7. The Chairman referred to the diverse nature of the situations in countries with indigenous and tribal peoples; including different social structures, standards, philosophies and doctrines embodied in legislation. He noted that some of these peoples were concentrated in specific areas while others were widely dispersed; some comprised a majority of the population of the country in which they lived, others a small minority; while some had a strong collectivist philosophy, others were very anxious to safeguard their individual rights. In the light of these variations, he considered that the challenge before the Committee was to draft a Convention which covered them all. The Chairman recalled the small number of ratifications of Convention No. 107 and stressed the need for a flexible approach if the new Convention was to be widely ratified. Although significant progress had been made on a number of items during the first discussion, there were a number of delicate questions still to be considered. In view of the relatively short time available, he believed it important to avoid any duplication of the previous discussions on points upon which agreement had been reached, particularly since he knew the Committee would be anxious to listen to the various representatives of the indigenous peoples. He then proposed to the Committee procedures under which international non-governmental organisations would be able to make interventions during the general discussion and during the consideration of the different Articles of the proposed Convention.

8. The Committee agreed that international non-governmental organisations would be allowed to make interventions during one hour of the general discussion. They would then be able to make 12 interventions at given moments during the discussion of the text of the draft Convention. The Committee also agreed to adjourn one sitting in order to be able to hear the views of non-governmental organisations which were not international organisations outside of its formal sittings.

General discussion

9. Many Government members expressed their support of the direction and thrust of the proposed Convention in Report IV(2B) and commended the Office for drafting a broadly acceptable text which took into account many of the different views which had been expressed. The inclusion of environmental issues in the text was welcomed. There was widespread support, also expressed during the first discussion, for the need to change the emphasis of the Convention from integration of indigenous and tribal peoples to respect for their cultures, traditions and unique circumstances. Several Government members referred to recent enactments of legislation on this subject in their countries and noted that their legislation went beyond the provisions contained in the proposed Convention.

10. The Government member of Brazil informed the Committee that the new Constitution of Brazil included provisions which were in line with the proposals in the proposed Convention. The Government member of the USSR informed the Committee of the considerable interest in the Convention which was being expressed in his country. He informed the Committee that associations of indigenous peoples would be set up to improve the legal status of autonomous groups to ensure that they retained their national identities, culture and customs. His Government regarded the issues of land and land rights as important ones for the Committee to resolve. He supported other speakers’ statements on the desirability of adopting a Convention which could be widely ratified and, in this regard, emphasised the need to harmonise the text in the different languages used. The Government member of the United States noted that the changed circumstances and a greater awareness of the needs of these peoples, which had resulted in the decision to undertake a partial revision of Convention No. 107, had also influenced the development of his Government’s policies towards American Indians. The proposed Convention focused on some of the areas addressed by the United States Congress in recent legislation. The Government member of Mexico pointed out that his Government was already making efforts to ensure that indigenous peoples fully enjoyed their fundamental human rights on an equal footing with all other citizens along the lines of the revised Convention. The Government member of Honduras drew the Committee’s attention to a new law precluding state interference in matters within the competence of indigenous peoples, which was drafted following extensive consultations with their representatives.

11. Notwithstanding the value of the proposed text as a sound basis for discussion, there was broad agreement among Government members that there were some important issues which would have to be resolved if the Conference wished to adopt a Convention which was universally acceptable, which would be ratified by as many States as possible, and which acknowledged the fundamental rights of indigenous and tribal peoples to retain their identity and traditional lifestyle and to make their own choices about the future. A number of Government members cited the small number of ratifications of Convention No. 107 in this regard. The Government member of Ecuador stated that the lack of economic resources in developing countries could hinder the application of the revised Convention. The severe economic crisis was adversely affecting the social, economic and cultural development of indigenous peoples.

12. Several Government members considered that the proposed revised Convention presupposed the existence of discrimination against indigenous and tribal peoples. They drew attention to their own constitutions and national law which guaranteed equality for all their citizens. The Government member of Bangladesh, in referring to recently enacted laws which gave sweeping political, administrative and legal power to the tribal people, was convinced that the existing provisions of Convention No. 107 were sufficiently comprehensive. He expressed concern that any attempt to introduce radical changes in the focus and orientation of the Convention would have detrimental effects on territorial integrity and conflict with existing constitutions and legal systems of many countries, and could discourage many countries from ratifying it. The speaker hoped that the revision would be limited to devising ways to further strengthen and protect the socio-cultural identity of indigenous and tribal population, rather than seeking rights for them which would be in conflict with national provisions. The Government member of Argentina also stated that his Government would be unable to accept any proposals which were in conflict with national laws and which could be interpreted as establishing a separate system for indigenous people with respect to the rights and obligations of the other citizens of the country. Several other Government members supported this view. The Government member of Japan considered that the scope of the Convention was unclear and could thus lead to an unnecessarily broad application at the national level. He stressed the seriousness of this problem, as the Convention had provisions on penalties, land rights and other basic issues possibly conflicting with national legal systems, and stated that unless these problems of the Conventions could be resolved, ratification by his country would be difficult. The Government member of India reiterated his position that the tribal peoples in India were not comparable in terms of their problems, interest and rights, to the indigenous populations of certain other countries. For this reason, attempts to set international standards on some of the complex and sensitive issues involved might prove to be counter-productive. The Government member of Peru stated that the revised Convention should not use terms in senses which were different from those used in international law, so that under an internationally applicable Convention indigenous peoples could enjoy the same rights as all other citizens.

13. In a preliminary exchange of views concerning terminology, the Government members of Argentina and Venezuela expressed a strong preference for the use of the term "populations" rather than "peoples" in order to avoid possible erroneous interpretation of the latter in the context of self-determination under international law. A similar concern on the possible interpretation of the term "peoples" in international law was expressed by the Government member of Canada. A number of other Government members expressed similar views but were prepared to consider a suitable qualifying clause to the term "peoples". The Government member of Ecuador noted that the term "indigenous nationalities" was used in his country. The Government member of India felt that the Committee should carefully consider the impact that the use of "peoples" could have in countries beset with the problems of integration. Moreover, he did not consider the term "peoples" to be relevant to the tribal situation in his country. The Government member of Australia noted in regard to the choice of term that his Government wished to explore further the application of Article 1 of the draft Convention. The Government member of Nicaragua said that the use of the term "peoples" did not imply the recognition of a State within a State. The Workers' members and a number of other Government members supported the use of the term "peoples" without any qualifying phrase, while the Employers' members expressed serious reservations.

14. The Chairman asked the Committee to give special attention in the general discussion to the questions of land and land rights and the use of the terms "lands" and "territories". The Government member of Australia drew attention to the need for greater consistency in the use of the terms "lands" and "territories", in line with the compromise suggested by the Office in Report IV(2B). The Government member of Denmark, on behalf of the Greenland Home Rule Government and the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, stressed the need to find language on land rights that was sufficiently flexible to meet the various situations faced by indigenous and tribal peoples as well as the national social and legal systems in different countries. This flexibility should be accompanied by strong provisions for the protection of rights, including the effective legal protection of traditional use of lands, as well as ownership and control of land. The Government member of India stated that his Government attached the utmost importance to preventing the alienation of tribal lands, and that state legislation had been enacted for this purpose. However, in view of the scarcity of land in his country, it would not be possible in all cases for his Government to dispossess the non-tribals of lands which the tribal populations had traditionally occupied. He considered that the wording of Convention No. 107 should be retained in this regard. In order to avoid the concept of nationhood, he felt that the word "territories" should be replaced by "areas". The Government member of New Zealand stated that the "two peoples-one nation" concept reflected in the Treaty of Waitangi was being actively pursued by his Government, which acknowledged the right of indigenous people to the control and enjoyment of those resources they wished to retain. He considered that it might be appropriate for governments to take meatures to re-endow indigenous peoples with certain lands and resources to ensure proper self-management and self-reliance in the true spirit of partnership. The Government member of Canada agreed with the objective of the Convention to oblige governments to deal fairly with indigenous claims to traditional lands. Legally settled claims, however, should not be reopened. The provisions dealing with the obligation to recognise rights in traditionally occupied land should therefore be more closely linked with the provisions obliging governments to provide for the settlement of disputes over land claims. It was important to adopt terminology which accommodated different national situations. The speaker reaffirmed her Government's concern over the use of the term "territories". In certain provisions both "lands" and "territories" had been used which implied that the legal obligation arising from this was applicable to two distinct geographical regions, namely the lands over which indigenous groups held recognised rights as well as the territories in which those lands were situated. She was of the view that the term "lands" should be used throughout, except in Article 7, which dealt with environmental threats where there could be effects which were not limited to areas over which these people had rights. Several other Government members expressed a preference for the use of "lands" rather than "territories" because of the implications for sovereignty and because of their national legislation on the use of land and surface resources. The Government member of the Philippines noted that her Government was discussing draft legislation for the creation of autonomous regions for indigenous peoples, and she described the consultation process whereby the ethnic minorities took part in decision-making which affected them. The communal nature of ancestral lands had been retained in the process of agrarian reform. The speaker noted that it was proposed to establish a Commission on Ancestral Domain, which would determine the location and boundaries of ancestral lands, including the recovery of lands which had been usurped. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that the question of land rights should be considered from a historical perspective, taking into account the duration of initial settlement by the peoples concerned. He referred to minorities in Africa, the Americas and Palestine in this regard. He believed that the Committee should not neglect the rights of the indigenous peoples of the world to land and to self-determination.

15. The Employers' members appreciated the opportunity they had had to consult with organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples regarding the revision of Convention No. 107. They felt that some of the points in the proposed Convention in Report IV(2B) had a political emphasis and referred to public international law, going beyond the scope of labour standards and social security, and were clearly the responsibility of governments. The Employers' members believed that the text should be seen in the light of national legislation, the social situation and the level of development and integration of these populations in each country. In order to be viable as an international labour standard, the text should not be too specific, locally-oriented or rigid in its approach. They considered that, since many of the points under consideration were effectively political topics, the fundamental responsibility for the discussion, approval and implementation of these issues rested with governments. The use of the term "peoples" presented problems regarding its political interpretation, and had connotations of social and national self-determination. The Employers' members expressed surprise that, notwithstanding agreement on the term "peoples/populations" at the first discussion, "peoples" had been used in the text proposed to the Conference. They could only accept "peoples" if it was clearly defined and if its use respected the identity, national unity and laws of each country. The use of the term should also be consistent with its use in other international instruments. For this reason, it needed to be reviewed in the preamble as well as in the relevant Articles of the draft Convention. The Employers' members pointed to the diverse meanings of the concept of "territory" at the national level, and stressed that national legislation with regard to ownership of resources including waters, flora, fauna, sub-surface resources and sea-ice had to be respected. In this context, the use of the term "lands and territories" would lead to controversy, and careful analysis of this issue was therefore required which, above all, respected national legislation. The Employers' members looked forward to working further with the indigenous and other groups in seeking the best solution to the issues before the Committee and the adoption of a flexible and universal text which would be ratified by countries with different characteristics.

16. The Workers' members noted the progress which had already been made towards removing the intergrationist orientation of Convention No. 107. This move accorded with their belief in the importance of self-identification by indigenous and tribal peoples, recognition and respect for their cultures, customs and laws, and the greatest control possible over their lands, territories and resources. The Workers' members unreservedly supported the use of the term "peoples" throughout the Convention. Moreover, they believed that the Convention should seek to ensure the agreement of the peoples concerned when legislative and administrative measures affecting them were drawn up, and should reflect the importance of their full involvement in environmental decision-making and management in their lands and territories. In this regard the Workers' members stressed that the Convention should embrace the more general concept of territories as well as land. Special attention needed to be given to the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples to the lands which they occupy or to which they have a legitimate claim, including sub-surface and other resources which are part of the lands and territories. When exploration and exploitation of natural resources were being considered, these peoples must have the maximum possible influence on decision-making and priority in the benefits of such exploitation. The Workers' members underlined their desire to arrive at a Convention which was capable of broad ratification and acceptance, and which reflected the legitimate aspirations and concerns of indigenous and tribal peoples.

17. The Director of the Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States expressed satisfaction with the process of revising Convention No. 107, which was the only international instrument protecting indigenous and tribal peoples.

The Institute was honoured at the reference to it in the Preamble. It had become clear during the revision process that the ILO was the proper organisation to deal with issues affecting these peoples. Revision of the Convention was important because there had been a number of recent developments in the relationships between these peoples and governments as a result of improved organisation and governments' increasing readiness to recognise their demands. The standards which would be adopted would serve as the basis for adapting policies and modernising legislation in the future. In referring to the activities of the Institute during the revision process, and to the progress achieved in a number of Latin American countries regarding the constitutional rights of indigenous peoples, the speaker noted the intensity of indigenous organisations' activities in defence of their own point of view. He felt that the discussions of the Convention were going in the right direction; he drew the Committee's attention to the claims being made by Indian peoples, and sought a fair hearing on their behalf. The use of the term "peoples" corresponded to the reality of the situation, and its clarification in Article 1 should be more positive. Turning to the issue of lands and territories traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples, he felt that the description needed to be more specific and cited Article 231 of the new Brazilian Constitution as containing a good example in this regard. He felt that the treatment of migration (Article 32 of the Convention) did not fully cover all the cases faced by indigenous peoples settling in border areas, and referred the Committee to Recommendation Nos. 19 and 20 adopted by the VIIIth Inter-American Indian Congress (Mérida, Mexico, 1980).

18. The representative of the United Nations stated that the United Nations Centre for Human Rights supported and followed with considerable interest and attention the partial revision of the Convention, and recalled that Convention No. 107 remained the only international instrument dealing with indigenous and tribal peoples. The Centre undertook to continue its long-standing fruitful mutual collaboration with the ILO in this field. The speaker informed the Committee of the status of the standing-setting activities undertaken by the Working Group on Indigenous Populations of the United Nations Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities in considering the principles to be included in a future draft declaration on indigenous rights.

19. The Committee also heard statements from international non-governmental organisations which were attending the Conference in accordance with article 56, paragraph 9, of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference. Each reaffirmed the significance of the revision of the Convention and most noted with satisfaction the progress that had been made since the first discussion in 1988. The revision of the Convention was an opportunity to apply concrete provisions which would preserve the lives and cultures of indigenous and tribal peoples. The organisations themselves had been active in the past year canvassing their members and making their views and concerns known to relevant governments and employers' and workers' organisations. They referred to recent events in Bangladesh, and in Brazil and elsewhere in Latin America, which improved the rights of indigenous peoples. All of the representatives strongly supported the use of the term "peoples" without any prejudicial qualifications, comments or conditions. The representative of the Four Direction Council noted that it was increasingly the terminology of preference in the United Nations and it constituted a determination to deal with peoples as organised groups, not as aggregations of individuals. In seeking the use of "peoples", indigenous and tribal peoples were not advocating secession.

20. The representative of the World Council of Indigenous Peoples supported the statements made during the first discussion concerning the obligation of the ILO to update the concepts and mechanisms which governed the relations between indigenous and tribal peoples and governments. It was difficult to establish communications between the two based on concepts developed in the 1950s, such as the concept of minority groups. The Council recognised the efforts of many non-governmental organisations which had communicated with other organisations, as well as with the spokesmen for indigenous peoples. He regretted, however, that only six governments had held consultations with indigenous peoples before finalising their replies (Report IV(2A)) and expressed the hope that the situation would soon improve. He felt that the limitations which were imposed by the terms of reference of the ILO were clearly reflected in the process of setting standards affecting indigenous peoples without allowing them to participate fully. The speaker enumerated several points of substance for the Committee's consideration. The crucial point was land and he was convinced that this issue should be resolved so as to give a positive impetus to the final shape of the Convention. He also cited ecology, education, employment and economic and social aspects as issues on which the Committee needed to make progress if the indigenous and tribal peoples of the world were to be helped. The speaker pointed out that the World Council of Indigenous Peoples was in a good position to advise the social partners so that the development of the Convention could proceed in a positive manner.

21. The representative of the International Organization of Indigenous Resource Development appreciated the opportunity to represent his members before the Committee. He believed that the failure to recognise the unanimous request of the indigenous peoples' organisations for the use of the term "peoples" would perpetuate the philosophy of racism which all participants were determined to eliminate. He took exception to the concept that the scope of the Convention should remain within existing national legislation, and pointed out that existing legislation had not protected these peoples, who remained the poorest of the poor. What was required was the setting of forward-looking standards which would encourage States to improve their legislation, even at the expense of preventing widespread ratification of the Convention. Indigenous peoples did not want the Convention to be token endorsement of their rights by States which did not intend to respect those rights. The representative recognised that while all States endorsed the concept of cultural rights, support for social and economic rights faded away when land and resources were concerned; the theft of lands and resources had been instrumental in causing the present situation of indigenous peoples. He emphasised the need for the protection and respect of the traditional economies of these peoples, including the use of their natural resources as a means of sustaining a viable economic base.

22. The representative of the Indigenous World Association expressed his concern over the lack of consultation by governments with indigenous and tribal peoples on this important issue, and considered that action to revise the Convention should be suspended until adequate consultations had occurred. He also called for greater representation of these peoples in the Government, Workers' and Employers' groups of the ILO. He emphasised the importance of their access to natural resources associated with the lands they own and occupy and the prevention of expropriation of their resources by governments.

23. The representative of the Four Directions Council considered that the revised Convention could not and should not spell out the precise relationship between indigenous institutions and nation States since the relationship would necessarily vary according to regional circumstances and would evolve over time. The essence of the revision was procedural and the principle was the participation of indigenous and tribal peoples as social partners with the right to organise – an approach which was entirely consistent with the work of the ILO. He noted that while the question of self-determination in the sense of decolonisation, which was a matter for the United Nations, would not be settled by the Convention, that instrument should not foreclose the possibility of achieving self-determination in appropriate circumstances by any peoples. He saw the draft United Nations Universal Declaration of Indigenous Rights as complementary to the revised Convention. In the context of social partnership, the right to self-determination of these peoples was fundamentally their right to remain as distinct societies as opposed to assimilating with other sections of the national population. He stated that land rights was a labour problem, and therefore a concern of the ILO, since dispossession turned farmers into landless workers and itinerant labourers. While Convention No. 107 had tried to minimise dispossession, the revision should go further by providing the means for indigenous and tribal peoples' self-development on their own lands so that they would not be dispossessed either by force or by poverty. He pointed out that the right of these peoples to control the development and exploitation of natural resources, in cases where they had acquired these rights, had not resulted in these resources being removed from possibilities of exploitation. These peoples had in fact become less hostile in such cases towards new development activities because of their involvement in the decision-making process and their share in the benefits. The speaker considered that the ILO should look beyond the immediate task of revising the Convention and should prepare a plan of action for promoting and facilitating the new kind of social partnership it would entail. This would include technical assistance to strengthen co-operation among indigenous and tribal peoples, and between them and the social partners, particularly as concerned sustainable development, environmental protection and employment creation.

Consideration of the proposed Convention in Report IV (2B)

PREAMBLE

24. Ten amendments on the Preamble had been submitted to the Committee. The Government member of Canada proposed that all of the amendments be withdrawn and the Office text adopted. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the proposal. Several Government members added their support. All amendments were withdrawn.

25. The Preamble was adopted unchanged.

PART I. GENERAL POLICY

26. The representative of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference recalled that a majority of governments making comments on the proposed text circulated by the Office, following the first discussion, had supported the use of the term "peoples". She expressed the conviction that there were no legal grounds to governments' opposition to the term on the basis that its use accorded the right to self-determination as understood in international law. She referred to a number of United Nations instruments in support of her contention, including General Assembly resolution 1514(XV), and quoted from the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples in support of her position that a recognition of the right to self-determination would not lead to the dissolution of States. She also stated that any questions concerning political self-determination were outside both the scope of the revised Convention and the competence of the ILO. She noted that the draft the preamble adequately addressed the concerns felt by some governments, by indicating that the Convention would be applicable within the framework of the States in which the peoples lived. The speaker underlined that many peoples could enjoy collective rights. The Inuit Circumpolar Conference was seeking the right of indigenous and tribal peoples to control their own lives, cultures and territories. For this reason, it could not accept any qualification of the term "peoples" in the Convention. No other peoples were discriminated against in this way and such efforts to diminish the basic human rights of indigenous and tribal peoples would be contrary to the Constitution of the ILO among other instruments; the unqualified term "peoples" should be used throughout the Convention.

27. The Co-ordinator for Indigenous Organisations of the Amazon Basin strongly advocated the use of the term "peoples" in the Convention. He stressed the need to understand the position of indigenous and tribal peoples which stemmed from centuries-old history of settlement on territories which resulted in specific languages, customs and histories which no authority could force them to abandon. He stressed that indigenous and tribal peoples had never expressed the wish to create a state within a state. They were a true part of the country to which they belonged and has amply demonstrated that they had not and would not undertake the action regarding self-determination which some governments feared.

28. The representative of the Indian Council of South America emphasised that indigenous and tribal peoples had considered themselves peoples since before colonisation. The threat to political sovereignty which governments perceived from the use of the term "peoples" was being used to discriminate against them, to undermine their fundamental human rights and to deprive them of the natural resources on which their survival depended. Self-determination was a universal concept which was used to determine membership in a particular group. The speaker considered that the term "peoples" should not be qualified under any circumstances. He stressed that a Convention was necessary to take care of indigenous and tribal peoples' needs since there were no adequate means to implement the existing laws. If these peoples' rights were ignored again, it would result in the continuation of discrimination against them.

Article 1¹

29. The Committee had before it 19 amendments to Article 1. After some discussion the Chairman noted that three options had emerged regarding the terms used in Article 1 and in consequence throughout the Convention. These were "populations", "peoples", and "peoples" plus a wording for paragraph 3 of this Article stating that the use of this term had a specific meaning in the Convention. After each amendment had been introduced by its sponsor there was a lengthy discussion, plus consultations outside the meetings, in an attempt to obtain an acceptable text for paragraph 3 of Article 1.

30. The Chairman believed that an effort should be made to accept the text as drafted by the Office in order to retain the essence of the meaning of the Article. As a result of the foregoing discussions he suggested that paragraph 3 be amended by replacing the words "other international instruments" by "international law". In addition to adopting this change, he proposed that the Committee approve the text of an explanatory statement which would be included in its report. The text of the statement would serve as an instrument of clarification for the interpretation of the meaning of the Convention.

31. This statement read as follows:

It is understood by the Committee that the use of the term "peoples" in this Convention has no implication as regards the right to self-determination as understood in international law.

32. The Chairman believed that, with the amendment and the explanatory statement in the report, the Committee could reach an understanding which covered the need expressed by several Government members for the term "peoples" to be accompanied by a clarification as to the impact of its use. Speaking in his own name, he considered that the clarification would imply that, among many other rights, indigenous and tribal peoples had the right of a large degree of self-determination within the framework of national States, but that any implications regarding self-determination in international law were outside the area of competence of the ILO.

33. The Chairman considered that the inclusion of the term "peoples" in the Convention represented substantial progress. He felt that it expressed recognition of the rights of these peoples to their culture, respect and self-determination which were needed by all the peoples of the world. He believed that the proposed text and clarifying statement, which were arrived at after intense consultations, would serve as a good basis for understanding the Convention's intent.

34. The Workers' members supported the amendment to paragraph 3 and associated themselves with the explanatory statement. They were, however, not fully satisfied with the compromise which had emerged, and they reserved the right to explain their position during the discussion of the report in the plenary.

35. The Employers' members had discussed the proposals extensively and had concluded that in the spirit and tradition of the ILO they should support them. They expressed full support for the amendment to paragraph 3, and for the explanatory text. They believed that reaching an acceptable compromise was a notable achievement with respect to the ability of the Committee properly to complete its task. The Employers' members, like the Workers' members, were not entirely satisfied with the outcome of the discussions and felt that many of the elements in the Convention did not fit within the framework of the ILO. While they reserved their right to present their point of view during the plenary discussion, the Employers' members, in the spirit of consensus, offered their full support for the two proposals.

36. The Government member of Portugal supported the proposed amendment to paragraph 3. She expressed her Government's reservations over the explanatory text and stated that it was not for the ILO to address the question of self-determination. This was a basic human right that could not be taken away and she considered that it should not be referred to in the Convention. Her Government interpreted the text as having no implications for the universal right to self-determination. She would, however, respect the consensus which had been achieved. The Government member of Peru stated that while his delegation preferred the term "peoples" it was concerned about the links between this term and the right to self-determination. He suggested that if governments did not wish to provide self-determination to peoples, another term should be used. Alternatively, a footnote could be inserted in the text of the Convention to the effect that use of the terms "peoples" did not connote any right to self-determination. He considered, however, that a Convention with such a footnote would not be ratifiable. What had occurred was the settlement of an important point in international law in a bureaucratic manner. His delegation would accept the proposed amendment and the inclusion of an explanatory text in the report in the spirit of consensus, but he expressed his Government's serious reservations. The Government member of Ecuador supported the views of the Government members of Portugal and Peru. He noted that the text contained no implications regarding the right to self-determination as understood in international law and he pointed out that this did not diminish the impact of the term in other international instruments. He regretted that since his Government had not had the opportunity to participate in the consultations concerning the proposed text, he would have to explain his delegation's position at a later stage.

37. The Government member of the USSR expressed satisfaction with the proposed amendment to paragraph 3 and appreciated the efforts made to achieve consensus. He was concerned about the proposed explanatory statement and was unsure of its appropriateness in an ILO document. He would, however, support the consensus. The Government member of India appreciated the efforts involved in the discussions. He noted that a number of governments had voiced genuine reservations about the proposed text, and further noted that his country, with a large tribal population, had the most cause of any to be concerned about this matter. His delegation would, however, abide by the consensus.

38. The Government member of Argentina stated that while his Government was not in favour of the use of the term "peoples" it would have been able to accept its use, provided that a clause was included in the text of the Convention itself which indicated clearly that there would be no implications for self-determination under international law. His delegation would not obstruct the consensus on the amendment and the proposed text for the report but it was not satisfied and expressed its reservations. The Government member of Venezuela expressed his appreciation of the efforts made by many governments in accepting the proposals. He appreciated that the Workers' members had made significant concessions. His delegation could not support the consensus which had been reached but it would not oppose it. The Government member of Brazil joined in acknowledging the efforts of all who took part in attempting to find a solution to this issue. His delegation, which had made strenuous efforts to accept the compromise, joined in the spirit of the consensus.

39. The Government member of Canada acknowledged the efforts of all involved in achieving an acceptable solution and appreciated the statement made by the Workers' members. He recognised the difficulties which they had overcome in order to reach a consensus. His delegation supported, without reservation, the amendment and the text for inclusion in the report. The Government members of Australia, Honduras, New Zealand and the United States made similar statements of support.

40. The Government member of Norway welcomed the use of the term "peoples". While he did not see the need for a qualifying statement, since the notion of peoples had no clear legal definition, he welcomed and accepted the compromise. This view was shared by the Government member of Denmark.

41. The Government member of Columbia stated that, while he would have preferred a clause which referred to all of the terms included in the draft Convention, he would support the consensus.

42. During his summary of the discussion on the amendment to Article 1, paragraph 3, the Chairman referred to the remarks of the Government member of Ecuador who had said that there was no reference in the Convention to any limitation on self-determination. The Chairman considered that the text was distancing itself to a certain extent from a subject which was outside the competence of the ILO. In his opinion, no position for or against self-determination was or could be expressed in the Convention, nor could any restrictions be expressed in the context of international law.

43. The text of paragraph 3, as amended, together with the inclusion in the report of the explanatory statement, which appears in paragraph 31 above, was adopted by consensus.

44. The Employers' and Workers' members considered that in the light of the agreement on the amended text, the remaining amendments to Article 1 should not be discussed. Several Government members supported this view. It was agreed to submit three amendments submitted by the Government members of Canada, Colombia and the USSR to the Drafting Committee.

45. Article 1, as amended, was adopted.

Article 2

46. The Committee had six amendments before it. First, the Government member of Colombia introduced an amendment with the triple purpose of harmonising the text of paragraph 1 of the Article in the three languages, of adding a requirement that the participation of indigenous peoples be "direct and authentic", and of substituting the word "safeguard" for "protect", which he felt was paternalistic. The Workers' members supported the amendment since it would strengthen the involvement of these peoples and would assist them to safeguard their rights. This view was shared by the Government members of Ecuador and Nicaragua. The Employers' members preferred the Office text which offered adequate protection and avoided paternalism; they did not support the substantive part of the amendment. Several Government members expressed similar views. The Government member of Peru wished to subamend the Office text by adding the word "safeguarding", but the Government member of India questioned whether this proposal would add anything to the provisions already in the text. The proposed drafting changes were referred to the Drafting Committee and the rest of the amendment was not adopted. A second amendment to strengthen the text of paragraph 2(a) by replacing "enabling" with "ensuring that" was proposed by the Government member of Colombia. The amendment was supported by the Workers' members and by the Government members of Ecuador and Brazil and was adopted by consensus. An amendment proposed by the Government member of the USSR was not seconded. An amendment to paragraph 2(c), which would require governments to devise measures to eliminate social and economic gaps between indigenous and tribal peoples and other members of the community, was proposed by the Government member of New Zealand. The Workers' members supported the amendment and proposed a subamendment to restore the phrase "assisting the members of the peoples concerned". The Employers' members and several Government members supported the amendment as subamended and it was adopted. As a result, an amendment on the same subject proposed by the Government member of Colombia was not considered.

47. The Government member of Ecuador proposed an amendment to add a new paragraph 2(d) which would require measures to guarantee the territorial integrity of indigenous and tribal peoples. The Workers' members supported the amendment which recognised the strong ties between cultures and territories. On a suggestion of the Employers' members, supported by several Government members, it was decided to consider this amendment during discussion of Part II of the proposed Convention.

48. Article 2, as amended, was adopted.

49. Four amendments were submitted on this Article. The first, to add a sentence to paragraph 1 in order to provide that the Convention be applied without discrimination to male and female members of these peoples, was submitted by the Government members of Sweden, Canada, Denmark, Finland, the United States and Norway. The Government member of Sweden stressed that the provision in the draft amendment was addressed to governments. The Workers' members, in supporting the amendment, recalled that this point had already been raised during the first discussion in 1988. The Employers' members considered that since the amendment stressed discrimination on the basis of sex alone it could create the impression that the Convention had a special focus on this subject. They recalled that Article 2 already called for the observance of human rights on a basis of equality, and did not support the amendment. The Government member of Canada, in supporting the amendment, stated that it concerned the widespread nature of sexual discrimination and the fact that this form of discrimination was often the most pervasive and least recognised. She considered that the amendment would serve as a reminder to governments that special efforts were required to avoid sexual discrimination in areas such as vocational training, social security and health. The Employers' members withdrew their objection and the amendment was adopted by consensus.

50. When submitting an amendment, in order to ensure that the legal use of force would not be prevented by paragraph 2, the Government member of Japan sought a clarification concerning the coverage of this provision. A representative of the Secretary-General stated that the legitimate use of force, for instance in connection with law enforcement, would not be excluded by the text of Article 3, paragraph 2. The amendment was withdrawn.

51. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members which affected the French text only was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government member of Ecuador had proposed an amendment to add an additional paragraph concerning the legal recognition by governments of indigenous organisations. At his suggestion the Committee agreed to defer consideration of the amendment until it discussed Article 6.

52. Article 3, as amended, was adopted.

Article 4

53. The Committee had before it nine amendments to Article 4. Separate amendments submitted by the Government members of Argentina and Colombia to replace the word "protector" in the proposed text in Spanish were referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government member of Ecuador submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 which would add the words "form of organisation" after "property" and the word "territory" after "labour". He drew attention to the need for governments to implement special measures to protect the form of organisation and environment of the peoples concerned. The Chairman suggested that consideration of "territories" be left to the results of the discussion of Part II of the draft Convention. The Workers' members considered that the reference to institutions in the Office text covered the form of organisation and proposed by subamendment to add the word "cultures" after "territory". The Employers' members agreed with the Chairman's suggestion concerning consideration of "territories" and did not support the rest of the amendment or the subamendment. The Committee followed the Chairman's suggestions. The amendment was not adopted. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to insert the words "cultures, territories" after "labour" in paragraph 1 in order to stress the importance of linking economic, social and cultural issues to land and territories. They agreed to the consideration of "territories" during the discussion on Part II. The Employers' members accepted the addition of "cultures". The Government member of India stated that, since "cultures" was already dealt with in Article 2, it would be repetitious to include it in Article 4. The Chairman suggested that use of the word "cultures", while repetitious, would not be contradictory. The Committee agreed and its inclusion was adopted. Consideration of "territories" was again deferred.

54. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to add the words "without prejudice to national interests" to the end of paragraph 1. The purpose of the amendment was to avoid discrimination against other sectors of society. The Workers' members considered that since the draft Convention already contained adequate qualification, the amendment would not add to the text. In addition, they considered that any special measures could be prejudicial if they were directed towards a particular group. After several Government members expressed opposition to the amendment, the Employers' members withdrew it.

55. The Government member of Colombia submitted an amendment to paragraph 2 to provide that any special measures adopted be designed and executed jointly with indigenous and tribal peoples. The Government member of New Zealand supported the amendment. The Employers' and Workers' members did not support the amendment. The Workers' members did not want to sacrifice the clear statement and guidance to governments which was contained in the draft text. After the Government member of Canada had indicated that the point was dealt with in Article 33, paragraph 2, the amendment was withdrawn.

56. An amendment to paragraph 2, introduced by the Workers' members, sought to maintain consistency with the intent of the Office, and to recognise the reality of historical experience, when coercion and economic blackmail had been used to obtain consent. The Employers' members supported the amendment to ensure that the wishes of these peoples be expressed freely, and it was adopted unanimously.

57. Another amendment, which affected the Spanish text of paragraph 3, was submitted by the Government member of Colombia and was referred to the Drafting Committee.

58. Article 4, as amended, was adopted.

59. The Committee has 11 amendments to this Article before it. An amendment to join subparagraphs (a) and (b), which was submitted by the government member of Colombia, was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government member of Ecuador proposed an amendment to subparagraph (a) to include a reference to the economic structures of the peoples concerned. The Government member of Peru supported the amendment and proposed a subamendment to restore the word "protect". The Government member of Argentina supported the amendment but felt that "protect" was too paternalistic a term. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and the subamendment. They considered that the reference to institutions in subparagraph (b) was sufficient. This view was echoed by the Employers' members. The amendment was withdrawn.

60. The Government member of New Zealand submitted an amendment to include a reference to spiritual values in subparagraph (a). He explained that its meaning was wider than that of the word "religious". The Employers' members stated that in their discussions with indigenous groups they had learned that spiritual characteristics and religious characteristics were not the same. They supported the amendment, as did the Workers' members, and it was adopted by consensus.

61. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Argentina to replace the word "protected" by "preserved" was not seconded. The Government member of Colombia proposed an amendment to replace "protected" by "safeguarded" in order to accord more closely with the wishes of these peoples. The Workers' members did not support the amendment but were prepared to agree to it being sent to the Drafting Committee. This course of action was adopted.

62. The Employers' members introduced an amendment to delete "both as groups and as individuals" from subparagraph (a). They considered that the amendment would clarify the proposed text which, as it stood, could result in protectionist legislation. Article 5 referred to communities of individuals. If groups of individuals were stressed, it could cause problems because the Convention was intended to deal with the whole. The Workers' members considered it important to distinguish between the problems of groups and individuals and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Australia questioned the Office concerning collective and individual rights when the plural was used in the text. A representative of the Secretary-General recalled that in general terms the Committee had wished to refer to individuals when members of these peoples were referred to in the text, and to collective rights when peoples were referred to. He noted that the draft text came from Convention No. 107 and considered that the intent was to distinguish between groups and individuals. The Government member of Australia felt that the amended text left open the question of whether the subparagraph would refer to individuals. The amendment did not receive sufficient support and was not adopted.

63. Two amendments to subparagraphs (b) and (c) submitted by the Government member of Ecuador were not seconded and therefore not considered. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to replace "adjusting to" by "encountering" in subparagraph (c). They considered that the draft text contained an element of compulsion which would be removed by the amendment. Several Government members expressed their support for the amendment. After some discussion it was agreed that the Spanish text needed redrafting since it did not reflect the sense of the English text. The amendment was adopted and the Spanish text was referred to the Drafting Committee. As a result, a similar amendment submitted by the Government member of Colombia was not considered.

64. The Government member of Ecuador introduced an amendment to add a new subparagraph (d), which would supplement the Article by referring to the need to guarantee cultural diversity. The Employers' members noted that it was for member States to resolve how to protect these values. They felt that the amendment could lead to claims for guarantees in the legislation of States which adopted the Convention, and they opposed the amendment. The Workers' members, in opposing the amendment, associated themselves with the Employers' members' viewpoint and added that the point was already covered in Article 2(2)(b). The Government member of the Philippines said that she understood the philosophy behind the amendment and proposed to subamend it by replacing the word "development" with "integrity" in order to preserve cultural diversity. The Employers' members noted that "integrity" was mentioned in subparagraph (b) and did not support the subamendment. The Government member of Canada agreed with the Workers' and Employers' members and felt that a requirement to guarantee a cultural diversity went beyond the scope of Article 5. The amendment was not adopted.

65. Article 5, as amended, was adopted.

66. In accordance with the arrangements already agreed to by the Committee, a representative of the World Council of Indigenous Peoples made a statement on Article 6 to 12 of the proposed Convention. He noted that there were two views concerning opportunities offered by the revision of Convention No. 107. First, there was the opportunity to take a historical step in transferring greater control to indigenous and tribal peoples than had ever been done before. The second view, to which he subscribed, was the far more challenging opportunity to affect dramatically the evolutionary process of humankind. Rather than addressing the degree of control within the relationship between these peoples and States, the speaker believed it important to address the essence of the relationship itself. He considered that Article 6 to 12 addressed the issues surrounding the building of a new relationship with indigenous and tribal peoples, as equals. To do so it was necessary to step back from the existing model of the oppressor and the oppressed which, over time, had merely dehumanised both sides. The speaker insisted that, in relation to Article 6, indigenous and tribal peoples should have the power to accept or reject actions or programmes which affected them. Anything less would constitute a denial of their integrity as peoples to control their own destiny. He also drew the Committee's attention to Article 8 and 9 concerning respect for customs and customary laws, and considered that peoples' customary laws and methods of obtaining social order among themselves should be respected. He objected to the imposition of the national legal system on indigenous and tribal peoples, defining what it considered to be fundamental rights which were based on its own historical and cultural perspectives.

67. Thirteen amendments were submitted on Article 6. The Government member of Norway recalled that this issue had been considered at length during the first discussion in 1988, and noted that the conclusions adopted then had been adequately reflected in the proposed text. He expressed the hope that the Article could be adopted without amendment.

68. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to paragraph 1(a) to replace "consult" by "obtain the consent of". They felt that the draft text would require only contact rather than consent, and that this would enable government to undertake unilateral action. The Employers' members considered that the language in the draft text was in accordance with ILO use of the term "consult" which meant dialogue at least. The amendment would make the text too rigid and they did not support it. The Government member of Canada recalled that during the first discussion there had been consensus that the term "consult" meant to consult in good faith. He felt that expressing the objective of obtaining consent was unrealistic, especially in countries with many different indigenous and tribal groups. He opposed the amendment. Several other Government members also opposed the amendment. The Workers' members regretted the lack of support for the amendment from the other members of the Committee. The amendment was not adopted.

69. The Government member of Brazil introduced the second amendment to paragraph 1 which was to replace "consult" by "hear". He noted that this term was used in the new Brazilian Constitution and felt that its use in this Article would facilitate acceptance of the Convention by Brazil and other countries without detracting from the substance of the provision. The Workers' members felt that the draft text submitted by the Office was appropriate since it required a dialogue, whereas the amendment could refer to a one-sided procedure. They did not support the amendment. The Government member of Brazil stated that for his Government "consult" meant openly finding out opinions. He withdrew the amendment.

70. Two amendments to paragraph 1(b) were submitted by the Government member of Brazil and the Workers' members, each of which sought to amend that part of the text which referred to other sectors of the population. The Workers' members withdrew their amendment. That of the Government member of Brazil was not seconded and was not considered.

71. Two amendments to paragraph 1(b), submitted by the Government members of Ecuador and Colombia, were considered together. The Government member of Ecuador stated that he wished to make the paragraph more consistent within the framework of a law or treaty through the use of "could" rather than "may". He also proposed to replace "affect them directly" by the words "concern them". The Government member of Colombia considered that it would be discriminatory if indigenous and tribal peoples could only participate in decision-making on matters which directly affected them. He therefore supported the proposal to use the words "concern them". He also noted that he wished to use a word which was stronger than "podrán" in the Spanish text. The Workers' members strongly supported the amendments. The Employers' members supported the change of emphasis in the Spanish text but felt that the other changes were unnecessary. They noted that the Convention pointed out the equality between these peoples and other citizens of a given country, and felt that the Office text corresponded perfectly with the needs of these peoples. They did not support the amendments. The Government member of Brazil accorded with the Employers' members' point of view. The Government member of the Netherlands agreed with the idea of according the full right to participate in decision-making. He noted, however, that this had been dealt with in Article 2 and that Article 8 dealt with other relevant matters. He did not support the amendments. The Government member of Portugal supported the amendments, since she felt that there should not be any negative discrimination between indigenous and tribal peoples and the rest of the population. Several other Government members (Botswana, Denmark, New Zealand, Nicaragua and USSR) supported the amendments. The Employers' members withdrew their opposition and the amendments were adopted.

72. An amendment to paragraph 1(c) which was proposed by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and was not discussed. The Workers' members submitted a three-part amendment. They said that the use of the words "establish means for" would ensure that governments provided assistance, whereas opportunities were already available. They considered the replacement of "their" by "these peoples" to be consistent with the rest of the text and felt that the deletion of "in appropriate cases" would remove opportunities for governments to avoid co-operation. The Employers' members proposed a subamendment to delete the third part of the amendment, in order to retain flexibility in the Convention. The Workers' members did not accept this subamendment. Several Government members supported the subamendment. The Workers' members withdrew the third part of their amendment, which was then adopted as subamended.

73. An amendment to paragraph 2 submitted by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and was not considered. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada was withdrawn in favour of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Argentina and Bolivia. The Government member of Argentina said that the purpose of the amendment was to ensure effective participation of peoples in decisions which affected them, avoiding the use of the words "consent" or "agreement" which could make it difficult to ratify the Convention. The Workers' members considered that the replacement of the phrase relating to the achieving of agreement or consent would weaken the Article and opposed the amendment. Government members were evenly divided in their support for the amendment and for the draft text submitted by the Office. The Government member of Portugal, who opposed the amendment, believed that governments' concerns were fully covered in paragraph 1(a) of Article 6. The Government member of Denmark felt that sufficient flexibility in the wording was secured by the words "with the objective of" and opposed the amendment. The Employers' members considered that the extent of countries' experience with the issue had to be borne in mind and pointed out that not all countries had adequate resources to implement such requirements. They considered the text of the amendment to be realistic and supported it. The Workers' members pointed out that the purpose of any consultations was to reach an agreement, not merely to exchange information, but the amendment did not convey this meaning. The Government members of Australia, USSR and the United States supported this view. The Government member of Bolivia said that he did not wish to belittle the concept of consultation or to deprive these peoples of the opportunity of airing their opinions. The consultative system had to be applied in good faith. Before public authorities could obtain either agreement or consent, they had to consult. He did not want to see the opportunities for consultation reduced, but he felt that national legislative requirements should be taken into account. He supported the amendment. The Government members of Ecuador and India supported this view. The Government member of Argentina, in a statement clarifying the intention of the amendment, stated that the draft text submitted by the Office would give indigenous and tribal peoples opportunities to veto governments' decisions. States would have to obtain the consent of these peoples before taking decisions; such a procedure was not feasible. He realised the necessity of consulting with and involving these peoples, but felt that the draft text was too rigid and would lead to problems for ratification. The Government member of Brazil expressed his full support for the amendment and stated that his Government would be unable to ratify the Convention with the text as it stood. The Workers' members called for a vote. The Government member of Venezuela, supporting the statement of the Government member of Argentina on the intent of the amendment, which he supported, felt that for the Convention to be universal in its application, efforts to reach an agreement should continue. The Government member of Portugal understood that the amendment addressed the fact that no part of a nation's population had the right to oppose a law after its adoption. She pointed out, however, that the situation under discussion was a prior phase of the legal process when consideration was being given to proposed measures. Consultations were imperative at this juncture if governments were to be able to persuade people of the validity of their policies. She considered that the text did not clash with the legitimate concerns expressed by some Government members.

74. A representative of the Secretary-General stated that in drafting the text, the Office had not intended to suggest that the consultations referred to would have to result in the obtaining of agreement or consent of those being consulted, but rather to express an objective for the consultations. The Government members of Peru and the United States felt that the explanation was helpful, and considered that no right of veto would be acceptable. The Employers' members, in the light of the explanation, proposed to subamend the Office text. The Workers' members pointed out that the Office text could not be subamended at this stage and repeated their call for a vote. The amendment was rejected by 750 votes in favour, 795 against, with 45 abstentions.

75. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to add words to paragraph 2 which they considered would make it more specific and not subject to misinterpretation. The Employers' members noted that the amendment overlapped part of the text in Article 33 of the proposed Convention and would also introduce new elements in the amendment were alien to the goals of paragraph 2 as explained by the Office. They opposed the amendment. The Government member of the United States supported the views of the Employers' members. The amendment was not adopted.

76. The Government member of Ecuador introduced an amendment to add a paragraph to Article 2 with the intention of making it more specific so that it would facilitate the consultative process and make it clear who was to be consulted under the terms of Article 6. The Employers' members agreed with the concept of the amendment but felt that it was already covered by the wording of paragraph 1(a) of the Article. They considered that the addition of administrative detail would endanger the future of the text. They did not support the amendment. The Workers' members opposed the amendment, which was not adopted.

77. Article 6, as amended, was adopted.

Article 7

78. The Committee had 19 amendments before it. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to paragraph 1 to give priority to the examination of plans rather than to the improvements themselves. They felt that the development plans referred to in paragraph 1 would be important in each country and they wanted to ensure they were examined. The Government member of Japan, in supporting the amendment, expressed the view that the draft Office text gave priority to the peoples concerned at the expense of the rest of the population. The Workers' members felt that the amendment would create uncertainty in the text and did not support it. The Government member of Portugal considered that the text did not imply any discrimination and opposed the amendment. This view was supported by the Government member of Colombia. The amendment was not adopted.

79. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to add the words "to the extent possible" to the end of the first sentence of paragraph 1. He stated that although these peoples' welfare needed to be considered within overall economic development plans, the extent of assistance should depend on economic circumstances, and should not discriminate against other members of the community. The Employers' members held the same view about this amendment as they did about their previous one and supported it. They noted that, when speaking of areas of countries, it was necessary to consider priorities to the extent possible. They considered that the text should be more flexible and take national realities into account since any improvements would be subject to means being available to implement them. The Workers' members felt that flexibility was adequately covered in draft Article 34 and did not support the amendment. The amendment was not adopted.

80. Discussion of an amendment to paragraph 2 submitted by the Government member of Australia was deferred until after consideration of Part II of the Convention. An amendment submitted by the Employers' members to add the words "to the extent possible" to the beginning of paragraph 2 was opposed by the Government member of Colombia. He noted that it had the same intention as an amendment to paragraph 1 which had not been adopted. The Government member of Venezuela stated that the amendment should be adopted and the paragraph subsequently referred to the Drafting Committee. The amendment was not adopted. The Government member of Venezuela expressed his Government's reservations on the question.

81. Consideration of three amendments proposing to replace the word "territories" by "lands", which were submitted by the Government members of India and Canada and by the Employers' members, was deferred until Part II of the Convention had been discussed. When that Part of the Convention had been discussed, the Committee decided to replace the word "territories" in paragraph 2 by "the land they occupy or otherwise use". An amendment submitted by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and was not considered. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the USSR which affected the English and French language texts was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government members of Colombia and India each withdrew an amendment to paragraph 2.

82. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to delete two phrases in paragraph 2. The deletion of "to the extent possible" was proposed because they felt that its use should be contained in the general provisions of the Convention. They considered that the deletion of "their own priorities for" was necessary because the Article contained a right which had already been accepted, and because peoples should control their own process of development. The Employers' members felt that the flexibility which was in the draft Office text was required and opposed the amendment. The Government member of Brazil did not support the amendment. The Government member of India said that priorities were already dealt with in Article 7, and it would be difficult for governments to support the text if so amended. The amendment was not adopted.

83. The Government member of Ecuador proposed an amendment to paragraph 3 which he stated would enable these peoples to be involved more actively than was provided for in the Office text. The Employers' members had considered the amendment to be in two parts. They felt that no purpose would be served by changing "co-operation" to "participation". The second change related to participation of indigenous and tribal peoples' representatives in carrying out studies. They felt that this was not necessarily the most suitable method. Moreover, they considered that the removal of the words "whenever appropriate" would make the text too rigid and difficult for governments to ratify. They did not support the amendment. The Workers' members expressed their preference for "co-operation" and opposed the amendment. The Government members of Canada and the United States preferred the draft Office text. The Government member of Colombia stated that each human group had representatives and it was important to take their views into account. He supported the amendment. The Chairman recalled that when Article 6 was discussed, a similar problem had been dealt with. The amendment was not adopted.

84. The Government member of Colombia introduced an amendment in which he proposed to delete "whenever appropriate" and add a sentence to the paragraph to the effect that the results of studies should be fundamental criteria for the implementation of the activities concerned. While recognising the principle behind the amendment, the Employers' members did not support it. They considered that the elimination of the words "whenever possible", would remove the flexibility of the paragraph. They questioned how studies, which were normally theoretical, could be fundamental criteria. The Workers' members, in supporting the amendment, stated that there was no point in having studies unless they were followed up by action. The Government member of Colombia explained that the objective of the amendment was to ensure that studies, which should be as practical as possible, should be taken into account when programmes were implemented. The Government member of India supported the amendment and proposed a subamendment to retain "whenever possible" since governments could not study all issues. The Government members of Argentina and Botswana supported this proposal. The Workers' members could accept the deletion if the qualification "if acceptable to the peoples affected" was added. Several Government members spoke in favour of the draft Office text. A number of others supported the amendment. The Chairman suggested that there could be a general provision on studies which would state that they should be considered by governments as fundamental. The Government member of Colombia, in line with the subamendment, withdrew the suggested deletion in the first part of the amendment. The Workers' members did not maintain their subamendment. The amendment, as subamended by the Government member of India, was adopted.

85. An amendment to paragraph 4 submitted by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and was not discussed. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to develop further the text of paragraph 4 in order that it would contain recognition of the need to restore the environment in many cases. In addition, the amendment would highlight the need to pay special attention to subsistence economies. The Government member of Denmark recalled that he had raised these issues during the first discussion and supported the amendment. A number of Government members supported the amendment. The Government member of Canada noted that it was not always possible to restore the environment and that the question of subsistence economies was dealt with in draft Article 23. He opposed the amendment. This view was supported by the Government member of the United States who drew attention to the financial burdens associated with environmental restoration. A number of Government members expressed a preference for the draft Office text. The Employers' members noted that the restoration of the environments of territories should be carried out whenever possible. They felt that the term "territories" was too general and also noted that the matter of subsistence economies was dealt with in draft Article 23. If the latter part of the amendment was withdrawn and the words "as far as possible" added, they could consider supporting it. The amendment was rejected by 650 votes in favour, 775 against with 105 abstentions.

86. The Government members of Argentina and Bolivia submitted an amendment to delete "protect and" from paragraph 4 in order to remove paternalistic language and to enable better consideration of the environment. Neither the Workers' members nor the Employers' members supported the amendment, which was withdrawn.

87. An amendment to replace "territories" by "areas" was submitted by the Government member of India. He felt that since Article 7(1) mentioned "area", the term would be more appropriate in paragraph 4. The Government member of Australia recalled that the Committee had already deferred another amendment to replace "areas inhabited" with "territories they inhabit" until Part II of the Convention had been considered. The Employers' members considered that in this context "areas" was more appropriate. When that Part of the Convention had been considered, the Committee decided to retain, "territories".

88. Article 7, as amended, was adopted.

Article 8

89. An amendment to insert a new Article which was proposed by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and was not discussed. The Committee had 12 amendments before it on the proposed Article 8. The Workers' members introduced an amendment to replace paragraph 1 with a requirement for the recognition of the customary laws and practices of the peoples concerned. The Employers' members did not support the amendment. They stated that in many countries customary law was not recognised. If the reference to national laws was to be deleted, the text would become too rigid. It should be for each State to apply its national legal system. Problems could arise for those countries which considered that the text interfered with their national sovereignty. The Government member of Australia sought a clarification as to whether both state and federal laws were included in the reference to national laws and regulations. A representative of the Secretary-General stated that this understanding was consistent with usage in the ILO. The Government member of Japan did not support the amendment. He stated that consideration needed to be given concerning the compatibility of customary laws with national legal systems and internationally recognised human rights before they could be recognised. He referred to the principle of legality which prevented customary laws from becoming a source of criminal law, thereby protecting people from arbitrary punishment. The Government member of Bolivia stressed the importance of Article 8 and noted that, in his country, although customary law was not a source of law, it was taken into account by magistrates. The proposed deletion of the reference to national law went too far. The Government member of Canada recalled that during the first discussion in 1988 it had been pointed out that customary law had no legal force in many countries. He considered the draft Office text adequately dealt with the issue and he opposed the amendment. His view was supported by the Government members of Ecuador, USSR and the United States. The Government member of Ecuador regretted that his draft amendment proposing a new Article 8, which would have dealt with this issue, had not been considered. In the light of the discussion, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment, expressing regret at having to do so.

90. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to add "to the extent compatible with the national legal system" to the end of paragraph 1. He explained that the paragraph should be consistent with the national legal system and he wanted to ensure that this was explicitly stated in the text. The Employers' members supported the principle of the amendment, but suggested that the question should be considered in the light of Article 34. The Government member of the United States felt that the amendment could lead to a situation where all tribal laws would have to conform with national law, which would be too rigid. He opposed the amendment. Several Government members and the Workers' members supported this view. The amendment was not adopted.

91. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the first sentence of paragraph 2. They stated that through the amendment they wished to refer to a flow of basic rights and international instruments. They did not feel it necessary to reiterate references to national laws throughout the Convention. The Government member of Canada, supported by several other Government members and the Employers' members, supported the Office text. The Government member of Australia expressed concern over Article 8. His Government wished to be satisfied that the intention behind the Article was satisfactory from the perspective of the domestic legal framework of a broad range of countries. In this regard, his Government was seeking the Office's advice, outside the present discussion on the measures being taken in his country concerning customary law and their relation to the procedures which would be required under the revised Convention. He added that it was his Government's understanding that the recommendations contained in recent reports on customary law and on aboriginal deaths in custody in Australia would, when implemented, be adequate to satisfy the requirements of Article 8(2) and of Articles 10, 11 and 12 of the proposed Convention. He noted that a positive response would be a significant element in a future decision by Australia to ratify the revised Convention. The Government member of New Zealand expressed similar concerns in that while there were no procedures in New Zealand specifically for this purpose, an existing tribunal, the Waitangi tribunal, could conceivably resolve conflicts of this nature. The Workers' members stated that the Office text implied that the national legal systems could be incompatible with internationally recognised human rights. The amendment was not adopted.

92. The Chairman suggested that an amendment to the English and French texts proposed by the Government member of the USSR to replace the word "or" by "and" could clarify the situation raised by the Workers' members. In introducing his amendment to this effect, the Government member said that there was a need to take into account the possibility that national law could be wider in scope than international law. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted.

93. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Colombia to delete the word "shall" was referred to the Drafting Committee. The Government members of Argentina and Bolivia agreed to withdraw an amendment to delete the second sentence of paragraph 2 if the Workers' members withdrew an amendment to replace it. Both amendments were withdrawn.

94. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to paragraph 3 in which they intended to ensure that the peoples concerned would not be discriminated against. The Employers' members considered the amendment to be superfluous in the light of paragraphs 1 and 2 and opposed it. The Government member of Canada supported this view. The Government member of Australia stated that it was his understanding that it was not the intention of this provision to establish collective rights to the exclusion of individual rights. The amendment was not adopted. Amendments proposed by the Government members of Australia and Ecuador were not seconded and therefore not discussed.

95. The Government member of Colombia introduced an amendment to add a new paragraph 4. He stated that there was a need for studies to be carried out so that progress could be made towards recognising customary law. The Workers' members supported the amendment. The Employers' members pointed out that it would be up to governments to decide what was feasible and that paragraph 1 as amended dealt with this issue. They did not support the amendment. Several Government members expressed understanding for the rationale of the amendment, but felt that it could create problems for them and did not support it. The amendment was withdrawn.

96. Article 8, as amended, was adopted.

Article 9

97. Three amendments had been submitted on this Article. The Government member of Ecuador proposed an amendment to replace paragraph 1 with another text. The amendment was not seconded and was therefore not considered. The Government member of Japan introduced an amendment to paragraph 2 to insert a phrase requiring compatibility with national legal systems and internationally recognised human rights. He referred again to the principle of legality already discussed under Article 8, and felt that the text could be interpreted as giving customary law an unwarranted influence. The Government member of India, in supporting the amendment, said that it sought to define limits to which consideration could be given to customary law by the authorities and courts. The Government member of Venezuela supported this view. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The Government member of Argentina, supported by the Employers' members, proposed by subamendment to merge paragraphs 1 and 2. The Government member of Brazil supported the subamendment with the addition of the words "and the customs of these peoples in regard to penal matters". The Workers' members questioned the need to repeat the contents of paragraph 1 in paragraph 2, and preferred the draft Office text. The Government member of Canada, in supporting the draft Office text, stated that paragraphs 1 and 2 contained two separate ideas which would make their merger difficult. A number of Government members and the Employers' members supported the draft Office text, noting that Articles 8(1) and 9(1) made it clear that the national legal system represented the overriding authority. Neither the amendment nor the subamendment was adopted. The Government member of New Zealand proposed an amendment which was not seconded and was not further considered.

98. Article 9 was adopted without change.

Article 10

99. The Committee had eight amendments before it. An amendment to paragraph 1 proposed by the Government member of Ecuador was not seconded and therefore not considered. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment which was designed to make the text clearer as far as compatibility with national legal systems was concerned. The Employers' members felt that the flexibility desired would be better sought elsewhere in the Convention and opposed the amendment. The Workers' members also did not support the amendment and it was not adopted.

100. The Government member of Colombia proposed to amend paragraph 2 by attempting to incorporate what he understood as the spirit of the underlying text. Indigenous groups had stated that they sought to avoid the isolation of members of these peoples from their communities through imprisonment. The Workers' members supported this view. The Employers' members expressed understanding of the idea that punishment should be compatible with the offence, the person committing it and the local circumstances. They felt, however, that the amendment carried with it a high risk of preferential treatment which would override other considerations. They felt that the issue would be adequately covered if the term "consideration" rather than "preference" was used, as they had suggested in an amendment. The Government member of Canada preferred the draft Office text. The Government member of India drew attention to an amendment he had submitted which was prompted by the realities in India where the courts could not be told what to do, and said that the text should be confined to consideration of customary law with punishment being left to the courts. The Government member of New Zealand expressed his preference for the Office text, plus the insertion of "where appropriate" as suggested in an amendment he had submitted. He stated that in his country elements of customary law were included in the criminal justice system and cited the example of community care. He noted, however, that there would be circumstances where prison sentences could not be avoided. The Workers' members considered this amendment to be superfluous since the work "preference" contained sufficient flexibility. The Government member of Japan did not support the amendment of the Government member of Colombia. He noted that punishment had a preventive function and it could not be avoided, including imprisonment if necessary. The Government member of Australia referred to the findings of a Royal Commission, which had recommended prison sentences as a last resort, and a Law Reform Commission, which had sought wide discretion regarding imprisonment. In the light of these findings, he strongly supported the draft Office text. The Government member of Ecuador stated that the amendment he had offered concerning incompatibility with the cultural background of these peoples, would not prejudge the situation. In the light of the diversity of opinion, the Workers' and the Employers' members supported the retention of the draft Office text. The Government members of India and New Zealand and the Employers' members withdrew their amendments in favour of the Office text. The Government member of New Zealand once again drew attention to his concerns on this paragraph. The other amendments were not adopted.

101. In response to a question from the Government member of India a representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office did not understand the provision to mean that imprisonment would be forbidden, but rather that preference be given to other forms of punishment. The Government member of Venezuela expressed doubts regarding the explanation by the Office.

102. Article 10 was adopted unchanged.

Article 11

103. The single amendment on this Article was withdrawn by its sponsor, the Government member of Ecuador.

104. Article 11 was adopted unchanged.

Article 12

105. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Japan was not seconded and was not discussed. The Government member of Ecuador submitted an amendment which proposed to enable indigenous and tribal peoples to use their mother tongue in legal proceedings. The Workers' members expressed a preference for the use of the word "institutions" rather than "organisations" as appeared in the proposed amendment. The Government member of Argentina recalled that this issue had been raised during the first discussion. He felt that the Office text was sufficiently flexible. While the intentions of the amendment were laudable, it would be difficult to implement in many countries. This view was shared by the Employers' members and several Government members. The amendment was withdrawn.

106. Article 12 was adopted unchanged.

PART II. LAND

107. The Committee had 101 amendments before it on Part II of the proposed Convention concerning land, and it decided to refer the entire Part (Articles 13 to 19) to a Working Party. The Working Party was composed as follows: five Government members (Argentina, Australia, Canada, India, Norway); five Employers' members (Mr. Amos, Mr. Barrenechea, Mr. Bruchet, Mr. Mukadi, Mr. de Regil); and five Workers' members (Mr. McLeod, Mr. Murray, Mr. Murry, Ms Sayers, Mr. da Silva). The representatives of four international non-governmental organisations made statements to the Committee on Part II of the proposed Convention before the Working Party completed its examination of these questions.

108. The representative of the Nordic Sami Council expressed appreciation for the co-operation of representatives of Nordic Governments and advice from the Office during its activities relating to the revision of Convention No. 107. He reiterated some of the concerns on land which the Council had expressed during the first discussion in 1988. Firstly, he recalled that the indigenous and tribal peoples' own concepts of their rights to land were not reflected in national legal systems. He referred to the legal systems in Nordic countries in this regard and said that the indigenous and state concepts could not be fairly resolved unless the States took steps to harmonise them. The speaker also expressed satisfaction that the collective aspects of land rights had been accepted and were reflected in Article 13, and hoped that they would also be reflected in other Articles. In this regard, the use of the term "territories" was the only appropriate means of spelling out that the relevant provision was dealing with a collective group having certain rights which were held collectively. The speaker expressed the special concern felt by the Sami people over the loss of their coastal fishing rights which could have a disastrous effect on their lives and culture. Finally, he stressed that the special needs his people shared with other peoples should be addressed in Part II of the revised Convention.

109. A representative of the Co-ordinator for Indigenous Peoples' Rights, speaking on behalf of the Inuit Circumpolar Conference and the National Indian Youth Council, stated that, like self-determination, the assertion of indigenous land and territorial rights presented a challenge to State assertions of supremacy, and considered that it would be similarly resisted in the Committee. He added, however, that indigenous and tribal peoples had been encouraged by the movement towards principles based on concern for the human condition of these peoples. The extent to which the revised Convention would accelerate this process would depend on its ability to reach beyond notions of absolute sovereignty, particularly in addressing land and territorial rights. The speaker stressed that for these peoples, land and territory were central to life. Land was the core of the collective body of the people, upon which its survival depended, not simply a material possession. He stated that the discriminatory tendencies which had diminished the status of land holdings in colonial times persisted. The question of lands was therefore one of restoring rights previously denied, not of granting or creating new rights. For this reason, the Convention must reflect the historical nature of indigenous lands and territorial entitlements in order that rights extended to lands which peoples have used or occupied. The speaker referred to the collective nature of indigenous land and territorial rights, which should be a premise for their development. He stressed the importance of using the term "territory" in the Convention in order to capture the essential nature of indigenous and tribal peoples' relationships with the Earth, which was fundamental to their survival as distinct peoples, and to their social and cultural integrity. He stated that objections to the use of the term "territory" demonstrated the same misunderstanding of international law that appeared when objections to the use of the term "peoples" were put forward.

110. The representative of the International Organisation of Indigenous Resource Development expressed the hope that the Committee would consider the crucial issue of land rights with a full understanding of the practical effects of its decisions. The speaker referred to the fact that States claimed ownership over lands, and that the indigenous and tribal peoples who were the original owners had to try to reclaim their rights. These peoples' loss of land, which was their primary characteristic, had led to their current diminished economic, social and cultural state. He stressed that these peoples wanted the Convention to be binding and expressed the hope that the international community would be able to find the means to require that the land of indigenous and tribal peoples be restored and protected.

111. A representative of the Co-ordinator for Indigenous Peoples' Rights rejected what he perceived as an attempt by the Committee to cut indigenous and tribal peoples off from their fundamental human rights. He stated that representatives of the indigenous non-governmental organisations and other non-governmental organisations which supported them had walked out following the decision on the use of the term "peoples" in the Convention. He considered also that the Committee's decision on Article 6.2, in failing to require these peoples' consent before adopting measures which affected them, undercut the foundation of mutual respect of peoples that was necessary for the revised Convention to be meaningful to them. As far as land rights were concerned, he felt that the Committee to be meaningful to them. As far as land rights were concerned, he felt that the Committee was moving away from the minimum rights necessary for the survival of indigenous and tribal peoples. He maintained that the Committee, in its revision of Convention No. 107 – a revision that was not sought by these peoples – was acting to preserve the power of governments over these peoples and their territories.

112. The Working Party held four sittings. Its Chairman reported to the Committee that the key issues identified concerned the use of the term "land and territories"; the form and extent of land rights to be recognised; surface and sub-surface resources; and the question of removal or relocation of indigenous peoples from areas inhabited by them.

113. The Government members had stressed the need to arrive at a text which would be relevant to a wide variety of countries and which would not present constitutional and other legal impediments to ratification. The Employers' members had noted that the ultimate goal was the adoption of a viable text that would find the widest possible support and acceptance. While recognising the need to allow for a certain flexibility which would facilitate ratification of a revised Convention, the Workers' members had felt strongly that the proposed revision of the provisions concerning land should in no way diminish the rights already enshrined in the existing Convention.

114. Central to the discussion was the use of the term "territories", the deletion of which had been proposed in several amendments. In discussing Article 13, the Workers' members stated that this term was the only appropriate one to describe the special relationship which indigenous peoples collectively attach to specific geographic areas. Article 13 enshrined respect for cultural and spiritual values of indigenous peoples, with no implications for ownership or national sovereignty. The Employers' members and some of the Government members stressed that the unqualified use of the term "territories" anywhere in the Convention would give rise to serious, if not insurmountable, legal and constitutional problems in many countries which could jeopardise the prospects for ratification. Several proposals were made to find a formulation which would meet these concerns. The Employers' members and the Government members felt that retention of "territories" would be acceptable if "or" were to replace "and". The Workers' members then suggested for Article 13 the words "lands or territories, or both as applicable". The Working Party agreed to this. There was also discussion of the terms "lands", but the Working Party did not pursue this.

115. Following further discussion on Article 13, the Working Party recommended the adoption of the following text:

In applying the provisions of this Part of the Convention, governments shall respect the special importance for the cultures and spiritual values of the peoples concerned of their relationship with the lands or territories, or both as applicable, which they occupy or otherwise use, and in particular the collective aspects of this relationship.

116. During consideration of Article 14, views diverged as to the use of the terms "ownership", "possession" and "use". The Government members stressed that the addition of the word "use" would help to expand the scope of the rights conferred by this Article. They also argued that for practical reasons the forms of legal recognition of these rights had to be rendered sufficiently flexible to reflect the varying national constitutional and legal circumstances. The Workers' members, however, suggested that this carried the risk of reducing the effect of the obligation incorporated in the Article, and the consequence would be a lesser protection than that provided in Convention No. 107. The Working Party was unable to reach agreement.

117. The Working Party then discussed the amendment proposed by the Workers' members which would have added the word "territories" after "land" in Article 14. The Employers' members stated that introduction of "territories" in the manner suggested was unacceptable for the reasons stated in the discussion on Article 13. Moreover, for some Governments and the Employers' members, the unqualified use of the word "traditionally", as proposed by the Workers' members, posed serious legal difficulties. In addition, neither the Government members nor the Employers' members could accept the Workers' members' proposal to use the past tense of "occupy" and "use". Such a proposal would introduce retroactive recognition of claims with far-reaching consequences. It was decided that Article 14, 15 and 16 should be referred back to the Committee.

118. Following clarification by the Office, consensus was reached on retaining the text of Article 17, paragraph 1, as set out in Report IV (2B), on the understanding that all amendments to this paragraph would be withdrawn. The Government and Employers' members preferred the Office text of Article 17, paragraph 2, and regarded it as a realistic proposal which would bring about an improvement for indigenous and tribal peoples. They regarded the Workers' members proposed amendment as being too restrictive. They also felt that governments had a role to play in preventing alienation of land in circumstances which would in the end be prejudicial to the interests of the peoples concerned. The Workers' members considered that the Office text did not really address itself to the issue of inalienability, which was a fundamental concern of these peoples. They proposed a text for paragraph 2 which had been submitted in the working Party and which read as follows:

The lands and territories of the peoples concerned shall ordinarily be recognised as inalienable. Alienation of lands and territories shall only be possible under procedural arrangements established in consultation with the representative institutions of the peoples concerned.

The Government and Employers' members continued to support the Office text. In the circumstances, the Working Party decided that this paragraph should be referred to the Committee for decision between the Office text and the Workers' proposal.

119. The Working Party agreed to a proposal by the Workers' members to accept the Office text of Articles 17 (1) and (3), 18 and 19 on the understanding that all amendments would be withdrawn.

120. The Chairman expressed his gratitude to the Working Party for the considerable efforts it had made to assist the Committee in this most important element of its task.

121. A representative of the Workers' members made a statement clarifying some aspects of the report of the Working Party. He appreciated the difficulty in summarising the intensive discussion which had taken place. He pointed out that the Workers' members only supported the wording which had been agreed for Article 13 in the spirit of consensus; it was not their preferred wording and had not been proposed by the Workers' members. Moreover, he said that they did not argue that there were no implications for ownership or national sovereignty in Article 13, rather that no rights in relation to ownership were directly addressed in this Article. As far as Article 14 (1) was concerned, he pointed out that the Workers' members only supported the retention of the Office text if it were to remain unamended and unequivocally recognised ownership and possession.

122. The Chairman noted that, despite the advances which had been made by the Working Party, the Committee was still some way from adopting by consensus a text on the important and delicate issue of land. In order to avoid the adoption by numerous votes of a text that was unlikely to be lucid and could well be contradictory, as well as jeopardising adoption of the Convention and its subsequent ratification, he made the following suggestion concerning consideration of Part II of the proposed Convention. On the basis of the Working Party's report, which proposed texts for Articles 13 and 17(2), as well as agreed solutions for Articles 17(1) and (3), 18 and 19, he would consult with governments and the Employers' and Workers' groups with a view to formulating and submitting to the Committee for its consideration a new complete text for Part II. Prior to these consultations, he invited Committee members to address the critical aspects of the land issue.

123. All the speakers fully supported the proposal as to how to proceed. Many of them considered that the Office text, for the most part, particularly Articles 17 to 19, was to be preferred. Also, most of the speakers were willing to accept the Working Party's text for Article 13. Many speakers stressed the need to adopt a Convention which went beyond the provisions of Convention No. 107 in this regard, and which could be widely ratified.

124. The Government member of Norway referred to an amendment submitted by several Government members to include the word "use" in Article 14. He explained that the intention had been to extend the rights that should be protected, not to weaken the paragraph.

125. The Employers' members noted that they had difficulties with Article 14(1) and felt that it should be more flexible. They would accept the inclusion of "use" in the provision. The inclusion of "territories" in Article 14 would create a different interpretation. Turning to Article 15, they were awaiting the opinions of governments since many States would find it difficult to implement the draft Office text in the light of their national legislation. They considered that the text of Article 15(2) in the draft before the Committee would violate the States' ownership of sub-surface resources. Article 16 was basically an administrative issue for governments. The principle of compensation, as well as the possibility of the return of lands, should be included. They noted that if indemnification was provided, the option to return lands would be removed. The Office text was not clearly drafted in this regard. They were unable to accept the concept of retroactivity in relation to traditionally occupied territories. The Office text of Articles 17(1) and (3) was preferred, as well as for Articles 18 and 19.

126. The Government member of Canada recalled the three main concerns he had expressed during the general discussion. The Working Party's formula for Article 13 was acceptable as it adequately provided for the situation where rights were vested in lands not territories. His delegation had problems with Article 14 as it was drafted and recognised that the inclusion of "use" could cause problems for some countries. He proposed "ownership or possession". He supported the Employers' members views concerning the use of "occupied" rather than "occupy" which could cause major problems for most countries. Article 15, as drafted, would be acceptable if the Working Party's text for Article 13 was adopted. He agreed with the basic intent of Article 16. He preferred the Office text for Article 17, but was prepared to accept the Workers' members proposal on Article 17(2) for the sake of consensus. He also accepted the Office text for Articles 18 and 19.

127. The Government member of Bolivia agreed that Article 15 as drafted was unacceptable for many States. Article 15(2), which would vest ownership of sub-surface resources with people living on the land, was incompatible with provisions of the Bolivian Constitution, which reserves the ownership of such resources exclusively for the State; these can be granted to private individuals on a concessionary basis, but in no case can ownership be transferred.

128. The Government member of Australia noted that while the ownership of sub-surface resources was largely vested in the constituent states and territories of Australia, legislation existed which gave indigenous and tribal peoples a major say in resource development. In the Northern Territory, where the Commonwealth owned the resources, these peoples had the right of veto over exploitation. He was at a loss to see why a requirement that these peoples should be consulted in respect of resource development which would have a large social impact would violate the principle of state ownership.

129. The Government member of Argentina felt that the term "treaties" should not be used in Article 14(4). Agreements between peoples and the State would be public contracts under national law. He supported the Government member of Canada as regards the use of "territories" in conjunction with "as applicable"; and supported the Government member of Bolivia regarding Article 15. He considered that Article 16(3) would be very difficult to adapt to national legislation. He supported the text proposed by the Workers' members for Article 17(2), provided the term "territories" was not used.

130. The Government member of India supported the views expressed by the Government members of Argentina and Canada regarding the use of "land" and "territories". He considered that more flexibility should be provided in the text of Article 14(1) so that different situations would be covered. He joined with other speakers in expressing reservations about Article 15 as concerned sub-surface resources which were owned by the State. He felt that Article 16 should emphasise a comprehensive rehabilitation package for displaced peoples. Although admirable, the concept of "land for land" would not work where land was scarce.

131. The Government member of Brazil noted that from the outset his delegation had stressed that the Convention should be as universal as possible. Some of the terms used in Articles 13 to 15 caused difficulties in this regard and it was important that the Committee reach agreement. She preferred the use of "lands" in Article 13 and, in Article 14, favoured rights of possession and use of land by these peoples in view of the State's ownership of indigenous land. She pointed out that in Brazil people had the right to share sub-surface resources and for this reason her Government had submitted an amendment to include water and energy producing resources. With regard to the displacement of peoples (Article 16) she noted that this was only possible in special cases in Brazil and that the peoples affected were entitled to compensation.

132. The Government member of the USSR recalled that his delegation had submitted an amendment to Article 14(1) in accordance with national legislation concerning the possession of land by virtue of property and use. Thus the three terms "ownership, possession and use" would be required in order to be in accordance with national legislation. Regarding Article 15, the State had exclusive right of ownership of natural resources. Before any exploitation commenced, however, the consent of all those living in the territory was required. In relation to Article 16, relocation should be limited to the cases put forward in the amendment of the Workers' members. He supported the Workers' members' proposed text for Article 17(2).

133. The Government member of Japan noted the differences of legal systems between countries as far as lands, territories and resources were concerned. He also noted the differences of the relationship with lands and resources between indigenous and tribal peoples. For this reason, the text of Articles 14 to 16 should be more flexible and give due regard to the different conditions. He supported the views expressed by the Government member of India concerning the inability to accept the concept of "land for land".

134. The Workers' members had the feeling that the revision of the Convention was leading to a worse position for indigenous and tribal peoples than obtained in Convention No. 107. If the proposed text weakened the draft Office text they would have great difficulty in supporting it. They supported the use of "territories" and noted with interest the views put forward by the Government members of Canada and Norway regarding "use", which they felt could be a basis for consensus on Article 14. They also noted the view of the Government member of Canada on the amendment they had submitted to Article 17(2).

135. The Government member of Venezuela recalled that the main problem in Part II of the Convention was the use of the term "territories", which in his country referred exclusively to the national territory over which the State exercised jurisdiction and had sovereignty according to the national Constitution. He supported the views of the Government members of Argentina and Bolivia on Articles 14(2) and 15(2) and noted that there were fundamental reasons preventing the support of some of the amendments to these paragraphs. Regarding Article 16, he noted that under the legal system applicable in Venezuela, rights of property and possession belong to the State. He considered that the text of Article 17 should be more flexible in order to deal with the universal nature of the text.

136. The Government member of the United States reiterated his support for the draft Office text and was encouraged to hear the Workers' members' views on it. He noted that under United States law, surface and sub-surface rights to their lands belonged to the tribes, but he appreciated the need to accommodate countries where this was not the case. He endorsed the development of broad concepts which could deal with the needs of these peoples and national governments without the threat of the loss of certain rights.

137. The Government member of Denmark could not support any weakening of the Office text. He supported the views expressed by the Government members of Australia and the United States regarding Article 15(2) and noted that the question was one of relationship with the land. He noted that the people of Greenland, who shared its resources with Denmark, had the right of veto over the exploitation of these resources. He stressed the importance of environmental protection and considered that this would have greater chance of success if indigenous and tribal peoples were involved.

138. The Government member of New Zealand interpreted Article 14(1) as requiring governments which ratify this Convention to recognise the rights of indigenous peoples to ownership and possession of the lands which they have occupied over time by right of tradition and which they currently occupy and accepted the text. She noted that in some cases mineral rights belonged to the State and that there would be problems if, under Article 15(2), specific benefits were given to all landowners. She had some doubts on the provisions concerning benefits received by the larger community. In Article 16(1) she expressed a preference for the use of "traditionally occupy" and stressed that in Article 17 it should be clear that the land referred to was the same as in Article 14. In Article 17(1) she expressed a preference for the use of "recognised" instead of "respected".

139. The Government member of Ecuador expressed general agreement with the Office text, but referred also to the amendments his Government had submitted. He considered that the process of determining lands referred to in Article 14(2) should involve the representation of indigenous and tribal peoples. He suggested that unoccupied lands, such as national parks, which had been possessed by these peoples should be included in their territories. Concerning Article 15, he considered that the right to surface resources should include their use and that governments, as owners of sub-soil resources, should promote agreements on their use with these peoples. He supported the concept of contracts in this regard put forward by the Government member of Argentina. For Article 16 he expressed a preference for "re-settlement and relocation" rather than "removal" and felt that compensation should cover damage caused by the relinquishment of lands. He agreed with the Workers' members' text for Article 17(2) provided it included a general condition that the sale of land possessed by these peoples should in principle be prohibited without their agreement.

140. The Government member of Colombia felt that "lands and territories" should be used throughout the text. He agreed with other speakers on the need to discuss the word "use", but felt that the inclusion of the words "or use" in Article 14(1) would weaken it. He considered that the right of these peoples to use lands and territories they temporarily occupied should be clearly stated in Article 14(3). He agreed with the views expressed by the Government member of Australia on Article 15 and stressed the need for consultation before resource exploitation could take place. He referred also to the need for consultations before these peoples could be removed from their territories. He felt that Article 17(2) was poorly drafted and supported the Workers' members in the need to ensure that lands should be inalienable.

141. The Government member of Portugal referred to her Government's reasons for its intervention in the revision of Convention No. 107, which concerned its interest in human rights and its historical and current responsibilities for indigenous and tribal peoples. She preferred the use of "lands and territories" throughout the text since territories was a concept to which these people were attached. She also supported the concept of ownership, possession and use of land and territories but noted that one could not be substituted for the other.

142. A representative of the Workers' members expressed understanding of the difficulty of achieving a universally applicable Convention. While there was recognition of the diversity of indigenous and tribal peoples, she said there was a failure to understand that they shared among themselves concepts of life and relationships with land and nature. What differed were the national legal systems. She considered that international law should set standards to be attained, even if this would involve changing national legislation. She stressed the fundamental relationship between these peoples and the land and noted the relationship with lands and territories which was mentioned in Article 13. She emphasised that these peoples required ownership of land on which they lived, which was the basis for their existence. Failure to use the term territories would be a retrograde step. She urged the Committee to recognise the indigenous and tribal peoples' right to the ownership, possession and use of lands and territories, and to protect these peoples against exploitation under Article 16, rather than allowing governments to prescribe under what exceptional circumstances compensation would be paid for removal from land. She noted that some countries were concerned that too many rights were being granted to these peoples and that the revised Convention would give them too much power. The traditional rights of indigenous peoples to lands should be recognised, as well as the rights of those who were currently acquiring land. The issue of resource rights was vital to these peoples' development. They did not wish to remain dependent on States but rather to be able to ensure their own survival. She had difficulty in understanding the extreme position taken by the Employers' members in the Working Party concerning the ownership of resources, and wondered whether they were afraid of economic development being impeded. She stated that the text of the revised Convention could not be weaker than that of Convention No. 107, particularly as far as land was concerned, if the credibility governments needed to obtain with indigenous and tribal peoples was to be achieved and maintained.

143. Following his consultations with Government members and with the Employers' and Workers' groups concerning Part II of the draft Convention, the Chairman indicated that he would propose that the Committee consider a "package" text dealing with Articles 13 to 19, with the exception of Article 17(2) which would be considered separately. Articles 13 to 16 had been amended in the light of the Working Party's deliberations (for Article 13) and in the light of his discussions. Articles 17(1), 17(3), 18 and 19 in the package were the draft Office texts, in accordance with the Working Party's recommendations. He suggested that the package of Articles would constitute a basis to reach a firm understanding in order to finalise the task the Committee had been given by the Conference. He felt that in view of the agreements which had been reached concerning the issues dealt with in Part II of the draft Convention, only amendments to Article 17(2) should be considered. The Chairman then put the consolidated text for Part II of the draft Convention, with the exception of Article 17(2), before the Committee. This approach received general support, though a number of members expressed reservations on various aspects of these texts.

144. The Government member of Brazil congratulated all those involved in reaching a consensus on the package of Articles and expressed his full awareness of the fact that there had been very difficult negotiations. He noted that major concessions had been made and that the resulting wording showed the force of the Committee's determination. Although some points were not ideal from his delegation's point of view, he was prepared to accept them as drafted as far as Articles 13, 15, 16, 17(1), 17(3), 18 and 19 were concerned. He stressed, however, that the solution which had been found with regard to ownership in Article 14 would create insurmountable problems for Brazil and would practically remove the possibility of his country ratifying the Convention. He recalled that the new Brazilian Constitution recognised the permanent possession of traditionally occupied lands by indigenous and tribal peoples, whose rights were imprescriptible and inalienable and the lands could not be transferred. They had the rights to the exclusive use of surface resources, including water and participation in the results of the exploitation of sub-surface resources. He registered his Government's serious reservations.

145. The Government member of the United States expressed appreciation for the deep commitment and effort expended in achieving consensus on the Articles concerned in the face of deeply divergent points of view. His Government accepted the Articles as proposed. He noted, however, that lack of clarity made many parts very difficult to interpret, and he felt that this could pose a problem for governments concerning adoption of the Convention. He considered that many of the clauses which were apparently intended to strengthen the rights of indigenous peoples could in fact be taken to weaken those rights. He also felt that there could be a number of unintended consequences in the revised Convention, particularly as far as Article 14 was concerned. He believed that the use of "ownership and possession" rather than the more flexible "ownership or possession" could make it impossible for governments to ratify the revised Convention. He noted that "ownership and possession" should not be interpreted to support policies like "Allotment" (1877) and "Termination" (1953) which have had a decidedly negative effect on Indians. Both the tribes and Congress have rejected these policies.

146. The Government member of Argentina joined in thanking those involved in preparing the consolidated text. He recalled that his delegation had tried to promote a text which could be ratified by his country and would help indigenous and tribal peoples. He felt, however, that the draft Articles contained provisions which could cause problems in relation to some national Constitutions. For this reason it would be better to avoid what could prevent ratification of the Convention. He considered that the definition of lands in Article 13, paragraph 2, was vague. The inclusion of the word "consult" in Article 15, paragraph 2, would, he believed, also make it more difficult for the Convention to be ratified by his country, and reserved his Government's position in this respect.

147. The Chairman sought the agreement of the Committee on the adoption of the package of Articles in Part II of the draft revised Convention. The texts were adopted by consensus.

148. Articles 13, 14, 15 and 16, as amended, were adopted. Articles 17(1), 17(3), 18 and 19 were adopted without change.

149. The Government member of Venezuela, after expressing his gratitude to those responsible for the drafting of Part II of the Convention, stated that his Government, like other Latin American governments, had serious difficulties with respect to the substance of these Articles. He reserved his Government's position.

150. The Government member of Canada thanked all the members of the Committee for their efforts towards achieving a consensus text which would be widely acceptable. Her delegation accepted Articles 15, 16, 17(1), 17(3), 18 and 19. Other elements of the text, however, raised major concerns. As far as Article 14 was concerned, she noted that in Canada individual rights of ownership of land were available to everyone. Regarding Articles 14(1) and (2), which dealt with collective land rights. She stated that the phrase "rights of ownership and possession" did not accommodate the cases of countries such as her own where indigenous rights in land could be other than those of ownership. While indigenous groups in Canada sometimes had complete rights of ownership to their land, in most instances, such as Indian reserve lands, the rights were in the form of extensive rights of use, possession and occupation. Domestic courts had interpreted the aboriginal rights in land as being those of traditional rights of use and occupation. She pointed out that in many cases Indians had expressed a preference for the retention of these rights and had consequently chosen not to avail themselves of collective rights of ownership. She stated that use of the term "rights of ownership and possession" implied a requirement that indigenous land rights must always be those of both ownership and possession and that this would not be compatible with the Canadian situation. A second concern of her delegation had to do with Article 13(2). The definition of the term "land" in that Article, for the purposes of Articles 15 and 16, was vague in its reference to "the concept of territories which covers the total environment of the areas which they occupy or otherwise use". She questioned the meaning of "total environment" and expressed a preference for the formulation proposed by the Working Party for Article 13, which referred to "lands, or territories, or both, as applicable". Her delegation regretted that, because of her Government's serious and valid concerns, it could not join in a consensus applicable to all elements of the package deal. It would not, however, stand in the way of consensus.

151. The Government member of India recalled his earlier statements that the concept of territories did not apply to the tribal situation in his country and had suggested using the word "areas". Any use of the term "territories" without a qualification would not be acceptable. He had also supported using "lands or territories, or both, as applicable". He felt that paragraph 2 of Article 13 which defined the use of "land" in Articles 15 and 16 lacked the flexibility of paragraph 1, since it still included the term "territories". It was also ambiguous and did not lead to clear interpretation. He reiterated that in India "territories" had political connotations and meant only the territories of the nation. He expressed his Government's reservations on Article 13.

152. The Government member of Ecuador noted that the texts which had been adopted did not cover some matters which were very important for his country. Nevertheless, he did not intend to oppose the adoption of the text although he considered that it should have deleted "lands" and "or both, as applicable" and should have had an addendum covering ownership. He expressed his Government's reservations on Article 13(1) and on Article 15(2) which he felt should have been drafted along the lines of an amendment submitted by his delegation which emphasised, inter alia, that sub-surface resources were the property of the State. He expressed regret that his delegation's proposals for a new Article 20, which concerned territories of indigenous and tribal peoples which were divided by international frontiers, were not considered by the Committee.

153. The Government member of Japan expressed his appreciation of the efforts involved in reaching a consensus on the issue of land in the draft Convention. He noted, however, that due to the fact that, under Japanese law, ownership of natural resources was vested in the State, problems remained in the text as far as his delegation was concerned. He would, however, follow the consensus.

154. The Government member of the USSR stated that he was able to support the consolidated text. However, he expressed the reservations of his Government on Article 14(1) because his country's Constitution gave the State exclusive right of property on lands. This paragraph might considerably reduce the likelihood of ratification.

155. The Government member of Portugal joined with previous speakers in congratulating those who made consensus on the land issue possible. She expressed support for the consolidation of texts of articles in Part II. She expressed, however, her preference for the draft Office text of Article 15(2) which she felt was a clearer statement, and agreed with other speakers who had voiced concern over the ambiguity of this Article. She expressed her delegation's reservations on Article 15(2).

156. The Government member of Peru congratulated those who contributed to producing a text on land which protected the rights of all the peoples concerned. He would support the consensus on these articles. He agreed with other speakers that some problems remained and that the ambiguities in the text could lead to interpretations which would affect the Peruvian Constitution. In order to avoid such possible conflicts, he felt that the Committee should not have used terms such as "territories" and should have refrained from introducing consultative machinery which might imply the right to accord or deny approval and thereby lead to concepts of sovereignty outside the Constitution. In Peru sovereignty was indivisible and related solely to the nation. Without prejudice to this, however, it was considered that indigenous populations should be consulted but in a flexible manner and within the framework of the interest of the entire nation. The Constitution established that the territory of the Republic, which included its soil, sub-soil, waters and airspace, was inviolable. Natural resources, whether renewable or non-renewable, were national property. Lands of rural and native communities were inalterable and imprescriptible, unless the interest of the community dictated otherwise or was based on public necessity or utility. He therefore had reservations on the interpretations of the text.

157. The Government member of Colombia echoed the gratitude expressed by other speakers concerning the development of a text on land. He recalled his delegation's objective of producing a Convention which was an improvement on Convention No. 107 and doubted whether this had been achieved as regards rights to the land inhabited by the peoples concerned and the natural resources contained therein. He felt that the Articles on land which had been adopted contained a number of deficiencies and were difficult to interpret. For these reasons it was possible that the Convention might not be ratified by some countries, which would be regrettable for indigenous and tribal peoples. He stressed that it was of paramount importance to include a statement on the concept of land with respect to the Spanish and French texts. He felt that it would be necessary to apply Article 35 of the revised Convention to its full extent in order that the revised Convention could not adversely affect previously adopted Conventions. He noted that the legal position in Colombia regarding these peoples was superior to what had been adopted and that his Government was seeking to improve matters further.

158. As concerned Article 17, paragraph 2, the Committee began by considering the amended version put forward by the Workers' members in the Working Party. The Employers' members proposed to subamend the text proposed by the Workers' members by deleting the word "territories". The Workers' members opposed the subamendment. During the ensuing discussion, support for both the amendment and the subamendment was expressed. The Government member of Argentina, in supporting the subamendment, recalled that in the Working Party, he had supported the Workers' members' proposal, subject to the removal of "territories". He felt that the inclusion of the term "territories", which was not covered by the definition in Article 13(2), might cause confusion in the context of this Article. This was because only land which was possessed could be sold, and this could not be the meaning of the word "territories" according to the preceding discussions. The Government member of India noted that Article 17(2) derived its force from Article 14(1), since the right to alienate land could arise only from ownership. He recalled his previously expressed reservations regarding the use of "territories" and supported the subamendment. The Government member of Venezuela supported the statements of the Government delegates of Argentina and India. The Government member of Peru wondered why the Workers' members insisted on using a term which caused consistent and considerable problems for many governments. He suggested that this was a terminological difficulty and not a conceptual one and that they should therefore look for a different word from "territories" which, without causing difficulties to States, could include the legitimate interests of the indigenous communities. Several other Government members supported the subamendment. The Government member of Portugal recalled her previous support for the inclusion of "territories" and opposed the subamendment. She stated that, in Portugal, the condition of inalienability was not restricted to property which was owned. The subamendment was opposed by several other Government members. The subamendment was rejected in a vote by show of hands, by 2,016 votes in favour, 2,139 against, with 210 abstentions. At the request of the Employers' members, a record vote was taken, and the subamendment was rejected by 2,016 votes in favour, 2,100 against, with 252 abstentions.

159. The Employers' members, as a result of the foregoing discussion, felt that the amendment to Article 17(2) proposed by the Workers' members contained many difficulties for many countries. They expressed support for the draft Office text. The amendment was rejected in a vote by show of hands, by 2,142 in favour, 2,142 against, with 84 abstentions. Under article 65(10) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the amendment was not adopted. At the request of the Workers' members a record vote was taken, and the subamendment was rejected by 2,184 votes in favour, 2,184 against, with no abstentions. Under article 65(10) of the Standing Orders, the amendment was not adopted.

160. The Government member of Panama regretted that it had not been possible to reach a more flexible position which would have been consistent with the use of "lands or territories" as used in Article 13. Her delegation had therefore abstained from the vote on the subamendment on Article 17, paragraph 2, submitted by the Employers' members, and had been unable to support the amendment proposed by the Workers' members, because under the Constitution of Panama, the national territory could never be transferred or alienated. While she felt that it would have been possible to improve the Office text, she congratulated the Chairman on reaching a successful conclusion.

161. Article 17(2) was adopted without change.

162. The Workers' members and the Government member of Colombia sought from the Office information on the meaning of "lands" in relation to existing ILO instruments. A representative of the Secretary-General stated that the term "lands" was used in Convention No. 107 but was not defined therein. He recalled that when Convention No. 107 and its accompanying Recommendation No. 104 were adopted in 1957 there was one sentence in the relevant Conference Committee's report concerning Recommendation No. 104 which appeared to be relevant. In the Record of Proceedings (p 732) of the 40th

Session of the International Labour Conference, it was stated, inter alia, that "The Committee agreed that the term 'land' as used in this Part was generic and should be understood to include rivers, lakes and forests." The speaker noted that this referred specifically to the Recommendation, not the Convention, and indicated that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had never had the occasion to interpret the meaning of "lands" as used in Convention No. 107.

163. The Government member of the United States sought a clarification from the Office on the term "ownership" as used in Convention No. 107. A representative of the Secretary-General said that the problem of dealing with the meaning of "ownership" in Convention No. 107 had often arisen in the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which had recognised on a number of occasions that the exact contents of the concept of ownership varied in different countries and under different legal systems. The Committee of Experts had concluded that it was difficult to say precisely that what was called "ownership" in one country had exactly the same implications in another country. The Committee of Experts had also concluded on a number of occasions that firm, permanent and assured possession did not constitute a violation of the requirement of ownership in Convention No. 107, which was considered to be among the ILO's "promotional" Conventions in many respect. This concept had been considered to be a good interim measure until full conformity with Convention No. 107 had been achieved. While the Committee of Experts had not found an exact equivalence between "possession" and "ownership", it had not found the firm assurance of possession and use to be in violation of the requirement for "ownership".

PART III. RECRUITMENT AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

PART IV. VOCATIONAL TRAINING, HANDICRAFTS AND RURAL INDUSTRIES

PART V. SOCIAL SECURITY AND HEALTH

PART VI. EDUCATION AND MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

PART VII. MIGRATION ACROSS BORDERS

PART VIII. ADMINISTRATION

PART IX. GENERAL PROVISIONS

PART X. FINAL PROVISIONS

164. The Workers' members indicated that, subject to the same action being taken by the Employers' members and Government members, they would withdraw their amendments to Articles 20 to 36 and support the Office text. They recalled the lengthy consideration of the issues in Parts III to X of the Convention which took place during the first discussion in 1988, and noted that the agreements which had been reached had been reflected in the draft Office text. The Employers' members supported the proposal. Various Government members also supported the proposal and agreed to withdraw their amendments. The Government member of Brazil expressed his Government's view that Article 32, which covered the complex issue of migration across borders, was beyond the jurisdiction of the ILO and expressed reservations on this point.

165. A representative of the Secretary-General informed the Committee that the decision to adopt Article 36 meant that Convention No. 107 would be closed to further ratifications when the present Convention came into force, but that it would remain in force for those countries which had ratified it until they ratified the new Convention. He also explained the conditions which governed the entering into force of the revised Convention, and its ratification, in accordance with the standard final Articles.

166. Articles 20 to 36 were adopted without change.

Examination of the resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples submitted by the Governments of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden

167. The Government member of Denmark, in introducing the resolution, stated that it had been drafted in the hope that agreement on the revision of Convention No. 107 would be achieved in much the way it had been. It was also based on the basic principle motivating the revision, namely that the relationship between States and indigenous and tribal peoples should be based on co-operation instead of assimilation and on mutual respect instead of paternalism. The speaker considered it important that in addition to reporting its activities to the Conference, the Committee should point out to the international organisations cited in the Preamble that they shared the ILO's responsibilities concerning the implementation of the Convention, and that the Committee relied on their co-operation in this regard. The speaker highlighted the leading role of the ILO in dealing at an international level with the situations facing indigenous and tribal peoples. He considered that the member States which numbered these peoples among their citizens could benefit from ILO activities in this area. He stated that the crux of the resolution was to seek increased ILO activity, subject to budgetary constraints, as far as these peoples were concerned, including bringing indigenous and tribal organisations together in order to improve their relations with the international community. He considered that this would assist governments in their activities in relation to the new Convention, and would ensure that the spirit of the work undertaken by the Committee would be followed up.

168. The Government member of Norway stated that six amendments to the draft resolution had been submitted. The sponsors had examined and accepted five amendments (submitted by the Government members of Australia, Colombia, Peru, Portugal and the Employers' members). They felt that one amendment, proposed by the Government member of Colombia, was outside the scope of the resolution and they did not accept it. The Government member of Colombia said that his delegation had submitted the amendment to the introductory paragraphs of the draft resolution with the objective of reaffirming the principle of equality of rights between indigenous and tribal peoples and other persons in national communities. The Workers' members stated that they had been prepared to accept the resolution as it was drafted, but they could also support the five amendments accepted by the sponsors. The Government member of Colombia withdrew this amendment. The Employers' members supported the text of the draft resolution and the five amendments. The Government member of Bolivia stated that the draft resolution, which added an important dimension to the Committee's work, had been enriched by the amendments. The amendments were adopted.

169. The resolution, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Convention and the Resolution

170. In the course of the consideration of paragraphs 1 to 169 of the report, alterations with a view to clarifying, correcting or supplementing the text of the report were requested by several members of the Committee.

171. Subject to the modifications agreed on, the Committee adopted the report unanimously.

172. The Committee proceeded to examine and adopt the proposed Convention, Article by Article and as a whole.

173. The Committee proceeded to examine the resolution paragraph by paragraph and adopted it unanimously.

174. The Employers' members expressed their gratitude and appreciation to the Chairman for his skills during the meetings and during the many discussions which took place outside the meetings and which played a major part in achieving a good solution to the difficult task given to the Committee. They expressed their appreciation to the Workers' members as well.

175. The Workers' members fully supported the Employers' members in praising the Chairman's work. They expressed appreciation for the way they had been able to work closely with the Employers' members towards achieving a result of the Committee's activities which they would be able to support in the plenary discussions.

176. The Government member of Canada, on behalf of other Government members, noted that the Committee had dealt with complex issues which went beyond the subjects normally encountered by the ILO. She felt that each of the groups had played a major part in achieving a workable compromise. While she recognised that the proposed Convention neither reflected all the aspirations of indigenous and tribal peoples, nor met all the concerns of governments, it was a significant improvement on Convention No. 107.

177. The Chairman expressed his appreciation for the co-operation of the Government members and the Employers' and Workers' members in dealing with such a complex issue in a constructive and forward-looking manner. He recognised that each of the groups had overcome their own difficulties in achieving consensus. He thanked the Working Party for its extensive efforts towards achieving the consensus. He expressed his appreciation for the presence of non-governmental organisations who had clearly expressed the concerns and aspirations of indigenous and tribal peoples. He considered that the proposed Convention which the Committee had unanimously adopted represented a major landmark in the

PART I. GENERAL POLICY

Article 1

1. This Convention applies to:

- (a) tribal peoples in independent countries whose social, cultural and economic conditions distinguish them from other sections of the national community, and whose status is regulated wholly or partially by their own customs or traditions or by special laws or regulations;
- (b) peoples in independent countries who are regarded as indigenous on account of their descent from the populations which inhabited the country, or a geographical region to which the country belongs, at the time of conquest or colonisation or the establishment of present state boundaries and who, irrespective of their legal status, retain some or all of their own social, economic, cultural and political institutions.

2. Self-identification as indigenous or tribal shall be regarded as a fundamental criterion for determining the groups to which the provisions of this Convention apply.

3. The use of the term "peoples" in this Convention shall not be construed as having any implications as regards the rights which may attach to the term under international law.

Article 2

1. Governments shall have the responsibility for developing, with the participation of the peoples concerned, co-ordinated and systematic action to protect the rights of these peoples and to guarantee respect for their integrity.

2. Such action shall include measures for:

- (a) ensuring that members of these peoples benefit on an equal footing from the rights and opportunities which national laws and regulations grant to other members of the population;
- (b) promoting the full realisation of the social, economic and cultural rights of these peoples with respect for their social and cultural identity, their customs and traditions and their institutions;
- (c) assisting the members of the peoples concerned to eliminate socio-economic gaps that may exist between indigenous and other members of the national community, in a manner compatible with their aspirations and ways of life.

Article 3

1. Indigenous and tribal peoples shall enjoy the full measure of human rights and fundamental freedoms without hindrance or discrimination. The provisions of the Convention shall be applied without discrimination to male and female members of these peoples.

2. No form of force or coercion shall be used in violation of the human rights and fundamental freedoms of the peoples concerned, including the rights contained in this Convention.

Article 4

1. Special measures shall be adopted as appropriate for safeguarding the persons, institutions, property, labour, cultures and environment of the peoples concerned.

2. Such special measures shall not be contrary to the freely-expressed wishes of the peoples concerned.

3. Enjoyment of the general rights of citizenship, without discrimination, shall not be prejudiced in any way by such special measures.

Article 5

In applying the provisions of this Convention:

- (a) the social, cultural, religious and spiritual values and practices of these peoples shall be recognised and protected, and due account shall be taken of the nature of the problems which face them both as groups and as individuals;
- (b) the integrity of the values, practices and institutions of these peoples shall be respected;

- (c) policies aimed at mitigating the difficulties experienced by these peoples in facing new conditions of life and work shall be adopted, with the participation and co-operation of the peoples affected.

Article 6

1. In applying the provisions of this Convention, governments shall:
 - (a) consult the peoples concerned, through appropriate procedures and in particular through their representative institutions, whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly;
 - (b) establish means by which these peoples can freely participate, to at least the same extent as other sectors of the population, at all levels of decision-making in elective institutions and administrative and other bodies responsible for policies and programmes which concern them;
 - (c) establish means for the full development of these peoples' own institutions and initiatives, and in appropriate cases provide the resources necessary for this purpose.
2. The consultations carried out in application of this Convention shall be undertaken, in good faith and in a form appropriate to the circumstances, with the objective of achieving agreement or consent to the proposed measures.

1. The peoples concerned shall have the right to decide their own priorities for the process of development as it affects their lives, beliefs, institutions and spiritual well-being and the lands they occupy or otherwise use and to exercise control, to the extent possible, over their own economic, social and cultural development. In addition, they shall participate in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of plans and programmes for national and regional development which may affect them directly.
2. The improvement of the conditions of life and work and levels of health and education of the peoples concerned, with their participation and co-operation, shall be a matter of priority in plans for the overall economic development of areas they inhabit. Special projects for development of the areas in question shall also be so designed as to promote such improvement.
3. Governments shall ensure that, whenever appropriate, studies are carried out, in co-operation with the peoples concerned, to assess the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact on them of planned development activities. The results of these studies shall be considered as fundamental criteria for the implementation of these activities.
4. Governments shall take measures, in co-operation with the peoples concerned, to protect and preserve the environment of the territories they inhabit.

Article 8

1. In application of national laws and regulations to the peoples concerned, due regard shall be had to their customs or customary laws.
2. These peoples shall have the right to retain their own customs and institutions, where these are not incompatible with fundamental rights defined by the national legal system and with internationally recognised human rights. Procedures shall be established, whenever necessary, to resolve conflicts which may arise in the application of this principle.
3. The application of paragraphs 1 and 2 of this Article shall not prevent members of these peoples from exercising the rights granted to all citizens and from assuming the corresponding duties.

Article 9

1. To the extent compatible with the national legal system and internationally recognised human rights, the methods customarily practised by the peoples concerned for dealing with offences committed by their members shall be respected.
2. The customs of these peoples in regard to penal matters shall be taken into consideration by the authorities and courts dealing with such cases.

Article 10

1. In imposing penalties laid down by general law on members of these peoples account shall be taken of their economic, social and cultural characteristics.
2. Preference shall be given to methods of punishment other than confinement in prison.

Article 11

The exaction from members of the peoples concerned of compulsory personal services in any form, whether paid or unpaid, shall be prohibited and punishable by law, except in cases prescribed by law for all citizens.

Article 12

The peoples concerned shall be safeguarded against the abuse of their rights and shall be able to take legal proceedings, either individually or through their representative bodies, for the effective protection of these rights. Measures shall be taken to ensure that members of these peoples can understand and be understood in legal proceedings, where necessary through the provision of interpretation or by other effective means.

PART II. LAND

Article 13

1. In applying the provisions of this Part of the Convention governments shall respect the special importance for the cultures and spiritual values of the peoples concerned of their relationship with the lands or territories, or both as applicable, which they occupy or otherwise use, and in particular the collective aspects of this relationship.
2. The use of the term "lands" in Articles 15 and 16 shall include the concept of territories, which covers the total environment of the areas which the peoples concerned occupy or otherwise use.

Article 14

1. The rights of ownership and possession of the peoples concerned over the lands which they traditionally occupy shall be recognised. In addition, measures shall be taken in appropriate cases to safeguard the right of the peoples concerned to use lands not exclusively occupied by them, but to which they have traditionally had access for their subsistence and traditional activities. Particular attention shall be paid to the situation of nomadic peoples and shifting cultivators in this respect.
2. Governments shall take steps as necessary to identify the lands which the peoples concerned traditionally occupy, and to guarantee effective protection of their rights of ownership and possession.
3. Adequate procedures shall be established within the national legal system to resolve land claims by the peoples concerned.

1. The rights of the peoples concerned to the natural resources pertaining to their lands shall be specially safeguarded. These rights include the right of these peoples to participate in the use, management and conservation of these resources.
2. In cases in which the State retains the ownership of mineral or sub-surface resources or rights to other resources pertaining to lands, governments shall establish or maintain procedures through which they shall consult these peoples, with a view to ascertaining whether and to what degree their interests would be prejudiced, before undertaking or permitting any programmes for the exploration or exploitation of such resources pertaining to their lands. The peoples concerned shall wherever possible participate in the benefits of such activities, and shall receive fair compensation for any damages which they may sustain as a result of such activities.

1. Subject to the following paragraphs of this Article, the peoples concerned shall not be removed from the lands which they occupy.

2. Where the relocation of these peoples is considered necessary as an exceptional measure, such relocation shall take place only with their free and informed consent. Where their consent cannot be obtained, such relocation shall take place only following appropriate procedures established by national laws and regulations, including public inquiries where appropriate, which provide the opportunity for effective representation of the peoples concerned.

3. Whenever possible, these peoples shall have the right to return to their traditional lands, as soon as the grounds for relocation cease to exist.

4. When such return is not possible, as determined by agreement or, in the absence of such agreement, through appropriate procedures, these peoples shall be provided in all possible cases with lands of quality and legal status at least equal to that of the lands previously occupied by them, suitable to provide for their present needs and future development. Where the peoples concerned express a preference for compensation in money or in kind, they shall be so compensated under appropriate guarantees.

5. Persons thus relocated shall be fully compensated for any resulting loss or injury.

Article 17

1. Procedures established by the peoples concerned for the transmission of land rights among members of these peoples shall be respected.

2. The peoples concerned shall be consulted whenever consideration is being given to their capacity to alienate their lands or otherwise transmit their rights outside their own community.

3. Persons who are not members of these peoples shall be prevented from taking advantage of their customs or of lack of understanding of the laws on the part of their members to secure the ownership, possession or use of land belonging to them.

Article 18

Adequate penalties shall be established by law for unauthorised intrusion upon, or use of, the lands of the peoples concerned, and governments shall take measures to prevent such offences.

National agrarian programmes shall secure to the peoples concerned treatment equivalent to that accorded to other sectors of the population with regard to:

- (a) the provision of more land for these peoples when they have not the area necessary for providing the essentials of a normal existence, or for any possible increase in their numbers;
- (b) the provision of the means required to promote the development of the lands which these peoples already possess.

PART III. RECRUITMENT AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

Article 20

1. Governments shall, within the framework of national laws and regulations, and in co-operation with the peoples concerned, adopt special measures to ensure the effective protection with regard to recruitment and conditions of employment of workers belonging to these peoples, to the extent that they are not effectively protected by laws applicable to workers in general.

2. Governments shall do everything possible to prevent any discrimination between workers belonging to the peoples concerned and other workers, in particular as regards:

- (a) admission to employment, including skilled employment, as well as measures for promotion and advancement;
- (b) equal remuneration for work of equal value;
- (c) medical and social assistance, occupational safety and health, all social security benefits and any other occupationally related benefits, and housing;
- (d) the right of association and freedom for all lawful trade union activities, and the right to conclude collective agreements with employers or employers' organisations.

3. The measures taken shall include measures to ensure:
- (a) that workers belonging to the peoples concerned, including seasonal, casual and migrant workers in agricultural and other employment, as well as those employed by labour contractors, enjoy the protection afforded by national law and practice to other such workers in the same sectors, and that they are fully informed of their rights under labour legislation and of the means of redress available to them;
 - (b) that workers belonging to these peoples are not subjected to working conditions hazardous to their health, in particular through exposure to pesticides or other toxic substances;
 - (c) that workers belonging to these peoples are not subjected to coercive recruitment systems, including bonded labour and other forms of debt servitude;
 - (d) that workers belonging to these peoples enjoy equal opportunities and equal treatment in employment for men and women, and protection from sexual harassment.

4. Particular attention shall be paid to the establishment of adequate labour inspection services in areas where workers belonging to the peoples concerned undertake wage employment, in order to ensure compliance with the provisions of this Part of this Convention.

PART IV. VOCATIONAL TRAINING, HANDICRAFTS AND RURAL INDUSTRIES

Article 21

Members of the peoples concerned shall enjoy opportunities at least equal to those of other citizens in respect of vocational training measures.

Article 22

1. Measures shall be taken to promote the voluntary participation of members of the peoples concerned in vocational training programmes of general application.

2. Whenever existing programmes of vocational training of general application do not meet the special needs of the peoples concerned, governments shall, with the participation of these peoples, ensure the provision of special training programmes and facilities.

3. Any special training programmes shall be based on the economic environment, social and cultural conditions and practical needs of the peoples concerned. Any studies made in this connection shall be carried out in co-operation with these peoples, who shall be consulted on the organisation and operation of such programmes. Where feasible, these peoples shall progressively assume responsibility for the organisation and operation of such special training programmes, if they so decide.

1. Handicrafts, rural and community-based industries, and subsistence economy and traditional activities of the peoples concerned, such as hunting, fishing, trapping and gathering, shall be recognised as important factors in the maintenance of their cultures and in their economic self-reliance and development. Governments shall, with the participation of these people and whenever appropriate, ensure that these activities are strengthened and promoted.

2. Upon the request of the peoples concerned, appropriate technical and financial assistance shall be provided wherever possible, taking into account the traditional technologies and cultural characteristics of these peoples, as well as the importance of sustainable and equitable development.

PART V. SOCIAL SECURITY AND HEALTH

Article 24

Social security schemes shall be extended progressively to cover the peoples concerned, and applied without discrimination against them.

Article 25

1. Governments shall ensure that adequate health services are made available to the peoples concerned, or shall provide them with resources to allow them to design and deliver such services under their own responsibility and control, so that they may enjoy the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health.

2. Health services shall, to the extent possible, be community-based. These services shall be planned and administered in co-operation with the peoples concerned and take into account their economic, geographic, social and cultural conditions as well as their traditional preventive care, healing practices and medicines.

3. The health care system shall give preference to the training and employment of local community health workers, and focus on primary health care while maintaining strong links with other levels of health care services.

4. The provision of such health services shall be co-ordinated with other social, economic and cultural measures in the country.

PART VI. EDUCATION AND MEANS OF COMMUNICATION

Article 26

Measures shall be taken to ensure that members of the peoples concerned have the opportunity to acquire education at all levels on at least an equal footing with the rest of the national community.

Article 27

1. Education programmes and services for the peoples concerned shall be developed and implemented in co-operation with them to address their special needs, and shall incorporate their histories, their knowledge and technologies, their value systems and their further social, economic and cultural aspirations.

2. The competent authority shall ensure the training of members of these peoples and their involvement in the formulation and implementation of education programmes, with a view to the progressive transfer of responsibility for the conduct of these programmes to these peoples as appropriate.

3. In addition, governments shall recognise the right of these peoples to establish their own educational institutions and facilities, provided that such institutions meet minimum standards established by the competent authority in consultation with these peoples. Appropriate resources shall be provided for this purpose.

Article 28

1. Children belonging to the peoples concerned shall, wherever practicable, be taught to read and write in their own indigenous language or in the language most commonly used by the group to which they belong. When this is not practicable, the competent authorities shall undertake consultations with these peoples with a view to the adoption of measures to achieve this objective.

2. Adequate measures shall be taken to ensure that these peoples have the opportunity to attain fluency in the national language or in one of the official languages of the country.

3. Measures shall be taken to preserve and promote the development and practice of the indigenous languages of the peoples concerned.

Article 29

The imparting of general knowledge and skills that will help children belonging to the peoples concerned to participate fully and on an equal footing in their own community and in the national community shall be an aim of education for these peoples.

Article 30

1. Governments shall adopt measures appropriate to the traditions and cultures of the peoples concerned, to make known to them their rights and duties, especially in regard to labour, economic opportunities, education and health matters, social welfare and their rights deriving from this Convention.

2. If necessary, this shall be done by means of written translations and through the use of mass communications in the languages of these peoples.

Article 31

Educational measures shall be taken among all sections of the national community, and particularly among those that are in most direct contact with the peoples concerned, with the object of eliminating prejudices that they may harbour in respect of these people. To this end, efforts shall be made to ensure that history textbooks and other educational materials provide a fair, accurate and informative portrayal of the societies and cultures of these peoples.

PART VII. MIGRATION ACROSS BORDERS

Article 32

Governments shall take appropriate measures, including by means of international agreements, to facilitate contacts and co-operation between indigenous and tribal peoples across borders, including activities in the economic, social, cultural, spiritual and environmental fields.

PART VIII. ADMINISTRATION

Article 33

1. The governmental authority responsible for the matters covered in this Convention shall ensure that agencies or other appropriate mechanisms exist to administer the programmes affecting the peoples concerned, and shall ensure that they have the means necessary for the proper fulfilment of the functions assigned to them.

2. These programmes shall include:

- (a) the planning, co-ordination, execution and evaluation, in co-operation with the peoples concerned, of the measures provided for in this Convention;
- (b) the proposing of legislative and other measures to the competent authorities and supervision of the application of the measures taken, in co-operation with the peoples concerned.

PART IX. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 34

The nature and scope of the measures to be taken to give effect to this Convention shall be determined in a flexible manner, having regard to the conditions characteristic of each country.

Article 35

The application of the provisions of this Convention shall not adversely affect rights and benefits of the peoples concerned pursuant to other Conventions and Recommendations, international instruments, treaties, or national laws, awards, custom or agreements.

PART X. FINAL PROVISIONS

This Convention revises the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957.

Resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation, Having adopted the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989, and Determined to improve the situation and status of these peoples in the light of the developments which have taken place since the adoption of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention (No. 107) in 1957, and

Convinced of the vital contribution that indigenous and tribal peoples from the regions of the world make towards national societies, and reaffirming their socio-cultural identity, and

Motivated by its firm desire to support the implementation and enhancement of the provisions of the revised Convention;

National action

1. Calls upon member States to consider ratifying the revised Convention at the earliest possible time; to fulfil the obligations laid down in the Convention; and to implement its provisions in the most effective manner.

2. Calls upon governments to co-operate in this respect with national and regional organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned.

3. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to engage in a dialogue with the organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned about the most appropriate ways of securing the implementation of the Convention, and to establish appropriate consultative machinery enabling indigenous and tribal peoples to express their views on all aspects of the Convention.

4. Calls upon governments and employers' and workers' organisations to promote educational programmes, in collaboration with the organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned, in order to disseminate knowledge of the Convention in all sectors of national society including programmes consisting of, for example:

- (a) materials on the content and objectives of the Convention;
- (b) information at regular intervals on the measures taken to implement the Convention;
- (c) seminars designed to promote a better understanding, the ratification, and the effective implementation of the standards laid down in the Convention.

International action

5. Urges the international organisations cited in the preamble of the Convention and others, within existing budgetary resources, to collaborate in developing activities to achieve the objectives of the Convention within their respective fields of competence, and urges the ILO to facilitate the co-ordination of such efforts.

ILO action

6. Urges the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to instruct the Director-General to take the following action, within existing budgetary resources, and to propose the allocation of further resources in future budgets for these purposes:

- (a) promoting the ratification of the Convention and supervising its application;
- (b) assisting governments in developing effective measures for implementing the Convention with the full participation of the indigenous and tribal peoples;
- (c) providing the organisations of the peoples concerned with information and training on the scope and content of this Convention and of other ILO Conventions that may be of direct concern to them, and possibilities for exchanging their experiences and knowledge;
- (d) strengthening the dialogue between governments and employers' and workers' organisations about the objectives and content of the Convention, with the active participation of organisations and institutions of the peoples concerned;
- (e) conducting a general survey, at an appropriate time, under article 19 of the ILO Constitution on the measures taken in member States for the implementation of the revised Convention;
- (f) producing, analysing and publishing relevant, comparable and up-to-date qualitative and quantitative information on the social and economic conditions of the peoples concerned;
- (g) developing technical co-operation programmes and projects that will directly benefit the peoples concerned, addressing the severe poverty and unemployment affecting them. These activities should include income and employment generation schemes, rural development, including vocational training, promotion of handicrafts and rural industries, public works programmes and appropriate technology. These programmes should be financed by the regular budget, subject to existing budgetary constraints, and by multi-bilateral and other sources.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

PART ONE

GENERAL REPORT

A. Introduction

1. In accordance with article 7 of its Standing Orders, the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III of its agenda: "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations". The Committee was composed of 207 members (108 Government members, 33 Employers' members and 66 Workers' members). It also included 16 Government deputy members, 30 Employers' deputy members and 79 Workers' deputy members.¹ In addition, 31 non-governmental international organisations were represented by observers.²

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. J.-J. Elmiger (Government member, Switzerland);

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. A. Wisskirchen (Employers' member, Federal Republic of Germany) and Mr. J. Houthuys (Workers' member, Belgium);

Reporter: Mr. M. Kchaou (Government member, Tunisia).

3. The Committee held 23 sittings.

4. Pursuant to its terms of reference, the Committee considered the following questions: information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference, supplied under article 19 of the Constitution; reports on the application of ratified Conventions, supplied under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution; and reports requested by the Governing Body under article 19 of the Constitution on the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention (No. 128) and Recommendation (No. 131), 1967, in so far as they applied to old-age benefits.³ The Committee, by a decision of the Conference, was also called to examine the report of the fifth session (October 1988) of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers.

5. As usual, the Committee began its work with a discussion of general questions relating to the application of Conventions and Recommendations and the discharge by member States of their obligations under the ILO Constitution in regard to such instruments. The Committee then discussed the general survey made by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and devoted to social security protection in old-age and the above-mentioned report of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts. Finally, it considered a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions or compliance with the obligations to supply reports and to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent national authorities. The examination of these cases – which was the essential work of the Committee – was based mainly on the observations contained in the report of the Committee of Experts and on the written and oral explanations provided by the governments concerned. The Committee also relied on its discussions in previous years, on comments received from employers' and workers' organisations or, where appropriate, on the report of other ILO supervisory bodies. In view of the short time available, the Committee followed its usual practice of making a selection among all of the Committee of Experts' observations and limited itself to discussing a limited number of cases, which did not reduce the importance of the other cases mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts and concerning which government should take the necessary measures in accordance with the observations made in the report. A summary of the information, supplied by governments, of the discussions in the Committee and of any conclusions reached by it, is set out in Part Two of this report.

Obligations binding member States

6. Each year the report of the Committee of Experts made an evaluation of the obligations binding member States.

7. On the positive side there was the number of ratifications, as was indicated in paragraph 14 of the general report of the Committee of Experts, the total number of ratifications stood at 5,401 as at 31 December 1988, thanks to the registration of 90 new ratifications coming from 27 member States during 1988. This notable improvement in the number of ratifications after a somewhat downwards trend which had been noted in previous years and which had worried the members of the Committee was noted with satisfaction by the Employers' and Workers' members and by several Government members (Algeria, Australia, Belgium, Greece, Morocco, Nigeria, Portugal). The Employers' members, however, recalled that ratification was only one step in the commitment of countries, a step which had to be followed by implementation in law and in practice, as well as the supply of reports.

³ Report III (Parts 1 to 3) to the International Labour Conference: Summary of reports (articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution); Report III (Part 4A): Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; Report III (Part 4B): Social Security Protection in Old-Age.

8. The progress achieved in ratifications was highlighted by some members of the Committee. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the five Nordic countries (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden) observed, on the one hand, that a large number of Conventions had still not been ratified by member States and, on the other hand, that ratifications seemed to come mainly from developed countries over the past years. The Government member of Tunisia considered that particular attention should be devoted to the Conventions concerning human rights and recalled the scant ratification of them; he suggested that the Committee of Experts should devote a section in the general part of its report to these Conventions as was done for Convention No. 122. Indeed, the Workers' member of Chile cited the example of his country which had not ratified any Convention for 19 years. The spokesman for the Workers' members expressed the concerns of the Workers' members at the low number of ratifications of the Conventions on social security and old-age benefits (see, in this respect, the summary of discussions on the general survey of the Committee of Experts below). The still unsatisfactory number of ratifications (45) of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) was raised again, particularly by the Workers' member of Pakistan.

9. Some factors favourable to ratification or, on the contrary, difficulties which created obstacles, were mentioned. The Government member of Bulgaria considered that the dialogue carried out by the Committee encouraged the creation of favourable conditions for ratification of Conventions. The Government member of Saudi Arabia considered that the assistance of the Office would be highly appreciated during the preparatory stages when ratification was being looked at. The Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran stated that this Committee should encourage and help member States in the ratification process while at the same time respecting the sovereignty of each State and the ideological or religious principles on which they were founded. Referring to the example of his country, the Government member of Somalia indicated that the Council of Ministers was considering the ratification of 12 Conventions following prior consultations with the national employers' and workers' organisations and with the assistance of a mission by the Regional Adviser for Standards. On the other hand, the Employers' member of the United States considered that the variations he saw in the jurisprudence of the Committee of Experts (which is treated elsewhere in this report) were liable to create difficulties for countries which were trying to bring their legislation into conformity with the Conventions whose ratification was under study, as well as for countries which had ratified them.

10. Several other speakers informed the Committee of ratifications or ratification prospects involving new Conventions for their respective countries. Belgium, having ratified three Conventions in 1988, was studying the possibility of ratifying the Labour administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). In 1988 China had ratified the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159); in 1989 it had completed the preparatory work for the ratification of the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). In Czechoslovakia, the Minister of Labour had submitted for the approval of the Government the ratification of the following Conventions: No. 95 on the Protection of Wages, 1949; No. 120 on Hygiene (Commerce and Offices), 1964; No. 139 on Occupational Cancer, 1974; and No. 148 on the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration), 1977. Examination of the ratification of the Seamen's Welfare Convention, 1987 (No. 163) and the Health Protection and Medical Care (Seafarers) Convention, 1987 (No. 164) was at a very advanced stage and other ratifications were envisaged. Gabon had ratified three new Conventions: Convention No. 144, the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) and the Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158). Greece had recently ratified the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141) and the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142). Hungary had ratified the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167) (as well as the amendments to the Constitution of the ILO). In Italy, the most recent ratification was dated May 1989 and concerned the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160), and several other Conventions were currently being examined. In 1988, Tunisia had ratified the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142) and the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150); in 1989, it had ratified the Vocational Rehabilitation and Employment (Disabled Persons) Convention, 1983 (No. 159). Uruguay had ratified in May 1989 the Rural Workers' Organisations Convention, 1975 (No. 141), the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), the Hours of Work and Rest Periods (Road Transport) Convention, 1979 (No. 153) and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154). The Government of the USSR was preparing to ratify a whole series of Conventions. Work was under way towards the ratification of two maritime Conventions, No. 133 on Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions), 1970 and No. 147 on Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards), 1976; the ratification of the Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127) and the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) was being prepared. The USSR also envisaged ratifying the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) and the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160). The Worker member of the United States, after recalling the ratification by his country in 1988 of Convention No. 144 and the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147), indicated the substantial progress made towards ratification of the Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160); major progress had also been made regarding the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) which would represent the first ratification by the United States of a human rights Convention, and work was advancing for several other Conventions in this field. The Government member of the United States noted that her Government had long felt that, even though in practice United States law met or exceeded, in almost every case, that which was set out in international labour Conventions, an improved record of ratification was an important objective towards which to strive.

11. On the negative side of the evaluation of the obligations binding member states were the denunciations of Conventions. In paragraph 15 of the report of the Committee of Experts, it was stated that in 1988 the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45) had been denounced by Australia, Ireland, Luxembourg and the United Kingdom. Luxembourg had also denounced the Protection against Accidents (Dockers) Convention, 1929 (No. 28), whereas the denunciation by the Netherlands of the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), which was mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts, had been withdrawn by the Government (see below). The total number of denunciations not accompanied by the ratification of a revised Convention now stood at 53.

12. The Workers' members of the Committee expressed their concern at the number of denunciations. The Employers' members observed that the denunciations mentioned were, to some extent, linked to changes in opinion as to whether special protection for women was still justified or whether it constituted an obstacle to equality of opportunity and treatment. According to the representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU), this argument based on equality seemed to be advanced more to aggravate the situation of protected categories of workers in the name of equality instead of being used to improve the situation of everyone; he considered this trend towards denunciation worrying and dangerous and hoped that it would be fought more energetically. The Government member of France thought that a high number of denunciations of a certain type of Convention should be seen as a signal; the Organisation should, in his opinion, accelerate its re-examination of certain instruments which were perhaps no longer well-suited to modern conditions. In the Employers' members' opinion, the Organisation should in any case investigate these questions so as to be in a position to react, where appropriate, more rapidly. The Government member of the Netherlands had already announced to the Committee the withdrawal of his Government's decision to denounce which had been opposed by the workers' organisations. This decision had been based on the belief in a divergence between the instrument and the Dutch legislation due basically to the fact that the principle of occupational risk contained in the Convention had been replaced by the principle of social risk in the Netherlands. Consultations between Office experts and the Dutch authorities had permitted clarification of the situation and the removal of doubts. One of the lessons which the Government member had drawn from this affair was that it showed the necessity of close co-ordination between the lawyers of the Office and national jurists: their interpretation of ILO standards might differ widely, although neither of them was authoritative since, as was known, only the International Court of Justice was competent in this regard. The Government member of France observed further that the circumstances surrounding the denunciation of Conventions were not easy. That could perhaps explain, in part, the "false" denunciation of Convention No. 121 by the Netherlands.

B. General questions relating to international labour standards

Standard-setting activities and the supervisory system

13. This year 53 speakers took part in the discussion of general questions relating to international labour standards. This was the highest number ever recorded. But beyond this purely quantitative aspect – which was doubtless not without importance – it was the sense and the content of the interventions which epitomised the essential characteristic of this session. Indeed, after many years of difficult dialogue in the search for compromise solutions on questions of substance affecting often divergent or even antagonistic interests and positions, the Committee this year had heard one common voice speaking on the major problems which had so often stirred it in previous years. As the Workers' members had pointed out in concluding this discussion, this was the first time that such wide unanimity on the principle of the universality of standards, the objectivity, impartiality and independence of the supervisory system, the role and work of the Committee of Experts and the nature of the links between the supervisory bodies had been achieved. Another subject which had been widely discussed was that concerning the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), especially its conflicting relationship with the massive debt problem of developing countries and the implementation of structural adjustment policies. A reflection of this discussion, as faithful as possible regarding the essential points, but not at all exhaustive, appears in the following paragraphs.

14. This year the Conference was celebrating the 70th anniversary of the International Labour Organisation. The Committee of Experts had seized this occasion to recall the considerations written into the Preamble of the ILO's Constitution in 1919, namely, that universal and lasting peace could be established only if based on social justice, were still, in 1989, the framework in which it carried out its functions (see paragraph 10 of its general report). The importance of an anniversary in an organisation such as the ILO did not lie in its festive celebration, but in the critical review, in the positive sense of the term, of its past achievements and in the prospective review that would be made of its future achievements. The discussions within this Committee had unambiguously shown unanimity as regarded the permanence of the ILO's basic objectives, the unique value and dynamism of its standard-setting activities and the attachment shown more and more clearly by member States and occupational groups to its aims and values.

15. Several speakers recalled the importance of the established standards of the ILO, patiently elaborated and unceasingly complemented since its beginnings. According to the Government member of the Netherlands, the ILO's instruments were the foundation of the ILO itself. The Government member of the United States observed that a good number of these standards dealt with basic and inalienable workers' rights. Representative from developing countries, for example, the Government member of India and the government member of Malaysia speaking on behalf of the members of the Association of South-East Asian Nations (ASEAN), the Workers' members of China and Pakistan, stressed the importance of standard-setting activities for the promotion of balanced economic and social development, for guaranteeing the legitimate freedoms and rights of workers particularly at the trade union level, and finally, for replying to the wishes and hopes of the workers of these countries. A representative of the socialist countries, the Government member of Bulgaria, along with many other members, was of the view that, by their impact on the contents of national legislation and their guiding role in the search for solutions to the problems linked to the protection of human rights and of the most underprivileged social groups, to the guarantee of full employment, to safety and health at work, international labour standards made an important contribution to the promotion of social justice which was an essential prerequisite for long-lasting peace.

16. This widely attested confirmation of the value and more than ever topical nature of the principles and standards of the ILO required affirmation – or reaffirmation as the Government member of India wished – of a commitment to the aims of the ILO and an undertaking to take up the challenges that the world of tomorrow would present. Certain representatives made statements along these lines. The Government member of the USSR informed the Committee that a message had been sent to the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference from the President of the Council of Ministers of the USSR in which the Council stated that the USSR shared and fully supported the objectives and principles of the ILO, whose task of drawing up Conventions and Recommendations, covering practically all aspects of working life and protection of the social concerns of workers, was of primordial importance. This speaker recalled that the USSR regarded highly the ILO's contribution to strengthening stability in the international community. The development of co-operation with the Office – to which "perestroika" had greatly contributed – could be further consolidated in new fields in his opinion. Another speaker, the Workers' member of Pakistan, also informed the Committee of the commitment, duly noted by the Director-General of the ILO, of his country's new Government to bring the national labour policy into conformity with the Conventions of the ILO.

17. Looking at current events, the Employers' members stated that the Committee of Experts had quite rightly referred to the principles set out in the Preamble to the Constitution of the ILO and that present-day developments towards peace – if they could continue without reversals – could have positive results in the social field. For their part, the Workers' members observed that, during the past year, even if the news was worrying in a good number of countries, many political developments had enabled reforms and improvements in economic and social situations in others. They stressed that such reforms had to be accompanied by the enjoyment of freedom and by the exercise of democracy so as to result in lasting peace based on justice, in the service of the most destitute and most vulnerable.

18. As for future standard-setting activities, although the Government member of Norway considered that the Organisation should first try to review and modernise existing standards, others were in favour of pursuing the elaboration of new standards. The world was changing, techniques were evolving and developments did not always involve progress for the workers and, indeed, were often accompanied by increased risks that countries had to be able to overcome. The instruments of the ILO should be able to adapt to these changes and to new requirements. These were basically the opinions expressed by, in particular, the Government members of Czechoslovakia and Morocco, as well as by the representative of the WFTU. The Government members of Norway and Portugal drew attention to the importance of ensuring the greatest and most energetic participation possible of all member States in the process of drawing up standards. In this regard, the Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, stated that he was in favour of initiatives to arrange the procedures along these lines given that they would facilitate more extensive ratification and better compliance with the Conventions. The Government member of Portugal regretted that the Office had received such a low number of replies to the questionnaire on night work and on safety in the use of chemical substances in the workplace.

19. The wish was expressed, in particular by the Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic countries, to see attempts made to find types of flexibility for standards when they were being formulated which would allow the aim of universality in standard-setting activities to be reconciled with the heterogeneous nature of national situations. To this end the above-mentioned speaker proposed that, in the future, the ILO seek to adopt standards which, without giving up its essential aspirations, would be framed in such a way that countries with different political systems at different stages of development would be able to ratify them. He emphasised, however, that this flexibility should apply only to the formulation, and not to the implementation, of standards. The Government members of Australia and Saudi Arabia spoke along the same lines. For his part, the Government member of Malaysia, speaking on behalf of the ASEAN countries, wondered whether, by reason of the tremendous disparity between nations in terms of industrial and economic development, it was possible to establish a set of universally applicable labour standards. In his opinion, the most appropriate way might be to adopt only standards which laid down sufficiently broad and basic guidelines and which left considerable flexibility in other respects to enable ratifying States to adapt them according to local traditions. He stressed, however, that in arguing for more flexible standards, ASEAN countries were not apologising for any manifestation of laxity in the application of ratified Conventions by developing countries, in particular when Conventions concerning workers' rights, the right to organise, the principles of freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining were involved.

20. As was indicated above, the interventions concerning the supervisory system showed a notable improvement over the discussions of previous years on the subject. Employers' members, Workers' members and Government members, in the main, recognised the quality of the work of the Committee of Experts carried out faithfully with respect to its tradition of independence, objectivity and impartiality. These principles applied to the Conference Committee, which continued to apply the methods of work which had been agreed upon in 1980. Appreciation had been particularly expressed for the part of the Committee of Experts' report (paragraph 7) where it indicated that its own working methods included the spirit of mutual respect, co-operation and responsibility which had consistently prevailed in the Committee's relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards, whose proceedings the Committee took fully into consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in respect of specific matters concerning the way in which various States fulfilled their standard-setting obligations. The Employers' and Workers' members noted with interest this clarification made by the Committee of Experts on the relationship of the two supervisory bodies and of their roles. Many Government members referred to this. The Government member of the USSR, after recalling this numerous interventions during previous sessions of the Conference, welcomed the above-mentioned statement of the Committee of Experts on the relationship between that Committee and this Committee. Since, in his opinion, all possibilities for co-operation and interaction between the various supervisory bodies had not yet been exhausted, he hoped that there would be still further movement in this direction.

21. As regarded the interpretation of Conventions, the Employers' members indicated that, if the report of the Committee of Experts was the very basis of the Committee's work, this was not to say that all the opinions and evaluations of the Committee of Experts had to be shared, and different views would be expressed if necessary in concrete cases. The Employers' member of the United States stated, basically, that the jurisprudence of the Committee of Experts was sometimes unstable, evolving and variable. The Employers' member of Sweden recalled the views expressed by the Employers' members on the supervisory system and on the respective roles played by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. Only one body – the International Court of Justice – could make authoritative interpretations of international labour Conventions. Recourse to it had seldom been sought, probably because there had been considerable satisfaction with the way the system functioned. None the less, the role of the International Court of Justice as the ultimate arbiter should always be borne in mind. A Convention had to be interpreted in line with the principles laid down in the Vienna Convention on Treaties (1969), which the speaker enumerated. He drew attention to a representative case he thought showed an over-interpretation of Convention No. 96, based on a faulty reading of the preparatory works many years ago. In his view, this year's report of the Committee of Experts unfortunately contained a number of over-interpretations, especially regarding basic human rights Conventions and in particular Convention No. 87. Even though his country had not been mentioned in this connection, he thought that some of the comments were inadmissible. In the long term, he believed over-interpretations would only erode the credibility of the supervisory system. A drastic cut was needed in the number of reports examined by the Committee of Experts each year. This should be combined, however, with a rather strict application of the constitutional annual interval where a report had given rise to critical observations. If the Committee of Experts' burden were lightened, then more than one expert would be able to examine the application of a particular Convention. These speakers reiterated that it was neither for the Committee of Experts nor the Office to provide conclusive interpretations of Conventions since the only competent body for this was the International Court of Justice according to article 37 (1) of the Constitution of the ILO.

22. Commenting on the statement of the Employers' member of Sweden, the Workers' member of the United Kingdom was opposed to this stance which he considered dangerous, particularly when it came to a Convention such as Convention No. 87: what was, for some, only a legal nicety was hard reality for workers, for example, when there was imprisonment for having exercised the right to strike. The Workers' member of the Netherlands, referring to the statement of the Employers' member of the United States concerning the changes in the jurisprudence, observed that if it was normal that the doctrine of the Committee of Experts had undergone developments, this in no way meant that one could talk of incoherencies.

23. At the closure of the general discussion, the representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Committee of Experts had itself recognised, and recalled on many occasions – particularly in 1987 when it re-examined its terms of reference, governing principles and working methods – that: "its terms of reference do not require it to give definitive interpretations of conventions, competence to do so being vested in the International Court of Justice by article 37 of the Constitution; nevertheless, in order to carry out its function of evaluating the implementation of Conventions, the Committee has to consider and express its views on the meaning of certain provisions of Conventions". In 1921, in a document to which the Office still referred, it was clearly indicated that no particular authorisation had been granted to it to interpret provisions of Conventions. However, it was considered to be part of the task for which the Office was created to strive to provide the fullest information possible on the intentions of the Committee and the Conference which had drafted the Convention. In this way, the Office considered that there would be greater uniformity in interpretation. Thus the last time the Governing Body has examined the question of the interpretation of Conventions, in 1982, it had concluded that the current practice concerning interpretation was entirely satisfactory. The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that it was within the power of governments disagreeing with the interpretations given by the supervisory bodies to have recourse to the International Court of Justice. In two cases, the Committee of Experts had drawn attention to this option. On the questions of the right to strike and essential services, it could be said that the jurisprudence of the supervisory bodies was consistent. On the right to strike, both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had considered this right to be one of the essential means available to workers and their organisations to promote and to defend their economic and social interests. This principle had always been supported by both supervisory bodies which, over time, had fixed the conditions in which this right could be exercised. The Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts had also admitted that once the principle of the right to strike had been established, this right could be subject to restrictions, or even prohibition, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. However, to this principle relating to the prohibition of strikes in essential services, they had added the notion that this principle would lose all meaning if such services were defined too broadly. This jurisprudence had not varied.

24. The Workers' members fully subscribed to this declaration.

Constitutional procedures of complaint and representation and other procedures

25. At paragraphs 18 to 26 of its report, the Committee of Experts provided indications, on the one hand, on the cases in which there had been recourse to the constitutional procedures of complaint and representation and, on the other hand, on the conclusion of the Committee on Freedom of Association to which the attention of the Committee of Experts had been drawn.

26. At paragraph 19 of the general report of the Committee of Experts, mention was made of the withdrawal of the complaint presented by the Government of Tunisia under article 26 of the Constitution on the observation, by the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) and the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) after a settlement between the parties has been reached through the good offices of the Office. The Employers' members and the Workers' members expressed their satisfaction with the settlement of this case and the way in which this had been achieved. This example was, in the opinion of the Employers' members, an ideal type of solution.

27. The situation, however, was different in another case mentioned in paragraph 20 of the report of the Committee of Experts. This concerned the current examination by the Governing Body of a complaint concerning the observance, by Nicaragua, of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) presented by several Employer delegates to the 73rd Session (1987) of the Conference under article 26 of the Constitution. The Employers' members pointed out that the examination of the matter had had to be carried over on several occasions because of the lack of adequate information transmitted by the Government. They wished to stress the unacceptability of such an attitude by the Government. Referring to the same case, the Workers' member of the USSR was of the view that this Committee should take into account the statements and conclusions contained in the document approved by the Governing Body at its May 1989 session, a document which had not been available when the Committee of Experts made its report based on the conclusions approved by the Governing Body at its February-March session.

28. At paragraph 24 of its general report, the Committee of Experts referred to a complaint submitted to the ILO by the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) against the Republic of South Africa concerning violations of freedom of association. In accordance with the procedure for the examination of complaints concerning violations of trade union rights, established in 1950 by agreement between the United Nations and the ILO, the Secretary-General of the United Nations requested the Government of South Africa to consent to the referral of the complaint to the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association of the ILO. The Government of South Africa replied that it would be premature to transmit the complaint to that Commission. Commenting on this case on behalf of the five Nordic countries (Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, Sweden), the Government member of Norway regretted the refusal of the South African Government to allow the procedure to follow its course. He expressed the hope that effective pressure could be brought to bear on the Government to persuade it to change its decision.

29. If, as mentioned above, the constitutional procedures had resulted – at least in one case – in a satisfactory conclusion, there remained, in the opinion of the Workers' members, many serious problems still unsolved: 70 complaints concerning freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively were still under examination. As regarded this type of complaint and examination procedure, the Workers' member of Tunisia regretted that Office interventions were complex, slow and therefore ineffective; in his opinion, ways had to be found to make the Committee on Freedom of Association truly representative of the trade union movement.

Application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122)

30. As in previous years, the Committee of Experts this year included, in paragraphs 51 to 57 of its report, general comments on the application of Convention No. 122. These comments represented a summary of the examination of 50 government reports. The Committee of Experts stated on this occasion that it was "more convinced than ever of the need for exchange of information among countries which had ratified the Convention: the need to study different experience and difficulties, and to evaluate the strategies and policies adopted". Aware of the complexity of its task, given the nature and breadth of the Convention, the Committee of Experts based its examination and comments firstly on the governments' reports, which were often detailed. In each case it relied on the expertise of the economists in the Employment and Development Department of the ILO and the regional employment teams (such as PREALC in Latin America). Where necessary, it took advantage of the work of the new Employment Committee of the Governing Body, whose mandate had been carefully defined to avoid overlap with its own work. Finally, and this merited recall in the context of the discussions this year, the Committee of Experts took into account, since it had started making its general comments, the information, ideas, suggestions or recommendations arising from the exchange of views which took place in the Conference Committee on this subject. The Conference Committee had noted in its report to the Conference in June 1988 (paragraph 50) that the dialogue which had been taking place between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee was considered to be exemplary. The Committee of Experts would no doubt be comforted in its approach by the opinions and wishes expressed this year within the Committee – and to which reference was made in this report – regarding the necessary relationship of the two supervisory bodies.

31. To give some concrete examples, there was agreement on the analyses made on the question of the international aspect, or globalisation, of employment problems. These problems, noted by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 57 of its report, concerned “all countries, whatever their level of development or economic or employment system. Every country has to deal with problems of economic restructuring, structural adjustment, employment promotion and the skills of the workforce in one way or another”. Some might say that this was evident, but if a number of countries had had to battle for some time with these difficulties others had only met them recently and the examination of the application of Convention No. 122 could be of new interest there. The Committee of Experts noted that almost everywhere practices of exclusion, marginalisation, segregation and discrimination were still rife. It therefore appeared opportune to recall the need to promote the “main” goal of full, productive and freely chosen employment set out in the Convention, attributing to it the necessary weight among the priorities of economic and social policies.

32. The discussion within the Committee of the general comments of the Committee of Experts had been enriched by the interventions, in addition to those of the spokesmen of the Workers’ and Employers’ members, of a great many speakers, mainly Government and Workers’ members, representative of the various regions of the world and of different economic and social systems. They were practically unanimous in recognising the central and priority nature of the question of employment, unemployment and underemployment, the value of the goals of Convention No. 122, and in appreciating the analyses presented by the Committee of Experts in its general comments. In this respect, they referred to the Director-General’s Report on Recovery and Employment and its discussion in plenary. Its work of summarising and its approach to the problems were particularly praised by the Government member of Venezuela, who suggested similar treatment for other Conventions; the Committee of Experts was encouraged to pursue its action, for example, by the Workers’ member of the USSR. As for the means of implementation to bring about the employment objectives, the positions were not always the same, naturally, between the groups which represented conflicting interests and between the countries which had different economic and employment systems. There was quasi-unanimity expressed as regarded the aims and the evaluations of the Experts. The Employers’ members expressed certain reservations as to the pertinence of giving priority to one objective of economic and social policy, be it that of employment, to the detriment of other economic and financial factors; they also questioned the capacity of the Committee of Experts to cover such a vast field of States’ internal policies. Although they were eminent jurists, the Experts were perhaps not predestined to treat questions of employment policy. Caution seemed to the Employers’ members to be advisable. They also drew attention to the risk of overlapping of work between the Committee of Experts and the Governing Body Employment Committee.

33. The part of the Committee of Experts’ comments which gave rise to the most numerous and the most committed discussions was that appearing in paragraph 55, devoted to particular difficulties encountered by governments of developing countries, mainly in Africa or Latin America, in formulating and implementing an employment policy in an international economic environment marked, in particular, by the massive debt problem. On the basis of information supplied, in one case, by a workers’ organisation and, in two other cases, by the governments in their respective reports, the Committee of Experts was able to note the relationship of cause and effect between the problems of external debt, balance of payments, structural adjustment policies, and those of employment. In the first case, that of a Latin American country, it was alleged that the stabilisation and structural adjustment programmes had affected social policy measures and the conditions and standards of living. In the case of an African country, the Government had decided to abandon the adjustment programme prepared in agreement with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) on account of its negative effects on the economy and employment. The third reference concerned another Latin American country which recently experienced serious social tensions and whose government stated in its report that the measures imposed by the international financial institutions were “diametrically opposed to the aims of the Convention”.

34. Many of the members who spoke referred to or commented on the examples mentioned by the Committee of Experts and others presented additional information or evidence to the Committee. They expressed their agreement with the analyses and concerns of the Committee of Experts concerning the impact of the high level of external debt, interest rates, or the deterioration in exchange rates (for example, the Government members of Morocco and Venezuela). More precisely, several speakers referred to the structural adjustment programmes adopted, usually, in agreement with the international economic and financial organisations (IMF, World Bank) and to their perverse or counterproductive effects on employment and revenue. The application of Convention No. 122 was directly involved. The Government member of Nigeria referred to the example of his country where the debt problem hindered the efforts of his Government to maintain employment or create new jobs. Several other members also stressed the difficulties created by these situations for the application of Convention No. 122, as well as for the application of other basic Conventions; the tensions arising from policies put into place had, in many cases, resulted in severe restrictions on trade union rights and human rights. These points of view were put forward particularly by the Government member of Argentina, the Workers' members of China, Pakistan, Spain and the United Kingdom, while the representative of the WFTU and the Employers' member of Argentina highlighted one of the consequences of unemployment and inflation; namely, the development of the unstructured sector. More generally, speakers from African countries described as "crucial" the debt problem in Africa, where the situation was such that it had become economically and socially worrying, politically dangerous and liable to question the sovereignty of States (Workers' members of Liberia and Senegal; a similar opinion on the "political" risks was also expressed by the Workers' member of the United Kingdom).

35. Several of the speakers, who had stressed the responsibility of the international financial organisations for having neglected or minimised the social cost of structural adjustment policies and programmes, stated that the ILO should be more visible and active. The High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment (November 1987) recalled the constitutional responsibility of the ILO and the fact that it was for it to examine and consider the action programmes and economic and financial measures in the light of their effect on employment and social conditions. The Meeting concluded that the ILO should promote tripartite consultations and co-operation in the service of adjustment and that it should monitor respect for its standards on employment, fundamental rights and tripartism. Last year, the Committee had had an initial discussion on this meeting (see paragraphs 54 and 55 of its report). This year, several of the speakers mentioned above stressed the need to ensure a follow up to the conclusions of the above-mentioned Meeting (in particular, the Government members of Australia, France, Uruguay and the Workers' member of Pakistan). For its part, the Committee of Experts was invited to continue its action in this regard, particularly by the Government members of Tunisia and Venezuela.

36. The Committee of Experts' examination of reports from industrialised market economy countries showed a continuation of the trend towards rising employment and falling levels of unemployment, already noticed last year (see paragraph 53 of the 1989 report). This improvement was noted by the Employers' members and the Workers' members of the Committee. The spokesman of the latter, however, stressed that the good economic indices registered these last years should not hide the fact that a mass of workers were included from labour markets, namely, 15 million unemployed in the 12 countries of the EEC, or 30 million in the countries of the OECD.

37. A certain number of comments were made on the measures of employment policy referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts. The Government member of Norway pointed in particular to the comment of the Committee of Experts that the best results had been obtained by countries pursuing employment policies along the lines of the goals of the Convention, and through methods of implementation set out in it. The Government members of Italy and Spain drew attention to the importance of training programmes, the encouragement of creating independent employment for the unemployed, and the measures taken to help young people or women in the framework of employment policies. The Employers' members mentioned the reference made in the Experts' report to the reduction in working time, in relation to the aims of employment, and stressed that this measure should be evaluated differently according to whether or not it was accompanied by maintenance of remuneration.

38. But in the end, it was the concerns expressed by the Committee of Experts with regard to certain special, or "flexible", types of employment in relation to the goal of full employment set out in the Convention, which received attention. The Workers' member of Finland – who preferred to talk of "irregular" or "atypical" types of employment when referring to part-time or temporary work – and that of Spain, as well as the representative of the WFTU, shared the Committee of Experts' concerns as to the conformity of these types of employment, when they were not voluntary, with the goal of full employment of Convention No. 122. According to the Workers' member of Spain, the practice of replacing stable employment by precarious forms of employment (such as short-term renewable contracts) was unacceptable, especially when the undertakings received financial aid from the government for the creation of this type of position. For the Workers' member of Finland, new standards were needed to protect workers since these types of employment were being further developed. The spokesman of the Workers' members expressed a slightly different opinion, making a distinction between flexibility in employment – which could be acceptable if negotiated – and precarious employment – which could only constitute a temporary solution in periods of crisis. The spokesman of the Employers' members, who criticised the way in which the Committee of Experts presented the problem, clarified the Employers' position on this question. He stated that they rejected descriptions like "precarious" or "atypical" because of their negative connotation and that they had never suggested that such alternative forms of work were the ideal solution for ensuring full employment. In their opinion, however, such work opportunities were certainly preferable to unemployment and could really offer an opportunity to achieve full employment, as had seen these last few years. Another important factor was that more and more people were voluntarily seeking it out. Speaking generally, this was an inevitable consequence of structural changes in production and services which were also linked to reductions in working hours. The Employers' members wished to state clearly that these flexible forms of work should not lead to a diminution in workers' protection. With the Workers' members, they stated that they were in favour of recourse to collective bargaining for the organisation of this type of work relations. Speaking more generally, consultation and negotiation machinery were recognised as special means for implementing a policy to promote labour productivity and employment, as had been pointed out, for example, by the spokesman of the Workers' group and the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany. The Employers' members, highlighting along with the Committee of Experts that the unemployed had no pressure groups, stated that common, concerted action was necessary with regard to this category of the active population.

39. Proving the assertion that employment problems concerned all countries, the Committee of Experts had devoted a part of its general comments (paragraph 56) to the problems and employment policies in socialist countries with planned economies. On the basis of often detailed reports and information supplied by these countries, the Committee of Experts had been able to gauge the amplitude of changes which were occurring in the field of labour management in the framework of the current process of restructuring the economies of these countries. It stated its interest in following developments in the situation and in examining the way in which the global or sectoral policies now in place would allow the conciliation of the goal of full employment and the guarantee of the right to work with that of "real" employment at the level of the undertaking. Several representatives of these countries intervened and presented the Committee with information corroborating or complementing the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Government member of the USSR recognised that, in socialist countries, the reform of economic institutions and the development of independent workers' collectives also gave rise to employment problems. In the USSR, for example, 16 million people would probably lose their jobs over the next 15 years. During the past two years, the State had found new jobs for 3 million workers. Although the Government had run into certain difficulties in this connection, it was pursuing its policy of full employment based on recognition of the right to work; a decree had been adopted in 1987 which was intended to guarantee full employment to the population, to improve the placement system and to strengthen social guarantees. The right to work would be guaranteed to all persons whose posts had been cut out. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic stressed the role of trade unions in the implementation of employment policies. It was one of the first and foremost duties of trade unions to participate in the conception of methods to struggle against unemployment, in securing workers' security in employment, and in informing them of planned rationalisation measures. Referring to his country, he stated that the constant participation of workers' representatives in the preparation of workers for new jobs and the supervision of the implementation of social measures accompanying rationalisation had been highly successful. The co-operation of unions in introducing new techniques had been particularly significant in ensuring the reintegration of workers. He also stated that the trade unions in socialist countries would continue to send comments on their experiences regarding employment and would thus reply to the request for information made by the Committee of Experts. The representative of another socialist country, the Government member of Hungary, also informed the Committee of his country's experience, where the aims and tasks of the employment policy had also been redefined. To be able to put these aims – which concerned mainly the raising of labour productivity and the guaranteeing for workers of the maintenance of social protection – into practice, an employment fund had been created. It would particularly serve in financing recycling costs, unemployment benefits and in providing financial assistance for the creation of small enterprises. His Government intended to reform the employment agencies, particularly by introducing computers, and it wanted to be able to benefit from the ILO's experience and that of member States in this field. Finally, the Workers' member of the USSR observed that the current reforms introduced, among other things, a greater employment flexibility, and he indicated that labour flexibility was designed above all to lighten and improve working conditions; in fact, in his country, the problem of unemployment did not arise, at least for the moment, with the same acuity as in market economy countries. Commenting on paragraph 56 of the report of the Committee of Experts, the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee showed their interest in the reforms currently under way in socialist planned economy countries, which put particular emphasis on the notions of productivity, responsibility and autonomy. The Employers' members were also surprised, as regards the socialist countries with planned economies, that the Committee of Experts had noted with interest, but no critical note, the new efforts being made, as well as the measures aimed at introducing greater flexibility, in particular in the form of part-time work. They wondered whether the Committee of Experts had practised that which it had always rejected; namely, the application of double standards. The Workers' member of the USSR expressed his disagreement with the statement of the Chairman of the Employers' group to the effect that the Committee of Experts was duplicating the work of the Governing Body Committee of Employment, quoting from the report "The principal means at the ILO's disposal – standards and technical co-operation – should be used together by emphasizing their complementarity in order to reach the goals of the Convention; namely, full, productive and freely chosen employment".

Application of Conventions to off-shore industrial installations and in export processing zones or enterprises.

40. As indicated in its general report, between 1981 and 1987 the Committee of Experts considered the applicability of international labour Conventions to offshore industrial installations used in the exploration and extraction of mineral and petroleum resources at sea. In 1987, a preliminary study was carried out by the Office with a view to defining the main problems to be examined. During the last Session of the Committee, the Workers' members had expressed the hope that the study in question would be finished for the 76th Session of the Conference and that the Committee of Experts would continue its examination as planned. The Committee was informed that a preliminary report had been concluded during 1988, the general lines of which were set out in the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts (paragraphs 42 to 47). That Committee felt that it would be premature at this stage for it to comment on the various points raised in the information presented and hoped that in due course a comparative study of the law and practice of a selected number of countries would be carried out. The Employers' members shared the Committee of Experts' view that it was premature to carry out an evaluation on the state of the situation. For the Workers' members – many of whom were attentive to the problems of seafarers – now was the time to go further with a view to defining the way in which such installations could be better protected through different approaches. They questioned the adequacy of the attention given to these activities in the reports supplied by governments and in those of the Committee of Experts. In this connection, the representative of the WFTU considered that priority should be given to the financing and rapid completion of the comparative study suggested by the Committee of Experts; the increased number and size of these installations had provoked dramatic accidents which had evidenced the serious safety problems.

41. As regarded the application of Conventions in export processing zones or enterprises, the Committee of Experts, which had also examined the question in 1981, recalled that it was continuing its consideration within the framework of its regular supervision of the application of ratified Conventions, namely, in the observations and direct requests addressed to the countries concerned. In this regard, the Government member of Venezuela did not want the analysis thus carried out through Conventions and individual comments to deprive the Committee of a future study of the question in the general part of the Committee of Experts' report.

Role of employers' and workers' organisations

42. In its report, the Committee of Experts indicated that, since its last session, it had received a total of 154 observations from occupational organisations, including 113 from workers' organisations. The Workers' members highlighted the importance of this figure which witnessed – as noted by the Committee of Experts – the interest shown by employers' and workers' organisations in the implementation of standards and reflected the constant efforts of the supervisory bodies and the Office to supply interested organisations with full information on their role. In this regard, the Government member of Portugal highlighted in her intervention the growing importance of occupational organisations in the field of adoption, ratification and implementation of standards. The Committee of Experts also indicated that 75 of the 154 observations received had been transmitted directly to the Office. The Workers' members welcomed this way of proceeding which bore witness of the confidence these organisations had in the ILO, subject to the fact that it should not hinder dialogue with the Government.

43. The Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), the real incentive for the promotion of tripartism, had, to date, received 45 ratifications. The Committee of Experts repeated its hope, based on the favourable ratification prospects it had noted in its 1982 General Survey, of seeing an increase in the number of commitments undertaken by member States as regarded this instrument. Several speakers expressed full support for the encouragement of its ratification and/or stressed the importance of the instrument (in particular, the Workers' members and Government members of Australia and the Federal Republic of Germany). According to one of them for example (the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany), the tripartite structure and tripartite co-operation of the Organisation were characteristics which differentiated the ILO from all other organisations within the United Nations system. They were the real strength of the ILO since they encouraged dialogue, co-operation and the settlement of differences. This was particularly important for countries where the national machinery for such co-operation was insufficient. On the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the ILO, it was important to recall that tripartite co-operation had opened the door to social progress, particularly in the field of human rights. Tripartism was useful for dialogue between different political and socio-economic systems and it contributed to social justice. Several countries informed the Committee of the measures taken and progress achieved in these fields. The Government member of Hungary, in particular, mentioned the creation this year of a tripartite committee which was considered to be an important step towards the establishment of permanent tripartite consultations on labour questions; he also referred to the development of trade union pluralism during the past year, which had involved the creation of eight new independent unions. Finally, the Workers' member of the USSR stated that, in his country, the workers were actively involved in the ratification process through their membership in a tripartite committee.

Promotional activities concerning standards

44. Paragraphs 58 to 63 of the Committee of Experts' report contained information on the use of the direct contacts procedure and other forms of assistance to member States in the field of international labour standards. During 1988, direct contacts missions concerning freedom of association took place in Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Haiti and Nicaragua. Direct contacts took place in Bangladesh concerning the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and Guatemala concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). Another direct contacts mission was undertaken in the Dominican Republic and Haiti with a view to the implementation of the recommendations made in 1983 by the Commission of Inquiry concerning Haitian workers in the sugar plantations of the Dominican Republic. The Regional Advisers on Standards, whose task consisted essentially in assisting governments to fulfil their obligations under the ILO Constitution and ratified Conventions, visited 20 countries in Africa, America, and Asia and the Pacific. Nineteen officials, two employers and four observers from 23 countries undertook training in the International Labour Standards Department. This Department organised two regional seminars on international labour standards designed for government officials directly responsible for questions relating to international labour standards and, in particular, on the fulfilment by States of the obligations deriving from the ILO Constitution and ratified Conventions. In addition, the Regional Advisers on Standards participated in the work of a number of seminars organised by other ILO departments in various regions of the world. National tripartite seminars on international labour standards were held in five countries and six seminars on freedom of association were organised for workers' and employers' organisations.

45. The Committee welcomed the continuation of these activities which aimed at assisting member States of the Organisation in better fulfilling their obligations concerning standards and the standards-setting procedures of the ILO. Several speakers (for example, the Government members of Gabon and Somalia, the Workers' member of Pakistan) attested to the usefulness of these programmes. The Government member of Hungary stated his country's interest in these programmes. The Committee, convinced of the special interest which developing countries had in such promotional activities since it had been shown that their problems concerning standards were often due to administrative and financial difficulties, agreed that these activities should be strengthened. The representative of the Secretary-General assured the Committee that this would be the objective aimed at within the limits of available resources.

46. The promotional activities mentioned above took place in the context of action aimed at strengthening the links between international standards and technical co-operation. In this regard, the Committee of Experts welcomed the new measures envisaged in the Programme and Budget for 1990-91 and expressed the hope that they would contribute to a better application in practice of the ILO's standards. The Committee of Experts indicated that it would continue to draw the attention of governments to the value of requesting ILO technical assistance for overcoming difficulties in the application of ratified Conventions. In addition, in the part of its general comments relating to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (paragraph 52), it stated that, in the examination of the application of this instrument, it looked favourably on an approach taking account of the inherent relations between standards-setting instruments, the supervision of their application and technical co-operation programmes. The inter-relationship, referred to at length throughout this report, of the two supervisory bodies was also evidenced in this field, as was seen from the above and the intervention of the Government member of the United States, who recalled that the links between standards and technical co-operation activities had become major themes, thanks largely to the support they had received from members of the Conference Committee over the years. This support had not diminished this year.

Reports on ratified Conventions

47. As each year, the Committee of Experts made an assessment of the way in which States fulfilled their constitutional obligations concerning the supply of reports on ratified Conventions. The statistics contained in the report of the Committee of Experts showed generally the continuation of problems noted year after year and, in certain cases, a downward trend in the situation, for example, as regarded the percentage of reports received by the due date (less than 10 per cent) or by the end of the Committee of Experts' session (slightly less than 75 per cent). The Employers' members and the Workers' members expressed their concern at these persistent facts, as did several Government members directly or indirectly (for example, France, Norway, the USSR speaking of "a dangerous trend"). Several members supplied information on the reasons for these shortcomings, based mainly on their own experience. It was common knowledge that most often administrative and technical problems were involved and this did not only concern developing countries (as was pointed out, for example, by the Government members of India and Nigeria). Certain Government members from developed countries stated that they had met similar problems, especially when a large number of Conventions had been ratified, and, in particular, Convention No. 144 which required tripartite consultations for the preparation of reports (indications along these lines were given, in particular, by the Government members of France and the Netherlands. The Government member of Uruguay also spoke in this connection, stressing the importance of technical assistance. The Government member of the United States hoped that reporting difficulties were not being used as a means of delaying or avoiding the supervisory process. A certain number of suggestions were made to the Committee concerning the measures to take to mitigate these difficulties. A request was made for a thorough analysis of the reasons behind this state of affairs and for use to be made of all forms of assistance that the Office could supply for the preparation of reports or for the training of qualified personnel; other suggestions, particularly from the Employers' members, included the revision of the report forms, the spacing out of requests for reports and the deferral of the due date in order to alleviate as far as possible the burden of work on the Committee of Experts and governments; finally, some speakers drew attention to the collaboration of the social partners. The representative of the Secretary-General stated that the Office had taken note of these suggestions and would examine them with due care.

48. While some data contained in the report of the Committee of Experts might give rise to concern, other information contained positive aspects which the Employers' members, in particular, noted. The statistics concerning the percentage of reports on Conventions containing indications on their practical application were quite encouraging (63 per cent). The Employers' members stressed the indispensable nature of the information requested in this connection; transmission of such information should become the rule. They noted with interest the Committee of Experts' statement that, in the majority of cases, no comment was called for regarding the way in which ratified Conventions were implemented (paragraph 91 of the report). The number of cases of progress registered – even if this showed a certain decrease – continued to give satisfaction. These cases were generally considered as proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory machinery. One illustration of this argument was supplied by the Government member of the USSR in relation to the cases of progress registered for his country concerning the Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936 (No. 52) and the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Seventh African Regional Conference

49. Several speakers referred to the Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO which was held in Harare from 27 November to 7 December 1988 and which was mentioned in paragraphs 27 to 29 of the general part of the report of the Committee of Experts.

50. The Employers' members recalled and stressed, on this occasion, the importance they attached to the work of regional conferences. The Workers' members noted in particular that, in its resolution concerning respect for human rights and basic freedoms, the Conference had recalled the role played by the ILO in the defence of workers' rights through its supervisory machinery. The Workers' member of Pakistan noted that the Conference had reaffirmed the principle of the indivisibility of human rights. The Workers' member of Liberia referred to the conclusions and recommendations of the Conference concerning co-operatives and training in rural and urban zones. Finally, the Government member of Nigeria pointed out that, in its resolution on economic development and social progress in Africa, the Conference requested the Director-General of the ILO to strengthen links between technical co-operation and international labour standards.

Functions in regard to other international and regional instruments

51. At paragraphs 30 to 39 of the general part of its report, the Committee of Experts supplied information on the co-operation activities of the Office with other international organisations relating, in particular, to the application of certain international or regional instruments.

52. The Employers' and Workers' members declared their support for these activities, highlighting the importance of co-operation between the various international organisations.

53. Various other speakers referred to particular aspects of these activities mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts. The Government member of the USSR, referring to the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women, indicated to the Committee that the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet had revoked the reservation made when it ratified the Convention in 1980 concerning non-recognition of the obligatory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice (this decision also affected five other international instruments concerning human rights); in addition, and more generally, he highlighted the fact that the process of harmonising national legislation with international covenants and treaties was being pursued actively. Referring to the same instrument, the Government member of Spain drew attention to the co-operation supplied by the Office in this field which greatly interested his Government. The Government member of Norway and the Employers' members mentioned the call, contained in a recommendation of the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, to ratify the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), of the ILO and to establish systems for the objective evaluation of work. Although they were not opposed to job evaluation, the Employers' members were of the opinion that this was not an automatic guarantee against discrimination in remuneration, especially when it involved evaluation of jobs carried out exclusively either by women or by men. Moreover, the Workers' member of Chile informed the Committee of the ratificatin by his country of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, certain provisions of which were in conformity with those of Convention No. 87. Referring to the European Code of Social Security, the Government member of Norway noted with satisfaction that the Steering Committee of Experts' conclusions, thus expressing its confidence in the ILO's supervisory procedures. With regard to collaboration with other international organisations, the Workers' member of Japan expressed his satisfaction at its development, but expressed concern at the activities of certain bodies such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank whose imposition of conditions on indebted countries was detrimental to trade union rights (see, on this question, the section concerning the application of Convention No. 122).

Relations with the European Communities

54. The Committee dealt with two themes in this connection. The first concerned the question of the relationship between the rights and duties deriving from the ILO Constitution and the rights and duties under the treaties establishing regional groups. The Committee of Experts in its report (paragraphs 114 to 116) looked at one particular aspect of this problem, that of submission of certain instruments to the appropriate authorities of the European Communities. At its previous session, the Workers' members of the Committee had particularly expressed concern at the consequences of a division of competence between the Communities and their member States for submission and ratification of certain ILO instruments. In its report, the Committee of Experts wished to stress the submission to the appropriate bodies of the European Communities did not fulfil the obligations of the member States concerned under the provisions of article 19 of the Constitution of the ILO or those deriving from ratification of Convention No. 144. The Employers' members observed that respect of the submission obligation was rather complicated, but need not become impossible; the member States of the European Communities had to fulfil their obligations towards the ILO and that went particularly for consultations with employers' and workers' organisations which had to be maintained. Other members of the Committee spoke on those points (in particular, the Workers' members, the Government members of France and the Federal Republic of Germany, the Workers' member of the Netherlands) and observed that the question of submission of instruments to the competent authorities was only one aspect of a more general problem which affected the whole standards-setting process of the Organisation. The transfer of certain elements of sovereignty to a supranational organisation was something new which raised certain difficulties because of the obligations of member States under the ILO's Constitution. The Government member of France noted that the question was becoming more and more topical and new problems were arising which might, according to the Workers' member of the Netherlands, seriously affect the work of the Conference at its current session when it was elaborating new instruments concerning safety in the use of chemical substances in the workplace. The speakers mentioned above expressed the hope that high-level contacts between the two organisations would allow appropriate solutions to be found to the legal problems as a whole. The representative of the Secretary-General confirmed that such contacts had indeed taken place with this in mind.

55. The second type of problem discussed concerned the forthcoming entry into force (1992) of the single European market. The Workers' members stated that the single market formed by the 12 countries of the Community could give rise to real hope for economic growth and employment. However, they pointed to the need to give a social dimension to Europe on the economic, monetary and financial planes. In their opinion, and in the opinion of the Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany, international labour standards had a determining role to play in the creation of a "base" for basic social rights. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany indicated that his Government wanted the social dimension of Europe to take root, whereas the Workers' member of the United Kingdom regretted that his country was not among those pushing for this.

C. Reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102); the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention (No. 128) and Recommendation (No 131), 1967, in so far as they applied to old-age benefits

56. The Committee examined the Committee of Experts' general survey based on the reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution and regarding the application of the above-mentioned instruments in so far as they concerned old-age benefits. In addition to the information supplied under article 19 of the Constitution, the survey took account of the information supplied under article 22 of the Constitution by States which had ratified Conventions Nos. 102 and 128. Thus, reports from 116 countries – 105 States and 11 non-metropolitan territories – were examined. The general survey also took into account the comment received from employers' and workers' organisations.

General observations

57. The Committee was unanimous in expressing its appreciation of the quality of the Committee of Experts' general survey which supplied valuable information on the general situation of old-age protection through social security, as well as on the problems facing States in this area. The Employers' members, however, regretted that the information supplied by governments was not always sufficiently full and detailed, and this weakened the impact of the survey. The Committee also wished to underline the importance it attached to general surveys in general since they allowed a global view of the subjects covered by the specific instruments involved, independent of their ratification. In this context, the Government member of Bulgaria also referred to the usefulness of the discussions which took place each year in the Committee and during which basic questions for the ILO were broached; this exchange of views constituted a useful prerequisite to the implementation of international standards.

58. The Committee stressed the role of social security in general and the need to ensure the protection of the elderly, whose pensions were often their only means of support. In this connection, it was recalled that social security had always been of the highest priority for the ILO and that Conventions No. 102 and 128, as well as Recommendation No. 131, had been classified by the Governing Body as instruments requiring priority promotion. In this context, the Workers' members observed that social security should not be considered a luxury, but was the most beautiful achievement since the end of the Second World War. The Workers' member of Greece considered the right to old-age benefit as the workers' due in that it represented a deferred wage paid to them upon their retirement. The pertinence and topicality of systems for old-age protection in developing countries were also stressed. The Government member of Nigeria noted, in particular, that following the disintegration of the extended family system, many adults had ceased to live with their parents; the latter were subsequently obliged to fulfil their own needs themselves and required financial assistance in the form of pensions.

59. The Workers' members, while stressing that it was first for Governments to ensure a decent standard of living for the elderly, stressed the duty of solidarity which workers and employers should respect since the real danger in this field was that of individualism. In this respect, they saw a perfect illustration of tripartism in old-age pension benefits financed by employers' and workers' contributions as well as by fiscal resources. The Employers' members also considered that while State intervention in old-age protection was necessary, solidarity should coexist with self-responsibility.

60. The Government member of Bulgaria indicated that old-age protection went beyond the scope of the application of the instruments discussed in the general survey of the Committee of Experts. It affected numerous other questions which the ILO should look at, such as social services, the suppression of social alienation factors and the improvement in health services. The question of medical care of the elderly was also raised. In particular, the Workers' member of Chile recalled the desperate situation of many pensioners in his country and stressed the need to grant the elderly the right to medical benefits.

61. The Committee expressed its concern at the relatively poor number of ratifications registered for Conventions No. 102 and 128 (32 and 14, respectively). The Workers' members stated that, although convention No. 102 had been ratified by 11 countries of the European communities, only two of their members were bound by Convention No. 128. They hoped that the Committee of Experts' general survey would be able to give new impetus to ratification, as had been the case after the 1961 general survey. Conventions Nos. 102 and 128 contained numerous flexibility clauses which should be better known thanks to the survey. In this respect, the Employers' members wondered whether the opportunities for flexibility provided by these instruments were really sufficient. In addition, after noting that the Committee of Experts had considered that certain difficulties mentioned by States in their reports were purely formal obstacles, they highlighted the need to launch an information campaign to overcome them and to encourage intensive co-operation between the Office and the States involved. They also indicated that the relatively low number of ratifications should not be imputed uniquely to the ill will of governments in that old-age protection schemes existed in countries which had not ratified the Conventions. The Government member of Iraq indicated that his country had no difficulty in applying the Conventions on social security in so far as they concerned old-age or invalidity benefits. The Government member of Spain stressed the complexity of the social security instruments and pointed out that, while the Committee of Experts' survey allowed some doubts to be dissipated, the question of the conformity of provisions of Spanish legislation concerning the suspension of benefits still required certain clarifications. In the opinion of the Government member of the United States, his country's legislation gave full effect to Conventions Nos. 102 and 128. The Government member of Nigeria, for his part, highlighted economic, financial and administrative difficulties.

62. Several members requested explanations on the situation in their country concerning ratification prospects for Conventions No. 102 and 128. The Government member of Czechoslovakia stated that when preparing its report under article 19 of the Constitution, his Government had realised that ratification of these Conventions was possible given the flexibility clauses contained in them and that it was very likely that ratification would be approved during the second half of the year. The Government member of Nigeria indicated that his Government would consider ratification of the two Conventions once the conversion of the national provident fund into a social security scheme – which was currently under study – would be completed. The Workers' member of the USSR explained that his country was engaged in the regular ratification procedure and indicated that the adoption in two to three years' time of the new law on pensions – in which the unions were actively collaboration – should enable Conventions Nos. 102 and 128 to be ratified. Finally, the Government member of Denmark stated that, although the general survey had not been able to dissipate certain concerns held by his country, he was prepared to request his Government to look at the matter again. In addition, several speakers, including the Government members of Denmark, Iraq, Spain, Sweden and the United States as well as the Workers' members of Byelorussian SSR, Chile, China, Pakistan, Spain, Ukrainian SSR and the USSR, supplied information on national legislation and practice as regarded old-age protection.

Incidence of economic and demographic factors

63. The Committee devoted a large part of its discussion to economic and demographic problems which affected the financing of social security schemes. It was recognised that social security schemes in many countries were starting to feel financial imbalance due to, on the one hand, the increase in burdens following from inflation and the ageing of the population, and, on the other hand, the reduction of resources for social security following increased unemployment and the economic crisis.

64. Referring to the general conclusions of the Committee of Experts, the majority of speakers stressed the impact of the economic situation on the development of social security programmes and on their financing. The economic crisis, unemployment, underdevelopment and inflation were mentioned as major obstacles to the implementation of Conventions Nos. 102 and 128. The Workers' members recalled that the creation of social security schemes and the financing of old-age benefit required major resources; in certain developing countries as well, it was understood that in the hierarchy of priorities, social security came immediately after satisfaction of the population's basic needs. But even in industrialised countries, the economic crisis had had negative repercussions on the level of old-age benefit, for it was politically easier to reduce the protection of non-active workers than to reduce the wages of the working population. The Workers' member of Liberia considered that, despite the enormity of the problems encountered by developing countries, it was necessary to commence action in this area. The Employers' members stressed that the prosperity of the economy was a determining factor for ensuring adequate old-age protection. They also indicated that periods of economic recovery and recession always had positive or negative repercussions at the social level. Whatever the old-age protection scheme, the active population should find the necessary means of ensuring its financing.

65. The Workers' member of the Ukrainian SSR recalled one particularly worrying point raised by the Committee of Experts. The economic situation of many countries, especially in the developing countries beset by external debt, had brought about major reductions in the resources allocated to social programmes and pensions. In this respect, several speakers insisted on the need for better respect for and integration of the social factor in economic policies. The Government member of Senegal pointed to the negative effects of structural adjustment policies on social security schemes and old-age benefit in particular. In numerous developing countries, indebtedness, which was a consequence of poverty, had necessitated the adoption of policies which did not always take account of the social dimension and the long-term consequences. She stressed that such policies could only be effective if the "social security variable" was taken into account, so that there was a real human dimension in adjustment policies. The Government member of Bulgaria stated that the improvement of old-age protection was directly linked to the problems of economic recovery which were discussed in the report presented this year to the Conference by the Director-General of the ILO. The ILO therefore had to give more sustained assistance so that the aspirations of countries to economic development did not overshadow the need to resolve social problems. In the same vein, the Workers' member of Liberia referred to the importance of looking at social security as a first priority in the framework of economic development programmes.

66. Discussion also took place in the Committee on demographic changes and, more particularly, on the ageing of the population as well as the problems arising from this for the financing of pension schemes. The decrease in the birth rate noted in numerous industrialised countries, as well as a period of often shorter activity, reduced the number of active workers, whereas the longer life expectancy involved an extension of the period of payment of old-age pensions. On the contrary, as the Workers' and Employers' members pointed out, in developing countries the very high proportion of young persons raised quite different questions concerning employment and the struggle against poverty.

67. The Employers' members stressed the fact that the difficulties facing old-age protection schemes could only be overcome by a whole set of measures. In addition, they considered it a little strange that the Committee of Experts attributed these difficulties mainly to external economic factors whereas the overall social policy, including old-age protection, was an integral part of the national economic and social situation in a country. The Government member of Denmark considered that people were currently becoming more sensitised to the need to complement through savings the pensions that they would receive upon retirement, even if there was a certain scepticism towards saving because of monetary erosion. He recognised, however, that it was not easy to convince the workers of this when they only received a small salary.

68. Whatever the solutions adopted, the Workers' members insisted that the elderly should not be the victims of any reorganisation concerning the financing of their retirement. They also launched a warning against certain dangerous tendencies such as the development of private insurance plans which provided advantages to certain categories of workers. The Employers' members stated that the question of old-age benefits involved long-term obligations and, for the individual, an entire life's planning. It was therefore essential for workers and employers – who bore the main share of the costs of pension systems – to have the necessary information sufficiently in advance.

Maintenance of the purchasing power of benefits

69. The discussion in the Committee put an accent on the dramatic effects of inflation on pensioners' budgets. The Government member of Senegal highlighted the need to adopt urgent measures in this area. The Workers' members insisted on the priority of envisaging adjustment machinery for pensions that would be effective. It was in fact indispensable that means be found to protect the purchasing power of pensioners since no pension scheme would be able to fulfil its long-term objectives if the increase in the cost of living and in the standard of living, in general, was not taken into account. In this respect, the Workers' member of the United Kingdom stressed that, in practice, it was preferable to opt for a lower benefit, the amount of which was guaranteed in the face of inflation, than an apparently better pension in the short term which would be subsequently eroded by inflation. The Employers' members considered that the need to adjust benefits was recognised by everyone although the most appropriate solution had not been found. Pensions, as well as wages, could appear to be protected to some extent by indexation, but this was not genuine protection against inflation to the extent that it created an inflationist mentality. Other measures were necessary to strangle inflation, such as increased productivity through technological innovation and investment, as well as the development of training. While admitting that indexation was not in itself a solution to inflation, the Workers' member of the United Kingdom recalled that, by contributing to social security, workers postponed for the moment the purchase of goods and services which they might have been able to acquire earlier; it would therefore be unfair, and even fraudulent, to make them bear the consequences of a depreciation in the value of money.

Scope of the instruments

70. The Committee agreed upon the need to pursue efforts to increase the number of workers covered by social insurance. The general survey of the Committee of Experts showed that, in a good number of countries, certain categories of workers such as independent workers, agricultural workers, home workers, occasional, seasonal and temporary workers, did not enjoy any protection. In addition, in numerous developing countries, public sector workers were the only ones to receive old-age benefit. In this context, the Government member of Senegal pointed out that the development of the informal sector and independent work contributed to a reduction in the resources at the disposal of social security institutions and deprived workers in these sectors of protection at the end of their careers. The situation of elderly workers in agriculture in most developing countries and certain industrialised countries was considered to be particularly worrying. The Workers' member of Greece considered that this question should be one of the preoccupations of the ILO. The Employers' members observed that progress in this field was slow and hoped for the progressive extension of social protection.

Pensionable age and other pension requirements

71. The question of fixing a fair pensionable age was the subject of a certain number of interventions. The Employers' members insisted on the need to take account of its impact on employment and on the financing of pension schemes. While subscribing to the Committee of Experts' opinion that the pensionable age should not become merely an instrument of employment policy, they considered that account had to be taken of the relationship between the two; the burdens had to be spread judiciously between the active population, the unemployed and the pensioners in order to achieve an appropriate balance between them. The Government member of Denmark indicated that, in his country, the age at which workers took retirement was below the legal pensionable age. While one of the possible responses to this phenomenon would be to lower the retirement age, he considered it more likely that the trend would be in the opposite direction, this being partly explained by demographic changes and partly by the fact that society could not afford to waste the talents of older workers.

72. The Employers' members referred to various ways of applying flexibility to the pensionable age introduced in different legislation and indicated that these new possibilities should not be considered as a means of reducing unemployment, but rather as an extension of the individual's self-determination. This greater freedom to choose the age when a worker can retire also implied the acceptance of financial consequences, namely, the increase or reduction in old-age benefit depending on the retirement age.

73. Several speakers referred to the situation of workers who did not fulfil the minimum contribution conditions or insurance contributions required by law in order to receive old-age benefit. The Government member of Senegal considered this problem particularly worrying for part-time workers or workers holding fixed-term contracts whose old-age benefit was often highly inadequate, or even non-existent, when it was of a contributory nature calculated on the basis of the level of remuneration and the length of employment. She considered that the ILO should urgently examine this type of contract. The Workers' member of Spain mentioned similar problems facing certain categories of workers – youth in particular – who were often forced to accept employment contracts which did not involve social security. In this regard, he stressed the importance of having minimum pensions for workers who could not complete the employment period required by the law.

74. The Workers' member of Spain also expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts would be able to reflect further on the maintenance of rights in the course of acquisition. In this regard, the Government member of the United States referred to measures taken in his country to strengthen co-ordination between the national social security scheme and the federal pension programme, on the one hand, and private insurance bodies, on the other hand, so as to facilitate the labour mobility of workers.

Equality of treatment

75. Many members spoke of the social security situation of migrant workers. The Workers' members pointed out that foreign workers were, in the field of old-age benefit, subjected to at times extremely different treatment to that enjoyed by nationals. In this regard, the Workers' member of Pakistan noted that foreign workers contributed to the well-being of society and that they should consequently benefit from the social protection scheme established by the State just as other workers did. He welcomed the comprehensive measures adopted within the European Communities to ensure the protection of migrant workers and expressed the hope that other host countries would do the same. The Workers' member of Greece regretted that the general survey of the Committee of Experts merely touched upon the situation of migrant workers. He observed that workers who were not covered by multi- or bilateral social security agreements were often deprived of their pension when they returned to their country of origin and that even workers protected by such agreements faced administrative difficulties leading to delays in the payment of their pensions. He hoped that the Committee of Experts would be able to give more thought to the subject and would make recommendations on these problems. In this connection, however, it had to be noted that the Committee of Experts had undertaken in 1977 a general survey on equality of treatment between nationals and foreigners in the field of social security during its examination of reports due under article 19 of the Constitution on Convention No. 118.

76. Several speakers also raised the question of equalising the pensionable age for women and for men, since the examination of national legislation had shown that this age was often lower for women. The Employers' members considered that the controversy on this subject would lose its importance in so far as workers were to enjoy greater freedom to decide the age when they would retire. The Government member of Sweden recalled that the Committee of Experts in 1985 had suggested that it would be appropriate to consider the adoption of international standards on equal treatment for men and women in social security matters. Now this question was among the items proposed for discussion by the Governing Body at its forthcoming November Session when it was to decide on the agenda of the 1991 International Labour Conference. She expressed her Government's support for the inclusion of this question on the agenda of a future session of the Conference. The Workers' members expressed the wish that the discussion to take place in the Governing Body with a view to the possible adoption by the Conference of new standards on this subject would not be limited just to the question of equalising the pensionable age. In this respect, the Committee was informed by the representative of the Secretary-General that the possibility of a new instrument on equality of treatment between men and women in social security matters, which was proposed for discussion by the Governing Body at its forthcoming November Session, was aimed at eliminating both direct and indirect discrimination in social security, and not only the inequalities existing with respect to the pensionable age.

Technical assistance, information and studies

77. The discussion which took place in the Committee brought out the need for the Office to continue to supply to developing countries, in particular, as intense technical assistance as possible. As had been stressed by the general survey of the Committee of Experts, the creation of social security schemes or their improvement had been helped by the technical assistance and advice provided by the Office to governments which had requested it.

78. The Workers' member of China indicated that extensive reforms had recently been undertaken regarding economic restructuring and social security and that the concrete assistance of the symposia carried out by the Office had been of the greatest usefulness to workers in this regard. The Government member of the United States referred to paragraphs 21 to 25 of the survey which described the technical co-operation, studies and research conducted by the Office and he welcomed the assistance provided by the Office experts particularly in relation to the adoption of guide-lines and of social security legislation, the publication of actuarial studies, the organisation of seminars and courses, as well as the exchange of experience and information through publications and research projects on current issues. He stressed that the link existing between the ILO's technical co-operation and standard-setting action constituted a responsible and co-operative approach to the renewing of national practices under ILO instruments. The Worker member of Pakistan recalled that the low percentage of protected persons and high unemployment were factors preventing the ratification of the Conventions in developing countries, and he highlighted the valuable assistance that the Office could give towards improving the methods and functioning of social security institutions. The Worker member of the United Kingdom pointed to the considerable efforts made by the Office to help governments in setting up pension schemes. He considered that the assistance provided by the Office should be aimed at setting up a framework capable of expanding in conjunction with developments in the country's economy. The Office had to tailor its advice to the needs of countries, to their stage of development and to their future prospects, as well as to their current means. The Worker member of Liberia referred to the sending of an expert by the International Confederation of Free Unions (ICFTU), which had enabled major progress to be made in this field. Certain members referred to the importance of governments having up-to-date and reliable statistical information which was absolutely indispensable for the organisation and operation of social security schemes. That was why the Workers' member of the United Kingdom thought that the Office should also help governments to set up or improve effective statistical systems.

79. The Government member of Bulgaria insisted on the fact that problems of comparing old-age benefit with changing economic circumstances required the ILO to carry out a systemisation of practice in the different States in this area. He considered that it was desirable that these questions be examined from a practical point of view in co-operation with other international organisations. The Workers' member of the USSR stated that, in his country, the measures taken to increase the level of the minimum old-age pension to the level of the minimum wage, together with the drafting of the bill on pensions, needed in-depth studies, especially as regarded the experience of other industrialised countries and the co-operation of the ILO.

80. The Committee was convinced that the general survey of the Committee of Experts was extremely useful. It also welcomed the particularly constructive exchange of views which had taken place between its members. The discussion had shown that there was general agreement regarding the importance of the role of social security and pension schemes in particular, even though a broad range of approaches was possible in the search for solutions and although one sole system did not apply. On several occasions, accent had been placed on the need to ensure for everyone a decent old age benefit which would take account of developments in the cost of living. Such an objective was the most basic concern of social justice; beyond the responsibility of social security institutions, the whole collectivity should be sensitised to the need to give pensioners a fair share of what they had given to society when they had been part of the working population. In addition, the Committee noted with interest that the general survey would receive the widest possible distribution among member States, representative employers' and workers' organisations at both the international and national levels, as well as in universities and social security institutions. It also noted that the suggestions and proposals made during this discussion would be transmitted to the Department of Social Security of the Office. In conclusion, the Committee expressed the hope that the general survey of the Committee of Experts and the discussion would contribute to the improvement of the protection of the elderly by mobilising all forces at the international and national levels.

D. Report on the Fifth Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers

81. The representative of the Director-General of the United Nations Economic, Social and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO) said that the issues pertaining to improvements in the professionalism required of teachers, which concerned primarily UNESCO, had to be considered in relation to the working conditions of teachers, which fell within the fields of competence of the ILO. The report of the Joint Committee would be submitted to the Committee on Conventions and Recommendations of UNESCO's Executive Board at its 132nd Session, scheduled for September 1989. The Director-General of UNESCO had incorporated many of its suggestions for actions in the proposed programme and budget for UNESCO for 1990-91, which would be examined by the General Conference of UNESCO in October-November 1989. At a time when UNESCO was planning to launch International Literacy Year, and to organise, in collaboration with the World Bank, UNICEF and the UNDP, a World Conference on Education for All, the report of the Joint Committee was indeed very timely. The Joint Committee's comments regarding the allegation received from a teachers' organisation in the Netherlands would be examined by UNESCO's Committee on Conventions and Recommendations. UNESCO shared the Joint Committee's concerns over the perceived decline in the quality of education, and the interlinkage that this had with the status accorded to teachers, who were an important factor in the development process.

82. More and more countries were resorting to the development of educational policies and plans, long, medium and short term, but UNESCO recognised the need to further encourage countries, particularly the poor countries, to develop such plans, and sustainable strategies of action consonant with overall development policies. Despite progress in the requirements for admission to teacher preparation programmes, there was a crisis in teaching as seen from the growing numbers of illiterates in the world today, and the growing numbers of underemployed and unemployed. UNESCO concurred with the Joint Committee's conclusions that the content of training programmes and the facilities accorded to teachers and learners had to be improved, and the participation of women teachers in technical and vocational education had to be increased to promote the currently inadequate enrolment of girls in this crucial area. UNESCO would encourage governments to include representatives of teachers' organisations in the conceptualisation and elaboration of educational policies as well as in the implementation and the evaluation of policies, plans and strategies of actions bearing on education and the status of teachers. UNESCO also supported the Joint Committee's conclusions regarding the need for better preparation of teachers and teacher educators. It emphasised, in its draft third medium-term plan, the development of relevant in-service and continuing education, as well as the training of teachers and teacher educators in pedagogical skills. It had also encouraged education and training authorities to pay more attention to research, experimentation and evaluation. UNESCO had also taken note of the Joint Committee's suggestion that actions relating to early childhood education should be encouraged and that there should be concerted action by all parties to stimulate interest in developing better services for pre-school children. UNESCO hoped to undertake the various actions proposed by the Joint Committee, if budgetary allocations were available. These actions would be undertaken with the collaboration of intergovernmental institutions, with the ILO and with non-governmental organisations, particularly those of the teaching profession (the IFFTU, the WCOTP, the WCT and the FISE).

83. Referring to the Joint Committee's proposal to undertake a study on international standards adopted after the 1966 Recommendation which apply to teachers, she said that UNESCO had already carried out such a study. It was hoped that the ILO would now undertake a similar study and that a joint brochure on the outcome could be made available to member States and bodies interested in improving the status of teachers. The Director-General of UNESCO attached great importance to the valuable contribution that the Joint Committee made in carrying out its task of monitoring the progress made by member States in the implementation of a very important normative instrument bearing on the professionalism as well as on the working conditions of teachers. UNESCO would therefore continue to co-operate with the ILO in inciting governments to provide teachers with the necessary material conditions and social status that were commensurate with their important role in society.

84. The Employer' members acknowledged the great importance of these issues and expressed their gratitude for the report of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts. They fully supported the call for more complete information on the situation of teachers throughout the world, since reliable empirical data was the necessary basis for formulating further measures and recommendations. In every society, development depended upon the quality of teachers and they had no doubt that the status of teachers was of crucial importance. Education and training were more important than ever as they were closely connected to the world of work; there was therefore an even greater need for qualified teachers who could impart not only the subject-matter but also a desire to learn. Qualifications and status were of course intertwined; the recognition given by society to teachers determined their status. The Employers' members thought that the report of the Joint Committee had dealt with very important matters and that it contained possible solutions for solving problems. They supported the proposals for further studies made by the Joint Committee.

85. The Workers' members inquired about the composition of the Joint Committee of Experts, its mandate, the work it performed and the possibility of presenting complaints or observations in relation to the content of the Recommendation. The lack of prestige, discrimination, deterioration of conditions and denial of rights which teachers were facing was all the more a source of concern because of the necessity to promote teaching in order to stimulate economic and social development. The status of teachers should be in line with the loftiness of their task and of their vocation. The means had to be found to follow up the outstanding study that the Joint Committee's report represented; it was regrettable that not enough governments had participated in its preparation. The Workers' members highlighted the double role of teachers' organisations: the quality of teaching and the defence of occupational interests. The Workers' member of Pakistan noted that in many Third World countries the illiteracy rate was growing and a sufficient percentage of the GNP was not being allocated to the educational sector. Teachers deserved more support, be that in the public or the private sector. There should be continuing job enrichment and participation of teachers as workers in decision-making which would enhance job satisfaction. The right of teachers to strike, which was derived from Convention No. 87, and the right to collective bargaining did not conflict with the overall public interest. The Workers' member of Senegal, citing strikes by teachers but also consultations between the government and teachers' unions in his country, contended that it was necessary to avoid the isolation of the teachers' union movement from the national or international workers' movement. In conclusion, the Workers' members referred to the possibility of drawing up Conventions or Recommendations concerning this very specific category of workers, teachers.

86. The Workers' member of the Netherlands, referring to the allegation annexed to the Joint Committee's report, welcomed the fact that an organisation of teachers had availed itself of the opportunity to lodge such a complaint, yet he wondered what would be the practical follow-up to a complaint based on a non-binding instrument. The ILO was the most appropriate body to deal with the increasing number of very serious cases involving severe violations of teachers' trade union rights, discrimination in the teaching profession, and so on. Although the competence of UNESCO in the case of many other aspects related to the status of teachers was not doubted, the question remained whether UNESCO was the most appropriate body to deal with the working conditions of teachers. The fact that the ILO was going to pay greater attention to these matters, through the newly instituted machinery, was to be welcomed. It hopefully would provide the ILO with practical and broadly accorded ideas for possible ILO instruments relating to the work of teachers throughout the world.

87. The representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers Unions, noting that the conditions of teachers had to be placed in the framework of a more general discussion on ways of promoting economic recovery and employment, cited the financial situation and indebtedness of many developing countries as an additional obstacle to the Recommendations's application. The Recommendation was an important tool but it did not provide a maximum guarantee as it was not an instrument that placed legal constraints on governments. Among other things, the ILO should consider preparing a general survey on the standards applicable to teachers. The representative of the World Confederation of Organisations ations of the Teaching Profession, pointing out gaps in the otherwise excellent reporting of the Joint Committee, highlighted the deterioration in the status of the teaching profession throughout the world, owing in part to policies of structural adjustment, and the effects of extending the principles of new liberalism to the educational system. This had resulted in the degradation in conditions of work, employment, remuneration and a deprofessionalisation of the sector, causing teachers to leave the profession prematurely or to exercise it in parallel with other jobs. Repression and even assassinations, as well as interference in the internal affairs of teacher unions, further constituted ways of silencing teachers' demands. Not only the future of teachers was involved, but also the future of youth and therefore of nations was at stake. He regretted the absence of teachers' organisations in the Joint Committee. The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions associated himself with the analysis and conclusions of the representatives of the international teacher's organisations as to the serious effect on teachers of reductions in public spending, including massive reductions in teacher positions, salaries and cutbacks in their professional training. Restrictive or privatisation policies would create structural imbalance more dramatic than the balance of the debts of the countries concerned. To sacrifice teachers was the equivalent of sacrificing youth and therefore, the future. The supervisory machinery of the Recommendation was not entirely satisfactory and the present Committee's examination of the Joint Committee's report could improve the implementation of its conclusions.

88. The representatives of the international teachers' and trade union organisations reiterated their views that workers in education should benefit from full freedom of association as did other workers in accordance with ILO standards, notably Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151, in addition to the Recommendation of 1966. They welcomed the recent decisions of the ILO's Governing Body to convene a joint meeting on teachers in 1991 and to institute a standing committee on teachers' problems. They further called upon the ILO to complement the existing Recommendation by the adoption of one or more Conventions specifically related to teachers.

89. The Government member of Japan paid tribute to the quality of the Joint Committee's report and agreed that the recruitment of excellent teachers should be given the highest priority in education policies, and he gave evidence of the situation prevailing in Japan. He stressed the importance of granting teachers the best salaries and conditions in the public service. His Government supported the two topical areas which the Joint Committee recommended for in-depth study: the continuing education of teachers; and stress, burn-out, turnover and difficulties in the exercise of the profession. His Government also supported the proposal that the dissemination of information on the 1966 Recommendation should be given a high priority, but it could not support the view that teachers who were public service employees should have the right to strike. He recalled that in the report of the intergovernmental conference which adopted in 1966 Recommendation, several countries had indicated their view, in cases where there were adequate alternative or compensatory measures available, paragraph 84 of the Recommendation would be construed so that the right to strike was not conferred on teachers who were public service employees.

90. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that, subject to a more in-depth study, the majority of international labour Conventions applied to teaching personnel, particularly the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). The ILO's supervisory bodies had clearly stated that teachers should enjoy the right to organise, the right to associate with organisations of their own choosing, the right to strike and the right to bargain collectively; in particular, the Committee on Freedom of Association had decided that teachers were not to be an essential service under ILO standards. The suggestions concerning the adoption of a Convention on the conditions of work and employment of teachers, and the desire to incorporate teachers' organisations more closely in the workings of the supervisory machinery for the application of the 1966 Recommendation were being discussed in consultation with UNESCO. The Committee, thanks to its discussions, had perfectly carried out the mission assigned to it.

E. Compliance with specific obligations

91. The Committee decided that, in examining individual cases relating to compliance by States with their obligations under or relating to international labour standards, it would follow the same working methods and apply the same criteria as last year, as amended or clarified in 1980 and 1987.

Submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

92. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee considered the manner in which effect was given to article 19, paragraphs 5 to 7, of the ILO Constitution. These provisions required member States within 12 months, or exceptionally 18 months, from the closing of each session of the Conference to submit the Convention and Recommendations adopted at that session to "the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, or the enactment of legislation or other action", and to inform the Director-General of the ILO of the measures taken to that end, with particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent.

93. The Committee noted from the report of the Committee of Experts that considerable efforts had been made in a number of countries in the fulfilment of their obligations in regard to submission, namely Angola, Brazil, Ghana and Nepal. In the course of its session, the Committee was informed by various other States of measures taken to bring Conventions and Recommendations before the competent national authorities. It welcomed the progress which had been achieved, and expressed the hope that improvements would occur in countries that still experienced difficulties in complying with their obligations.

Failure to submit

94. The Committee noted with regret that no indication was available that steps had been taken to submit the Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the 67th and 74th Sessions of the Conference (1981 and 1986), to the competent authorities, in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution, by Grenada, Haiti, Islamic Republic of Iran, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Saint Lucia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone and Suriname.

Supply of reports on ratified Conventions

95. The Workers' and Employers' members and many Government members expressed their concern at difficulties still being encountered by some governments in complying with their obligation to report on the application of ratified Conventions. Only 9 per cent of the reports due had been received by the date fixed by the Governing Body (9.5 per cent in 1988). By the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, however, this percentage had risen to 74.7, which represented a decrease compared to 1986, 1987 and 1988 (for which the figures were 79.2, 78.7 and 78.4 per cent respectively). Since then further reports have been received, bringing the figure to 84.4 per cent (as compared to 86 per cent in 1988 and 87.1 per cent in 1987).

96. This year, 63 per cent of the reports for which information on practical information had been requested contained such information, which represented a considerable increase over previous years (46 per cent in 1988, 53 per cent in 1987 and 52 per cent in 1986). The Workers' and Employers' members emphasised the importance of sending such information, since without it, it was impossible to know if a Convention was being applied.

97. It was recognised that shortcomings in complying with the reporting obligations were often due to a shortage of staff having the requisite knowledge and experience, particularly in developing countries. This underlined the importance of training measures and assistance by the International Labour Office, to which reference has been made earlier in this report. (See also paragraphs 44 to 46 above.)

Failure to supply reports and information on the application of ratified Conventions

98. The Committee noted with regret that no report on ratified Conventions had been supplied for the past two years by Cape Verde.

99. The Committee also noted with regret that the first report on ratified Conventions had not been supplied since 1986 by Jamaica (Convention No. 149). It stressed the special importance of first reports, on the basis of which the Committee of Experts could make its evaluation of compliance with the Conventions.

100. In this year's report, the Committee of Experts had noted that 30 governments had not communicated replies to most or all of the observations and direct requests relating to Conventions on which reports were due for examination this year, involving a total of 177 cases (compared with 224 cases last year and 185 two years ago). It was, however, informed that, since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, 14 of the governments concerned had sent replies which would be examined by the Committee of Experts next year.

101. The Committee noted with regret, however, that no information had yet been received regarding all or most of the observations and direct requests of the Committee of Experts to which replies were requested for the period ending 30 June 1988 from the following countries: Bahamas, Cape Verde, Denmark (Faeroe Islands, Greenland), Grenada, Jamaica, Lebanon, Madagascar, Mauritania, Mauritius, New Zealand (Niue Island), Papua New Guinea, Seychelles, Sierra Leone.

102. The Committee noted the explanations provided by the governments of the following countries concerning difficulties encountered in discharging their obligations: Denmark (Greenland, Faeroe Islands, administrative difficulties), Grenada (administrative difficulties), Haiti (political and administrative difficulties), Islamic Republic of Iran (technical and administrative difficulties), Jamaica (administrative and technical difficulties), Lebanon (state of war), Mauritius (administrative difficulties), New Zealand (Niue Island, communication difficulties), Papua New Guinea (technical and administrative difficulties), Sierra Leone (administrative difficulties), Suriname (political and administrative difficulties), Uganda (administrative difficulties). (Details of these explanations appear in the reports of the discussions of these cases, in Part Two of this report.)

Application of ratified Conventions

103. The Committee noted with particular interest the steps that had been taken by a certain number of governments to ensure compliance with ratified Conventions. This year, the Committee of Experts had been able to list, in paragraph 94 of its report, new cases in which governments had made changes to their law and practice following comments it had made concerning the degree of conformity of national legislation or practice with the provisions of a ratified Convention. There were 46 such cases, relating to 29 States and 3 non-metropolitan territories from all regions of the world having different social and economic systems. Almost 1,800 cases of progress have been recorded since the Committee of Experts began listing these cases in its report in 1964. These results are a tangible proof of the effectiveness of the supervisory system.

104. In the course of the present session, the Conference Committee was informed of a certain number of other instances in which measures had recently been taken or were about to be adopted by governments with a view to ensuring the implementation of ratified Conventions. While it was left to the Committee of Experts to examine these measures, the Conference committee welcomed these renewed signs of the efforts made by governments to comply with their international obligations and to act upon the comments of the supervisory bodies.

105. The Committee thought it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to a number of important cases which it had considered.

Cases of progress

106. The Committee noted with satisfaction that in a number of cases governments have introduced changes in their law and practice in order to eliminate divergencies previously discussed by the Committee.

In this respect, it referred to the report of the Committee of Experts and the discussion of individual cases which appears in Part Two of this report.

Special cases

107. The Committee considered it appropriate to draw the attention of the Conference to the discussions it had had regarding the cases mentioned in the following paragraphs, the full record of which will be found in Part Two of this report.

108. As regarded the application by the Central African Republic of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the explanations and information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which had taken place in the Committee. The Committee noted with regret that the Government had not yet followed up on the promises it had made in 1986, 1987 and 1988 to receive a direct contacts mission. The Committee, while noting that certain divergencies in relation to provisions of the Convention had been eliminated in law and in practice, stated its concern over the imposition, by means of a new trade union Act, of a single trade union structure. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would swiftly take all steps necessary to eliminate the serious and important divergences which still remained and to ensure full conformity with the Convention in the legislation and in practice. It hoped the Government would be able to report definite and substantive progress next year.

109. As regarded the application by Colombia of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and the detailed discussions which had taken place within the Committee. The Committee noted with profound concern the comments made by the Committee of Experts, which spoke of the persistence of a number of grave divergencies between, on the one hand, law and practice and, on the other hand, the provisions of the Convention. It recalled in this respect the questions that had been raised by the Committee of Experts over many years. The Committee took note with interest of the report of the direct contacts mission that had travelled to Colombia in September 1988 and of the grave concern and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee requested the Government to take all necessary measures to bring the law and practice fully into line with the requirements of the Convention, inter alia, in attempting to reintroduce a situation propitious to the re-establishment of civil liberties and accordingly freedom of association, and to guarantee the physical safety of trade unionists. The Committee decided to request the Government to hold tripartite consultations and reminded it of the possibility of having resort to the ILO's assistance. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would be able to report next year on substantial progress achieved in this field in view of the importance and gravity of the situation.

110. As regarded the application by the Dominican Republic of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the extensive discussion which had taken place. The Committee, taking note of the direct contacts which took place in October 1988, expressed its extreme concern over the situation of Haitian workers. It regretted that once again no government report had been received and that the Government representative had merely provided some information in regard to labour inspection and minimum wages. The Committee stressed that there had been no progress, either in legislation or in practice, on essential points raised over a number of years by the Commission of Inquiry, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. The Committee further noted that the Dominican Republic had requested ILO assistance in order to ensure the application of the Conventions in both its legislation and practice. In this regard, the Committee considered that special efforts were called for so that the ILO could, as from the next harvest, verify the situation and ascertain on the spot that improvements which had been promised but were still awaited had in fact been made. It insisted upon the need for the Government to take the necessary measures the implementation of which should be verified in practice. The Committee also noted that the Government had requested ILO assistance in drawing up an agreement with Haiti concerning the migration of workers. The Committee trusted that any agreement drawn up with ILO assistance would particularly heed the comments of the supervisory bodies. The Committee also trusted that, whether or not such an agreement was concluded, the Government of the Dominican Republic would, without delay, take the measures necessary to give full effect to the comments made by the ILO supervisory bodies.

111. As regarded the application by Ecuador of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee recalled that the direct contacts mission of 1985 had, in agreement with the Government, prepared draft amendments designed to remove a serious divergence between the legislation and the provisions of the Convention and to give effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee welcomed the fact that the draft legislation would be transmitted for examination by the Committee of Experts and expressed the hope that these drafts contained solutions to the existing difficulties and divergences with the Convention. The Committee took note of the assurances provided by the Government that these draft amendments would be implemented as soon as possible in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to show proof of progress in the application of the Conventions by next year. As for the application by Ecuador of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), the Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, and the discussion that took place in the Committee. It noted that at the time of the meeting of the Committee of Experts the report of the Government had not been received. Consequently, the Committee of Experts had merely been in a position to recall its previous conclusions. The Committee, for its part, noted with concern that only certain measures had been taken to ensure conformity in law and in practice with the provisions contained in the Convention, and in this respect it expressed the firm hope that the Government would take, without any delay, the necessary measures in order to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention. The Committee hoped that it would be able to take note of substantial and real progress in the near future.

112. As regarded the application by Romania of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Committee took note of the oral and written information supplied by the Government and of the discussion which took place in the Committee. The Committee noted with great concern that the Committee of Experts' observations noted the persistence of serious divergences between, on the one hand, the law and practice and, on the other hand, the provisions of the Convention particularly as concerned political opinion and social origin. The Committee also noted the worrying allegations and information on the situation regarding national extraction. It expressed the firm hope that the Government would take in the very near future all the measures necessary to ensure full respect for the Convention and that these measures would take into account the Committee of Experts' observations. The Committee requested the Government to accept a study mission to establish the facts and report back to the Committee of Experts. In addition, it requested the Government to provide the Committee of Experts with the detailed information it had requested. The Committee strongly hoped that it would be able to note, in the near future, real and appreciable progress in the application, both in law and in practice, of the Convention.

113. As regarded the application by Turkey of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), the Committee took note of the information given by the Government representative and the various opinions and comments expressed during the discussion. The Committee noted the conclusions of the Committee of Experts, according to which there existed, both in law and in practice, profound divergences concerning the full application of the Convention. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the contemplated revision of certain sections of Martial Law No. 1402 would duly take into account the observations of the supervisory bodies of the ILO and would thus make it possible for the Government to continue its efforts so that the measures intended to ensure state security would be defined and delimited in such a way that they would no longer lead to any discrimination based on political opinions. The Committee trusted that in the near future the Government would communicate all the information requested so as to enable the Committee to be assured that the application of the Convention and real progress were achieved.

114. The Committee trusted that the governments concerned would take all the measures necessary to correct the deficiencies noted and invited them to use appropriate forms of ILO assistance, including direct contacts, to ensure that real progress would be achieved by next year in regard to the observance of their obligations under the ILO Constitution and the Conventions in question.

Continued failure to implement

115. The Committee recalls that its working methods provide for the listing of cases of continued failure over several years to eliminate serious deficiencies in the application of ratified Conventions which it has previously discussed. This year the Committee did not list any case under this heading.

116. The Governments of the countries to which reference is made in paragraphs 108 to 113 are invited to supply the relevant reports and information which will permit the Committee to follow up the above-mentioned matters at the next session of the Conference.

Supply of reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations

117. As already indicated, reports had been requested in 1988, under article 19 of the Constitution, on the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention (No. 128) and Recommendation (No. 131), 1967, in so far as they applied to old-age benefits. The Committee noted that, of the 402 reports requested, 271 (or 67.4 per cent) had been received.

118. The Committee noted with regret that, over the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution had been supplied by: Jamaica, Paraguay, Sao Tome and Principe, Uganda.

Communication of copies of report to workers' and employers' organisations

119. Again this year, the Committee did not have to apply the criterion "The government has failed during the past three years to indicate the representative organisations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23(2) of the Constitution, copies of reports and information supplied to the ILO under articles 19 and 22 have been communicated".

Participation in the work of the Committee

120. The Committee wanted to express its gratitude to the 50 governments which had collaborated with it in providing information on the situation in their countries and in participating in the discussions of individual cases.

121. However, the Committee regretted that, despite repeated invitations, the governments of the following States failed to take part in the discussions concerning their countries: Cape Verde, Madagascar and Mauritania.

122. The Committee noted with regret that certain countries which were not represented at the Conference (Bahamas, Fiji, Paraguay, Saint Lucia, Seychelles), as well as another whose representatives had had to leave the Conference before its closure (Sao Tome and Principe), had consequently been unable to participate in the Committee's examination of the cases relating to them. It decided to mention the cases concerning these States in the appropriate paragraphs of this report and to inform the States concerned of this in accordance with the usual practice.

123. In submitting its report to the Conference, the Committee expressed the reasoned hope to make, this year, a special contribution on the occasion of the 70th anniversary of the creation of the Organisation. As was pointed out in paragraph 13 of its report above, the general discussion, richer than ever, had enabled the Committee to observe that it had made an important step – a decisive one, it hoped – towards the reconciling of views on questions of substance such as: the universal value of standards, the complementary nature of the different supervisory bodies and the foundation of their working methods on the same principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.

124. As one of the members of the Committee had pointed out during the general discussion, perhaps the most notable aspect in the development of the Organisation rested in the gradual extension of the notion of dialogue and in the way it was perceived. Reduced to basics – since it is not attached to behaviour and procedures and is only practised by a small number of protagonists – dialogue had progressively become a many-varied and irreplaceable thing, especially in its tripartite dimension, which made the Organisation unique. The Committee was one of those privileged places where dialogue could be pursued and deepened. The many Government representatives who replied to the Committee's invitation bore witness to their desire for co-operation and, beyond that, to their recognition of the value of the supervisory system.

125. Indeed, only the guarantee of the effective application of standards in good faith and on an equal basis for all could confer credibility on the standard-setting work of the ILO. This carried the message that the Organisation had addressed to the world 70 years ago, namely: that peace and social justice go hand in hand. Albert Thomas, at the Organisation's tenth anniversary, explained social justice not only as a means, but also as an end in itself. He added the phrase which has become famous: "The social factor must take precedence over the economic factor". Clearly the 70th anniversary has not yet seen this hope become a reality, as shown particularly by the discussions within the Committee concerning the Employment Policy Convention, No. 122. In a rapidly and widely changing world, where economic and social structures and even systems are in flux, where the need to take account of the social cost of adjustment policies is apparently still not fully appreciated, where the right to work and social achievements are often questioned in the name of economic rationality, the ILO has to double its efforts so that its international standards can promote balanced economic and social development, integrating that human factor which it was set up to defend.

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING PARTICULAR COUNTRIES

I. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

Congo. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent reports and its responses to the comments of the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 5, 11, 13, 26, 29, 33, 87, 119, 149, 150 and 152.

Denmark. A Government representative noted the observation by the Committee of Experts that the reports from the Faeroe Islands had not been received. In regard to Greenland, it could be seen from the Appendix to that report that two out of five reports had not been supplied. His Government fully shared the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts. The speaker pointed out that the autonomous authorities in the Faeroe Islands and Greenland had very limited administrative resources. The Government pledged to provide all the necessary assistance to the Faeroe Islands and Greenland to make sure that reports due would be sent in the future.

The Workers' members deplored the fact that the Danish Government had not respected the important obligation to respond to certain direct requests. They were of the opinion that the present Committee should mention in its general report that the Government had not provided reports concerning these territories.

The Employers' members, supported the recommendation of the Workers' members.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the difficulties mentioned. The Committee noted that no reply had been given to the comments of the Committee of Experts. It decided to mention this case in the appropriate part of its report.

Djibouti. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports and replies to the Committee's comments relating to the application of Conventions Nos. 1, 5, 9, 10, 11, 13, 16, 19, 26, 29, 33, 36, 37, 38, 53, 58, 63, 69, 73, 81, 87, 91, 96, 98, 99, 100, 105, 120, 122, 123, 125 and 126.

Dominican Republic. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports on Conventions Nos. 1, 5, 7, 10, 19, 26, 29, 45, 77, 78, 79, 81, 87, 88, 89, 90, 95, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 119. In addition, it has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 29, 81, 87, 95, 98, 105 and 111.

Ghana. In response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has communicated information on the application of Conventions Nos. 26, 30, 98, 100 and 119.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his Government's delegation had been in touch with the Office and had provided information in reply to the Committee of Experts' comments on the Conventions mentioned above, together with copies of the legislation requested by the Committee of Experts. He announced that the Government would make every effort to include further details as available in its next Article 22 report.

The Workers' members commented that, through its contacts with the Office, the Government had already taken a great step forward; they also welcomed the assurance that every effort would be made to improve the communication of further details. They recalled the very great importance of the obligation to supply reports, and especially of replying to the Committee of Experts' observations and direct requests. Without replies to precise direct requests and observations, the ILO's supervisory machinery could not work. In this connection, they referred to the Committee of Experts' concern, expressed in paragraphs 87 and 88 of its report, about the large number of cases in which there had been no reply to its comments. Although there had been slightly fewer than in the previous year, the figure still stood at 177 cases. They hoped that, with contacts having been made and communication established despite administrative difficulties, the Government would be able to send in its replies to comments in future; if necessary, other forms of assistance should be furnished to the Government.

The Employers' members commented that this was the first case to be considered in this session concerning the duty to reply to comments of the Committee of Experts; they intended to deal with all such cases in the same fashion by pointing at the importance, for the supervisory machinery, of compliance with the obligation to report, as well as of replying to direct requests and observations. Whilst not wishing in any way to rank the respective importance of the five Conventions on which the reports requested were missing, there were two very important ones: the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention (No. 98), 1949, and the Equal Remuneration Convention (No. 100), 1951. The importance of the obligation to report has already been raised by this Committee with the Government in 1985, and the Employers' members hoped very much that in future reports would indeed be sent as required and that, as far as possible, the Office could give any necessary assistance.

The Government representative indicated, with respect to the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention (No. 26), 1928, that in Ghana adequate machinery existed for fixing minimum wages, through a tripartite committee; the minimum wage had last been fixed in February 1989 and was binding on all employers. As regards the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention (No. 30), 1930, there was a national committee on labour, which had been reconstituted in February 1989, and whose functions included advising the Minister on procedural points for legislation on labour and industrial relations. This committee had furnished the Minister with a memorandum on the revision of hours of work in commerce.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted that, at the time of the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government had not supplied answers to the comments of the Committee of Experts. It noted, however, that replies had now been handed to the Office. The Committee also noted the assurances given by the Government representative that the failure to send replies would no longer occur.

Grenada: A Government representative apologised for the fact that his Government had not fulfilled the promises given by its representative when he appeared before the Conference committee in 1988. His Government had not received report forms for Conventions Nos. 26, 58 and 99, although they did receive copies of the report of the Committee of Experts. He had now obtained copies of the relevant forms from the Office. His Government would make every effort to reply when the delegation returned after the Conference. The Workers' members reiterated that reporting was one of the central obligations of members of the Organisation. This included furnishing general information as well as responses to specific questions posed by the Committee of Experts on certain conventions. It was necessary to respond on time if possible, and in any event before the meetings of the Conference Committee. Bearing in mind the difficulties which this country had encountered, they hoped that it would be possible for the government to do better next year in sending reports on the conventions in respect of which they had been requested, including Conventions Nos. 26, 58 and 99.

The Employers' members associated themselves with the comments of the Workers' members. They noted that the Government had said that the relevant forms had not been received but that it was aware of the comments of the Committee of Experts. In that connection they put two questions to the secretariat: First, had there been an oversight which resulted in the questionnaires not being sent? Second, was it really necessary to send questionnaires if the government already knew of the comments of the Committee of Experts? At any rate, it was necessary to note in the report of the present Committee that the replies had not been received.

The representative of the Secretary-General said that requests for reports were accompanied by questionnaires in the form approved by the Governing Body. Reports were systematically sent to governments. In order to help the Government in this case, additional copies would be provided.

The Committee has taken note of the information provided by the Government representative as well as of the difficulties to which he referred. The Committee, however, would like to point out that the Government has not supplied information regarding the comments of the Committee of Experts, and it notes the assurances provided by the Government representative that replies will be sent to the office immediately after the Conference. The Committee decided to mention this case in the relevant section of its report.

Guyana. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, reports have been received on Conventions Nos. 81, 100, 111, 124, 131, 135, 136, 137, 139, 142, 149, 150, and 151. In particular they provide partial replies on Conventions Nos. 111, 131, 136, 139, 149 and 150.

Iraq. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the report on Conventions Nos. 92, 108, 147 and 152.

Italy. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 29, 92, 105, 111, 120, 129, 134 and 143.

Jamaica. In response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has communicated the following information:

As regard a report due since 1986 on Convention No. 149, the ministry responsible for labour is encountering difficulties in obtaining the relevant information from the Ministry of Health and the Nurses Association of Jamaica. It hopes to be able to send a report by October 1989.

With respect to Convention No. 29, the ministry responsible for labour states that it awaits new information from the Ministry of Justice.

With reference to the Committee's observation concerning Convention No. 87, the Government hopes to be able to indicate in its next report the measures taken to bring its legislation into conformity with this Convention.

The Government will also indicate in its next report on Convention No. 98 the measures taken to ensure that a union with the greatest number of workers in a bargaining unit is entitled to negotiate collectively conditions of employment on behalf of its members.

Relating to a report on Convention No. 122, the ministry responsible for labour is encountering difficulties in obtaining information from various government agencies, statutory bodies and trade unions. The Government will endeavour to send the required report by October 1989.

As regards the reports under article 19 of the ILO Constitution on unratified Conventions, the ministry responsible for labour indicates that it has not been able to supply them in the absence of information from the trade unions and the Ministry of Welfare. The Government will ensure that a report is submitted by October 1989.

In addition, a Government representative apologised for his Government's failure to submit the reports required on a timely basis. This failure to submit reports and to reply to comments made by the supervisory bodies was a matter of deep concern to the Government.

Jamaica had been experiencing considerable administrative and technical difficulties in obtaining the necessary data from the relevant authorities in order to compile the required reports and to prepare meaningful responses to the comments made by the supervisory bodies. These problems arose mostly as a result of a rapid turnover of personnel in key areas of the ministry, this causing a drain on experience and expertise, adversely affected the Government's ability to deal with these matters in a timely and efficient manner.

Referring to the indications in the general report that assistance may be made available to governments who are experiencing administrative or technical difficulties in fulfilling their obligations and responsibilities in this matter, the speaker stated that the Government had already made contact with the Office to explore the possibility of such assistance at the earliest possible date.

Notwithstanding these difficulties very special efforts would be made to ensure that reports and responses to comments would be submitted in the shortest possible time and in any event not later than October 1989.

In addition, the new administration installed after the general elections held last February indicated that it intended as a matter of priority to undertake a review of the labour and industrial relations law. In this exercise, attention would be paid to the legislative provisions needed to give effect to ratified Conventions. For this purpose, a tripartite labour advisory committee has been reactivated to assist the Minister of Labour in undertaking the review of the relevant legislation.

In view of the complexities involved and the number of acts and proposals to be considered, it was unlikely that any meaningful information would be available for submission in these matters by the October deadline, but it was expected that full and comprehensive information would be available for this Committee at its next meeting in June of 1990.

In regard to some of the outstanding reports and responses to comments by supervisory bodies, the Government representative called attention to the written response provided to the present Committee by the Government.

In conclusion the speaker reiterated his Government's commitment to submit the outstanding reports and responses without further undue delay.

The Workers' members have noted the administrative difficulties which have arisen in Jamaica. To be a member of the ILO implied a certain number of extremely important obligations to the supervisory system of the Organisation. In this particular case, there were three very specific obligations. The first was the obligation to submit a report after the ratification of a convention, in this case Convention No. 149 on Nursing Personnel. The second concerned the obligation to respond to the comments made by the supervisory bodies. Jamaica did not respond to the comments made by the Committee of Experts on Conventions Nos. 8, 29, 87, 98, and 122. The third obligation which Jamaica has failed to comply with is to provide reports requested under article 19. With the help of technical co-operation, it should be possible to remedy these gaps. The case of Jamaica should be included in the appropriate section of the report.

The Employers' members indicated that it would be correct to deal with these points altogether because they all concern an absence of information. First of all, it was a question of sending first reports on ratified conventions; reports which were particularly important for the evaluation of the degree to which a member State fulfilled its obligations undertaken when a new convention was ratified. Secondly, it was a matter of replies to the observations made by the supervisory bodies; in this case five conventions were involved. Finally, the last paragraph refers to the reports under article 19 of the constitution which Jamaica had not sent for five years. The Government representative provided information on the serious difficulties which the country was facing and in its written communication there were already some indications on the difficulties between the various competent authorities. The competent authorities lacked information which they had to obtain from other bodies. These were difficulties that practically every member State faced and had to resolve, and in particular these were difficulties typical of developing countries. This country should make efforts to fulfil its obligations and this duty could perhaps be facilitated by technical assistance, in particular with the help of instructions for explaining the way to fulfil this obligation of sending reports. They expressed the hope that in the future there would no longer be such shortcomings. I would be fitting this year to include this case in the appropriate part of the present Committee's report.

The Government representative indicated that he had no new information but that he wished to indicate that he had taken note of the important comments made by the present Committee. He gave assurances that the Government took its obligations seriously and reiterated the promise to send its reports in a timely and efficient manner.

The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Government representative and of the difficulties he had described.

The Committee found that, for several years, the Government had not supplied the first reports due, that it had not supplied any reply to the comments and observations made by the Committee of Experts, nor had it supplied any report under article 19 of the Constitution for the past five years.

The Committee noted the assurances given by the Government representative that this situation would no longer occur. In these circumstances, the Committee considered that the technical assistance of the Office could prove to be useful.

The Committee decided to mention these cases in the appropriate sections of its report.

Lao People's Democratic Republic. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee on the application of Conventions Nos. 4, 6 and 29.

Lebanon. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports on Conventions Nos. 102, 128 and on Recommendation No. 131 under article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

In addition on the subject of the failure to send reports on ratified and non-ratified Conventions, a Government representative stated that his Government had always tried to provide information requested by the Committee of Experts, whose work was highly appreciated; this was even more the case when the country was peaceful. The speaker explained that the tragic situation which now prevailed was the main reason preventing the Government from complying with its commitments. Lebanon had always endeavoured to fulfil its obligations as much as possible and some evidence of its eagerness to provide these replies could be found in the Government's written reply concerning Conventions Nos. 102 and 128 and Recommendation No. 131. The speaker stressed the war situation, explaining that the Ministry of Labour itself was situated on the demarcation line in the capital and was constantly receiving bombshells. The speaker expressed the hope that the present Committee would understand this dramatic situation, and wished that his Government would be able to live up again to its commitments as soon as possible.

The Workers' members states that they appreciated the difficulties encountered in Lebanon and particularly the expression of good will given by the Government representative to fulfil their obligations under the ILO Constitution. However, they pointed out that no reply had been received concerning a high number of ratified Conventions, and stressed that this was an important commitment, without which supervisory bodies cannot function.

The Employers' members expressed their approval with the comments made by the Workers' members, adding that the missing information was due to objective factors, for which the Government was not responsible.

The Worker member of Liberia stated that the situation in that country was both complex and alarming and he expressed the hope that the Government would be able to submit its reports in the near future.

The Committee had taken note of the explanations given by the Government representative and of the difficulties which he referred to. The Committee noted that the Government had not given any replies to the comments of the Committee of Experts for the period under review. The Committee noted the good will expressed by the Government, which should enable it to comply with its obligations once circumstances make this possible. The Committee has decided to mention this case in the appropriate sections of its report.

Mauritius. The Government has indicated that reports on Conventions Nos. 26, 94, 98 and 99 were mailed to the ILO in mid-May, replying to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

In addition, see discussion under III.

Mongolia. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports due and its responses to the comments made by the Committee on Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 103, 111 and 122.

Papua New Guinea. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government indicated that it is encountering difficulties in discharging its obligations under Articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution. In particular, the constant changes in the National Government through "Vote of Non-Confidence" have prevented the submission of instruments to the competent authorities. As regards the reports due on Conventions Nos. 98, 99, 105 and 122, the Government indicated that they have not been completed because repeated requests for information from other organisations have been ignored.

In addition, regarding the failure to supply reports on ratified and non-ratified Conventions and on submission to the competent authorities, a Government representative stated that his Government highly respected the observations of the Committee of Experts but that, like many other developing nations, faced many administrative and technical difficulties in its efforts to comply with reporting obligations. The Labour Department was faced with negative response and lack of co-operation from various intergovernmental agencies responsible for the administration and compliance with Conventions ratified by his country and a critical shortage of manpower.

The speaker also explained, concerning the general observation mentioned on page 505 of the report of the Committee of Experts that the instruments adopted from the 66th to the 74th Sessions of the Conference could not be submitted to the Parliament because the Government was defeated through a vote of no confidence, which further delayed the submission of instruments to Parliament. The new Government which came into power in July 1988 will be facing another vote of no confidence in July 1989; therefore, the representative could not give a commitment as to the time when the instruments would be submitted to Parliament. However, he assured the present Committee that it would be kept informed of the developments in due course.

The Workers' members expressed their appreciation that the Government representative came to explain the problems his Government was facing but nevertheless hoped that more information would come in due course since this information was crucial to initiate the control procedure. As regards the submission problems, they recalled that no reports had been submitted during the last seven sessions. They stated that more substantive information should be provided so that the Committee would not be in the same situation next year, and then emphasised the comments made by the Committee of Experts on page 505 of its report.

The Employers' members expressed their agreement with the Workers' members.

The Committee has taken note of the information, both oral and written, provided by the Government representative and of the difficulties he referred to. The Committee noted that no information had been received about the requests made by the Committee of Experts for the period under review and that no other measures had been taken to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, in conformity with the obligations under the Constitution. The Committee hoped that the necessary measures would be taken in the near future and decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Sierra Leone. A Government representative stated that the acute shortage of staff in the Ministry of Labour had been and continues to be a major obstacle to the effective execution of the obligation to report to the ILO. The Government had authorised the newly appointed Minister of Labour to carry out major structural changes in the Ministry, and the International Relations Department would receive special attention. The speaker assured the Committee that the matters raised in paragraph 88 of the Report of the Committee of Experts were receiving urgent attention and that the Government would not have to stand again before the present Committee in the future, to reply to the same observations.

The Workers' members stated that they understood the problems mentioned by the Government representative but urged the Government to make every effort to overcome these staff shortages and present the reports requested, especially in view of the seven years' lapse noted.

The Employers' members recalled that under the ILO Constitution, each State which ratified a Convention should respect its obligations. Sierra Leone had ratified a whole series of Conventions in respect of which the Government had not provided information and had not replied to the direct requests of the Committee of Experts. It was not known for the last seven years whether the instruments had been presented to the competent authorities. The Employers' members stated they regretted this situation and recalled that any process of control depended on the submission of the information requested, which was the first step for the implementation of Conventions, in so far as a country wanted to put them into effect. Concerning the administrative difficulties mentioned by the Government representative, they exist everywhere in the world but they should not prevent compliance with obligations. They expressed the hope that the necessary changes would be made within the Ministry so that in the future the Government would supply the information requested in due course and that the Committee of Experts would not have to deplore the lack of information in its next report.

The Government representative added that his Government would make every effort to reply to the Committee's request for information.

The Committee has taken note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the difficulties which he mentioned. The Committee noted that no reply had been given to the observations and comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted the measures taken and the assurance given by the Government so that the situation would not happen again in the future. The Committee has decided to mention this case in the appropriate sections of its report.

Uganda: A Government representative stated that his Government sincerely regretted the oversight in not submitting the required reports for all that time, but it would transmit the 1990 report to the Office on time.

The Employers' members observed that in the past five years the Government had not presented any reports under article 19 of the Constitution. These reports were, however, very important in order to provide a general understanding of the practical and legal situation concerning the application of Conventions, even for member States who had not ratified the conventions. Each time these reports were not sent, the possibility for examining the situations as a whole was weakened. For this reason, it was very important that each country seriously comply with its obligations in this area. The Employers' members expressed the hope that the Government would fulfil its promise to transmit its reports next year. The Committee should, none the less, mention in its report that the Government had not transmitted its reports for the past five years.

The Workers' members recalled the importance of presenting reports under article 19 for the preparation of the general surveys. If a government abstained, year after year, from respecting its obligations to transmit reports on Conventions, whether or not it has ratified them, it was not possible to have an idea of the situation which prevailed in the country. Certainly, Uganda had known difficulties, but taking into account the importance of the general surveys, it would be advisable to mention in this Committee's report that this country had not sent its article 19 reports for the past five years.

The Worker member of Liberia indicated that it was not possible to accept the explanations made by the Government representative according to which the Government omitted to send reports for the past five years simply out of forgetfulness. He stated that, as an African, he could understand the existence of other reasons but that it was difficult to accept the forgetfulness of a State member, taking into account the obligation which was assumed when a convention was adopted.

The Government representative indicated that the concerns expressed by the speakers on this question would be taken into consideration. The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee found that the Government had not supplied the reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution for the past five years. The Committee noted the assurances provided by the Government that this situation would not occur again. The Committee decided to place this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Yugoslavia. Since the meeting of the Committee of Experts, the Government has sent the reports on Conventions Nos. 11, 29, 69, 74, 87, 92, 97, 98, 111, 135, 138, 143 and the first report on Convention No. 158. In addition, it has provided information in response to the comments made by the Committee on the application of Conventions Nos. 77 and 111.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 3: Maternity Protection, 1919

Chile (ratification: 1925). The Government has communicated the following informations:

In reply to the Committee of Experts' observation on Article 3(c) of the Convention, the Government indicates that health care for pregnant women is expressly provided for in section 6(d) of Act. No. 18469, which makes them beneficiaries of the health payments scheme even when they are not affiliated. It applies to all Chilean women, not only those under public or private industrial or commercial enterprises. The same provisions apply to children under six for benefits under section 9 of the Act. Health benefits are payable throughout pregnancy, i.e. nine months or 36 weeks, and for up to six months or 24 weeks after the birth of the child. Section 9 of the Act gives all pregnant women the right to state protection during the pregnancy and up to six months from the birth, including ante-natal care and the confinement.

Under section 8(b) of the Act, beneficiaries have the right to medical assistance, including consultations, examinations, diagnostic and surgical procedures, hospitalisation, obstetric care and treatment, including the medication listed in the National Form, and other possible treatment. Under section 15, health benefits during pregnancy and for up to six months after the birth, including ante-natal care and attendance during confinement by a doctor or midwife, are free.

The confinement and obstetric care from which all pregnant women may benefit, even when they are not affiliated, is free and 100 per cent financed for those in groups A and B who have insufficient means. The State National Health Fund provides the finance.

Confinement and obstetric care for those with greater means and high incomes are financed 75 per cent by the State National Health Fund and 25 per cent by private insurance, which, in addition to traditional insurance companies, includes ISAPRES (health-care institutions), which finance various kinds of medical care such as confinement and obstetric care through affiliation and payment of a premium or monthly contribution.

The welfare services have state financing in the public sector and affiliates; the private sector is financed entirely by employers. The State's payment of only 75 per cent of the confinement and obstetric costs for rich and high-income people conforms with the principles of assistance and solidarity, whereby preferential treatment is accorded by the State to those in real need who cannot manage themselves. Thus, the spirit of the legislation has the objective of protecting those with small means by allowing them maternity benefits.

The Government notes the 1965 General Survey of the Committee of Experts on Maternity Protection with interpreted Article 3(c) of the Convention as establishing the right to free attendance by a doctor or midwife, including completely free medical care during confinement, there being no question of requiring any participation by the woman in these expenses.

Since this interpretation by the Committee of Experts was not known, and with a view to re-examining the legislation and the financial implications of the State assuming 100 per cent of confinement costs of the well off, who do not need state help, the Government requests a copy of the General Survey.

Convention No. 5: Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Brazil (ratification: 1934). The Government has communicated the following information:

In regard to the observation of the Committee of Experts concerning the prohibition of work in industry by persons under the age of 14 years, the Government is of the opinion that the national legislation is perfectly in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, since the definition of apprentice is given in Decree No. 3156 of 6 October 1951. That Decree provides: "Contract of apprenticeship" means any individual contract of employment made by an employer and an employee between 14 and 18 years of age under which, in addition to the features mentioned in section 3 of the Consolidated Labour Laws, the employer undertakes to give the employee systematic vocational training in the trade or occupation for which he is engaged, and the young person undertakes to follow the apprenticeship course. Any worker under the age of majority enrolled in a course of the National Service for Industrial Apprenticeship (SENAIC) or National Service for Commercial Apprenticeship (SENAC), or in a course approved by them in accordance with the application legislation, shall be deemed to be undergoing systematic vocational training in a trade or occupation. The National Service for Industrial Apprenticeship and the National Service for Commercial Apprenticeship are technical schools; financed by a payroll levy imposed on employers and structurally linked to the Ministry of Labour. The Ministry of Labour is studying the harmonisation of the ordinary legislation to the constitutional provisions which govern this subject.

In addition, a Government representative of Brazil indicated on the subject of the observations of the Committee of Experts on this Convention, that prior to the adoption of the new Constitution in 1988, the minimum age to perform work was 12 years of age, and to perform work as an apprentice it was 14 years of age (Decree No. 31546/52). The new Constitution established a minimum age of 14 years for the performance of work (article 7(33)). However, the Constitution permitted work to be performed by apprentices under the age of 14 years. The speaker referred to the definition of contracts of apprenticeship in decree No. 31546/52. The Government was unaware of any apprenticeship contracts entered into by persons under the age of 14. It was making special efforts to adapt the legislation on minors to the principles contained in the Constitution and in the Convention. The speaker reiterated that the Government had strengthened its labour inspection services to ensure the application of the legislation especially in regard to work performed by minors. Additional, more detailed information on the activities of the labour inspection services would be supplied in reply to the request made by the Committee of Experts.

The Worker member of Brazil stated in relation to the perverse use of child labour in Brazil was each year growing worse, in direct proportion to the deterioration in industrial relations and in the standard of living. He expresses his concern over the widely accepted position in Brazil which held that it was better to have minors working than hanging around in the streets, where they did not receive any education, guidance, health services or food, and where they formed outcast gangs of children and juveniles. He regretted that, as the Committee of Experts had pointed out, the new Federal Constitution of 1988 was a step backwards on this matter in so far as it permitted the employment of minors under the age of 14 as apprentices. It was accurate to say that various sectors of the federal Government favoured subjecting work performed by minors to legal regulation, but the insufficient number of labour inspectors (who earned low wages) to cover the entire country made the situation worse. The speaker suggested that the ILO exert pressure on the Government to reverse the situation and urged the Ministry of Labour to initiate a national publicity campaign to promote the defence of minors and to clarify the situation concerning the Convention so that violations of it would cease.

The Workers' members thought that the already troublesome situation was getting even worse. The economic situation was deteriorating, inflation was rampant, wages could not keep pace and impoverishment was increasing. Economic measures and an adaptation of the legislation to bring it into conformity with the provisions of the Convention were necessary. Labour inspection could also play an important role in regard to employers engaging under-age minors. But access to education was also key here. Children were running through the streets when they should be in school. To find solutions which would ensure the country's future, there had to be genuine collaboration between all the social forces in Brazil in order to protect children, not only in the field of work but also in regard to education.

The Employers' members said that the issue here was effective implementation of statutes and of the Convention. The written information supplied by the Government regarding the definition of apprenticeship contracts had not been of assistance in demonstrating that child labour was prohibited. The Employers' members wondered if that was the only type of contract of employment applicable to youth or if there were other forms of employment falling outside that definition. They expressed their disappointment that the Government had not replied to several questions raised by the Committee of Experts. The Government had said that information on activities of the labour inspectorate would appear in the next report, but the Employers would appreciate any information that could be provided at this time about how this inspectorate would conduct its investigations and any data on the number and nature of violations regarding minimum age. The crucial question was how the Government could assure this Committee that there was in fact effective implementation of the Convention.

The Committee took note of the report of the Committee of Experts and the oral and written indications provided by the Government representative. According to this information, the new Constitution laid down a minimum age of 14 years, in accordance with the Convention, but permitted apprenticeship training for workers under that age. The Committee expressed its regret that amendments had not been made to other relevant legislative provisions. The Committee therefore requested the Government to take additional practical measures to prohibit the employment of children in accordance with the Convention and to ensure its proper application. The Committee hoped that there would be progress in the very near future with regard to the application of the Convention and that a report would be received in this connection.

Poland (ratification: 1924): See under Convention No. 87.

Convention No. 26: Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928

Ghana (ratification: 1959). See under IA.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). The government has communicated the following information.

As regards previous comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning this Convention as well as Conventions Nos. 105 and 119, the Government indicates that draft texts have been elaborated so as to bring law and national practice into conformity with these Conventions. The constitutional procedure for adoption of these texts is in process and they will go before the competent authorities. Furthermore, it is advisable to refer to the previous declarations made by the delegation in response to the Committee of Experts' comments concerning the divergences between the international Conventions and the legislative provisions and national practice in the Central African Republic.

Greece (ratification: 1952). The Government has communicated the following information:

Regarding the observations of the Committee of Experts on this Convention, the Government refers to the report it submitted on the application of this Convention for the period 1987-1988.

India (ratification: 1954). A Government representative made the following statement. Identification and rehabilitation of bonded labour is a vast and complex problem, rooted in the socio-economic fabric of the society and closely connected with the basic problems facing all developing countries – namely poverty and unemployment. To tackle this problem legislation is hardly sufficient; therefore, the Government of India launched a massive programme to combat poverty and unemployment, specifically addressed to the population living below the poverty line. This programme consists of schemes like Integrated Rural Development Programme (IRDP), National Rural Employment Programme (NREP), Rural Labour Employment Guarantee Programme (RLEGP), etc. These efforts have shown results: in 1977-78, 48.3 per cent of India's population was below the poverty line; in 1983-84 this figure came down to 37.4 per cent (i.e. 273 million people) and by 1990 it should drop to 25.8 per cent (i.e. 211 million people) which is no small achievement. However, there still remains a gigantic problem – the fact that about 211 million people are below the poverty line; this is why the Government is seeking the active help of unions and social organisations, and launched a special scheme to involve the voluntary agencies in the identification of bonded labourers.

As far as the estimates and identification of bonded labourers are concerned, no estimates made by the Gandhi Peace Foundation, the National Sample Survey or those quoted by the Sub-Committee on Bonded Labour can be regarded as realistic for the following reasons. Firstly, there have been very wide variations in the interpretation of who is a bonded labourer under the Act; all the estimates made so far were made before the Act was amended to further clarify the definition of bonded labour. Even under the amended Act, there is room for varying interpretations on account of differences of perception and also because accurate facts do not usually come out while conducting sample surveys. Secondly, the methodology adopted by the Gandhi Peace Foundation was not scientific and their sample was too small. Also, the investigators of the Gandhi Peace Foundation gathered the data on the basis of group discussions in the villages between them and the members of the villages gathered, as distinct from personal interviews with the households adopted by the National Sample Surveys, which identified the bonded labourers in certain sample villages from which the figures were multiplied. Therefore, the method of the National Sample Surveys was a little more scientific and, in fact, this has given the figure as 353,000 as against a much larger figure – about 2,617,000 which is the estimate of the Gandhi Peace Foundation. However, the National Sample Survey was not really a special one for bonded labour, as such. Its main focus was on employment and the unemployment situation in the country. Therefore the survey methodology was not really designed particularly for conducting the bonded labour survey. Even then, there is a wide fluctuation between the figures.

For these reasons, the Government has not accepted any of these estimates of the number of bonded labourers. The correct number of bonded labourers can be ascertained only after a proper identification through a legal process. If certain persons have been counted as bonded labourers during one of the sample surveys, but the competent authority under the Act concludes that they are not within the definition of bonded labour, no action under the law is possible and the scheme of rehabilitation of bonded labourers also is inapplicable. Of course, those concerned and their families would still be entitled to the benefits of other schemes pertaining to poverty allocation – like IRDP, NREP, RLEGP, TRYSEM – if the relevant criteria are satisfied. There cannot be a numerical target for the identification of bonded labour. The Government has instructed the state authorities to identify and release all the bonded labourers at once. If all the bonded labourers were not identified in the first instance, it was not because the Central Government had fixed a limit on the number to be identified, but rather because the State Governments and the competent authorities in the field were unable to ascertain the real situation. In spite of the best efforts made by the Government, the facts may not come out if the bonded labourers themselves hide the facts and to not complain. That is why the active involvement of trade unions and social organisations is crucially important.

As of 31 March 1989, the Government has identified 242,532 bonded labourers – far less than the 2 million estimated figure suggested by the Gandhi Peace Foundation. The Government does not know whether more bonded labourers exist or not; if it did, it would have identified them. If new bonded labourers are identified today, they may be cases of new bondage or old cases, which did not come to light in spite of the Government's best efforts. All the Government can say is that there are 242,532 known bonded labourers today, that it has rehabilitated 218,272 of them as of 31 March 1989, and that the target is to rehabilitate by 31 March 1990 all the bonded labourers who are known to exist today and all those who might be identified by then. In other words, by 31 March 1990, there will be no gap between bonded labourers identified and rehabilitated.

The Government representative acknowledged that implementation of the Act or the scheme of rehabilitation of bonded labourers may not be perfect. The Central Government actively monitors and reviews the implementation of the law and the scheme and provides financial assistance, but the implementation of both the law and the scheme is within the powers of the State Governments who are autonomous under the Constitution. It is almost impossible to ensure a perfectly uniform interpretation of the Act throughout such a vast and diverse country. However, the Government has asked the State Governments to ensure proper functioning of the Vigilance Committees; these consist of non-officials and the Government depends on their help to identify the bonded labourers who are not identified for a variety of reasons. Thus, the Government has also instructed the State Governments to see that regular and effective meetings of these Vigilance Committees are held and to see that the registers required to be maintained under the rules are maintained properly.

The Government shared the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 4 of its observation that there have been far too few cases of prosecution under the Act. Of course, courts may order imprisonment or fines, depending upon the merits of each individual case. The judiciary is independent. However, the Union Labour Minister has instructed all the State Governments, emphasising the need for launching prosecutions immediately after identification or release of the bonded labourers. It has also been clarified that launching prosecutions of the guilty employers is a necessary condition to the granting of financial assistance for the purpose of rehabilitation of the released bonded labourers. This is to ward against erroneous identification in order to get the benefit of financial assistance.

As regards the integration of other poverty-alleviation programmes with the main scheme of rehabilitation, strict and clear instructions have been issued by the Central Government. The Programme Organisation Evaluation (POE) study mentioned by the Committee of Experts covers the period between June 1981 and February 1982, while government instructions regarding integration of other anti-poverty programmes with the main scheme were issued on 2 September 1982. The POE study, therefore, could not have taken much notice of the integration mentioned above.

Regarding the functioning of the scheme to provide assistance to voluntary agencies for identification and rehabilitation of bonded labourers, the managerial subsidy is Rs.5,000 per annum up to 20 bonded labourers identified. For each additional bonded labourer identified, there is an additional Rs.100 and the overall ceiling is Rs.10,000. This would suffice for 70 bonded labourers and not 50 as mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Government is not aware of any voluntary agency which has identified more than 70 bonded labourers; if necessary, the ceiling can be reviewed. It is too early to assess the functioning of this scheme since it was launched on 30 October 1987, but the Government hopes that voluntary agencies will take up this task in a big way so that the Government's hands are strengthened and the message spreads far and wide.

The Government is fully committed to the release and rehabilitation of all bonded labourers and welcomes the co-operation of all those who are ready to help it. This programme is a very important ingredient in its top-priority 20-point economic programme, and it will make every effort to eradicate the evil of bonded labour.

The Government representative also indicated that he was handing over a copy of relevant portions of the Report of the Parliamentary Sub-Committee on Bonded Labour, referred to by the Committee of Experts in the last paragraph of its observation.

The Employers' members pointed out that this question had been discussed in 1986 for the last time and stated that a step had been made in the right direction; however, the question was whether the measures taken are sufficient or if they must be improved to reach the assigned objectives faster and better.

Everybody agreed that the Convention on forced or compulsory labour must be implemented in practice. The Government representative had made observations which had already been made during the last discussion. The definition of bonded labour had been modified since 1986 so as to facilitate identification of the persons to which the Act applies, but their number remains an unsettled question. While vigilance committees were to assist in the identification of bonded labourers, it appeared from the report of the Committee of Experts that the registers to be maintained by these committees were not adequately kept. Therefore, improvement and extension of these measures were very urgent.

Secondly, the Employer members wondered as to what happens to released bonded labourers: how are they rehabilitated? A new scheme for the involvement of voluntary agencies had been established, but there was criticism about insufficient material means available to these agencies, and there were doubts as to the results and whether the steps taken were sufficient.

More general questions arose about the integration and implementation of a number of different programmes mentioned by the Committee of Experts and their coverage of bonded labourers. According to the Committee of Experts, less than 1 per cent of all those concerned benefited from the programmes, which was not enough, given the size of the country and the magnitude of the problem. Statistical information could certainly be improved, but there appeared also to be a more general problem of education at all levels of society.

The report by the Government representative and the Committee of Experts report showed that a lot was being done but the problem was not solved yet. A better co-ordination of all the measures might be necessary. Also, the Government did not have all the information required. Therefore, the Employer members strongly encouraged the Government not only to continue its efforts but to intensify them, so that despite the enormity of the problem solutions may be found faster and within a reasonable period of time serious progress can be made.

The Workers' members stated that, following the comments of the Committee of Experts (expressed over many years), the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976, had been amended in 1985, which enabled the scope of the definition of bonded labourer to be clarified. However, in spite of the passing of this Act, in practice the situation remained the same as before, as had been observed by the Bharatiya Mazdoor Sangh. The law had not yet achieved its objectives due to the absence of adequate implementing measures. The Committee of Experts had noted that prosecutions were too few and punishment too light. Furthermore, only a small number of freed bonded labourers had been able to benefit from the debt-release and rehabilitation programmes. As the bonded labour system still existed in spite of the passing of legislation outlawing it, the Government had to take effective measures and put into place more significant means to ensure the rigorous application of these laws.

The Workers' member of the United States referred to the statements of the spokesmen of the Employers and of the Workers and pointed out that, just as when the Committee had discussed this case in 1984 and 1985, the Government representative had conveyed the will of his Government to eliminate the social evil of bonded labour. These good intentions should be put into practice. In this respect, he recalled that, in connection with the stone quarries question, the Supreme Court of India had pointed to some means that could detect more efficiently cases where bonded labourers existed and help to eliminate this form of forced labour through the efforts of the district magistrates, the State Governments and the Vigilance Committees. The speaker wondered whether these agencies were working efficiently and effectively and whether it might not be appropriate to obtain the services of the ILO to deal with this problem.

The Government representative thanked the Employers' and Workers' members for expressing their views and giving some very valuable advice. They had stated that implementation of the law required to be improved and that the means which had been employed to tackle the situation were not strong enough; much stronger means would be employed.

The statement that only 1 per cent of the bonded labourers had been covered was based on the presumption that the actual number was above 2 million, as estimated by the Gandhi Peace Foundation. His Government had not been able to accept this estimate because there was no evidence at all to support it; 242,000 bonded labourers had been identified and 218,000 had already been rehabilitated. The Government did not know whether the bonded labourers existed or not, but it was trying very hard to reach a final count, with the help of State Governments, various committees, voluntary organisations and the trade unions. It was trying to improve the implementation of the existing legal provisions and was in favour of punishment for the guilty, but it could not instruct the courts which punishment to apply. The speaker added that a National Commission of Labour had been established to examine the problems of rural labour in general, including bonded labour. He stated that his Government did not feel the need for technical assistance from the ILO on this question since it was simply a question of implementation, not a technical matter which could benefit from the intervention of foreign experts. Returning to the question of figures, the Government had not fixed any target because its target was all the bonded labourers who exist – if they exist.

The Workers' members stated that differences of opinion might well exist on the figures, which were difficult to verify in practice. However, discussions which had taken place within the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery of the Sub-Committee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the United Nations, as well as information provided by the trade union organisations showed that bonded labour remained a very serious problem. The practical application of the law should be reinforced more vigorously and with effective sanctions. They hoped that the Government would shortly be reporting progress on this matter.

The Committee had taken note of the explanations supplied by the Government representative. The Committee noted the changes reported by the Government representative; it recalled, however, the points discussed at its previous sessions and mentioned by the Committee of Experts. The Committee requested the Government to continue its efforts to put the practice in question in conformity with the requirements of the Convention and to provide the information requested by the Committee of Experts.

Mauritania (ratification: 1961). The Employers' members recalled that in relation to Mauritania and Convention No. 29, the question of the elimination of slavery had been a source of problems for many years. The Committee of Experts had noted with regret that the necessary measures had not yet been taken to implement a law abolishing slavery. There had been discussions in past years with the Government, and the Employers' members failed to be convinced that slavery was no longer practised. This should therefore be included in the Committee's report under Convention No. 29 in relation to Mauritania.

The Workers' members associated themselves with the Employers' members' statement.

Netherlands (ratification: 1933). A Government representative stated that a Bill revising the legislation on dismissal would be presented this year to Parliament. This Bill proposes to delete the requirement for a worker to obtain approval of the Director of the Employment Office for the termination of his employment, if the employer disagrees. In practice, this requirement is hardly ever used since employers and workers typically agree; in any case and if approval is requested it will not be refused. The speaker said that this was not an issue of forced labour since the worker may not be forced to stay in employment under the menace of a penalty. He hoped that next year this case would be listed as a case of progress.

Speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, the Workers' member of the Netherlands expressed his satisfaction with the Government statement but regretted that a solution could not be found earlier.

The Employers' members agreed that this issue might have been settled earlier and that the legislation should be amended as soon as possible.

The Committee took note of the information submitted by the Government representative and of the discussion which followed. It noted that, according to the report of the Committee of Experts, there were divergences between the law and practice and the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to ensure, at least in practice as a first stage, compliance with the requirements of the Convention, pending the solution of this question through legislation. The Committee hoped that the Government would be able to report major progress next year.

Pakistan (ratification: 1957). See under Convention No. 105.

Sudan (ratification: 1957). A Government representative, indicated, with respect to Article 25 of the Convention, that the information mentioned by the Committee of Experts which appeared in a document (E/CN.4/Sub.2/AC.2/1988/7/Add.1) of the UN Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities concerned slavery and was received from the Anti-Slavery Society for the Protection of Human Rights. The speaker was surprised that the Committee of Experts' report had not referred to the report of the Working Group on Slavery which appeared in Sub-Commission Document No. E/CN.4/

Sub.2/1988/32 of 22 August 1988. In paragraph 16 of that latter report, it could be seen that information on slavery had been presented by the Anti-Slavery Society regarding certain problems posed in the context of the on-going conflict in Sudan. The Anti-Slavery Society and the Government of Sudan had then agreed to an on-the-spot visit in the following year in order to be able to obtain more detailed information. In the light of the Working Group's report, it was clear that the Anti-Slavery Society had agreed to withdraw the information it had presented on Sudan until the time it would have objective information gathered by a group composed of representatives of the Government and of the Anti-Slavery Society. A representative of the Society had gone to Sudan, where he had met the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Foreign Affairs, as well as other competent authorities and certain other key Sudanese. In a letter addressed to Geneva, the representative stated his satisfaction at the visit; the Sudanese Government had, in accordance with the wish expressed by the Anti-Slavery Society, presented a joint document on this point, which had been submitted to the Commission on Human Rights at its last session.

The Government representative stated that there was no racial or religious discrimination in his country and that a spirit of tolerance, freedom and democracy reigned. The laws were applicable to all, whether strong or weak, subject or ruler, and the Government was making efforts to bring peace so as to ensure development and justice. The laws were in conformity with international labour standards and protected human rights; the application of the laws and the possibilities of seeking recourse under law guaranteed peace and personal safety. The legislation prohibited any form of exploitation or forced labour. There was no doubt as to the Government's commitment with regard to international instruments on the prevention of slavery and the slave trade, and Sudan had been among the first African countries to ratify the UN Convention on the abolition of slavery.

The Worker member of Sudan, after noting that he had been chosen as the representative of Sudanese workers without any interference whatsoever from the authorities, refuted what he termed false accusations contained in the report mentioned by the Committee of Experts, which could cause prejudice against Sudanese and disdain for their characteristic tolerance. The situation did not involve reports addressed officially to the Government of Sudan; the Government would have reacted in another way had the truth been alleged. The allegations were baseless. The Sudanese workers were vigilant in protecting fundamental freedoms and legitimate rights of citizens, such as the rights to freedom, dignity and justice, which were basic principles enshrined in the ILO Constitution. After indicating that his country enjoyed political and trade union freedoms that did not exist in many Third World countries, and that the political conflict between the Popular Movement of Southern Sudan and the Government was on its way to a peaceful resolution, the speaker concluded by stressing the humane and democratic traditions of the Sudanese nation, which could not tolerate false propaganda or fallacious rumours.

The Workers' members referred to the document of the UN Sub-Commission mentioned by the Committee of Experts. It had contained accurate information and the facts mentioned were so precise and so tragic that the Workers' members wondered how it could ever be shown that they were not true. The country should be visited by experts from the United Nations or organisations protecting civil liberties; the country should be open to the press so that journalists could travel freely to ascertain the facts, which would make it possible to determine the truth. The allegations cited by the Committee of Experts, corroborated by witnesses, were overwhelming. They dealt with, inter alia, the forced sale of children, especially boys, by their own parents, to unknown persons, with the parents having no hope of ever seeing their children again. The Workers' members hoped that efforts would be made to shed light on this matter, that objective information would be communicated in regard to the facts related, and that human rights would be respected.

The Employers' members stated that the situation was not very clear on some very serious matters dealing with slavery, and that it had not been possible to ascertain the facts to resolve ambiguities. The Government had not provided proof of the existence or non-existence of legislation calling for effective penalties against slavery, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Employers' members shared the opinion of the Workers' members on this case.

The Government representative recalled that Sudan was a democratic country, in liberty, open to anyone who wished to find out on-the-spot what was happening; there was nothing to impede these efforts from being undertaken so that this could be confirmed in the eyes of the world. The speaker would inform his Government of the discussions so that full report could be prepared containing all the information requested to gain a more precise idea of the situation.

The Worker member of Sudan indicated that the question did not deal with the conflict between the Government and the trade unions, but rather was a matter involving the dignity of citizens. The trade unions would be the first to voice opposition to the Government if the situation were otherwise.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the opinions and comments made during the discussion. The Committee noted the serious allegations cited by the Committee of Experts, which had a direct bearing on respect for the Convention, at least in practice. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take all necessary measures to ensure the application of the Convention and to ensure that penalties imposed by law for the exacting or forced labour would be truly effective and applied fully in practice. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in the near future be in a position to provide substantive information on measures taken in this regard.

Convention No. 30: Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices), 1930

Ghana (ratification: 1973). See under IA.

Convention No. 52: Holidays with Pay, 1936

Morocco (ratification: 1956). The Government has communicated the following information:

The observations of the Committee of Experts have been taken into account in the draft Labour Code which refers to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. This draft Code, which has been approved by the Government, was communicated to the ILO at the request of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 1988. Steps have been taken to ensure that the draft Code can be examined as quickly as possible by the Parliament. Furthermore, the legislation on working conditions and remuneration of agricultural workers, which also contained certain divergencies from the requirements of the present Convention, has been amended by an Act of the Dahir, No. 1-72-219; section 23 of the Act provides that "The accumulation or the division into parts of holidays shall not reduce the duration of annual holiday to a period of less than 12 working days taken in two week rest days." The Government has communicated the complete text of Dahir (Act) No. 1-72-219 relating to the conditions of employment and remuneration of agricultural workers.

In addition, the Government representative orally reiterated the indications contained in the written communication above. He also indicated that steps were now being taken with a view to examination, as rapidly as possible, by the Parliament of the draft labour code.

The Workers' members recalled that the reason the Committee of Experts had asked the Government to supply full particulars to the Conference was the fact that the Government's report had not contained any new information in relation to compliance with this Convention. They were happy to see that there had now been some progress. However, the fact remained that there was still no new Labour Code, and they hoped that before next year the Government would be in a position to provide the answers which the Committee of Experts had been seeking.

The Employers' members supported the position adopted by the Workers. They emphasised that what was at issue in this instance was legislation which had to be brought into line with a Convention which had been ratified in the mid-1950s and in respect of which there was still no compliance. The proposed changes to the Labour Code had first been mooted 22 years ago. It was now high time that something was done – especially bearing in mind that these were obligations into which the Government had freely entered. They wanted to know when the new Labour Code would be adopted.

The Government representative said that it was important not to over-estimate the extent of divergence between the Convention and the law which was already in force: the only difference between the legislation in force and the Convention was that the legislation gives to the worker – and only the worker – the right to request the accumulation or the splitting up of paid leave. This right must be exercised with the approval of the head of the enterprise; as this right must be exercised according to strict formalities it is, in practice, hardly used by those workers concerned. This is the reason why the Government has not met with objections of occupational organisations over the introduction of necessary changes in the draft Labour Code or in the legislation relating to agricultural workers.

Replying to the Employers' members, he reiterated that the draft Labour Code had already been adopted by the Council of Ministers and that it must be approved by the Parliament. The modification made in the draft Labour Code concern not only paid leave, but also more technical fields such as occupational health and safety. These amendments also have significance with respect to the prospects of ratifying other Conventions.

Regarding the legislation relating to agricultural workers, the Government has not been obliged to amend these provisions, but has done so in order to demonstrate its good faith and to harmonise its legislation with international standards targeted for attainment.

The Committee noted the explanations and information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee noted, however, according to the conclusions of the Committee of Experts, that there remained divergences of both law and practice with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the provisions of the proposed Labour Code would make it possible to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would be in a position to report decisive and specific progress next year.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection, 1947

Uganda (ratification: 1963). A Government representative stated that his Government regretted its failure to comply with the requirements of Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. However, it should be pointed out that Uganda was faced with enormous administrative and material difficulties, due to prolonged civil strife and economic problems. These factors had made organisation of the publication of the inspection reports difficult. Everything possible would nevertheless be done to fulfil in the future the obligations under the Constitution and the Convention. In this regard the speaker informed the present Committee that the inspection reports for 1979 and 1980 have been compiled.

The Employers' members indicated that the reports on inspection services which should have been sent were not just pieces of paper. There was more involved here because these reports, if drawn up correctly, contained valuable information which reflected the present situation of a country. Every member who undertook the obligation of sending such information by ratifying the Convention should comply with this obligation. The reports gave account of the functioning and the effects of inspection services. This was an obligation whose importance went far beyond a purely formal obligation. The Employers' members understood the administrative difficulties which existed in a number of developing countries. Consequently, it was necessary to insist on the importance of this obligation so that member States would make all efforts to comply with their obligations. Taking into account the technical difficulties in understanding certain questions, it would be advisable for the Government resort to the technical assistance of the Office.

The Workers' members recalled that the present Committee had already emphasised on a number of occasions that labour inspection must be sufficient and competent in order for social legislation to be applied. Moreover, reports were indispensable for giving an idea of the difficulties encountered by a country. Labour inspection reports must be sent in the twelve months following the year in question. In this case, the last report, which was received in 1985, contained information concerning the years 1977 and 1978. Thus it was not enough to send a report. It was also important that the information be supplied in a timely manner. In this regard, ILO assistance could be extremely useful.

The Government representative declared that his country has received an ILO technical assistance mission in November-December 1988 and that its recommendations would be taken into consideration as soon as they had been transmitted.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, in particular with regard to the difficulties that it had described concerning that elaboration and publication of inspection reports.

The Committee noted that no annual report on the activities of labour inspection services had been supplied since 1979.

The Committee requested the Government to take all the necessary measures, if necessary with the assistance of the Office, to ensure application of the Convention as concerns the regular publication and transmittal of annual labour inspection reports.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

Burma (ratification: 1955). A Government representative indicated that his country had undergone drastic changes recently in the political, economic and administrative system. The single party system had been abandoned in accordance with the wishes of the people. The concomitant changes, reforms and restructuring were presently in full swing in all sectors of life in the country namely, political, economic and social spheres. Plans had been already adopted and a specific timetable had been drawn up for the holding of a free and fair general election on multi-party system within a few months time. All necessary preparations were being made in that direction. As a matter of fact, over 200 political parties had been formed and duly registered with the General Election Commission and they were expected to participate in the forthcoming elections.

Thus, there no longer existed the situation about which the Committee had expressed certain misgivings in regard to the present Convention. In the meanwhile, during this extremely delicate period of transition, marked by drastic reforms and restructuring, the existing labour laws afforded adequate protection to workers of their basic rights. The Ministry of Labour and its administrative organs were keeping very close watch on all matters concerning the interest and welfare of workers. It may also be emphasised that there existed no legislation whatsoever which prevented workers from forming associations to look after their legitimate common interest.

The prospective scenario of labour organizations and movements in Burma could accordingly be no other than the one that is in tune or harmony with the multiparty democratic system and hence in conformity with Convention No. 87.

The Workers' members stated that there would not be a long discussion because Burma had sent its reports. Furthermore, the political, economic and social changes permitted hope that the Convention would be fully applied. The declarations of the Government representative concerning the constitution of several political parties and the possibility for workers to form one or many trade union organisations permitted hope that the Act No. 6 of 1964, and, in particular section 9 (which imposed a single union structure), would be amended. It would be useful to specify the date by which these amendments should be made in order to assure that they would result in a proper application of the Convention.

The Employers' members indicated that the trade union monopoly laid down in law was an obstacle to freedom of association, and therefore, to application of the Convention. As in many other cases, the Government maintained that this monopoly was based upon the will of the workers themselves. None the less, the Employers' members considered that the will of these persons did not constitute a reason for establishing such a monopoly in the legislation. The declarations, made by the Government representative were somewhat vague; it seemed that different rules would be established if a different will were to become known. In any event, trade union monopoly should be eliminated from the legislation.

With regard to the political changes which would lead to a multi-party system, the present Committee could not examine these political questions, but could affirm that a single party system often goes hand-in-hand with a single union system. In fact, there was a correlation between these two systems and therefore it was hoped that the end of a single party system would also lead to the end of the single union system. The Workers' members would be grateful if they could observe progress in the near future in legislation, as well as in practice.

The Government representative described the political changes which had taken place in this country. The single party system and the single union system no longer existed. With regard to the economic plan, a mixed economy came into practice. As concerns the social climate, the democratic way was being pursued. The fact that two political parties had set up trade unions proved that workers now enjoy freedom of association.

The Workers' members observed that it was not the political parties that it was necessary to give authorisation to set up trade union organisations; this was a worker's right and it was preferable that a trade union not be attached to a political party, nor created by such a party. In this regard, the Office could clarify the meaning that must be given to the forming of free trade union organisations.

The Committee took note of the information communicated by the Government representative.

The Committee noted the will expressed by the Government to comply with its obligations stemming from the Convention.

The Committee also noted that certain specific measures were adopted to remedy the divergencies existing between national legislation and practice on the one hand, and the Convention on the other, but that this legislation had not yet been adopted.

Recalling the comments made by the Committee of Experts for a number of years, the Committee expressed its firm hope that the Government would adopt at an early date, and if necessary with the assistance of the International Labour Office, legislation in conformity with the requirements of the Convention and which would put an end to the system of a single union structure.

Central African Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative wished to assure the present Committee that the principle of freedom of association was respected by his Government. Act No. 88/009 of 19 May 1988, which created the possibility for workers to form federations and trade unions to promote and defend their interests, had entered into full force on 1 May 1989, the date on which the national authorities had invited all workers and employers to freely establish their organisations by occupational branch. A single trade union structure was in no way imposed on workers. This provision was not new, since the Labour Code provided in section 30 that regularly established occupational trade unions could engage in activities for the study and defence of their economic, industrial and commercial interests; that section also provided that they could establish unions, under any form whatsoever, and in particular could join international organisations of workers or employers.

In contrast to the view of the Committee of Experts that section 4 of the new Act was in contradiction to the Convention, the speaker stated that the Act simply afforded the workers the possibility of forming new groups.

The speaker also said that he had made contact with the Office so that a direct contacts mission could occur in the Central African Republic in order to ascertain that measures were being taken to establish local trade unions at all levels of economic activity, and that the Convention was being respected in this way. This mission could be accepted from September 1989, and it was up to the Office to fix the date of arrival so that the Central African Republic authorities could take the necessary measures in this connection. The speaker considered that the impetus given to the establishment of trade unions amply demonstrated the Government's will to respect its obligations as an ILO member.

The Workers' members expressed their serious concern over the situation in the country in particular, in regard to the application of the present Convention. For the fourth consecutive year, the Government has mentioned a direct contacts mission, without there ever being any follow-up on the oral promises made. This situation could not continue. The Workers' members wished there to be a written proposal seeking direct contacts, so that what had so long been promised could finally become reality.

The absence of the Central African Republic trade union representative who had for several years participated in the present Committee, and whose participation had been announced this year as well, was another source of concern. The Workers' members wished to know more in this regard.

The new legislation referred to was not satisfactory because it did not meet the standards of the Convention, even though certain technical points had been partially resolved. In a certain way, the principle of a single trade union structure had been maintained. If workers' organisations wanted to have a national central body, it was not up to the law to provide for it, because then it became quasi-obligation. The workers themselves had to decide freely, in their own organisations, if they wished to have trade union pluralism or unity.

The Employers' member recalled that the application of this Convention had caused difficulties for quite some time, and that the present Committee had discussed the situation on a number of occasions. The problem began with the absence of a Government report, first in 1982 and then since 1985. The question of a direct contacts mission has been discussed again and again, but none had taken place. Since 1981 there had been a general suspension of all trade union activity and there were many specific legislative limitations applicable to trade unions. New legislation may have cleared up a few of the more minor difficulties, which showed some progress, but the basic problem of the single trade union structure, which violates the Convention, remained unresolved. That constituted a sufficient reason for sending a direct contacts mission. In the light of the changes appearing in the new legislation and the progress made in applying the Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) Convention, 1932 (No. 33), the Employers' members maintained the hope that the Government would make the efforts necessary here to achieve additional improvements. They requested the Government representative to be more specific in stating that existing discrepancies with the present Convention would actually be eliminated.

The Government representative stated that his Government had informed the ILO of the effective renewal of trade union activities in the Central African Republic. His country's delegation had contacted the Office and indicated, orally and in front of witnesses, that the Government was in a position to receive a direct contacts mission and that the date of its arrival should be set by the Office. The speaker therefore thought it was useless to put this undertaking in writing.

Concerning the absence of the aforementioned Workers' representative from the Central African Republic, the speaker said that the representative had been neither prevented from attending the Conference nor detained, but was rather participating in regional trade union meetings. Another trade union leader had therefore been named to represent Central African Republic workers at the 76th Session of the Conference.

As regards the new Act, the speaker was of the view that the direct contacts mission would permit a viewing of progress achieved in the application of the Convention and misunderstandings to be cleared up. If it was a matter of formulation, where reference was made to single trade union federations, his country, which respected engagements it undertook, would voluntarily accept co-operation on the part of the direct contacts mission to review this provision.

The Workers' members wished to receive further information on the normal procedure to follow in relation to direct contacts missions. They added that in principle, this mission should be requested in writing. Moreover, the direct contacts should serve not only to study the current law but should assist, if necessary, in amending or adapting it.

The Workers' member of Liberia expressed the grave concern of African workers over the suspension of trade union activities since 1981. Trade union activities had gone on prior to that date, and the speaker failed to see any difficulty in restoring them by a revocation of the suspension. He questioned whether the Central African Republic's Workers' delegate to the Conference was in fact from the most representative workers' organisation, as required by the ILO Constitution. He thought it was inappropriate for the Government to argue impediments to compliance before a direct contacts mission had even taken place. Once one country in the region was able to get away with such an attitude toward trade union rights, African workers elsewhere had reason to be fearful. He found the Government's current comments and guarantees to be mere repetitions of those it had made in previous years, when no improvements had been made.

The representative of the Secretary-General indicated that direct contacts missions traditionally took place following a written communication from the government and an exchange of communications and correspondence between the government concerned and the Office in order to specify the terms of reference for the mission and the manner in which the visit would be carried out. In this case, the Government had stated its request before the Committee in 1986, 1987, 1988 and for the fourth time this year, 1989. In spite of efforts by the Office, correspondence and pressing appeals to the Government, no reply had been received in order to follow up on these requests for a direct contacts mission. The Office was fully disposed, once it received a written communication, to take the necessary measures, in consultation with the authorities involved, to set the terms of reference of the mission and to define the ways in which the on-the-spot visit would take place, if it was to occur.

The Committee took note of the explanations and information provided by the Government representative and of the discussion which had taken place in the Committee. The Committee noted with regret that the Government had not yet followed up on the promise it had made in 1986, 1987 and 1988 to receive a direct contacts mission. The Committee, while noting that certain divergencies in relation to provisions of the Convention had been eliminated in law and in practice, stated its concern over the imposition, by means of a new trade union Act, of a single trade union structure. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would swiftly take all steps necessary to eliminate the serious and important divergencies which still remained and to ensure full conformity with the Convention in the legislation and in practice. It hoped the Government would be able to report definite and substantive progress next year.

On the proposal of the Workers' members, with the agreement of the Employers' members, the Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

Colombia (ratification: 1976). A Government representative of Colombia stated that his Government was open to review by the supervisory machinery concerning the application of international labour standards. He said that, although there were links between the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, as regards Convention No. 87 there could be no confusion over their respective functions, as there were differences between the two as to their competence: the Committee of Experts was more concerned with the legal work of comparing general international and national labour standards and had rightly confined itself to mentioning the situation of violence created by minority groups of extremists, delinquents or drug traffickers; the Committee on Freedom of Association, on the other hand, was more concerned with examining actual cases of violations of the Convention. His Government, he declared, was the first to deplore such cases and was most interested in clarifying and punishing the crimes which had taken place, as well as in preventing them from recurring; to this end, it had taken very important measures. Considering that the Committee of Experts had referred to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, to which his Government had sent a great deal of information, he went on to deal with the issues raised by the Committee of Experts.

As regards the establishment of trade unions and the approval of their rules, he denied the allegation made by the Workers' Central Organisation of Colombia (CUT) that the Government was placing obstacles in the way of the establishment of trade union organisations, by repeatedly denying recognition of their legal personality or approval of their rules. He stated that over the past three years two new confederations had been established, 359 trade unions recognised and duly registered and 294 amendments made to their rules. Over the same period, 2,185 collective agreements were approved. He expressed his Government's intention to study ways of hastening this process, in consultation with the workers' leaders.

The speaker referred to the suspension of legal personality and the incompatibility which the Committee of Experts considered existed between the Convention and section 450 of the Labour Code (which permits the suspension of legal personalities for a period of two to six months and even the dissolution of a trade union as a sanction for an illegal strike); he stated that his Government was ready to examine in detail, with the workers and the employers, ways of changing the law, in so far as, for its part, the trade union movement could guarantee the normal operation of enterprises in which strikes had just finished, since the State had to ensure that the availability of work continued. He said that in normal times, as well as those involving repeated non-compliance by labour unions with the labour legislation provided for in section 380, the Minister of Labour must petition a labour judge for authorisation to impose the penalty provided in the section, suspension of legal personality. He added that in cases of grave disturbance of the public order by virtue of the Constitutional provisions on powers under the state of emergency to safeguard rights for all the population; the Government conferred, by temporary decree, jurisdiction to the Ministry of Labour to exercise, on a case-by-case basis, the authority to suspend legal personality or to dissolve trade unions. Decrees which suspended the legal personality of trade unions as punishment for having taken part in the general strike of October 1988 had been adopted in order to safeguard the authority of the Constitution and had been declared by the Supreme Court to be in conformity with the Constitution. He also referred to Article 4 of Convention No. 111, which stipulates that any measures affecting an individual who is justifiably suspected of, or engaged in, activities prejudicial to the security of the State shall not be deemed to be discrimination. He stated that these decrees had been repealed because the crisis came to an end. He pointed out that, even in a state of emergency, a trade union whose legal personality had been suspended could appeal either through administrative channels, which had the effect of suspending measures taken by the ministry, or through the administrative disputes procedure which, though it does not have a suspensive effect, may be accompanied by a supplementary appeal asking for suspension. He added that Colombian law is in conformity with Convention No. 87 and, in some regards, is more favorable for trade unions, for example, with respect to representation on boards of directors of public establishments. He added also that it was possible that in some regards, the Convention itself was out of mode and modification might be needed to bring it up to date. He then referred to the provisions of the national legislation which the Committee of Experts had considered incompatible with Convention No. 87, namely ministerial approval of amendments to the constitutions of unions, federations and confederations; supervision of the internal management of unions; the suspension, with loss of trade union rights, of trade union leaders who had been responsible for the dissolution of their unions; and the actual obligation to belong to the trade or occupation in order to be considered eligible for election to trade union office. He said the Government was interested in expediting these questions, in examining the degree of compatibility between these provisions and the Convention and the possibility of taking measures to put provisions in conformity with the Convention, in so far as they are not in conformity with regard to the election of foreigners to trade union office, the Government will request information from the ILO on the various national legal systems dealing with this question. As regards the communication of the election of trade union officers to the administrative authorities, he explained that this was a question of informing the labour authorities for registration and not for their approval. He also referred to the prohibition on trade unions from taking part in political matters and, in this respect, he said that in practice the Colombian trade unions participated in politics and that, like every citizen, their members were entitled to take part in elections and be elected and in fact a number of important trade union leaders have taken advantage of this right to be elected in the political arena. He added that this principle tended to protect unionised workers against the political adventuring of a leader who might step out of his strict trade union role and take advantage of a "captive constituency."

It is the intent of the Government to study the possibility of tempering or suspending the current prohibition on strikes by federations and confederations, provided that adequate guarantees are given that the eventual declaration of strikes would concern real employment issues and the Government was conscious of the need for Constitutional guarantees of the right to strike in public services except in essential public services. He pointed out that amendments to the Constitution already proposed by the Government were under way. He added that the administration had no guarantees at all when faced with these strikes, which frequently occurred without the proper conciliation procedures being followed. The speaker declared that, for clear constitutional reasons, his Government had difficulty in accepting the idea of the suppression of compulsory arbitration ordered by the Government in order to terminate strikes affecting the national economy.

As regards prison sentences in cases of the suspension of the right to strike, under a state of emergency, he said that Decree 2004 was no longer in force and that a similar Decree adopted in October 1988 was repealed in December 1988.

The Government would also examine the question of the automatic dismissal of trade union leaders for participation in illegal strikes (which he said were not as automatic as all that), in order to establish which legal improvements might be proposed.

Finally, he said that the national legislation did not place any limit on the duration of strikes but that it guarantees the right of the majority of workers to request the ministry of labour to constitute an arbitral tribunal to resolve strikes of more than 40 days' duration.

In conclusion, he affirmed that, in Colombia, despite the difficult social and economic context, an atmosphere of harmony and collaboration did exist between Government and trade unions; this did not mean there were no differences of opinion, but these could always be resolved in an atmosphere of patience and constructive dialogue. The Government was examining ways of bringing the legislation more closely into line with the Convention. He reiterated its interests in continued co-operation with the Committee of Experts and the present Committee; he stated that some observations were unfounded because of a wrong interpretation of the standards or because the complainants had overlooked the Government's obligation to safeguard higher legal rights through emergency measures.

The Workers' members considered that the Government representative's intervention was excessively long and had hindered the problem rather than helped it. They would have liked the Government representative to have supplied replies to the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and to have given details of the measures taken following the direct contacts mission. As it happened, the Government representative had merely repeated the same formula throughout his intervention, namely that things would be examined later.

The Employers' members believed that after the long statement of the Government representative, it was necessary to highlight certain main points. The point of departure is the great number of complaints and of different findings about the situation in Colombia which, taken altogether, is a cause for much concern. The Committee of Experts had spoken of an alarmingly violent situation and the Government representative had confirmed the situation. The Committee should examine the case against that background; it was not surprising that in such an unusual situation, problems had arisen in relation to freedom of association: authorities appeared to act arbitrarily, there was a lack of sufficiently precise legal provisions and many of them were not complied with. A number of different laws represented too great a form of intervention into the activities of associations, bureaucratic provisions prevented employers and workers from carrying out their work independently, and restrictions were placed upon the activities of organisations. The Committee of Experts considered that restrictions on the right to strike were too stringent; the Employers did not want to raise the point as they were not in agreement with criteria applied by the Committee of Experts. However, there were clear violations of the Convention and they were very concerned about the situation. The Government representative had recognised that the situation was complex but had given little indication of the possibilities for changing it. The situation did not justify regulations and practices which did not conform with the Convention. The Government had to supply a detailed report and indicate its intentions and the changes it would make. The Committee should continue examining the case and express its concern about the present situation.

The Worker member of Colombia referred to the fact that some governments appeared to consider as an attack on the nation any complaint made by trade unions before the international authorities regarding non-compliance with obligations entered into with the Organisation. He considered that the important factors in this question were the truth of the complaints made and the opening of the dialogue needed to enable labour legislation to progress. He stated that, in giving the workers' representation at the International Labour Conference to the most representative union group, namely the CUT, the Government had merely complied with its duty, not granted any favours. The speaker stated that the Convention was of the greatest importance to the trade union movement and was the result of a century of workers' struggle; it had still not been ratified by some States and was not respected by others, as was the case in his country. He said that in his country trade unions were still being suspended by administrative authority and that this currently affected over 40,000 workers; Decree No. 939 of 1966, which empowered the Ministry of Labour to suspend strikes lasting over 40 days and to order compulsory arbitration, was still in force and was still being applied.

The President of the Republic could suspend a strike if he considered that it threatened the national economy. The speaker observed that, for years, the Committee of Experts had insisted that some amendments be made. He hoped that the consultations with the unions and the employers would be fruitful and that they would result in proposals to improve the application of the Convention by the next session of the national Congress. However, he found this difficult to imagine since agreement had not been possible even on a minimum wage. The speaker referred to the murders of 276 trade unionists and stated that when the president of CUT was murdered in February 1989, the executive of that organisation had started a hunger strike, which had led to discussions being held between the Ministry of Labour and CUT. On the basis of these discussions, the Government had committed itself to protect the trade unionists and to investigate the crimes. In spite of the good will of the President of the Republic, the facts were clear: the headquarters of CUT in el Meta had been blown up and two more trade union leaders had been murdered by paramilitary groups. The situation was very serious, with 276 murdered trade unionists, and 300 death threats. In short, it was very dangerous to be a trade unionist in Colombia. He appealed for the international solidarity of the world's democratic countries to ensure that the efforts made by the President of the Republic should culminate in the unmasking of the murderers.

On the question of the October 1988 strike, he denied that it had been politically motivated; the CUT and CGT had demanded improved living and working conditions for Colombian workers. Three days before the strike, the Government passed emergency decrees which allowed the arrest and dismissal of strikers and the suspension of the trade union centrals. The decrees had been repealed, but the punishment had been maintained. The suspension is still in force, in spite of the fact that all internal appeal channels have been attempted. Finally, he emphasised that the Colombian trade unionist movement was seeking to engage in dialogue with a view to ending the violence, since without peace there could be no progress; it was a peace movement fighting to defend the right to life, liberty and democracy. He concluded by expressing his faith in the assistance the ILO would bring to the Colombian workers, employers and government, in order to reach the necessary agreements.

The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the Government representative's intervention led him to make the following comments on the links between the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Committee. The present Committee is accustomed to dealing with cases on non-application of standards, on which it drew its own conclusions. He emphasised that on many points Colombian labour legislation was diametrically opposed to the Convention, as had been stressed by the Committee of Experts in its report. There was an urgent need for the law to be modified so as to settle the question of the legal personality of trade unions and put law and practice into conformity with the Convention. The persistent refusal to make these amendments was most worrying. A direct contacts mission had taken place in 1988 and the case was examined within the Committee on Freedom of Association. Violations of Convention No. 87 were observed in several countries, but in Colombia not only were limitations placed on the activities of trade unions, but also trade unionists wishing to carry out their functions put their lives in danger. There are limits beyond which one cannot go: with drug-dealers, the complicity of the police and the armed forces, and illegal activities of paramilitary groups – against even the most elevated dialogue is powerless. Nevertheless, the Government is obligated to guarantee the rights of trade unions, grant the right to strike legally and to protect trade unionists against assassination. In a country where violence prevails, the exercise of trade union rights is also in danger. There have been 276 murdered trade unionists; 1,660 people were murdered between May 1988 and April 1989 and 2,000 had "disappeared". Paramilitary groups terrorise most of the country. The Government, which has not been able to stop these terrorist acts and which uses inadequate means in their pursuit of the guilty should therefore not only review its legislation but also its practice. All criminal activities against trade unionists should be prosecuted and sufficient measures taken to conclude the inquiries into these activities. The Government representative's statements did not show much good will in this respect; he merely justified the maintenance of the existing legal situation, this being characterised by interference in the activities of trade unions, limitation on the right to strike, prohibition on strikes by public servants and invocation of Constitutional provisions. Dialogue between members of the present Committee should consist not merely of the expression of points of view and their repetition: progress should also be able to be registered. The speaker joined with the Worker member of Colombia to stress the right of trade unions to supply observations on the situation in their countries. The exercise of this right should not give rise to discrimination. The numerous murders of trade union leaders provoked the horror of civilised people and the solidarity of all trade unions.

A Worker member of Spain stated that the situation in Colombia was so serious that it went beyond the provisions of the Convention. A Government which does not guarantee to its citizens the most fundamental right, the right to life. With reference to the violation of freedom of association and particularly the suspension of trade unions, he emphasised that according to indications by the Committee of Experts, the Government, in October 1988, was to promulgate new decrees ordering suspensions; nothing has been done to improve this situation. He referred to the appendix of the Committee on Freedom of Association's Report, the first of which contained a list of 79 disappeared or murdered unionists, with regard to whom the Government has communicated no information; 18 of these have been murdered in 1989. In the second appendix, there was a list of 180 trade unionists concerning whom the Committee had requested information on the legal investigations which had been undertaken. The speaker asked the Government representative about a disappeared trade unionist and asserted that until the Government responded, the case of Colombia should be the object of a special paragraph as labour laws were merely a dead letter. The Worker member of Venezuela expressed his deep concern for the situation of Colombian workers. He considered that the threat to the right to life merited special attention on the part of the present Committee because, without this fundamental right, no other right can be guaranteed. He emphasised the fact that in the seven months since the meeting of the Committee on Freedom of Association in November 1988, when the assassination of 200 trade unionists was noted, 76 more assassinations had taken place. He felt that this violent process of a dirty war sought to resolve the problem of social justice by repression. He thought it necessary to oppose such a process being adopted as a state policy. He made reference to a declaration made by the President of the Republic of Colombia, as a consequence of the strike of October 1988, in which he referred to the decrees that had been adopted and confirmed that these decrees had fulfilled their objective and had defeated the country's enemies. Such a declaration showed that the President's policy was one of repression and assassination of those who fight to defend their rights. Finally, the speaker expressed his wish that this case be the object of a special paragraph.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom declared that this was a difficult, confusing and horrifying case, filled with savagery and death. In his view, the Government representative of Colombia was confused, as he appeared to be indicating that horror was dealt with by the Committee of Experts and that the present Committee dealt merely with its legalistic aspects. On the contrary, observations by the Committee on Freedom of Association had considerable relevance to the work of the present Committee and many of the points made by the Committee on Freedom of Association had been referred to by the Committee of Experts, notably the one concerning the alarming, violent situation in Colombia which generally made it impossible for normal living conditions to be maintained and prevented the full exercise of trade union activity. This was relevant to the work of the present Committee, as was the litany of martyrs to the trade union cause. If a trade unionist was murdered because of his trade union views, then the murder was relevant to the work of this Committee; indeed, being mentioned in this Committee might amount to the only memorial erected to such a victim. The political situation in Colombia was confused, with drug-traffickers and paramilitary organisations operating freely.

The contrast was inescapable between a government unable to protect the lives of trade unionists or to control paramilitary organisations, but with sufficient strength, control and law to deal with local strikes, general strikes and other trade union activities. The contrast was also relevant to the work of this Committee. There was no doubt whatsoever that Colombia was not in conformity with the Convention. This had been said by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts and by this Committee. Furthermore, this Committee would continue saying so, because it was not satisfied with the presentation of the situation by the Government representative. At the end of his statement, the Worker member of Colombia had expressed his faith in the ILO; the Speaker hoped this faith would remain intact after the decisions taken by this Committee.

The Worker member of Uruguay stated that this case should be distressing to all democratic members of the Committee now that this country had become a world leader in the number of workers murdered. He expressed his agreement with the statement of the Employers' members as concerns the need to put an end to this situation. The speaker expressed his disagreement with the explanations given by the Government representative and regretted the fact that the Government tried to justify itself and its violation of the Convention as well as the attacks against the trade union movement by paramilitary groups and drug-traffickers. He felt that the present Committee should include a special paragraph which, in a clear and precise manner, would explain the situation of violation of trade union rights on the Government so that it might recognise and apply, in practice, these rights so that it would give priority to guaranteeing the right to life.

The Workers' members indicated that registration of a case in a special paragraph does not constitute a formal condemnation but does emphasise the grave nature of a case. Their first concern was for an end to the violence which was annihilating civil liberties and freedom of association and was preventing the operation of justice. Reports of supervisory bodies dealing with the situation in the country could help the Government find solutions. On their side, the industrialised countries should make their contribution by more effectively fighting drug-trafficking, one of the scourges of the country; this had already been noted by the spokesman for the workers before the Governing Body. The conscience and solidarity of the world should be awakened. As far as freedom of association was concerned, workers who engaged in trade union activity found themselves face to face with violence, accused of terrorism, and their activities were described as "perverse"; this had to stop. In spite of the direct contacts mission and the recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association, it was clear that, at present, freedom of association was not respected either in the law or in practice, notably as regards the legal personality of trade unions and strikes, as the Committee of Experts had pointed out. Changes had to be made and measures had to be taken which should result in tripartite consultation and the assistance of the ILO.

The Government representative declared that he had not referred to the comments of the Committee on Freedom of Association due to lack of time and in view of the numerous questions asked by the Committee of Experts; however, his Government was ready to explain both orally and in written form, as it had always done, these crimes which his Government was the first to deplore. His Government was trying to avoid responding with repression to the attacks against democracy that were being made by violent and delinquent opponents; it preferred dialogue and the participation of all interested parties. As regards the situation described in his country, he referred to the multiple causes of the violence, the drug traffic linked with subversive groups both of the extreme right and of the extreme left. He also referred to the need for the control of arms trafficking, although it should be pointed out that the arms were not manufactured in Colombia. He stated that, in certain cases, his Government had recognised the grounds for the complaints which had been presented to the ILO and other international authorities. These were cases of abuse of power but they did not permit one to affirm that violence was organised systematically by the Government; this had been recognised by the Workers' representative before the Governing Body. The speaker also referred to the report of the direct contacts mission which visited Colombia and which had been submitted to the Governing Body; this referred to a state of generalised violence and to the fact that the victims of this violence were also employers, school-teachers, priests, journalists, people from all levels of society, various civil servants, magistrates, judges, the Minister of Justice and the Attorney General. The Workers' members before the Governing Body had asked the Director-General to use his influence to mobilise the United Nations and the specialised agencies in support of the fight against drug-trafficking, which was principally responsible for the current situation in Colombia and he reiterated his Government's interest in supporting all efforts made in this direction.

The Government representative turned to the general strike of October 1988 which had been called by CUT, CGT and other trade union movements. He stated that it was a political strike and not a strike on labour questions; this he could prove by reading from a text published by the "Coordinadora Guerrillera Simon Bolivar", in which this movement had called for military confrontation and for sabotage activity as ways of participating in the political general strike. He also referred to the fact that the same president of CUT had admitted publicly after the strike that terrorists and other violent elements had defeated the strike and he wondered that would have happened if the Government had not taken emergency measures in the face of this particularly abnormal strike.

The speaker also stated that three decrees had been adopted dealing respectively with: the establishment of a committee to fight against the death squads, bands of gunmen and private self-defence groups (Decree No. 813), the establishment of a special armed corps to fight against these groups (Decree No. 814); and Decree No. 815, which suspended the legal provision allowing the Ministry of Defence to issue weapons which are reserved for the exclusive use of the armed forces to civilians and to use the collaboration of private citizens in national defence activities. He also referred to Decree No. 1.194 of 1988 which deals with the dismantling of training camps for hired gunmen and raised the penalties for training gunmen and other related activities. He insisted that the present Committee take into consideration the external factors which were aggravating the situation in his country, in order to undertake an international action against such activities, for example against arms trafficking. Finally, he expressed the hope that the present Committee's conclusions would take into account the efforts made by his Government, which wished a democratic and progressive situation to exist in the country.

The Committee had taken note of the information supplied by the Government representative and the detailed discussions which had taken place within the Committee. The Committee noted with profound concern the comments made by the Committee of Experts, which spoke of the persistence of a number of grave divergences between, on the one hand, law and practice and, on the other hand, the provisions of the Convention. It recalled on this score the questions that had been raised by the Committee of Experts over many years. The Committee took note with interest of the report of the direct contacts mission that had travelled to Colombia in September 1988 and of the grave concern of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee requested the Government to take all necessary measures to bring the law and practice fully into line with the requirements of the Convention, inter alia, in attempting to reintroduce a situation propitious to the full exercise of civil liberties and accordingly the freedom of association and to guarantee the physical safety of trade unionists. The Committee wished to request the Government to hold tripartite consultations and recalled to it the possibility of having resort to the ILO's assistance. The Committee expressed the most sincere hope that the Government would be able to report next year on substantial progress achieved in this field in view of the importance and the gravity of the situation. The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph in its report.

The Government representative stated that his Government respected the conclusions of the Committee, to the point of abstaining from any intervention in their adoption, as he respected the legal belief that you could not be the judge in your own case. However, he wished it to be noted that his Government considered that in the conclusions, greater consideration should have been taken of the efforts made by his Government to fight violence by all the extremist groups and its determination to apply the international labour Conventions as best as possible. Finally, he referred to the difficult economic context which hindered the application of these standards in developing countries.

Czechoslovakia (ratification: 1964). A Government representative stated that in his country trade union unity came into existence spontaneously, long before the present legislation came into force. Furthermore, Law No. 74 of 1973 provided specifically that trade unions may be set up freely, without previous authorisation which is otherwise required for setting up associations of other types. No attempt has been made by the workers to establish trade union organisations other than the existing one. This fact, and the nearly universal membership of the workers in the revolutionary trade union movement led to the conclusion that the existing trade union movement in his country corresponded with the wish of the workers and these wishes, in turn, were respected by the Government.

Moreover the Committee of Experts pointed out that, in spite of the absence of legislative restrictions concerning other trade union organisations, the very fact that the revolutionary trade union movement was referred to by name in the Constitution and other legislation, and that the Labour Code granted extensive powers to this organisation, led to the conclusion that, in a strictly legal sense, Article 2 of the Convention was not fully applied.

His Government had expressed in its written reports its willingness to amend the legislation should a new, strong trade union organisation be set up. It was difficult for his Government, however, to propose a major change, when the law completely covers the existing needs and the party concerned, the existing trade union organisation, resists the change. Amendments were made to the Labour Code in relation to the provisions of the law on state enterprises. The amended Labour Code was recently sent to the ILO. In the amended sections of the Code, the reference to the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement by name was consistently replaced by the general reference to the "respective trade union body". Reference to the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement remained unchanged, however, in certain other sections.

The case was not considered settled. The Government called attention to the profound changes that took place or were expected to take place in the Czechoslovak economic system. Those changes would lead to greater independence of enterprises, and it could be expected that changes in the present pattern of industrial relations would follow. Further and possibly more profound amendments to the labour legislation would have to be made and this would be the right occasion to examine once again, with a fresh outlook, the present provisions concerning the special status of the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement. The speaker assured the present Committee that the Government remained committed to the obligations undertaken by the ratification of Convention No. 87.

The Employers' members stated that the opportunity for trade unionism pluralism was a fundamental principle of the Convention. It was not surprising that only one trade union existed given the constitutional provision which expressly stated that the only trade union organisation to be recognised was the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement. The amendments to the Labour Code at best appeared to be an attempt to address the concerns of freedom of association indirectly, rather than directly stating that more than one trade union could exist in the country. Nothing had been said by the Government representative concerning the right to organise for members of collective farms. Since the Government's position, at least as reflected in the Committee of Experts' report, was that there was no obstacle to the right to organise for co-operative farmers, it was requested to communicate the provision which ensured that right. Since Czechoslovakia ratified this Convention some 25 years ago, it was urged and commended to change the legal situation.

The Workers' members stated that the fact that the dialogue continued was a good thing in itself but that the situation was not yet satisfactory. Workers do not love compulsory pluralism, nor obligatory unity. It was, therefore, not very likely that the Czechoslovakian workers would not form organisations of their choice if they had a real possibility to do so. The Workers' members shared the opinion of the Committee of Experts that the possibility of forming organisations of their own choice did not exist for Czechoslovakian workers. What are the legal provisions or regulations providing the right of freedom of association for members of collective farms? It had been stated that new texts were adopted. It was also necessary to hope that the Committee of Experts would be able to examine them and that we would be in a position to note progress, because at present, Czechoslovakia had not fully and correctly applied Convention No. 87.

The Government representative of Czechoslovakia, in response to observations made by the Employers' members and the Workers' members, stated that trade union monopoly was not imposed. By virtue of an Act adopted in the beginning of the 1950s, the formation of all associations had to be authorised by the Ministry of the Interior, who also had to approve the statutes. By virtue of another Act, however, adopted following the dialogue with the Committee of Experts, the general provisions of the Act on associations did not apply to trade unions. Consequently, trade unions could be created without prior authorisation. At issue before this Committee was the special status of the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement derived from the Labour Code, and to a certain degree, the Constitution. This special status effectively poses a problem, because the creation of other organisations is impeded. The Government is, however, looking for a solution. It is difficult to propose profound changes in the legislation in force because, as the national debates concerning the amendments of the Labour Code can prove, the special status of the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement is not called into question by anyone.

With regard to the freedom of association workers in agriculture, of members of collective farms, it was necessary to explain the difference between collective farms and state farms. The members of collective farms are affiliated to the Union of Collective Farmers, which is not a full fledged trade union because its statute was approved by the state authority. The Union defends in a satisfactory fashion the interests of its members. This union is not affiliated to the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement. As concerns the members of state farms, their status is identical to that of other workers, and although they are free to create their own organisation, they have not expressed that wish and prefer to join the Revolutionary Trade Union Movement.

The Committee took note of the remarks made in the Committee of Experts' report, as well as the explanations provided by the Government representative. The Committee recalled that the Committee of Experts, and the Conference Committee itself, had examined the question of trade union monopoly, which is in contradiction with the provisions of Convention No. 87, for a number of years. Furthermore, the Committee noted the absence of freedom of association of members of collective farms.

The Committee regretted that no changes had yet been made with a view to implementing Convention No. 87. The Committee considered that it was time for measures to be taken in order to amend the relevant legislation and that the Government should report as soon as possible the progress made in this area.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1956). The Government has sent the following information:

In the Dominican Republic, workers and employers have the right to establish the organisations of their choice without any distinction whatsoever and without previous authorisation, as well as the right to affiliate to such organisations, subject only to observance of the statutes of these organisations. The Government respects freedom of association fully and without restrictions as an expression of the right of association which is enshrined in the Constitution of the Republic.

As concerns the comments of the Committee of Experts on section 265 of the Labour Code, the Government reiterates that this provision, which excludes from the application of the Code workers in agricultural undertakings employing no more than ten workers, does not imply restrictions on their trade union rights, because of the undeniable possibility of forming or joining occupational unions under section 294 of the Code, and because the minimum legal number for forming a workers' union (at the undertaking level) is 20 members in accordance with section 292 of the Code.

The Government reiterates that in practice certain categories of public employees, in particular in decentralised, semi-autonomous and autonomous state bodies, have formed unions at the undertaking or occupational level. This has occurred in, for instance, the Electricity Corporation, the Water and Sewage Corporation of Santo Domingo, and the state undertakings, as well as in the autonomous University of Santo Domingo, and unions of doctors, nurses, and dock workers, among others. Public employees enjoy the right to belong to unions connected with their occupations or offices, so long as they observe the provisions of the relevant national legislation. Nevertheless, the labour authorities are examining the possibility of inserting in the national legislation certain specific limitations on the right to organise of public officials involved in high-level management or decision-making, so long as this is in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention. Whatever changes may be made in this respect will immediately be communicated to the International Labour Organisation.

In the public sector, unions exist in the semi-autonomous, autonomous and decentralised bodies of the State; and in some centralised bodies there are provisions in legislation or regulations which facilitate the establishment of organisations for special categories of workers (doctors, nurses, teachers, engineers, etc.). The public officials and support staff of centralised institutions do not belong to workers' or employers' organisations within these bodies, as they are affiliated to organisations for special categories of workers (professional associations, etc.) in accordance with their individual and social rights laid down in the country's Constitution and laws. The labour relations of these workers are regulated by special laws.

The legal provisions which refer to the suspension or dissolution of workers' and employers' organisations were adopted under Title VIII (sections 352 to 356) of the chapter of the Labour Code concerning trade unions. In no case can a workers' or employers' organisation be dissolved or suspended by an administrative decision.

The right of affiliation to higher-level organisations is not limited or infringed in any way by the labour authorities.

As concerns the exercise of the right to strike, the unions enjoy full freedom in this respect so long as they observe the relevant provisions of the legislation. In most cases collective conflicts are resolved through the mechanisms of mediation and arbitration in order to avoid damage to the national economy and harming public order and civil peace. In addition, there are no restrictions whatsoever on exercise of the right to sympathy strikes so long as the initial strike which is being supported was legal.

The labour authorities are evaluating the possibility of amending section 374(3) of the Labour Code in order to reduce to a simple majority the number of workers in an undertaking necessary to declare a strike. Another possible amendment would remove transport in general from the list of permanent public services. The possibility is also being examined of reintroducing to the legislature a preliminary draft to repeal section 265 of the Labour Code, which has been introduced on several occasions but has encountered various obstacles. Another reform is being considered, which would guarantee fully the stability in their jobs in undertakings, of workers who are administrators of trade unions.

In addition, the national authorities have noted the suggestion of the Committee of Experts that the prohibition of political strikes be limited so that workers may come out on strike in protest against state economic and social policies which they consider to be contrary to their interests, it being understood that the main objective of unions should be to ensure the economic and social development and well-being of all workers, while respecting the Constitution of the Republic, the labour legislation and internal security.

The Government refers to cases of violation of freedom of association and the right to organise, alleged in the observations which the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) presented to the ILO in communications of 3 and 31 January 1989. The Government reaffirms its comments made in reply to these allegations and transmitted officially to the ILO in April and May of this year.

The labour authorities have noted carefully all of the suggestions made by the Committee of Experts, with a view to adopting the necessary measures to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention as soon as possible.

Ecuador (ratification: 1967). A Government representative referred to the fact that in accordance with Ecuador's democratic traditions a new Government had been elected in early 1988, and had taken office in August 1988. The new Government had studied the observations which had been formulated by the supervisory bodies of the ILO in previous years. It wanted to satisfy all of the requests which were reasonably compatible with the national interest. Consequently, three legislative decrees had been sent to Congress, all of which were designed to deal with matters raised by the ILO. The President of the Republic had also approved an Executive Decree which was intended to achieve the same objective.

One of the draft decrees consisted of an interpretation of Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967 concerning collective work stoppages. This new decree makes it clear that the 1967 measure does not apply in any way to collective stoppages at work, and that it did not prohibit workers the exercise of their rights to strike or organise – both of which were guaranteed by the Constitution of Ecuador.

Turning to the other comments of the Committee of Experts, the speaker indicated that public servants did have the right to associate and freely to elect their representatives. Their associations were not called trade unions, but they did exist.

It was logical that the members of the executive committees of works councils should be of Ecuadorian nationality. It was also logical that works councils should be dissolved if their membership fell below 25 per cent of the total number of workers at the workplace, because in such circumstances it would no longer be representative of the workers. Studies were under way in order to finalise the Government's positions on these matters.

The proposals which were put forward by the direct contacts mission in 1985 should be examined cautiously. It was especially difficult to criticise the legislative provisions which prohibited the religious or political activities by trade unions. These provisions had profound systemic and organic meaning in Ecuador. They had emerged out of intense political and religious struggles which had bloodied the country for many years. The Government did not wish to see this situation recur in the future. The Constitution permitted full political and religious freedom. Trade unionists were free to worship in their churches, and to fight politically within their parties. However, it was necessary to keep both religion and politics out of trade union affairs. The Government hoped that the present Committee and the Committee of Experts would respect national sensibilities in relation to this matter.

Referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts on the need for legislation protecting workers against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment, his Government did not understand what this observation meant. He referred to various provisions of the Labour Code which were intended to protect workers in various contexts. He called upon the Committee of Experts to indicate precisely what changes they wanted to see implemented in this area.

Turning to the comments sent to the Committee of Experts by the Ecuatorian Confederation of Class Organisations (CEDOC), he stated that comments sent on 22 January 1988 had nothing to do with the present Government. It was inopportune, therefore, for the Committee of Experts to refer to these comments in their report. If CEDOC believed that their comments were still relevant this organisation should indicate which cases they wished to denounce.

In relation to the delegation to officials of a lower category of the power to refuse to register workers' organisations, he pointed out that there had to be some delegation of authority in a complex administration. The Constitution provided that the different ministries should deal with different topics. The Labour Code expressly empowered the Labour Directorate to deal with a range of issues including occupational health and safety, minimum wages, social services and labour organisation. It followed that there was nothing improper in the fact that officials in the Directorate dealt with matters pertaining to labour organisations.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom thanked the Government representative for his detailed statement on the state of the law and on the legislative changes envisaged. He declared, nevertheless, that it would have been more helpful if this information could have been provided to the Committee of Experts.

The Committee of Experts had said that since 1985 there had been no indication that the Government had taken any measures to implement the proposals made to the Government by the direct contacts mission. The Government representative said that he looked to the present Committee for advice. All the necessary advice was contained in the report of the mission, which had been agreed with the Ministry of Labour in the country. The present Committee wanted the Government to indicate that it intended to make these changes as soon as possible. The speaker observed that the Government representative said that public servants had the right to organise and to elect their representatives. However, this did not grant to civil servants a right to form or join the union of their choice in full freedom. He asked the Government representative to give an assurance, and to provide evidence to the Committee of Experts to the effect that public servants would be allowed to join unions of their own choosing, and that they would be treated in no way differently from other workers in this regard.

The Workers' members said that in 1985 a direct contacts mission had taken place because of problems which had been observed in previous years in relation to trade union freedoms as embodied in this Convention. They had hoped that after the direct contacts mission they would see appropriate changes to the legislation – for example, in relation to the right to organise public servants and the administrative dissolution of trade unions. The present Committee had waited for two years after the mission in order to see what would happen. By 1987 nothing had happened, and the report of the present Committee for that year contained a long special paragraph relating to Conventions Nos. 87 and 105. The Workers' members had hoped that they would see real change – especially after lengthy discussions in the Committee, involving the Vice-Minister of Labour. Yet today, the present Committee was faced with exactly the same situation. The Workers' members had heard a speech which contained vague promises, but still nothing had been done. They considered that this lack of progress over many years suggested to the Committee a case of continued default in application of the Convention. The Workers' members expressed their hope to hear more positive responses from the Government. They expressed the hope that the discussion would elicit more concrete proposals from the Government representative.

The Employers' members agreed that there had been no progress in this case, and perhaps there had even been movement in the opposite direction. They noted that the Committee of Experts had dealt with six problems areas. The Government representative had not addressed any of them, nor had he indicated that any changes were going to be made in relation to them. A direct contacts mission had taken place in 1985. It had suggested appropriate legislation solutions. It now appeared that these were not being considered in any realistic way. The present Committee now finds itself in the same position as in 1987 and 1988. The Government, in fact, showed no real will to correct any of the deficiencies that had been identified. It talked in terms of incursions upon national sovereignty; when it ratified an ILO Convention, it undertook an obligation to meet the requirements of that Convention. That had not been done in this case.

The Government member of Venezuela felt that it was important to take account of the democratic context of the country. It had a long democratic tradition, and there was undeniably an atmosphere of freedom. Some of the cases with which the present Committee had to deal were far more serious than this one. He understood the Committee's impatience because of the delay in implementing the recommendations of the direct contacts mission. However, it was necessary to bear in mind that there was a new Government in Ecuador, and that it was important to try to maintain dialogue with that Government.

The Workers' members put five specific questions to the Government representative: (1) Did the draft legislation exist in written form? (2) Where had the draft texts been presented within the country? (3) Had the texts been sent to the ILO for scrutiny by the Committee of Experts? Was the Government going to do so? (4) Did the draft laws respond to the proposals formulated by the direct contacts mission to bring the law into full conformity with the Convention? (5) Did the draft laws respond to the specific comments which had been made over a number of years and which were repeated in the report of the Committee of Experts this year?

These were precise questions and if the Government was able to provide precise answers then it would be possible to continue a dialogue.

The Government representative indicated that the draft decrees had been submitted by the President of the Republic to the relevant legislative body – that is the Congress – for proclamation as a law. The Executive Decree had been sent, with presidential endorsement, to the relevant minister in charge of implementation. He had the relevant texts with him, and would immediately hand them to the Secretariat.

The Workers' members noted that this constituted a partial reply to their question. The Government representative had not indicated whether the text corresponded with those agreed with the direct contacts mission. Since there was a formal promise to submit the documents to the Secretariat for examination by the Committee of Experts, they were prepared to be patient for one more year. They believed that the Committee's observations should be contained in a special paragraph, but there should not be any reference to continued default in application of the Convention.

The Workers' members proposed that the conclusions should be included in a special paragraph.

The Employers' members expressed some hesitation at the use of a special paragraph because there had been one small step taken in good faith to resolve the situation.

The Workers' members pointed out that special paragraphs were not used to condemn governments, but rather to show that the Committee had discussed an important issue. Furthermore, there had been a special paragraph in 1987. It would have been possible to have gone further on this occasion, but the Workers' members noted that there was some hope that the draft legislation would contain satisfactory responses. This should be reflected in the conclusions.

The Employers' members agreed to the Workers' proposal subject to this reformulation.

The Government member of Venezuela was concerned that a number of more serious cases of violations were not being recorded in a special paragraph; in the present report of the Committee, one might be led to conclude that the Committee applied dual standards in dealing with cases before it.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee recalled that the direct contacts mission of 1985 had, in agreement with the Government, prepared draft amendments designed to remove a serious disparity between the legislation and the provisions of the Convention and in order to give effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts.

The Committee noted with satisfaction that the draft legislation would be transmitted for examination by the Committee of Experts and expressed the hope that these drafts contained solutions to the existing points of difficulty or divergence from the Convention.

The Committee took note of the assurances provided by the Government that these draft amendments would be implemented as soon as possible in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to show proof of progress in the application of the Convention by next year.

The Committee decided that its conclusions should appear in a special paragraph.

Greece (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information.

(a) Collection of trade union dues

With regard to the collection of trade union dues, it should be recalled that the proposals made by the General Confederation of Labour of Greece (CGTG), mentioned in the Government's statement to the Conference Committee in 1987, had not resolved the problem, since the proposals had called for a Temporary Executive Decree to set a compulsory, fixed amount of dues; this would have robbed the parties concerned of their right to fix such an amount freely, as for example by collective bargaining.

Since the Government could not consider adopting an Executive Decree of this type, it then addressed a new letter to the most representative organisations to ask for their viewpoints on an other plan for a decree. Up to now, the CGTG has not made any observations on this. Following the 25th Panhellenic Congress of the CGTG and the naming of an administration representing all trade union sectors, the Minister of Labour once again, on 27 April 1988, requested the new CGTG administration to submit observations as quickly as possible. As soon as the Government has received these observations, it will draw up a final version and issue the Executive Decree, in order to find a final resolution the problem of trade union dues deductions. The Government will keep the Committee informed of developments on this issue.

(b) Seafarers

As to freedom of association for seafarers, the Minister of Merchant Shipping, who has been given the task of democratising the trade union movement, has set up a special commission which has drawn up a Bill on democratisation of the seafarers' trade union movement and the strengthening of their freedom of association. The Bill was communicated some time ago to the interested parties in an effort to learn their views. Following reminders by the competent branch of the Merchant Shipping Ministry, the two principal organisations (the Greek Shipowners' Union, EEE, and the Panhellenic Maritime Federation, PNO) sent their replies, which are now being examined.

(c) Clause restricting the right to strike

In regard to the Committee of Experts' observation which refers to the amendment of section 4 of Act No. 1365 of 1983, the Government points out that this section was repealed by section 1 of Act No. 1766 of 1989 concerning repeal of section 4 of Act No. 1365 of 1983 (Official Gazette, No. 61, Part A, of 4 April 1989). This section having been repealed, the specific provisions on labour disputes, and therefore the period of notice for strikes, have been suspended and the organisations of workers employed in socialised enterprises should henceforth follow the procedures set forth in the general provisions of sections 19 to 22 of Act No. 1264 of 1982.

Haiti (ratification: 1979). A Government representative, the Minister of Social Affairs, noted that the Committee of Experts had raised a number of specific issues including: the necessity of obtaining Government approval to establish an association of more than 20 members; the wide powers conferred on the Government to supervise the affairs of trade unions; restrictions on strikes; and the need to accord statutory recognition to the right to organise of civil servants. He also referred to Case No. 1396 which had been examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1988. The Committee of Experts had also referred to the powers of the Service of Social Organisations to intervene in the preparation of collective bargaining agreements.

He reminded the present Committee that it was not dealing with a new situation which had arisen in the last three years, but rather with the heritage of the last thirty years. This included serious problems in relation to the behaviour of the social partners, especially employers. Furthermore, a number of laws needed to be amended in order to ensure compliance with the Convention. The speaker recognised, for example, that there were inconsistencies between the Labour Code and international labour standards. That was part of why the Government had asked the ILO for assistance in 1988. It was necessary to provide training not just for workers and trade union leaders but also for employers in view of the problems which were the product of the previous 30 years. He thanked the ILO for its assistance with seminars for workers and missions for employers. These had made a major contribution to the development of industrial relations in Haiti.

The points raised by the Committee of Experts had been taken into account in the preparation of a draft Labour Code, which had been sent to the ILO for comments. This revision had also taken account of the comments of the present Committee. The draft was much more in harmony with international labour standards in relation to the right to strike, the right to organise and other matters.

In 1988, his Government had asked the ILO to organise a tripartite seminar on international labour standards and labour law in Haiti. It had thought at the time that this would enable it finally to harmonise its legislation with ratified Conventions. Unfortunately, for reasons beyond its control it had not been possible to hold the seminar. His Government hoped that the seminar would take place later this year or early next year.

In recent months a National Tripartite Committee had been established at the initiative of his Government. This Committee was authorised to look at the range of social and labour questions, and also had the authority to deal with litigation in industrial matters without the need for reference to a labour tribunal. He saw this as a sign of progress in Haiti, particularly in view of events of the last 30 years. A mission of the ILO visited Haiti in October 1988. This mission had seen for itself the progress which had been made in relation to these matters.

Referring to section 236 of the Penal Code which makes necessary obtaining prior approval of the Government for constituting organisations of more than 20 members, the Government proposed to amend this provision as part of a reform of the entire Penal Code. That revision was in turn part of an attempt at general democratisation in Haiti.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for what they considered to be a remarkable statement. Despite the enormous difficulties with which the country was faced, the present Committee was impressed by the Government's very positive action. The situation still had not been fully corrected, but the progress which had been made showed the positive results which could flow from discussion before this present Committee. The Government representative outlined the major problem areas, and draft legislation had been prepared. They were encouraged by developments and urged the Government to persevere in its endeavours.

The Worker member of the United States agreed with the Employers' members in relation to the difficult environment within which recent developments had taken place. He expressed understanding of the problems confronting the Government and was encouraged by its progress so far. He asked the Government to indicate what steps had been taken to secure the reinstatement of trade unionists who had been dismissed in the course of the suppression of unions which took place in 1987. He hoped that in the context of a review of national legislation account would be taken of the comments of the Committee of Experts concerning the establishment of organisations without prior authorisation, the control of organisations by Government, the prohibition of strikes, the right of public servants to organise, limitation of government interference in collective bargaining, and legislative protection against anti-union discrimination as required by Convention No. 98.

The Government member of the United States recalled that in 1988 she had expressed her concern and astonishment at the unusually strong language which the Committee of Experts had used to describe the situation in Haiti, and at the apparent lack of progress on the part of the Government in resolving them. This year, in contrast, the Committee of Experts had noted with interest the progress that had been made in relation to drafting of a new Labour Code. This was a tribute to the goodwill of the Government and to the value of ILO technical assistance.

The Workers' members recalled past difficulties in discussing the situation in Haiti in the present Committee. Without being naive, they believed that a new era had begun. They emphasised that making criticisms in individual cases was intended to encourage dialogue to improve the situation.

They hoped that it would be possible to arrive at an agreement with the Dominican Republic to overcome difficulties associated with the migration of Haitian workers to that country.

They confirmed that the mission which had visited Haiti had indeed had contact with relevant interest groups. They also referred to an ILO mission which was currently examining the possibilities for establishing a social security system.

They looked forward to legislative changes which could reflect the changes in practice which had already occurred. Mutual association, trade unions and co-operatives were already functioning freely in the country. They hoped that such bodies would be able to co-operate not just to press their sectional demands, important as the standard of living was, but that they would also seek to improve the economic status of the country.

They expressed two final wishes. First, they wanted to see legislative action in the near future to bring the law into conformity with the requirements of ratified Conventions. Secondly, they hoped to see the development of a system of genuine tripartism within which the parties could engage in constructive dialogue for progress. To this end they appealed to Haitian employers and international employer organisations to co-operate in good faith to bring about further improvements in addition to those which were already on the way.

The Government representative said that the Government had examined the issue of the trade unionists who had been dismissed in 1987, and had now submitted it to the National Tripartite Committee so that they could intervene with employers and come up with recommendations. It was in order to deal with such cases, together with other social and industrial problems, that the Committee had been established in the first place.

The 1987 Constitution granted the right of public servants to form and join trade unions. Teachers, doctors and nurses had already exercised this right, which was also accorded express recognition in the draft Labour Code.

The speaker expressed particular thanks to Workers' and Employers' representatives who had intervened in the discussion. They had expressed understanding of the problems associated with his country's emergence from a long period of dictatorship in a context of profound economic, social and political crisis. He also thanked the present Committee for their appreciation of social problems such as high levels of unemployment and the migration of workers towards the Dominican Republic. Even though his Government had already benefitted from the assistance of the ILO, they would profit from further co-operation in relation to matters such as social security, industrial relations, and vocational training. He hoped that the proposed tripartite seminar would enable the Government finally to effect the harmonisation of its legislation with international labour Conventions.

The Committee has examined the questions connected with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 on the basis of the report of the Committee of Experts and of the report and recommendation of the Committee on Freedom of Association. It has also taken note of the results of the ILO mission. The Committee takes into account the detailed explanations given by the Government representative of Haiti. According to this information, the many obstacles hitherto placed in the way of freedom of association should be removed in close co-operation with the ILO and a tripartite national committee. In these circumstances the Committee hopes that the long-lasting discrepancies which exist between the Convention and the legislative and practical situation in the country will be removed as soon as possible and the Committee expresses the hope that the Government of Haiti will continue its efforts to this end and will inform the ILO of further progress.

Japan (ratification: 1965). The Government has sent the following information:

The right to organise of fire defence personnel

In Japan, the tripartite committee (the Convention Subcommittee of the Round-Table Conference on Labour Problems); in which the most representative trade unions in Japan, SOHYO and DOMEI, were represented, deliberated on this question prior to the ratification of the Convention, and, in 1958, it unanimously reached full agreement to confirm that "it is considered appropriate that the function of the fire defence personnel in Japan can be interpreted as being included in the category of the function of the police as referred to in the Convention, judging from their historical development and the existing legal system".

In addition, it was confirmed by the ILO prior to Japan's ratification of the Convention that the function of fire defence agencies in Japan should be assimilated to that of the police, since the Committee on Freedom of Association deliberated twice, in 1954 and in 1961, on this issue in connection with the trade union's allegations concerning the right to organise in cases Nos. 60 and 179, and on both occasions recommended to the Governing Body that it should decide that those allegations did not call for further examination on the ground that the services of fire defence agencies in Japan were included in "the police and certain services assimilated thereto" (paragraphs 33-36 of the 12th Report, and paragraph 94 of the 54th Report of the Committee).

On the basis of the tripartite consensus at the national level and the confirmation by the ILO with regard to the prohibition on organisation of personnel of fire defence agencies in Japan as mentioned above, Japan concluded that they are included in the police referred to in Article 9 of the Convention, and ratified the Convention in 1965. The Japanese Government, as the government of a State that ratified the Convention, has maintained this interpretation consistently and repeated the view that the prohibition on organisation of fire defence personnel in Japan does not constitute a violation of ILO Convention No. 87.

From these viewpoints, the Government considers that the treatment of the prohibition on organisation of fire defence personnel in Japan is a domestic issue and a matter to be determined by national laws and regulations on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention. Based on this understanding, the Government authorities concerned have been exchanging opinions on occasions with workers' organisations concerned, and the Inter-Ministerial Conference on Public Employees' Problems has also received opinions from fire defence personnel directly as well as the representatives of organisations concerned, including those of workers' organisations. (I-3-(1) of the "Reports on the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98" dated February 1985, (Reference material) (b) and (c) of I-2 of the "Observations of the Government of Japan regarding the comments of SOHYO, DOMEI and others on the application of ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98" dated February 1986, (Reference material) (b) and (d) of I-2 of the "Observations of the Government of Japan regarding the comments of SOHYO and DOMEI on the application of ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98" dated January 1987.)

Moreover, the Government is now in the course of hearing opinions from members of the volunteer fire corps (volunteers who perform calamity defence activities such as fire fighting, patrolling, etc. in co-operation with fire defence personnel; their total number is about 1,010,000). In the process of hearing so far, the workers' organisations concerned have expressed the opinion that the right to organise should be given to fire defence personnel, but, on the other hand, the National Prefectural Governors' Association, the Japan Association of City Mayors, the National Association of Headmen of Towns and Villages, the National Fire Brigade Chiefs Conference, and the Japan Fire Services Association expressed opposite opinions.

The Government has been examining this issue as a domestic matter. In future, the relevant public authorities will hold on occasions discussions with the appropriate workers' organisations, and the Inter-Ministerial Conference on Public Employees' Problems will hear opinions from members of volunteer fire corps. Furthermore, taking account of the fact that in November this year a unified organisation will be formed comprising unions in the public sector and Rengo (the confederation of trade unions in the private sector which was formed in November 1987), the Government will once again hear opinions from relevant workers' organisations at the completion of hearings at the Inter-Ministerial Conference on Public Employees' Problems.

In addition, a Government representative of Japan, firstly, took up the question of the right to organise of fire defence personnel. The reply of the Government to the observations by the Committee of Experts on this question had already been submitted in writing to the Office. He requested that the written reply and his remarks would be put in the record of the Committee. For reasons repeatedly made known to the present Committee, and stated in the above-mentioned reply, the Government considered that the prohibition of organisation of fire defence personnel did not constitute a violation of ILO Convention No. 87. This question had been examined as a domestic issue. The relevant government authorities had been discussing and exchanging opinions from time to time with workers' organisations. Direct opinions from fire defence personnel, as well as representatives of the relevant organisations concerned, including the workers' organisations, were heard at the Inter-Ministerial Conference on Public Employees' Problems. The Government was in the course of listening to members of volunteer fire corps who perform fire defence activities in close collaboration with fire defence personnel. From now on, too, the Government considering this to be a domestic matter, would continue, through the relevant authorities, to exchange opinions with relevant workers' organisations and also would hear opinions from members of the volunteer fire corps at the Inter-Ministerial Conference on Public Employees' Problems. Furthermore, taking into account the current evolution of circumstances that later this year in November there would be a unified labour organisation formed by the trade unions in the public sector as well as the private sector, the Government would once again listen to the relevant workers' organisations. Secondly, as concerns the sanctions applied for having engaged in strikes, the report of the Committee of Experts referred to the prohibition of strikes by public employees in Japan and the sanctions applied to those who have violated the prohibition. The present Committee had restated its previous view. In Japan, national and local public employees were prohibited by law from engaging in strikes. The laws concerned had been repeatedly upheld by the Supreme Court as being constitutional. It was quite natural that a constitutional State applied sanctions to those who had violated the laws in an appropriate way in accordance with the laws. On this point, the Government was fully aware of the ILO's established view that the application of disproportionate sanctions did not favour the development of harmonious relations. The speaker stated that his Government would continue to deal in a proper manner with this question.

A Worker member of Japan stated that the question of the right to organise for Japanese fire-fighters had been the subject of discussion in the present Committee for many years. He recalled the opportunity given him to speak on this subject in this Committee in 1973. No progress had since been achieved at the national level, despite the repeated and consistent recommendations and the conclusions of this Committee to accord the right to organise to fire-fighters.

He expressed his disappointment with the written reply supplied by the Government. The so-called agreement between the Government and trade unions referred to in the first paragraph of the Government's written reply was a distortion. The Government representative introduced this agreement for the first time during the discussion in this Committee two years ago. This statement about an agreement was neither fair nor honest. The report of the Convention Subcommittee of the Round-Table Conference on Labour Problems was drafted and presented to the Minister of Labour by the Chairman of this subcommittee on his own behalf and without any sign that it was adopted by the subcommittee itself. In any event, the question of the fire-fighters was not the subject of major discussion in the subcommittee because it was not at issue.

The subcommittee was not an authoritative tripartite body, but it was an informal council only answerable to the Minister of Labour in which trade union representatives were a small minority. The said council worked on an ad hoc basis and existed only a short period before the ratification of Convention No. 87.

Furthermore, no action was taken on the said report and it was almost forgotten until the Government started to use it in this Committee. He expressed great doubt that such an agreement was ever reached, since it was 30 years ago, well before his time. He would not challenge it here, but preferred to present overriding facts which were indisputable. Firstly, such an agreement was never reported to the Parliament when ratification of Convention No. 87 was discussed only three or four years later. On the contrary, Parliament ratified Convention No. 87 in 1964 without any hesitation and established a statutory tripartite council for the purpose of securing conformity of the public service employment system with the Convention. A number of outstanding issues, including the right of fire-fighters to organise was specifically referred to this council. Official minutes and the report of the council published by the Government themselves showed clearly that the workers' representatives on the council unanimously insisted on the right to organise for the fire-fighters. This crystal clear fact ran squarely counter to what the Government stated in the written reply. The Government, however, did not change its position; therefore the council had to conclude its work without an agreement in this regard. That was the position in the late 1960s, ten years after the so-called agreement quoted by the Government.

There has been no agreement between the Government and the trade union even since. For this reason, the case had to be brought to the ILO for examination by the supervisory machinery. If there was any agreement with the Government, such course of action would have been redundant.

The Government presented another distorted picture by saying that the Committee on Freedom of Association admitted the position of the Government which assimilated the fire-fighters with the police. The case quoted on this point had no direct connection in this regard. It was a case brought by the Japanese postal workers' union concerning their freedom of association. That case was also concluded some 30 years ago when the question of the trade union rights of fire-fighters in Japan was not yet an issue.

The case of the fire-fighters became a hotly debated issue in the late 1960s and the fire-fighters themselves started to organise only in the early 1970s. The complaints directly related to this question were lodged with the ILO by the Municipal Workers' Union (JICHIRO) which tried to help fire-fighters in their efforts to organise. In 1974 the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association concluded the case by clearly stating that fire-fighters cannot be excluded from the scope of the Convention.

The Government representative in his statement underlined ongoing discussions in the Government on the national level. The Government, however, only invited organisations of their own unilateral choice. When the trade union representative went to see the authority concerned to ask for consultation with the union, these brief meetings and conversations counted as consultations in the reply.

Regrettably, there has been no partnership with trade unions in the exercises reported by the Government as "consultation" or "hearing". There has been no consultation even on the procedure adopted by the Government. Most of the so-called organisations invited by the Government for hearings are governmental or semi-governmental organisations, such as the Governors' Council and the Mayors' Council. An association directly engaged in organising fire-fighters has never been invited.

The Association of Fire-Fighters was formed in 1976 to represent the voice and aspirations of 130,000 full-time personnel, all of them public employees. This organisation was not recognised and has been prevented from having any access to the Government and their employer. It requested that the right to organise be assured for fire-fighters, but emphasised that the right to strike was not being sought. Fire-fighters were fully aware of the heavy social responsibility in carrying out an essential service to the public, and would probably not hesitate to accept restrictions on the right to strike when the right to organise was granted.

The Workers' members stated that this case was a very serious one because it involved the violation of one of the most basic of all human rights Conventions and because of the excessive length of time which had elapsed without any action taken by the Government to comply with its obligation. This was an international obligation, not simply a domestic concern. The Workers' members wished to focus upon the issue raised in the Government's written reply concerning the Government's reliance on the confirmation, allegedly given by the Committee on Freedom of Association, of its position that fire-fighters should be considered as part of the police and thus excluded from the scope of Convention No. 87. In 1987 the Employers' members expressed concern in the present Committee that some of the facts concerning the conclusions made by the Committee on Freedom of Association were not quite clear. By way of explanation, the question of fire-fighting personnel was not an issue in the cases in 1954 and 1961 which were relied upon by the Government. The Government simply explained its custom and practice with regard to fire-fighting personnel in the context of the "Dreyer Commission" inquiry into the multiple problems involved in the public sector in Japan. Convention No. 87 had not been ratified at that time, and therefore no detailed information was provided concerning the right to organise for fire-fighting personnel. The Committee on Freedom of Association, therefore, merely noted the Government's statements.

In 1973, however, following Japan's ratification of Convention No. 87 in 1965, the Committee of Experts, after examining reports from Japan in response to its direct request for information on fire-fighting personnel, concluded that the fire services were not in fact formally assimilated with the police and determined that this category of workers had the right to organise pursuant to the guarantees of the Convention.

Moreover, in case No. 737 of its 139th report, published in 1974, the Committee on Freedom of Association stated in its conclusions concerning the right of firemen to organise: "In the earlier reports referred to by the Government, the Committee treated firemen within a more general context, considering allegations concerning the refusal of the right to organise in the public service. Subsequently, Japan ratified Convention No. 87 and a specific question of the fire service was examined by the Committee of Experts". The Committee then stated in its recommendations to the Governing Body "that firemen in Japan, although having special characteristics, are not members of the police or armed forces".

Firemen, therefore, were not considered among the category of workers which were excluded from the right to organise by virtue of Article 9 of the Convention. The Committee also rejected the Government's intention that granting firemen the right to organise would undermine the discipline necessary for their duties and lead to the outbreak of strikes, and emphasised that the right to organise and the right to strike were two entirely different matters. Accordingly, there was no contradiction between the supervisory bodies on this problem. In the earlier cases prior to ratification, the Committee on Freedom of Association based its conclusions on the information made available to it at that time. Subsequently, when more detailed information and reports were available, the conclusions of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association were not contradictory.

Even assuming there had been an agreement between the Government and the unions concerned and assuming that the ILO confirmed this position, the Government's position would still be invalid. Reservations or exceptions, whether by agreement between the Government and trade unions, or otherwise, to the terms of the application of Conventions, were not permissible.

The Workers' members stressed the extremely long period of time which has passed since the Government was requested by the Committee of Experts and the present Committee to observe the provisions of the Convention. No progress has been made in all this time.

The Workers' members emphasised that the real issue was whether Convention No. 87 permitted the Government to carve out an exception to the requirements of the Convention on the grounds that its fire-service personnel were really part of the police. The Committee of Experts had consistently rejected this contention ever since its first observation on the issue in 1973, and had expressed its hope that the Government would take appropriate measures to ensure the right to organise for personnel in this category.

As regards the right to strike in fire services, the Committee of Experts emphasised "that the right to organise does not necessarily imply the right to strike and that the fire-fighting services must be considered as an essential service in the strict sense of the term in which the right to strike may be subject to prohibition". The fire-fighters had informed this Committee on previous occasions that, involving as it does protection of life and limb, strikes in the fire service are not an option in their collective bargaining. The issue now is simply one of the right to organise. Consultation and negotiations were a separate and distinct problem following recognition.

There had never been disagreement by the large majority of this Committee's members of the legal conclusions asserted by the Committee of Experts concerning the lack of justification for the Government's continued denial of the right to organise for fire-fighters. The dialogue in this Committee had been one of continual entreaty to the Government to try to resolve this problem at home.

The Government had repeatedly assured this Committee that the problem would be resolved. In the light of the provisions of the Japanese Constitution guaranteeing unequivocally the rights of workers to organise and bargain collectively, the Government could solve this issue on a national basis by simply recognising the paramount guarantees of its own Constitution and its supercession of any legislation that may exist to the contrary. But the Government's promises seemed to be empty and, in effect, a kind of smoke screen for the fire-fighters who were only seeking the recognition of their right to organise in protection of their interests, the freedom of association which the ILO safeguards as so sacred a trust as to embody it in its own Constitution.

It was a pity that the Government not only disavowed its solemn international obligations under Convention No. 87, as well as its obligations under its own Constitution, but that it also rejected the considered judgement of all 20 experts, 19 of whom have consistently disagreed with the Japanese Government in its evaluation of the requirements of Convention No. 87. These experts deliberated with objectivity, impartiality and independence of parochial concerns. If the Japanese Government did not accept their views it was obviously blind to all counsel and advice.

In 1984 the Workers' members had added to the conclusion on this same case that, if no improvements had been made by 1985, recourse should be had to other methods. Five more years had elapsed since that conclusion by this Committee. It was clear that in point of fact there had not only been no progress, but the situation had actually worsened. Two years ago the Government asserted in its written reply that it would maintain "firmly hereafter" its interpretation that fire-fighters were included in the police. The purpose of dialogue should be to reach a conclusion and resolution of a problem through an exchange of viewpoints. Dialogue was completely frustrated when one party no longer listened to the other.

The refusal of the Government to comply with its obligations under the Convention reached well beyond the parameters of this particular case involving 135,000 fire-fighting personnel. As every trade union leader instinctively knew, denial of freedom to organise has a negative impact on all social progress and paralyses the source from which workers' rights grow. Anything which endangered this principle imperilled everything done in this Committee. Finally, the Workers' members requested an impartial assessment of this case which would mete out the same measure of justice to the powerful industrial States as it would to the developing countries.

The Employers' members emphasised that this case raised two issues: the restrictions on the right to strike of public servants and the freedom of association of fire-fighters. During the general discussion, they had made clear that they could not accept certain conclusions of the Committee of Experts they considered excessive, in particular as regards the restrictions of the right to strike where it threatened life and health of the population. Far from challenging the right to strike and of lock-out, they merely wanted the exercise of that right submitted to reasonable restrictions. No member State could accept the restrictions proposed by the Committee of Experts which, indeed, were not respected in practice. The principle of proportionality was at stake here. Every country should protect its citizens even before their lives would be threatened; if one were to accept the Committee of Experts' notion, every country could be accused of violating Convention No. 87. Since under the general rules of international public law, the concepts and practice of each member State should be taken into account to interpret correctly the obligations of the States which have ratified a Convention. This general rule of law was explicitly enshrined in the Vienna Convention on Treaties. However, if no State recognised this limitation of the right to strike, no interpretation could be correct. Therefore, they expressed the hope that the Committee of Experts would reconsider its position on that issue, and they stated that they were ready to continue the discussions. Their intention was not to support restrictions of the right to organise or the freedom of association enjoyed by employees in essential services, but rather to propose reasonable limitations of the right to strike.

The problem of fire-fighters did not call for any other explanation since everybody knew their situation. The Employers' members learned from the experience of the years 1950 and 1960, and during the last discussions in this Committee, they had examined the decisions taken in that field by the Committee on Freedom of Association. Initially, it had appeared possible to put the fire-fighters in the category of police members. The decision of the Committee on Freedom of Association had been, as usual, submitted to the Governing Body which approved it, as mentioned in the report of the Committee of Experts. It would be difficult to say to what extent these observations could be unanimously accepted by the Japanese. However, it was surprising that the Committee of Experts would not decide on this issue, but merely give its opinion, i.e. that fire-fighters should not be considered as members of the armed forces or the police. The Committee of Experts did not mention in its report if other decisions had been taken or if that decision had been expressed in different terms, and whether it was necessary to modify it now. Such an attitude was surprising considering the importance given to the co-operation between the Committee of Experts and this Committee. Therefore they wished to obtain an answer from the Committee of Experts on its earlier decisions. Referring to the Workers' members' statement, the Employers' members recalled that this was a question which should be carefully studied. Although they did not feel competent to decide on the problem, they remained convinced that the situation in Japan would strongly affect the interpretation of the case. Nobody would challenge the fact that Japan faced complex problems which would continue to raise discussions and different interpretations of the situation. They considered that the problem was far from settled in Japan since it was even more crucial in that country than elsewhere. The Committee of Experts shared that opinion and trusted that the parties would pursue their discussions and that the problem of the right to organise of fire-fighting personnel could find a solution at the national level. The Employers' members considered that this sentence had been carefully worded and they fully supported it.

The Workers' member from Liberia stated that this was not a borderline case but a very clear-cut one. Convention No. 87 was definitely applicable to the Japanese fire-fighters. The speaker asked two questions of the Government. Firstly, since workers were either protected under the industrial relations or the Civil Service legislation, with access to the corresponding adjudicating procedure, what was the situation in Japan? Secondly, if the workers here in question did not qualify to belong in the industrial trade unions, were they civil servants? He wanted answers to these questions because Convention No. 87 did not establish pre-conditions and gave workers without distinction whatsoever the right to join a labour organisation of their own choosing, without prior authorisation or permission. The speaker expressed his strong support to his Japanese colleagues.

The Workers' member of the United Kingdom stated that he was getting worried about the interpretations given to Convention No. 87 by the Employers. For instance, the Employers' member of Sweden had declared that the Committee of Experts had exceeded their functions in a number of cases and now the Employers appeared to argue that the views of the Committee on Freedom of Association could override the views of the Committee of Experts. The speaker pointed out that when this issue was dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association in 1974, it went subsequently to the Committee of Experts who reiterated their view that fire fighters were not excluded from the provisions of Convention No. 87. This Committee was reaching the same dangerous position it had reached in the 1970s, when it considered cases concerning socialist countries, when the objectivity of the Committee of Experts was challenged. The difference now is that its impartiality is being challenged by advanced industrial countries. The validity of the work of this Committee was once again at issue. During the general debate, everybody had agreed on the impartiality and objectivity of the Committee of Experts, and rightly so because the whole work of this Committee rested upon their comments and observations. So this Committee should come back to the simple issue: if Japan wanted to pass an act of Parliament saying that from now on fire fighters were considered as being part of the police or armed forces, they should say so and this Committee would understand it. However, the Government kept on saying that it wanted an exception to the general rule in the country so as to count fire-fighters as part of the police, but the Committee of Experts told them this was not possible under the Convention. This Committee had been considering this case long enough. It seemed to be another case of a Western government asking for special exemptions concerning another part of the public service; the workers were getting a bit fed up with the way some Western governments dealt with Convention No. 87 and there would be less sympathy on the side of the workers when dealing with issues of more concern to the employers, if the workers could not get an understanding on something as vital as Convention No. 87 in so far as it applied to the public services.

The Workers' member of the Netherlands stated that there were three main questions: firstly, whether freedom of association meant the same in industrialised countries as in others; secondly, whether the right to organise in these countries should be discussed in the same manner as in other countries with different levels of economic, political and cultural development; and finally, whether violations should be dealt with on the same basis by this Committee by taking fully into account the observations of the Committee of Experts. The speaker expressed his uneasiness at the detached and reserved – if not totally negative – attitude of the Government. This was again a case with a long history in this Committee, probably the longest history of a case involving serious difficulties. As mentioned by the Committee of Experts over a number of years, the Government had handled this case in a rather satisfactory manner from a procedural point of view: it had duly responded to the comments made by Workers' representatives, supplied the ILO with full information, and kept close contact with the Office, both formally and informally. While very laudable, this should not divert this Committee's attention from the essential issue, namely compliance with the present Convention. Over the past few years this Committee had learned to live with governments which said that they disagreed with the Committee of Experts and with this Committee, and which stated they were sure that they were perfectly in line with the Convention and that the Committee of Experts were wrong. Faced with such a position in the past, in the face of repeated serious criticisms from the Workers' side, the Committee expressed its concern about such an attitude by mentioning it in a special paragraph. In 1987 the Committee came very close to mentioning the present case in a special paragraph; it did not do so but expressed once more hopes and concerns, to which the Government had reacted now by stating that whatever this Committee would say it would not change its policies. The speaker stated he was aware that Japan was a very special country, that the job of firemen was a very special one, and that this Convention certainly was a very special one: so this certainly was a very special case. Nevertheless, as in some other cases of a special nature, the Committee of Experts itself took that factor into account. The comments and observations made by the Committee of Experts over a number of years left no doubt that they did not consider it to be a marginal case, which might have revealed some difficulties with ILO Conventions. The speaker expressed the hope that this Committee would deal with the case accordingly.

The Workers' members considered that it was not necessary to recall the substance of this problem since the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Committee, on many occasions over the past 12 years, already had the opportunity to give their opinion on the necessity for the Government to re-examine this case so that progress could be made with a view to guaranteeing the fire-fighters the full enjoyment of the rights that the Convention would give them. Referring to the conclusions of this Committee at its 1987 Session, which expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to announce concrete measures taken to guarantee to fire-fighters the full enjoyment of the rights established in this Convention, they expressed their disappointment. At the end of the general discussion, they hoped that the universality of standards, but also the objectivity, impartiality and independence of the experts, would be unanimously acknowledged in the present Committee. If the work and observations of the Committee of Experts on the cases of developing or industrialised countries were questioned, then all the discussions would be useless and the control mechanism would also be questioned. Consequently, the Workers' members trusted that the present discussion (which could seem rather long to some participants) would nevertheless lead to concrete results since it concerned an extremely important subject: the associational rights of public servants established by Conventions Nos. 87 and 151. The Workers' members had nothing to add on the two aspects of the problem, except that the Government appeared not to be facing the truth. The freedom of association of fire-fighters concerned more than 700,000 workers, which made it an important case. Where human dignity and workers' rights were at stake, there could not be small problems, even if that concerned only 13 workers, as in the British case. The Workers' members congratulated the Japanese workers for keeping their faith in the ILO and supported their efforts. They trusted that these Committees' conclusions would not contradict those of the previous years. Referring to the Japanese Government's answer that this was an "internal question" they replied that all the questions addressed by this Committee were "internal questions", but that the Government had ratified the Convention and was consequently committed to respect it. The discussions should, therefore, be continued until a solution could be found. Referring to the corrigendum mentioned in Point 4 of the written reply, where the Government declared that it had "consulted the fire-fighters' personnel, as well as the representative organisations", they noted that all reference to "union organisations" had been deleted, which preoccupied them.

It was not enough to be aware of measures to be taken, of the changes which were necessary and of union rights. To discuss the issues of strikes, negotiation and arbitration in case of labour disputes, it would be necessary to consult the representative union organisations, regroup the social partners and not to deal with each fire-fighter. They concluded by noting this was a serious case which did not progress and they asked whether the employers had a solution to propose.

The Government representative stated, firstly, that, contrary to the allegations of the workers, cases Nos. 60 and 179 decided by the Committee on Freedom of Association indeed dealt with the right to organise of Japan's fire-fighters. Case No. 179 was lodged by the trade unions alleging that prohibition of the right to organise to fire-fighters in Japan fell upon the violation of freedom of association. With regard to this allegation, the Government sent the information to the ILO in January 1959, including the report of the Convention Subcommittee of the Round Table Conference on Labour Problems which concluded that "the function of the fire defence in Japan can be interpreted as being included in the category of the function of the police". The Freedom of Association Committee, having examined this allegation as well as the information supplied by the Government, concluded that fire defence agencies in Japan were included in "the police and certain services assimilated thereto". It was quite clear, the Government representative said, that the 54th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning case No. 179 had decided these allegations concerning fire-fighters in Japan did not call for further examinations. His Government ratified Convention No. 87 on the premise of these conclusions reiterated by the Committee on Freedom of Association, one of the authoritative and prestigious supervisory bodies in the ILO. Secondly, the Round Table Conference was an official tripartite body, set up by the Cabinet decision, to examine national laws with a view to ratifying ILO Conventions. It was not an informal council of the Labour Minister as the Japanese Workers' member insisted. Thirdly, with regard to the agreement reached by the Subcommittee of the Round Table Conference, the Government representative said that his Government, after this issue being taken up again by the ILO in 1972, repeatedly sent the copies of the said agreement to the ILO, i.e. in October 1972 in the annual report and in May 1973 in its reply to the Experts Committee's observation, contrary to the assertion by the Japanese Workers' member. The Government representative also mentioned the fact that the said agreement had been indeed reported to the Japanese Parliament on the occasion of its deliberation regarding ratification of the Convention No. 87, for example, to Special Committee on ILO Convention No. 87 of the House of Representatives in July 1963 and to the Special Committee on ILO Convention No. 87 of the House of Councillors in May 1965 in response to the question posed by members of the Socialist Party.

In reply to a question asked by the Liberian Workers' member, the Government representative stated that fire-fighters were covered by the Local Public Service Law and, as such, had a right of recourse to the complaint procedure which was guaranteed to public employees, as well as before the courts, when a problem arose. The Government representative reiterated in conclusion that his Government would treat this problem as a domestic issue and that it remained determined to further its examination at the Inter-Ministerial Conference as well as to maintain a constructive dialogue with the labour organisations concerned through the relevant government authorities.

The Workers' members considered that the historical overview of the case proposed by the Government representative could not modify the opinion of the Committee of Experts and of the Committee of Freedom of Association. They wanted to know if, where the Government representative mentioned exchanges of opinion with the workers' organisations, he meant the competent organisations representing the public sector workers.

The Employer member for the United States stated that this case illustrated a point that the Employers had been stressing over the past two years, namely the stability and consistency of interpretation by the ILO supervisory bodies. When examining the substantive issue in this case, one would be addressing in part what was the basis for the ratification of this Convention by the Japanese Government; it seemed that one of the problems which concerned the Employers' group was that the Government relied in part on two earlier decisions made by the Freedom of Association Committee prior to the ratification of the Convention. As pointed out by the Workers' representative of the United States, there was an evolution in this interpretation such that, in 1969, the Committee of Experts analysed differently the fire-fighters' situation. However, this Committee was now addressing the issue in terms of the uniform and consistent application of Conventions.

The Worker member of Pakistan stated he was glad that ratification of a Convention did not absolve a country from bringing its legislation in conformity with the principles outlined in the Convention. In addition, the speaker declared that the fact of giving a worker the individual right to proceed before the courts did not replace the functions of trade unions because these have a wider scope. Therefore, the observations made by the Committee of Experts in their report fully deserved to be implemented in the respective countries, in consultation with the workers concerned.

The Committee took due note of the discussion which took place and in particular of the information provided by the Government delegate. The Committee recalled that for many years the Committee of Experts had made comments on certain differences between the national legislation and the Convention, in particular in connection with the right to organise of the fire-fighting staff. The Committee noted that internal discussions continued on this issue but that they had not led to concrete measures permitting progress toward the full application of the Convention. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the discussions with representative trade unions would be intensified and that they would soon lead to the recognition of the right to organise of these workers in conformity with the Convention.

Netherlands (ratification: 1950). A Government representative expressed his satisfaction with the comments of the Committee of Experts that the 1985 WAGGS Act appears to be a market improvement upon its predecessors; clearly its basic elements are in conformity with the principles of free collective bargaining. In drafting the Act, the Government tried to strike a balance between its responsibility to manage public funds, the level of service to be delivered and the principles of freedom of association.

As regards sections 10 and 11 of the Act, the Dutch authorities were carefully studying the conclusions of the Committee of Experts, which have been sent to employers' and workers' organisations, as well as to Parliament. Sections 10 and 11 form part of the bargaining system and were important issues during the discussions which led to the final legislative text. Furthermore, the measures provided for by these sections were meant to be taken in very exceptional situations; this was illustrated by the fact that until now such measure had never been taken and, he trusted, would never be. The observations of the Committee of Experts would be studied carefully but, because of the rather complex and legal nature of the issues, discussions were necessary with the social partners and this would take time.

The Worker member of the Netherlands stated that the observation of the Committee of Experts was a fine example of the objective, impartial work style of that Committee. However, recalling his earlier comments about the necessary feedback which should link the work of the various supervisory bodies, he wondered why this case had not been dealt with earlier, since various efforts had been made in 1985, 1986 and 1987 to draw attention of the Committee of Experts to the inconsistencies between the WAGGS Act and the Convention, and in view of the fact that this legislation was to be evaluated by the Dutch Parliament in late 1988. This legal opinion of the Committee of Experts certainly would have changed the Parliament's decision to extend that Act. The three Dutch trade union confederations found the text of the Committee of Experts' observation very helpful and hoped that it would be a strong stimulus for the Dutch Government to bring its legislation in line with Convention No. 87. While it was fair to give the Government some time to implement the recommendation of the Committee of Experts, and hopefully, of the present Conference, it should be able to report progress next year on this matter.

The Employer member of the Netherlands emphasised that the present Committee was now faced with two recommendations; one by the Committee of Experts, the other by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The speaker emphasised the distinction between comments made by a union on reports to be examined by the Committee of Experts over several years, and a complaint presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association. A complaint was a much stronger instrument and yet the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association were "softer" than those of the Committee of Experts. While both recognised that "budgeted negotiating" is permitted, their recommendations differed as regards the possibility of government interference in the negotiating process (sections 10 and 11 of the Act), with the result that the Government was faced with an alternative: repealing articles 10 and 11 or amending the WAGGS Act. The speaker emphasised that the "trend following" sector was financed by the ordinary citizens and, for that reason, has to negotiate within a given budget. Both Committees had accepted this principle, while underlying the necessity to negotiate and conclude agreements in full freedom. The two recommendations would have to be studied carefully and a choice made; consultations with the social partners will be necessary and, in the end, the Parliament would have to decide, all in accordance with national rules. The opinion of all sectors of industry have to be heard as their interest is linked with the interest of this sector. While urging the Government rapidly to take action to avoid any further delay and uncertainty, the speaker expressed the Employers' preference for the recommendation made by the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, which would permit the Government to control wage cost development in this particular sector well within the limits of its responsibilities in the financial field. It would be possible at the same time to stay within the principles of freedom of collective bargaining.

The Workers' members stated that with economic upturn and certain financial restrictions there was a risk that the wages in the public and subsidised sector would fall behind the private sector. The Government should put an end to a situation which was supposed to be exceptional and of a short-term nature, and trust that the workers' and employers' organisations are mature enough to freely negotiate with due regard to what is possible and what is not.

The Employers' member underlined that in this case and in earlier situations, the Committee of Experts said that an intervention in collective bargaining may be justified for urgent reasons due to the economic interest of the country. It was of course very difficult to draw the line and decide whether such an emergency situations existed. This evaluation needed to be made not at the level of the sector concerned, but at the national level and on a tripartite basis.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, and the different comments and opinions expressed during the discussion. The Committee noted the conclusions of the Committee of Experts concerning the persistence of divergences between the law and practice on the one hand, and the requirements of the Convention on the other hand. The Committee requested the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the legislation and practice are in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would be able to show complete consistency of its legislation with the Convention by next year.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1967). A Government representative referred to the observations made by the Committee of Experts concerning the General Provisional Act on means of communication of 1979 which, according to the Committee of Experts, imposed under section 3 of this Act, certain restrictions upon the freedom of information and freedom of expression for employers and workers. The representative stated that this Act had been repealed by the decree adopted by the National Assembly on 21 April 1989 which contains the new Act (No. 57) concerning means of social communication. The repeal of these former provisions and its complete substitution can be found in section 50 of Act No. 57. Taking into account the concerns and observations of the trade union and employers' organisations, as well as the suggestions made by the political opposition parties, the new legal provisions on this subject offer full guarantees of freedom of speech and freedom of information. All the standards alluded to by the Committee of Experts have been eliminated and the rights and responsibilities concerning the means of communications have been clearly defined. The previous censorship has been completely eliminated thus guaranteeing the free and responsible use of the media for all political and trade union organisations. Thus, full response has been given to the observations made by the Committee of Experts on this subject.

With regards to the changes in labour legislation concerning which expressed and detailed recommendations have been made, the Government representative indicated that the necessary consultation process has been in fact initiated with a view toward issuing a new labour code which will respond both to the observations made by the pertinent ILO bodies and, at the same time, to the overall situation which now prevails in the working environment of the country. As was noted by the study mission which visited Nicaragua at the request of the Government from 26 September to 6 October 1988, at present there are four different drafts of a labour code presented by political opposition parties and various trade union organisations.

The commitments made by the National Assembly during the first months of this year in connection with the fulfilment of the agreements and responsibilities assumed by the country at the Central American Presidents Summit at Costa del Sol on 15 February 1989, prevented the formal start of parliamentary debate on this subject. The consultation process with all the bodies concerned, however, has continued. The Nicaraguan Government will officially request the technical assistance of the ILO in order to organise and implement the process of discussions and tripartite consultations through seminars or other activities considered suitable for this purpose. This request will be presented during the present Session of the Conference.

Moreover, concerning the practical exercise of the rights and freedoms of association existing in Nicaragua, the Government representative indicated that the study group which visited the country, and which was able to visit all the trade union and governmental bodies that it wished to see, expressed its thoughts about the trade union situation in this country. In this regard, on page 44 of its report (document GB241/5/9) study mission stated "despite this situation, which is difficult from every point of view, a trade union movement and pluralist associations do exist in Nicaragua". He felt that this expression very faithfully described the real situation in Nicaragua at present in the field of freedom of association.

With regard to Convention No. 98 the Government representative expressed that indeed as noted by the Committee of Experts, even though there had been no official abrogation of Decree No. 530 which imposes participation of the Ministry of Labour in collective bargaining, this provision was in fact no longer applied; today the National Labour and Wages Organisation System is merely a reference group and employers and workers can negotiate their wages between themselves. Thus the Ministry of Labour has practically restricted its own role to simply that of a registry for collective agreements. In 1988, all the collective agreements arrived at or revised by workers and employers were recorded without any obstacle, as pointed out by the Committee's report and verified by the above-mentioned study mission.

The Government wanted to call the present Committee's attention to the efforts which have been made in the country and the strong will of the Government to create effective conditions for consultation and tripartite dialogue. As a result of tripartite agreements; important, fiscal, financial and administrative policies have been advocated in order to stimulate the economic and productive activities of the employers, for example, conclusions had been drawn from the First Tripartite National Meeting of the Livestock Sector held during the first two weeks of April 1989.

Within the context of the political efforts made to finally find a negotiated solution to the Central American conflict, an amnesty was pronounced for the Somosa National Guards. The electoral law was amended thus responding to many of the concerns voiced by the opposition parties. The above-mentioned Act on means of communication of 1979 was repealed and, in general, national political prerequisites are being established for an early holding of national elections in February 1990. One of the most recent measures has been the establishment of the Supreme Electoral Council with the participation of the political opposition parties which have already reached more than 20 organisations ready to participate in the elections. Even former leaders of the counter revolution ("contrarrevolución") have been covered by the amnesty; they may participate in the political campaign. All these efforts have been made despite the fact that the war of aggression against Nicaragua continues.

Finally the Government representative stated that his Government was firmly convinced that the ILO as well as other UN agencies would give their support and experience to the consolidation of democratic society, pluralistic and social justice contributing to the creation of conditions necessary for full tripartite consultation and dialogue among all the sectors. The Secretary-General of the International Employers' Organisation (IEO) stated that his organisation approached the question before the present Committee concerning freedom of association in Nicaragua feeling a lot of scepticism mixed with very little optimism. As allegations, complaints and representations are raised before the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body practically every year since 1981, the leaders of the employers' organisations - in particular the Superior Council of Private Enterprise (COSEP) have been systematically detained, muzzled, imprisoned and assassinated. In this regard the speaker thanked the previous Director-General of the ILO, François Blanchard, who did not hesitate to intervene a number of times before the Government of Nicaragua. These leaders were charged with the crime of openly expressing themselves on trade union rights, the recognition of independent social progress and the economic policy of the country.

Finding itself faced with the probability of the nomination by the Committee of Commission of Inquiry, the Government and the courts have recently freed an economist of the COSEP; he was cleared of charges after he had already endured 11 months in the Sandanista prisons. Still under international pressure, a member of COSEP who had been condemned without proof by the popular courts to 28 years in prison, has just been declared innocent. It is clear that the Government cannot ignore international opinion; this is what justifies a small dose of optimism with regard to ILO action.

As concerns the legislative plan, the situation is hardly better than in practice. In fact, after all the requests - reiterated year after year by the Committee of Experts - to amend the legislation concerning trade union rights and civil liberties in order to bring them into conformity with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, the Government has responded with promises which have required the patience of both the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Committee in that practically none have been kept. It is enough to mention three examples among many which justify the scepticism with which the statements and promises made here with regard to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 must be received. First, notwithstanding the observations made by the Committee of Experts and the amendments promised, no collective agreement is valid in Nicaragua without the consent of the Government and the National Labour and Wages Organisation System (SNOTS). Second, the new Act on means of communication adopted in 1989 still permits almost all the abuses which were criticised by the Committee on Freedom of Association. Decrees Nos. 512 of 1989 and 888 of 1982 which violate basic rights to information and freedom of expression are still in force, and the Committee on Freedom of Association was of the opinion that the reform made was insufficient. Third, contrary to what the Government representative of Nicaragua has stated, and contrary to the commitments made by Nicaragua at the time of the study mission carried out by a representative of the Director-General in September 1988, no tripartite consultation with the aim of the adoption of a new labour code has taken place.

The present Committee should take into account all these elements when examining the situation prevailing in Nicaragua in the area of freedom of association. The IEO considered that the situation, in law as well as in practice, was in flagrant contradiction with the obligation freely assumed by this country.

The Employer member of Nicaragua observed that for three consecutive years the Committee of Experts has made comments on the need for national legislation to be brought into conformity with Convention No. 87. Referring to the conclusions and recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body, he stated that employers and independent trade unions had not been consulted on certain amendments made to legislative provisions, or on the provisions of the labour code which were announced. The Tripartite Advisory Committee to study questions related to international labour standards has not been created either. This is the case despite the fact that the Government offered that this Committee would start its work in March 1989.

The Employer member of Nicaragua stated that the media director of the Ministry of the Interior denied authorisation for the broadcasting of a radio news programme "La Nacion." Its director of the programme, who made the request, had received only evasive replies from the person in charge of the media department. The truth is that despite the fact that the state of emergency has been lifted, there are still decrees such as Nos. 511 and 512 which restrict freedom of expression and which have not yet been repealed.

With regard to the detention of leaders of employers' organisations, the Government did not extend amnesties, as it had promised to the ILO Governing Body, but rather it granted pardons.

The Employer member referred to the information concerning the right to strike, mentioned in the Committee of Experts report, stating that these strikes were due to the courageous and decisive attitude of the workers; on several occasions, as the whole world knew, the repression suffered by these workers was very severe. By virtue of the reiterated and continuous violation of ILO Conventions committed by the Government throughout the years and, in particular, as concerns Convention No. 87, he expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to strictly comply with the provisions of these international instruments.

Finally, with reference to the application of Convention No. 98, the Employer member stated that Decree No. 530 of 24 September 1980 provided under section 1 that collective agreements must have the approval of the Ministry of Labour in order to enter into force. This Act has not yet been repealed despite repeated requests by the Committee of Experts.

The Employer member of Argentina stated that it had been several years since the restrictions of the freedom of employers' organisation in Nicaragua had been noted. The principle of freedom of association and the genuine representative nature of employers' groups was put into question and the tripartite dialogue had been stripped of any legitimacy. There can be no true tripartite dialogue, either at the national or the international level, if the representatives of the various sectors are not respected. According to the speaker, the Latin American employers wanted to put on the record the absence of progress with regard to the conformity of the present situation with Convention No. 87. The statements which were just made by the previous Employer members indicated that measures to restrict the role of the authentic employers' organisations were frequently taken, whether it be by disregarding its representative nature or limiting its possibilities for expression. Either way, freedom of association, and freedom in general, is compromised. According to the speaker, the Employer members were determined to insist that Convention No. 87 be fully applied in practice. In order to fulfil the objectives set out by this Committee, the Conference, and the ILO, an authentic tripartite dialogue which respects the rights of the individuals who make up the organisations must be set up.

The Employers' members stated that this case of freedom of association concerned both workers and employers. The present Committee had been investigating the situation in Nicaragua with regard to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 for a very long time. Furthermore, the Committee on Freedom of Association has had before it a number of complaints. The Government of Nicaragua, however, has systematically slowed the examination of these questions, which can be clearly seen in paragraph 20 of the Committee of Experts' general report. This report also indicated that excessive restrictions upon the freedom of association remain even after the lifting of the state of emergency. In practice, those who dare to criticise the Government have become the object of sanctions which often were harsh. The most recent example is that of the Director of an institute of economic research of an employers' organisation, shortly before the Conference, was freed after nine months of imprisonment thanks to pressure from the ILO.

This case is only one among many which confirms that freedom of expression is considerably restricted. The new Act on means of communication mentioned by the Government representative does not remove these restrictions, as had been recommended in the Committee on Freedom of Association's last report. In this context of limitations upon fundamental human rights the adoption of an appropriate labour code cannot be expected. The Nicaraguan Government, during earlier discussions, made promises concerning, for example, the re-establishment of trade union pluralism and the cessation of intervention in the formation of professional organisations. It was stated that consultations were in progress with workers and employers on these points but, in the last report by the Committee on Freedom of Association, it was very clearly stated that the most representative workers' organisation in Nicaragua, COSEP, had not been consulted. In this context, it is not surprising that there are no collective agreements. The repeal of the Decree of 1980, by virtue of which collective agreements must obtain the approval of the Minister of Labour, has often been requested. Although this obligation may exist in several countries for particular sectors, in this country it is a general obligation applicable to all sectors. If this decree is no longer applied, why is it not repealed?

With regard to wages, the social partners must fulfil certain requirements. This voids collective bargaining of its meaning.

It must again be stated that in practice, freedom of association, the right to organise and the right to collectively bargain raise certain objections and that the representatives of professional workers' and employers' organisations continue to be the object of serious attacks. This concerns fundamental rights which must be guaranteed to employers, as well as workers, and which is certainly not the case. It must be deeply deplored that the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 has only been met with obstacles.

The Workers' members stated that, although the Committee on Freedom of Association had been presented complaints concerning the non-observance by Nicaragua of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, it was good that the Government expressed itself before this present Committee because that would be very useful to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

In order to touch upon this discussion in a positive and constructive manner, the Workers' members expressed their wish that the political agreements signed in Central America would bring peace, stability and economic progress to the countries of that region, and as a result freedom, democracy and social progress.

This being said, like the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association, the present Committee has noted for a long time that Conventions Nos 87 and 98 are not applied either in law or in practice. In this regard, the allegedly exceptional situation in this country has served as a smoke screen for too long.

Serious difficulties persist: free trade union organisations are impeded from completing their mission and Decree 530 has not been repealed; even if the Government restricts itself to merely registering the agreements concluded by the employers' and workers' organisations, as long as Decree 530 has not been repealed the danger of impeding free bargaining still exists. Furthermore, certain improvements should be mentioned even if they are only partial improvements. In fact, trade union leaders were freed and a certain number of political changes occurred, which is a good omen for the installation of a system of freedom of association hand-in-hand with a system of political liberty. It would be useful to know if the new Act, which replaced the Act on means of communication of 1979, (which was not in conformity with Convention No. 87), fully conforms to this Convention. This issue will return to the Committee on Freedom of Association for verification.

Two interesting elements were raised with regard to the new draft labour code. First, consultation with the social partners is provided. Second, the Government will request ILO assistance in the form of seminars in which the representatives of various organisations will participate so that this code may permit the full application of the international labour Conventions. The question remaining was whether all the representative employers' and workers' organisations would be associated in this consultation and would participate in the seminars envisaged. This is a very important question upon which trade union pluralism and freedom of complete action for trade union organisations depends. It would be advisable to follow very closely the developments of this process so that the Committee of Experts, the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Committee can assure themselves that the progress which has occurred will become more concrete and that fundamental Conventions such as No. 87 and 98 will be fully applied.

The Worker member of Nicaragua stated that a pluralistic debate was taking place in his country between the employers and workers on the most urgent problems of the economy, such as the reactivation of enterprises which were affected by the war, and requests by employers for incentives for production and by workers for social benefits and participation in the management of enterprises. Freedom of expression exists in the country and workers as well as employers have channels for expressing their different opinions. The speaker stated that it had not been easy to adopt Act No. 57 on means of social communication in the Legislative Assembly. First of all, a discussion was entered into among the different sectors of the country, through the mass media, and lastly in the Legislative Assembly. At the request of the trade union organisations the National Communications Council was created. This Council will have a deliberative and consultative nature.

In November 1988, the first trade union meeting took place. The main subjects examined were the labour code and the creation of a law for workers' participation in enterprises. The labour code was given priority and as a result several preliminary drafts were formulated, one of which was presented by the organisation of by the speaker. Some organisations proposed the modification of the present code so that it would include the comments made by the Committee of Experts. For its part, the organisation of the speaker was in favour of the drafting of a new labour code, which is the main demand of the political parties who will participate in the 1990 elections. The workers and employers are bilaterally negotiating collective agreements. In many cases they have been negotiated with the economic capacity of the enterprises taken into account, and in some cases, the employers have asked that negotiations be postponed. The delegates of COSEP and National Union of Farmers and Ranchers (UNAG) can confirm this. A tripartite meeting took place on 26 and 27 April devoted to agricultural production for 1989-90 when bank debts for cotton undertakings were forgiven and bank credit was approved for different areas of production. The collaborative spirit which exists between workers, employers and the Government must also prevail in the present Committee in order to stimulate communication, with the goal of reconstructing a country which finds itself between war and peace.

The Worker member of Spain stated that his country followed the situation in Nicaragua very closely. Spanish trade unions had sent workers' brigades to help build houses in Nicaragua. Through these visits, they were able to verify that a truly pluralistic discussion exists in the country. They also verified that the restrictions which existed during the state of emergency have completely disappeared and that, now, a true democratic opening has occurred which has made freedom of expression for trade unions, employers and political parties possible. The conclusions reached by the Spanish trade unions were confirmed by the newspapers which recognised that Nicaragua was faithfully applying the agreements to which the workers' spokesman had made reference. Seemingly, the same conclusion was reached by the Spanish Government which recognised that Nicaragua had faithfully complied with the "Esquipulas II" agreements.

The Worker member of Ecuador joined in the opinion expressed by the Workers' spokesman, according to which the fundamental desire was to see the normalisation of the situation which prevails in the countries of Central America, and particularly in Nicaragua. The desire of all Latin American workers is that this country be allowed to find its own destiny. The aim of the ILO was to bring about such progress for justice and shared development for peace. Beyond the limitations of a judicial nature of the standard setting instruments of the Organisation, the workers must be protected. This is precisely the task of the present Committee. Furthermore, this Committee should be concerned that what was stated here actually be carried out, and not remain merely good intentions. Flexible machinery was needed to bring into practice these good desires. The problem in Nicaragua is more political than legal. The principal cause of these problems must be eliminated. Once that cause has been exhausted, these problems will no longer exist. In spite of the suffering in Nicaragua caused by the war, this country has made progress in the fields of health, housing and education. The industrialised countries are in a better position to comply with the Conventions; they have greater independence in taking decisions. On the contrary, the countries that, like the Latin American countries and those of the Third World, find themselves burdened with foreign debt, suffer economic dependence. The conditions imposed by the International Monetary Fund negatively affect the application of the Conventions. In conclusion even when these countries have the desire to fully comply with the provisions of the Conventions, they are not in a position to do so.

The Worker member of Uruguay stated that for some years this Committee had been dealing with the complaints against Nicaragua. The Government had responded to the complaints with valid arguments. In 1988, a study mission wrote a positive report with respect to the situation in the country. The state of emergency was lifted and trade unions were given every right, including the right to strike which had figured in the mission's report. Sixty strikes have been registered and no trade union leaders have been assassinated, as in the case in other Latin American countries. Furthermore, Act No. 57 on the means of communication which permits employers and workers to freely express themselves, has been adopted. Proposals have been made for the creation of popular associations and political parties. The Government of Nicaragua, as the study mission stated, intends to promote economic and social consultation. This is a matter of fundamental values taking into account the situation of war that prevails in the country. The workers and employers must work together for the reconstruction of the country. The Government of Nicaragua is currently entering into discussions with the various trade union organisations with a view to the promulgation of a new labour code which will soon be the object of debate in the Legislative Assembly. Tripartite consultation is presently taking place under the auspices of the ILO. Amnesties have been granted to reinforce the will for peace and democracy in Nicaragua. The Supreme Electoral Council was created with a view to the elections which will take place in February, 1990. Twenty political parties, which enjoy full freedom of expression, will participate in these elections. The workers of Uruguay welcomed the progress made in Nicaragua despite the immense difficulties that the Government has faced. Nicaragua has made efforts to comply with international labour standards and it is fitting to take note of the progress made in this regard.

The Worker member of Venezuela stated that in August 1988 he led, at the invitation of organisations which had no links with the Government a pluralist committee of a confederation of workers' trade unions of Venezuela to Nicaragua. He was able to note that there was freedom of expression and freedom of association and that organisations that did not share the opinions of the Government were provided with all the necessary facilities to exercise their functions. In this respect, he stated that it would be necessary to look for the points of convergence between all of those who did not share the Government's position. Finally he stated that there should be compliance with the Conventions but that the Nicaraguan Government was confronted with obstacles, as much from the inside as from the outside, which prevented them from ensuring complete respect.

The Workers member of the United States stressed that although the Government representative had communicated some encouraging information about what was being done or what was intended to be done, there was as yet no specific information communicated in report form to the Committee of Experts for their review and evaluation. The responses made by the Government representative to the points raised by the Committee of Experts were very general. He requested the Government representative to respond in more detail concerning the measures to be taken with regard to the following recommendations raised in the Committee of Experts' report: to guarantee the right to organise for public servants and self-employed workers in rural and urban sectors; to remove excessive limitations on the exercise of the right to strike; to amend the provision on the general prohibition of political activities by trade unions, and to abolish the restrictions concerning the formation of trade unions.

Finally, with regard to Decree No. 530 of 1980 which makes collective bargaining agreements subject to the approval of the Ministry of Labour, he stated that the Committee of Experts and the present Committee had traditionally been of the opinion that it was not enough for a decree containing provisions contrary to ILO standards not to be used in practice, but that the legislation would have to be repealed.

The Workers member of the United Kingdom stated that when a country undergoes a tremendous upheaval such as that experienced by Nicaragua, it must be recognised that problems still remain even though signs may exist that suggest it is emerging from those difficulties. The judgement which must be made is not whether everything is going to be immediately perfect, but whether as a general rule progress is being made towards the objectives promoted by the ILO. There were a number of questions raised by both the employers' members and the workers' members which needed to be answered. He associated himself with the request made by the Workers' spokesman for an assurance that all truly representative trade unions are given legitimacy by the laws of the land. These were hard questions which deserved firm answers.

The situation gave rise to particular concern as regards the public service, in particular, civil servants. He asked the Government representative to assure unequivocally that civil servants would be granted the right to organise and that this right be guaranteed in the new labour code. His own opinion concerning the Government's good will would depend upon the answers given to these questions.

Finally, the final judgement would depend on the events occurring in the coming year when the outcome of what has been promised can be seen. Some governments made promises, the fulfilment of which seemed to be put off year after year. Next year the present Committee would be entitled to expect full results from the promises made by the Government representative.

The Government member of the USSR stated that the goal of the discussions before the present Committee was to guarantee social justice. In order to do this, it was necessary to be fair in the evaluation of concrete situations. The case of Nicaragua was a typical example of this concern.

It was not only a question of making remarks concerning the legal machinery which guaranteed the application of conventions, but also a question of assessing a society. Nicaragua could not be compared to other countries without taking into account the war, the destruction and the economic difficulties through which they have suffered for many years. The application of Conventions depends on the economic and social situation of a country and, therefore, in order to evaluate the situation fairly it was necessary to verify whether there had been progress towards the installation of social justice, which is the ultimate aim of these Conventions.

Taking into account the political and social situation which exists in the country, the Government representative gave adequate proof that his Government tried to ensure respect for the requirements of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. A democratic process has started in Nicaragua. Progress has been made towards trade union pluralism and it would be fair to adequately appreciate the efforts made by the Government to apply the provisions of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. The speaker stated that he was convinced that the Government of Nicaragua would follow up on its promises and that it would meet its obligations.

The Government member of Venezuela stated that the object of the discussion was to promote favourable conditions for the application of Conventions. She stated that in the present discussion, there were a series of positive aspects as regarded the application of the Conventions which had been highlighted by the various speakers. The Government had demonstrated its willingness to engage in dialogue by giving facilities to the study mission, sending information to the supervisory bodies and supplying detailed and positive information to the present Committee. The study mission had noted certain restrictions but it had also pointed to signs of progress. The speaker expressed the hope that the present Committee would take note of the positive developments that had taken place and that the situation would continue to evolve favourably.

The Employers member of the United States requested the Government representative to indicate what the Government intended to do with respect to freedom of association of employers, the recognition of COSEP, the incarceration of employer leaders and the representation of employers. He considered that the present Committee, in its conclusions, should make some specific reference to the fact that real problems existed as regards the freedom of association of employers.

The Government member of Cuba stated that the interventions of previous speakers had pointed to the advances achieved in finding solutions to the problems raised by the Committee of Experts. The Government had shown its goodwill. In addition to the social problems which the Government had inherited, it had to face up to others that were the result of situations foreign to Nicaragua. She expressed the wish that the Committee of Experts and the present Committee would take account of the report and the results of the study mission (which had taken place with objectivity and impartiality) and that its findings would be reflected in the comments of the Committee of Experts and in the present Committee. The contents of the study mission report and the statements made by the Government representative of Nicaragua showed that there had been progress towards a better implementation of the Convention.

The Government representative, replying to the comments and questions made by Workers' members of the Committee, stated that: (1) as regarded the guarantee of the right to unionise of self-employed workers in the urban and rural sectors, the Constitution of Nicaragua fully guaranteed the right to form trade unions and to organise, and the Government hoped that this principle would also appear in the Labour Code which was currently the subject of full debate; (2) the restrictions on the right to strike had been completely suspended; (3) the provisions in the Code which prohibited political activities by trade unions was entirely out of place with reality in Nicaragua since, in keeping with their political preferences, trade unions had developed activities which they considered to be adequate for their interests and therefore this provision was not worth maintaining; (4) as regards the possibility of forming free trade unions, he pointed out that in Nicaragua there was no division between free trade unions and trade unions which were not free since, by their very nature, and because of the nature of the process of transformation which the country was going through, the unions were free; (5) Decree No. 530 was no longer applied in practice and the Ministry of Labour saw no objection to contemplating the possibility of its prompt repeal; (6) the Government was convinced that the legislation guaranteed the fullest freedom of association to public servants, a right which already existed in practice; (7) the question of granting the right to strike to civil servants would be discussed with the public servants' union organisations and other workers' organisations, but it was not yet possible to give a categorical reply as to whether this right would or would not be allowed, since this subject had to be examined in the light of all possible repercussions; (8) the Labour Code and the labour law revision would be debated with all the trade union organisations without exception, and this was the political will of the Government as regards the way in which the labour legislation would be modified.

Replying to the questions and concerns raised by the Employers' members, the Government representative stated firstly that he was surprised by the tone and the way in which they had been put, and this showed the persistence of a serious communications problem and a problem with genuine desire for dialogue, all of which made it difficult to arrive at common ground. He stressed the following points: (1) the imprisonment of employer leaders had not been due to the fact that they were employers, but because they had acted in violation of the national legislation, violations which could not be ignored by reason of the particular circumstances of those committing them; the employer leader, Mr. Guillermo Quant, had been sentenced on charges proven before the courts and had been pardoned not because of international pressure, but with a view to promoting a collaborative climate for the economic restructuring of the country without the exclusion of any sector; the employer leader, Mr. Allegria, had been released by the court, and this showed the independence of the judiciary; (2) as regarded tripartite consultation, it was incorrect to say that this did not exist; Mr. Dreifus, a leader of COSEP, had participated as the reporter in a seminar on consultation and the Labour Code organised by the SIERA; since August 1988 consultation commissions had been established in which COSEP delegates took part and where prices and wages policies for the agricultural and stock-raising sector were discussed; the COSEP leader, Mr. Ramiro Gurdian, made public statements recognising how positive the Government's measures had been concerning the first tripartite consultations in the agricultural sector which took place in April; (3) the Government had the firm intention to promote changes in the labour laws and had requested the technical assistance of the Office; since the triumph of the revolution, the Government had made 22 changes to the Labour Code, some of which concerned freedom of association such as, for example, section 22 of the Labour Code which now guaranteed the reinstatement of dismissed workers in cases of political discrimination or trade union repression; (4) the Government intended to modify the provisions concerning collective agreements that were not in conformity with Convention No. 98; in 40 years of dictatorship there had only been 122 collective agreements, whereas over the last ten years more than 1,500 such agreements had been signed; there were 1,300 trade unions affiliated to seven trade union central organisations of different political and ideological convictions; the study mission indicated that despite the difficulties that beset the country, there was freedom of association and trade union pluralism; (5) as regards the Act on means of social communications, he stressed that the new law eliminated the provisions criticised by the Committee of Experts and this demonstrated the importance attached to their comments; the Government would send a special report on this question to the Committee of Experts. In Nicaragua, political pluralism was seen in the freedom allowed to political or occupational organisations to express their criticisms, for example, COSEP had its own journal and the newspaper La Prensa was published freely.

The Government representative regretted that the Employer members did not recognise the efforts that the Government was making and appealed to the employers of his country to give their support to the process of economic and social transformation and economic reconstruction in the country. This was an historic opportunity and he expressed the hope that they would seize it. It was normal that there were differences of opinion between the Government and the union or the employers' organisations, but with a genuine will and a constructive spirit an agreement could be arrived at and progress achieved. The employers had the right to challenge the government; there were 21 political parties in opposition having varied ideologies; the employers were thus free to choose whichever one suited their ideas in the elections due in February 1990.

The Employers' members indicated that the statements of the Government representative had not convinced them absolutely, their opinion is founded on a number of official ILO documents and not on suspicions. Since the Workers' position was for progress to be achieved by the present Committee, they decided not to propose that this case be the subject of a special paragraph. They hoped that the present Committee would reflect this divergence in its conclusions, along with the Employers' concern over this case. As freedom of association did still not exist in Nicaragua, neither for employers nor for workers, the Employers' members requested that the present Committee examine this case next year.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and the different comments and opinions expressed during the discussion. The Committee recalled the content of the recent reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association and, inter alia, the last interim report of the aforementioned Committee, presented to the Governing Body in May. The Committee noted with interest the suspension of the state of emergency, certain cases of releases of employer leaders and of trade unionists, and assurances by the Government that it would consult the employers' and workers' organisations and the International Labour Office. The Committee noted, however, that the Committee of Experts in its report observed the persistence of a certain number of divergencies between, first of all, the law and, secondly, practice with respect to the full application of these two Conventions. The Committee requested the Government to adopt, as soon as possible, all necessary measures to eliminate all of the existing restrictions in law and in practice concerning the right of employers' and workers' organisations to exercise freely the rights guaranteed by the two Conventions in question. The Committee requested the Government to supply the Committee of Experts with precise information, with precise and detailed information on the development of the work on the re-elaboration of the Labour Code and the consultations that it would carry out on this matter. The Committee firmly hoped that next year it would be able to note decisive progress along the lines of the remarks made by the supervisory bodies.

The Government representative of Nicaragua requested the Committee to take note of the Government's reservation as regarded the following portion of the conclusions of the Committee:

"The Committee noted, however, that the Committee of Experts in its report observed the persistence of a certain number of divergencies between, first of all, the law, and, secondly, practice with respect to the full application of these two Conventions. The Committee requested the Government to adopt, as soon as possible, all necessary measures to eliminate all the existing restrictions in law and in practice concerning the right of employers' and workers' organisations to exercise freely the rights guaranteed by the two Conventions in question."

Panama (ratification: 1958). A Government representative stated that the requirement of 50 workers to establish a trade union (section 344 of the Labour Code) neither limits the establishment of unions nor their affiliation, since the workers can establish unions by branch of activity or by profession; in fact, the majority of these organisations have workers employed by small enterprises in their membership. As regards the requirement of ten employers to establish an occupational organisation (section 344) the same comments would apply. In practice, there are in the country large employers' organisations that encompass small or large enterprises; therefore, their freedom to organise is not restricted. As regards the prohibition of more than one union per undertaking (section 346) this provision refers specifically to the possibility of forming one "works union" which does not mean one "union by undertaking", since this provision permits the existence of two or more trade unions (for example by branch of activity, or by undertaking) in addition to the works union. This is the situation as it occurs in practice. As regards the requirement that 75 per cent of the members of a union be Panamanian (section 347), the Committee of Experts considers that these questions are better dealt with in the trade unions by-laws. It goes without saying that the possibility of a greater number of foreigners being admitted to trade unions, by way of statutory provisions, would not guarantee territorial sovereignty, nor the purity of decisions taken by the social institutions in favour of Panamanians. The State would abdicate its constitutional function of protection of the native manpower in favour of the trade unions, which could preclude the majority of the workers of the country. It can also be asserted that the Panamanian trade unions - which consider that the number of work permits given to foreigners is excessive - would not like to see an increase in the percentage of foreigners permitted by section 347. As regards the automatic removal from office of a trade union officer in the event of his dismissal (section 359) this provision applies only to works unions as provided for by the language of this provision, and not to the branch or works unions, nor to the federations or central organisations. When a union officer loses his worker status, his links with the workers' organisation of that undertaking are also severed. As regards the authorities' wide powers of supervision over the records and accounts of trade unions (section 376, paragraph 4) the Government undertook to study - with the participation of the trade union - the possibility of excluding this obligation from the legislation. In practice, this provision has not been applied for many years; the Government therefore undertook to amend this obsolete provision. Concerning the exclusion of public servants from the scope of the Labour Code and the fact that they don't have the right to organise and bargain collectively, it must be noted that the draft Bill on the Public Service could not be discussed last year in the Legislative Assembly in view of the priorities that the public authorities had to consider in view of the current situation in Panama. In spite of this, the Council of Ministers again tabled that Bill on 25 May 1988 in the Legislative Assembly so that it could be discussed and adopted. In practice there is a large federation of public servants which carries on union activities and has all the prerogatives of unions. Sooner or later, the public servants will have to be covered by the Labour Code.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the explanations given and for the fact that she readily admitted that some legal provisions contrary to the Convention should be modified or abolished. There are certain difficulties in the practical application of the Convention, as indicated by the complaints presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association by employers' and workers' organisations. The Workers' members welcomed the fact that the Government wanted to establish a dialogue on the application of the Convention, that it undertook to suppress the powers of supervision and control over the affairs of trade unions, and that it has tabled a draft Bill on public service in the Legislative Assembly. The Workers' members hoped that, as requested by the Committee of Experts, the draft law would grant public servants the right to organise and bargain collectively including, in the case of teachers, the right to strike. These are positive steps and it is to be hoped that legislation and practice on these points will be rapidly brought into conformity with the Conventions. As regards the number of workers necessary to establish an union, the prohibition of more than one undertaking union and the loss of status of trade union officers in case of dismissal, the Government representative seemed to indicate that, in practice, there is no problem of application of the Convention on these points. If that is the case, the Government should amend the legislation to bring it into conformity with the practice and to comply with the requirements of the Convention. As regards the percentage of foreigners who can be members of a union, the Workers' members submitted that foreign workers should be treated equally with native workers, since they contribute equally to the wealth of the country. The Workers' members were surprised to hear the Government representative allege that Panamanian unions would not accept an increase in the percentage of foreigners that could, by law, be union members. In that respect, the Workers' members submitted that unions also must comply with the Convention. The Workers' members concluded by submitting that this Convention has been ratified in 1958 and that for many years there have been serious deficiencies in its application; they hoped that tangible improvements will be adopted in the near future and that the country's law and practice will be brought into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee should examine these questions again next year.

The Employers' members stated that this was a typical case of restriction of freedom of association. The number of workers and employers needed to form an occupational organisation should be a matter of its own choice, and not imposed by legislation. If there are no difficulties in practice, as indicated by the Government representative, it would be advisable to abolish this restriction, as well as restrictions on the right of organisations freely to draw up their Constitution and rules, as they are contrary to the Convention. With regard to the prohibition to create more than one union by undertaking, the Government representative asserted that this prohibition did not exist and that the Committee of Experts had drawn erroneous conclusions in that respect in its report. As concerned the percentage of foreigners in unions, the legislation should not contain such a provision, as noted by the Workers' members. Even if the unions did approve of a limitation on the number of foreign members in a union, such a provision would be open to criticism. Regarding the automatic removal from office of a dismissed trade union officer, this question is also better dealt with in the trade union by-laws than in legislation. The Government's commitment to amend the Labour Code provision which gives the authorities wide powers of control over the unions' internal affairs was the most positive aspect of its statement. The fact that this provision has become obsolete gives reasons to hope that it will be amended. In addition, the Government tabled in the Legislative Assembly a draft Bill which should extend the right to organise to public servants and agents (who are not covered by the Labour Code). The Employers' members generally emphasised that several of these points have been examined repeatedly in the last 20 years (the Government has indeed accepted the observations of the Committee of Experts on some of these issues), and that the legislation could be partially – if not completely – modified. They recalled that, according to the Committee of Experts, the Government had delayed the submission to the National Assembly of the draft legislation to amend the provisions criticised, due to the serious economic crisis that the country is facing. One must be aware, however, of a converse proposition: human rights' violations are sometimes the root cause of social and economic crisis. The Employers' members insisted that the Government give precise indications as to how and when the legislation will be amended. These issues have been raised for so many years that the time has come to bring the legislation in conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' member of Greece indicated that Panama has ratified Convention No. 87, which is not the case of other countries; and yet these other countries participate in the discussions of the present Committee as if they had done so. He strongly emphasised that Third World countries prejudice all migrant workers of these countries by keeping in their legislation provisions similar to section 347 of the Panamanian Labour Code, which limits the percentage of foreign workers entitled to be union members. This is a discriminatory and racist provision which should be abolished.

The Government representative stated that she agreed in substance with the concerns expressed by the previous speaker. The provision in question limiting to 25 per cent the number of foreigners in a union, which could probably be explained by historical reasons, should be made more flexible in the future. She stressed that Panama does not discriminate against foreigners, nor does its legislation. Replying to the Employers' members, she deplored not being able to indicate when the legislation will be amended, since her country is going through an economic and political crisis, and faces serious reprisals and illegal sanctions from a foreign government.

The Workers' members insisted that legislation should not prescribe the maximum number of foreign workers authorised to be members of a union. They added that the Committee did not discuss the political difficulties facing the country, but the social problems that a legal provision may create. They recalled that the Committee has insisted for many years on the necessity of amending the legislation.

The Employers' members indicated that, according to the report of the Committee of Experts, it was the Government which declared that it had delayed the submission of a draft legislation amending the Labour Code, due to the economic crisis, and underlined once again the reciprocal effects of the economic crisis and the respect of human rights. Since the Government representative was unable to indicate when the legislative amendments will be adopted, the present Committee should again examine this case next year.

The Committee has taken note of the information supplied by the representative of the Government and has taken note also of the various opinions and comments expressed in the course of the discussion. The Committee notes, however, that the Committee of Experts has noted in its report the persistence of divergences, on the one hand between the law, the Labour Code, and on the other hand the practice and the full implementation of the Convention. It notes, however, in this respect that work to amend legislation has been undertaken. The Committee therefore expresses the hope that legislation will shortly be brought into line with the Convention on the points which the Committee of Experts noted since 1973. It finally hopes to be informed of any changes that may take place in this respect, and hopes that this will take place as of next year.

Philippines (ratification: 1953). The Government representative informed the present Committee that Senate Bill No. 530 and House Bill No. 11524 mentioned by the Committee of Experts had already been consolidated and enacted into law as Republic Act 6715. This law became effective on 21 March 1989, just prior to the termination of the Committee of Experts' session. A copy of this law would be submitted to the Committee of Experts for its information and examination. The rules and regulations implementing Act 6715 were signed by the Secretary of Labour and Employment on 24 May 1989 after about two months of tripartite consultations and deliberations; they would also be sent to the Committee of Experts. He trusted that the Committee of Experts would find that most, if not all, its concerns are answered by these documents. He pointed out that, since the new Government came into power and Congress became operational, the Labour Code had undergone two amendments: Executive Order No. 111 of 1986 and Act 6715 of 1989. The speaker said this was not a bad record considering the relatively short period in power of the current administration and the time required for public hearings and tripartite deliberation in this connection. He added that the National Tripartite Review Committee, which was now a permanent mechanism, convened regularly for the purpose of reviewing legislation so that necessary amendments could be formulated and introduced to give full meaning and effect to the present Convention.

The Workers' members noted that problems under the Convention had been addressed by the Committee on Freedom of Association and, for several years, by the Committee of Experts to the effect that the legislation was not in conformity with the Convention. It was now time to act. They understood that the country had known a dictatorship which had probably hindered action, but the new regime had been in place for three years and should be in a position gradually to improve its legislation and practice. They were aware that the country still suffered economic difficulties and high unemployment, as well as the internal problem of the guerrillas. This was not the subject under discussion here, but it cost much in terms of money and human lives. The tripartite activities referred to could be a means of realising progress, and they were pleased to note that a new law had been promulgated, coming into force March 1989. They hoped that this legislation had been, or would be, transmitted to the Committee of Experts for examination so that it would be able to see whether progress had been made. They also hoped that most, or all, of the comments outstanding for so long would be met by this legislation and that the present Committee would be in a position to note its conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' members noted that this case concerned a series of provisions relating to and interfering with freedom of association, and that some were useless and therefore should be eliminated. They referred the Committee of Experts' comments on the restrictions imposed on the right to strike, recalling that these were the sort of cases where the employers had a differing view as to the requirements of the Convention. In any case, the current legislation contained enough problems concerning conformity with the Convention; for example, interference in the internal affairs of the unions. A certain number of points might be resolved by the new law which had been drawn up following tripartite consultations; however, a series of other legislative measures were still necessary. They hoped that in the reasonable and foreseeable future there would be amendments since, for 25 years, there had been divergence between law and practice and the requirements of the Convention.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative and of the debate which took place. The Committee noted with interest that certain draft laws had been adopted and called on the Government to send the texts in question to the ILO so that the Committee of Experts could examine them. Taking into account the importance of the points raised by the Committee of Experts, the Committee requested the Government to take all necessary measures to bring about rapidly full conformity between the legislation and practice and the Convention. The Committee hoped that the Government would, in its next report, be in a position to indicate significant progress in the application of the Convention on all the points raised by the Committee of Experts.

Poland (ratification: 1957): The Government has communicated the following information:

In the report submitted to the International Labour Office in February 1989 the Government informed about the opening of the Round Table Conference aiming, inter alia, at reaching agreement on a new pluralistic model of trade unions. The purpose of this written communication is to present up-to-date information on the results of the Round Table (ended on 5 April 1989) and on subsequent changes in legislation during the period April-May 1989.

The participants of the Round Table agreed, inter alia, that in order to ensure the workers the right to establish and join the trade unions of their own choosing and, particularly, to enable legal activity of the Independent Self-governing Trade Union "Solidarity" and of other trade union movements, the Trade Unions Act of 8 October 1982 should be amended without delay and that respective amendments would:

- ensure that free establishment and registration by workers of the trade unions, including the registration of the nation-wide trade unions, as well as free creation of the trade union organisational structures on branch, territorial, occupational or other principles, in accordance with the ILO Conventions, particularly Conventions No. 87 and 98.
- determine principles of co-operation of trade unions in enterprises in matters connected with collective and individual representation of rights and interests of workers in their relations with the manager of the enterprise and organs of the workers' self-management.
- ensure equality of all the trade unions, including in particular, equal rights of trade unions which are representative for workers of the majority of enterprises.

On 7 April 1989 the Parliament (Sejm) adopted the Act amending the Trade Union Act, 1982. Amendments took into account all above-mentioned agreed points.

It should also be noted that immediately before their adoption, the Government consulted the ILO concerning the main provisions of the Amending Act.

Participants of the Round Table recognised also the necessity of carrying out further amendments of the Trade Union Act 1982, particularly of its articles concerning collective disputes, the right to strike and the categories of employees not allowed to form and join trade unions.

On 7 April 1989 the Sejm also adopted the new Act on trade unions of individual farmers, implementing the principles of the trade union pluralism in agriculture. In accordance with this Act, individual farmers running farms and their family members working with them on the farm are entitled to establish and join trade unions of individual farmers for the protection of their rights and professional interests. Trade unions of individual farmers are self-governing and, particularly, they have the right to determine the aims and programmes of their activity, adopt statutes and other acts concerning their activity as determine their internal organisational structures. They are independent and are not subject to supervision and control of the state administrative authorities. These authorities should refrain from any activity leading to the limitation of the independence of the trade unions in their activity carried out in accordance with law.

Trade unions functioning on the basis of this Act have the rights and obligations accorded by the law to socio-occupational organisations of farmers in the field of representation and defence of rights and interests of farmers.

The Act recognises the principle of equal treatment by the State, and the self-management organs of trade unions of farmers and socio-occupational farmers' organisations, in the field of their activity.

As a result of the above-mentioned changes in legislation, the following trade unions have been registered by Polish courts: Independent Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarity", on 17 April 1989; Independent Self-Governing Trade Union of Individual Farmers "Solidarity", on 20 April 1989. These trade unions are nation-wide organisations.

The Government wishes also to inform that on 7 April 1989, the Sejm adopted one more Act – the Act on Associations – which abrogated the Decree of the President of the Polish Republic of 1932. The new Act creates conditions for full implementation of the freedom of association guaranteed by the Constitution. It ensures to all citizens, whatever their religion or opinion, equal rights of active participation in the public life of the country and of expressing different views and realising their interests. An association is a voluntary, self-governing and durable organisation of non-lucrative character. It independently determines its aims, programmes of activity and organisational structures as well as adopts internal acts concerning its activity. It is prohibited to organise associations based on the principle of absolute obedience of members to the authorities of the association. The Act provides that no one may be forced to join the association or leave it. No one may be punished due to his membership of the association or for staying outside it. The right of association may be limited only in cases provided for by the law, justified by national safety reasons, public order, health protection, public morality or reasons of protection of rights and freedoms of other persons.

In addition, a Government representative referred to the written information which had been submitted to the ILO. This information related to recent changes directly affecting the implementation of Conventions Nos. 11, 87 and 98.

As far as Convention No. 87 was concerned, the Act of 7 April 1989 is of primary importance. It abolishes former restrictions on the establishment and functioning of trade unions – especially the stipulation that there could be only one trade union at each enterprise. It ensures freedom in the choice of principles on which the structure of trade unions should be built, including in particular the right to establish unions on a territorial basis. It ensures the equality of all trade unions. It sets out the principles of co-operation between trade unions in enterprises. Also on 7 April 1989 legislation was adopted to give effect to the principle of trade union pluralism in agriculture. Finally, an Act of 24 May 1989 makes provision for the re-employment of persons who had been dismissed for trade union activities after 13 December 1981. This last provision has a direct relation with the need for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination which is incorporated in Convention No. 98.

The speaker then referred to the Act on Associations which was also adopted on 7 April 1989 and which created conditions for the full implementation of the principle of freedom of association guaranteed by the Constitution of Poland. He stressed also the importance of the Act on Oblivion of 29 May 1989 which was not just a simple amnesty provision, but rather it entirely obliterates all convictions imposed in respect of strikes of other protests committed after 31 August 1980.

Both of these latter measures were consistent with the spirit of recent political and legal changes in Poland. They were helping to create more appropriate conditions for the implementation of the Conventions, and in a sense could be regarded as guarantees of their full implementation.

He noted that the independent Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarnosc" had been registered on 17 April 1989, and that a parallel organisation for individual farmers had been registered on 20 April 1989. These bodies had been registered in addition to existing unions, most of which were affiliated to the All-Polish Alliance of Trade Unions. All of the most representative unions in the country were part of his country's delegation to the present International Labour Conference.

Referring to employers' organisations, he noted that in January 1989 the Association of Employers in Poland had been established. This organisation combined employers from the state, co-operative and private sectors.

Turning to the further intentions of the Government, it had been agreed at the Round Table Conference that further changes to the Trade Union Act, 1982, would be introduced at a later stage. These changes would deal with collective disputes and strikes – and in particular would simplify procedures associated therewith. It would also deal with those groups of employees who were not permitted to form or join trade unions. This category included prison officers – a matter which had been raised on a number of occasions by the Committee of Experts, and which had been discussed in this present Committee. Implementation of these changes would complete the second stage of the agreed revision of the Trade Union Act.

He also announced that his Government had decided to establish a tripartite committee for co-operation with the ILO. A preparatory meeting had been held on 1 June 1989, and it was hoped to establish the committee in September, or in the early autumn. The Government also intended to examine the possibility of ratifying Convention No. 144 on tripartite consultation. This was further evidence of the Government's positive attitude to the ILO, and consultations within the Committee would have a direct bearing on the attitude of the Government to the practical implementation of ratified Conventions and to Conventions which had not yet been ratified by Poland.

He stressed the importance which the Government had always attached to dialogue within the present Committee. He recalled that two years ago the Government had stated that the question of union pluralism remained open, and that the then-current restrictions were of a transitory nature. It had said that future developments in this regard depended upon the general situation in Poland, and it had appealed for understanding and patience. In 1988, the Government had been able to indicate some measures undertaken to change the legislation, and in February 1989 it had announced the holding of a Round Table Conference aimed at, inter alia, the creation of trade union pluralism. The information presented to the present Committee showed how serious the Government's intention had been on previous occasions.

The Workers' members noted that a great deal had happened in Poland in recent times. They found the progress which had been made in this case refreshing, comforting, encouraging and very different from the criticisms and difficulties which were found in most cases.

They were aware that the application of the Convention had been the subject of comments by the present Committee, by the Committee of Experts and by a Commission of Inquiry. It was clear from reading the report of the Committee of Experts, and from what the Government had told the present Committee, that there had been real progress in this case – even though not everything had yet been put right. One sign of progress was the establishment of a national council charged with the reform of all labour legislation in Poland – a body which was actively co-operating with the ILO in its work. A further sign of progress was the setting up of a group of experts within the Ministry of Labour to deal with human rights, and to examine conformity between legislative provisions and human rights Conventions.

The changes which had been made were most welcome, and were most encouraging. However, much remained to be done, and it was important that the Government did not cease in its endeavours to bring law and practice into conformity with the Conventions.

Finally, they asked whether the Government could indicate if the amendments relating to collective conflicts and the right to strike would be introduced in the near future.

The Worker member of Poland expressed his sincere appreciation of the work of the present Committee in helping to convince the Government to reopen dialogue with the workers represented in "Solidarnosc".

He found the statement of the Government representative to be a reflection of the spirit of dialogue which had led to the Round Table Conference. The co-operative attitude of the Government was most welcome, and Solidarnosc wanted to promote continuing dialogue through the tripartite machinery. However, there was a problem in that one partner was missing. There was a need to counterbalance the Government as an indirect employer with representatives of direct employers. This was not yet possible.

The consensus at the Round Table Conference had simply been a starting-point for further negotiations which were necessary to deal with a number of urgent issues. In that context, the speaker asked the Government representative to comment on five points: (1) the need for fundamental reform of the Labour Code; (2) the strengthening of collective bargaining; (3) the repeal of legislative measures which provided for discrimination in employment and for forced labour in certain circumstances; (4) the extension of trade union rights to areas which had been categorised as "essential" after the declaration of martial law; and (5) the introduction through the country's Constitution of the direct applicability of ILO Conventions. Many of these were sufficiently clear as to permit direct application through the judicial process, rather than just by means of legislative reference.

These five points involved the repeal of remnants of martial law which had permeated the existing legislation, and also provided a framework for developing a new labour law system based upon respect for ILO standards.

Referring to the principles of freedom of association, the speaker fully concurred with the conclusion of the Committee of Experts at paragraph 148 of their 1983 General Survey on Freedom of Association and collective bargaining to the effect that "although the Convention clearly does not aim to make trade union pluralism compulsory, pluralism must be possible in every case". By the same token, he could not accept the proposition that a union monopoly encouraged employee integration and more effectively represented the interests of the workers. More and more States were abandoning this outmoded approach. It was surprising, therefore, to find that a minority of the Committee of Experts still sought to justify the retention of a trade union monopoly by reference to euphemisms such as "socio-economic and political circumstances" or "social realities".

Fundamental universal standards of human rights are inherent and inalienable values irrespective of socio-political system or levels of economic development. The speaker agreed with the Committee of Experts that trade union monopoly imposed directly or indirectly by the law ran counter to the standards expressly laid down by Convention No. 87.

Solidarnosc supported bona fide, new, independent trade unions which were established in Poland, or anywhere else, regardless of the socio-political circumstances of the country concerned.

The Employers' members noted that events had moved rapidly in Poland. In relation to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, there had been positive and substantial developments both as concerned trade union pluralism and anti-union discrimination. The changes which had taken place in relation to these matters were to be welcomed.

They recalled that the Government had an on-going obligation to supply copies of new laws to the Committee of Experts, and to submit timely reports. They also emphasised that a great deal remained to be done. In this context, the Committee of Experts had provided a number of detailed interpretations relating to the Convention, and the Government should not be surprised if it had to appear before the present Committee again at some time in the future. This was said not as a threat, but to help the Government to realise that its task had only just begun.

The Employers' members noted with concern that there were continuing problems associated with the lack of private enterprise in Poland. They urged the Government to adopt programmes to develop free enterprise in their country. They reiterated that there had been giant steps in the right direction, and hoped that the positive attitude demonstrated by the Government would be applied to remaining problems in relation to the present Convention.

The Worker member of France recalled that his organisation, through its member on the Governing Body, had been instrumental in initiating the complaint against Poland which had led to the establishment of the Commission of Inquiry. He had heard of the substantial progress which had been made through the Round Table Conference. This was most gratifying, but it was now necessary to follow through with practical implementation. He hoped that other countries with similar political regimes would witness similar progress in the near future. For such progress to be meaningful, dialogue had to be carried on in good faith, and on a tripartite basis. When the Government indicated that it was considering the ratification of Convention No. 144, he took this as a positive gesture, indicating that the Government meant to press ahead with its reforms. The speaker hoped that they would also look carefully at the implementation of the Conventions which they had already ratified. He hoped that the Committee would, next year, be able to note further progress both in Poland and elsewhere.

The Government member of the United States noted that the information presented by the Government did not constitute a 100 per cent resolution of all problems of law and practice. It would not have been realistic to expect that at this stage. But there nevertheless appeared to be a genuine evolution towards full respect for the principles of freedom of association and the right to organise. She hoped that in the report of the present Committee there would be an expression of satisfaction at the progress which has been made, and an encouragement to further progress in the future.

The Worker member of Liberia expressed satisfaction at the meeting of minds of all concerned in Poland. African workers supported the positive trends, and hoped for even further progress in the future.

The Government representative expressed his pleasure at the fact that his country was being treated neither as especially good nor as especially bad, but as normal.

It was difficult to be definite about when the second phase of the revision of the 1982 Act would be completed – especially in view of recent electoral developments. However, the changes had been agreed upon in principle at the Round Table Conference, so it seemed reasonable to assume that they would be implemented whatever shape the new Government might take.

Turning to the concerns expressed by the Employers' members about the private sector, the Government representative pointed out that this sector was still relatively small in Poland. It accounted for about 35 per cent of the active population (including independent farmers). He acknowledged that there was a problem in relation to employers' organisations. However, the establishment of an organisation in January 1989 had been a positive development, and it was now necessary to see how things worked out in practice.

The speaker considered that the issues raised by the Workers' member of Poland were directed to the Government itself, rather than to the Government representative in the present Committee. They would be dealt with in the proper way, and if necessary, the appropriate legislation would be prepared. Some of this work was already under way. This included the possible abrogation of those provisions of the Act of 1982 which dealt with the punishment of persons convicted of evading work.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the discussion that followed. The Committee noted with interest the evolution of the trade union situation and of collective bargaining, in particular as regards the right of workers to set up the organisations of their choice. The Committee welcomed the fact that the Round Table Conference which had taken place had recognised the need for a modification of the legislation regarding certain points which were raised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee noted with satisfaction that the Government had decided to set up a tripartite committee with responsibility for the examination of social legislation, taking into account the Conventions and Recommendations of the International Labour Organisation.

The Committee expressed the hope that discussion would be continued between the Government and employers' and workers' organisations with a view to continuing to adapt legislation and practice and hoped that all of the texts would be sent to the ILO so that the Committee of Experts would be in a position to examine them.

Romania (ratification: 1957). A Government representative recalled that the observations made by the Committee of Experts were not new and had already been discussed by the present Committee. They basically concerned trade union unity and the link between the Party and the unions which, in the Committee of Experts' opinion, were in contradiction with the principles inscribed in the present Convention. After reaffirming that his Government did not share this point of view, he stressed the conformity of the national legislation and practice with the Convention. He recalled that the unity of the trade union movement was linked to tradition, the origins of which were to be found in the beginning of the workers' movement in his country. The aspiration towards unity in the trade union movement continued to correspond to the desire of all the workers of the world. It was also notorious that, in several countries represented on this Committee, there was a recognised trade union unity. It was incorrect to maintain that trade union unity was imposed in his country through legislation either directly or indirectly. In this regard, article 27 of the Romanian Constitution provided that citizens had the right to associate with a view to forming, in particular, trade union organisations. As for section 2 of Act No. 52 respecting occupational trade unions, it granted to all persons working in the same occupation or in similar occupations, the right freely to establish occupational unions without prior authorisation; no one could be forced to join a union against his will. In addition, under section 17 of Act 52, the establishment, organisation and functioning of occupational unions were freely determined by their members. It was therefore clear from these provisions that the relevant legislation neither directly, nor indirectly, imposed trade union unity.

The Government representative recognised that the Labour Code only mentioned the General Confederation of Trade Unions (UGSR); but this merely reflected a situation existing for over a century of the workers' movement of his country. It was also true that, by virtue of Act. No. 5 of 1978, self-management had been institutionalised. This Act specified that the supreme management forum in economic units was the general assembly of workers and that the executive governing body of this assembly was the workers' council, in which one-third of the members are directly elected by the General Assembly among the workers, irrespective of their membership in the union or other social organisations. Subsequently, in 1981, legislation had been adopted on the creation of the congress of workers' councils, of the national council of workers, of management councils of ministries and other bodies at the national level. These bodies examined and adopted the various economic and social development programmes, as well as the legal regulatory principles before they were submitted to Parliament for approval. It had to be noted that in the management councils of ministries – in addition to the representative of the General Confederation of Trade Unions – there were one-third of the members who represented workers in production units independently of their membership in trade unions or social organisations set up by the workers' councils. As regarded the higher State bodies, workers' organisations other than the General Confederation of Trade Unions were also represented, for instance: the Central Union of Craftmen's Cooperation; the Central Union of Agricultural Production Cooperatives; the Central Union of Consumers' Cooperatives, etc. In our conceptions and practice, the participation of workers to the decision-making process is the expression of the concrete and real possibility given to all the citizens of the country – without any discrimination – to participate in the direction of the society, on a global plane and at all the administrative and socio-economic levels, a direction conceived and implemented within the context of dialectical unity of its constitutive components: the elaboration and adoption of decisions, their practical implementation and the control on their method of realisation. This meant that the Committee of Experts' conclusions that the GCTU had the exclusive representation of the workers before the higher state bodies, including the Ministry of Labour, had no real basis.

With regard to the links between the Communist Party and the trade unions, his Government still considered that Article 3(2) of the Convention, which referred to the public authorities and not political parties, was not relevant to this question. The speaker recalled that, in Romania, the public authorities were the following: the Government, the Council of State and the Great National Assembly. Consequently, the Committee of Experts' references to article 26 of the national Constitution and to section 165 of the Labour Code, which laid down the role of the Party as a guiding political force went beyond the legal aspects of the question and dealt with problems that were not covered by the Convention.

In conclusion, the Government representative considered that Romanian legislation covered the provisions of Convention No. 87. Union monopoly and the links between unions and the Party are historical realities which existed long before the ratification of Convention No. 87 by Romania. These realities do not result from the legislation but from the workers' will itself. At the present time, they continue fully to reflect their will. However, given that certain provisions could give rise to misunderstandings, the Romanian authorities were continuing to take pains to make them clearer. After all, the democracy achieved until now in Romania was not considered to be an immutable system. As in other areas of activity, it could be perfected and subject to adaptation to real conditions which were in constant evolution. This explained why the five-year plan for 1991-95 stressed continuing improvement in the organisation and management of the global social and legal system which would, no doubt, mark a new stage in the development of participative democracy in his country. The Committee of Experts would be kept informed.

The Workers' members, after indicating that the discussion of this case could enable the repetition of a number of observations which had already been made on several occasions, recalled that a complaint had been presented by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) to the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning a number of very specific points. In 1990, logically, the Conference should have information on the state of the question. They expressed their concern at the statement of the Government representative who rejected the interpretation given by the Committee of Experts, and they feared that the situation was a stalemate. They wondered whether the examination of this case would not better be handled by another body, and asked the Governing Body whether it would be opportune to have a Commission of Inquiry or some other procedure given the fundamental divergence which had existed for a great many years. They believed that the most important problem was to know whether in a country like Romania there were trade union organisations other than the organisation which existed today. It was unimaginable that, if in Romania there was total freedom for workers to create trade union organisations of their own choosing, there were no organisations other than the Confederation which existed, and which was therefore unique. Indeed, one could have a theoretical text, but in practice other measures, in particular threats, could make implementation of that text impossible. According to article 26 of the Constitution, the Romanian Communist Party guided the activities of mass organisations. Consequently, in their opinion, even if one tried to distinguish between the public authorities and political authorities, they were in reality one and the same authority.

In addition, section 165 of the Labour Code laid down that trade unions should mobilise the masses in order to carry out the programme of the Romanian Communist Party. Sections 113, 116, 119, 122 and 153 of the Code entrusted one expressly named trade union – the UGSR – with the exclusive duty of representing the workers. These provisions showed that the existence of free unions able to draw up their proper statutes in full independence with regard to the UGSR and the Communist Party, was questionable. The Workers' members also noted that there was no more talk of new legislation on trade unions to which reference had been made at a certain time. In view of the Committee of Experts' report and the discussion in the present Committee, they hoped that the Committee on Freedom of Association would be in a position to clarify the situation.

A Worker member of France recalled a number of facts showing that the allegations presented by the Government representative did not stand up to close examination. For example, in June 1988, 34 workers from an armaments factory who had met to discuss the creation of an independent union had been arrested by the police and a number of them were still in prison today. Several dozen workers were still detained following the demonstrations in Braşov, which took place in November 1987, despite a so-called amnesty decreed in 1988. Even worse, between 50 and 80 workers had been reported missing since these events, and 60 workers had been sentenced to terms of imprisonment of as long as three years for having attempted to establish independent unions. Other attempts had been made in June 1988, but were met with brutality against arrested persons, who were transferred to other jobs and subjected to severe conditions. One worker who had tried to form an independent group of workers in September 1983 was still serving a ten-year prison sentence. The present Committee's attention also had to be drawn to the fact that the physical safety of Romanians living abroad had also been threatened; several dissidents had received death threats, while not wishing to enumerate situations of this kind, the speaker recalled the case of those who, only because they had participated in meetings, had been dismissed and found themselves under constant police threat and brutality during repeated arrests. All these facts showed that the ICFTU's complaint was more than ever justified and the inquiry that would be carried out would show that the information supplied by the Government representative had no other aim than to delude, giving the impression that it was a non-reply.

The Employers' members pointed out that since at least 1974, the Committee of Experts had been requesting Romania to amend its legislation on the issues that were being discussed here. Until now, the Government had replied to these demands in varying ways. For two years in succession, the Government did not appear before the present Committee. Sometimes it used a Member of arguments saying that the facts put forward were not correct, or the legal basis was different, or the assessment made by the Committee of Experts was totally wrong. In the end, the Government indicated that, in the future, the question could be debated. While it was true that the problem of trade union unity was not unique to Romania, the reasons given by the Government representative, in particular the tradition reason, were quite irrelevant. The fact that, traditionally, there were many unions or only one union, was not part of the present Committee's discussions, since that was not the point in the present Convention. What the Convention required was that there be the real possibility of freely creating unions and employers' organisations. The institutionalisation in the legislation of trade union unity was a serious violation of freedom of association. The same went for the very close links with a political party laid down in the Constitution. In this respect, the reply given by the Government representative had been extremely vague. He had started by denying the existence of such a link, then he had stated that there could indeed be reflection on it. According to the law as it stood, trade unions in Romania had no possibility to draw up their own statutes and, on the contrary, were tied to those of the UGSR.

It was an undeniable fact that the violations of the Convention covered three points: trade union unity laid down in the law; the existence of a close link with the Communist Party; and the absence of any autonomy as regarded internal statutes. This meant that there was no independence for collective bargaining, which was naturally a fundamental element for freedom of association. In the absence of detailed information from the Government representative, particularly on the amendments which had to be made, the Employers' members regretted to have to observe that both the legislation and the practice in Romania constituted a violation of the Convention which had lasted for a very long time. That was why they insisted urgently that the situation be changed.

The Government representative, while rejecting the assertion that his Government had violated Convention No. 87, emphasised that the present Committee was not the place to discuss the complaint presented by the ICFTU. His Government had already communicated a preliminary reply on it, and a final reply would soon be drafted.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and of the debate that ensued. The Committee expressed its deep concern at the fact that the Government had not taken any measures in response to the comments that had been made by the Committee of Experts for a number of years and it recalled the importance of the questions raised in the observation of the Committee of Experts. It urged the Government to adopt very rapidly the amendments required to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

United Kingdom (ratification: 1949). A Government representative recalled that, as a founding member of the ILO, his country continues to support its aims, objectives and activities. He then pointed out that public service workers in his country have broader freedoms to organise, bargain and strike than public servants in most other countries, and indeed are treated no differently from workers in other sectors of the economy. By contrast, in other cases considered by the present Committee, public servants had been entirely or partly barred from the right of association.

The Government appreciated the work done by the Committee of Experts, which had a difficult and complex task in looking at the application of conventions and interpreting them in the light of national laws and in the context of the diverse socio-economic factors and institutional structures in each country. The Committee of Experts was a distinguished authority in law whose opinions were respected. But in complex areas there were often divergent views, even among experts and within rational and democratic organisations – of which the ILO must surely rank as a leading example – it should be possible to say: yes, we understand why you came to these conclusions, but we think it is possible to make a different interpretation.

The Government's actions in respect of the General Communications Headquarters of Cheltenham (GCHQ) were taken solely in the interests of protecting national security. Although the GCHQ was not part of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, it was in fact one of the security and intelligence services and formed an integral part of the United Kingdom's organisation for defence and national security. It provided vital indispensable operational support to the armed forces of the United Kingdom and its allies, including a continuing watch for any form of armed hostile activity. The speaker conveyed his Government's disappointment with the Committee of Experts' rejection of the argument that the workforce at GCHQ might fall within the scope of the "armed forces exemption" in Article 9 of the Convention. The functions of GCHQ were very closely connected with those of the armed forces and the Government found it hard to believe that GCHQ would not fall within the spirit of the exemption. Consequently, this was very much the kind of borderline case which Convention No. 151 was designed to clarify. GCHQ should operate continuously if national security needs were to be met and there had been severe disruption there through industrial action, with 10,000 work-days lost between 1979 and 1981. The Government's actions had been taken in the firm belief that it was unacceptable to have a top secret intelligence establishment vulnerable to national strike action.

In framing its Conventions, the ILO had taken account of the special issues which in matters of national defence and security; Convention No. 151 contained a specific exclusion clause for those involved in work of a highly secret or confidential nature. In formulating its action on GCHQ the Government took the view that it remained within the letter and spirit of these instruments. Convention No. 87 could and should be examined in conjunction with Conventions Nos. 98 and 151. It appeared to the Government that because of earlier disputes about the application of Convention No. 87 to the public service, an instrument dealing specifically with this area – Convention No. 151 – had been adopted and this new Convention took precedence over the generality of Convention No. 87. The Government's interpretation of the preamble of Convention No. 151 was that it had been adopted with the two earlier Conventions in mind. Conventions Nos. 87 and 151 were interwoven with each other to such an extent that the power in Article 1(2) of the latter Convention to disapply the guarantees provided by that Convention would be of no utility or practical effect unless it was intended to have the effect of disapplying also the associated provisions of the earlier Convention. This meant it was for governments to determine – by means of national law and regulations – the extent to which the protections provided for in the Convention applied to public service workers engaged in highly confidential work: this was precisely what the Government had done.

The speaker noted that the Committee of Experts stated in its observation that the supervisory bodies of the ILO have consistently disagreed with the Government's view. The speaker indicated, however, that the same Committee previously acknowledged (in its report to the 1985 Conference) that the interpretation of the Conventions adopted earlier by the Committee on Freedom of Association was not the only sustainable one and was not necessarily definitive. The Committee of Experts was on record as recognising the difficulties inherent in interpreting the interrelation of these Conventions. In addition, the Court of Appeal in the United Kingdom specifically considered this issue, concluding that the Conventions should be read together and that Article 1(2) of Convention No. 151 took precedence over Convention No. 87. Therefore, the Government did not believe that its actions at GCHQ represented a breach of Convention No. 87.

The Government noted the Committee of Experts' expression of regret that 13 employees at GCHQ have been dismissed because of their refusal to give up membership in the union of their choice. The Government also deeply regretted the necessity of that action, which was not taken lightly. The speaker then set these dismissals in the context of developments at GCHQ, every opportunity was extended to the small group of staff who retained their membership in a national trade union to accept the terms and conditions of employment that were introduced on that date or, where practicable, to transfer to other employment in the Civil Service. The overwhelming majority of staff at GCHQ (98 per cent) accepted the new conditions of service. Nearly all the remainder either transferred voluntarily to suitable posts elsewhere in the Civil Service where they could retain their union membership, or opted for voluntary departure with the generous compensation normally paid in cases of redundancy. On 15 July 1988, the Government wrote to the remaining 18 employees who had either failed to leave their national trade union, or had rejoined trade unions after initially accepting the new terms of service, formally enquiring whether they were still members of a national trade union and reminding them that, if they were members, they were in breach of their conditions of service. On 29 September 1988, the Government announced that it proposed to transfer the few remaining trade unionists for whom alternative posts could be found; to terminate with compensation the employment of the so-called "non-optants" – those who had refused either to leave their union or to be transferred – for whom there was no realistic chance of finding alternative posts; and to institute further disciplinary proceedings against the "rejoiners" – those who had initially accepted the new conditions of employment but subsequently resumed their union membership – if they did not agree to leave GCHQ voluntarily with compensation. The possibility was, of course, at this stage, still open to those concerned to accept the conditions of employment at GCHQ and to remain there, and the government very much hoped that they would do so. By the end of October 1988, 17 trade union members remained at GCHQ. Of these, ten were "non-optants" and seven were "rejoiners". Of these 17, three were transferred to alternative jobs within the Civil Service, one rejoinder accepted premature retirement; and the remaining 13 were dismissed. Of the 13 who were dismissed, the seven non-optants received generous compensation and the six rejoiners received, ex gratia, six months' salary in lieu of notice. There are now no members of national trade unions at GCHQ, but there is a staff association which enjoys many of the rights of collective organisation except the right to strike. Over half of the employees at GCHQ are members.

The Government noted the Committee of Experts' view that it should undertake renewed negotiations with the relevant national trade unions. In fact, discussions were held with the national trade unions following the Government's announcement of 25 January 1984, and in those discussions the unions urged that a "no disruption agreement" would provide adequate safeguards. These proposals, which were of a limited nature, leaving the determination of the areas to be covered by the agreement for later negotiation, were very carefully considered by the government but had to be rejected, as they did not provide sufficient guarantee that conflicting pressures would not produce difficulties in the future. Support for this conclusion was taken from the fact that the draft "no disruption agreement", which had been tabled by the Council of Civil Service Unions, was subsequently repudiated by two of the main trade unions concerned at their 1984 annual conferences. The unions formally rejected any negotiations directed towards the possibility of concluding a no-strike agreement at GCHQ. The Government recognised that the trade unions subsequently indicated that they might change their position on this point, but this possibility itself supported the Government's position. It was essential in the national interest to ensure the uninterrupted future operation of GCHQ and, clearly, this could not be guaranteed if agreements entered into by the unions representing the workers concerned could be repudiated at any time in the future as a result of a change in position of the unions concerned. The Government was also aware that very few trade unions in the United Kingdom had been prepared to enter into no-strike agreements and that a union which would voluntarily sign such an agreement, to ensure arbitration rather than strikes as the end result of any dispute, could find itself in severe difficulties with the rest of the trade union movement. Thus, for example, the Electrical, Electronic, Telecommunication and Plumbing Union (EETPU) was expelled from the Trades Union Congress (TUC) in September 1988 after entering into single-union no-strike agreements with two private companies. The Government therefore considered that in the specific context of GCHQ, and the national defence interests it served, further negotiations with the relevant trade unions could not possibly serve any useful purpose.

While, in the Government's view, the traditions and culture of British trade unions would make it impossible to revert back to representation by national unions at this particular defence establishment, the Government's action, was limited to GCHQ within the organisational control of the armed services; If the workers at GCHQ, undertaking the same tasks within the same establishment, had been reclassified in this way then no issue would arise under the convention: it would have been an apparently easy solution. However, it would not have been a solution which, in the Government's view, was possible, either in principle or in practice. At the level of principle, the people working at GCHQ were civil servants with contracts of employment as civil servants; it would have been a breach of those contracts and of the basic rights of these workers to reclassify them; these workers certainly would have strongly and rightly objected to such an action. It followed, therefore, that if such change was to take place, it would have to be done over a very long period of time. However, the people working at GCHQ had very specific and very rare skills and the practical problems of implementing such a change were considered to be insurmountable. The government, therefore, took the view that for reasons of principle and for reasons of practice such a change was not possible.

In conclusion, the Government maintained that its action on GCHQ was not an attack on freedom of association or on trade unionism, but was taken solely in the interests of securing its national defence. Over the period since 1984 when it announced the action, the Government had made every effort to accommodate the small minority of workers who were not able to accept the new conditions of service. The outcome was not perfect, but in the context, might be seen as one which was both reasonable and practicable, and which left the United Kingdom well within the spirit, and indeed the letter, of ILO Conventions. If Conventions were to be effective, interpretation must not be too narrow; it must be appropriate, responsible and realistic.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom stated that this was a serious case, because a very deep principle was at stake. He had hoped for a sign of progress, or at least a gesture of conciliation, but it appeared that the Government had never moved from its position and had consistently repeated the same arguments on the many occasions this case was before the present Committee or the Committee on Freedom of Association.

He had listened to the arguments advanced although they were not new.

Firstly, regarding the Government's statement that civil servants generally in the United Kingdom enjoyed broader freedom to organise and to bargain than those of most countries, the speaker replied that the rights provided for civil servants generally in the United Kingdom were those laid in Conventions which the Government had adopted: no more, no less. If the Government was better than other countries it was because those countries infringed the appropriate Conventions, particularly the freedom to associate. By denying the GCHQ workers that freedom, the Government was placing itself in the same position as those countries.

Secondly, as regards the inter-relation of Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 151, the Committee of Experts had already answered the Government's argument. Convention No. 151 does not overrule the important articles of Convention 87. Each time the Government had used this argument the Committee of Experts had rejected it.

Thirdly, the argument that GCHQ workers should be treated in the same way as members of police and armed forces because of the nature of their work, the speaker – while conceding the very special nature of their work – stressed that the Committee of Experts rejected that argument; indeed with very good cause: all these workers had been members of national trade unions for 30 to 40 years; they were then as they are now – civil servants. The Government representative had pointed out himself that it would not be possible for them to be conscripted into the armed forces; they were not members of the armed forces and could not be treated as such.

Fourthly, as regards the argument that the civil service trade unions would not accept a no-strike deal because when this was suggested at one stage it was rejected by two trade unions at their subsequent conference, the speaker pointed out that there was a great difference between seeking a conference's views on a hypothetical case and an actual offer of a binding agreement; the latter had never been put to the trade unions' conferences because no offer of any kind had ever been made by the Government to the unions concerned. Indeed, only a month or two ago, there were discussions with the civil service trade unions which said they would be prepared to negotiate a watertight deal which provided positive assurances of no interruption to the work of the GCHQ. The Government should therefore do what the Committee of Experts had asked them to do – that is to negotiate a no-strike deal; if the British trade union movement refused to negotiate or refused to reach agreement the Government would then have a case that it could confidently present to this Committee. The Government was not asked anything unusual but only to negotiate.

Fifthly, as regards the argument about how generous the Government was in its compensation to dismissed or compulsory transferred GCHQ workers, no price could compensate for a denial of freedom to associate and the right to organise. The Government had already shown its so-called generosity when it bribed GCHQ staff with £1,000 each if they left their unions. The principles laid down in Convention No. 87 were not for sale and could not be bought at any price.

Sixthly, concerning the argument about 10,000 workdays lost, the speaker emphasised that this was not 10,000 of workdays lost to GCHQ. He could not reveal how many staff worked at GCHQ for that was secret information which he was not prepared to reveal, but many thousands of hours were lost each week when a large proportion of the staff went home at the weekend. That put the Government claim into its true perspective. However, the important issue here could take the form of this interesting question: since the strikes took place in 1979 and 1981 and it was 1984 before the Government actually took some measures, was it really a matter of such great urgency as far as the national security was concerned, if it took so much time?

Finally, as regarded the argument based on the judgements handed down by the British and European courts, the speaker conceded that the Government may have won on technicalities but, in this context, only one court was entitled to interpret Conventions under the Constitution of the ILO: the International Court of Justice. The Government representative seemed to argue somewhat perversely that because the possibility existed of having the Committee of Experts challenged in court then ambiguity must therefore exist. The United Kingdom Government was challenging the views of the Committee of Experts. They were creating the ambiguity. The answer to that was that the Committee of Experts had invited the Government, if it wanted to challenge its interpretation, to do so before the International Court of Justice. The Government had not done so and would not do it because, in the speaker's opinion, they already had legal advice as to what the answer might be.

It appeared that the Committee of Experts, in its appeal to the Government, put its final conclusions in about the strongest terms it could use: what the Committee of Experts wanted in fact was negotiations. The present Committee could not come back every year discussing the same thing and was entitled to have the answer to one simple question: will the Government enter into negotiations with the trade unions as the Committee of Experts has recommended, or will it not? This could be answered by a simple yes or no. This Committee should let the Government answer that question and make its judgement.

The Workers' members emphasised that all the relevant information on this case had already been given by the present Committee in its reports of 1987 and 1988, by the Committee on Freedom of Association, by the Committee of Experts – all of which had decided this issue – and, finally, by the Government representative in his present statement. Consequently, there was nothing to add on substance. Although it was decided by common agreement to limit the discussion to the first part of the observations made by the Committee of Experts on the GCHQ, the Worker members noted with concern in the light of the observations of the Committee of Experts and of the discussions which took place these last years, that this was not an isolated case but actually a situation, among many others, where unjustified measures had been taken against unions with the effect that their action, and in particular collective bargaining, was hindered. They wished to emphasise that the arguments raised by the Government representative contradicted both the observations of the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government is ignoring the Committee of Experts' observation that the measures taken against the GCHQ workers form part of a systematic restructuring of the labour relations legislation. They emphasised that this case concerned both Convention No. 151 and Convention No. 87, and raised the issue of public servants' freedom of association and collective bargaining. Convention No. 151 is meant to clarify and add to Convention No. 87, and not to replace it. The public servants' freedom of association and of collective bargaining still raises serious difficulties in this country.

Concerning the alleged necessity of the measures to be taken with respect to the GCHQ, they expressed their surprise, as did the Worker member of the United Kingdom, that the Government had waited until after 1984 to deal with events which occurred in 1979 and 1981. It was disturbing that the Government took such drastic measures as dismissals, since the ILO supervisory bodies had begun the examination of this case.

The Government had not used the possibility of recourse to the International Court of Justice, and refused to negotiate and to take into account the comments of the ILO supervisory bodies. It was worrying that a sort of internal association of GCHQ employees could be established, while the existence of a normal union was challenged. Should one conclude that this type of association is less dangerous than a traditional union for national security? Do public servants lose their patriotism when they organise?

The Workers' members noted with regret that the Government maintained its position and refused to negotiate; therefore, this is a very serious case. They hoped that this case had not reached the point of no return.

The Employers' members recalled that this case had already been examined by the present Committee twice – the first time in 1985 – and that the Government and the Worker members were still at odds. The Employers' members stated that they had no intention to act as arbiters. This case concerned a communications centre where employees have functions comparable to those of military personnel and the Government was not prepared to accept strikes which could have serious repercussions; this position seemed justified. The discussions and negotiations did not produce results and 17 employees refused to cancel membership in their union, as proposed by the Government; 13 of these 17 employees have been transferred or dismissed. This was a very special case which would not affect the United Kingdom economy, wholly or partly. This was a very specific case which would not happen again in other circumstances since its complexity was also due to the difficult distinction between public servants and military personnel, a difficulty which has legal repercussions.

In 1985, when the Committee of Experts first studied this case, it noted in its report that this question went beyond the scope of Convention No. 87 and that this was a very complex situation. The issue was the relationship between Conventions Nos. 87 and 151 and the Committee of Experts then considered it was not in a position to make a decision. In the meantime, the Experts modified their position. The reference made to the International Court of Justice was then legitimate, since under the Constitution the Court was the only body competent to decide on interpretation problems. The question was: who should refer the case to the International Court of Justice? Could a government simply write a letter to the Court? This would be too easy.

The strained relations between the Government and the unions explained that this problem could not be resolved yet and that there was no solution in sight. This case should be replaced within the context of the part of the observations made by the Committee of Experts which would not be discussed this year.

Even before the publication of the report of the Committee of Experts, the Employers' members heard the unions complain that the Government constantly interfered in collective bargaining and that it violated union rights. The issues which were raised now could be debated, and should be examined again by the Committee next year. The Employers' members hoped that the Committee of Experts would examine again these questions in the meantime.

The particularly difficult relations between the unions and the Government are an obstacle to a solution. The question as to whether this communications centre could be integrated with the armed forces was a very difficult question to resolve since it concerned national legislation but, from a theoretical point of view, that solution could be considered. However, the Employers' members would not state whether this solution was the best one.

In any event, in view of the differing points of view, it would be necessary to emphasise in the conclusions that what was at issue in this country was not the freedom of association, but the situation of workers in a given sector which raised serious difficulties. The question had no relation whatsoever to the national economy, nor did it have links with the freedom of association. It should be admitted that positions were sometimes irreconcilable during a certain period, especially when it concerned so unique a sector. The Employers' members recalled that some cases – too many of them – had been discussed for 20 years without any solution or progress. This case was fairly recent and had been discussed three times during a relatively short period. Right now, it seemed that no solution was in sight and the Committee had to note it with regret.

The Worker member from Sweden, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden stated that a well-functioning supervisory system was a basic prerequisite of the ILO, but that the supervision would be meaningless if the member States did not respect the views expressed by the supervisory bodies. The Committee of Experts and the present Committee could examine objectively, independently and impartially cases brought before them. Until recently, their views were considered as binding by the member States, until the International Court of Justice had made a final decision. If that principle was not maintained, the whole work of the ILO would be undermined. Generally, however, there was no problem concerning the interpretations given by the supervisory bodies as the member States usually agreed with the Committees, which was further proved by the fact that only one case had been brought before the International Court of Justice since the founding of the ILO. In the present case, in spite of the unanimous views expressed by the supervisory bodies, 13 employees of the GCHQ had been dismissed because of their refusal to give up membership in the union of their choice. The right to join a trade union or to work for a union is one of the basic human rights. Therefore, it was of the utmost importance that a leading member State of the ILO should not ignore the views of the two Committee unless it took steps to bring the case for a final decision by the International Court of Justice. Any other behaviour would undermine the position of the supervisory bodies and of the supervisory system as a whole. The speaker therefore urged the Government to renew negotiations with the trade unions in order to find a solution consistent with the requirements of the Convention. The only other alternative would be to bring the case before the International Court of Justice.

The Worker member from Poland stated that his organisation was very happy to reappear in the ILO after eight years of official absence, and expressed his appreciation that it had not been forgotten. The speaker stressed that the GCHQ employees had been trade union members in many cases for up to 40 years; there had been no problem for many years and their loyalty was never questioned. Despite the fact that two ILO supervisory bodies reached the same conclusions, and that the trade unions have shown great flexibility and readiness to reach an agreement, the Government regrettably seemed to have rejected the possibility of a negotiated settlement. The credibility of the ILO, from which the Solidarity trade union benefited so much, would be put at risk if its supervisory bodies did not adopt a consistent approach. After so many years of discussion in this Committee concerning the present case, it was necessary, to retain the credibility of the Committee, to strongly draw world-wide attention to the gravity this case represented for workers in the United Kingdom. The GCHQ case is one of principle, the principle of freedom of association and human dignity.

The Employer member of Sweden, commenting on the report of the Committee of Experts, emphasised that he did not suggest that the Experts were not impartial or independent, but he questioned their expertise. The Committee of Experts had forgotten the basic principles governing the interpretation of treaties between States, as could be seen in the increasing number of over-interpretations in the reports of the past few years; he cautioned against that trend. He referred in particular to the present case and expressed the hope that the Experts would reconsider their position in that respect. The GCHQ establishment should be classified in the category of armed forces or police, and only the International Court of Justice could give an authoritative interpretation of the Convention. There were two ways to accomplish this: either the Conference or a majority of the Governing Body could ask for an opinion, or a government other than the United Kingdom or a worker delegate could make a constitutional complaint. The Governing Body could then establish a Commission of Inquiry whose conclusions could be appealed to the International Court of Justice by the Government. This course has now been open for five years and has not been used. Therefore, this Committee should not deal with this case any more, and the workers, if they so wish, could go to the Court by presenting a constitutional complaint.

The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that what was most frightening was the fact that the Government assumed that trade union members were or could be a threat to the national security of the country. This reminded one of the hostile attitude towards the entire workers' movement which existed at the end of the last century. Members of the GCHQ had their own economic and social interests and, like all other employees, they needed the freedom to organise in unions and they had the right to bargain collectively. The Government ignored the findings, considerations, suggestions and demands of the ILO supervisory bodies. This was really a serious case because it was undermining the authority of the supervisory procedures. Meaningful dialogue did not mean one side who speaks and the other who does not listen. The present Committee cannot be satisfied if countries simply ignore its conclusions, because this would threaten its authority.

The Worker member of the Netherlands stated that he was really concerned about the possible consequences of this case for the ILO supervisory system, especially in view of the final comments of the Employers' members. The key sentence in the Government's declaration was, "we understand how the Committee of Experts came to its conclusions but we came to different conclusions and we should be allowed to do it". Back in 1978 there was a debate in this Committee between the Government representatives of the United Kingdom and of the USSR on this very point. The USSR representative had then been defending the point the British Government is now making, and the British representative had then submitted that that position would undermine the whole ILO supervisory machinery if this Committee would accept it. In cases where there were differences of opinion for 20 years, this Committee always showed its concern by expressing its views in a special paragraph. The key question here was: should the present Committee accept the Committee of Experts' views on this case, which included their views expressed in several reports in previous years. In the past two years the present Committee by and large always accepted the views of the Committee of Experts. Consequently the question was: did the Committee of Experts change their interpretation on this Convention, and in this very case this year? That was not so.

The Worker member of the United States commented on the Government representative's statement that it would serve no useful purpose to enter into any further negotiations with the unions involved; this statement greatly troubled him because it was slamming the door shut on any possible solution in consultation with the union, notwithstanding the fact that the latter was willing to reconsider the no-strike agreement sought by the Government. The legal complexities of this case were such that the final arbiter in this matter could only be the International Court of Justice. The speaker stated he would not quarrel with the Government's statement that the British courts had held that somehow there should be a fusion between Conventions Nos. 151 and 87; however, he doubted very seriously that the British courts at the same time indicated that there should be no further resort to resolution or possible compromise on the issue of the no-strike clause in an agreement between the Government and the trade unions. The Government representative never indicated a departure from the normal course of negotiation, reconsideration and re-negotiation if necessary, to resolve a very important problem. On the contrary, he seemed to take the position that the Government had always firmly supported these fundamental principles. Consequently, the present Committee should be preoccupied by such an adamant refusal to re-enter into any negotiations despite the union's indication of its willingness to negotiate on the very issue which is the root cause of the Government's concern in this case.

The Employer member of the United States replied to the comments made earlier by the Worker member of the Netherlands; this appeared to be a case of a "rush to judgement", whereas in fact this case was certainly recent. He further stated that this appeared to be a question of form over substance, since the functions of the GCHQ employees seemed to be inherently military. If these employees had been labelled "military" in terms of their functions, there probably would have been no problem: the fact that they were not so labelled expressly seemed to make a great difference to the Committee of Experts. The speaker also stated that there were really two questions here. Firstly, as mentioned by the Employers' members, on the basis of the 1985 observations of the Committee of Experts, there seemed to be an evolution and changing of the findings on the part of that Committee. Secondly, as was pointed out by the Employer member of Sweden, there was also the question of whether or not the Committee of Experts had in fact over-interpreted or misread this particular Convention. These questions were very different from the nature of the debates that took place in the late 1970s and early 1980s, which were really dealing with questions of application and whether there should be differences in application based on the nature of the political, social and economic views of particular governments.

The Worker member of the Netherlands replied to the previous speaker on two points. Firstly, he clarified that what he said before was that, if the present Committee on a certain case accepted over a number of years the views expressed by the Committee of Experts, the only reason to disagree now could be that the Committee of Experts had now changed their interpretation. Secondly, the speaker explained the criticism he had put forward during his intervention on the Dutch case; he made it clear that he criticised the fact that during a number of years the Dutch trade unions had asked for an interpretation by the Committee of Experts which did not come for a couple of years.

The Government representative stated he would make sure that the points made would be reported to his Government. He clarified some of his previous comments in reply to the Worker member of the United Kingdom, emphasising, first, that whilst the United Kingdom had a common law based system and not a system of law based on positive rights, in reality and in practice, public servants in the United Kingdom have greater freedom of association than in most other countries. Second, this was not a general case on freedom of association but a very specific case, concerning an establishment which was vital to national defence. Third, the trade union representatives had now suggested, after four years, the possibility of a no-strike agreement; to the speakers' knowledge, this had not been mentioned to his Government. Fourthly, the British Government has absolutely never impugned the loyalty either of employees at GCHQ or of the trade unions. However, for reasons of national bargaining across the public service, the national trade unions had used the GCHQ employees as part of a national bargaining strategy. This may have been a legitimate action but it did undermine the credibility of the trade unions in the particular and unique situation of that establishment; this was worrying and troublesome. The speaker stressed again that this was not a general freedom of association situation, but a very unique case due to the special nature of GCHQ; the Government's action in this case was not an anti-union measure, but one taken solely in the interests of national security. In the meeting of the Governing Body which recently took place the new Worker member on the Committee of Freedom of Association pointed out that it was important to make a distinction between what he called "bureaucratic idiocies" and what he termed "monstrous abuses of human rights". The Government did not believe it breached Convention No. 87, but if the present Committee were to find otherwise, the speaker hoped that if fault there was, it lay in the former category. The Workers' members had referred in their comments to special conclusions on this matter; the speaker hoped that this Committee would think very clearly and carefully before agreeing to this. To adopt that type of conclusion for matters that were not fundamental human rights issues would be to undermine the force of a sanctioning policy that the ILO has at its disposal. This Committee should not have double standards, and the universality of the ILO standards should be maintained.

The Chairman of the Committee proposed the following conclusions:

The Committee took note of the information submitted by the Government representative and of the detailed discussions which took place in the Committee. The Committee expressed its concern at the situation discussed by the Committee of Experts, which noted in its report that the GCHQ workers still did not enjoy union rights, contrary to the Convention. It recalled in that respect the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association as regards the GCHQ case. The Committee noted with regret that the Government had dismissed some GCHQ workers during the proceedings pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, and that the Government does not consider that it would be useful to hold negotiations with the workers' associations on the right to organise of workers. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government will reconsider its position, through dialogue with the trade unions, with a view to finding solutions to the factual and legal situation, that would be in full conformity with the Convention. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the next report of the Government requested by the Committee of Experts will contain information on definite developments in this situation, in conformity with the Convention. In addition, the Committee asked the Government to study very carefully the comments of the Committee of Experts on the Employment Act of 1988, and to provide information on the measures it considered taking to implement these comments.

The Workers' members proposed that these conclusions be mentioned in a special paragraph of the present Committee's general report since, although this was an important case which had been discussed on many occasions, the Government had not initiated negotiations with the trade unions concerned and the situation had not progressed.

The Employers' members pointed out that the legislative questions had not been discussed by this Committee and should not be included in the conclusions; if reference to these aspects were retained in the conclusions, the dissenting position of the Employers should be recorded. The proposal that the conclusions be included in a special paragraph was not acceptable: a complex legal question was at issue, which could be finally resolved only by the International Court of Justice; the issue was, who would take the initiative of an appeal to the Court. It followed that the situation was not clear as had sometimes been alleged. The case was not typical. Fortunately, the existence and extent of freedom of association in the country was not at stake; it was merely an individual borderline case which warranted full attention as such and which was being discussed for the third time now. In many other cases, a legal trade union monopoly, depriving all workers of freedom of association, had been debated for over 20 years. There was a question of equality of treatment, so that a special paragraph could not be accepted in the present case.

The Workers' members requested that a nominal vote be held to decide whether this case should be mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Government member of Czechoslovakia, speaking on behalf of a certain number of socialist countries, stated that they were not in favour of solving problems by a vote, but preferred that a solution be sought by other means. However, if a vote was to take place, the complexity of the problems at issue required time for reflection; therefore, they asked that the vote be delayed until a later time, in the hope that the Workers' and Employers' members could reach an agreement in the meantime.

The Government member of the United States wondered whether this case should be pushed so far. She considered that this was not an issue by whether the United Kingdom was a developed or developing country, and that if there had been an egregious violation of freedom of association there would be no question that a special paragraph was merited. Indeed, this was a very special case. She was concerned that a vote on this matter would damage the good will and consensus which were so important to the work of the Committee.

The Government member of France requested that, were a vote to be held, members should have the possibility of explaining their vote.

The Committee adopted the conclusions proposed by the Chairman with regard to the GCHQ issue and decided that, in a later sitting, a nominal vote would be held to decide on the appropriateness of mentioning this case in a special paragraph unless, in the meantime, the Workers' and Employers' members could conclude an agreement on this issue.

At a later sitting the Committee proceeded to a record vote at the request of the Workers' members for the registration of this case in a special paragraph of the report of the Committee.

The results of the vote were as follows: 56,845 votes in favour; 60,398 votes against; 9,555 abstentions. Consequently, the Committee decided not to register this case in a special paragraph of its report.

After the results of the vote had been announced, various Government members went on to explain the reasons for their vote.

A Government member of Sweden, speaking on behalf of the five Nordic countries, stated that the Governments of those countries had agreed with the conclusions adopted by the present Committee in this case, but had voted against a special paragraph because they wished to maintain the particular significance of the special paragraphs, which in their opinion should continue to be reserved for the most serious cases.

A Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany explained his Government's "No" vote, noting that the question voted upon was not whether the United Kingdom had violated the Convention; rather the vote had been about the fundamental principles governing the work of the present Committee: dialogue and consensus. Taking a vote was contrary to consensus and did not contribute to furthering a dialogue, which was sought in this case, in particular by the Workers.

A Government member of Portugal stated that he voted "No" because of the doubts which surrounded an interpretation of the situation. His Government thought this case should be subject to further legal analysis; the present Committee should not adopt a decision which, by its exceptional nature, would have to be seen as final. In addition, in other cases where doubts of interpretation existed, decisions different from the one proposed had been taken; this had to stand in the way of mentioning the United Kingdom in a special paragraph of the report.

A Government member of Australia had disfavoured the inclusion of this case in a special paragraph for the following reasons. The present Committee traditionally reached a consensus view; the approach taken in this case was cause for concern. Having noted the discussion with interest and the special and unique circumstances of this case, his Government none the less thought there might be a technical breach of the Convention. The United Kingdom Government had not moved to address the issues raised by the Committee of Experts and apparently saw no need so to move. The Australian Government supported the Committee of Experts' conclusions. It encouraged the United Kingdom Government to undertake further negotiations with the relevant trade unions to seek, in a manner consistent with the requirements of the Convention, resolution of the issue. However, special paragraphs had previously been used only in respect of gross breaches of human rights, circumstances which did not apply in this case. At this stage, a special paragraph would be a disproportionate response.

The Workers' members regretted the result of the vote; they were also saddened by not having been able to reach a consensus with the Employers' members, as was usually the case. They wished to make it clear that special paragraphs did not represent a judgement; they were merely an indication of which cases had been considered worth highlighting and on which governments and employers' and workers' organisations were invited to try to overcome the difficulties. They believed in the independence, impartiality and objectivity of the Committee of Experts and in the great importance of the Committee on Freedom of Association. They stated that standards and the supervisory machinery existed for both industrialised countries and developing countries; problems in the industrialised countries assumed different proportions from the ones they assumed in poor countries, in so far as there was non-compliance or serious difficulties were encountered, particularly in relation to basic standards, such as freedom of association, they believed that attention should be drawn to this problem as well. The Workers' members explained the reasons why they had proposed the use of a special paragraph: firstly, because they thought all the possibilities of dialogue and conciliation had not been exhausted within the country; secondly, because of the dismissal of 13 workers for faithfulness to their trade union during the course of the procedure before the Committee on Freedom of Association; and thirdly, in order to urge and encourage the British Government not to close the door but rather to reopen negotiations. They expressed their surprise at the narrow margin in the voting results and their satisfaction with the total solidarity shown by the Workers' members, which they considered to be important and historical.

A Government member of Ecuador explained that he had, with much regret, voted in favour of mentioning this case in a special paragraph in the hope that this would spur other countries to reflect on the tendency towards singling out situations in small countries which were sometimes the result of pressure from political interests outside the country. He expressed satisfaction that a democratic vote in connection with the present case had shown that principles of equity were not always violated.

A Government member of the United States declared it was a shame that the situation had become so polarised. Her Government questioned whether this matter should have come to a vote at all. She hoped that the present Committee could now move forward in a positive and constructive manner, on the basis of good will and consensus. A vote had been cast against a special paragraph because its use should be reserved for serious, long-standing and pervasive violations of a ratified Convention; the United Kingdom case did not meet that test. The United States Government firmly believed in the uniform, universal application of ILO standards, regardless of a country's political orientation or level of economic development. In the view of her Government, this had not been a vote for or against a double standard; it had been a vote for or against lowering the standard that the present Committee applies in deciding whether to mention a case in a special paragraph. She declared that her Government was not ready to change the criterion determining whether or not a case should be registered in a special paragraph. Her Government thought that another case discussed recently in the present Committee had also not merited a special paragraph, because there had appeared to be signs that the government in question was taking steps towards the fuller application of a ratified Convention.

A Government member of France stated that he had voted "No", essentially because of the jurisprudence of the Committee. The long-standing work practices of the present Committee allowed stable and objective positions to be taken, whether the country was large or small, industrialised or developing. According to tradition, a special paragraph could be used when the country in question met two criteria; firstly, that it had been under examination for a long time without any progress being made and, secondly, that it was a very serious case of violation of human rights. Each case of a special paragraph had to be put into perspective, that is, related to and compared with others. It had not seemed to him that the present case met the two criteria mentioned above. Finally, he expressed the hope that a return would be made to consensus, which was the usual working method of the Committee.

A Government member of Uruguay explaining his "Yes" vote stated that it had been based on the objective facts described in the Committee of Experts' report, which had said that workers were dismissed while the Committee on Freedom of Association was examining the case. In this sense, his vote constituted support for the ILO supervisory system. He indicated that the same criteria should be applied to other similar and even more serious cases dealt with by the present Committee.

The Government member of the Netherlands stated that a "No" vote had been cast because the Government considered the present Committee should follow its usual procedure of reaching decisions by consensus.

Explaining the reasons for its abstention on the vote, the Government member of Czechoslovakia referred to the earlier expression of his Government's view that such issues should be decided by consensus not by vote. Further, it was his Government's view that sanctions should be applied only in cases of gross and repeated violations of the respective Conventions and where consensus had been reached. His Government had not been fully convinced of the arguments put forward in this case and wondered whether a real issue of principle was at stake, or rather a matter of disagreement between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Committee of Experts over an interpretation of one specific issue covered by Convention No. 87.

A Government member of Bulgaria explained his delegation's abstention in the vote on the basis of his Government's opinion that only dialogue should be promoted in the present Committee and that decisions should be reached only by consensus. A vote was not a dialogue. No matter its outcome, it did not serve the cause of co-operation. He stressed that to achieve better results, emphasis should be placed on dialogue.

A Government member of Turkey wished to explain the "No" vote of his Government. He recalled the mandate of the present Conference Committee, which should not be exceeded; the striking of a balance between North or South, East or West, was up to other United Nations bodies having responsibility in that regard. While his Government had great respect for the Committee of Experts and its report, it did not take the conclusions therein as word of law. The present Committee was supposed to feel free to make a full assessment of all the aspects in the report, without any prejudice in regard to any consideration on a specific country.

A Government member of the United Kingdom noted that his Government had voted "No" because it felt that registration of this case as a special paragraph would be disproportionate and that it would undermine the force of ILO sanctions. This was not a North-South question. It was a question of the norms governing the practice of the present Committee. The Workers' members had, however, demanded a vote and the issue had been put to the democratic process which had now produced its results. His Government thanked the present Committee for its decision, particularly as an indication of the return to a sense of proportion. The Government hoped that the Workers' members would take good note of the outcome.

Convention No. 95: Protection of Wages, 1949

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1973). The Government has sent the following information:

With reference to the Committee of Experts' comments, the labour authorities are considering urgent and necessary measures which might be adopted to ensure effective application of Articles 2, 3, 5, 6, 8(2), 14 and 15 (b) of the Convention and of the Recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry in paragraph 543 of its 1983 report – in particular legislative reforms:

- to prohibit strictly the payment of wages in the form of promissory notes, vouchers, coupons or other negotiable instrument;
- to allow wages to be paid directly to the workers;
- to lay down a general prohibition on employers limiting the worker's freedom to spend his wages;
- to regulate the assignment of wages;
- to take sufficient measures to inform workers of the conditions of payment of wages and the deductions which can be made; and
- to regularise other aspects of the employment of sugar-cane workers.

The Government also provided the following details of the application of the Convention:

Article 2. In practice, the Government repeats, the coverage of the Convention has been widened, although the legislation needed to apply it has not yet materialised. The labour authorities still wish to consult concerned workers' and employers' organisations in order to exclude from the total or partial application of the Convention persons working in conditions of employment in that such application would be inappropriate, or persons engaged in non-manual or domestic or similar work. Amendments to the Labour Code to extend wage protection to all agricultural enterprises, regardless of how many workers they employ or what operations are involved, are being considered.

Article 3. Wages are generally paid in legal tender; payment by cheque is also allowed. Payment by promissory note, voucher or coupon or in any other form in place of currency is prohibited. Payment of Haitian workers' wages in negotiable vouchers has, it is repeated, been abolished by administrative means pending repeal of the provisions of the Labour Code which authorise it. This provision is applied in enterprises of the State Sugar Board (CEA) and Consorcio Vicini operations which had for decades allowed workers to negotiate wage vouchers to third parties. In these enterprises, under administrative arrangements workers receive cash advances, as is the case in the Central Romana.

Article 5. Wages are paid directly to the worker concerned unless the worker is unable to collect them in person and authorises payment by the enterprise to some other person on production of the workers' identity papers. In the CEA, wages are paid to casual workers by chitties which are redeemed each week; while awaiting their wages, workers can use the chitties to buy essential goods at official prices in CEA- and INSEPRE- (National Price Stabilisation Institute) run shops.

Article 6. No employer may in any way restrict the worker's freedom to dispose of his wages. The Government considers that it fully satisfies Resolution No. 1/88 of 10 June 1988, which retroactively to 1 April 1988 laid down that all agricultural workers, whatever their type of employment, receive a minimum wage of RD12 Dominican pesos for an eight-hour day. The Resolution also provided for measures to be adopted as soon as possible to guarantee minimum wages when these workers have task-rate contracts. The CEA presently employs casual workers only for the transport and collection of cane, which is why cutters have increased their productivity and thus attained daily wages above those fixed by the National Wages Committee, since they cut over 2 tons of cane in an eight-hour day.

Circular No. 8 referred to by the United Workers' Organisation (CGT) in its communication of 3 January 1989 has been duly observed and widely distributed among cane workers. In accordance with the 1988-89 rates, administrative measures have been taken to make sure all workers employed in CEA operations receive minimum wages. The labour and CEA authorities will supply the ILO with complete information on the practical application of Circular No. 8 including the wage rates fixed by the CEA, the number of contracts and the daily earnings of workers employed in each process, and the means by which non-CEA plantations are made to observe the agricultural minimum wage.

Article 7. No coercion whatever in respect of workers using any works stores selling goods or services at fixed rates is allowed. The following are the main measures by which it is ensured that, in conformity with Article 7(2), goods are sold at fair and reasonable prices and that there is no exploitation in and around the sugar enterprises and plantations:

- (a) In collaboration with INSEPRE, various public stores have been set up.
- (b) In collaboration with the DGCP (Price Control Department), a price list for essential goods has been drawn up.
- (c) The CEA has substantially increased the production of groceries for sale to its workers as part of the recent Agricultural Diversification Plan.
- (d) Sugar workers can validate their wage advance chitties in CEA plantation shops in collaboration with INSEPRE without any reduction or discount.
- (e) The DGCP regularly inspects private and CEA stores to ensure prices are fixed and to avoid speculation and usury to the prejudice of the workers.
- (f) The CEA has considerably increased the network of non-profit-making businesses both for cash sales and through advance forms (CEA Form No. 1) or letter of payment for daily workers.
- (g) Businesses in and around CEA enterprises have to pay all the rest of the money due to sugar workers when they pay for purchases with written proof of what has been cut, collected or transported.
- (h) All businesses (private or CEA) operating in or around the enterprises and plantations have to accept cash or written proof of what has been cut, collected or transported.
- (i) To avoid arrears of payments to sugar workers and prevent them having to pay with chitties or written proofs of wage advances, in businesses, stores, shops or public selling points providing essentials, payment of wages is made or cancelled weekly.

In and around the Central Romana enterprise there are stores, shops, kiosks and public selling points where the requirements of Article 7 are strictly observed. Central Romana has a detailed and effective Agricultural and Cattle-farming Diversification Programme as part of its overall social plan for the benefit of its own workers and the whole population of the eastern region. The CEA has greatly increased the coverage of its own Agricultural Diversification Programme, especially the Food Programme, which includes vegetable, fish, chicken, pig and rabbit farming, reasonably priced beef, wheat flour and other goods at the public selling points (comestibles, rice, beans, bananas, etc.), and the food supplement programme, according to the CEA Social Development Programme Director. There are other programmes, for instance, for clean drinking water, nutrition and health, and education. The Government is compiling data and will shortly send a full report on the resources spent and the results obtained by the CEA and private enterprises in their compulsory and non-compulsory employees' Agricultural Diversification and Social Assistance Programmes.

Article 8. Deductions from wages are only allowed under conditions fixed by legislation, collective agreement, or tribunal decision for the economic protection of persons under the age of 18 years. In the last case, the size of the deduction is determined as a proportion of the worker's income. Enterprises have to inform workers of the conditions for such deductions. The State Secretariat for Labour's inspection department is vigilant in CEA enterprises and districts in ensuring wage protection measures are applied and that cane is correctly weighed: the latter operation is satisfactorily organised, according to inspection reports, by laying down rules to make sure weighing is accurate (with no reduction for wastage) and done in the presence of the driver, the cutter or a CEA representative who supervises it. All workers may see the weight conversion table and the wage rates in force.

Articles 9 and 10. Any deduction from wages to guarantee a direct or indirect payment by a worker to the employer, his representative or an intermediary for obtaining or retaining employment, and any attachment or confiscation of a worker's wages contrary to the legislation are strictly prohibited.

Article 11. The long-standing practice in the CEA and Casa Vicini of withholding part of cutters' pay as an "incentive" to be paid at the end of the harvest (intended to keep casual workers in their jobs until the end of the harvest) has been abolished. Authorised incentives to cane workers now form part of the weekly wage.

Article 12. Under the legislation wages are paid regularly (weekly, fortnightly or monthly) as the parties to the contract (worker and employer) agree, with the union's consent if there is one. Within a reasonable time of the expiry of the contract, all remuneration due is finally adjusted in accordance with the legislation, collective agreement or decision of an arbitration tribunal. A Bill now before the National Congress would require employers to pay off their workers within ten days. The ILO will be informed of further developments in this regard.

Article 13. This Article is satisfactorily applied. In the CEA, workers are paid at the end of each week somewhere near to the workplace. Advances to the workers are deducted.

Article 14. It is common practice in the country to give workers an appropriate and easily understandable statement of their conditions of wages, a breakdown of how wages are calculated, the time and place of payment, etc. In the CEA, Circulars Nos. 8 and 9 of 20 October 1988 are satisfactorily applied, guaranteeing information on wage conditions to workers known as "ajusteros" who work by the day or the task and workers presenting cut cane by weight, mostly in Spanish and in Creole if necessary. There has been a widespread publicity campaign to inform Dominican and foreign (Haitian) workers living in the country of the incentives and conditions of work and life in CEA operations for the 1988-89 harvest. The campaign covered the whole country and various mediums of communication with the aim of attracting manpower for cutting and collection of cane, at a time when labour is scarce, in the absence of imported labour from Haiti.

In each CEA enterprise the management displays in prominent places texts, in Spanish and Creole, showing the terms of employment contracts binding on the employer and the agricultural worker covering such subjects as wages, living conditions, medical assistance, food facilities, labour discipline, etc. Every CEA enterprise also gives orally full information in Spanish and Creole when a worker is engaged or at work.

Article 15. The labour authorities are considering early measures to apply this Article in full, in accordance with labour legislation in force. The labour authorities have strengthened inspection in the CEA, Casa Vicini and the Central Romana, in order to guarantee sugar workers their rights. Further information on inspection will be sent to the ILO. The CEA has designed its inspection to cover all aspects of plantation work, cutting and transport of cane, sugar milling and production, the Agricultural Diversification Programme, etc. Living and working conditions in CEA enterprises and districts are inspected by the State Labour Secretariat's inspectorate, which has been augmented for this purpose. Inspection also takes place in Casa Vicini and the Central Romana.

In addition see under Convention No. 105.

Iraq (ratification: 1960). The Government representative stated that his Government had closely examined the comments of the Committee of Experts on the payment of wages to Filipino workers in Iraq and noted that that committee had based their observation on the existence of agreement between Iraq and the Philippines. The Government wished to say that there was no such agreement as described in the report and that Filipino workers in Iraq were treated just like Iraqi workers as regards the payment of wages, under Labour Code No. 71 of 1987 and Labour Code No. 95, an earlier document. If there were a document, the Government would be prepared to discuss both its existence and its veracity.

The Employers' members considered that it was unclear if there was a problem; the point, however, remained that this was a case occurring under Convention No. 95 which addressed another issue, namely the protection provided relating to promissory payment of employees, which was prohibited by the Convention. It would appear that the proposal that had apparently been made by the Filipino Government had remained merely a proposal and was not actually agreed to. If that were the case, then there was compliance with the Convention on this point.

The Workers' members thought it was difficult to decide whether the matter was settled, if indeed it was true that no agreement existed between Iraq and the Philippines to pay 40 per cent of wages in dinars and 60 per cent in dollars, but the latter only after two years. If article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention were indeed being applied, then it was for the Committee of Experts to determine, subsequent to the reply from the Government, whether or not there had been full application of the Convention. However, Article 3 did not allow for a time lapse of two years before payment of 60 per cent of wages. If that had not been done, then that was progress already: they hoped the Committee of Experts would be able to ensure that, in this aspect, there was conformity with the Convention. Otherwise, it would be necessary to add other complaints or claims by the Filipino Government or by the workers concerned themselves.

The Government representative reiterated that there had been no such agreement on the part of the Filipino and Iraqi Governments and that Filipino workers in Iraq were treated in the same way as all other foreign workers and just as Iraqi workers as regards the payment of salaries, with the right to transfer part of their salary back to their families.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative and recalled the comments according to which proposals to pay the wages of Filipino workers in Iraqi territory were in contravention of the provisions of the Convention. The committee trusts that the Government will communicate detailed information in this case so that the Committee of Experts may be assured of the application of the Convention in this matter.

Philippines (ratification: 1953). The Government representative informed the present Committee that at this point in time the Governments of Iraq and the Philippines involved in this case were still pursuing the discussion and review of the existing arrangements. A Filipino mission was currently in Baghdad as part of the follow-up efforts of his Government. As soon as the negotiations were concluded, his Government would provide the ILO with the details of the arrangements; in any case, however, it would send a report on application of the present Convention for the period ending 30 June 1989 right after the said date as requested by the Committee of Experts.

The Workers' members recalled that the present Committee had discussed the same question in relation to the application of Convention 95 by the Government of Iraq at its present session. They thought that it was good to deal with both sides of the question because the two countries were concerned with this Convention. Iraq had stated its willingness to give full implementation to the Convention and, although there was no agreement between the two countries, according to the Government representative of Iraq, Filipino workers were paid in the same way as Iraqi workers were paid in Iraq. If this was the case, then it appeared that there was an accord eliminating the problem. But as long as even a rumour existed to the effect that part of the Filipino workers' salary was being withheld, thereby depriving workers of the benefit of part of their salary, there was cause for concern. They noted that the ongoing negotiations would take account of the requirements of the Convention. If technical assistance of the Office was required, the Workers' members recommended that it be provided. They hoped that the Philippines and Iraq would pay workers normally and apply a decent and acceptable system, including, where appropriate, savings where the workers themselves asked for this to be taken out of their salary.

The Employers' members considered that the situation was neither clear nor satisfactory. For some time there had been talk of arrangements between the countries concerned, but Iraq had stated that no arrangements existed at all. This partial payment of wages was a problem not only because many workers were affected, but also because a good share of the wages was involved. The question involved not only workers going to work in Iraq, but also in other states in the region. A solution had to be found; if necessary the ILO's assistance should be drawn upon through an explicit request. In such an unclear situation, it was necessary to uncover the real facts and the Government representative's intervention was not really sufficient. A request from the Government for ILO assistance would be in the interests of its own workers.

The Government representative expressed his appreciation for the offer of assistance of the ILO which his Government would consider in the event that it should be needed.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. It recalled the comments of the Committee of Experts according to which proposals to pay the salaries of Filipino workers working in Iraq were contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee considered that the Government of the Philippines would provide detailed information about arrangements in force and that the agreement to be signed with the Government in Iraq would conform with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee wished to record that the assistance of the ILO might be useful as appropriate.

Portugal (ratification: 1983). A Government representative recalled that the Committee of Experts, in its observations on the application of the present Convention, had asked questions on the discussions held last year in the present Committee and on the information provided by his Government in its report on the Convention. His Government had also communicated a written reply to the Committee of Experts and to the present Committee, which was given to the Secretariat.

Given the size of the written response, resulting from the fact that the Government gave factual and legal details, as well as reports and data provided by the labour inspectorate, it would be preferable that the present Committee gave the Committee of Experts an opportunity to examine this information and that the discussion on the questions asked be delayed. In any event, the Government wished to inform the present Committee that the situation continued to progress in a satisfactory manner. At the end of the first trimester of 1989, the number of workers who had wages in arrears amounted to 15,436, representing 23.8 per cent of the total number registered at the end of 1985. The number of undertakings in arrears in the payment of wages was 117, 17.5 per cent of the 1985 total. In March 1988 the arrears in wages concerned 20,802 workers and 185 enterprises, respectively 25.8 per cent and 36.7 per cent of the preceding year's total. The basic wages and all other benefits were taken into account in these calculations. The total number of undertakings in arrears in the payment of wages included active and stagnant enterprises and undertakings that had been closed. Between 1 January 1988 and 31 March 1989 only 5,765 workers have benefited from Act No. 17/86 at their own request.

The workers who had wages in arrears only represented 0.5 per cent of the salaried workers. The claims of workers, wages or claims of another nature were protected by privileges and paid on a priority basis as against the debtor undertaking's assets. The workers with wages in arrears may, under Act No. 17/86, either institute regular proceedings before the Labour Court or file a complaint with the labour inspectorate.

From 1 January 1988 to 31 March 1989 the labour inspectorate imposed 952 fines upon undertakings in arrears in the payment of wages and prepared 5,050 determinations specifying the amount of wages in arrears due to workers. As regards the application of Act No. 17/86, the labour inspectorate prepared during the same period 75 reports of inquiry, establishing that 71 undertakings were in arrears in the payment of wages.

The speaker concluded by stating that, according to the labour inspectorate and to his Government, this issue should be settled through the normal means of prevention applicable to labour legislation violations. Indeed, the workers of this country who had wages in arrears have used more frequently the normal means of protection than the exceptional procedure established by Act No. 17/86, which shows that this problem no longer had the social dimension it once did.

The Employer member of Portugal stated that, in 1986, the Portuguese employers had declared before the present Committee that in three years' time the delay in the payment of wages would no longer be a grave social problem. Since 1985 the delay in the payment of wages in a great many enterprises had created a very complex situation. The main causes of these difficulties were negative events, such as the no-compensation nationalisations which had occurred in the private sector, discretionary public intervention in companies and the adoption of one of the EEC's strictest laws on labour contract questions. All the events which occurred between 1974 and 1979 had aggravated the economic crisis, which had very seriously affected both public and private enterprises in the beginning of the 1980s. Happily, the situation had reversed, as the Committee of Experts had noted and as was also evident in the available statistics, which confirmed that the delay in the payment of salaries had ceased to be an endemic problem. The number of enterprises affected had fallen 82.5 per cent, from 668 in 1985 to 117 in March 1989; 15,436 workers were affected, that is 86.2 per cent fewer than in 1985; this represented 0.5 per cent of all salaried employees. This amounted to progress, even if as the Portuguese employers believed, all the individual cases of workers still affected should be supported. Whilst he noted with interest the explanations of the Government representative regarding the positive effects of Law No. 17/86, the speaker stressed these improvements had occurred because of the sacrifices which workers and employers had been willing to make in order to save most of the companies affected. In particular, besides financial difficulties, the employers had come up against other difficulties such as outdated legislation on labour contract matters (which had remained outdated until the beginning of 1989) and permanent restrictions on credit. If the number of enterprises affected continued to fall at the current annual rate, the speaker hoped that the situation as regards delay in payment of salaries would be completely resolved in the coming two years.

A Worker member of Portugal stressed that action by the supervisory bodies of the ILO had greatly contributed to an improvement in the situation, as the delay in the payment of wages had markedly diminished. However, the problem remained. Non-payment of wages was an affront to the fundamental rights of workers and this amounted to inadmissible violation and exploitation. The number of workers affected merely gave an idea of the breadth of the problem; the essential fact was that there were still skilled workers who had not received their wages. Figures given by the Government provided significant evidence of this. They showed that the workers affected numbered several thousand; official statistics show that they were not a fixed group of workers, since workers enter and leave this situation of delayed wages. The Government had stated that, on the one hand, the situation was well under control and, on the other hand, the employers were responsible, attempting thus to justify their own failure to adopt specific measures and their lack of responsibility. The worker still ran the risk of not receiving his wages and, should this occur, his situation would not immediately be resolved. When employers did not pay wages, the existing law did not sufficiently protect them and did not ensure conformity with the Convention: the notion of wages was too limited as it covered basic remuneration only and did not take into consideration subsidies, bonuses and other supplements; in cases of non-payment of wages, there were time limits within which the worker had to claim his due, that is two months if it is a question of the whole wage, or four months if it is a question of only part of the wage. By making partial, or even symbolic, wage payments, employers could block any action by the worker; there were cases in which a worker suffered a permanent delay of three months in the payment of his wages. The penalties for non-payment of wages and their application were ineffective; in cases of termination of contract for the reason of non-payment of wages or in cases of closure of the enterprise, the worker ran the risk of never receiving his unpaid wages; the new law on dismissals, which had been adopted in February 1989, continued to place upon the worker the burden of proving the guilt of the employer in cases of wage non-payment. In the contrary case, the worker did not receive any compensation if he terminated his contract. Finally, the speaker recalled that quantitative data did not allow one to judge application of the Convention, that the law and penalties were neither effective nor deterrent and therefore did not provide true protection of wages. The speaker emphasised that the non-payment of wages was a violation of workers' basic rights and a way of limiting the exercise by workers of their individual and collective rights; she considered that the problem should continue to be examined by the Committee of Experts so that the Government would assume its responsibilities and adopt the necessary measures for an overall solution to the problem.

The Workers' members recalled that the question of non-payment of wages in this country had been under discussion by the present Committee for some time. Although they noted that improvements had actually taken place and that the number of workers affected had been reduced, this did not mean that the question was settled; as long as there was a single worker who did not receive his wages on time, one had to continue taking action. The difficulties that arose were of several kinds. The case, for example, of an employer who continues running his enterprise whilst not making regular wage payments; this causes a situation in which the workers are often too frightened to take any action. Penalties against such an employer should be severe, as a worker who does not receive his wages very quickly encounters major obstacles for himself and his family and quickly finds himself in a state of poverty. Regular wage payments (which, by the way, he thought should be made every two weeks), were essential and especially so for manual workers. Another difficulty arose because employers, especially during the economic crisis, had not been paying wages regularly in order to place pressure on the workers to accept reductions in pay. A third difficulty to which reference had been made in the report of the Committee of Experts results from the closure of enterprises for different reasons, such as, for example, bankruptcy, fraudulent bankruptcy which leaves the workers without a responsible party against which to take action. In this respect, it should be noted that in certain countries, especially Common Market countries, solidarity funds had been set up which acted as substitutes for employers' contributions to the payment of salaries to the workers. Finally, whilst noting some progress, the Workers' members also recalled that full remuneration remained to be paid to several tens of thousands of workers and that existing efforts on that issue should be kept up.

The Employers' members declared that, on this question of the protection of wages, notably the delay in the payment of salaries and the non-payment of salaries, the present Committee had noted real progress for the first time the previous year; they noted that further progress had taken place. Nevertheless the problem continued to exist. This was recognised by everybody and it had to be stopped as soon as possible. They wondered whether all the examples provided by the Workers' member came within the scope of the Convention. They stated that they were concerned about Law No. 17/86 respecting arrears in wages, which appeared to have been interpreted in a restricted manner, the notion of basic remuneration seeming even more limited than the definition of salaries in the Convention; they considered that this deficiency should be remedied as soon as possible.

The Government representative remarked that the Employers' members and Workers' members had both noted progress and that he wished to make some corrections to the statements made. The law expressly prevented any reduction in wages and any agreement made by a worker to such a reduction had no effect and at any time the worker could claim the differences in wages. Law No. 17/86 was an exceptional law concerned only with basic remuneration; salary supplements were guaranteed by the country's general law. Workers were not obliged to accept the application of Law No. 17/86, it was only applied if workers opted for its application, otherwise they could make use at any time of the normal channels for wage protection. In cases of non-payment of wages, the worker could file a complaint with the labour inspectorate immediately after the day on which payment was due. The problem of fraudulent bankruptcy and of the disappearance of employers was a false problem; companies were registered and their assets could be seized.

The Committee took note of the information supplied by the Government representative. It noted that legislative measures had been adopted in order to guarantee the payment of wages, but that the problem of the payment of wages in arrears had not been entirely overcome in practice. Whilst noting the progress described in practice by the Government representative, the Committee wished to emphasise the importance it attached to a solution being found to this problem, not only in the law but also in practice. It expressed the hope that the Government would pursue its efforts and would report on progress achieved during the coming year.

Brazil (ratification: 1952): The Government representative of Brazil stated that his country was in a transition period, and the promulgation of the new Federal Constitution had introduced great innovations in the national legal order. The Congress was now drawing up specific legislation that would permit implementation of the Constitution. The Ministry of Labour was now preparing studies and Bills with the aim of speeding up the process of adapting the national legislation to new constitutional standards, in an effort to overcome the obstacles to full implementation of the Convention. It had to be noted that the Constitution represented great progress on a number of points: a trade union member could not be dismissed, except in case of serious misconduct, from the time of presenting his or her candidacy for trade union office until, in case of election, even as an alternate, the expiry of one year from the end of his or her term, as established in the legislation (article 8, paragraph VIII of the Constitution); there was recognition of collective agreements and awards (article 7, paragraph XXVI of the Constitution): civilian public servants were granted the right to freedom of association and the right to strike (article 37, paragraphs VI and VII of the Constitution); article 173, paragraph I of the Constitution guaranteed employees of public enterprises, mixed economy enterprises and others the social rights referred to in article 7 of the Constitution, including recognition of collective labour agreements and awards. It could be concluded that negotiation by representative organisations was fully ensured. In addition, freedom of collective bargaining was provided for in the Bill on wage policy that had been approved by Congress and was now under consideration by the President of the Republic. This Committee should also be informed that the Inter-ministerial Council on Wages in State Enterprises (CISE) was playing an advisory role as an employer in cases in which the Government held more than 50 per cent of the enterprise capital. This Council was an advisory body for the management of state enterprises and was not an instrument that impeded collective bargaining.

The Government representative conceded that there still were a few obstacles to the full implementation of the Convention in the legislation and in practice, but the Government was making every effort possible to overcome them. There was an agreement regarding technical co-operation between Brazil and the ILO. Two officials from the Ministry of Labour had recently had internships on the application of standards, and this year the ILO Regional Adviser on Standards would be visiting Brazil. A request had been made for him to be accompanied by a legal expert to provide advice to national experts in drawing up Bills containing provisions which would be fully compatible with ILO Conventions.

The Worker member of Brazil stated that the present Committee should not limit itself to an analysis of legal terms which in any event were not implemented in practice. He referred in particular to the observation of the Committee of Experts on Decree No. 2425 of 7 April 1988, which provided in its section 7 that public enterprises, mixed-economy enterprises and private enterprises subsidised by the State or holding concessions from public services, could not conclude collective agreements or accords unless those pacts were in line with the decisions adopted by the Inter-ministerial Council on Wages in State Enterprises (CISE). In this regard he stated that in practice, these enterprises first asked permission from the CISE, then negotiated and finally returned to the CISE, whose usual practice was to invalidate clauses in already negotiated agreements.

In relation to the right to strike, the speaker referred to the observations of the Committee of Experts on the right of workers to freely negotiate their conditions of employment. Those observations had mentioned CUT. It was necessary to clarify that the CUT now represents around 15 million workers with approximately 5 million members in local unions. He stated that the CUT had refused to engage in discussions on a social accord to fight inflation, because it was the CUT's position that Brazilian workers had nothing left to give up in material terms, since the statutory monthly minimum wage was the equivalent of approximately US$40. The CUT had also felt that values other than material ones – such as the right to strike – were values that could not be subject to bargaining. The CUT proposed to the Government and to the employers that a collective labour agreement be negotiated to take the place of current individual agreements; the bargaining should make up for the wage cuts occasioned by economic measures and by the absence of wage protection standards. The speaker indicated that at the moment wages had declined some 40 per cent and that he was astounded that in his country employers were maintaining that the compensation for the erosion in wages should not be more than 6 per cent, a proposal which the Government had accepted. This had caused the largest strike ever in Brazil, in which 30 million workers had participated; instead of negotiating with the workers as had been hoped, the Government introduced Temporary Order No. 50 which dramatically curtailed the right to strike, thus violating the Constitution and the provisions of the Convention. This restriction can only be compared to those which existed in three countries with very special historical circumstances: Hitler's Germany, Franco's Spain, and Stroessner's Paraguay. Brazil was one of the few countries in the world that had not yet ratified Convention No. 87, and there had often been repression of strikes by the military, as in November 1988, resulting in the death of three workers in Vuelta Redonda. In addition to this, it is necessary to mention the detention of trade union leaders because of the strike and the dismissal of more than 300 trade union leaders over the past two years. The assassination of the trade union leader Chico Méndez was one of the many events of this type.

The speaker concluded by calling for the assistance of the present Committee to vindicate the legitimate rights of workers, in particular, the rights to strike and to bargain collectively; it was unacceptable that a country considered to have the eighth largest economy in the Western world continued to pay around 4 per cent of its gross domestic product for foreign debt servicing while at the same time having some of the most degrading social conditions known to modern history.

The Workers' members shared the opinion of the Employers' members' that Brazil was going through a transition period in relation to collective bargaining and freedom of association. It was necessary to recognise the existence of trade unions and to accept representative trade union organisations. If those organisations were not recognised for purposes of collective bargaining, they were being compelled to strike merely to have the right to negotiate; this was regrettable, since strikes should only be used as a last resort in difficult situations. The Workers' members took up three important points from the statement made by the Government representative: (1) improvement of protection against illegal dismissal of trade union representatives; (2) restrictions on the freedom of association rights of public servants in violation of Convention No. 98; and (3) limitation on the right to strike in sectors where there had been no such limits.

The Workers' members recalled their general approach regarding bargaining and the right to strike. Employers and workers from all quarters had to be brought together in an attempt to remedy the serious situation and to see to it that it was not only the workers who bore the brunt of economic adjustment. The Workers' members therefore called for solutions to be sought with the central trade union organisations that were truly representative of the vital forces in the country, in regard to freedom of association rights.

The Employers' members recalled that 37 years had passed since Brazil had ratified this Convention. There were still some fundamental problems with regard to compliance, but the picture painted by the Committee of Experts' report was not entirely negative. That Committee had noted with satisfaction a law protecting trade union officials from dismissal except in case of a serious offence. The Employers' members also noted that the Government appeared ready to enact a Bill to guarantee the right of association and the right to strike for persons employed directly or indirectly by the public administration. On the other hand, workers' right to freely negotiate their terms and conditions of employment (as provided by Article 4 of the Convention) was limited by wage and price controls and by governmental powers to cancel collective bargaining agreements and arbitration awards that were inconsistent with those controls. There was also work to be done with respect to the rights of workers in certain public sector enterprises to negotiate freely their terms and conditions of employment. The Employers were encouraged by the Government's stated wish to avail itself of technical co-operation to resolve remaining problems.

The Government representative of Brazil wished to clarify that Temporary Order No. 50 on the exercise of the right to strike was only valid for 30 days, and thus had expired. Also, Congress was drawing up a Bill which would regulate only the exercise of the right to strike in relation to essential services which could involve a true risk for the population. In connection with the accusations of repression of workers and violation of freedom of association, the Government of Brazil had supplied all the information required, and the matter had been thoroughly discussed in the Governing Body. It was important to note that since the time of the military dictatorship, the great trade union organisation CUT had been recognised and had now been called upon to participate along with other social partners in meetings organised by the Government.

The Worker member of Brazil wished to clarify that this was the first time the CUT had been included in the Brazilian delegation to this Conference, thanks to the efforts of the Ministry of Labour. He hoped this would be so every year and that the traditional method of balloting between the old official confederations would be abandoned. He also wished to state that while Temporary Order No. 50 was no longer in force, it had been reissued in the form of Temporary Order No. 59, which contained the same terms and was still in force.

The Committee took note of the Committee of Experts' report and of the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee welcomed the fact that some progress had been achieved relative to the protection of freedom of association. It noted, however, that problems remained regarding the free fixing of wages and the right to collective bargaining for employees of the State and certain public sector enterprises. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would soon take the necessary measures to apply the Convention fully in law and practice. It hoped that the possibility for tripartite dialogue at the national level would be put to use in this regard and that the Government would be able to indicate progress in its next report.

Denmark (ratification: 1955). The Government has sent the following information on developments in connection with negotiations with a view to renewal of the collective agreements in the spring of 1980:

(a) The Private Sector

Negotiations with a view to the renewal of collective agreements take place every second year in the spring in Denmark. Collective agreements in the private labour market expire on 1 March and collective agreements in the public labour market and a few private sectors expire on 1 April. These negotiations have a direct and an indirect impact on that part of the labour market which is regulated by collective agreements; in Denmark this is a very large part of the total labour market. In recent years the general trend has been for negotiation in the private labour market to take place between the individual national unions and the opposing employer organisations, i.e. so-called decentralised negotiations, as opposed to negotiations conducted at the central level by LO (the Federation of Danish Trade Unions) and DA (the Danish Employers' Confederation) on behalf of their member organisations.

In the spring of 1987 collective agreements were concluded in the usual manner on the private labour market. This time it was, however, agreed that the collective agreements would run for a period of four years; one of the reasons for this was that working time was reduced by two hours per week under the new agreements. The collective agreements provided, however, that negotiations could take place in the spring of 1989 concerning pay rates. These negotiations could be conducted in the usual way and the parties would have the right to call a strike or lockout if they failed to reach agreement.

As an element of the tripartite negotiations which the Government conducted in the autumn of 1987 and later with the social partners, a common declaration was adopted by the three parties in December 1987 which stressed, among things, the decisive importance of ensuring that the development in costs in Denmark did not exceed that of other countries.

It is important for the understanding of further developments to realise the distinction between the so-called normal pay agreements and minimum pay agreements. Normal pay agreements are characterised by the fact that the pay rates are expressly fixed in the collective agreement. This means that the development in wages is fixed once and for all in connection with the collective bargaining process. Minimum pay agreements are characterised by the fact that it is only the minimum pay that is regulated in the agreement. The amount of actual wages received by the individual employee is fixed through negotiations at the individual enterprise by means of "personal supplements" to the wage. Negotiations concerning the amount of such supplements may, in principle, take place any time during the term of the collective agreement.

The actual negotiations with a view to the renewal of the collective agreements are consequently – when it comes to wage rates – of less importance in fields with the minimum pay system than in fields with the normal pay system. An increase in the minimum wage by a certain percentage does not necessarily mean that all employees covered by this collective agreement will receive the same percentage wage increase. That will depend on local negotiations concerning personal supplements. For the same reason it has been pointed out by the employer side that it is not possible simply to project an increase in the minimum pay to a field with the normal pay system because the employees covered by the normal system would in this way obtain a wage increase which would on average be higher than that of the employees working under the minimum pay system.

Negotiations between the parties in the individual fields covered by collective agreements continued until mid-February 1989. The negotiations were very difficult and actually broke down at some points. From the employee side, notice of massive strikes (excepting only in quite essential sectors) had therefore been given. The strikes were to take effect from 6 March.

On 19 and 21 February 1989 there was a breakthrough in the negotiations in two sectors within the field covered by the minimum pay system: the clerical field (clerical staff and shop assistants) and the iron industry. The main element of the agreement was an increase in the minimum pay rate of about 1.25 D.kr. per hour in each of the following two years. The parties had agreed that these negotiation results should form part of the draft settlement that they expected the Public Conciliator to propose for the whole private labour market.

At this stage the negotiations in the other fields continued within the framework of the public conciliation system. In the other fields covered by the minimum pay system the Public Conciliator invited the parties to reconsider the situation in the light of the breakthrough in the two sectors (clerical field and iron industry) mentioned above. In the field covered by the normal pay system the Public Conciliator selected three fields where special efforts should be made to come to a result with her assistance.

In the fields with the minimum pay system, results were rather quickly obtained corresponding to those in the clerical field and iron industry. In the fields covered by the normal pay system it was not possible for a long period of time to bring the parties any closer to each other. At some point the negotiations of the Public Conciliator were even suspended; the decisive negotiations were not resumed until 1 March. On 3 March an agreement was obtained between the Association of Employers of the General Danish Industries on the one hand, and the Union of Danish Semi-skilled Workers and the Female Workers' Union, on the other. The most important element of this agreement was an increase in wage rates by 1.10 D.kr. per hour in each of the following two years. On the same day the Public Conciliator again invited the parties in the remaining normal day fields (as she had earlier done for the minimum pay field) to reconsider the situation in the light of the breakthrough which had taken place in the negotiations. At the same time she used her powers to postpone for a period of 14 days the strikes of which notice had been given in order to give the parties time for such consideration.

These negotiations led to negotiation results in a number of other fields covered by the normal pay system; on 11 May the Public Conciliator was able to put forward a draft settlement covering most of the private labour (excluding the agricultural and the financial sectors as they conduct their own negotiations). The draft settlement was adopted by the parties on 30 March 1989.

In a few other fields collective agreements were concluded without the assistance of the Public Conciliator. This was the case, for instance, in parts of the financial sector and in negotiations between the Danish Seamen's Union and the Association of Danish Shipowners. In other fields the Public Conciliator had to be involved in the negotiations and a draft settlement was proposed which has now been adopted. This was the case, for instance, in the agricultural and banking sectors.

(b) The State Sector

Pay and working conditions for employees in the state sector are, as a general rule, laid down in collective or other agreements. Such agreements are concluded between the Ministry of Finance and the organisations which have the right to negotiate for the employees concerned. The Ministry of Finance represents all employees in the state sector in these negotiations.

There are about 250,000 persons employed in the state sector. About 150,000 of them are public servants, while the remaining 100,000 are employed under a collective agreement, with pay and other working conditions more or less identical to those applying the normal pay system in the private sector. In recent years many different organisations have had the right to negotiate on behalf of employees in the state sector. This has made negotiations difficult and time-consuming. In connection with the renewal of agreements, the parties conclude agreements concerning the general framework for pay and working conditions, normally for a 2-year period. This includes, for instance, general changes in pay rates, working time and holiday.

In the spring of 1987 agreement was reached in the usual manner with the organisations of the public servants; subsequently collective agreements were concluded with the organisations of the staff employed under collective agreements.

As regards working time, the regulation scheme and regional allowances the agreements concluded in 1987 were to run for a period of four years.

The negotiations in 1989: In recent years radical changes have taken place in the negotiation patterns on the employee side. A number of employee cartels have developed; this means that the central organisations which negotiate directly with the Minister of Finance represent about 95 per cent of the employees in the state sector. This has made it possible to solve general problems more easily and to bring the negotiations to a conclusion more quickly.

The negotiations – both in the public sector and on the private labour market – took place in the light of the agreement reached during the tripartite negotiations concerning the importance of attaining a lower development in costs than that of other countries. To this should be added that the public employers had indicated to the employee organisations that they found it extremely important to ensure that the public wage systems were made much more flexible. This could be obtained in the form of individualisation and increased decentralisation of the determination of wages and salaries. Furthermore, it was a demand from the employer side that the many different sets of rules concerning working conditions etc. should in the future be made more simple, open and uniform.

On 14 March 1989 the parties in the state sector concluded an agreement concerning the renewal, for a 2-year period, of collective and other agreements. The agreement fixed a framework of 2.5 per cent during this period, broken down as 1.5 per cent for general increases in wages and salaries and 1 per cent for selective pay increases, including also those necessary in order to achieve the increased flexibility which was one of the main demands of the employers. Within this framework it was further agreed to introduce full pay in connection with maternity leave from 8 weeks before the confinement until 24 weeks after and the introduction of a pension scheme for about 40,000 employees who had not been covered by a labour market pension scheme. At the same time a committee was set up to come up with concrete proposals for a simplification and harmonisation of the system of collective and other agreements during this period and prior to the next round of negotiations. It was also agreed to set up a committee which is to examine the existing sets of rules and come up with proposals concerning a uniform agreement on cooperation.

As regards those 5 per cent of the employees who are covered by the general negotiations with the Minister of Finance, agreement has been reached about the renewal of the collective agreements for the coming two years. There is only one organisation which has – after giving a strike notice – asked the Public Conciliator for assistance in the negotiations; it is now expected that a result will be obtained also in this case.

(c) The Municipal/County Sector

About 480,000 persons are employed full-time in the 275 municipalities and 14 counties of Denmark. Among the functions they perform are: child care (nurseries, kindergarden, day care), nursing and care of old persons, teaching in the primary school system and in the upper secondary schools, health care, supply of essential services, environmental protection, care for disabled persons and administration of the tax authorities.

Pay and working conditions for teachers in the primary school system follow the rules applying to public servants in the state sector and are fixed by negotiations between the Teachers' Central Organisations and the Minister of Finance. Pay and working conditions for other staff categories employed in the municipal/county sector (about 420,000 full-time employees) are laid down by agreement between the staff organisations and the municipal/county employers.

The rate of organisation is very high for employees in the municipal/county sector. The majority of the staff organisations in the municipal/county sector are affiliated with a joint organisation, KTO (the organisation of public servants and other employees in the municipal/county sector).

On the employer side there are 5 negotiating parties; the National Association of Municipal Authorities which negotiates for 252 municipalities; the National Association of Municipalities in the County of Copenhagen which negotiates on behalf of the municipalities in the metropolitan area except the municipalities of Copenhagen and Frederiksberg which negotiate separately.

The negotiations are co-ordinated among these five municipal/county employer parties by a special central supervisory body, the Pay Board of the Municipal/County Authorities, which also co-ordinates pay and working conditions for employees in the municipal sector with those applied to employees in the state sector.

The negotiations with a view to renewal of the collective agreements in the municipal sector take place every second year in the spring as the agreements expire on 1 April. The negotiations take place in the form of general negotiations between the five municipal/county employer parties jointly, on the one part, and the KTO, on the other part. These general negotiations lay down the framework for the renewal of the collective agreements and other agreements with the individual employee organisations. Agreements are concluded – on the basis of the general negotiation result – between the municipal/county employers and the individual employee organisations.

The negotiations in 1989: In connection with the negotiations in 1989 certain general questions were removed from the negotiations. They were, in particular, the question of the duration of working time and the regulations scheme under which wages and salaries in the public sector are regulated in accordance with the development in wages and salaries on the private labour market. In connection with the conclusion of the collective agreements in 1987 these questions had been agreed upon for a 4-year period i.e. until 1991.

The negotiations with the KTO concerning the general questions were initiated early in January 1989. Prior to that, these negotiations had been intensely prepared by the municipal employers. The municipal/county sector is undergoing radical changes right now and the tight economic situation has led to a need for significant changes in the system of collective and other agreements as known until now. Some of the planning of the negotiations had taken place in cooperation with the State and had resulted in a report (No. 1150) "Collective agreements and other agreements in the 1990s". It was the wish of the municipal/county employers that the negotiations should lead to a result within a very limited economic framework. At the same time the municipal/county employers wished to obtain improvements as regards the content of the agreements. One aspect was to maintain and further develop the right to individualise wages and salaries by decentralised determination thereof which was introduced in connection with the conclusion of the agreements in 1987. The municipal employers also wanted to introduce a general agreement concerning a rationalisation and streamlining of the system. Finally, they wanted to change the system so that the demarcation lines between the various occupational fields were broken down and uniform and more simple rules introduced.

The municipal/county organisations (KTO) wanted to obtain adjustments of pay rates, improvements in a number of social elements of the agreement system in the form of a general training and job security agreement, improvements in the rules concerning pay in connection with maternity leave, etc. and pension schemes for those groups who did not already have such schemes.

The negotiations in the municipal/county sector entered into a decisive phase towards the end of February and early in March when there was a breakthrough in the negotiations on the private labour market. Traditionally, the negotiations in the public sector have to a very high degree been dependent upon the outcome of the negotiations on the private labour market as the negotiations on the private labour market have formed the framework for the adjustment of wages and salaries in the public sector.

Agreement was reached between the municipal employer parties and the KTO about a general compromise within an overall framework for improvements of 2.5 per cent for the coming 2-year period until 1 April 1991. Out of this framework, 1 per cent is to be used for general increases in wages and salaries, 0.3 per cent for individual pay increases agreed upon in local negotiations, and 0.25 per cent for special demands in connection with subsequent negotiations with the individual employee organisations. The remaining part of the framework has, among other things, been used for the introduction of full pay in connection with maternity leave and the introduction of pension schemes for those groups which have not earlier been included in such schemes. A general framework agreement has been concluded concerning rationalisation and streamlining of the system and it has been agreed to start negotiations during the term of the agreements concerning the dismantling of demarcation lines between the vocational fields and concerning simplification of the system of collective and other agreements.

As a new thing, the compromise was reached in the municipal sector before a negotiation result had been obtained in the state sector. This framework of 2.5 per cent – which is estimated to be lower than that resulting from the renewal of the collective agreements in the private sector – also applied to the renewal of the collective agreements in the state sector.

At the present time final negotiations are taking place with a few staff organisations concerning the special demands. It seems that it will be possible to bring these negotiations to an end without industrial action being taken.

In addition, a Government representative referred to information contained in the written communication submitted by his Government regarding negotiations for collective agreements which took place in the Spring of 1989. The outcome of the negotiations had been very satisfactory from all points of view. New agreements had been negotiated on all the issues that were open to negotiation – first and foremost pay rates. In the private sector, the parties had, in complete agreement, made wide use of the services of the public conciliator. In the public sector most agreements had been negotiated by the parties themselves, normally without recourse to the conciliation services. The negotiation system had proved its effectiveness, all the more so because costly and devastating labour conflicts had been avoided. The system was able to cope with new economic circumstances that left room for only modest wage increases. The process had not been an easy one.

Referring to Case No. 1470, examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, the speaker indicated that the Government had announced in March 1989 that it had comments to make on the conclusion drawn by that Committee; it had thus suggested that the Committee of Experts wait for these comments before examining application of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had drawn its own conclusions, based in part upon the conclusions reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association, before the Government had made additional comments. The Government therefore thought that the Committee of Experts' comments had been formulated on incomplete grounds. The Committee on Freedom of Association had itself recommended, in its May 1989 Report, that the last communication from the Government should be transmitted to the Committee of Experts. The situation addressed by Case No. 1470, and the Danish International Ships' Register (DIS) it involved, was complex and had not been adequately considered; the Government believed that the present Committee should not draw any conclusions concerning this case.

The Government representative explained that in 1987 the Danish shipping industry (the country's third largest export industry) was seeing an increasing number of ships flagging out to flags of convenience. If the industry were to have disappeared, the country would have encountered severe economic problems and many Danish seafarers would have been unemployed. The Government saw no alternative to establishing a realistic alternative, that is, the Danish International Ships' Register. Part of the package was that seafarers on DIS ships were free from Danish tax, an important change, since in Denmark more than half of total income was paid in direct taxes. One result of that change was the absolute necessity of concluding new collective agreements for persons employed on DIS ships; if not, their income would have doubled, thus diverging from the wages which had been agreed. The matter was urgent; the new register had to come into effect quickly to prevent further flagging out. Another consequence was that to make the new register efficient, the employers had to have the possibility of concluding different agreements with different unions on the same category of labour. In international shipping, labour was employed from all over the world. There was nothing illegitimate in stating that unions from labour-supplying countries were also entitled to make agreements for their members, as they had in fact done. The Government did not understand the Danish unions' attitude towards these unions.

The results since the law was passed had been good. Many ships had flagged home to the Danish flag and the Danish maritime fleet had increased by 13 per cent, compared to 1 per cent world-wide. Employment on Danish ships had been stable. Work on Danish ships was now covered by new net wage agreements concluded between the ship owners and the unions. Agreements with Danish unions included, where relevant, a clause for ships with mixed crews, specifying that persons with equal qualifications should not be hired on conditions other than those in the said agreement, that is, as if they were covered by the agreement. It had to be stressed that everyone employed on DIS ships was covered, apart from agreements, by Danish legislation with its high level of social protection.

Everyone could agree that this case raised extremely interesting questions for discussion. However, the Danish case did not form a sufficient basis for such a discussion. It had not been adequately considered and the principal issue of international ships' registers should be dealt with in a general way, and not on the basis of a single case. There was a general trend towards such registers; on 31 May 1989, the European Economic Commission had put forward a proposal on a European Ships' Register, along the same lines as the DIS, to the Council of Ministers. His Government thought that the present Committee should not draw specific conclusions based on Case No. 1470, but instead should state its wish that the issue of international ships' registers be discussed in some appropriate forum. The forum might be the Committee of Experts, which might even carry out a special survey, or perhaps the Joint Maritime Commission under ILO auspices. After such a general discussion, the issue could be returned to next year, when one of the maritime Conventions (the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147)) would be under discussion in the context of the general survey to be prepared by the Committee of Experts. The representative stated that his Government would attempt to resume domestic discussions on the issue on a tripartite or bipartite basis, as appropriate.

The Worker member of Denmark noted that the Government was being brought before this Committee in several cases involving some of the ILO's key Conventions on basic human rights (Conventions Nos. 87, 98 and 111). With regard to the present Convention, since the present Government came to power in 1982, it had made a number of legislative interventions concerning both the right to strike and existing collective agreements. Those interventions had led to five complaints brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The most serious intervention was adopted, in June 1988, of Act No. 408 on the Danish International Ships' Register, which established a continuing legal violation of the above-mentioned Conventions. The complaint regarding the Danish International Ships' Register was important, not only nationally, but for all seafaring nations. The case had far-reaching consequences; the speaker supposed that any transnational trade, such as perhaps haulage contractors, could be seen as requiring an international register to address competition from abroad. Honest, free competition was what was needed. The present Committee should reject such international registers, since they were an artificial means of gaining a competitive advantage at the cost of other countries. When similar registers were established to retain competitiveness, it became a vicious spiral. The real losers were the workers and those governments and employers who retained a sense of decency.

Citing the text of section 10 of Act No. 408 (reproduced on page 379 of the Committee of Experts' report), the speaker stated that under subsection (1), shipowners could unilaterally evade their obligations under an existing collective agreement by simply changing the ships' register. This provision constituted a flagrant violation of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, as both the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts had noted. Because of the operation of the provisions of subsections (2) and (3) of section 10, the workers, with their negotiating position totally undermined, then had to renegotiate their agreements with the shipowners. To understand the situation fully, general Danish labour law had to be taken into account. It had been illegal to discriminate against workers on the basis of colour, race or nationality since 1911, when the industrial court had ruled that an employer had to pay the same wages and generally comply with the terms of an agreement in respect of all persons performing work covered by that agreement. This had enabled Denmark to ratify Convention No. 111 in 1960 without amending any labour law. Thus, foreign workers working alongside Danish seafarers had the same rights. Subsections (2) and (3) of section 10 of Act No. 408 had removed the possibility of maintaining this fair and equitable state of the law. With these provisions, the Danish Government had created two classes of workers. By contrast, such discriminatory provisions did not exist in the Norwegian ships' register.

Recalling the Government representative's reference to a crisis in the shipping trade as justifying these measures, the speaker asked for more information, especially since several Danish shipping companies had earned record profits in 1988. He wondered whether the Government had considered means other than these to stop flagging out and, if so, why the alternatives were rejected. He noted that the tax exemptions granted in legislation adopted parallel to Act No. 408 had reduced shipowners' crew costs by more than 40 per cent. Surely such a hefty subsidy should have been fully adequate to meet any alleged crisis. He challenged the statement made by the Government in correspondence to the ILO in which it had said that the agreements would have ceased to be in operation in any event because more and more ships would have been flagging out. This was incorrect because irrespective of flagging out, an agreement continued to run for its full duration under Danish labour law. He also disagreed with the Government's statement that the parties had agreed in practice that mixed crews should be treated in the same way. In all but two cases, the shipowners had rejected agreement to this effect. The Government had triumphantly stressed that new agreements had replaced the old ones; in fact, the old agreements had been removed by law and the workers had no choice but to conclude new agreements providing for considerably inferior conditions (reduced crews and changed working time). It was also important to note that not all cancelled agreements had been replaced by new agreements. The shipowners were under no obligation to enter into collective agreements. In practice, several seafarers were working on Danish ships without being covered by collective agreements. Despite the Government arguing that the Act would create more jobs, employment had fallen by 10 per cent since the new register was established, and no increase was anticipated.

In relation to section 10 of the Act, the Government had stated that a criterion of residency and not nationality had been applied in subsections (2) and (3). Fortunately, both the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts had seen through this ploy, the speaker said. It was important to know that even when a foreign seafarer had been working on Danish ships for several years, the seafarer was not deemed to be a resident of Denmark. He noted that the Government had also tried, in correspondence with the ILO, to maintain that subsections (2) and (3) of section 10 solved a problem of organisations competing to conclude agreements. The Government had said it could not accept Danish organisations in the seafaring trade having exclusive competence to negotiate agreements on Danish ships. These arguments had been invented for the occasion, the speaker said. No one was demanding that only Danish organisations should have the right to conclude these agreements; so far, no foreign organisation had wanted to negotiate an agreement, because their members had been secured the same rights as Danes under Danish agreements.

The speaker wanted to know why the Government had not sought the legal opinion of the Office while the Act was being drafted. A large minority in Parliament had called for this and yet the Government had rejected the proposal.

In its complaint concerning the Act, the Danish Federation of Trade Unions had requested that direct contacts be established. As in previous cases, the speaker said that the Government had rejected this suggestion. He cited the Government's written reply of January 1989, to the effect that the case had been "sufficiently elucidated so as to eliminate any doubts in relation to the basis upon which it can be evaluated." The Government had stated that it thus found it "unnecessary to have direct contacts between the ILO and the parties to this case." With reference to this, the speaker could not understand that the Government representative now was of the opinion that further consideration was needed before the present Committee could draw any conclusions. The speaker wished to know how the Government intended to comply with the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which had been endorsed by the Committee of Experts. Those bodies had not merely stated that the Convention had been violated; they had urged the Government to amend Act No. 408. He asked specifically whether the Government intended to repeal the discriminatory rules in subsections (2) and (3) of section 10 of that Act.

If the Government disagreed with the supervisory bodies' analysis in this case, the speaker wondered how it would attempt to resolve the situation. Would it, he asked, request that a commission of inquiry be set up? Replies were needed from the Government on these questions, he concluded.

The Employer member of Denmark noted that the Government had invited the present Committee to engage in a more general discussion of problems arising out of international ships' registers, going beyond the Danish International Ships' Register alone. The Shipowners' Association would be prompted to take an active part in such a discussion. The allegation made by the Worker member of Denmark, that collective agreements were set up in a discriminatory way, was absolutely untrue. In the collective agreements in question, it was stated clearly that with respect to skill, no discrimination at all could take place. The Danish Shipowners' Association had concluded new collective agreements with all Danish unions concerning work on board ships registered in the International Ships' Register. All the agreements had been concluded in a peaceful way; the unions had been free not to conclude any collective agreements at all. That would have meant that the international register never would have opened and flagging out would have continued. He disagreed with the statement made by the Worker member of Denmark concerning employment. It had stabilised on the same level as last year, and the employers had hoped that it would increase. Almost 90 per cent of all work on Danish ships was carried out by Danish citizens. In the negotiations, there had been good, serious discussion with all the unions, including the Danish Metal Workers, to which general purpose crew members belonged. The agreements were concluded with all the affiliated unions of the Federation of Danish Trade Unions, not with the Federation itself. The Danish employers' requests for discussions with the Federation had gone without reply. The new agreements did not provide for considerably inferior conditions, the speaker said; they gave all seafarers improved working conditions and guaranteed them a higher real income than in the past.

Moreover, the setting up of an international register could not, in his view, be seen as interference in existing collective agreements. The old agreements were still in force for all ships in the ordinary ships' register. The new international register never could have opened had it not been for the tax exemption for all seafarers and the ability to conclude new agreements with the trade unions based on the possibility of concluding collective agreements with foreign seafarers. The international register was a positive alternative to flagging out, not only out of the national social security system but also out of national collective agreements. There were other second registers in Europe, and the Commission of the European Community had proposed a register along the same lines as the Danish register. The Danish employers were quite willing to continue discussions to try to convince the Danish trade unions that the DIS had so far been a success.

Another Worker member of Denmark requested the Government representative to state why the Danish trade unions had not been invited to take part in negotiations on the draft legislation on the ships' register. The Bill had been introduced into Parliament in December 1987 and approved six or seven months later. There had been ample time for negotiation of the labour market participants, including the unions. The speaker thought that direct contacts would help all concerned to consider the issue further. The government had stated to the ILO in a letter of January 1989 that the case was sufficiently elucidated, thus obviating a need for further discussion; the Government representative had now told the present Committee that the case was complex, requiring more information to be on the table to permit discussion. The speaker asked the Government to indicate whether it was now in a position to accept or to request direct contacts involving the social partners, which he thought would be of assistance. The Danish legislation needed to be brought into conformity with the ILO's minimum standards, and steps towards achieving that could be made by direct contacts.

The Worker member of Norway, speaking as well, on behalf of the national trade unions of Denmark, Finland and Sweden, noted that the legal concept of the Danish International Ships' register under Act No. 408, had been dealt with by the Committee of Experts as relating both to Conventions No. 98 and 111. The Committee of Experts had called upon Denmark to amend the Act so as to ensure that all seafarers employed on Danish internationally registered ships could benefit from collective bargaining engaged in by representatives of their own choosing. After quoting the text of section 10 of the Act in extenso, the speaker listed three consequences of the legal provisions which he thought brought the legal concept of the Danish International Ships' Register into conflict with the principles of Convention No. 98. In the first place, seafarers who were non-resident in Denmark and employed on board Danish ships could not be covered by collective agreements concluded by Danish trade unions, even though they were members thereof. Secondly, the Act permitted the conclusion of separate collective agreements, with two or more foreign trade union organisations being represented on board the same Danish ship. These collective agreements could provide different wages and other employment conditions for seafarers due to their national origin, while the seafarers are serving at the same time on equal jobs on board ship. Thirdly, under Act No. 408, Danish trade unions could bargain on behalf of non-resident, non-citizens only if the seafarers concerned were ensured national treatment in Denmark by virtue of an international treaty. These consequences showed that Denmark was not fulfilling the obligations it assumed when it ratified Convention No. 98. The legal concept in Act No. 408 brought about discrimination on the basis of national origin. That meant in fact discrimination based on race. There was a responsibility to react with all legal means to eliminate all forms of discrimination based on race on board Danish ships and ships of all other ILO member States. The present Committee should not only take note of the report of the Committee of Experts in this case for information or notice. A serious disagreement existed between the Government, on the one hand and the Danish trade unions and the Committee of Experts on the other hand, as to the correct legal interpretation of the relevant Conventions, among them Convention No. 98, in relation to section 10 of the Act. The speedy internationalisation of the shipping industry could confront the present Committee with several new cases of this type in the future. Acts on international ship registry had already been introduced in the United Kingdom (Isle of Man), France (Kerguelen Island) and Norway. Those enactments had chosen quite different legal concepts as regards seafarers' right to organise. If the draft on international ships' registry proposed by the Commission of the European Community were enforced, there would be discrimination against seafarers on the basis of national origin in respect of the right to organise and engage in collective bargaining, which would be in flagrant contradiction to Convention No. 98.

This case was important in light of the development of international ship registers elsewhere in Europe. This fact made it all the more regrettable that the possibility of direct contacts had been rejected by the Government. The dispute relating to Convention No. 98 and Denmark was legally clear-cut and could easily and quickly be settled by an advisory opinion sought from the International Court of Justice. On behalf of the national unions of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, he proposed that the Conference as a whole authorise the ILO Governing Body, in accordance with article 37 of the ILO Constitution and article 9, paragraphs 2 and 3, of the agreement between the ILO and the United Nations, to request the International Court of Justice to give a legal advisory opinion in this case.

The Employer member of Sweden thought that a lot of irrelevant material had been brought into the discussion of this case. When the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association had come before the Governing Body, criticism had been voiced against the conclusions in the case. Over-interpretation had taken place. In addition, the speaker expressed surprise that the Committee of Experts had included this case in its report this year. That Committee had shown undue haste, especially given the fact that it had not had the chance to consider the Government's most recent communication, even though the Committee on Freedom of Association had asked the Committee of Experts to do so. He suspected that the machinery was being used for internal political fights. The idea of international ships' register should, however, be subject to more general examination at a proper time and in an appropriate forum. That would be the most satisfactory conclusion the present Committee could reach.

The Worker member of the Netherlands found an interesting element of the debate in the reference made to the proposal for a European ships' register. He wished to challenge the view of the Government that, foreseeing establishment of that register, it would be unwise for the present Committee to express itself on this case. On the contrary, he suggested, it was very important for this Committee to state its position as clearly as possible in order to give the European Commission guidance on ILO standards and their importance. Any enlightening contribution the present Committee might give to the Commission would be very important.

The Employer member of the United Kingdom, referring to Case No. 1470 concerning the Danish International Ship's Register, recalled the special rules provided in section 10 of Act No. 408 applicable to collective agreements for ships registered on the register. It seemed to him reasonable for the Danish Government to have concluded that existing agreements should not be applicable to an entirely new register, which was subject to profoundly different conditions, namely the tax regime. Further, he feared that the Danish unions were really claiming the right to decide who should represent non-Danish seafarers serving on those ships. That would not be reasonable and would effectively remove the right of non-Danish seafarers to choose their own representatives. That could lead to a direct conflict with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147). Wherever possible, wages should be fixed by negotiation in the country of the seafarer's domicile; he wondered how that could be complied with if non-Danish seafarers were to be represented by Danish unions. As to the fear that the provisions on the DIS could be extended to land transport, he thought that quite unlikely. For the ILO's entire existence, the maritime industry had justified separate machinery owing to its unique circumstances. The Danish Government had suggested that international registers could perhaps be discussed in the Joint Maritime Commission, and the speaker thought that might well be appropriate. He pointed out that a meeting of the Joint Maritime Commission was scheduled in the next biennium, starting in 1990. The Danish Government wished to postpone a conclusion in this case to provide the opportunity for further comments and discussion elsewhere. In the circumstances, where the case was so clearly arguable, that seemed to the speaker to be an entirely reasonable proposition which the present Committee should accept. This was all the more so since Convention No. 147, of obvious relevance, would be debated in detail during the next session of this present Committee.

The Worker member of Pakistan associated himself with the statements made by the various Worker members who had spoken. He stated that in the developing countries, workers looked to the developed countries to set better standards of implementation for their welfare. The argument had been advanced that workers not of a particular country, on a particular ship, should be left to their own fate. But experience had shown that workers from labour-sending countries could not always defend themselves. If they were unionised in the receiving country, their unions were able to safeguard their interest more effectively. There could be discrimination in having different standards for the two sets of workers involved, one for the Third World countries and one for the developed world. There would be discrimination and flagrant violations of international labour standards if wages and working conditions on the same ship were different for workers from developed countries and workers from developing countries. He therefore supported the stance taken by the Danish workers as to the contradictions between the provisions introduced and the Convention. The Committee on Freedom of Association had also upheld the principle that international labour standards are indivisible, whether they relate to Third World countries or to the industrialised world.

The Workers' members thought that this matter should not simply be referred to another forum; the problems concerning seafarers were posed not only for Denmark but also for other countries and had to be discussed in the present Committee. Next year, when the Committee of Experts' general survey on the Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147) would be discussed in relation to this special category of workers, the general question as well as the specific matter involving Denmark would have to be discussed. The Workers' members thought that it would not be reasonable, in the case of a country like Denmark, a democratic country with a tradition of labour relations and collective agreements, for a hard and intransigent stance to be taken instead of a position maintaining dialogue and consultations in order to arrive at solutions; this would moreover prove that ILO Conventions were useful not only for developing countries but for developed countries as well.

The Workers' members were aware of serious problems regarding maritime matters, not only in Denmark but in many other countries as well; there was, in particular, a problem of competitiveness. The Workers' members hoped that the Office and the European Commission would examine the contents of a draft EEC Directive to evaluate its conformity with Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 111 and 147. This would make it possible to determine the action to be taken; in the case of Denmark, it lay in two fields. First, it involved knowing whether or not the legislation needed to be modified, and to what extent, because there were divergent and contradictory that had to be overcome. Second, it involved knowing whether there were shortcomings in regard to collective bargaining and studying the difficulties and how they could be overcome and avoided in the future. It would be very unfortunate to have the Government, employers and workers engage in a dialogue among the deaf. The Workers' members hoped to see recognition, by both Denmark and the European Commission, of the need for the assistance of the Office. They had hoped that it would be possible to overcome the difficulties, and because of this the present Committee should not be content with waiting for replies or reports; it should act.

The Employers' members thought it was important that the parties directly involved had been the first to state their view in this case. Addressing the general question, the Employers' members always favoured the principle of free collective bargaining, which should be pursued in line with national conditions. The national conditions in Denmark had been explained extensively by the Government in the written information it had supplied. The Committee of Experts has set a high standard in requiring that the autonomy of the parties to collective bargaining could be waived only for compelling reasons of national economic interest. The Employers' members did not see that standard in the Convention, but it was the standard used by the Committee of Experts to be considered in looking at the ships' register. The Employers' members saw national economic interests involved here which were of the highest possible importance. Secondary or international registers existed in many countries with a traditional shipping industry; there had been considerable national justification for this. The relationship between the establishment of new international registers and an increase in flagging out to so-called flags of convenience could not be doubted. Flagging out had meant that the national legislation on labour matters, social security and safety at sea was no longer applicable. With the Danish register, however, the only consequence was that existing collective agreements had to be changed, while all the other legislation on safety and so forth remained in force. New collective bargaining could still take place and this had in fact occurred. The Committee of Experts had always said that in any interference in collective bargaining, workers' standards of living should be guaranteed; in this situation, legislation exempting crews on ships listed on the new ships' register from taxation on their wages acted as a kind of compensation to ensure their standard of living. Mention had been made of a distinction made between foreigners and nationals in relation to new collective agreements, with the suggestion that this might violate Convention No. 111. Without getting into discussion on that question, the Employers' members wished to point out that in no case was nationality a criterion under that Convention. They did however think that the broader questions involved should be taken up at a later time. The Government had offered to have such a discussion next year. The Committee of Experts had requested the Government to report on the results of collective bargaining, and it had complied fully with that request. The question of the ships' register, which was a difficult problem, was being discussed for the first time this year. The Employers' did not wish to draw any conclusions on the substance and did not want to refer to the question of discrimination in the conclusions in this case. They preferred to come back to the matter at a later time when it might be possible to find a solutions that would reflect a consensus, which was not possible at the moment.

The Worker member of Liberia observed that countries in the Third World saw flags of convenience as an industry which could generate badly needed employment. Notwithstanding this, they would very much like to have their nationals treated in keeping with the strict application of ILO Conventions with respect to equal treatment at work. These workers were not boarding ships only as labourers; Liberia trained young men in a maritime institute who emerged with some measure of competence. But with such serious unemployment problems in the country, there could be little bargaining power in collective negotiations with shipowners. He submitted, however, that shipowners could not contract with Liberian seafarers with a view to violating the Convention if working conditions under other contracts were more favourable. Treatment of Liberian seafarers should be commensurate with treatment given to the shipowner's own nationals.

The Government representative declared this had been an extremely interesting discussion. If nothing else, it had given ample evidence that the case contained many issues deserving further dialogue. He thought that all the disagreement on the various points stemmed back to one basic disagreement, namely, what the alternative to establishing the DIS had been. The trade unions considered the alternative as being the status quo, but the Government firmly believed that this would have led to a complete flagging out to flags of convenience. The signs of this could be read in the new proposal from the EEC Commission.

It had been said that the Government had repeatedly violated ILO Conventions and that an example should be set. He found that to be a queer statement, since the Government had invariably and unwaiveringly declared its intention to abide by ratified Conventions. It was quite something else to say, as in this case, that the matter was more complex than it seemed at first glance. The Government wished to discuss problems to find a solution. The Government had never been convinced that a direct contacts mission in this case would solve the problems. The facts in the case were not difficult. In the Government's view, this was not essentially a Danish case at all, so all in all the Government was still not convinced that a mission to Denmark would be adequate. As to the question of discrimination which had been touched upon, the Government did not understand how a criterion of residence could be discriminatory. The speaker recalled that work on DIS ships was now covered by collective agreements concluded with the respective unions. On this background, the present Committee might foresee further dialogue, partly on a general level under ILO auspices and partly at a domestic level prior to the 1990 International Labour Conference.

The Workers' members were of the view that the issue involved eliminating confrontation and getting rid of the divergencies which existed between the Government on the one hand and the Committee on Freedom of Association and the present Committee on the other hand. They recalled that Denmark was not the only country at stake in relation to this issue, which also concerned the Common Market. Recalling the example of the Netherlands in which direct contacts had contributed to clarifying certain issues, the Workers' members stated that it would be very regrettable to have to conclude that an industrialised country never had need of assistance or of direct contacts.

The Committee took note of the information supplied orally and in writing by the Government representative, as well as of the detailed discussion which had taken place. The Committee observed that the comments of the Committee of Experts had found divergencies between the legislation and the provisions of the Convention. It also noted the conclusions of the Commission on Freedom of Association in this connection. The Committee took due note of the assurances of constructive tripartite dialogue given by the Government representative. It requested the Government none the less to pay particular attention to the observations of the Committee of Experts in order to take them into account in developments concerning the legislation and practice in regard to collective bargaining. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would continue to provide information on developments in the situation and that progress would be achieved in the application of the Convention.

The Workers' members wished to recall that not only the Danish Government, but also the Danish trade unions, had presented information to the present Committee. The Workers' members also stressed the fact that it was not merely a matter of taking stock; the Office should find a way of examining the matter in the context of maritime questions in general and of the draft EEC directive. Finally, it was not enough to provide information; it was also necessary to act and, in this respect, the Workers' members held firm in proposing Office assistance to the Danish Government in the name of the present Committee, even though the Government representative was not in a position to reply at this time to that suggestion.

The Employers' members pointed out that the Employers as well as the Workers had contributed information to the discussion. The Employers' thought it necessary to have a careful and detailed discussion before drawing any conclusions of future action. They also disagreed with the proposal of direct contacts, since the questions involved here were not typical of the kind that could be solved in that way.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1953). The Government has communicated the following information:

In general, workers in the Dominican Republic enjoy protection against any act of discrimination which would infringe freedom of association in relation to employment. The right to form trade unions is enshrined in the Constitution and the Government promotes full respect for trade union rights, offering to the workers all the guarantees necessary for retaining this right as a vital part of public liberties. No legal provision impedes national or legally resident foreign workers from working freely or from joining trade unions in accordance with the Constitution and the labour legislation. In some cases, foreigners who are not legally resident may work, but may not join trade unions due to their status as migrant workers. National and foreign workers enjoy freedom of association and the right to organise both in rural and in urban areas.

As concerns the employment of Haitian workers in sugar cane plantations, there is no anti-union discrimination whatsoever by employers. This is proved by the existence of trade unions in each and every one of the installations of the CEA, a trade union at the Casa Vicini and one in the Central Romana, which are the only sugar producers in the country.

The labour authorities are evaluating a preliminary draft of legislation which would guarantee the continued existence of trade unions and protect trade union leaders in their jobs due to the exercise of their trade union duties, in order to reintroduce it to the legislature for early adoption. There is a firm will to make the necessary administrative and legislative reforms in conformity with the recommendations of the 1983 report of the Commission of Inquiry and the comments made by the Committee of Experts concerning the protection of Haitian workers against any act of anti-union discrimination which might be practised by the large employers of the sugar sector, one of the most basic of the economy. Acts of direct or indirect interference against workers' and employers' organisations or their members or representatives, are now practically non-existent. As for their establishment, functioning and administration, this kind of organisation has complete independence in accordance with the guarantees contained in the Constitution and labour legislation; the authorities of the State Secretariat of Labour maintain strict supervision in this regard.

Other important preliminary drafts of legislation and various administrative provisions are being evaluated, drafted or redrafted, in order to attain higher levels of compliance with Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, such as the extension of the coverage of the Labour Code to agricultural, agroindustrial and forestry undertakings which permanently employ fewer than ten workers; extension of the coverage of section 307 of the Labour code, strengthening sections 678(15) and 679(6) of the Labour Code concerning sanctions for violations of section 307; the adoption of adequate measures to guarantee effective protection against any act of anti-union discrimination or interference, and measures for reintegration in employment, preventive measures and penal sanctions involving prison sentences.

The Government trusts that it will soon be able to inform the ILO of the adoption of a package of measures for the amendment of the present legislation so as to bring it into complete conformity with the Convention.

As concerns the specific cases of violations of trade union rights of migrant workers, acts of anti-union discrimination and interference with trade union organisations, alleged by the General Confederation of Workers in its communications of 3 and 31 January 1989 to the ILO, the Government refers to the comments it recently made in a communication to the ILO.

In relation to other aspects of the application of this Convention, the Government refers to the report it has submitted on the application of Convention No. 87 for the period ending 30 June 1989.

The General Directorate of Mediation and Arbitration of the State Secretariat of Labour has intensified its work, and has made important progress among workers' organisations, stimulating collective bargaining and the conclusion of new, significant and satisfactory collective agreements and peaceful solutions to innumerable labour conflicts. It has also supported the development of new trade union organisations, all of which are indicators of the peaceful labour situation in the Dominican Republic.

Greece (ratification: 1962). The Government has communicated the following information:

In reply to the observations of the Committee of Experts in regard to the application of Article 4 of the Convention, the Government notes that, in the context of the effort being made to modernise the legal provisions governing collective bargaining in Greece, the Minister of Labour, in 1988, set up a committee of university professors and professors who are experts in labour law. This committee recently submitted a draft Bill it had drawn up; comments on it are being sought from interested parties and representatives of political parties before being put into final form. This draft Bill has already been signed by the competent Ministers and will be placed before Parliament. The draft Bill provides that there shall be no state intervention at any stage of labour dispute resolution (face-to-face negotiations, arbitration), since there are no plans to set up a special corps of arbitrator-mediators outside the public service. In addition, no limitation will be placed on the right to strike from the beginning to the end of a conflict or even while dispute resolution is being pursued.

Haiti (ratification: 1957). See under Convention No. 87.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1967). See under Convention No. 87.

Poland (ratification: 1957): The Government communicated the following information: In the course of the Round Table Conference there was discussion of the problem of ensuring the possibility of reinstalling to employment persons who lost their jobs due to their trade union activity carried on after 13 December 1981 (in contradiction of the then-existing law) and of reinstating continuity of their employment, interrupted because of dismissal. Basic provisions of the draft Act on the Rights of Persons to Re-enter an Employment Relationship were agreed upon.

On 24 May 1989 a respective Act was adopted by the Sejm. It provides that the above-mentioned person may apply to establishments which had dismissed them for re-employment in accordance with their skills and professional experience. An establishment should employ an applicant and if it refuses to do so, persons concerned may apply to the Special Social Conciliatory Commission, composed of a representative of the administration, a representative of a trade union – indicated by an applicant – and an impartial, competent chairman. Appeals may be lodged with the Commission also by teachers of schools and academies of all levels and research workers of the Polish Academy of Sciences.

All workers whose employment was terminated after 13 December 1981 due to their trade union activity carried on in contradiction with the then-existing law will be ensured continuity of employment regardless of whether they return to the previous enterprise or not.

The Government wishes also to note that on 29 May 1989 the Sejm adopted an amnesty act concerning certain criminal acts and misdemeanours. It covers the cases of infringement of law for political reasons or in connection with strikes or acts of protests, committed after 31 August 1980.

Detailed information on the above-mentioned changes in Polish legislation, and – in particular – on changes in the Trade Union Act shall be submitted to the ILO in the due course.

In addition, see the discussion under Convention No. 87.

Turkey (ratification: 1952). A Government representative stated that Turkey had recently gone through an important political, social and economic process. An integral part of this dynamic process had been the progress achieved in the area of industrial relations. Important improvements were brought to the labour legislation in June 1986 and 1988. In 1988-89, the Government's efforts continued to the same end, with regard to both domestic legislation and international agreements, including the recent submission to the Parliament of the ILO constitutional amendments of 1986. The speaker welcomed the positive reference made in the Committee of Experts' report about the improvements brought by laws Nos. 3449 and 3451 of June 1988. This evolutionary process would have to be pursued on the basis of tripartite dialogue and consensus.

As regards Convention No. 98, the Committee of Experts referred in its comments to three issues under Act No. 2822 of 1983 on Collective Bargaining, Strikes and Lockout. The first issue concerned the requirement of trade unions having a membership of at least 10 per cent of the workers employed in a specific branch of activity and more than 50 per cent of the workers employed in the enterprise or the workplace, so that they could be qualified as a party to negotiate a collective agreement. This issue had been duly considered by the Government, which also undertook consultations with the workers' and employers' associations. The speaker reiterated that the concurring positions of the employers and workers on this issue had remained unchanged. The Government, therefore, in the continuing absence of any formal request by both social partners to change this numerical criteria, did not find itself presently in a position to launch any legislative initiative. It would, nevertheless, continue to maintain this issue under consideration on the basis of tripartite principles. He added that under the present legislation, minority unions were effectively allowed to function freely and had such rights as to make representations on behalf of their members and to represent them in cases of individual grievances. Furthermore, 2,454 collective agreements had been signed in 1988 alone covering 629,000 workers, i.e. one-third of all unionised workers.

With regard to the second issue, namely the intervention of the Supreme Arbitration Board in dispute-settling in certain situations, the Government representative stated that, as urged in the Committee of Experts' report, the application of this procedure was in fact restricted to cases where work stoppage due to a strike would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or the part of the population. In the exercise of this power, the Government and the judiciary had been extremely careful not to exceed the limits intended by the law-maker. Indeed, since the enactment of this Law in 1983, the Government had only implemented this measure once on 22 March 1989 when it decided to postpone the implementation of the decision of a strike by the iron and steel workers. The Government decision had been subsequently brought by the workers' union to the Administrative Court of Appeal and before the court could pass a judgement on the case, the Government had decided to lift the postponement. The strike had in fact been going on for the last 45 days involving 23,000 workers. This procedure was governed by constitutional rules strictly restricting its exercise to exceptional situations. Furthermore, the law guaranteed the repeal procedure on any such Government decision, therefore ruling out any possibility of arbitrary action. Furthermore the composition of the Supreme Arbitration Board had been improved by Act No. 3451 of June 1988 so as to provide for a more balanced tripartite representation. The speaker further stated the high number of strikes (156 in 1988) and the participating workers (30,000 in 1988) did indicate the presence of effective use of the right to strike in Turkey; the work-days lost in 1987 and 1988 in strikes reached record highs, around 1.9 million work-days each year.

The third issue concerned public servants and their right to collective bargaining. The speaker reminded the Committee that the Turkish Government had not yet signed Convention No. 151 on Labour Relations (Public Service) of 1978. Furthermore, Article 6 of Convention No. 98 provided that "this Convention does not deal with the position of public servants, nor shall it be construed as prejudicing their rights or status in any way". Those public servants who, under Article 6, are not dealt with by Convention No. 98, are defined by Act No. 657 on the State Personnel Regime. Therefore, the Committee of Experts' report clearly referred to another category of persons in public service and whose status is in fact governed by Decree No. 233. There had been a recent development with regard to this issue: article 3 and other sections of Decree No. 308 of 18 January 1988, which prohibited the contracted personnel of the public enterprises from signing and benefiting from collective agreements, had been declared unconstitutional by the constitutional courts. Therefore, these employees will very shortly recover their rights to collective bargaining. The speaker concluded that his Government had taken note of the Committee of Experts' observations and would be pleased to supply the Committee with more detailed information at a later date.

A Worker member of Turkey stated that once again the Committee had been unable to note any real progress concerning this case. The Government had merely repeated arguments which had been consistently rejected by this Committee, the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association. This could not possibly result from a lack of dialogue, since both Workers and Employers had always offered a constructive dialogue over many years, since 1983 to be exact. Furthermore, this could not result from lack of assistance since there had been three direct-contact missions, two technical missions, some 18 reports of the Committee on Freedom of Association, hours of discussions, pages of observations, and conclusions of this Committee with which the Government had always seemed to agree. Why then cannot this present Committee note any progress?

The answer to that question requires an assessment from a broader perspective, which involved one basic argument raised by the Government, which was that "Turkey is in a phase of rapid development concerning all spheres of life and all parts of society... improvement of labour legislation has been a priority objective and as it stands now is a part of the 'evolutionary' process of the labour life in Turkey". The speaker stated that the labour legislation here in question had never been and would never be a part of this evolutionary process in labour matters; it was an integral part of a system imposed upon Turkish workers and the Turkish society under extraordinary conditions, at a time when Turkey was entirely under martial law and when practically all trade union activity was prohibited. It was a system designed to curb all trade union rights and liberties, which was best described in a report of the Director-General's representative following his fifth and last visit to Turkey: "...Laws Nos. 2821 and 2822 (respecting trade unions and collective agreements, strikes and lock-outs respectively) constituted a legal straightjacket in which the trade unions found themselves, faced with interference in or control of practically every activity that unions should normally be able to carry out, free from any state intervention..."

As regards the argument that amendments had been brought to the labour legislation, these modifications failed to address major problems relating to ILO principles, such as: exclusion of public servants from the right to organise, interference in the administration and activities of trade unions, excessive restrictions on the right to strike and problems related to collective bargaining. To this day, teachers both in private and public institutions, just like some 2 million public servants were still denied the right to organise.

To sum up, another full year had passed by and nothing had changed; the Government had made promises which it had not kept; no consultation whatsoever had taken place and violations were still occurring. Perhaps the time had come for this Committee to note that this attitude could no longer be tolerated.

A Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the Committee of Experts' report established clearly that there were still serious difficulties in Turkey with regard to collective bargaining. Workers were still deprived of the right to negotiate their working conditions. The numerous limitations on the right to strike in Turkey extended far beyond the essential public services. In numerous sectors, workers were facing extremely difficult conditions and were subjected, in case of dispute, to an arbitration procedure which was not adequate since they could be constantly placed in a minority position because of the composition of the Arbitration Board. By and large, free collective bargaining was not possible in Turkey, strikes could be suspended and workers could have to give up their right to strike, under the threats of heavy fines and prison terms of up to eight months in certain circumstances. This serious situation should be examined and put to an end.

A Worker member of United Kingdom stated that he could have repeated almost word for word what he said last year because hardly anything whatsoever had changed. The speaker strongly reiterated that the right to strike was fundamental to trade unionism, since it was the only tool available to workers in a dispute when all other means of arguing their case had been exhausted. No one could argue that the right to strike existed in any realistic form in Turkey; furthermore, large numbers of workers in Turkey had no right to strike at all; in addition, where this right was recognised, there existed a whole series of laws prohibiting certain actions perfectly legitimate in other countries and circumstances, such as the right to collect money to assist strikers and the right to establish picket lines around an undertaking which was on strike.

As regards the right of public servants to joint trade unions, the Government advanced that it had no obligations whatsoever to civil servants since it had not signed Convention No. 151; the speaker reiterated that Convention No. 151 did not override Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 in the case of countries which had signed it, and in the case of countries which have not signed Convention No. 151, this did not affect their obligation to give civil servants the right to organise. A country which refused that right to public servants could not claim to be fulfilling its obligations under the Conventions. The workers had hoped to see fundamental changes in the situation but, unfortunately, there was no progress whatsoever.

A Worker member of the Netherlands stated that this was a very serious case, which had been discussed again and again, and where the Government had made many promises which it had never fulfilled in a meaningful way. Both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on Freedom of Association had expressed themselves on the case and the comments of the latter had been just as severe as those of the former. Since the Employers fully participated in the supervisory activities of the Committee on Freedom of Association, they should subscribe completely to its judgements. This was a long-standing case, involving violations of trade union rights and also of human rights: trade union organisations had been closed down and trade union leaders had been locked up, many of them sentenced to long prison terms. Accordingly, it was very hard to believe that the Employers would not accept mentioning Turkey in a special paragraph of the report, with a view to drawing the attention to the fact that this was a serious case, which had been discussed year after year without major improvements.

The Workers' members, after expressing their full support to the previous Workers' speakers, emphasised certain points which, in their opinion, showed the seriousness of the situation:

- (1) the Government had undertaken in 1986 to re-establish freedom of association and collective bargaining, but it had not fulfilled its commitments and the fundamental problems subsisted since the improvements concerned only minor issues: these were the conclusions of the Committee of Experts and of the Freedom of Association Committee; consequently, the legislation and practice were unacceptable and should be modified;
- (2) the interference in trade union affairs, and particularly in collective bargaining, could not be tolerated; in spite of the repeated requests of the Workers' members, the Government had not ratified Convention No. 87, which was regrettable since the right to collective bargaining depended on the right of association;
- (3) in spite of the technical assistance and the missions from which this country benefited, the three problems mentioned by the Committee of Experts still had not been resolved:
 - concerning the numerical requirements giving bargaining rights, the Government maintained that it would not take any initiative as long as social partners would not agree, which did not make any sense;
 - as regards the disputes settlement procedure, some progress had been made but there were still important restrictions;
 - finally, public servants did not have the right to organise or to bargain collectively although their number was very high.

All this showed that there was no satisfactory progress.

A Worker member of the United States insisted on the extreme seriousness of this case, a case so serious in fact that the Committee of Experts highlighted it by pointing this Committee's attention to certain conclusions of the Freedom of Association Committee mentioned in paragraph 25 of the General Report. Furthermore, workers who were members of the tripartite delegation of United States, in a pre-Conference briefing, had especially expressed their concern on this case after consideration of the Committee of Experts' observations. Furthermore, he specifically approved the previous statements of the Workers' members.

The Employers' members noted that during the present discussions, new facts had been introduced which had not been mentioned by the Committee of Experts in its report, and thus, that they would not deal with them. During these last two years, the present Committee had noted two points: first, Turkey had ratified Convention No. 98 but not Convention No. 87 and, when this Committee mentioned the conclusions of the Freedom of Association Committee, it referred only to the conclusions concerning Convention No. 98. Although these two Conventions are linked, problems concerning exclusively Convention No. 87 should not be discussed in this Committee. Secondly, during this year and last year's discussions, certain speakers mentioned that some new legislative texts had contributed to worsening the situation; in this respect, the Employers' members indicated that the Committee of Experts, this year, had examined with interest certain legal texts which could bring about certain improvements.

The Committee of Experts had criticised on the one hand the numerical conditions imposed on trade unions so that they be authorised to bargain collectively and, on the other hand, the obligation to accept compulsory arbitration in certain cases. The Government had explained to the Committee of Experts why it did not seem appropriate to amend the legislation, but the Committee of Experts without listening to the Government's arguments told it directly in its observations what to do. The Employers' members called attention to this method by the Committee of Experts, which they could not get used to. They pointed out that, in their opinion, the national legislation should provide for a reduction of the numerical criteria presently prescribed. The Committee of Experts could have answered to the Government's arguments and could have given further explanation to demonstrate, for instance, that the conditions established were excessive and that they could prevent the establishment of new unions, or that powerful unions could use them not only to compete with weaker unions but also to eliminate them. Concerning compulsory arbitration, the Committee of Experts had considered that it was justified only to prevent strikes presenting a risk to the life, security or health of the population. The Committee of Experts had not pointed out in the present case the principle it had mentioned in the Netherlands case, which permitted restrictions to collective bargaining for compelling reasons of national economic interest. The Government had declared that compulsory arbitration would only be resorted to in exceptional circumstances (presenting a danger to the citizens' health or national security); in this respect, the Employers considered that a certain convergence of opinions between the Government and the Committee of Experts existed. The Employers' members criticised the formula regularly used by the Committee of Experts to define the cases in which it was justifiable to limit the right to strike in respect of Convention No. 87. The Committee of Experts had also used that formula in its observations on the implementation of Convention No. 98 in Turkey, as regards compulsory arbitration. The Employers' members did not agree with the criteria used by the Committee of Experts since, in their opinion, it was not realistic nor acceptable to only take into account the risk to the life of the population; the State should be able to intervene before this stage. In any event, they added that it should be possible, through dialogue, to avoid excessive state interference in free collective bargaining but that such interference should not be limited only to situations where the population was really in danger. The huge number of work-days lost because of strikes, mentioned by the Government representative, showed that there were indeed strikes in this country and that compulsory arbitration had not been used as often as certain speakers had suggested.

As regards freedom of association and the right to bargain collectively of public servants, the Committee of Experts had requested the Government to submit the relevant instruments and information for examination.

The Employers' members noted in conclusion that the problems raised by the application of Convention No. 98 had not yet been settled. The situation should continue to improve as regards the problems mentioned by the Committee of Experts and this should be mentioned in the conclusions of this Committee which would have to discuss again this case.

The Workers' members, referring to the Employers' members' intervention on the Netherlands' case, emphasised that the Committee of Experts and the Direct Contacts Mission had dealt with that case on the basis of Convention No. 87, ratified by the Netherlands, although it would have normally been dealt with under Convention No. 98. In the present case, this was exactly the reverse situation; the applicable Convention was No. 98 and it could not be totally separated from Convention No. 87. In practice, there had been discrimination for union activities; public servants had been punished; trade unions had been dissolved; and trade union leaders had been prohibited from exercising their union duties. In the present political situation, profound changes and improvements could have been expected but, unfortunately, they had not occurred yet. This Committee should insist that the Government adopt measures that would be compatible with the various Conventions it had ratified, and even those it had not ratified.

A Worker member of the Netherlands added, concerning the Dutch case, that the problem, in short, was interference in collective bargaining. The Workers would have liked to use Convention No. 98 but this was not possible because the Netherlands had not ratified it; so they invoked Convention No. 87. As regards the Employers' statement on the state interference in collective bargaining in the Netherlands' case, he pointed out that the Committee of Experts had defined the criteria to be fulfilled to permit what it called "legitimate interferences in collective bargaining". As was made clear in the observation of the Committee of Experts and in the report No. 265 of the Freedom of Association Committee, if these criteria are respected, there would be no illegitimate interferences in collective bargaining, but these criteria should be duly verified.

A Worker member of Greece expressed his total disagreement with the Employers' argument that powerful unions would fight less powerful unions, from which they concluded that "weak" unions could be prohibited. Obviously, there could be competition between unions in a pluralist system – that is the essence of democracy – but this competition should take place through dialogue and action in favour of the workers; that could not justify any intervention whatsoever from the authorities or the employers. The speaker specifically asked the Government representative to explain why the representatives of DISK, an important Turkish trade union confederation, was still prohibited and why its representatives did not attend the Conference.

The Government representative stated that cases should not be discussed in the abstract. In that context, as regards the numerical requirement issue, he stated that there had been no request from the most representative workers' or employers' organisations to change the present legal status; this was just a factual situation.

As regards the second issue, the Government had not excessively used the Supreme Board of Arbitration; in fact it had only used it once recently, and the case had been withdrawn shortly thereafter. In addition there were very effective judiciary safeguards, which guarantee the lawful usage of this mechanism by the Government. Furthermore, the criteria used by the Committee of Experts on this issue were based on Convention No. 87, by which the Government was not bound because it had not ratified it. Concerning the third issue, the Government would compile all the information available and transmit it to the ILO organs in due time.

The Government representative recalled his preliminary remarks to the effect that Convention No. 151, which was clearly a specialised Convention on public service, did not bind the Government because it had not ratified it. Convention No. 98, however did not cover public servants; the speaker reiterated his previous comments on the trade union rights of public servants.

As regards other comments to the effect that nothing much had been done in Turkey to adjust policies in line with the ILO principles, the speaker informed the Committee that his Government had just submitted to the Parliament for ratification four new Conventions (Nos. 59, 123, 142 and 144), and had just ratified the European Social Charter; the ILO Constitutional Amendments had also been submitted to Parliament and should shortly be ratified. As regards the DISK situation, the judgments rendered by the courts are now in the process of appeal, which may take a long time, as would be the case in many countries. Before a final judgment was issued in these cases, the Government could not take any measures for obvious reasons.

The Committee has taken note of the information given by the Government representative, and of the detailed discussion that took place in the Committee. The Committee noted with concern the conclusions of the Committee of Experts that, even if trade union legislation had been improved in some respects, the amendments to that legislation had resulted in no changes whatsoever in regard to the points raised by the Committee of Experts. The Committee wished to recall in this connection the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee noted with regret the position adopted by the Government and expressed the firm hope that in view of the serious divergencies that had existed for a number of years, the Government would adopt in the near future all necessary measures as a result of genuine tripartite consultations, in order to give full effect to the comments made by the Committee of Experts and to improve the situation concerning full compliance with the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee hoped that the progress awaited for such a long time would be in evidence in the next report of the Government, so that discussion could be continued within the supervisory bodies.

The Workers' members expressed their complete agreement with these conclusions and proposed that they be included in a special paragraph of the report in view of their extreme importance. The Employers' members did not agree with that proposition.

Convention No. 105: Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957

Central African Republic (ratification: 1964). See under Convention 29.

Dominican Republic (ratification: 1958). The Government has communicated the following information:

No form of forced or compulsory labour is used in the Dominican Republic. The national authorities maintain strict compliance with the standards set forth in this Convention and with the recommendations made by the ILO's Commission of Inquiry in its 1983 report, as well as the observations made by the Committee of Experts in 1988 and 1989. This compliance maintained by the authorities explains why no measures involving imprisonment and/or forced or compulsory labour exist.

In the labour sphere, no recourse is had to this form of work as a method of mobilisation and utilisation of national or foreign labourers in order to foster the economy in the sugar plantations and refineries of the CEA, as was previously alleged by the Central Unitaria de Trabajadores (CUT). With regard to the importation of Haitian labourers for work in the sugar cane harvest (cutting and collection of the sugar-cane) in government-owned sugar mills, the collective agreements between the Governments of Haiti and the Dominican Republic for the recruitment of Haitian workers have not been renewed. These agreements were suspended because of the difficult socio-political situation which has emerged in that country. Haitian workers have not been hired under the bilateral agreements since the fall of the Duvalier regime in 1985. Both Governments are presently involved in a complete revision of the procedures and of the numbers of jobs for Haitian workers in order to re-establish these agreements as soon as possible, based on the best living and working conditions for these workers on Dominican territory and in the most favourable terms for both States. Any new developments on this matter will be communicated to the ILO. The present forms of recruitment of Haitian workers for sugar plantations in 1988-89 do not include, in any instance, round-ups of these workers legally or illegally resident in the Dominican Republic with the complicity of the national authorities, in order to hand them over, for payment, to the state sugar refineries.

Neither forced labour nor any form of discrimination exists in the Dominican Republic against Haitian workers engaged in agricultural work, cutting and collecting of sugar-cane at the CEA plantations and refineries, where these foreigners enjoy the same rights and privileges under the labour legislation as Dominican workers employed in similar work. Clandestine work by Haitian nationals who regularly, and in increasing numbers, cross the Dominican/Haitian border illegally does, however, exist to a large degree. These workers are used by private employers in various agricultural and livestock activities whence they move later to the informal rural and urban sectors, to domestic work and to the construction industry in the large cities of the country. The authorities are studying possible measures, to be adopted in the near future, to regulate recruitment and contracting, and the work of foreigners resident in the country, in particular, to reduce illegal trafficking of Haitian workers "ambastilles" to a minimum. These measures would also regulate the inadequate living and working conditions of these workers offered to them by private employers who benefit considerably from the use of practices which fall outside the labour law. In fact, the living and working conditions provided by private employers to illegal immigrant Haitian workers are less advantageous and humane than those granted to workers in the sugar plantations and refineries of the CEA.

In recent years (1987 and 1988), the CEA has undergone a dynamic process of diversifying its production into the agricultural and livestock subsectors, giving emphasis to the agroindustrialisation of the duty-free zones. The CEA has not been able to achieve full "Dominicanisation" of the sugar plantations in this process despite the great efforts made by its administration and the plan conceived to attract Dominican and resident Haitian agricultural workers, and to issue to the latter the full legal and social status similar to that enjoyed by Dominicans. Because of this, and in the absence of Haitian agricultural workers being brought in, the present harvest (1988-89) has been affected by a considerable lack of pickers which has resulted in a significant delay in the work of cutting and collecting sugar-cane, as well as the task of grinding it, with the subsequent loss of millions of pesos for the state sugar-trading centre.

Presently, no violation of the labour law has been registered against the CEA as concerns its sugar plantations and refineries nor do they offer sub-human conditions, particularly with regard to the work-day and wages. For the cutting and collecting of sugar-cane, Haitian and Dominican agricultural workers do not work for more than the eight hours a day allowed by agreement or by statute. The object of misunderstanding is that the said workers voluntarily vary their hours of starting and stopping work in order to take advantage of the hours of moonlight, early morning, dusk, etc. Earned wages are higher than those offered in Dominican agriculture due to the increase accorded for each ton of sugar-cane cut and collected. The considerable increase in income guarantees better living conditions. The presence of armed guards does not imply repression (such as the completion of excessively long work-days) but rather exists for the protection of human and material resources in the state-owned work centres.

Likewise, although Conventions Nos. 97 and 143 and Recommendations Nos. 86 and 151 (concerning migrant workers) have not been notified by the Dominican Republic, their provisions are observed so as to give full effect to the recommendations of the 1983 Commission of Inquiry found in paragraphs 516, 522, 526 and 527 of its report.

With reference to the provision of the Third Part of the Labour Code, it is reiterated that labour laws in the Dominican Republic are of a territorial nature and apply to Dominicans and foreigners without distinction.

The methods for recruitment established in the absence of agreements between the Governments of Haiti and the Dominican Republic for the hiring of Haitian agricultural workers, consist of contacts and personal interviews between the agricultural workers and the authorised representatives of the CEA, either in their place of residence in the Dominican territory, or in some cases when workers appear in person at branches of the state sugar enterprise searching for work at the time of the sugar harvest. In both cases, the Haitian agricultural workers showed particular interest in the cutting and pulling of sugar-cane, accepting the actual living conditions and work available in the CEA's plantations and refineries. Moreover, the CEA provides all possible facilities so that the recruited workers can be adequately transported from their places of residence around the country to their workplaces.

In compliance with the recommendation in paragraph 544 of the 1983 report of the Commission of Inquiry, the State Secretariat for Labour has intensified its inspection services in the sugar plantations and refineries, both state-owned respect for the rights of both national and foreign workers employed in agricultural work or on plantations for the cutting and collection of sugar-cane. In due time reports will be forwarded on the results of the system of regular visits to both the state and private sugar plantations and refineries, in order to improve the effectiveness of these services and on the complaints and irregularities investigated and sanctions imposed in cases of violations of agricultural workers' rights.

The CEA regularly uses individual contracts as a means for recruiting Haitian agricultural workers. Each contract contains all the contractual conditions and benefits which are enjoyed by Dominican workers hired also on an individual basis.

The Government is carefully considering the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry in 1983 in order to apply fully this Convention and others ratified by our country, as concerns the employment of Haitian workers in Dominican Republic sugar plantations, in order to take and implement all administrative and legislative measures that may be necessary.

The CGT, in its communications of 3 and 31 January 1989, made allegations concerning the violation of some provisions of this Convention. With regard to the questions raised in these accusations, the Government refers to the contents of its report recently sent to the ILO.

Article 1(c) of the Convention

Despite the existence of Act No. 3143 of 11 December 1951, amended by Act No. 5224 of 1959, on work paid for but not done, this does not imply that it is a means of labour discipline in practice since this Act has fallen into disuse. In order to repeal the application of Act No. 3143 as a practical measure, the authorities have determined ways of resolving labour conflicts, arising under this Act, through administrative or judicial means.

Article 1(d)

The provisions in the Labour Code which contemplate punishment by means of sentences of imprisonment involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes have, in practice, been completely abolished, now that the right to strike is guaranteed by law and by the authorities. The Government has, however, invoked some provisions of the Labour Code (sections 370, 373 and 378) in order to protect public order, human life and private property. The Government is promoting both the repeal of some of these provisions and possible amendments to others in order to ensure that the laws are in conformity with the Conventions.

As was expressed in earlier reports, the authorities are reevaluating possible reforms to the Labour Code in order to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention by providing that no form of forced labour may be imposed as a labour disciplinary measure. Furthermore, the Government's willingness to ensure the adoption of all measures necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention remains.

In addition a Government representative of the Dominican Republic, the Secretary of Labour, stated that there had been a lack of labour inspectors and a budget deficit in the State Secretariat of Labour; 60 posts for labour inspectors had now been created in order to overcome these shortcomings. These labour inspectors were employed under sections 390 and 400 of the Labour Code in order to effectively oversee the application of the labour provisions in that Code, especially in sugar mills under the administration of the State and on individual private plantations. These inspectors were to ensure, inter alia, that the minimum wage be paid to agricultural workers, and that the measures dictated by the State Sugar Board (CEA) in an effort to improve the situation of Dominican and Haitian labourers were being taken, and in particular that workers be paid wage bonuses before the end of the harvest. Other types of measures had been taken as well, such as mechanising the harvesting of cane and having the cut cane weighed in the presence of the cane cutter who was then given chits (showing the number of the cart, the name of the cutter, the date and the exact weight of the cut cane) as proof of the work performed. These labourers also benefited from having products available on sale at reasonable prices, social assistance and medicines. All of these measures were designed to increase the wage earned by workers on sugar cane plantations. The Government representative gave the exact number of weighers at each mill. He also stated that in case of difficulties in the weighing process, the chief weigher could intervene to try to resolve the problem; all the same, inspectors had shown that it was difficult to cheat the cane cutters, since they had garnered great experience over many years and knew the precise weight of cut cane. Up to now, 12 weighers had been dismissed for committing irregularities in carrying out their duties; this indicated that the circulars issued by the CEA were being observed in practice.

With regard to the labourers' housing, the labour inspectors had found that in plantations administered by the State, there were adequate sanitary facilities, works stores and childcare centres. It was important to note that the works stores, previously under private ownership, which had lent itself to speculation, were owned by the State, and offered prices for food and medicines which were within the reach of the workers and which were controlled by the Government Price Stabilisation Institute. The labour inspectors had also been asked to make a detailed report on the situation of agricultural workers on plantations with a view to improving the situation of workers of Dominican Republic and Haitian origin who were resident in the country. Circular No. 789 of 20 October 1988 contained provisions and recommendations to plantation administrators in relation to contracting Dominican Republic and Haitian manpower and in connection with the sugar cane harvest.

In regard to wages, the Government representative explained that there was a policy of wage bonuses, and that no plantation worker received a wage below the level of the statutory minimum wage. Nor were wages deferred, they were instead paid directly to the worker. Circular No. 111 of 11 November 1988 set forth provisions on wages: the price for sugarcane was 7 pesos and 50 centavos per ton. To this was added the bonuses offered for cutting a set number of tons, and which were now paid at the same time as wages were paid. The bonus was 1 peso per ton, which increased the amount to 8 pesos and 50 centavos per ton of sugarcane. In addition, the labourer received 2 pesos and 50 centavos when he or she cut more than two tons. All this, together with incentives granted by the CEA, had increased the real wages of the workers. In addition, thanks to newly introduced mechanisation, a worker's output was around 22.65 tons per load and per cart. In a study done in the state cane mills by the Secretariat of Labour, it had been shown that between 1 April 1988 and 30 May 1989, there had been a monthly average of 11,850 labourers and 3,623,205 tons of sugarcane had been cut in that period. When this figure was divided by the number of national and foreign labourers, the average was 50.55 tons per worker per month, which meant 2.14 tons per worker per day. When multiplied by the real price per ton, which was 8 pesos and 50 centavos, each worker was earning 18 pesos and 19 centavos per day, representing an increase of 51 per cent over and above the statutory minimum wage for rural workers which was 12 pesos per day. In addition the representative stated that if account were taken of the wage bonus given at the end of the harvest to each worker who cut more than 150 tons, this increased the wage by 5.25 per cent, for a total of 23 pesos and 52 centavos per day, which was 96 per cent in excess of the minimum wage.

It was also envisaged that the Labour Code, in particular sections 200, 201, 202, and 203 will be modified so as to eliminate finally the practice of wage payments being made in tokens, promissory notes, or vouchers. It was hoped that the National Congress would approve this modification so as to give full effect to section 187 of the Labour Code which provides that wages must be paid immediately and directly in legal tender.

In relation to Convention No. 105, the Government representative stated that the problem of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic was a difficult one, especially given the economic, social and historical conditions of the two countries. The Government of the Dominican Republic was perfectly aware of the problem and of the shared material interests of the island: this had to be taken into account but with prudence so as not to harm the island's resources and national interests. The Government of the Dominican Republic had the firm political will to seek solutions to this problem; its willingness to receive ILO missions, which were afforded all necessary facilities, stood as proof of this. On the occasion of the most recent direct contacts mission, the President of the Republic had established a commission charged with studying the possible ways of finding human and legal solutions to the problem of Haitian agricultural workers. This commission was made up of personages from all social and economic sectors of the country. The problem was an economic one, imposing obligations on both countries which shared a common border yet had different economic and social characteristics. At this time there were about one million Haitian nationals who had crossed the border illegally in search of better economic prospects and who were not being pursued by the immigration authorities of the Dominican Republic. Complaints had been made against the Government, but they had come from a trade union leader who had been expelled from the trade union federation to which he had belonged; these complaints had been made more for political than trade union purposes, and they had been disavowed by his former organisation.

Forced or compulsory labour for nationals or foreigners did not exist in the Dominican Republic; this was shown by the fact that, although sugar-cane being the backbone of the economy of the Dominican Republic, the amount of sugar-cane harvested in the years since the suspension of the agreements between the Dominican Republic and the Republic of Haiti had diminished considerably. This was also indicated by the fact that if there were a desire to resort to forced labour, in a country where there were one million illegal Haitian residents and well-organised police and armed forces, it would have been very easy to recruit the 30,000 to 40,000 persons required for the sugar-cane harvest. Instead, the Government had been obliged to close two sugar mills to take account of this reduction in manpower.

The Government representative stated that at the beginning of the harvest, the CEA had conducted a publicity campaign using the mass media in both the Dominican Republic and in Haiti in order to encourage the contracting of agricultural workers, informing them of the new minimum wage, social programmes (medical and social services), working conditions (hours of work, housing, provision of subsidised foodstuffs and other social benefits). Transport was also paid for persons voluntarily recruited.

The Government of the Dominican Republic was in compliance with Convention No. 105 and was taking appropriate measures in this regard. The President of the Republic had named a high-level commission which had recently visited the Republic of Haiti in order to conclude an agreement concerning the situation of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic. In addition, a formal request for technical assistance had been made to the Director-General of the ILO so that such an agreement would take into account all pertinent international labour standards. The ILO had also been asked to designate an international legal expert specialised in labour standards who could, together with legal experts from the Dominican Republic and Haiti, study the extent of legal standards necessary so as to adopt legislation which would be in complete conformity with the international Conventions ratified by the Dominican Republic.

The Workers' members deeply regretted the fact that the Conference Committee had been discussing this case involving the Dominican Republic for many years, and almost always in the same terms. Despite comments made by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee, regular observations appearing in the reports of the present Committee (a special paragraph had been included on the case involving the Dominican Republic in the 1988 report), a Commission of Inquiry in 1983 and a direct contacts mission in 1988, there had been practically no results apart from the announcement of the appointment of 60 labour inspectors. The Government had not sent any report and had not replied to any direct request or observation made by the Committee of Experts concerning Convention No. 105. Contrary to the Government's allegations, the legislation and practice in the Dominican Republic were in contradiction to the provisions of this Convention, and this remained the case in spite of many direct contacts and repeated technical assistance by the Office. Although poverty in Haiti could explain the fact that many people cross the border to seek work in the neighbouring country, this could not justify the continuing failure to take measures to give effect to Convention No. 105, in particular concerning regularisation of the status of Haitians who were on Dominican Republic territory, regularisation of procedures for recruitment and residence permits, and other matters referred to by the Committee of Experts. The Workers' members took note that when a trade union body presented claims or complaints in the Dominican Republic, its leaders were thrown out. The leaders who dared to take such action in that country should be congratulated.

The Workers' members wondered about the usefulness of pursuing, year after year, technical assistance from the Office where there had not been, in the short-term, any fundamental changes in the legislation or the practice in the Dominican Republic. Without a firm willingness to fully apply the right to freedom of association and to abolish all that is not in conformity with Convention No. 105 in the national legislation and practice, any further assistance from the ILO would be superfluous.

Without wishing to give up hope, since even the oldest, most serious problems could always be resolved some day, the Workers' members remained deeply concerned in face of the absence of valid and complete replies from the Government.

The Employers' members wished to stress the key points in relation to Convention No. 95, to wit the working conditions for Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic and their legal status, and particularly whether they were working on a legal or an illegal basis and whether force was involved in certain instances. These basic problems had been before the present Committee for a number of years. As to working conditions, the report of the Commission of Inquiry was available and the direct contacts mission had now taken place. The issues involved regular payment of wages, working hours and corresponding wages, the minimum wage, verification of the amount of work performed, payment in cash or with vouchers, facilities in relation to welfare, food and health, prompt payment of wages, wage advances and the Haitian workers' awareness of the working conditions and of their rights. The Employers' members wanted to know what in fact was going on, as opposed to what existed on paper. As indicated by the report of the Committee of Experts, the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the direct contacts mission, CEA circulars addressed these matters; however, information was not sufficient to say to what extent these circulars were implemented in practice. In its statement before this Committee, the Government had juggled a lot of figures but a written report stating the Government's position on law and practice in relation to each and every issue under examination was still lacking. The overall situation could be determined only on the basis of a comprehensive written report by the Government, which should give information on the results of labour inspections and which should cover private plantations as well as those run by the CEA.

The Employers' members thought the situation in relation to Convention No. 105 was even less clear. In the five points the Committee of Experts had highlighted, their report had mentioned the employment of Haitian workers, whereas the Government had stated earlier that Haitians were being employed but had no legal status and were, especially in the case of young people, being placed under pressure. There were many points here which called for clarification.

The Employers' members referred to the incident involving a fatal accident of a vehicle that had been transporting Haitian workers, with the participation of officials of the Dominican Republic. They also noted the Government's statement of its readiness to find a solution to the problems posed. Mention had been made of a committee to study the issues and make proposals, but according to the Committee of Experts' report, that national committee had fallen apart. For the Employers' members, three measures were essential: (1) the Government must see to it that the legal status of Haitian workers becomes clarified; (2) even if negotiations between the Dominican Republic and Haiti produced no results, national laws and regulations were to govern the conditions of work for these Haitians; (3) the competent authority had to see to it that the legal protections were applied in practice. Much was left to be done. At a minimum, the Government would have to prepare a written report addressing each point, so that the many pending questions could be clarified.

An Employer member of the Dominican Republic wished to present certain clarifications regarding the recruitment of Haitian workers. He stated that neither the Republic of Haiti nor the Dominican Republic had the resources to stop illegal border crossings or illegal recruitment of Haitians. This problem before the present Committee was one of long standing, and it was necessary to take into account certain indications and facts referred to by the Government of the Dominican Republic, since they reflected a change in attitude. These were concrete actions which should not be taken lightly. As such he cited statistics showing that fewer than one per cent of Haitian residents in his country were in cutting sugar cane, even though the CEA had had problems because of the shortage of manpower. If round-ups had really been the normal practice for the CEA, there would not have been such shortages this year; a round-up in the city of Santo Domingo alone would have sufficed if this were indeed the practice. Among the measures adopted by the Government and by employers to improve the situation of Haitian workers, mention should be made of the establishment of a study commission on the working and living conditions of Haitian workers, with instructions to adopt the measures necessary to improve those conditions and to comply with international undertakings made by the country. The Dominican Republic was interested in reaching an agreement with the Republic of Haiti to clarify the situation of temporary workers, but to do so also required the willingness of the Haitian Government. As additional examples of concrete action, he cited the adoption of Act No. 224 of 1984 on the penal system which had substituted imprisonment for a sentence to carry out public works, thus eliminating the possibility that anyone might be sentenced to compulsory labour. Another positive development had been the re-initiation of discussions with the Haitian authorities in the search for satisfactory solutions, in the short term, and for the establishment of standards and procedures for the contracting of Haitian temporary workers. Other positive deeds that could be stressed were the request for ILO technical assistance, wage improvements and measures taken to increase the number of labour inspectors by 40 per cent. These could not be ignored since they were actions which showed serious purpose and a willingness to seek solutions to these problems.

In regard to Convention No. 95, mention should be made, in relation to comments by the Committee of Experts, that sections 184 et seq. of the Labour Code provided that: (1) wages shall be fixed and paid in full in legal tender (section 187), which implied an express prohibition on the payment of wages in kind; (2) there was a prohibition on deductions from wages, except deductions for trade union dues with the prior written authorisation of the worker, wage advances and legally authorised deductions such as those for social security contributions (section 193); (3) wages were to be paid directly and personally to the worker, one hour before the end of the normal work day, on the date agreed upon (section 188); (4) wage debts of workers enjoyed a privilege against the employers' debts, the workers' creditors and the employers' creditors; (5) the minimum wage was the lowest wage which could be paid to a worker; (6) the law provided for criminal penalties against an employer who makes unlawful deductions, deferred payment or did not pay wages in full. The non-respect for, or the non-payment of, the statutory minimum wage was also subject to criminal penalties. The employers had, along with the CEA, provided for a substantial increase in the price per ton of cut sugar cane. Wages were now paid weekly, which also served to avoid illegal trade in sugar cane received by the CEA. It was not necessary to adopt laws similar or identical to those already in force; rather, the key point was applying the laws already in force and having trade unions and workers exercise their rights in accordance with legally established procedures.

The Workers' member of Greece stated that the present Committee was fortunately not a court. If it were, he said, there would be convictions for perjury. Concerning the application of Conventions Nos. 95 and 105, the Government representative of the Dominican Republic and the Employers' member of this country had denied the indications of the Committee of Experts regarding the wages of workers on sugar cane plantations, transport of Haitian workers to sugar cane plantations on vehicles chartered by the CEA and under military escort, and the round-ups of persons of Haitian origin (including young persons of second-generation Haitian origin who had Dominican Republic nationality). The Government representative had stated that this involved false information and unfounded accusations designed to support a tourism boycott of the country. The speaker wondered who was lying and who was spreading false information?

Referring to the suggestion by the Government representative that the trade union representatives who had lodged a complaint had been thrown out of their own trade union organisations, the speaker wished to know whether the representatives of these two trade union organisations cited in the report of the Committee of Experts were present at the International Labour Conference, and if not, why not. And if, as had just been stated, one million Haitians came to the Dominican Republic without any papers, why could not the authorities of that country regularise their status? The speaker wondered about the expediency of concluding an accord between the host country and the country of origin; this might be indispensable but in any case these workers should be able to have their status regularised and should be treated like human beings.

Finally, the speaker noted that the lengthy replies given had neither contained the substance desired, nor permitted the present Committee to overcome its feelings of impotence in the face of a situation which was intolerable from the point of view of freedom of association, freedom of labour and human rights.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom thanked the Government representative for the information provided. He also expressed gratitude to the Employer member of the Dominican Republic for independently assisting the Government in providing necessary facts. Paraphrasing Shakespeare ("Methinks they do protest too much"), the speaker said that forced recruitment had been the principal tool used by the Dominican Republic for years to compensate for the shortage of voluntary labour in the sugar cane harvest, where wages were low. He referred to the incident involving the truck accident as proving the involvement of the army of the Dominican Republic. He said that the accident had occurred on 27 January 1989, when a truck overturned while carrying 78 persons, including 73 Haitian cane workers who were being guarded (not accompanied) by two Dominican Republic soldiers on their way to a plantation near Santo Domingo. Forty-seven people had been killed, including one of the soldiers. Several survivors of the accident had told of being captured by the military and kept prisoner in military barracks before being put in the plantation-bound truck. Citing a number of detailed newspaper accounts, the speaker stated that the father of the truck driver had said his son regularly made trips for the CEA, and that the son had been hired by the military on behalf of the CEA, which paid him in their Santo Domingo offices. The truck driver corroborated this account, specifying the amount he was paid by the State for each worker transported. When the CEA initially denied involvement in transporting Haitian cane cutters, the National Federation of Truckowners (FENATRADO) had publicly contradicted this. FENATRADO had made public a document signed by a military commander authorising the shipment of 75 Haitian workers and had stated that such transport was regularly engaged in at the direction of the military. The only way to get to the ultimate truth in this case would be to send independent observers who could be present during the entire period of the harvest. He wondered if it would be possible for the ILO to do this. Until the evidence was in, the matter had to be pursued. The information provided by the Government had not been satisfactory. Serious infringements of Convention No. 105 had been taking place for many years now and the case had to be pursued until resolved.

A Government representative of Haiti, the Minister of Social Affairs, wished to recall several matters. The central question in this discussion had already been brought before the present Committee on a number of occasions and had been the subject of an inquiry in 1982-1983 which had issued recommendations to the Governments of Haiti and the Dominican Republic concerning the application of certain Conventions ratified by those two countries. Since then the government regime in Haiti had changed, and since 1985-1986 there had been no agreement authorising recruitment of Haitians to work in the Dominican Republic. Nonetheless, Haitian workers were continuing to go to the Dominican Republic and there were many problems in connection with this.

In regard to Conventions Nos. 95 and 105, the Government of Haiti wished to concur in the observations and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry in 1983 and of the supervisory bodies on the application of standards, since the ILO is an international institution with jurisdiction, in a sense, over problems involving labour and working conditions throughout the world, and it is an institution which had to ensure respect for its Conventions by ratifying States. In 1988, his Government had, in agreement with the Government of the Dominican Republic, requested a direct contacts mission in the two countries in order to assess the situation on the spot.

One week before the speaker's departure from Haiti to attend this Conference, he had received a high-level delegation from the Dominican Republic which had averred the good will and the good faith of the Government of the Dominican Republic concerning measures to take towards improving the situation of Haitian workers. The long-standing problem was in fact very complex, and it had been rather neglected by previous government regimes. The general crisis Haiti was facing means that unem-played peasants were compelled to leave to find work elsewhere, without it being possible for any national solution to be found to the problem. For this reason, his Government had let the delegation of the Dominican Republic which had come to Haiti know that it was ready to seek a solution on the basis of negotiations and perhaps even an agreement between the two States. Such an agreement should deal with two aspects.

The first was that the Government of the Dominican Republic should implement the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry, which had been taken up later in comments of the supervisory bodies. This meant granting legal status to Haitian workers who were already in the Dominican Republic and whose situation was considered irregular and illegal. In addition, a distinction should be made regarding Haitians who had lived for many years in the Dominican Republic and who could be granted resident status as well as a work permit and a residence permit. Moreover, under the law of the Dominican Republic, Haitians who had been born and lived in the Dominican Republic should be recognised as having Dominican Republic nationality or should be granted resident status. In relation to working conditions, housing, social security and so forth, Haitian workers should be treated the same as Dominican Republic workers and should have the same legal entitlement to benefits in case of sickness or accident; this applied equally to the housing and sanitary conditions on the "bateys".

The second point was that to the extent that the Government of the Dominican Republic followed up on these recommendations, which involved a plan for regularising the status of Haitians in the Dominican Republic, the Government of Haiti was willing to consider the possibility of an agreement on the migration of Haitian workers. This would involve the Government of the Dominican Republic giving the necessary guarantees so that Haitian workers would have legal papers permitting them to move about, to receive prior to their departure a clear and explicit contract of employment explaining the work to be done, the wages, the housing conditions, the payment system, etc.

The third point was that such negotiations should necessarily include the ILO since there was already a legal procedure under way in accordance with the ILO standards and since the matter had in a way already been adjudicated in the ILO. The Haitian Government called for the Governments of Haiti and of the Dominican Republic to jointly request ILO technical assistance so that there could be machinery on the spot which would permit verification of the follow-up given to the recommendations.

Fourthly, the Government of Haiti also suggested the establishment of a Haitian-Dominican Republic mixed commission composed of representatives of the private sector, the trade unions and the Governments of the two countries which would also watch to see whether the agreement was being respected and which could even serve to arbitrate in case of a conflict in interpretation.

Moreover, the Government of Haiti urged that it be authorised to send periodically a national commission to investigate the situation of Haitian workers in the Dominican Republic and to report to the Haitian Government. Finally, his Government urged that there be a corps of Haitian inspectors and superintendents who could work alongside Haitian workers on the "bateys" in order to help them formulate their claims and assist them in resolving problems.

In conclusion, the Government representative of Haiti thanked the representative of the Dominican Republic for having provided information on certain measures taken by his Government, particularly the establishment of a national commission composed of independent persons. He indicated that it was a human tragedy that workers were subjected to conditions of this sort and that the Conference Committee on Standards had not found any solution after having examined the question many times.

The Government representative of the Dominican Republic stated that his country and the Republic of Haiti shared the same island and that the economic situation of both countries was extremely difficult, although even more so in Haiti. He indicated that, as the Secretary for Social Affairs of the Republic of Haiti had said, the social and economic situation in that country was dramatic, in both urban and rural areas, and the same could be said for the Dominican Republic. The problem had perhaps not always been tackled with the same energy the Dominican Republic was now bringing to bear, but, as the Employer member of the Dominican Republic had pointed out, it was necessary to have two parties to conclude an agreement. The Republic of Haiti was now moving towards democracy and with this development it was hoped that agreements could be concluded so as to resolve these problems. The Government representative referred to a letter from the Minister of Social Affairs of the Republic to the high-level mission which had recently visited Haiti. The letter made four main points: (1) implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry which had visited Haiti in 1982-1983;

(2) renewal of an agreement covering various forms of payment, freedom of association, the conclusion of individual contracts of employment and other working conditions; (3) a request by both Governments for ILO technical assistance; (4) authorisation granted to the Government of the Dominican Republic to have a Haitian mission visit the Dominican Republic to verify implementation of the agreement.

The Government representative stated that his country sincerely wished to respect the provisions of Convention No. 105 and to this end the Government had taken effective measures, as shown by the statistics presented. It had been unfortunate that in this Committee it had been said that if it were a court, there would have been convictions for perjury. The problem was a critical one and the direct contacts mission that had visited the Dominican Republic, although it had not stayed long, had stated in its report that it was not in a position to verify the nature of the recruitment or to know exactly where it took place. According to the Government representative, this mission had not been able to establish whether it was voluntary or forced recruitment, since there was no proof of maltreatment of Haitian nationals, much less of forced labour. It was true that a lot of propaganda has appeared in the press; but any journalist who went to a developing country in Latin America or Africa could find and write about desperate situations which were much worse than what was happening in the Dominican Republic. He averred that in no country of Latin America were the rights of citizens and public freedoms enjoyed as much as in the Dominican Republic.

With regard to wages, he stated that statistics had been placed before the present Committee in relation to Convention No. 95. They showed that under Decision No. 188 of 1988, a minimum wage had been set for agricultural workers, that it was paid directly, as ensured by section 187 of the Labour Code, and that in addition, national and Haitian workers who worked in sugar cane cutting earned wages that exceeded the minimum wage by 51 per cent and by 96 per cent when additional bonuses were counted. A serious effort had been made in the Dominican Republic to respect and comply with ILO standards. If the Dominican Republic made contacts with the ILO to request technical assistance it was because this Organisation was established to assist and advise countries encountering serious economic problems as in the case of the Dominican Republic. It was a duty on the part of the Organisation to provide such assistance so as to permit the conclusion of agreements to bring an end to these problems. The Government representative said he had not indicated that in the past there had been no infringements of the Conventions; rather, he had stated that it could not be denied that at the present time serious efforts were being made and that some progress had been made.

The Workers' members inquired whether it would be possible to send, for example, one or more ILO observers to follow the actual situation in the sugar cane plantations over a certain length of time and to determine what was to be done. They also wondered whether within the next few months, the amendments needed in the legislation of the Dominican Republic would be made so as to bring it into conformity with Conventions Nos. 87, 95, 98 and 105.

The Government representative stated that it seemed that the Dominican Republic was being compelled to do what the Workers' member wanted. He had agreed with their statement. Nevertheless, in relation to one of the points raised by the Government representative Haiti, that permission has already been granted to have a verification commission visit the Dominican Republic; also, the two Governments had decided to request ILO assistance. He also said that the Government of his country was making all possible efforts, not just promises, in the sense of concrete actions such as contacts with the Haitian Government. He stated that the Ministry of Labour, which the speaker heads, would ensure through its inspectors that international labour standards in force in the Dominican Republic were being respected. Once he returned home, he would send the ILO a detailed report on the progress made up to now; with a view to satisfying the Workers' members, he would send a list of the names of the new labour inspectors and would indicate the budget of the Labour Secretariat, which had been increased by 2.26 million pesos to total 6.9 million pesos.

The Workers' members proposed that this case be mentioned in a special paragraph of the Conference Committee's report. The Employers' members agreed, provided the conclusions would refer specifically to the application of Conventions Nos. 95 and 105.

The Government representative reiterated the political will on the part of his Government to respect the Conventions it had ratified and he recalled the efforts it had made towards this end. The Government considered it unjust to have this case mentioned in a special paragraph.

The Committee, taking note of the direct contacts which took place in October 1988, expressed its extreme concern over the situation of Haitian workers.

The Committee regretted that once again no government report had been received and that the Government representative had merely provided some information in regard to labour inspection and minimum wages.

The Committee stressed that there had been no progress, either in terms of legislation or in practice, on essential points raised over a number of years by the Commission of Inquiry, the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee.

The Committee further noted that the Dominican Republic had requested ILO assistance in order to ensure the application of the Conventions in both its legislation and in practice. In this regard, the Committee considered that special efforts were called for so that the ILO could, as from the next harvest, verify the situation and ascertain on the spot that improvements which had been promised but were still awaited had in fact been made. The Committee insisted upon the need for the Government to take the necessary measures whose implementation should be verified in practice.

The Committee also noted that the Government had requested ILO assistance in drawing up an agreement with Haiti concerning the migration of workers. The Committee trusted that any agreement drawn up with ILO assistance would particularly heed the comments of the supervisory bodies. The Committee also trusted that, whether or not such an agreement were concluded, the Government of the Dominican Republic would without delay take the measures necessary to give full effect to the comments made by the ILO supervisory bodies.

The Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its general report.

Ecuador (ratification: 1962). A Government representative reiterated that in order to satisfy the comments of the Committee of Experts in relation to Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, a draft decree had been sent to the Congress to interpret the existing provision relating to collective work stoppages.

In order to address the most recent comments of the Committee of Experts with respect to the implementation of the Convention, the Congress had also been sent a draft decree relating to articles 53 to 56 of the Penal Code. This draft made it clear that these provisions did not establish forced or compulsory labour. The work of prisoners in re-education sites and prisons would be voluntary, and the fruits of their labour would be exclusively their benefit. The draft decree also made clear that sections 53 to 56 of the Penal Code could not be applied as a means of coercion, punishment or political education because of the expression of political opinion, and that they could not be used for economic development, as a means of labour discipline, as punishment for having participated in a strike, or as a form of racial, social, national, religious or other discrimination. The Government hoped that this provision would be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

Referring to article 165 of the Maritime Police Code, he considered that this provision protected the crews of ships as workers and helped maintain the stability of the crew. He considered that to dispense with this provision would lead to absurd results and would not be in the interests of employers, workers or the Government.

In conclusion, he indicated that his Government fully respects the obligations it had undertaken as a result of ratification of both Conventions Nos. 87 and 105.

The Workers' members considered that it was necessary to include the situation in relation to Convention No. 105 in the conclusions of the Committee. There were two issues which needed to be considered in this context. First, there was the need to amend section 165 of the Maritime Police Code. They hoped that the draft legislation would contain clear responses to these concerns.

The Employers' members considered that the draft decree did seem to deal with the issue of the right to strike. However, the Government had not indicated that it would amend section 165 of the Maritime Police Code. They asked the Government representative to clarify the steps which were being taken with respect to seamen.

The Government representative did not wish to make any further comment.

The Workers' members proposed that these conclusions should be included in the special paragraph.

The Government member of Venezuela considered that, in line with the usual practice, the present Committee should note with interest the draft legislation envisaged to exempt prisoners, as contemplated by the Convention, from compulsory labour so as to maintain dialogue on these matters.

The Committee nevertheless decided that its conclusions should appear in a special paragraph.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, and the discussion that took place in the Committee. It noted that at the time of the meeting of the Committee of Experts the report of the Government had not been received. Consequently, the Committee of Experts was merely in a position to recall its previous conclusions. The Committee for its part noted with concern that only certain measures had been taken to ensure conformity in law and practice with the provisions contained in the Convention, and on this score it expressed the firm hope that the Government would take, without delay, the necessary measures in order to bring law and practice into conformity with the Convention. The Committee hoped that it would be able to take note of substantial and real progress in the very near future.

Iraq (ratification: 1959) The Government representative recalled that his Government endeavoured to give every guarantee to workers in every sector in the spirit of securing social security and well-being for everyone. However, a number of temporary and exceptional provisions had been implemented, in the light of the very specific situation brought about by the war in order to secure the pursuance of work on certain projects, without which there would have been a health risk to the population. The situation now having evolved, the Government was reconsidering some of these provisions in the light of the economic and social development of the country.

The Workers' members considered the reply of the Government representative lacking in answers to the specific questions raised in the report of the Committee of Experts. He had to note that in several circumstances, e.g. where a worker resigned from his job, or changed jobs or as a consequence of certain so-called offences, the Government could, through the legislation, have the worker punished, even with imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour. Thus, in cases where there should be freedom to work and to resign from work, there was or could be state intervention enforced to work and to resign from work, there was or could be state intervention enforced by sanctions involving compulsory labour, where the worker did not wish to continue working or abandoned tasks which were held important for the State. They failed to see altogether clearly how the Government was going to eliminate all the divergencies, terminate certain practices and, on several points, abolish specific legal provisions violating the Convention. Public servants were the persons most exposed to sanctions and the problem should be re-examined. They suggested that the Office, possibly through a regional adviser, could help with the details of the case, especially in view of the goodwill that could be discerned.

The Employers' members also felt that the reply of the Government representative had not responded to the concerns expressed in the Committee of Experts' report. The two issues concerned were labour discipline and the right to strike as it related to public officials. Whereas the labour discipline issue was tied to situations involving national emergency and health and safety, the provisions in statute in this respect appeared to be overly broad and inconsistent with Convention No. 105. Law No 71 concerned the right of workers to terminate their employment with notice to the employer, but as this provision applied only to private sector employees and not to public officials, there too, seemed to be inconsistency with the Convention. Finally, section 132 of the Labour Code dealt with the situation involving unresolved labour disputes; in such cases, all disputes, regardless of the nature of the work and the degree of its impact on the country's economy, had to be resolved by the Supreme Court. Thus, it appeared that in all cases in which voluntary settlement was not reached, the right to strike was foreclosed, with any employee engaging in a strike becoming subject to imprisonment and obliged to work. They thought the Government needed to re-evaluate the scope of its legislation on labour discipline and strikes with respect to public officials; they asked for indications that the Government was taking action towards the positive implementation of its obligations under the Convention.

The Government representative emphasised that the provisions he had earlier referred to were temporary and exceptional, and that they were necessary in a given context in order to protect society and public health. He did not accept that they constituted forced labour. As to the possibility of assistance involving an ILO regional adviser, he did not think this was necessary, as, with the war over, the Government was intending to revise a number of provisions in its legislation. It had issued instructions to repeal certain laws or restrictions imposed on workers that had been required by the war. He wished to reassure the present Committee that the Government was pursuing the adoption of a number of measures to eliminate all obstacles to conformity with the Convention.

The Workers' members expressed their satisfaction that the temporary and exceptional measures were being revised and looked forward to hearing, through the Committee of Experts, about real changes and the abolition of the above-mentioned measures.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted that the conclusions of the Committee of Experts pointed to divergencies with the Convention both in law and in practice. The Committee noted the assurance provided by the Government and wished to believe that it would take the necessary measures to bring law and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requested the Government to supply detailed information about measures taken so that substantial and decisive progress could be noted in the near future.

Pakistan (ratification: 1960). A Government representative stated that the Prime Minister, Mohatma Benazir Bhutto, in her address to the nation on 2 December 1988, announced that restrictions placed on trade union activities by the previous regime would be removed and labour laws would be brought in conformity with the Convention.

In accordance with the commitment of the Prime Minister, trade union activities were fully restored and legislative measures were being taken to provide necessary legal backing. A Review Board was also constituted to decide the cases of those employees who were penalised for their trade union activities.

Referring to the Committee of Experts' observations on the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, according to which the provisions of that law are in conflict with the provisions of No. 29, ratified by Pakistan, the Government representative announced that the Government had decided to meet the requirements of the that Convention by amending the Act, so that an employee of an establishment covered under the Act may terminate his employment in accordance with the expressed or implied terms of the contract of employment. The proposed amendment would be placed before the Parliament.

As concerns the reference to the use of alleged bonded labour by contractors, known as "Kharkars", in the construction of dams and irrigation canals, the Government representative stated that his Government categorically denied the existence of any "Kharkar" camp in the country. In addition, the mention made of the alleged bonded children in "Kharkar" camps by the Sectoral Review Mission of the ILO (July-August 1986), also referred to by the Committee of Experts, was based on hearsay, having little support of any recorded evidence. Had there been any such "Kharkar" camp in howsoever remote areas of the country, the members of the Mission were free to go and inspect the same. The Government, therefore, reiterated its earlier submission that there was no illegal bonded labour in the country.

Regarding the Committee of Experts' observations on certain sections of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, giving the authorities powers to prohibit the publication of views and to order the dissolution of associations, subject to penalties of imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour, the Government representative informed this Committee that the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963, had since been repealed. Under the provisions of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 and the Political Parties Act, 1962, offenders are tried in ordinary courts of law with full right to be represented by legal counsel of their choice and they have the right to appeal to the superior courts. The Government was of the view that conviction of offenders by courts of law for specific offences under these laws did not fall within the scope of the Convention.

In order to meet the objections raised by the Committee of Experts on sections 54 and 55 of the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, the relevant provisions were being amended so that the element of compulsory labour was removed. The word "imprisonment" would be substituted by "simple imprisonment". The Government had already presented a Bill in Parliament to amend the Industrial Relations Ordinance so that these sections were brought into conformity with the present Convention. It should also be noted that the provisions of sections 54 and 55 are equally applicable to employers and workers.

Similarly, the Government was taking necessary action to make suitable amendments to the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Act.

A Worker member of Pakistan informed this Committee that the climate in Pakistan was much better since last year's elections when the new Prime Minister promised that the Government would bring law and practice into conformity with ILO Conventions. With regard to the issues under Convention No. 29, the assurances made by the Government to bring the provisions of the Essential Services Act and the West Pakistan Essential Services Act into conformity with that Convention was a welcome step. This legislation, however, should be placed before the Parliament for adoption as soon as possible. Under the present legislation, workers were still compelled not to leave the services of their employer without his/her consent.

As concern the "Kharkars", even though the Constitution prohibited forced labour, the Government could still play a more positive role in carrying out effective labour inspection, particularly as concerns construction work, in order to ensure implementation of the relevant legislation. While it was true that workers were able to seek remedies from the courts in order to protect their rights, the Government could take preventive action through labour inspection.

With regard to Convention No. 105, the Government should supply the ILO with any new legislation so that the supervisory bodies could determine whether the new legislation was in conformity with the ratified Conventions. The Government should supply the new legislation replacing the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance as soon as possible.

The Security of Pakistan Act and the Political Parties Act which provided sanctions involving rigorous imprisonment should be reviewed by the Government.

As concerns minorities in Pakistan, the Government has set up a special Minority Ministry to look into questions of discrimination. A special ministry has also been established for the advancement of women. The Government should take the necessary measures to bring its law and practice into conformity with the ILO Conventions.

The Workers' members welcomed the Government representative's statement that a number of acts which had been at issue in the considerations of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 were repealed or being repealed. Good relations and a constructive dialogue should be established with the new Government. If the Government had actually submitted its reports to the Committee of Experts, this Committee would have been able to make judgements and draw conclusions on the basis of the Committee of Experts' comments. If the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, has been either amended or repealed, or substituted by another Act, full details should be provided to the Committee of Experts.

As concerns the Government representative's statement that the ILO Sectoral Review Mission report on "Kharkars" was erroneous, it would be helpful if the Government, in any event, supplied information on the measures taken to enforce the prohibition of forced labour in the field of contract labour. The Government should also supply detailed information on the actual measures undertaken or envisaged, as concerns all types of exploitation of labour, such as forced labour.

With regard to Convention No. 105, it was not clear whether the Government representative stated that the Security of Pakistan Act was being repealed or replaced. The Committee of Experts pointed out quite clearly that the Security of Pakistan Act was in contravention of Article 1(a) of this Convention. Any replacement of these Acts, or any amendments, should be transmitted to the Committee of Experts for their consideration.

The workers' members noted that the Government representative said that the Industrial Relations Ordinance was being amended to replace the term "imprisonment" with "simple imprisonment". The Workers' member further said that the term "simple imprisonment" required clarification, because the existing Industrial Relations Ordinance was completely contrary to Article 1(c). In previous years, the Government stated that nobody had been punished under this Ordinance. Nevertheless, the Committee of Experts had pointed out that the mere fact that the threat existed, that the legislation existed, was sufficient in itself to bring it into contravention of Article 1(c). The Industrial Relations Ordinance should be amended so as to bring it into conformity with Convention No. 105.

As concerns the Merchant Shipping Act, further information should be provided in order to determine whether Pakistan has fulfilled its obligations under Articles 1(c) and (d) of the present Convention.

As concerns Article 1(e), the question was posed to the Government representative whether sections 298(b) and (c) of the Penal Code had, in fact, been repealed. As long as ordinances and orders exist dealing with a particular religious group, then whether, in fact, a country is observing the particular Convention is called into question.

Information must be supplied to the ILO with regard to all these matters so that the Committee of Experts may fully examine this case and so that the present Committee may properly continue its work.

The Employers' members stated that it was refreshing to hear of the positive developments taking place in Pakistan.

There were six problems raised as concerns the application of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. First, as concerns Convention No.

29, the Government representative should have stated when the legislation relating to termination of employment subject to consent would be amended. Secondly, the Government should supply information confirming the position that bonded labour by contractors does not exist so that the Committee of Experts may be able to substantiate its statements.

Thirdly, as concerns Convention No. 105, the need for the Government to submit written reports was stressed. The statements made by the Government representative concerning the amendment of the Security of Pakistan Act and the Political Parties Act in order to provide for the right of appeal did not clearly demonstrate how these laws would then be in conformity with Convention No. 105. It was, however, a step in the right direction and the new legislation could provide the Committee of Experts with information to evaluate the new situation.

Fourthly, as concerns the Industrial Relations Act, whether the Act referred to "simple imprisonment" or "imprisonment" did not seem to change the fact that this legislation was in contradiction to the Convention. Further clarification was needed.

Fifthly, the revisions referred to by the Government representative concerning the Merchant Shipping Act should be adopted as soon as possible. Finally, more complete fact-finding was necessary as concerns the penal sanctions relating to Islamic activities. The information provided by the Government was considered to be very positive and hope was expressed that the Government would continue to make progress.

The Government representative expressed his wish that he could have been able to provide more details about concrete measures, but the new Government had only come into power six months ago and it takes time to make changes in the legislation. As concerns the Essential Services Act, the Cabinet had already decided upon its amendment and this matter Parliament would act on this matter. The necessary measures would be taken to bring the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act into conformity with the ratified Convention. As concerns bonded labour, it should be noted that forced labour was against the Constitution of Pakistan, which was the supreme law of the land. The kidnapping of children for bonded labour was punishable by death in Pakistan. The Government representative noted the observation made by the Worker member of Pakistan and stated that labour inspection would be improved.

The West Pakistan Press and Publication Ordinance had been repealed and any new legislation adopted in this area would be transmitted to the Office.

The Government representative reiterated his position that neither the Political Parties Act nor the Security of Pakistan Act were within the scope of Convention No. 105 because these Acts concerned offences against the integrity and security of the State, and the offenders were provided a fair hearing before an ordinary court of law with the right of appeal to the superior court. The punishment of rigorous imprisonment, considered to be forced labour, was awarded by the civil courts exercising their judicial discretion and which is appealable. As concerns the Political Parties Act, the Government was obliged to refer any cases concerning the dissolution of an association to the superior court for confirmation. Any law that was considered in violation against the Constitution could be challenged before the superior court.

The Cabinet had already decided to amend sections 54 and 55 of the Industrial Relations Ordinance and the matter would be referred to Parliament for formal approval. As concerns sections 298(B) and (C) of the Penal Code, the Constitution of Pakistan guaranteed freedom of expression and freedom of religious beliefs. This freedom existed as long as the feelings of another religious community were not injured. Anyone, regardless of his religious conviction, will be punished for professing his religion in a way that injures the feelings of another community. This section of the Penal Code was drafted so as to resolve the differences between the Moslem and Ahmadi practices of faith with a view to ensuring peace and tranquility, particularly in public places of worship.

The Workers' members referred once again to the Security of Pakistan Act. The Government representative seemed to be repeating the position asserted on previous occasions that the conviction of offenders by courts of law was not covered by the Convention. The Committee of Experts, however, indicated on numerous occasions that compulsory labour in any form, including prison labour, which resulted from a conviction by a court of law as a penalty for expression of political views, was within the scope of the Convention. The Committee of Experts asked on a number of occasions that information on the practical application of the Security of Pakistan Act, including the number of convictions and copies of court decisions, be provided.

This information on the Security of Pakistan Act, as well as information concerning the repeal of or amendment to, the Industrial Relations Ordinance should be provided to the Committee of Experts.

The Government representative should convey to his Government the views of this Committee concerning the divergences between the Security of Pakistan Act and Article 1(a) of the Convention.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative. The Committee once again expressed its great concern with regard to the points already discussed in the Committee during previous sessions and regretted that no report had been received.

The Committee, however, noted with satisfaction the positive development as concerns the implementation of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105, in particular, the progress made or being made with regard to the legislation. The Committee asked the Government to continue to take, as soon as possible, all necessary measures to bring the law and practice fully into conformity with Conventions Nos. 29 and 105. In particular, the Committee asked the Government to provide the detailed information requested by the Committee of Experts and to send to the Office any new legislation, as well as draft laws, so that the progress made in law and practice could be noted.

The Committee expressed the hope that, at its next Conference, it would be able to note the real progress made in the different areas covered by these two Conventions.

The Government representative of Pakistan said that the present Committee's reiteration of "grave concern" was somewhat "discouraging" in view of the fact that positive developments have been reported on so many points.

Zambia. (ratification: 1965) A Government representative indicated that his Government was aware that ratification of the Convention imposed administrative and legislative obligations; these the Government had voluntarily assumed. The Government was still examining the legislation which was not in line with Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. A number of administrative procedures and consultations must be completed before the relevant legislation (The Prison's Act, Penal Code, The Societies Act and the Preservation of Public Security Regulations) could be amended. The Committee had been informed in writing of this decision. The Government intended to narrow the definition of "essential service" in a proposed industrial relations bill. This bill would also make the Supreme court the final Court of Appeal in industrial relations cases. The Government would advise the ILO when the bill became law. Meanwhile the Government was doing everything in its power to comply with ratified Conventions.

The Workers' members expressed their disappointment at what they had heard. The Government had not indicated any progress since 1987. The Convention had been ratified in 1965, and there had been comments by the Committee of Experts regularly since then. After all this time we were still at square one. This was a pity, and was a negative state of affairs.

The Government needed to be clear that there were legislative provisions and there were realities which were very serious. The Workers' members referred to a number of situations where the law created offences which were punishable by imprisonment with forced labour: political activity outside the recognised political party; provisions relating to public safety; the holding of or speaking at public meetings which had not been approved by the police; labour discipline; strikes and disruption of essential services. It was a matter for regret that the present Committee was faced with an essential Convention such as this which had been ratified by Zambia, but which was not being applied in practice and where the law of the country concerned was not in accordance with the requirements of the Convention. Perhaps the Government needed assistance in order to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

They felt that the present Committee should not wait for another two years before dealing with this matter again. They hoped that it would not be necessary to be more severe after a year's patience. However, it was imperative that the Government should fundamentally change its legislation within that time.

The Employers' members, like the Workers', had doubts about the Government's will or intention to implement the Convention. It had been ratified in 1965 and had been the subject of observations since then. Yet, the present Committee had heard less today than it had in 1987 with respect to what the Government intended to do in order to bring its legislation into compliance with the Convention. This was an important and basic human rights Convention. The legislative proposals outlined by the Government representative were not sufficient for this purpose - indeed this is almost acknowledged in the report of the Committee of Experts. Action was needed in order to get this case moving.

The Worker member of Liberia asked the Government representative when legislation would be enacted which was in conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

The Government representative indicated that he could not give any time frame. All that he could say was that the Government was consulting with the relevant agencies. It would not be honest to say otherwise.

The Workers' members expressed their regret at the lack of progress and dialogue in relation to this matter. The Committee had heard promises two years ago, but still did not know whether anything positive was being done. The Committee should take the matter up again next year and might then adopt a more severe approach. This was not simply a matter of inserting a special paragraph; the Committee could note that in the application of certain Conventions, the Government had continually failed over a period of several years. They hoped this would not be necessary. It was unfortunate in an organisations such as this to have such a statement made. They said this with real hope, with a little patience and at the same time with serious intent.

The Committee took note of the comments made by the Committee of Experts according to which for many years there had been considerable discrepancies between the requirements of the Convention and the law and practice in Zambia. With regard to the explanations given by the Government representative, the Committee was disappointed because they did not give rise to the expectation of any change in the situation in the near future. The Committee expressed the urgent wish that the Government should be prepared to take the necessary steps very soon in order fundamentally to change the situation. The Committee hoped that the Government would fulfil its earlier promises to adjust its law and practice. The Committee wished to examine this question again next year and if necessary to adopt more severe measures.

Convention No. 107: Indigenous and Tribal Populations, 1957

Bangladesh (ratification: 1972) A Government representative complimented the Committee of Experts for the understanding, the objectivity and the sense of neutrality with which it had prepared its report. The Government had consistently co-operated with the Committee of Experts and with the Office. It had met its reporting obligations and provided all possible facilities to the direct contacts mission and to various non-governmental organisations. The report of the Committee of Experts was based on information provided by the Government and upon the observations of the mission which had visited Bangladesh (including the Chittagong Hill Tracts) in April 1988. The speaker then outlined the key demographic features of Bangladesh, and indicated that in order to promote balanced growth and rapid national advancement, the Government had implemented a number of far-reaching reforms to improve the quality of life of the people while, at the same time, maintaining their cultural and social traditions and ethnic identity.

He then went through each of the issues raised by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 34 of its observations.

Regarding paragraph 34(a), he described the special legislative treatment which had been accorded to the Chittagong Hill Tracts from the early part of this century. More recently the National Committee on the Chittagong Hill Tracts had reviewed a special legislation in the light of present day requirements, including the provisions of this Convention. It had recommended the repeal of the legislation; this was done in February 1989. This legislation also provided for the creation of three hill districts called the Rangamati Hill District, Khagrachari Hill District and Bandarban Hill District. Each of these districts would have its own elected council with a built-in-majority of tribal members, and with a tribal chairman. Elections for these councils were due to be held on 25 June 1989. The council would be responsible for civil administration, including the appointment of the police. They would have the power to approve or prohibit the sale of land rights, and to repossess land which had been fraudulently or corruptly obtained. They would be able to raise their own revenue through local taxes to supplement the funds provided by Central Government.

Regarding paragraph 34(b), the National Committee continued to function as a standing body. It makes recommendations to governments from time to time. Such recommendations may then form the basis of new administrative or legislative arrangements.

Regarding paragraph 34(c), section 64 of the act which established the district councils provided that land ownership, including transfer, would be dealt with by the Chairman of the District Council. This implied that tribal leaders now had direct supervision over ownership and transfer of land. The cadastral survey referred to by the Committee of Experts had been suspended at the request of the tribal leaders, but would take place once the Councils had been elected.

Regarding paragraph 34(d), the Government had adopted programmes for settling landless tribes on Government-owned land. A few hundred families had been settled under this programme, but it was hoped that the process would be accelerated once the Councils were established.

Regarding paragraph 34(e), the Councils would be able to decide on the priority and type of projects which would best help to improve the socio-economic conditions of the population of the area.

Regarding paragraph 34(f), joint investigation committees were formed immediately after the occurrence of any breach of law and order involving the tribal and non-tribal populations. These committees were composed of tribal leaders, representatives of non-tribal residents of the area, and a magistrate. They investigated the incidence as a matter of urgency, collected evidence and prepared a report. On the basis of this report, alleged wrongdoers are charged in accordance with the law. This system has been in operation since August 1988.

Regarding paragraph 34(g), the Government was continuing to facilitate the repatriation of tribal people of Bangladeshi origin who were presently resident in other countries. He described visits to India which had taken place in May 1989 in order to facilitate this process. The President had also announced an amnesty for terrorists (which was valid until 25 June 1989) in order to further facilitate this process.

The speaker appreciated the interest which the Committee had taken in this matter, and assured it that the Government would uphold the principles of human dignity and would protect the rights and interests of the indigenous and tribal populations of the country.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom emphasised the importance of the Convention but noted that it was often difficult to deal with issues which arose in relation to it. This was because of the nature of some of the issues involved, the fact that often they related to remote areas, and that the countries concerned were often poor. He felt that in this case, the Committee had at last been presented with evidence of progress after a very long wait. He thanked the Government representative for his very full explanation of recent developments. However, he felt that there were still some very serious problems in relation to the position of tribal people in Bangladesh. In particular, he asked the representative for comments upon reports of an army attack on the village in May 1989 as a result of which thousands of people had left their homes for India.

As regards Article 11 of the Convention, he asked whether the legislation would respect the right to land ownership as embodied in this Article.

He also asked the Government to respond to suggestions that district councils would have the capacity to appoint only junior administrative officers and junior members of the police force – with more senior positions remaining the responsibility of the Central Government.

Finally, he asked for information as to the geographic coverage of the new councils. He had been informed that they totalled only about 10 per cent of the total area concerned.

The Workers' members referred to the fact that the Committee of Experts had noted progress in relation to compliance with the Convention at paragraph 94 of their report. They were pleased at the progress which had been made so far, and felt that this was at least partly due to previous discussions in the present Committee. They hoped that by next year the application of Convention No. 107 would have been strengthened in order better to protect the most vulnerable populations.

They expressed the hope that the conclusion of the Committee of Experts could be verified, and that the Government would provide the relevant information and texts. They still had serious concerns in relation to the application of the laws that were already in place, but they congratulated the Government for what had been done. They looked forward to full conformity with the Convention in the not too distant future.

The Employers' members expressed their appreciation for the full and candid explanation provided by the Government. This was a difficult case, which had been subject to special paragraphs in 1986 and 1987. The Government had now displayed a more positive attitude than in previous years, and new measures had been put in place, or were in the process of being put in place. They recognised that these divisions dealt with only some of the deficiencies which had been previously identified. In particular there was a continuing need to investigate human rights violations, to recognise tribal land rights, to determine the boundaries of tribal land, and to spell out procedures for dealing with disputes between tribals and non-tribals in relation to land matters. Nevertheless, they noted at least five positive changes since the matter had last been examined by the Committee.

Regarding paragraph 34(c), they asked the Government representative to explain what he had meant when he said that this paragraph implied that tribal leaders now had direct supervision over ownership and transfer of land. Finally, they reiterated that whilst there had been some progress, a great deal remained to be done. They urged that the necessary measures be taken as quickly as possible whilst recognising the enormous difficulties with which Bangladesh is presently confronted.

A Government representative explained that he was an official of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and also the Secretary of the National Committee on the Chittagong Hills Tract. He provided a full account of the incident on 4 May to which the Workers' member of the United Kingdom had referred. He explained that in the aftermath of the murder of a prominent non-tribal person there had been a certain amount of violence, which resulted in a number of deaths and injuries, and in burning of houses. This disturbance had been brought under control within about six hours. A joint investigation committee had been established. As a result of its investigations 31 persons had been identified and charged, and were awaiting trial. The Government had made substantial provision for the rebuilding of huts which had been burned down. As regards the allegation that thousands of people had fled, the Government had invited the press to the area to see for themselves. It was true that some people had left their homes and gone to India, but it was also true that some others had returned. The situation was normal, as was evidenced by the meeting with Indian Government officials in May. He also referred to the Presidential Amnesty as further evidence of the Government's good faith in this matter.

As regards land questions, the district council would have full power in relation to questions of ownership, etc. He reiterated that the chairmen of the councils would invariably be tribals, and that two-thirds of the members would also be tribals. As to the cadastral survey, he repeated that it had been postponed at the request of the tribals and that the Government would be happy to report back on the results of the survey after the election.

As regards problems associated with traditional forms of agriculture, he indicated that this raised exceedingly complex issues – particularly in relation to the ownership of land which had been subject to "slash and burn" cultivation. It also raised some difficult ecological issues.

The district councils would have power in relation to all these issues except defence, foreign affairs, central planning and national highways. The councils would also be able to decide whether non-tribals should be permitted to settle in tribal areas.

In relation to the levels of officials who would be controlled by the district councils, he explained that tribal members would be elected by both tribals and non-tribals, and that the same was true for non-tribal members. This should ensure that the composition of councils would adequately protect the interests of tribals. The chairman of the council would have the status of a Deputy Minister, and would have the responsibility for executing the decisions of the council. The police superintendent would also be responsible for executing the decisions of the council. Police officers up to the level of Assistant Superintendent would be recruited from within the district, but more senior officers would be appointed through the national system.

The Government would continue to co-operate with the ILO in the implementation of this Convention, but asks for understanding for the severe constraints under which it operates.

The Committee noted with interest the Report of the Committee of Experts and the detailed explanations provided by the representatives of the Government of Bangladesh. The Committee recalled the various discussions which it has had in the past on these problems which had given rise to two direct contacts missions. The Committee welcomed the fact that the most recent direct contacts mission had intensive discussions with the officials concerned. It took note of the measures that have been adopted on the basis of the new laws of February 1989 including: the setting up of local councils, improved protection with regard to human rights of tribal populations, and a general improvement of the situation in the tribal area. The Committee, however, observed with the Committee of Experts that further steps must be taken such as the effective examination of violations of human rights, the recognition of property of tribal populations and the delineation of tribal lands and the settlement of conflicts and disputes between tribal and non-tribal peoples. The Committee welcomed the fact that the Government of Bangladesh was prepared to co-operate further with the ILO. It hoped that the Government would continue to take all necessary measures to ensure full application of the Convention and that in its next report the Government would be able to answer all of the other questions posed by the Committee of Experts and by the Committee.

Brazil (ratification: 1965). The Government has communicated the following information:

With regard to the comments made by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 3 of its observation, 43 million hectares of indigenous surface land have already been delimited, which corresponds to 50 per cent of the goal set out in article 67 of the temporary provisions of the new Constitution. As the Committee of Experts was earlier informed, the above-mentioned constitutional rule provides that, within a period of five years (being 5 October 1993), all indigenous land in the country must be delimited. In this regard, the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI) has already studied plans for this delimitation task; a survey which will be submitted to the National Congress for consideration and analysis in the near future. Finally, it is important to recall that, in 1985, the total amount of indigenous limited land reached a total surface area of 12 million hectares which demonstrates the enormous effort undertaken by the Government on this point in the last four years. With regard to the information requested in paragraph 3 of its observation concerning the confrontations between Indians and non-Indians, it is important to recall that article 231, paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Constitution expressly prohibit the entry into and exercise of certain activities in indigenous areas by non-Indian groups. If any non-Indian groups attempt to enter indigenous areas they must obtain a declaration of agreement on the part of the indigenous community and the approval of the National Congress. The Government is aware that these conflicts exist in practice in particular the fact of the invasion by the garimpeiros (prospectors). The Government, however, has the political desire to repress such invasions. Recently, the FUNAI, with the support of the police forces, has taken measures to expel the garimpeiros from the indigenous area of Avá-Canoeiro, in the state of Goiás. The FUNAI has also, with the support of the federal police, expelled the recidivist garimpeiros in the Pico da Neblina area, in the Amazon state. This operation led to the use of the air force.

At the end of paragraph 3, above-mentioned, the Committee of Experts observes that the confrontations between Indian groups and non-Indians could be provoked by non-Indian people who had entered the indigenous lands with official authorisation. This type of confrontation had existed principally in activities taking place in the forest which resulted in contracts made between the indigenous communities themselves and the enterprises, with the endorsement of the FUNAI. Such situations can no longer occur because of the provisions of article 231, paragraph 6, of the Constitution which declares these contracts null and void and instructs the Government to take measures which will result in the expulsion of these intruders from their land.

With regard to the Committee of Experts' observation on the Yanomami Indians, the FUNAI regularly ensures medical and social assistance to the Yanomami and has set up the Emergency Plan for the health of the Yanomami in order to examine 3,100 indigenous spread out among 65 villages. As at February 1989, 800 medical examinations, 350 orthodontic exams and 3,534 vaccinations have been given. The vaccinations include SABIN, BCG and tetanus. The Minister of Health, in co-operation with the FUNAI and with the support of the Brazilian army and marines, as well as religious missionaries, also brings medical assistance to the indigenous populations in the Amazon and Roraima states.

The FUNAI has undertaken administrative demarcations of the following areas of traditional and permanent occupation by the indigenous Yanomami and Maingong group. These demarcations were confirmed in law by presidential decrees Nos. 97,512 to 97,530, dated 16 February 1989:

- (a) indigenous area Uauaris, in the Boa Vista department, in the state of Roraima, a surface of 116,211.6 hectares;
- (b) indigenous area Uaiacas, in the Alto Alegre department, in the state of Roraima, a surface of 25,211.92 hectares;
- (c) indigenous area Surucucu, in the Alto Alegre department and the Mucajaí departments, in the state of Roraima, a surface of 838,586.56 hectares;
- (d) indigenous area Cutaiba, in the Alto Alegre department, in the Roraima state, a surface of 92,320.80 hectares;
- (e) indigenous area Palimiu-There, in the Alto Alegre and Boa Vista departments, in the Roraima State, a surface of 46,438.81 hectares;
- (f) indigenous area Ericó, in the Boa Vista department, in the Roraima state, a surface of 30,389.27 hectares;
- (g) indigenous area Acapural, in the Boa Vista department, in the Roraima state, a surface of 12,606.11 hectares;
- (h) indigenous area Mucajaí in the Alto Alegre and Mucajaí departments, in the Roraima state, a surface of 182,648.22 hectares;
- (i) indigenous area Jundiá, in the Mucajaí department, in the Roraima state, a surface of 137,277.28 hectares;
- (j) indigenous area Catrimani, in the Mucajaí and Caracará departments, in the Roraima state, a surface of 51,751.71 hectares;
- (k) indigenous area Demini, in the Barcelos department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 36,941.88 hectares;
- (l) indigenous area Toototobi, in the Barcelos department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 242,005.39 hectares;

- (m) indigenous area Gurupira, in the Barcelos department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 20.637.25 hectares;
- (n) indigenous area Ajuricaba, in the Barcelos department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 20.283.22 hectares;
- (o) indigenous area Marari, in the Santa Isabel do Rio Negro department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 53.791.59 hectares;
- (p) indigenous area Marauá, in the Santa Isabel do Rio Negro department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 156.122.01 hectares;
- (q) indigenous area Maturacá, in the Santa Isabel do Rio Negro department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 119.916.88 hectares;
- (r) indigenous area Cauaburi, in the Santa Isabel do Rio Negro department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 10.391.26 hectares;
- (s) indigenous area Apuí, in the Santa Isabel do Rio Negro department, in the Amazon state, a surface of 33.313.45 hectares.

A total of 2.226.844.3 hectares for about 9,000 indigenous is assured by these decrees to the Yanomami population. The effect of demarcation of these indigenous lands as provided for in the above-mentioned presidential decree has been well managed and the work finished at the beginning of February 1989.

As regards the rights of the Yanomami in these zones, Chapter VIII – "The Indians" – of the Brazilian Constitution devoted to the indigenous provides in article 231 that:

"Paragraph 2. The land traditionally occupied by the Indians is destined to their permanent possession leaving them a life of interest in the riches of the soil, the rivers and the lakes which already exist."

"Paragraph 3. The profit from hydraulic resources, including energy potentials, the exploration and exploitation of mineral resources on indigenous land can be carried out with authorisation from the National Congress, the affected communities having been heard, and ensuring them participation in the benefits of the exploitation under the terms of the law."

"Paragraph 4. Lands traditionally occupied by the Indians are inalienable and the rights upon these lands are indefeasible."

Besides the fact that the Yanomami have available to them the above-mentioned constitutional guarantees and other guarantees on their lands – they can also initiate legal proceedings for the defence of their rights (Article 232 of the Constitution) – the 19 indigenous Yanomami areas are protected by the Roraima and Amazon National Forest, a surface estimated at 2.664.685 and 1.573.100 hectares respectively.

Presidential Decrees Nos. 97.545 and 97.546 of 1 March 1989, which created the Roraima and the Amazon National Forests respectively, assigned to them as social goals to set up a supplementary space in order to dampen the shock resulting from cultural differences existing in the region. Due to these Decrees, the Yanomami are assured preferential use of the two national forests in which entrance, passage or residence of third parties, or exercise of any activity, without previous authorisation from the FUNAI and the Brazilian Institute of the Environment and Renewable Natural Resources, are prohibited.

In adding up the above-mentioned forest surfaces and the Pico da Neblina National Park (6,109,785 hectares) to the indigenous area (2,226,844 hectares), it can be noted that the Yanomami population has available to it the preferential or exclusive use of a territory of 8,336,629 hectares.

The FUNAI is aware of the problems concerning the invasion of lands traditionally occupied by the Yanomami and wishes to continue to protect the indigenous population and to expel invaders found in these areas. As soon as the invasion by the garimpeiros of the Pico da Neblina zone occurred at the end of November 1988, on the border of Brazil and Venezuela, the FUNAI, in co-operation with the Brazilian Institute for Forest Development (BIFD), took actions for the recovery of this property before the Federal Justice of the Judicial Sections of the Amazonas in order to obtain preliminary measures to ensure the retreat of the invaders of the National Pico da Neblina Park and the indigenous Maturacá area. Judicial measures concerning the indigenous areas of Paapiu, Catrimini and Demini have been proposed and are still awaiting the decisions from the competent judicial authorities. The federal police, at the request of the FUNAI, began an operation of expulsion in the area situated on the border of the Catrimini river on 7 January 1989.

The penetration of the indigenous zone by certain people, whether nationals or foreigners, or non-civil servants of the FUNAI depends upon the previous authorisation of the presidency of the FUNAI and is regulated by the FUNAI Decrees PP.745/88 and PP.1032/88 of, respectively, 6 July and 23 August 1988. There exists, as a result, restrictions on entry into these zones and a legal basis for expulsion of intruders.

Based upon the information received on site by the technical teams organised by the FUNAI to verify the level of contracts between the Yanomami and the national society, it can be observed that there is practically no contact in the villages around the Toototobi, even those which were close to the missions which were made the object of investigations.

The indigenous are structured in nuclear families, with a division of labour between the sexes. They live on hunting, fishing, gathering, subsistence agriculture and also, in some cases, collecting of rubber gum. The craftsmen which are commercialised by the Toototobi mission and by the FUNAI should also be mentioned.

Formal education is, for the most part, undertaken by the missionaries but the FUNAI recognises the necessity of rapidly setting up bilingual education.

In the 120 villages registered by the technical teams of the FUNAI, in consultation with the indigenous population, it has been noted that many Yanomami groups aspire towards better production conditions. The FUNAI wants to respond to the requests of these groups in this direction.

Finally, it is important to mention the positive effects upon the Yanomami population of the programme "Our nature" which is currently in its final phase. The programme provides for the revision of legislation concerning the exploitation of mines and the use of chemical substances as well as modification of the criteria for tax benefits, official credits and public investments in the Amazon. The programme also provides for the creation of new forest reserves; the definition of special policies to control and repress activities of predators in the areas, including the reinforcement of the local FUNAI structures; and an education programme on the environment at the national level. Furthermore, this programme proposes complementary measures on the economic occupation of the central west region in order to deflect the migration currents which converge presently near the Amazon, as well as the improvement of judicial machinery and police machinery in these areas.

With regard to the point made in the observation by the Committee of Experts concerning indigenous populations in the frontier areas (paragraph 11), the Government states that the Brazil-Colombian Tabatinga-Apaporis project (the only one which has been established with a neighbouring country) has already begun to be implemented in order to respond to the basic needs of the Tukuna populations of Alto Solimões. Other projects are currently being discussed with other countries.

With regard to paragraphs 12, 13 and 14 of the Committee of Experts' observation, the Government indicates that no authorisation has yet been granted by the National Congress in relation to the provisions of article 231, paragraph 3 of the Constitution. This is due to the fact that the regulations of this provision are presently being examined by the Congress. It is also necessary to point out to this effect that, by virtue of this constitutional provision, Decree No. 88.985/83 is suspended. As regards this point, the Government confirms the information contained in the observation according to which a great number of requests for prospecting and exploiting of indigenous land have been received by the National Department for the Production of Minerals (NDPM). The Government states, however, that a large number of these requests have been authorised. There are only 16 authorisations for the exercise of activities concerning extraction of minerals from indigenous lands and, in conformity with article 231, paragraph 3 of the Constitution, these authorisations are suspended.

Finally, with regard to paragraph 15 of the Committee of Experts' observations, the Government states that there are no concrete measures in force to apply the provisions of article 231, paragraph 6 of the Constitution. This matter is being considered in the National Congress, and is being attentively followed by the FUNAI, which has presented a number of suggestions and proposals on this point.

In addition, the Government representative referred to the detailed information which had been supplied by her Government in reply to the observations of the Committee of Experts.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom recalled the discussion of this case in 1988, when the present Committee had held out a faint hope that the situation might have improved marginally. In fact it had gotten worse, with violence and crime committed against the Yanomamis having reached an unprecedented level of brutality, surpassing even their decimation during the period of construction of the Northern Perimeter Highway in 1975. Now the problem was the gold miners, who by the end of 1988 were entering into Yanomami lands at the rate of over 100 miners per day. Airstrips had been built everywhere, and there were now between 30,000 to 40,000 gold seekers in the area. Nothing stated by the Government had given any indication that the situation would improve. Although the present Committee had been told both this year and last that some effort was being made to remove the prospectors, the speaker doubted that any attempts at all were being made. There was indeed some confirmation that both local FUNAI officials and the police themselves were joining in the madness of the gold rush. The speaker referred to a delegation from a group ("Action on Citizenship") formed by members of Congress and representatives of civil institutions in Brazil which had visited the area in June 1989. The delegation had been appalled, finding the Yanomami region completely overrun by gold prospectors. The Government had referred to attempts to allocate land to the Yanomamis, but the land was in 19 separate small areas within the Yanomami region. If the Government could not protect a whole area, he wondered how could it protect these separate areas from the gold miners' incursion. The problem was not one of legislation. The Committee of Experts had noted with interest the adoption of the new Constitution. Despite the existence of legal instruments, nothing was happening. It was not health plans or arts and crafts arrangements that were needed; it was the expulsion of the gold miners who were robbing and killing, despoiling and polluting. The root cause needed to be addressed. He hoped the Government would be able to report on steps taken to end what amounted almost to genocide. If the Government continued to do nothing, it would end up committing a crime which would subject it to reproach and disgust from the entire world.

The Workers member of Brazil, referring to the situation of the Yanomami, said that they were a particularly fragile population which should be protected before they disappeared. He said that the repeated promises of the Government that the lands of the Yanomami would be adequately defined had not been kept, even though the National Indian Foundation (FUNAI) had admitted the need to protect this group of people from the invasion of their territory. In 1987, as a direct result of the passivity of the authorities, a massive invasion of Yanomami lands began on the part of individual miners (garimpeiros) in the face of indifference by the federal government and the territory of Roraima. It was now estimated that there were around 45,000 individual miners in Yanomami territory; they gained access to indigenous territory by landing strips built for the Calha Norte project. The speaker noted that in April 1987, army officers promised the Yanomami that the Calha Norte project would guarantee the inviolability of Indian territory, would preserve the natural resources and provide medicines and medical assistance to the indigenous population. The reality today was quite different. The ranks of the Yanomami were being depleted by direct conflicts with the individual miners and by the diseases they carried. Doctors who had cared for the indigenous populations and who had linguistic and anthropological training were expelled from the area; only the army, FUNAI officials and individual miners were allowed access to the Yanomami territory; because of this, it was impossible to obtain precise information on the number of dead and sick.

The speaker referred to the Government's report, which had indicated the efforts made to expel the individual miners from the region of Pico da Neblina in the State of Amazonia; this had been a small-scale operation affecting a small number of individual miners, whereas the majority of them were in the centre of Yanomami territory, where no evacuations had taken place. There had been testimony that FUNAI officials and members of the military police in the territory of Roraima were involved in mining activities.

The Worker member of Brazil indicated that the individual miners could be expelled simply by controlling the supply of fuel for airplanes transporting them and by closing the landing strips located on indigenous lands. Although the Government repeated its promises to have the individual miners withdraw, the Minister of the Army had stated that such an operation was almost impossible.

The speaker referred to the statement made in 1988 by the Government representative to the present Committee saying that the integrity of Yanomami territory would be respected, in accordance with Brazilian legislation and Article 11 of the Convention. Yet in its report for this year the Government had revealed that the Yanomami territory had been divided into 19 separate areas, comprising less than one-third of the previously defined area. This fragmentation of Yanomami land was contrary to the provisions of Article 11 of the Convention and of paragraphs 2 and 4 of article 231 of the Brazilian Constitution. This division of the Yanomami land made border patrol extremely difficult and created an incentive for new invasions by individual miners. This Government decision had been denounced by various international organisations as an act of genocide. There was clear proof that this policy was highly prejudicial to indigenous territorial rights. The same thing as had happened to the Yanomami, from whom the Government had taken away 70 per cent of their land had also occurred in the region of Alto Rio Negro in the State of Amazonia and in the State of Acre, where the Government had marked off small areas called "indigenous colonies", and reduced the area of traditional territory for the indigenous. All of these cases affected indigenous lands located in border areas.

The Employers' members, recalling the discussion of this case in June 1988, stated that the principle change since that time had been the adoption of the new Constitution in October 1988. The Government had now provided a considerable amount of information orally and in writing, but the volume of the material made it difficult to digest and examine. The key question was whether or not these new constitutional and statutory provisions effectively implemented the Convention. Although it was not up to the present Committee to engage in a detailed examination, the issue in relation to the 15 points raised in the Committee of Experts' report was whether or not there was effective protection of indigenous peoples. The Employers' members hoped for swift implementation of the constitutional provisions, if they indeed constituted progress in this area, so as to achieve compliance with the requirements of the Convention.

The Workers' members stated that, regarding the question of indigenous and tribal populations in Brazil, the eyes of the world were turned on the ILO. They expressed their fear that the fixing of boundaries on lands in Brazil was in fact an operation aimed at reducing the area available and at ending up with a type of camp. Moreover, the colonists and prospectors were left to do as they pleased; torturing and killing continued – these were the facts. Not only was the protection of indigenous populations insufficient; this was allowed to go on, it was tolerated, and there had even been unauthorised actions on the part of the authorities. The situation was very serious and the uncontrolled exploitation of riches was continuing unshackled.

The Workers' members therefore had the impression that bodies such as FUNAI were not adequate for resolving the problems. They also called attention to the danger of continuing merely to discuss this case each year; this was all the more so when between two sessions serious new facts which could not be tolerated for long had emerged, facts which would be referred to the present Committee.

Another Government representative indicated that Brazil today found itself in the vanguard, with the new Federal Constitution devoting an entire chapter to indigenous populations. Without wishing to engage in a confrontation with the Worker member from his country, he wished to place the question in the context of measures taken by Brazil in relation to the situation of the indigenous. He stated that in the brief period of three or four years, Brazil had increased the area of indigenous land with fixed boundaries from 12 million to 43 million hectares. This meant an increase of 250 areas out of the overall goal of 500 areas. Contrary to what had been said about the matter involving the Yanomamis, the provisions of the legislations had been scrupulously respected, and the marking of boundaries had been carried out. It should be borne in mind that the marking of boundaries in the Yanomami area had been done pursuant to the legislation and article 231, paragraphs 1 and 2 of the Federal Constitution.

As regards incidents of occupation of Yanomami areas by individual miners, it had to be said that this phenomenon was occurring in many non-indigenous regions as well, and not only in the Yanomami territory. In respect to Yanomamis, special efforts had been made, such as the evacuation of the occupiers in Pico da Neblina and more recently in Ava Canoeiro in the State of Goias. Thus the Government had a firm resolve to withdraw the independent miners from Yanomami areas. The Government had submitted information to the Office which specifically explained its plan of operations in this connection.

In relation to any possible participation of FUNAI officials and the military gold-prospecting in indigenous areas, the speaker stated that they were individual and isolated cases that are in no way supported by the Government.

Turning to the exclusivity of FUNAI activities in indigenous zones and the allegations of expulsion of missionaries from Yanomami lands, the speaker indicated that the legislation required permission from FUNAI to enter indigenous areas; this measure formed one of the proposals for modifying this Convention with the aim of avoiding invasion of indigenous lands. The speaker also indicated that the execution of the Calha Norte project was intended to strengthen the presence of the national authorities in this area and to bolster action by FUNAI. Thus the military authorities were in no way acting contrary to the interests of the indigenous population, but rather were supporting them. The Brazilian Armed Forces had historically had a supportive attitude towards indigenous peoples.

The speaker hoped that this information would clarify the most important points. His Government remained open to giving full implementation to the provisions of the Convention by providing increasing support to the indigenous populations.

The Government representative who had spoken first added that the Government had taken note of the points expressed during this discussion and of the attitude of openness regarding consultations. She also requested that the Regional Adviser on Standards, when he visited Brazil, be accompanied by an expert from the Organisation who could assist in achieving better implementation of the Convention and in carrying out consultations.

The Worker member of Brazil wished to clarify that the progress achieved in the Constitution was due in large measure to the efforts expended by indigenous organisations, since there had been considerable opposition on the part of some authorities during the discussion of the draft Constitution. He also stated that the Yanomami population was a sensitive, semi-nomadic one; the fragmentation of their territory would not permit them to maintain their traditional way of life, which depended upon contact between populations for purposes of marriages, exchanges of food, etc. Now the Yanomami were being faced with a situation which would not allow their survival in the medium or long term.

The Committee took note of the Committee of Experts' report and the written and oral explanations provided by the Government representative. It welcomed notable improvements in the legal situation with the adoption of the new Constitution. However, the Committee expressed its continuing concern over the remaining problems, particularly in relation to the Amazon area, the establishment of the Yanomami Park and the provision of medical care for indigenous peoples. The Committee also stated its concern over the slow progress made in marking the boundaries of territories reserved for the indigenous populations. It regretted the fact that prospectors were still able to invade the reserved areas. In view of these problems, the Committee urged the Government to take swifter and more effective measures in order to bring its law and practice into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee stated that it would welcome a request by the Government for ILO assistance for this purpose.

The Workers' members insisted on adding their hope that the Committee would be in a position next year to note effective and constructive changes in regard to genuine protection for the indigenous populations and stiff penalties imposed upon prospectors and colonists. If this were not the case, the Government would have to face other measures by this Committee.

Convention No. 111: Discrimination (Employment and Occupation), 1958

German Democratic Republic (ratification: 1975). A Government member reaffirmed his Government's adherence to both the letter and the spirit of the Convention. It considered strict adherence to this Convention to be of the utmost importance, and had always done so. This was evidenced by the fact that his country had ratified this Convention at about the same time it had joined the ILO. Article 20 of the country's Constitution clearly reflected the requirements of the Convention by providing that all citizens enjoyed the same rights and obligations, irrespective of nationality, race, religious or other conviction or social origin.

The entire legal structure of the country, including the Labour Code, was based upon the Constitution. The Labour Code was a fully binding set of provisions, which had not been questioned by the Committee of Experts in relation to application of this Convention.

Every able-bodied citizen had the right to be employed, to exercise a vocation and to receive training. It was very important, in view of the geographical, economic and demographic position of the country that it make the best possible use of its workforce. This was necessary in order to promote economic growth and to finance its social programmes. These social programmes included the promotion of full employment for men and women, and also promoting employment for handicapped citizens and senior citizens.

The comments of the Committee of Experts were directed to the terminology of the legislation rather than to discrimination in practice. Legislative statements relating to political awareness, consciousness and qualifications were intended to emphasise the professional and social obligations of the individual – they did not mean that supporters of one political opinion would be given preference over others in relation to access to training or the exercise of certain vocations. This was certainly not done in the pharmaceutical industry and the teaching profession. As regards universities and specialised schools, admission depends neither upon political or religious belief. There were many non-Party members in the universities. Applicants for higher and specialised studies were rejected on a number of grounds – for example, insufficient performance, not meeting the appropriate requirements in a particular field, full quotas and not being suitable for the profession in question.

In 1988, all of the relevant state bodies had examined the report of the Committee of Experts and other material from the ILO. This examination had included consideration of the main reasons for the Experts' comments. All of the bodies concerned stressed that discrimination was not permitted within their area of responsibility. There was unanimous recognition that some of the legislation contained terminology which was ambiguous, and which could give rise to differing interpretations. Clearly, this was what had given rise to the reservation expressed by two Experts in their most recent report.

Regarding the legal provisions mentioned by the Committee of Experts, there was a difference between the Government's position and that of the majority of the members of the Committee of Experts as to the meaning of the terminology used. This was not regarded as a minor matter, which could simply be brushed aside. The primary cause of this misunderstanding was the use of generalised terms in the legislation. This problem was not insuperable. The Government contemplated elimination of these misunderstandings on the basis of the continued dialogue with the ILO and the Committee of Experts.

In the field of vocational training, the directive of 8 February 1973 on special studies for leading functions in vocational training, mentioned in the Committee of Experts' report, had since been replaced by the directive of 18 August 1988 on postgraduate studies of the "Theory of directing vocational training", which avoided the use of terminology which had given rise to misunderstanding by the Committee of Experts. The speaker reiterated the Government's willingness to engage in dialogue with the ILO, and to report the results of such dialogue and any further developments, in due course.

The Workers' members welcomed the fact that there was a willingness to engage dialogue, and to search for solutions. There had been difficult discussions at certain times concerning the application of this Convention. Things had evolved since then. They understood that in some countries with certain political systems the need was felt to control the filling of certain jobs. They were not saying that they totally accepted this, but they did understand. But it was going too far to generalise such control on the basis of a political conviction.

It was detrimental even to the economic life of a country for managers, engineers, foremen, etc. to be judged, promoted and given opportunities according to their political outlook. That was contrary to the Convention, and very unfortunate for the country.

Problems had been found to exist and, as the Government representative said, there could still be misunderstandings. They would arise because there were still provisions in place which suggested that in order to obtain certain posts it was necessary to have a certain political outlook. Because the legislation was there, it was legitimate to assume that that was the situation which existed. That was what had been called a misunderstanding. To eliminate such misunderstandings, certain terms in the legislation must be removed.

They were still concerned at the fact that an organisation responsible for the application of the objectives of a political party played an important role in the evaluation of some of the criteria in the areas of education and training, as well as employment. This was a practice incompatible with the Convention.

They always recognised the value of dialogue in relation to such matters, even in the absence of information on concrete action taken or envisaged to give effect to the Convention. They hoped that it would be possible, also to avoid misunderstandings, to eliminate the use of unfortunate terms and language, and to do something also about actual application in education and employment. They hoped that with the next report, improvement would be noticeable with a view to the full application of the Convention.

The Employers' members recalled that in this case the present Committee was concerned with discrimination on political grounds in education, training and employment. The problems were not new in relation to the country although they had not yet been discussed often. The last discussion in the present Committee has resembled a dialogue of the deaf. While this had changed, the substance had not, since the laws at issue dated back to the early 1970s. They had, however, been detected rather late, and this might be related with the way in which the Government had fulfilled its obligation to report.

The provisions in question had a very broad field of application, covering numerous professions and activities. Thus, the words used in the legislation had not been included by accident. Rather, they were part of a systematic approach to questions which appeared of great importance to society. The coverage of the legislation ranged from access to higher education establishments to relatively modest activities such as instructing learner drivers. The legislation also applied to numerous employees of state bodies and institutions.

Similarly, the discrimination in question manifested itself in different ways. It was not dependent on, or limited to, a single criterion, but often based on a number of different requirements and positive political attitudes that had to be met. By way of illustration, reference was made to a provision which required "unconditional faithfulness to the working class and its Party and to Marxism-Leninism, uncompromising fight against all manifestations of bourgeois ideology, and partisanship". Under another provision, even the contribution of parents to building socialism could be decisive for the access of children and young persons to education and employment. This was a very serious matter. Thus, there was a dense network of provisions through which nobody could slip unless he was meant to. They noted that the Government representative, while passing over these objectionable provisions, had referred above all to the normal selection criteria that were relevant to vocation, education, etc., such as aptitudes or preparation for certain activities. But that was not the point at issue.

The Employers' members disagreed with the Government representative's view that the terms used in legislative provisions were not quite clear. The terms of the legislation were unequivocal and could lead to discrimination. The Government representative had said that some of the terms which had been criticised could be eliminated, and indeed that some had already been removed. This sounded very positive, but it remained to be seen whether the necessary amendments were envisaged in all fields mentioned by the Committee of Experts and whether they would actually be made, and when. Furthermore, it was even more important to look at what actually happened in practice, at what happened in the past and at what was to happen in the future. They could not imagine that in a German State certain provisions would not be strictly applied, and that they would not shape the reality, if their content required a specific political outlook. For all of these reasons they were, like the Committee of Experts, concerned about the application of the Convention in the German Democratic Republic. It would be most welcome if the Government representative would go beyond the very cautious hints made so far and announce more substantial steps towards the elimination of provisions which discriminate on political grounds and in particular, that such provisions would no longer shape actual practice.

The Government representative first reiterated that the provisions in question did not constitute discrimination, but that they were rather designed to give effect to the country's Constitution. He also rejected assumptions that the Government had not submitted its reports on this Convention. He could not say whether they had always been submitted altogether on time, but they had certainly been submitted.

He had to be very cautious about the changes which might take place in the future. However, the right path would be to define more precisely what was sought, namely, employment according to qualifications and access to studies according to ability, in the sense he had outlined here, so that those concerned would probably be able to make better use of these provisions. It was already clear that the legislation would be further amended to this end, and he had been given some clear and positive signals in two instances, but he was unable to be more specific at this stage. It was, however, also necessary to examine in greater depth the real situation; the Government was prepared to supply further details, and it was also very interested in improving, more generally, co-operation with the ILO so as to facilitate conceptual clarification of practical problems through the exchange of information.

Finally, he pointed out that the Employers' members had been quoting from a resolution of the Party rather than from legislation. There were significant differences between such resolutions and the law.

The Employers' members indicated that they had not expressed an assumption that the Government had not punctually submitted reports. Rather, they were concerned about the content of those reports since provisions concerning access to training and to employment were relevant to the Convention and should perhaps have been mentioned and included in the reports. Regarding the quotation from a Party resolution, legislative provisions exist which call for strict implementation of such resolutions; in that these were surely followed by a large number of people, it was not difficult to link them to actual practice.

The Committee took due note of the information and detailed explanations supplied by the Government representative, and of the discussion which had taken place. The Committee noted that the conclusions of the Committee of Experts showed that there was no indication of any action taken or envisaged to introduce in certain statutory, administrative and other provisions in operation in the field of employment, occupation and training, the amendments necessary to permit the implementation of a policy which would be in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee took due note of the preparedness of the Government to engage in dialogue and to pursue its contacts; the Committee hoped that the Government would re-examine, in this spirit, these questions in the light of the comments of the Committee of Experts with a view to taking appropriate measures to ensure the conformity of legislation and administrative practice with the requirements of the Convention.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to indicate, in the near future, that measures had been taken which would enable it to note substantial progress.

The Government representative indicated that he agreed with the conclusions, apart from the assertion that the practice in the German Democratic Republic did not comply with the Convention. Consequently, he entered a reservation on this point.

The Worker member of the German Democratic Republic shared the view of the Government representative and associated himself with the reservation expressed.

Federal Republic of Germany (ratification: 1961). A Government representative stated that at the last International Labour Conference, the Government had expressed the hope that an in-depth dialogue would take place on this case before the present Committee. This Committee had indicated that it was necessary to seek solutions with all the parties concerned. In fact, the Commission of Inquiry of the ILO had indicated in the last chapter of its report that "extensive consultations with various authorities and other interested parties will be required to determine the measures to be taken and that the time within which the necessary decisions can be taken will also depend on the nature of those measures." Following on these requests from the supervisory bodies and notably on the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the Government had made contact with the Länder, with the social partners and with the International Labour Office. Consultations with the leading associations of employers, of public servants, of employees and of workers had taken place at the expert level in October 1988 and were continued at a higher level in May 1989. The Länder were informed by the Government at the beginning of November 1988 and in May 1989 about the situation and about the tenor of discussions with the bodies of the ILO; in particular about the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. There had also been a discussion with the International Labour Standards Branch of the ILO at the end of 1988. All these consultations, deliberations and discussions showed that the Commission of Inquiry appeared to have judged the situation correctly when it stated in its report that consultations would be wide-ranging and that a fixed time-table was not possible for the action to be undertaken by the Government in this matter.

The efforts made by the Government to clarify the matter, notably the intensive study of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, had highlighted a number of questions relating to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. As the Commission of Inquiry had itself noted, the question was extremely complex and did not lend itself to easy solution. Evidence of the complexity of the matter also appeared in the actual report of the Commission of Inquiry, since the latter was not unanimously adopted, but only by a majority of 2 to 1, which was a first in the annals of the ILO. The member of the Commission of Inquiry who opposed the majority vote had done so on a central point, not on a secondary point, a fact which had remained significant since the report of the Committee of Experts based itself expressly upon the report of the Commission of Inquiry and required the implementation of the recommendations of the latter.

The Government had shared, and continued to share, the minority opinion and considered that in a supervisory process based upon dialogue all views had to be given their due value and should be taken into consideration; in fact, this had been shown in the present case.

In its recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry had stated that "[The principle of proportionality] implies ... that public servants should be subject to no greater limitations in the enjoyment of rights and freedoms accorded to citizens in general than can be shown to be necessary to ensure the functioning of the institutions of the State and of public services." The Government considered that a series of questions and observations followed from this affirmation: the principle of proportionality was part of the rule of law and had a constitutional rank in his country; in a general way, the public servant enjoyed the same rights and freedoms as other citizens, the difference being that it was his duty to support actively fundamental human rights as well as the structures which guarantee them, for example, the multi-party system, the independence of the courts and free elections.

This duty was based directly on the Constitution and was part of the concept of militant, self-defending, democracy, the principles of which are upheld by the whole population, including the social partners. Although the elevated rank accorded to such a duty in relation to basic rights and to human rights was perhaps not considered necessary in other countries, in view of historical events in his country it had been indeed appropriate to lay down in the Constitution the duty of public servants actively to uphold at all times the free democratic basic order. Consequently, the unavoidable question arose of the attitude the State should adopt towards a public servant who, instead of protecting human rights and freedoms, was actively pursuing their elimination. In such a case, was there a conflict with the right to freedom of political expression? The higher courts as well as the Federal Constitutional Court had denied that this was the case and, for its part, the European Court of Human Rights had indicated that the duty of the public servant to protect human rights and freedoms did not restrict his or her own right to freedom of expression. In that instance, the Court had ruled not only on a question of competence but also on the substance itself.

The Commission of Inquiry had stated that the actual attitude and the functions of each public servant had to be taken into consideration.

As to the first point, the implicit assumption that in the Federal Republic there might be judgements not taking the individual case into account questioned the foundation of the rule of law (Rechtsstaatlichkeit) in force. The requirement of individual examination of cases was an important element in the rule of law which also had a constitutional rank and the decision of a court which had not taken the individual case into account would not be confirmed by higher courts and, in particular, by the Federal Constitutional Court. As regards the whole set of problems in this context, the Government requested the Committee of Experts to examine them once again in detail.

As to the differentiation in functions, the Federal Constitutional Court had stated in 1975 that the duty of the public servant to be faithful to the free democratic basic order applied to all public servants, regardless of function. This decision was binding upon the Government, which could not therefore differentiate according to function on this question of faithfulness, and which would come into conflict with the highest court should it decide to submit a Bill along these lines to Parliament. The opinion of the Commission of Inquiry, according to which the duty of faithfulness could be regulated by a federal law was therefore unjustified. On this essential point, further in-depth dialogue should also take place with all interested parties.

The Commission of Inquiry had stressed that practice in the various Länder varied as far as the verification of faithfulness was concerned: for this reason, it had mentioned the procedure adopted in certain Länder in which in its opinion the faithfulness of applicants to the public service was assumed and activities within legal political parties were not considered incompatible with faithfulness to the Constitution. The Commission of Inquiry seemed to consider this procedure was a possible way of bringing practice into conformity with the Convention. In this respect, it should be noted that the practice of systematic verification of faithfulness had been abandoned in certain Länder and had no longer been applied at the federal level, including in the postal and railway services since 1979, and that the Land of Schleswig-Holstein had recently abandoned this practice. Nevertheless, the Federal Constitutional Court had noted that systematic verification was an adequate way of establishing an applicant's faithfulness to the Constitution and this practice was therefore still in use in certain Länder. The supervisory bodies seemed to assume that the federal Government should take measures to eliminate the practice of systematic verification in these Länder as well; however, owing to the federal structure, the Government did not have jurisdiction over this subject. It was for this reason that, in 1972, the Government and the Länder had adopted a joint declaration and not a federal Act.

In its recommendations, the Commission of Inquiry had also indicated that activities in favour of legal political parties should not be considered as being incompatible with faithfulness to the Constitution. The higher courts, including the Federal Constitutional Court, have consistently considered that an official breached the duty of faithfulness if he or she engaged in activities on behalf of a political party which pursued aims hostile to basic human rights incorporated in the Constitution, even though the party had not been formally prohibited by the Federal Constitutional Court. In relation to other citizens, a public servant had a greater duty of faithfulness to the fundamental principles of the Constitution. The concept of "legal" used by the Commission of Inquiry called for an interpretation; in fact, the prohibition of a party by the Federal Constitutional Court presupposed the filing of a claim in the formal sense by the Federal Government, which could have good reasons for not lodging such a claim; it might appear wise not to force extremist political parties into clandestine activities. It would be desirable if the Committee of Experts could address these matters in its next report. Of course, the decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court and the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights were not binding on the supervisory bodies of the ILO but that Court did deal essentially with fundamental rights – the same rights as set forth in the present Convention; the decisions of these Courts, which were competent in matters involving human rights and fundamental freedoms, should at least amount to the basis for a dialogue at all levels of the supervisory machinery of the ILO.

In conclusion, the Government representative stated that the discussion on the analysis of the report of the Commission of Inquiry should continue at all levels and the recommendations should continue to be examined in relation to their applicability. The Government was willing to continue the dialogue on the political level with the principal representatives of trade unions, associations of officials and employers, in that way also following up on a proposal made by the German Confederation of Trade Unions. The Government would ask the Länder to participate in their efforts and would assume that trade union organisations and employers' organisations and employers' organisations would make contact with the Länder authorities, which would lead to a better understanding of the situation. The Government requested the supervisory bodies to examine the questions it had raised, and which the Government would set forth more specifically in its next report. In that report, the Government would indicate in detail all results which had been forthcoming. Advantage should be taken of the opportunity to continue the dialogue.

The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the Committee of Experts had justly and objectively outlined the development of the situation since the discussions which had taken place in the present Committee in 1988. After an in-depth discussion, the present Committee had expressed in its conclusions the hope that the federal Government would examine the situation again in consultation with the workers' organisations and the employers' organisations and would adopt appropriate measures to overcome the existing difficulties, taking due account of the recommendations the Commission of Inquiry formulated in 1987, as well as of the discussion within the Conference Committee. The present Committee had regretted that the Government did not agree with the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry, whilst also pointing out that this did not detract from the validity of its conclusions. Since then, on two occasions discussions had taken place in which the German Confederation of Trade Unions had participated; however, regrettably, the Government had not changed its position of principle, which was not to recognise the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. The German Confederation of Trade Unions remained ready at all times to take part in discussions in order to overcome the existing difficulties and to put national practice into conformity with the provisions of present Convention. However, it could not and would not discharge the Government of its responsibility, which was to observe the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The present Committee was not the appropriate place to discuss, once again, the situation in practice and the situation in law. If the Government was looking for confirmation of its legal point of view, it should address itself to the International Court of Justice, which was the only competent body to change or to lift the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Government considered it was prevented from changing its practice by national laws and court decisions. However, the national laws and decisions could not discharge the Government of its obligation to give effect to the provisions of the present Convention. The Government had to pursue a national policy which guaranteed respect of the Convention and it had to abstain from anything which might favour, or even make possible, non-respect of the Convention. The practice followed by the federal Government, by the federal postal and railway services, as well as by certain Länder (which had been criticised by the ILO supervisory bodies) was not the only possible practice, since it was on the basis of existing law that other Länder had adopted a practice in recruitment and verification matters which was in accordance with the Convention; these Länder would henceforth include Schleswig-Holstein, following the electoral victory of the opposition party. The change in practice following from changes in parliamentary majorities in certain Länder demonstrated how simple it would be in the Federal Republic of Germany to put current practice which, according to the unanimous declarations of the supervisory bodies did not comply with the Convention, very rapidly into conformity with the Convention. In fact, if the legal constraints invoked by the Government to maintain its practice actually existed, they would have to be valid in these Länder as well. The supervisory bodies of the ILO could not proceed to interpret the decisions of German courts; but if these decisions were to become an obstacle to the application of the Convention, this would in no way modify the compulsory character of the said Convention. In reality, it might be that current national court practice did not prohibit the Government from pursuing its own current practice; but in no way did case law require the Government's current practice. The Government had to change its practice and it had to state here that it was ready to do so. If not, it would have to submit the matter to the International Court of Justice.

If, however, the Government were ready to put the process of verification of applicants to the public service into conformity with the provisions of the present Convention, the German Confederation of Trade Unions had already made a number of specific proposals within the framework of the national discussions which had taken place. These proposals would require: that the systematic verification with the Office for the Protection of the Constitution be abandoned at the federal level and in all the Länder, thus following the procedure adopted by certain Länder; the establishment by a federal law of a procedure which would simultaneously take account of the legitimate interests of state security and the prohibition on discrimination contained in article 3, paragraph 3, of the Constitution, as well as the provisions of the present Convention; such a standard would have to emphasise the need for strictly individual examination as well as the obligation to take account of the principle of proportionality of means to be put into effect; and that an end be put to excessive officialdom in the public service, so that more applicants for jobs in the public service can be recruited as employees covered by labour law and not as officials tied by the duty of faithfulness.

The proposals of the German Confederation of Trade Unions showed in a constructive manner that the Federal Government could make better use than it had up to now of its wide discretionary powers within the national legal framework. The same applied to those Länder which still gave cause for criticism in this respect. Although the Federal Government could not give orders to the Länder, it did, however, represent the State before the International Labour Organisation and was responsible for the application of standards in the whole country.

The representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions (WFTU) referred to the continued non-application of the present Convention in the Federal Republic of Germany, as regards workers in the public service, and stated that the practice of job bans (Berufsverbote) had been going on for 70 years. It indiscriminately affected public sector workers in certain federal States, whether they were applicants for a public post or were already in post. It was not just a case of employment in the public service; which is generally recognised as coming within the discretion of the Government because they concern the highest levels of the political and administrative machinery which touch upon the functioning of the State, rather it affected all public officials, regardless of their functions. These practices were occurring in a great country which called itself free and democratic and respectful of international law, whereas in fact they violated Convention No. 111 on a systematic and massive scale as regards recruitment, prolongation of service and termination of public officials and applicants to the public service. In conformity with article 26, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the ILO, the Governing Body had set up a Commission of Inquiry which had presented a report in 1987. The Government had not accepted its conclusions and whilst refusing to conform with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, it had not wished to take the case before the International Court of Justice and still refused to do so. The speaker recalled the representations made in 1979 and 1984 by the World Federation of Trade Unions by virtue of article 24 of the Constitution. Although the people affected by this practice might consider the lapse of time since the beginning of the procedures rather long, they had to place their confidence in the supervisory machinery, and had to respect it. The establishment of a Commission of Inquiry was a last resort in cases of continued violation, not a normal, every-day means in the supervision of the application of standards. All other procedures are suspended, including discussion in the present Committee. As regards recourse to the International Court of Justice or recourse, previously, to the Permanent Court of International Justice, few governments had employed this means of recourse. Governments were not pressing to seize the International Court of Justice on the interpretation of several thousands of ratified Conventions, contrary to what had been suggested by certain employers. The supervisory machinery set up by the ILO had proved its effectiveness, its objectivity, its impartiality and its independence, as well as its competence. The application of standards should be ensured through recourse to the supervisory machinery, dialogue, and technical assistance, if necessary accompanied by the support and advice of qualified experts whom the ILO made available to its constituents. This pre-supposed good faith and good will on the part of governments.

The Government of the Federal Republic of Germany did not abide by the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, indeed it persisted in its refusal to follow them. Since the recommendations had been adopted, new cases of job bans had been cited. The speaker said he held an open file of about 40 cases recently opened against public service workers, which he would hand over to the ILO. It was a cause for concern that these practices continued in spite of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Government was thus challenging the ILO, its Governing Body and the supervisory bodies, as well as the trade union movement whose opinions, as expressed in the course of the consultative process at the national level, it refused to take into consideration. Trust had to be placed in the action of the German trade unions and of all democratic people in the country, to ensure that the practice of job bans was eliminated, as this was political discrimination, which was contrary to the international standards relating to human rights. Certain Länder had already started on this road and so practice was not uniform; incidentally, this had created discriminatory situations between the public service workers from one Land to another. The speaker was of the opinion that, according to the current Federal Government, the present Convention was incompatible with the Basic Law. However, the latter accepted as a standard of domestic law the principles of international law, one of which resided in the compulsory nature of the Conventions freely ratified by States, and their application in good faith. No international court had ever admitted that States might hide behind own internal standards, whether constitutional or legislative, and behind court decisions so as to avoid fulfilling their obligations under the Conventions. No doubt the Government did not have absolute confidence in its own interpretation, for in that case it would not have declined the opportunity to have it confirmed by the International Court of Justice. The speaker contested the Government's figures on the number of cases of disciplinary action followed by dismissal which had actually taken place and stated that a filing system concerning hundreds of thousands of public officials and applicants to the public service had been set up, and included information identifiable by name on the opinions and political and philosophical allegiances of these persons, as well as on their trade unions and civic activities. Most democratic countries had prohibited, or very severely regulated, these files and investigations so that they could not be a breach of the rights and freedoms of all citizens. The mechanisms investigating and policing opinion were exercising a generalised pressure on the freedom of opinion and expression of a considerable part of the country's citizens. He referred to the European Convention on Human Rights and considered that, whilst that Convention had certainly wished to affirm certain basic freedoms, it had certainly not wished to prohibit the exercise of the rights and freedoms which it did not expressly mention. As far as the supervisory bodies of the ILO were concerned, it was a question of ensuring the application of Convention No. 111. In conclusion, he emphasised the serious nature of the case not only in relation to human rights which are specified in the present Convention on questions of employment and occupation, but also in relation to equally important public freedoms such as the freedom of opinion and the freedom of expression recognised in the covenants and conventions relating to human rights. The definition of a State governed by rule of law was not that it respected its own laws, but that it respected and put into practice the exercise of public freedoms for all, without discrimination. Freedom was indivisible. Attacks on the freedom of some persons or on certain freedoms were limitations on the freedom of all and an attack on all freedoms. This Committee should point this out in its conclusions, as well as the challenge presented to it and to the Commission of Inquiry and the Governing Body of the ILO. The latter should, in accordance with article 33 of the Constitution, examine as quickly as possible what should be done in this case. But the present Committee should not merely request the Government to provide a report next year; it should also request it to apply the present Convention and to stop its current practice. Conclusions appropriate to the extreme gravity of the continued violation of the present Convention should encourage the Government to implement the Convention fully in law and in practice, as quickly as possible, and taking fully into account the views of the German trade unions in this respect.

The representative of the International Federation of Free Teachers' Unions (SPIE-CISL) referred to the frequently very difficult personal situation in which persons found themselves when affected by measures taken in application of the duty of faithfulness and who could not be reproached for any actual default in their obligations. Some of these people had not been able to complete their training, others found themselves refused access to employment after years of training, hence the expression "job ban", and still others had been dismissed after long years of irreplaceable service, sometimes even more than 20 years, in teaching, in the postal service and in other parts of the public service. Dismissal procedures had continued since the adoption in 1987 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry, which had described the situation exactly and which had drawn attention to individual cases. In certain cases, the dismissed persons had had the benefit of their work-linked housing withdrawn or had had to pay back large amounts of money when their dismissal had been preceded by a period of suspended service: in the case of one school-teacher, the authorities had claimed the repayment of DM 150,000. This showed the speed with which the person concerned could see his or her material means of existence also become involved, after being deprived of his or her occupational life. And these measures had been taken since the previous International Labour Conference. The non-respect of international labour standards and of the supervisory system of the ILO was a cause for concern. The present Convention was one of the standards concerned with fundamental human rights. After an in-depth study of the facts and a full legal discussion, the Commission of Inquiry had noted that the Convention was not respected. This procedure was the most exhaustive of all in the supervisory machinery; it had not often been used in the 70 years of the Organisation's life and this was the first time that such a Commission had been set up as a matter of course by the Governing Body. The present Committee expected governments to put an end to the divergence noted by the Committee of Experts in connection with a ratified Convention; this carried even more weight in the case of the report by a Commission of Inquiry, set up by virtue of the Constitution of the ILO. If the Government continued to refuse to accept the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, a situation which was not acceptable, then it would have to appeal to the International Court of Justice. In this connection, it was worth recalling that in the past, in another context, the Government had already envisaged, before the present Committee, reference to the International Court of Justice. If it did not wish to proceed along that path, then it would have to be content with the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Worker member of Finland, speaking on behalf of the Worker members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden, pointed out interesting similarities between this case and the case involving the present Convention in relation to the Islamic Republic of Iran. Both that Government and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany were presuming that mere membership in certain political parties or organisations implied doubts about faithfulness to the constitution of the country, or that such membership was prejudicial to the security of the State, so as to justify exclusion from the public sector. The Scandinavian workers were glad to learn that the new government of Schleswig-Holstein had abandoned the so-called "Systematic inquiry" (Regelanfrage) practice; now, in that Land, loyalty to the Constitution was presumed unless there was specific evidence of an act contrary to that obligation. They found it strange that no change of attitude or practice had taken place with respect to the Federal Government or in the Länder of Baden-Württemberg, Bavaria, Lower Saxony and Rhineland-Palatinate. Although in the general discussion the Government had expressed its support for the supervisory machinery, finding it to be independent, neutral and objective, the Federal Republic of Germany was in practice calling the judgment of the supervisory bodies into question when it came to their own country's failure to apply a Convention. Yet all the supervisory bodies which had examined the case – the Committee of Experts, the present Committee and the Commission of Inquiry – had consistently reached the same conclusions. By opposing the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry and the other bodies, the Government was behaving in flagrant contradiction to the ILO Constitution and the fundamental rules on which the supervisory machinery was based. The Government should either request an interpretation from the International Court of Justice under article 29 of the ILO Constitution or it should accept and implement those conclusions. No other option remained for an honest-minded member State of the ILO. Yet the Federal Republic of Germany had failed in both respects. Given the negative consequences of the Government's attitude for the legal rights of civil servants and the entire ILO supervisory machinery, the Scandinavian workers proposed that the case be mentioned in a special paragraph of the present Committee's report. The Government had kindly expressed its willingness to continue a dialogue with the trade unions in the Federal Republic of Germany and with the ILO supervisory bodies. However, this question had been discussed in the present Committee since 1981. After so many years of dialogue, it could be said that hope, meaning mere dialogue, was a good breakfast, but a bad supper. The Scandinavian workers further proposed that the present Committee should, in the conclusions on this case, invite the Governing Body to examine, in accordance with article 33 of the ILO Constitution, what further measures might be taken to secure the observance of the Convention, and to recommend to the 1990 Conference "such action it may deem wise and expedient". They also referred to article 27 of the ILO Constitution and article IX of the agreement between the United Nations and the ILO, which concerned relations with the International Court of Justice. According to article IX, the Conference Committee or the Governing Body, acting in pursuance of an authorisation by the Conference, could request the International Court of Justice to give a legal advisory opinion concerning Convention No. 111. In conclusion, they hoped that next year this case would appear as an example of the successful operation of the supervisory process.

A Worker member of Spain stated that he fully shared the view expressed by the Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany. He wondered whether, in a democratic State like the Federal Republic of Germany in which human rights are recognised as promulgated in the international covenants of the United Nations, it was legitimate to invoke the defence of human rights in order to practise discrimination and exclusion from employment for security reasons. He considered just as freedom of association was protected, political freedom and its expression should also be protected; that is, protection was required not only of affiliation to a political party or of the expression of a political opinion, but also of protection in the face of any harm, repression or prejudice. He referred to the Spanish Constitution and to the prohibition on discrimination it contained, a system that had been adopted when democracy was established. In his opinion, the scope of present Convention had to be established and in order to do this it was important for the Government to submit the case to the International Court of Justice. However, in so far as it did not do so the solution to the problem could be found at the level of administrative practice, leaving aside the criterion of political activity or opinion in the choice and selection of candidates or deciding security of tenure of public servants. Bearing in mind, as well, the current crisis in political ideas and international developments tending towards the overcoming of ideological and political confrontation, the restrictions on democracy had to disappear, because the cause of peace also required it.

The Worker member of the United Kingdom considered that this case was typical of a number of cases that had come before the present Committee; he wondered how a breakthrough could be achieved. Earlier, many governments had argued that the present Committee resolved problems through dialogue and consensus. Workers who knew about this case tried to treat it through dialogue and consensus, but we were faced with a situation in which the Committee of Experts and the present Committee, as well as the Commission of Inquiry, had asked in vain for certain changes to be made. Workers were told that before a case could require special treatment, it had to have been considered for a long time and it had to be a very serious case, how many workers had to die before a case became serious? Let all those countries which had stated, in explaining their vote in the case involving the United Kingdom, that they believed in dialogue and consensus come forward now to assist in this case when dialogue and consensus seemed to have failed.

The Workers' members declared that this question of discrimination in employment and occupation because of political opinion was very important, as it: (1) concerned a democratic industrialised State; (2) the application of Convention No. 111, (a fundamental Convention on human rights matters); (3) the time that has elapsed since the question began to be examined; and (4) the number of people concerned, or who might become concerned, in view of the large number of public servants. The divergences between the Convention and its application were clear and had been noted by the present Committee, the Committee of Experts and, in particular, by the Commission of Inquiry; for the moment, the Convention was still not respected. Progress had been made in one Land and it was to be hoped that this progress would be followed by other examples of progress, notably at the federal level. Consultations and dialogue were taking place with the social partners and the various Länder authorities. These consultations, just like the decisions which may have been adopted by the Federal Constitutional Court, did not detract from the fact that the Convention was not respected, that changes should take place and the Government's obligations remained the same. The conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had been adopted at the beginning of 1987, that is, two years ago already. It would be dangerous to postpone the necessary changes indefinitely, just as it would be inappropriate to follow the request of the Government to the effect that the Committee of Experts re-examine the whole question. The conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry were clear. If the necessary changes could not be brought about by other means, the appropriate legislative measures would have to be adopted, and the Government would have to indicate to the present Committee which measures it intended to adopt. Should it refuse to follow that path, it was up to the Government to take the affair before the International Court of Justice. For its part, at a certain moment the present Committee would have to invite the Governing Body to examine which other measures could be taken to guarantee respect of the Convention. A request might even be made to the Director-General to submit a full analysis of the possible means of action to the Governing Body. In conclusion, the Workers' members considered that one could examine, discuss and consult, but in the end the legislation had to be corrected and amended.

The Employers' members stated that the present case concerned the important question of discrimination based on political opinion and it seemed to them that there was a hope that this question might be resolved, with time. As to the legal position of the Government, they referred to their comments made on the occasion of the discussion at the Conference the previous year, which is reflected in the Record of Proceedings of the International Labour Conference, 1988, No. 28, page 69. The question of discrimination based on political opinion in this case is inextricably linked to questions of national security and the protection of human rights. Furthermore, it was complicated by the fact that the Commission of Inquiry was divided and by the decisions of the European Court on Human Rights. The problem arose because of the Federal Constitution and it was not certain whether the solution being sought could be a legislative one; the Employers' members did not agree in this respect with the Workers' members. The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany had focused on the practice in his country and it was in this area that a solution to this case also could be found. The case was complicated by the fact that it was a question of a federal government and the authorities of the Länder and of their respective competence. Even if the case itself had been before the present Committee for a certain time, the report of the Commission of Inquiry was quite recent and the Government had paid much closer attention to the question since then. Progress had been made since the previous year: at least one Land had modified its practice and even if this was the result of political changes in that Land, it was a step in the right direction; the Government had engaged in tripartite dialogue which takes a certain time, particularly because the question being examined concerned the constitution of the federal State; consultations had begun or would be starting with different Länder. In conclusion, the Employers' members hoped that these various consultations would contribute to a solution to these problems; they also referred to the change in international relations which was taking place in the region and which in the longer term could contribute to the solution of the case. As regards the suggestion by the Workers' members to invite the Governing Body and the Director-General to formulate proposals to resolve the case, they considered it was premature to go that far, since the Government was trying to resolve the problem internally.

The Government member of France stated that this case was probably the most complex that the present Committee had ever had to examine, with political, legal, human and historical implications and with a particular significance as regards the duty of faithfulness towards the constitutional order and democratic institutions. The Government had indicated its willingness to seek a solution, to continue dialogue at the Länder level and also with the social partners, but all this would take time. The obstacles and difficulties referred to came very much to the fore, notably the political and human impossibility of changing the Constitution and the role of the Federal Constitutional Court; there were difficulties in the application in domestic law of the provisions of Convention No. 111 and of the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry; there were also difficulties associated with the autonomy of the Länder, which had different political majorities and over which the Federal Government had little power. One should not reach hasty or trenchant opinions on this very sensitive subject and it was appropriate to encourage the Government to continue seeking practical solutions.

The Government representative of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that several speakers had referred to the measures to be adopted by the Government and he considered it was difficult to have a discussion and to call it a dialogue when arguments that were already well known were simply evoked once more. Whilst he understood that the question of measures to be adopted by the Government should be evoked, one should bear in mind the federal structure of the State and consider what could be done at the Federal level and at the Länder level. As regards the competence of the federal authorities, including the postal and railway services, three cases had already started since the beginning of the process of inquiry, one which concerned a member of the German Communist Party and two which concerned extreme right-wing public officials (the case concerning the member of the German Communist Party has been settled in that way that the civil servant concerned continues to be employed); in view of the country's history it would be interesting to know the views of the members of the present Committee as to the reactions which the Government should have in this respect, when faced with Neo-Nazi extremists who actively fight the free democratic basic order.

As regards the time since when the dialogue can refer to the jurisprudence of the supervisory bodies in the opinion of the Government representative, none of the supervisory bodies had formed a definitive opinion until the report of the Commission of Inquiry of 1987, the conclusions and recommendations of which had been adopted by two members, as the third member had expressed a dissenting opinion. This also should encourage reflection and furnish an opportunity for continued dialogue.

The speaker referred to the freedom of expression and to the protection of the opposition which was guaranteed by the Constitution of his country and wondered how the jurisprudence of the Committee of Experts could be interpreted if an opposition was hostile to human rights and sought to establish a dictatorship, even through peaceful and parliamentary means. In particular, he referred to the jurisprudence of the Committee of Experts according to which the protection of the Convention cannot be granted if unconstitutional principles which are in contradiction to basic human rights are advocated. He wondered what was the significance of its jurisprudence for the Federal Republic of Germany. The Government respected the supervisory bodies and took part in procedures which aimed at dialogue. Regardless of other legal questions which could be raised in this context the Government did not consider it appropriate to appeal to the International Court of Justice, as it considered that the possibilities of dialogue had not yet been exhausted. Furthermore, the Federal Constitutional Court which is competent to decide on human rights had not had the opportunity of formulating a definitive opinion on the question since 1975 since the right to appeal to that court has not been used by those concerned. For its part, the European Court on Human Rights had decided that the incriminated practice did not amount to a restriction on liberty of opinion and this ruling should also be included in the dialogue. Human rights were indivisible, the Committee of Experts had not taken this ruling appropriately into account, whereas the questions on which it touches were extremely pertinent. The Committee of Experts should have the opportunity to examine the whole question again, including the decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and the Government was ready to take part in a constructive manner in such a dialogue.

The Worker member of the Federal Republic of Germany referred to the statement of the Government representative and said that the Constitution, the law regarding the public service and the law on political parties provided the necessary basis on which to solve the question of the Neo-fascists; he also said that there should be no change in the perspective on the problem, as the practice under consideration was essentially aimed at the "left" and not at the "right". It was not possible, due to lack of time, to discuss the problems of the Constitution, of the historical past or of the European Court on Human Rights. What was clear was that the Government did not accept the report of the Commission of Inquiry and that it split hairs by talking of minority votes. This was all way out of date: the position of the Commission of Inquiry had been followed by the Committee of Experts and its comments in 1988 and 1989, and the present Committee had adopted conclusions going in the same direction in 1988; the Government was faced with the position of the supervisory bodies of the ILO and it should not discuss minority votes. The second intervention by the Government representative had showed quite clearly that the Government was persisting in its point of view and refusing to modify its practice, which had been criticised by the supervisory bodies; this did not render dialogue any easier.

The Committee noted the information and explanations provided by the Government representative as well as the debate which had taken place. The Committee noted that the Government wished to continue to support the supervisory procedures of the ILO and to promote dialogue with the supervisory bodies. The Committee noted, however, that the Government maintained its position according to which law and practice with respect to the duty of faithfulness were in compliance with the Convention. The Committee recalled that under the ILO Constitution disputes relating to interpretation could be referred to the International Court of Justice. The Committee shared the opinion of the Committee of Experts that the position of the Government did not affect the validity of the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee, noting the importance and the complexity of the problem in both national and international law, took due note of the assurances given by the Government on the possibility of maintaining a constructive dialogue at all levels. It took due note of the measures already adopted and the steps initiated, as well as of developments in the practice of certain Länder. The Committee subscribed to the hope expressed by the Committee of Experts that, furthermore, measures would be taken by the Government to ensure full compliance with Convention No. 111 in regard to the matters examined by the Commission of Inquiry, taking into account the dialogue pursued within the supervisory bodies.

Islamic Republic of Iran (ratification: 1964). A Government representative, the Assistant Minister of Labour and Social Affairs, stated that, whilst participating in the work of the present Committee with the aim of observing the true nature of the debate and the reasons for which the Islamic Republic of Iran was accused of injustice and violation of this Convention, he had observed that his country was asked questions which touched on the fundamentals of the Islamic revolution. His Government had undertaken a careful study of the report of the Committee of Experts, and, in its opinion, there had been no discrimination. The representative of his country had had a legal discussion about the question of the competence of the Committee, and technical reports had been sent; nevertheless, the case had not been settled.

The Government had indicated that if there were any complaints, it was ready to examine them; but there had been no complainants. Numerous references had been made to human rights and indeed one might wonder about true human rights, about the role they had played and still played. Referring to the situation regarding human rights in his country before the Islamic revolution, he considered that at the time neither the Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations nor the present Committee had done anything against the regime. Whereas the question of the Freemasons and the Baha'is had been submitted to this Committee on many occasions and would no doubt be submitted again in future. The speaker then undertook an in-depth historical analysis of the role of the Baha'i movement and of Freemasonry in his country, of their links with the corrupt circles of the old regime, the leaders of which had largely been Baha'is or Freemasons or else had had close links with Baha'is or Freemasons, and with the Western powers which had controlled the country: they had even intended to establish Baha'ism as the state religion. Under the old regime, many of the present leaders of the country, including himself, had spent many years in prison and had been tortured, and he wished to know what the organisations concerned with human rights had been doing at that time.

Each year new problems were raised concerning the Baha'is and the question of women; the Committee of Experts had asked for religious minorities to have judges in the legal system, as well as for statistics on this point. The speaker drew the attention of the present Committee to the spies who are in prison in his country for having communicated such information to the outside world.

The speaker wished to point out that no Baha'i, no Freemason, no one holding beliefs other than the Muslim faith had ever been persecuted for his beliefs. Christians, Zoroastrians, Jews, were all represented in Parliament and had volunteered to serve in the defensive war. Baha'ism was merely a political and espionage movement, which acted against public order. Freemasons and Baha'is were prosecuted for acts concerning the misappropriation of public goods and for black-marketeering.

There cannot be any compromise on ideological questions; the Government would never, under any pretext, accept from the international organisations anything that was in opposition to its ideological objectives. The speaker recalled once again that if someone wished to make a complaint they could do so by submitting their case to the competent authorities. There had been no such cases as no minority was discriminated against. Non-discrimination was a fundamental precept of Islam. However, in order to maintain a healthy society, Islam rose up against all those opposed to the law and those people who showed too much indulgence for such actions would naturally have to be punished. In no case would Baha'is be allowed to emerge again in the country and their presence in the international organisations would be prejudicial to the Islamic Republic of Iran.

The speaker stated that in future any objection, any point raised against what was obvious, would not be accepted. The speaker asked a number of questions to which he wished to receive written answers: the definition of minorities, the definition of discrimination in general and in particular the definition of religion and the criteria enabling one to recognise a religion.

As the Workers' and Employers' members had asked the Government representative to restrict himself to the actual questions relating to the comments of the Committee of Experts, and as the Chairman had emphasised that it would be wise to deal with the essence of the questions, the Government representative indicated that he would send in his questions in writing. He pointed out that discussion had taken place previously within the Committee on the question of the application of the Convention, but it seemed that his Government's arguments were never taken up. He regretted that the report of the Committee of Experts had not mentioned certain measures that had been taken internally and also certain laws which had been passed. The question of the Baha'is was an internal matter and there was no reason to debate it within the Committee. Just like the other communities, this community had the right to work, the right to live, and the right to make representations to the legal authorities, as well as to the competent authorities which came under the Ministry of Labour, where their case would be considered attentively.

The Workers' members emphasised that, in employment and training matters, there was contradiction with the Convention, both in the law and in practice; that there was discrimination for politico-religious motives, which they considered an extremely dangerous state of affairs; and that this discrimination affected not only the Baha'i group but also other minorities. They mentioned tolerance and respect for civil liberties and hoped that certain signs now becoming perceptible would soon lead to a number of changes. They hoped that the workers would no longer suffer discrimination in employment and in training, a form of discrimination which undermined the reputation of the Convention, and whose existence was unanimously recognised by the international authorities and by a great many independent and objective individuals. Finally, they hoped that their concerns and those of the Committee of Experts and the United Nations would be reflected in the conclusions.

The Employers' members stated that the situation had been clearly described by the Committee of Experts; there was indeed discriminations in training, in employment and in the professions, discrimination against religious minorities, especially the Baha'is, the Freemasons and atheists. They had been disappointed in the statement by the Government representative, since they were not interested in hearing about the history of Iran and because the arguments advanced had been lacking in logic. In fact, they could not accept the reasoning which consisted of saying that, when the people responsible for bad government belonged to a particular religion, then that religion had to be condemned. Under such circumstances, all religions would have to be fought, since there were bad members in many religions. They would have preferred to have heard more specific information about the comments made by the Committee of Experts, in particular on discrimination in training and education. The Government representative had not referred to the changes that were becoming perceptible, and he had not provided any information about whether they were continuing. They expressed their concern about the statement by the Government representative to the effect that there were no more problems concerning Freemasonry because there were no more Freemasons. As for the Baha'is, it appeared that they had access to primary schools but that they encountered great difficulty in gaining access to secondary school and the higher educational levels, for which they had to renounce their faith. Women, for their part, were not allowed to exercised certain professions. They considered that the present Committee should take a position on all these points in a future report, and that it would be good to be able to note progress. They felt that considerable changes were necessary and, in view of the situation, they felt obliged to express their grave concern once more.

The Worker member of the Islamic Republic of Iran referred to the unusual step he was going to take, namely to support his Government. However, he felt that in fundamental problems of a religious nature one had to be guided by one's conscience. He recalled that the formulation of international labour standards usually led to the gratitude of the parties affected, notably the workers. As was well known, the Committee of Experts had to follow the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality in its work. Unfortunately, he believed these principles had not been adhered to. He reiterated the opinion he had expressed in the Workers' group meeting, namely, that the views of members from non-industrialised countries were treated with greater severity by the present Committee than were the views of members from industrialised countries. In the case of the application of the present Convention in the Islamic Republic of Iran, these criteria had been set aside. As he had explained the previous year, the question of the treatment of Baha'is and Freemasons could not be taken into consideration in relation to this Convention. The reason was that the Baha'is were a network of spies, who had held key posts in pre-revolutionary Iran and had themselves been the main agents of discrimination in that period. As a result they had attracted the hatred of the people, including the workers, and this was why the speaker was supporting his Government's stand on this issue. He asked a number of questions, to which he requested written replies addressed to the workers' organisation he represented: (1) Some four years previously, his organisation had submitted documents to the present Committee as evidence of the spying of the Baha'is - he wished to know why the Committee had not replied with its views regarding this documentation and why no mention had been made of it in the report, (2) The Committee of Experts' report emphasised the role of the workers in the application of Conventions, and he wished to know why his organisation had never been contacted by the Committee of Experts in this regard; (3) He wished to know why there had been no reply to this Organisation's repeated invitation over recent years to the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' members to visit his country to observe the measures taken by his organisation to further the interest of the workers. In his view, the problems being discussed here by the present Committee were not the real problems of the workers of this country. He had things to say to this Committee about other problems but could not do so until this problem was dealt with, as his cause might be seen to be affiliated with spying organisations.

There were some doubts in the minds of the workers he represented with regard to the references in this case to the interim report on the situation of human rights in his country which had been transmitted to the General Assembly of the United Nations. He had noted that some countries which had ratified this Convention and had worse records on human rights had also been mentioned in the report of the Committee on Human Rights of the United Nations; however, he pointed out that the present Committee had not mentioned these by name. He also referred to the pressures being put on workers in the occupied Arab territories, and to a number of murdered Palestinian workers. He asked whether the ILO or this Committee did not have duties and responsibilities, quite outside their formulated functions, to defend the rights of the oppressed workers of the occupied Arab territories. He wondered about the operation of a double standard not in accordance with the principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality. He also referred to the time taken for the preparation of the report of the Committee of Experts in March 1989 and expressed doubts about the feasibility of the Committee of Experts having fully examined all the country reports in the short time available. Finally, he requested the present Committee to review their earlier investigations and decisions, and to consider whether indulging in international political questions was compatible with solving the problems of workers. He hoped that the Committee would be able to create an atmosphere of mutual understanding in which the real problems of the workers in his country could be addressed.

The Government representative stated that it was not correct to maintain that some people had had to change their religion and faith; many Baha'is had converted of their own free will, and there had been no pressure on them to change their religion. As regards access to educational establishments, the Government had harmonised the procedures and everyone was treated equally. As for vocational training, he was personally in charge of this and had no knowledge of either rejections or acceptances of Baha'is. There was no discrimination in the employment and investment fields; Baha'is were managers in enterprises and in economic and commercial services, from the lowest rank to the top management. The Public Inspection Organisation dealt with all complaints, without any discrimination. The administrative court dealt with offences committed by civil servants, without any discrimination with all the complaints referred to it. A law had been passed which broadened the scope of the right of appeal to the higher courts.

The speaker concluded by stressing once again that these political questions were polemical, particularly as regards the instructions given by the Committee on Human Rights of the United Nations, and by asking for this issue to be struck off once and for all.

The Committee had taken note of the oral explanations provided by the Government representative. It had observed with regret that there were no changes in the situation regarding the application of the Convention. As each year since 1983, the Committee had expressed once again its serious concern regarding the problems which continued as to the application of the Convention. The Committee had expressed the firm hope that the Government would abolish all forms of discrimination contrary to the Convention, whether on the grounds of sex, religion, political opinions or even social or national origin. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be in a position to report on decisive and substantial progress as to the application of the Convention already the following year.

Pakistan (ratification: 1961). A Government representative declared that it was somewhat surprising that the report of the Committee of Experts made mention of the resolution of the 1985 session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights while not taking into account the fact that one of the subsequent two sessions of the Sub-Commission in 1987 and 1988, or for that matter the four sessions of the Sub-Commission in 1987 and 1988, or for that matter the four sessions of the Human Rights Commission itself (in 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989), had made any mention of or given credence to allegations of violations of the human rights of the Ahmadis whether of the Qadiani group or the Lahori group, as a result of Ordinance XX of 1984.

The various allegations mentioned by the Committee of Experts regarding the treatment of the Ahmadi Community were baseless. The Government had consistently discharged its obligations to ensure the equitable and just treatment of all its citizens regardless of their religious belief. There was no discrimination against Ahmadis. They had freedom of expression and could distribute religious and other types of publications. They had the right to freely associate and held religious meetings and conventions, as well as prayer congregations. The necessary facilities were provided for such meetings. Appropriate measures were taken to protect Ahmadi places of worship and to maintain their sanctity like that of all other minorities living in Pakistan. Article 20 of the Constitution was clear on this subject.

With regard to the charges that members of the Ahmadi Community had been arrested solely for the expression of their religious belief, it should be known that when such arrests had occurred they had been motivated by the aim to uphold the law, and only in cases where the members of this community had acted in breach of the law. Application of the law could not and should not be interpreted as a breach of religious tolerance.

In Pakistan there was no discrimination as regards employment. Article 27(1) of the Constitution provided that no citizen who otherwise qualified for appointment in the services of Pakistan should be discriminated against. The Government had not, as was alleged, dismissed Ahmadis from government employment on grounds of religion. Ahmadis held important positions in the civil service of Pakistan.

As regards the question of signing a declaration on the application for a passport, it should be known that only Muslims are required to sign this declaration. Non-Muslims, whether they are Christians, Hindus, Buddhists or Ahmadis, were not required to sign the declaration. A passport was never refused to anyone on religious grounds. All minorities including the Ahmadis had a right to obtain a passport. Ordinance XX of 1984 merely sought to resolve the problem by differentiating between Muslim and Ahmadi practices with a view to ensuring peace and tranquility, especially in public places of worship. It might be pointed out that Ordinance XX comes from a legislative declaration in 1974 by the National Assembly of Pakistan, a freely elected body, which in the exercise of its constituent power declared Ahmadis as a non-Muslim minority while at the same time guaranteeing them all the rights of a minority community. This was done after a full hearing of all parties, including the Ahmadi community itself. The Government's understanding of the law was that every legislative body in the exercise of its constituent power could rule on all conceivable matters. This was the only way to decide any controversy that arose within the state, particularly if the state was a religious state and had expressly declared Islam to be the religion of the state. Thus, the legislature at the highest level, in deciding the question of who a Muslim was, rendered what might be called a majority decision. In any democratic forum, decisions were after all taken by appeal to the majority principle.

After the lifting of martial law, the constitutional guarantees relating to the fundamental rights of all citizens were restored and the authority of the judiciary fully re-established. The restoration of democracy and the restitution of fundamental rights in Pakistan, as well as the full authority of the judiciary, ensured that the rights of the Ahmadis, as of every citizen of Pakistan, were fully safeguarded by due process of law.

The Government undertook the duty to promote the welfare of the non-Muslim citizens, to ensure tolerance for their faith and to provide them opportunities to lead their lives honourably and according to their beliefs. A Federal Ministry of Minorities Affairs has the responsibility to protect their rights and to take all possible measures for their well-being and economic, social and educational advancement.

It was, however, becoming increasingly clear that some Ahmadis had launched a campaign of hatred against the Government and people of Pakistan, and that their constant allegations, which were invariably found to be baseless, were nothing but a disinformation campaign motivated by a desire to malign Pakistan.

The Government of Pakistan reiterated that there was no persecution campaign against the Ahmadis. It strongly rejected the allegation that any government agency had resorted to authorised discrimination against Ahmadis in Pakistan. Conversely, the Government had endeavoured to protect the rights of all the minorities, including the Ahmadis, and adopted measures to pre-empt any developments which would create problems of a law and order nature. These clarifications should allay any misgivings about the situation in respect of discrimination.

A Worker member of Pakistan stated that discrimination based on beliefs, sex, religion or ethnic origin was not permissible, and that the workers' movement believed in tolerance because national unity depended on this. Extremists should not be allowed the possibility to provoke troubles of an ethnic or religious nature. In Pakistan minorities were protected and they were not the object of any discrimination based on religion. The fact that members of these minorities occupied very important posts demonstrated that this tolerance was shown to all religions.

The Employers' members stated that there was no reason to doubt the good faith of the Government and the statements made by the Worker member. The present Committee simply lacked the facts to really evaluate the situation. If the description of the situation as explained was true, further dialogue with the Government on this matter would no longer be necessary.

The Workers' members stated that they had some understanding for countries where one particular religious faith dominated and where the Government tried to put religious minorities in the best situation possible. The fact that a law was adopted by a freely elected body, however, did not necessarily imply that that legislation was wise and just. Furthermore, if people acted contrary to the laws of a country and those laws applied universally, then that was not a matter for this Committee. But if there were special laws or special provisions which applied only to one group, then the Committee of Experts immediately had the right to intervene. This was what happened in the framework of the supervision of Convention No. 111 by the Committee of Experts and they have continued to note, with concern, that these legislative provisions authorised the imprisonment of people for propagating their faith. With regard to the statements made by the Worker member of Pakistan on the subject of extremists, it would be useful to distinguish between an extremist and a person who believed in another religion, other than that of the majority. In any event, the Government should clarify the status of persons covered by Ordinance No. XX by providing information on the cases which have arisen under this Ordinance and the manner in which these cases have been resolved. If the present Committee or the Committee of Experts had detailed information on this point, it would be possible to know not only the state of the legislation, but also the situation in practice with regard to the present Convention. This Committee should be able to hope that it will be able to re-examine this question next year with the benefit of the Committee of Experts' comments.

A Worker member of Pakistan subscribed to the statement made by the Workers' spokesman that the Government should supply detailed information on the status of persons covered by Ordinance No. XX as concerns employment and occupation, in conformity with the request made by the Committee of Experts. In this way, any doubts which members of the present Committee had could be removed.

The Chairman of the Committee stated that he would like to have information concerning the present situation with regard to Ordinance No. XX of 1984.

The Government representative stated that no passports had been refused on the basis of religion. A signed declaration was only required from Muslims. If an Ahmadi, a Christian or a Hindu mentioned his religion when requesting a passport, it would not be necessary to sign a declaration. There is, therefore, no discrimination based on religion as concerns obtaining a passport in order to work in a foreign country.

No discrimination against the Ahmadis existed in the field of employment and occupation, and was proven by the number of Ahmadis employed at all levels of administration. Jobs were given on the basis of the qualifications of the candidate in relation to the responsibilities of the post. Ordinance No. XX of 1984 only declared that Ahmadis were a non-Muslim minority which benefited from all the rights and protections provided by the Constitution. If they were the object of any discrimination, they could seek remedies from the civil courts. In any event, Ahmadis were not the object of any discrimination in employment or occupation.

A Worker member of Liberia wondered what the reasons were for requiring that a declaration be signed by a Muslim in order to obtain a passport. Was this a trap to detect those who only pretended to be Muslims in order to obtain employment or to be able to leave the country? In any event, this Ordinance violated the Constitution of Pakistan which provided for religious tolerance. The Committee of Experts, therefore, had the right to request that this Ordinance be reconsidered and that the necessary measures be taken to bring law and practice into conformity with the Convention. Such measures would be completely in line with the promises made by the Prime Minister to bring all the laws into conformity with the relevant ILO Conventions.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative, as well as of the discussion that took place on the subject of religious tolerance in the context of discrimination in employment and occupation.

The Committee noted that the application of the Convention by Pakistan continued to be a source of concern because, notwithstanding the declarations of good intentions, there had been no legislative changes and, in particular, there had been no amendments to Ordinance No. XX of 1984. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the Government would take all the necessary measures, in the very near future, so as to eliminate the discrepancies between the law and practice on one hand, and the provisions of the Convention on the other.

The Committee requested the Government to supply detailed information so that next year it would be able to note decisive progress.

The Workers' members recalled that in previous years a special paragraph in the present Committee's report was devoted to Pakistan. This year, such a paragraph was not necessary because the Government had shown good faith upon which it could be hoped that the Government would send complete reports to the Committee of Experts, reports permitting evaluation of the progress made in the application of Convention No. 111.

The Employers' members supported the statement made by the Workers' members.

Romania (ratification: 1973). The Government has communicated the following information:

The reference to resolution 1987/75 on the Human Rights Situation in Romania adopted by the United Nations Commission on Human Rights at its 45th Session in March 1989 is irrelevant. As the Government pointed out in this year's session of the Human Rights Commission, Romania considers the resolution in question null and void, as it constitutes a gross interference in the internal affairs of the people and State of Romania, in conflict with the spirit of the Final Act of Helsinki and the document of Vienna. In its comments, the General Confederation of Labour "Force Ouvrière" refers to a so-called "report" prepared by the Hungarian Democratic Forum based in Budapest; in this way it acts as the tool of a revisionist policy that is fraught with danger for the very foundations of peace in Europe. These comments repeat not only the baseless allegations and references of the "report" but also its offensive expressions. For example, the Romanian zoning and development policy is described as "a programme of forcible elimination of thousands of villages on the pretext of the modernisation of agriculture." All kinds of charges are made against the Romanian political and legal system, based on mendacious speculation, to support the argument that this is not fitting for a State based on law. Emotional expressions such as "victims of reprisals", "brutality" and "intimidation", "role of the secret police", etc. are frequently invoked. Further evidence of the bad faith of the authors of both the "report" and of the commentary are the references to employment problems in the army and the police; these are completely outside the ILO's competence. The Government expresses its concern about the tendency in some quarters to use the ILO to misrepresent the reality in Romania and to spread allegations offensive to the country; this tendency is at variance with the purposes and objectives of the Organisation. If continued, such activities are bound to impair the credibility of the ILO and this country's co-operation with it. The Government objects to any interference in problems that are solely within the competence of the Romanian State. The Government wishes, however, to provide the present Committee with the fullest possible information about the country's legal system, its policies and the functioning of institutions relative to this matter.

The Government reiterates that under the terms of Convention No. 111, every ratifying State undertakes to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice, equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation, with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof. Romania has consistently submitted reports concerning legislation in force and action taken to ensure application of the Convention with a view to guaranteeing effective equality in rights and to preventing discrimination in the field of employment, the exercise of a profession or occupation, remuneration or any other aspect of work on the grounds of race or nationality.

The comments from "Force Ouvrière" (France) dated 13 March 1989 refer to alleged discrimination in various fields, without specifying which ILO conventions or recommendations are involved. It refers to a report received from the Hungarian Democratic Forum. It is apparent from a reading of this 100-page report that labour and employment problems are dealt with entirely incidentally, superficially and tendentiously. References to these problems occur in only two paragraphs (pp. 22 and 24), in the chapter entitled "Data on the size, territorial distribution and social stratification of the Hungarian minority." As the title of this chapter suggests, these paragraphs have nothing whatsoever to do with employment problems. These incidental references are pure allegations which misleadingly and tendentiously depict the situation; they are totally unrelated to the real conditions in Romania. As will be shown below, in Romania, under the law and in practice, there is no discrimination in matters of employment, occupation, choice and exercise of profession or occupation, remuneration or in any other respect, on the basis of race, colour, sex, nationality, religion or on any other grounds. It is surprising that the report deals with problems concerning the history of Central Europe and in particular, aspects of Romanian territoriality. In a number of pages the authors challenge the existing frontiers and the territorial integrity of the countries, claiming that these frontiers were achieved by territorial "expansion" (p. 4) or "dictated by the interests of the Great Powers" after the two World Wars (p. 7), that a number of territories of Romania are allegedly part of historic Hungary and were "awarded" to Romania or "annexed" (p. 7), specifically by the Treaty of the Trianon of 4 June 1920 (p. 15), describing the shameful Diktat of Vienna of 1940, which was imposed by Hitler, as an "arbitrary award" and regretting that this "award" left the southern part of Transylvania to Romania (p. 85), ignoring the fact that this Diktat was declared null and void by the Paris Peace Conference. As a "final solution" the report suggested, furthermore, that in this part of Europe the national frontiers which separate States should be abolished (p.

4). The source consistently used by the authors is the "History of Transylvania", published in Budapest in 1986. It is well known that this "History" has been the subject of much and well-founded criticism in the Romanian historiography and also in the non-Romanian literature (see the publication Balkanica, No. 3/1988, Rome), as it denies the continuity of the Romanian presence in these territories and patently conflicts with the documentary archaeological and historic evidence.

By raising such questions, empires and revanchist circles and forces have attempted to invent pretexts for interfering in internal affairs in order to repartition the territory of Romania. This method was used on the eve of the Second World War, when the Horthy Government of Hungary, which was subservient to German fascism, used the Vienna Diktat in order to seize a part of the territory - Transylvania - which was occupied until the end of the War. All this shows clearly that the source material in question raises serious political problems that indicate the true purpose of the démarche - the questioning of national frontiers - which the ILO ought to unconditionally reject. Romania does not accept any discussion of its territorial integrity and repudiates any debate on the subject within the ILO.

The report also criticises the socialist economic and social system, planning of the socialist ownership of the means of production, the working of institutions in the field of education, culture and information, the political system, the organisation of external relations, etc., of Romania. It touches upon a large number of political and ideological matters with which the ILO is not concerned. The Charter of the United Nations and the entire system of international relations is based upon respect for the sovereignty, political independence and territorial integrity of each member State, on the right of every people to choose and develop freely their own social system and to promote their own progress in all fields without external interference. By virtue of this, Romania disagrees with any discussion of countries' social and political systems taking place in international bodies.

The report offers confused and mistaken arguments on the basis of which it reaches erroneous conclusions concerning human rights. It is suggested, for example, that there is separate development of the population of a different national extraction - a kind of segregation - at the workplace, in industry, in schools and in churches (pp. 51 and 67), an idea conflicting with all the relevant international rules and standards adopted by the United Nations and its specialised agencies. The report also criticises the fact that, as a consequence of industrialisation, persons of Romanian origin have settled in towns, and alleges that, as a result, the ethnic composition of towns have changed (p. 20). Despite the fact that urbanisation is an objective process occurring in all countries, based on labour force mobility and migration from rural to urban areas (where there are more jobs), such a process cannot be halted for considerations of ethnic or national origins, etc. Those who strenuously argue that the rights of man include the absolute right of the individual to move and to settle where he pleases are now astonished to find that persons of Romanian origin are settling in Romanian cities. According to that argument, Romanians do not have the same rights as others - including national minorities - precisely because they are Romanians. This is truly a racist discriminatory attitude, upheld by self-styled "promoters of human rights".

In the same context, the report deliberately cites false information and source material from persons who do not and cannot know the actual situation in Romania. For example, the document disregards the official data of the 1977 population census, as well as predominant demographic trends, which clearly show that because of the lower birth rate in the districts having a part of the population of another national origin, their natural demographic growth rate is below the average of the other districts. In addition, the source of the data - including data concerning neighbouring countries - given in the report is wrong (pp. 12 and 15). The provisions of certain Romanian laws are misleadingly cited, in a partial or fragmentary fashion, in order to cause the readers to draw false conclusions suggesting evidence of discrimination. Besides, all the references to alleged "violations of human rights" are devoid of any foundation and are a distortion of the real situation in Romania. The authors themselves acknowledge that they have used the mass media, press releases, Hungarian studies and analyses (p. 3), hearings before the United States Congress (p. 43), and other sources that have no direct or trustworthy knowledge of Romanian conditions.

To sum up, according to the Government, this so-called communication is based on purely political considerations; its fundamental purpose is to challenge the political and territorial reality of Europe and its approach to certain ideological questions. The principal concern of the material which has been distributed is clearly not with problems of employment: the motives behind it are quite different. In conformity with its Constitution and its objectives, the ILO should concentrate on continuing the improvement of conditions of work and standards of living of workers throughout the world. The ILO should also intensify international co-operation in dealing with the many problems which hamper the realisation of fundamental human rights - the right to work, the right to vocational training, the right to social insurance, etc. Accordingly, it is not the ILO's function to concern itself with political, territorial or ideological problems, nor is it its function to sponsor the dissemination of documents that question the history and existence of peoples or existing national frontiers, that contains allegations offensive to countries and their rulers, or that give substance to racist or segregationist in complete conflict with the standards and rules laid down within the ILO and the United Nations, or that deal with questions other than those relating to employment. The document contains statements that are inconsistent with real conditions in Romania in areas not covered by the ILO Conventions and that are unrelated to labour problems. Some of these statements are reproduced verbatim, and without distinction, in the Committee of Experts' report submitted to the present Conference.

Moreover, the Government supplies the following:

The right to work: The Constitution of the Republic reads as follows:

Article 17 - The citizens of the Socialist Republic of Romania, regardless of their nationality, race, sex or religion, enjoy equal rights in all areas of economic, political, legal, social and cultural life. The State guarantees the equality of citizens before the law. No restriction of these rights and no difference in their exercise on the grounds of nationality, race, sex or religion are permitted. Any expression aiming to establish such restrictions, nationalist-chauvinist propaganda, or incitement to racial or national hatred are punished by the law.

Article 18 - In the Socialist Republic of Romania, the citizens have the right to work. Each citizen is given the possibility to carry on, according to his training, an activity in the economic, administrative, social or cultural field and remunerated according to its quantity and quality. For equal work there is equal pay.

The Labour Code reads as follows:

Article 2 - The right to work is guaranteed to all citizens of the Socialist Republic of Romania without restriction or distinction of sex, nationality, race or religion. They have the opportunity to take up employment in economic, technical, scientific, social or cultural areas according to their talent, training and personal preference, in accordance with the needs of society as a whole.

Article 3 - The assignment, and the total and rational utilisation, of human resources are carried out in accordance with the objectives of the economic and social development plan of the country, with the need for continual improvement in the economic and social efficiency of work, and with the need for a harmonious and balanced development in all the departments of the country.

The concrete results of the steadfast application of these provisions has been the creation, between 1965 and 1988, of over 3½ million new jobs throughout the country, which has led to an 82 per cent increase in the number of wage-earners and to an increase in their numbers to 51 per cent per 1,000 inhabitants. The greatest benefit from these new jobs has been felt in the less-developed areas, which include some where a large percentage of the population is of Hungarian origin. The number of wage earners per 1,000 inhabitants has thus increased, over this period, by 178 per cent in the Salaj county, by 89 per cent in the Covasna county, by 85 per cent in the Satu Mare county, by 60 per cent in Bihor, and by 54 per cent in the Muresh county.

Teaching and professional training: The Constitution contains the following provision:

Article 21 - The citizens of the Socialist Republic of Romania have the right to education. The right to education is ensured by compulsory education, by the fact that education at all levels is free and by the system of state scholarships.

The Law on Education and Teaching (No. 23/1978) reads as follows:

Article 2 - The citizens of the Socialist Republic of Romania have the right to education regardless of nationality, race, sex or religion, and without any restriction which might amount to discrimination.

Every citizen is guaranteed access to all levels and forms of education in accordance with the country's need for economic and social development, in accordance with his own wishes and talents.

Article 4 - Cohabiting nationalities are guaranteed the free use of the mother tongue in education at all levels, and the study of and deeper acquaintance with the mother tongue of each nationality.

Article 105 – Young persons of cohabiting nationalities are guaranteed equal opportunity to receive education of all types and to be assigned to jobs of all types in accordance with the needs of the economy and of society, according to their education and talents.

Article 106 – In the territorial administrative units where part of the population is of non-Romanian nationality, teaching units, sections, classes or groups are organised in accordance with the overall structural norms, where teaching is carried out in the languages of the nationalities concerned. In trade training schools, schools for foremen, teaching can also be carried out in the languages of the cohabiting nationalities.

Article 107 – In order to permit their active participation in all the political, economic, social and cultural life of the country, young persons of cohabiting nationalities are guaranteed the necessary conditions for learning Romanian. With this aim, Romanian is studied in primary and secondary schools of the cohabiting nationalities, and certain subjects on the teaching syllabus can be taught in Romanian.

Article 108 – Parents or young persons who belong to one of the cohabiting nationalities can choose to be registered in a school where the language is either that of the nationality in question or Romanian. Young persons of cohabiting nationality who attend Romanian-language schools are guaranteed the right, on request to study their national language as a school subject in accordance with the law.

Article 109 – In competitive examinations organised in accordance with the law, candidates who are members of cohabiting nationalities have the right to take the examination in their national language in the subjects which they have studied in that language.

Article 110 – The Minister of Education and Teaching guarantees the training and inservice training of teaching staff, and the provision of textbooks and other necessary teaching material.

In teaching establishments where the language is that of the cohabiting nationality, textbooks in that language are also guaranteed for subjects taught in Romanian.

Following the application of these provisions of the Constitution, the state of teaching in the languages of the cohabiting nationalities in Romania in the school year 1987-88 was as follows:

- Out of a total of 28,297 kindergartens, primary schools, secondary schools and universities, in 2,815 (9.94 per cent of the total), teaching is given in the mother tongue of pupils of a nationality other than Romanian;
- Out of a total school population of 5,535,306 (pre-school children, schoolchildren and students), 457,125 (8.25 per cent) are of another nationality. Of these, 295,448 (64.63 per cent) opted for instruction in the mother tongue. The others (35.37 per cent), who opted for learning Romanian, continue to study the mother tongue also;
- Out of the 295,448 pre-schoolchildren and schoolchildren of other nationalities who also learn in their own mother tongue, 58,878 are at the kindergarten, 193,241 at primary school and secondary school and 42,530 at grammar school.

In order to give schoolchildren of other nationalities the opportunity to learn in their mother tongue, there are, in rural areas where there is a non-Romanian population smaller in number, 50 schools containing classes (I-IV) and 308 secondary-school classes (V-VIII), which operate with a number of children which is lower than the minimum laid down for all schools in the country.

The training of teachers and kindergarten teachers (classes I-IV) who teach in the mother tongues of the cohabiting nationalities is carried out in the teacher-training colleges of Oradea, Odorheiu Secuiesc and Sibiu, where 399 students were studying during the school year 1987-88, representing 8.22 per cent of all students in teacher-training colleges in Romania.

- Out of a total of 149,979 Romanian students, 9,557 (6.38 per cent) are Romanian citizens of other nationalities. The language departments in the country (the universities of Bucharest, Cluj and Iassy) train teachers of the Hungarian language for grammar school.
- Out of a total of 218,320 teachers, primary-schoolteachers, professors and members of university teaching bodies, 18,615 (8.52 per cent) are Romanian citizens of other nationalities.
- Out of a total of 1,105 textbook titles for pre-university teaching, 297 (26.9 per cent) are published in the languages of citizens of other nationalities.

In Harghita, for example, out of a total of 93,000 schoolchildren, 64,000 (69 per cent of the total) attained Hungarian-language units and classes, while out of a total of 3,870 teaching institutions, 3,120 (81 per cent) are of Hungarian nationality.

The school network, the size of the teaching body and the number of text-books in languages of cohabiting nationalities are determined by concrete needs, such as the number of children in the locality where the schools are situated and the programmes of respective schools, taking into account the needs of modern education and, in particular, of technical and mathematical education.

In certain localities where universities and schools are merged, Romanian language sections have been established in schools where the language of instruction was Hungarian and vice versa. This is due to the changes which have occurred in the population structure of the respective locality and to the need to adapt schools to demographic change; these changes have not, however, affected the exercise of the right to study in the mother tongue in the section concerned.

In sections taught in a mother tongue other than Romanian (the official language of the country) Romanian is also studied, as has been pointed out previously. This enables persons of another nationality to be able to continue their studies in any cultural centre of the country, including those where the teaching language is Romanian. Thus, those concerned are able to occupy any public office or job in any area of the country, with full access to political, social and economic life. Education for persons of another nationality is an integral part of the national educational system; it is closely linked the economic and social development plans of the country and corresponds to the requirements of these plans. In this way, all citizens are assured at the conclusion of their education of a job appropriate to their training and to the qualifications they have achieved without discrimination based on sex, nationality or otherwise.

In the Ministry of Education and Instruction, a section deals with instruction in the languages of the cohabiting nationalities and, at the Directorate level of the Ministry there is a Secretary of State who comes from a cohabiting nationality. Every young person who completes a form of education is assured a job commensurate with his vocational training. Education at all levels is free. The large majority of those who pursue a form of education terminating in a trade or professional degree receive scholarships during the period of study and must work two to three years in the job to which they have been assigned. In the majority of cases, it is actually stipulated in the contract which the young person or, in the case of minors, his parents have concluded with the educational institution at the outset of their studies.

The assignment to jobs of young graduates of universities or equivalent institutions is regulated in general terms by the Decree of the Council of State No. 54/1975 which provides:

Article 1 – In conformity with the provisions of the Constitution concerning the right to work of citizens of the Socialist Republic of Romania, the State shall ensure jobs for graduates of institutions of higher education in accordance with the training acquired.

Article 2 – The establishment of jobs for the employment of graduates in carried out in accordance with the aims of economic and social development and harmonious distribution of the forces of production throughout the country. Priority shall be given to meeting the need for specialists highly trained in rapidly developing branches and the need of those socialist units, departments and zones which are deficient in particular types of specialists.

Article 4 – The assignment of graduates is based on results obtained in studies, taking into account certain criteria of a social nature, in accordance with the requirements of this decree.

The graduate's own choice of unit and appointment is made based on the marks obtained at the end of the study period, with reference to the regulations concerning the exercise of functions in the branch or area of activity to which the socialist unit belongs, as follows:

- (a) persons at the head of the class, according to their subject, may choose, in the order of their marks, any appointment from among those which have been made available to the class;
- (b) graduates who ask to be assigned to municipalities in which they, their parents or spouses are resident, or in adjoining municipalities, have first choice, regardless of marks obtained;
- (c) graduates who ask to be assigned to workers' centres and towns where they or their parents or spouses are domiciled, with the exception of large towns as established by law, and who, during their studies, have obtained an average mark of at least 7, are given priority in taking up appointments in these areas or in adjoining municipalities;
- (d) graduates who are domiciled in large towns as established by law, and who, during their studies, have obtained an average mark of at least 8 points, may, within the order of their marks, take up 70 per cent of the total number of appointments made available for assignment in these areas;

- (e) the remaining appointments available are taken up by graduates in the order of the marks obtained, without regard to their place of residence.

Where marks are equal, the first choice of area is given to married graduates. If there are several married graduates, those who have children are to be assigned first, followed by those whose spouse is already employed in a socialist unit in the area concerned. Where married graduates are members of the same class and have studied the same subject, the assignment of both is made by taking into account the higher average mark of the two persons. The assignment of married graduates to the same area or to adjoining areas is to be taken into account. Persons who have completed a course of higher education but have not graduated after the final examination, are assigned to production, in conformity with the provisions of the preceding paragraphs, after the assignment of the graduates.

Article 6 – The organisation of graduate assignment is carried out by the Governmental Commission for Co-ordination of Graduate Assignment in Production Sectors. This Commission is specified in the decree of the Council of Ministers and is made up of the Minister of Education and Instruction as President, representatives of the State Planning Committee, the Ministry of Labour, the Council of the Union of Romanian Student Associations, and of ministries and other central co-ordinating organs according to branch.

The Commission has the following responsibilities:

- (a) analyse the cadre needs of branches, ministries and departments and to submit to the Council of Ministers the projected annual plan for the numerical assignment of graduates, prepared by the State Planning Committee in collaboration with the Ministry of Labour and Ministry of Education and Instruction, on the basis of suggestions offered by the Ministries, other central organs and organisations, and by the Executive Committees of People's District Councils and of the municipality of Bucharest;
- (b) check that appointments guaranteed to graduates are appropriate to training obtained during their studies;
- (c) at the instance of the Ministry of Education and Instruction, the individual assignment of graduates to production;
- (d) inform the Council of Ministers on the finalising of the plan of assignment;
- (e) make suggestions for the improvement of legislation concerning assignment of graduates to production.

Article 7 – For individual assignment to production of graduates of institutes of higher education, commissions are set up by specialised areas, to examine and present to the government commission lists of appointments by units intended for the assignment of graduates, and to effect the individual assignment of graduates to production posts.

Article 13 – The ministries, other central organs, Executive Committees of Departmental People's Councils and of the municipality of Bucharest, together with the socialist units control the way in which assigned graduates are integrated within the work collective of socialist units to which they have been assigned and carry out the tasks arising from the job to which they have been appointed. They also control the other duties of assigned graduates which arise under employment contracts, internal regulations and labour law; guarantee suitable housing for those graduates who have been assigned to an area other than that which was their home; and pay to assigned graduates the costs of settling in, removal costs and other expenses laid down by law.

Article 14 – Graduates assigned under the terms of the present Decree can take advantage of all the rights recognised by labour law applying to members of labour collectives of the socialist units to which they have been assigned: they receive payment during the training period in accordance with the salary scales laid down by law; they carry out all the tasks arising from the office or appointment they hold and are responsible to the labour collective and the management of the unit for their execution; they have to respect socialist rules of conduct in relations to other members of the labour collective, and to contribute to strengthening of the spirit of collaboration among colleagues; they have to continually improve their professional qualifications, the level of their technical and scientific knowledge and general culture by attending in-service courses organised or recommended by the unit and to obtain certificates at the end of such courses.

Graduates assigned to a municipality other than the one in which they shall receive on appointment a settling-in grant equal to the salary laid down for the first year of work in the appointment. Graduates who do not receive settling-in grants shall receive from the socialist unit to which they have been assigned, on their appointment and on request, half of their salary as an "advance", on condition that it be repaid in six monthly instalments beginning from the second month of appointment. The settling-in grant or the advance of salary is granted on condition that the graduate established residence in the vicinity of the socialist unit to which he has been assigned.

Graduates who, at the time of their assignment, reside in an area other than that of the socialist unit to which they have been assigned shall receive, on appointment, the costs of removal to their place of appointment for themselves, their family and households. "Families" in this sense are husband or wife, children and relations for whom the graduate is responsible.

Graduates who appear, for assignment to production, before a commission operating in an area other than that in which the institute of higher education at which they have completed their studies is located, shall receive from the institution the cost of transport to the location of the commission and after assignment, to their place of residence.

The criteria for assignment and the rights which all graduates in higher education enjoy entail no discrimination. It is of course possible, in view of the number of appointments available in different areas and departments, that in recent years a number of young persons have been assigned to areas other than their own. This results from the absolute need to offer to each person a job in his own specialisation and at the same time from the needs of the whole country for economic and social development.

In conclusion, allegations that assignments to jobs are used to remove from their native place the intellectuals of the national minorities has no relation to the real situation in Romania. Similarly, the allegations that Romanians are granted economic advantages in order to settle in areas where the majority of populations is of Hungarian nationality is false, as is the allegation that jobs are created or suppressed in accordance with criteria of nationality, or that there is a numerous clausus in employment or "towns which are out of bounds for persons of Hungarian nationality."

The authors of the document even go as far as to attribute a discriminatory purpose to the policy of housing construction in all areas of the country and to that of priority economic development of backward areas, regardless of the nationality of the population concerned (p. 22). This shows obvious bad faith and a tendency to distort the present distort the present the state of affairs in Romania.

In fact, in the economic, social and cultural units of Romania, citizens of Romanian, Hungarian, German or other nationalities work together without any kind of discrimination or difference. In many cases citizens of Hungarian nationality perform managerial functions, in accordance with their professional qualifications and capabilities.

The allegation of unemployment in Romania, as well as the figures presented in its support, are the products of imagination and bad faith. There is no unemployment in Romania. The right to work, laid down in the country's Constitution, is clearly accompanied by legal, economic and social guarantees, such as: the guarantee of professional education, of adequate payment, of stable employment, of safe and healthy working conditions, of the right to rest, medical care, and certain social insurance rights. The legal guarantees consist also in a strict regulation of cases where the employer can cancel the worker's employment contract, in the setting-up of a multilateral administrative, legal and civil supervision, and in the development of labour relations. The right to work has developed within the context of total freedom to work. The basis for the guarantee of the right to work and for the full employment of the workforce is permitted by the constant development of the economic and social potential of the country, and by the creation each year of new jobs. The planned character of rapid development of the national economy has and does allow for forecasting of the needs of the country in terms of its workforce.

The industrialisation of the country and the rapid development of all sectors of the national economy on this basis have laid the foundations for full employment. Industrialisation has given impetus to the development and more rational assignment of manpower throughout the country, and to the development of all sectors of the national economy, thereby creating conditions conducive to a steady increase in the number of job opportunities and to full employment. As a result, the number of people employed had increased to 10.7 million by the end of 1987, or 11.6 million if young people fit for work (pupils and students) are included in that category, i.e. approximately 90 per cent of the total workforce, which is one of the world's highest rates of employment. Indeed, whereas the population grew by 20.7 per cent between 1965 and 1988, the number of jobs increased by 82.2 per cent. It is worth noting that the vast majority of the new jobs were created in the non-agricultural sectors and especially in industry in urban areas, thereby causing a considerable influx of rural population into the towns. From 1950 to 1985 the number of salaried workers increased by more than 5.6 million (over 3.6-fold), while the number of farmers declined by more than 3.5 million (58 per cent). As a result, the proportion of salaried workers in the total workforce employed increased from 25 per cent in 1950 to more than 72 per cent in 1985, while the proportion of farmers declined from 72 per cent to approximately 24 per cent over the same period. Accordingly, the proportion of rural population declined from 76.6 per cent in 1948 to 45 per cent in 1987 in favour of the urban population, which had increased to 54.3 per cent of the total population by 1987.

Throughout that period, and particularly after 1965, all the geographic zones and settlements of the country underwent sustained and balanced social and economic development benefiting all inhabitants, irrespective of nationality. Moreover, counties with a higher density of citizens of a distinct nationality, which lagged behind other counties, were granted more investment funds and subsequently achieved higher growth rates in terms of industrial production and job-creation.

Growth, by 1985, as a percentage of 1965 levels

	Investment	Industrial production	New jobs
Country total	457	616	178
Bistrita-Nasaud County	1 200	1 500	260
Covasna County	1 200	913	237
Harghita County	530	685	198
Satu Mare County	732	789	206
Salaj County	972	2 200	271

On that basis, all the citizens of the country, irrespective of nationality, are guaranteed the full enjoyment of their economic and social rights, including the right to work, in their native region through assurance of a job suited to their qualifications, equal remuneration for work of equal value, the right to rest and to social insurance, the right to a satisfactory standard of living, including health, clothing and housing, the right to education, the protection of families, mothers and children, etc.

These developments triggered, and sustain today, a process of urbanisation and changes in the settlements of the country, a process of demographic concentration in towns and the establishment of new urban settlements. This called for the attainment of higher standards in occupational skill, education, training and culture. The objective constantly pursued, both in the past and at present, throughout these various trends and changes, which stem from the necessary process of development, is to provide all citizens with full equality of rights in the effective enjoyment of human rights and freedoms and the elimination of all forms of discrimination. Also within the framework of that process, all citizens have been guaranteed complete freedom of movement and the right to settle anywhere within the national territory without discrimination whatsoever. Certain regulations aimed at limiting the number of people settling in large towns, especially in the capital, apply equally to all the citizens of the country, without discrimination on grounds of nationality.

Considering that all Romanian citizens, irrespective of their nationality, are the architects and beneficiaries of the economic and social development process, these changes relate to the entire population of the country and extend without discrimination to all the citizens in every area, with respect, of course, for equal rights and their rights and fundamental freedoms.

In Romania, no discrimination whatsoever is tolerated or practised in respect of remuneration. The references of the report in question, concerning the new legislation on the remuneration of labour, and the allegations of discrimination in the granting of certain bonuses are a reflection either of bad faith or of ignorance of the legislation in force and the manner in which it is applied. The new legislation referred to, particularly Act No. 1/1986, concerning remuneration by general agreement and in direct agreement with workers, contains the following provisions with respect to bonuses:

- (a) Article 8, paragraph 4 – Bonuses and other incentives are provided in accordance with the law for savings achieved in respect of raw materials, fuel and energy.

This matter is regulated by the Act on remuneration according to the quantity and quality of labour, No. 57/1974, Article 63, paragraph 1 of which stipulates that: "Personnel may be granted bonuses during the year for achieving savings on the consumption quotas set in respect of raw materials, equipment, fuel and energy. The amount of such bonuses may be as much as 30 per cent of the value of the savings achieved. In respect of certain important materials or materials in short supply, the bonus may amount to 50 per cent of the value of the savings achieved."

- (b) Article 44, paragraph 1 – The managerial staff of economic units producing goods for export, certain industrial workshops, ministries and other central bodies and people's councils, the heads of the departments of production, planning, technical and equipment procurements and foreign trade with the operational systems of such units, and personnel with responsibility for export-oriented production and exports are paid a monthly bonus of 1.5 per cent of their remuneration for each percentage point in excess of the target set in the plan for export-oriented production and exports.

- (c) Article 46, paragraph 2 – Bonuses for producing in excess of production targets in respect of goods for export are paid out per person on the basis of standard remuneration and effective working time in the month in which the bonuses are granted. The monthly bonus paid to a person may amount to as much as 20 per cent of the standard remuneration corresponding to his effective working time.

The Government also points out that the remuneration of all workers in Romania is subject to very detailed statutory regulations, based on the constitutional principle of "equal remuneration for work of equal value", which precludes all forms of discrimination. The basic statutes regulating this matter are the Labour Code (Act No. 10, 23 November 1972), the Act on remuneration according to the quantity and quality of labour, No. 57, 29 October 1974, and Act No. 1/1986, concerning remuneration by general agreement and in direct agreement with workers.

In addition, a Government representative stated that his country's legislation guaranteed the right to work of all citizens without any discrimination. The Committee of Experts considered that article 17 of the Constitution of Romania, and article 2 of the Labour Code, were not in conformity with Article 1 of the present Convention because they omitted political opinion and social origin from the prohibited grounds of discrimination. This view was based on an incomplete reading of article 17 of the Constitution and of other legislation relating to employment. Quoting article 17 and 18 of the Constitution, already reproduced in the Government's written document, the speaker wondered where there could be political and social discrimination. Therefore, if the citizens of the country had equal rights in all the fields of economic, political, legal, social and cultural life, where could political and social discrimination be found? Furthermore, article 18 of the Constitution, which was the substantive provision about the right to work, clearly provided that every citizen should be afforded the opportunity to carry on an activity in any field in keeping with his training, and remunerated according to the quantity and quality of his work. The speaker conceded that article 2 of the Labour Code did not expressly refer to political opinions. However, it was equally true that in its contents and in other normative provisions on labour relations dealing in particular with hiring, promotion and termination of contracts there were no and there could not be references to political opinions as criteria for termination of contracts, in view of the constitutional provisions above-mentioned.

The speaker quoted the provisions of Romanian legislation in this matter:

Concerning hiring, he underlined that Section 2 of the Labour Code provides that: "Every citizen shall be afforded the opportunity to carry on an activity in any field, in keeping with his training, skills and aspirations, taking into account the needs of society". Section 1 of Act No. 12-1971 provides that: "Citizens can freely choose their employment; they will be hired according to their training and professional skills". Section 10 of the same Act also provides that: "Hiring in work units and distribution of work positions are made according to:

- level of studies and of professional training,
- training period, experience in the sector or the profession;
- results obtained at examination, competition or on-the-job training."

The law also stipulated that promotions could take place only on the basis of examinations or competitions to verify occupational aptitude or professional competence. In the case of a single candidate, the examination or competition was administered by the committee responsible for higher level staffing and promotions established in each unit, which served as a body of the workers' councils in which trade union representatives participated. For promotions to management positions, consideration was given, in addition to strictly occupational criteria, to the evaluation made by workers' collectives at the place of the candidate's employment. For certain management posts – director, deputy director, chief engineer, chief accountant, etc. – the approval of the workers' general assembly at the enterprise level was required. Reasons justifying termination of employment were set out in the Labour Code. None of these grounds supported the notion that termination could occur on the basis of political belief; in reality, it could occur only for serious breaches of certain service obligations stipulated in the labour contract itself. Thus, no labour contract had been terminated because of political opinion or social opinion and, consequently, there had been no court decision on the subject.

In the light of this information, it was necessary to consider the comments of the Committee of Experts regarding the engagement of workers in civil aviation and promotion to management functions in state socialist undertakings.

As regards the second part of the observation by the Committee of Experts, concerning national extraction, the Government referred to the information which it had supplied in writing. In this document, the Government had tried to provide clarification which it hoped would dispel misconceptions and misunderstandings based on incomplete information. These clarifications had been provided out of a spirit of co-operation and dialogue, and it was hoped that those who read the document in good faith should find the answers they were seeking.

The Employers' members said that the Committee of Experts had noted two sorts of problems. In the first place, there was discrimination in employment on the basis of political opinion and social origin. Reference was made to provisions which required civil aviation staff to have complete political obedience, and also to provisions making political outlook a decisive criterion for promotion in state enterprises. The second and major part of the observation by the Committee of Experts reflected world-wide concern at the operation of the Government's policy of "rural systematisation". This policy covered a range of different measures which entailed massive discrimination on the basis of national extraction, and which put minorities at a disadvantage in all spheres of life. There was forced resettlement and violations of the rights of minorities in relation to education, training and employment. All in all the Committee had referred to 15 areas of discrimination on grounds of national extraction. The Employers' members took particular exception to the fact that in the Hungarian-speaking regions very few teachers who were able to speak Hungarian were being recruited. Also, the numerus clausus was used to deny the minorities equal access to universities. On all these matters, the Experts had asked for a detailed answer from the Government. The reply of the Government had been lengthy, but not very satisfactory. Firstly, the Government had said that the observation of the Committee of Experts amounted to an interference in the internal affairs of the State. The present Committee was used to hearing this argument. Every State, by ratifying the present Convention, entered into an obligation to shape its law and practice in such a way as to conform to the requirements of the Convention, and to submit reports to the supervisory bodies. If a particular State did not want to do this, then it should not accede to the Organisation or ratify its Conventions. The Government had also referred to legislative and constitutional provisions which spelled out equal rights for all citizens. This sounded good, but the realities were very different. An explanation of this discrepancy was most clearly apparent from paragraph 2(g) of the observation of the Committee of Experts: in a politically unidimensional State there was no true division of powers. This had the consequence that legislative texts lost their value when the supreme political will set different objectives. The result then complied with the political will but not with the law. The Government had also said that the facts set out in the report were incorrect. This clearly suggested that there was a need to investigate the situation on the spot. This should be done as a matter of urgency. The present Committee should urge the Government to accept a mission, which could establish the facts on the spot, meet with all concerned and very rapidly draw up a report to the supervisory bodies for examination in 1990 at the latest. The present state of the affair gave rise to greatest concern with the situation in Romania, and they considered that this concern needed to be expressed with all clarity in this year's conclusions of the Committee.

The Workers' members recalled that the Convention which had been ratified by Romania required the Government to abolish, in law and in practice, all forms of discrimination – especially in relation to employment and occupation. This was one of the most substantial and most important of all of the Conventions which had been adopted by the ILO. They hoped that the Government representative was aware of what was said and shown in the world media in relation to the situation in his country. The world is informed, even if tomorrow a wall were to be built around the country. The explanations which had been given by the Government were almost the same as those it had given in relation to Convention No. 87. However, here the contradictions between the Convention and law and practice seemed to be even more serious. The Government referred to legislative texts and constitutional provisions relating to non-discrimination and protection of minorities. But there were countless cases of daily practice providing evidence which contradicted what the Government said. The Government had not given a substantiated answer to the specific comments of the Committee of the Committee of Experts. Instead, they had argued that what the United Nations Human Rights Commission had said was irrelevant, that the resolution on Romania was null and void and represented gross interference in the internal affairs of Romania. The Government had also expressed its concern at the tendency in certain circles to use the ILO in order to distort the situation in Romania and to spread insulting allegations. But the arguments relating to interference in internal affairs had already been dealt with in connection with other countries. If a member State ratified a Convention then it undertook to take measures to give effect to the obligations contained in that Convention. That was true for Romania in the same way as for any other country. The Government felt that the ILO might suffer a loss of credibility if it took these allegations seriously. On the contrary, the ILO would suffer a loss of credibility if it did not discuss the situation in Romania in relation to Convention No. 111.

The Workers' members noted a passage in the paper provided in writing by the Government to the effect that, in the process of rural systematisation, the interests of the community were more important than the rights of individuals. In fact, the process amounted to deportation of members of minorities, who were thus forced to give up agriculture and take up employment in industry and to forget all about their past. This policy was a flagrant violation of the Convention, which had been denounced by the Committee of Experts and by a range of other organisations, including the United Nations. All that the Government could say was that the charges were trumped up, and that the concerns of the ILO and the United Nations amounted to an interference in internal affairs. In the field of discrimination in occupation and training, the position of minority groups called for priority attention because these were the most vulnerable groups of individuals. In society the weakest needed to feel secure. Just the opposite happened in Romania. The Government must accept that the Committee was very concerned at the state of affairs. The same was true for world public opinion, the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, the Committee of Experts, the ILO and the various international trade union organisations. There needed to be clarity and real application. For clarity, on-the-spot visits by international commissions or experts needed to be accepted so that they could discuss with the authorities and the population and the report. The Workers' members were very concerned that there be a dialogue which permitted to establish the facts more clearly, so that appropriate action could at last be taken.

A Government member of Hungary welcomed the fact that the Committee was examining the question of discrimination against the Hungarian minority in Romania. He noted that other United Nations bodies and in particular those concerned with human rights had also been considering this issue for some time. The concerns of his Government in relation to this matter arose partly out of general humanitarian considerations, and partly out of a feeling of solidarity with Hungarians living in Romania who for historical, cultural and family reasons had multiple ties with Hungary.

He explained that the Hungarian minority in Romania comprised at least 2 million people, which made it the largest national minority in Europe. The Committee of Experts had shown an objective picture of the situation in which the minority lived. The Hungarian Government had asked the Romanian Government to engage in bilateral negotiation on this matter on a number of occasions, but the Government had not yet acceded to this request. He hoped that the Government of Romania would recognise the authority of the ILO bodies and would continuously supply the information requested by the ILO so as to achieve improvement in this serious matter. Finally, he wished to stress that in spite of the existing problems, Hungary wished to maintain good neighbourly relations with Romania, as had always been sought by the great minds of Hungary and Romania throughout their common history.

A Worker member of the United Kingdom believed that this was one of the worst cases with which the Committee had had to deal. It was certainly the worst on the present Convention. The observation of the Committee of Experts dealt with two issues: first, discrimination in employment on the basis of political opinion or social origin; and secondly, discrimination in employment, education and training on the basis of national extraction. The Committee of Experts had been commenting on the first of these issues for a number of years; he did not want to cover this vital area, although Romania's record of discrimination based on political opinion was notorious. He wished to concentrate on the second issue. In the written submission, the Government set some legal and allegedly factual arguments. At the legal level, the Government attacked the United Nations Human Rights Commission for interference in the country's internal affairs. That sort of argument was pursued by a country which had something to hide. Turning to the first part of this written submission, this was a document of unsound philosophy, intellectual sophistry and an unsustainable view of history. Paragraph 2(g) of the report of the Committee of Experts clearly showed why, under the present politico-legal system, the legal provisions referred to in the document could not protect minorities. On the factual level, the Government had said that the allegations communicated by Force Ouvrière were either irrelevant or untrue. In fact there had been no real attempt to refute these allegations. There was, moreover, a mass of evidence in support of them. This evidence showed, for example, that citizens were being forced to pull down their own homes and were then sent to sub-standard housing which was intended to glorify the leadership of the country rather than to provide decent housing for working people. Rural communities were being destroyed, as were rural traditions and cultures. Minorities' history was being expunged from the records. There was evidence that young people asking to emigrate were drafted in the army only to be sent to unhealthy forced labour camps. The speaker wished to see practical and immediate solutions to these problems. He did not want a list of laws which were of no practical effect. Nor did he want to hear arguments about national sovereignty. Romania could not lock itself from the world, nor hide from its international obligations; it could not hide from the obligation it had to its own citizens, regardless of their ethnic origins, as enshrined in this Convention. If the Government believed in the ILO and its objectivity, it should invite the ILO to send a fact-finding mission to the country in order to examine these issues at first hand, to dispose of what the Government insisted were lies, and to report to the supervisory bodies.

A Worker member of the United States recalled a resolution which had been adopted by the Executive Committee of the ICFTU in December 1988. This had expressed deep concern at the continued disregard of human rights in Romania. The ICFTU had been appalled by the immense social and cultural damage which was being caused by the agricultural systemisation plan – with the destruction of villages and their replacement with concentrated “agro-industrial” centres. According to the Government, urbanisation was consequence of industrialisation and was based on labour-force mobility. He considered that this programme was based not on “labour-force mobility” but on “forced-labour mobility”. Furthermore, it had a disproportionate impact on ethnic minorities. The ethnic communities of Romania were already being forcibly dispersed from their places of birth and assigned to jobs not of their choosing. Information from Romania indicated that relocations were being carried out abruptly, sometimes brutally, usually without prior notification and without villagers knowing where they were being sent.

Romania had ratified Convention No. 111 in 1973. It had laws which promised freedom from discrimination. All reliable evidence indicated that in reality there was massive discrimination, and that that discrimination took place on the basis of an official, albeit unwritten, policy of the Government. He listed a number of illustrations of the practical operation of this policy. These included: forced population transfers; restrictions upon Hungarian-language education; limitations on access to higher education and training; the banishment of the Hungarian language from public life; the liquidation of Hungarian cultural institutions; the harassment of Hungarian churches; and the break-up of families – for example through the so-called repatriation or distribution system, which included the forcible assignment of young persons to heavy and dangerous work in industries such as mining and construction, with work sites far from their homes registered in their personal identity papers, which, in turn, could prohibit them from ever again taking up residence in their places of birth.

He recognised that the purpose of the present Committee was to open and to maintain dialogue. However, he was pessimistic at the prospects of dialogue with a Government which demonstrated such scant respect for this institution, by submitting a reply to the Committee of Experts devoid of full and accurate information of the situation in Romania.

A Worker member of Hungary wished to add his voice to that of all those who expressed deep concern about the situation.

He noted that about 300 persons from Romania arrived weekly in Hungary with a view to settling down and finding employment there. Altogether 17,000 of them had been officially registered. Most of them turned to local trade union organisations, asking for assistance. The reports they gave to local trade union officials fully confirmed what could be read on pages 397 to 402 in the report of the Committee of Experts.

A Worker member of France recalled that his organisation (Force ouvrière) had presented to the Committee of Experts the dossier on the situation of the Hungarian minority in Romania. He had followed with interest what the Government representative had said about the legal protection against discrimination which existed in his country. But the distinguished representative could just as easily have gone on to say that the Government did not have much respect for either the law or for the present Convention.

If the allegations represented by his organisation were false then the Government should be able to demonstrate that that was the case. If they were true, then it would not be able to do so. It could not in fact do so, because this was an instance of a Government that imposed a dictatorship, and which systematically destroyed those parts of the country in which the minorities lived, in particular the Hungarian minority, by destroying villages, rebuilding shoddy structures in which the population was crammed without regard to their aspirations. It was undeniable that there was discrimination against young people belonging to ethnic minorities in relation to education, training and employment, and that they were often liable to be sent to what could be termed forced labour.

He wanted to know, as others had before him, whether the Government was ready to accept an ILO mission to establish the facts on the spot in Romania. He thought he knew the reply, and wished that the Committee would draw the most stringent conclusions in the circumstances.

An Employer member of Hungary welcomed the fact that the present Committee was dealing with the issue of discrimination in employment, among others, against the Hungarian national minority in Romania. In 1988, several thousands of people had escaped from Romania to Hungary. They confirmed the situation described in the report of the Committee of Experts. The mere fact that they wanted to leave, risking everything, including their lives, suggested that something was badly wrong in Romania. The influx of these refugees also caused considerable problems for the Hungarian authorities. Part of the blame for the current state of affairs had to be attributed to a previous Hungarian Government which had not been prepared to speak openly about the situation of the Hungarian minority in Romania. This had not been a good policy because the general situation worsened a lot instead of improving. Members of the minority were denied full access to education and training. This was illustrated by the fact that Hungarians constituted almost 8 per cent of the general population, but less than 3 per cent of the university population. It was also illustrated by the recent dismissal of a number of employees who occupied managerial positions at a chemical works because of their national extraction. Several other managers were forced to resign from their jobs because their relatives left Romania for Hungary. The speaker strongly hoped that the conclusions of the present Committee would contribute to the resolution of this serious problem.

A Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany noted that there had been many references to the problems confronted by the Hungarian minority in Romania. However, the Committee of Experts also mentioned other minorities in this country: Germans, South Slavs, Slovaks, Ukrainians, Jews and Gypsies. At the 45th Session of the United Nations Human Rights Commission, his Government had co-sponsored a resolution submitted by Sweden on this issue. This showed that his Government took this issue very seriously. This resolution expressed concern about the treatment of minorities in Romania and touched upon a number of other points which were of importance to the present Committee. He stressed that the treatment of minorities in Romania was contrary to the present Convention; there was discrimination in training and employment, inter alia, on the basis of national extraction.

He noted that the importance of dialogue in the present Committee had been mentioned several times. However, it was difficult to engage in meaningful dialogue if the Government took the view that the discussion constituted an impermissible interference in its domestic affairs.

Referring to the 1988 Report of the Director-General of the ILO, he stressed that human rights were inalienable, basic rights to be respected throughout the world independently of the social order established in any individual state. Human rights must therefore be made an issue wherever they are infringed. It was, therefore, not an interference in the internal affairs of other States but a matter of human solidarity.

He hoped the Government would engage in a meaningful dialogue by, inter alia, accepting an ILO mission.

A Worker member of Pakistan stated that the discussion had corroborated what had been reflected in the Committee of Experts' report in relation to the minority communities in Romania. The testimony of the refugees spoke for itself; he associated himself with those who had called for the elimination of this discrimination.

Another Government representative of Romania stated that the written information submitted by the Government must have been read in a desultory manner, because it contained information which clearly showed that his country was making serious attempts to implement the provisions of the present Convention. His country had done a number of positive things which had seldom been mentioned by others in the present Committee.

The speaker did not propose to read the written information in the present Committee, but he felt that he needed to expand on some of the details.

He referred to the fact that the Romanian history was that of a people which had established its unity, acquired its independence through its own endeavours. As his country approached the third millenium it hoped to do so among the ranks of developed countries. Forty-five years ago, when the country had been liberated, it was a predominantly agricultural society. The liberation had put an end to long periods of foreign domination which had resulted in a heavy drain on the resources of the country. Since that time the Government had made great efforts to extricate the country from its state of underdevelopment. Substantial progress had been made. There was a strong industrial sector and the agricultural sector was also highly developed. Many major development projects were under way or had recently been completed. During the last 20 years, approximately 3.4 million houses had been built with State funding, while hundreds of thousands of families had private houses built, both in the country and in the cities, with the result that more than 80 per cent of the country's population lived in new housing.

Turning to "rural systematisation", he explained that 20 years before the Government had begun to reorganise the administrative system. This had been done on the basis of treating towns and cities as the basic administrative units. This was not unique to his country - it had happened in many parts of Europe. At the end of the war, 80 per cent of the population had been rural and worked in agriculture. Now only 28 per cent were engaged in agriculture. The consequent influx to the towns meant that it was necessary to provide housing and other infrastructure. The Government was now trying to improve conditions in the rural areas. This included the construction of houses, schools, factories, cultural facilities and shops. The long-term objective was to improve conditions in the rural sector, not to destroy them. Turning to the nationality issue, the speaker noted that his country was a unitary state. The existence of nationalities was the result of an historical evolution. The Government which had been in power after 1948 had worked to guarantee equal rights to all citizens by suppressing previous inequalities. The authorities also had made sure that the situation and circumstances - linked to Hitlerism - which prevailed in Europe immediately after 1944 had no consequences for Romanian citizens of German and other nationalities. According to the 1977 enumeration, the population structure was as follows:

- Romanians	89.1%
- Hungarians	7.7%
- Germans	1.5%
- Others (Serbs, Jews, Ukrainians, Tartars, Russians, Bulgarians)	1.7%

The last statistical data showed that Romanians represented 91 per cent of the whole population.

Romania had established a single legislative and legal system for the whole population, had only one category of central and local organs - of power and justice. This made Romania different from multi-national States which had official bodies both at the level of Federation and Republic, having distinct attributions and structure, as mentioned in the Constitution.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution and Romanian laws, Romanian citizens had equal rights in all fields of economic, political, legal, social and cultural life, without distinction based on nationality, race, sex or religion.

Any demonstration prejudicing fundamental rights and obligations by reason of nationality, race, sex or religion, as well as nationalistic and chauvinistic propaganda with a view to fomenting racial or national hatred were severely punished by the legislation.

The speaker illustrated this by reference to the parliamentary representation of the various racial groups, which mostly mirrored their representation in the population as a whole. He said that there was full freedom to use the mother tongue in education. The same principle applied to cultural and artistic institutions. There were several publishing houses for books and periodicals in the minority languages, and also a number of cultural institutions which catered specifically for the interests of the minorities.

Another Government representative of Romania stated that he was engaging in the same exercise as the one in which he had participated at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights, that is, a hostile and defamatory campaign directed against both the foundations of the socialist regime in Romania and the territorial situation in this part of Europe. Delegates from France, the United Kingdom and Hungary had supported their theses by invoking abundant testimony and images carried by the media of these countries, but this was really an inadmissible manipulation of words and images. They are manipulated and even fabricated to serve the objectives of the anti-communist and revisionist campaign organised against Romania. With regard to the allegation of cultural genocide, genocide by some countries represented at this Committee, perpetrated against the peoples of Africa and Asia who had, in some cases, lost their language and their culture, should rather be recalled. It was significant that the representatives of Hungary to this Committee - Government, Employers and Workers - had welcomed the report and the statements that had been made. There was no reason to be surprised at this because the anti-socialist, anti-Romanian, nationalist and revisionist manifestations in Budapest continued and had been the same for some time now. Such an action turned into a fascist demonstration.

The Government member of Hungary stated that he could not accept his country being offended. He asked the Chairman to tell the Government representative of Romania to speak about the observance of Convention No. 111 in Romania.

The Chairman of the Committee stated that this expressed the will of the Committee.

The Government representative of Romania considered that protection of minorities had always served as a pretext, even before the war, for the Hungarian revisionist circles. He noted that it was now the Government, the employers and the workers of Hungary who made themselves the promoters of revisionism. Some representatives of western governments, employers and workers had joined in the hostile campaign directed against his country on the subject of minorities. According to the speaker, the representative of France had forgotten that in that country the very notion of minority did not exist and that, for example, the blood had not stopped flowing in the overseas departments and territories.

A Worker member of France stated that the responsibility of the Government of France was one thing, but questions had been posed on the problems concerning the situation of workers in a given country - workers who had been harassed and were the object of discrimination - and as of now, nothing had demonstrated the contrary.

The Government representative of Romania concluded his statement by saying that if there was a problem of minorities, it was not in Romania but in Budapest. This city was the base of the "Hungarian Democratic Forum" which had produced the "report" taken up by "Force ouvrière". The Hungarians of Romania enjoyed the same rights as and full equality as citizens of Romanian origin. This problem concerning minorities had, therefore, been completely fabricated. The speaker rejected the allegations which were based on manipulative media images and abuses of language. With regard to the dialogue between the deaf which had been alluded to, the speaker stated that his Government had on many occasions - among them before the Committee on Human Rights - made varied declarations citing numerous facts, figures and arguments to show the actual situation in his country in various spheres, but they had not been taken into account. Therefore, there was in fact a dialogue between the deaf which would continue as long as the hostile campaign orchestrated against his country lasted. The speaker repeated that the resolution adopted by the Committee on Human Rights and initiated by Sweden was null and void. The Romanian delegation strongly rejected the allegations based on distorted views of realities and the defamation of the political and factual situation in Romania contained in the document of the "Hungarian Democratic Forum", and denounced its nationalistic, chauvinistic, irredentist and revisionist character. The delegation rejected categorically any interpretation pointing to an alleged violation of the present Convention. Moreover, no question of a mission of inquiry on the spot in Romania, which had no reason to take place.

A Government member of the Ukrainian SSR, speaking also on behalf of the Government members of the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR, stated that they would not take part in any decision taken on this case by the present Committee.

A Government member of Hungary stated, in connection with the declaration of the Government representative of Romania, that in recent times relations between Romania and Hungary had developed in such a manner that it was no longer unusual to hear such speeches in which the tone and content had nothing to do with the facts.

A Worker member of the USSR, speaking as well on behalf of the Workers' members of the Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR, stated that they could not take part in the taking of a decision on this case.

A Employer member of the USSR wished to associate himself with the other members of the present Committee who had indicated that they would not participate in the taking of a decision on this question.

A Government member of the German Democratic Republic declared that, in spite of all the difficulties that had been mentioned, he thought that the reasonable solution to the problem lay in a dialogue. Therefore his delegation would not take part in a vote on this case.

The Employers' members, referring to the statements of the two Government representatives of Romania who had spoken most recently, said that even though long, irrelevant statements were not unusual in the present Committee, some of the statements made by the Government representatives in this case had been utterly inappropriate. The impression had been given that the Committee was to be exposed to ridicule, and they took it as an affront to the Committee to have put the systematic violation of the rights of ethnic minorities on an equal footing with conferences and symposia on urban and rural planning. The Government had, in their view, mentioned in a somewhat threatening manner, that there were statements by other European bodies that saw things quite differently. They wished to refer the Government to statements made by the European Parliament, which had confirmed the very bad situation in Romania and had set forth additional facts on the matter.

The Employers' members regretted the Government's rejection of the idea of a mission that would have clarified the facts on the spot; that rejection had only confirmed the impression that Romania had a great deal to conceal. They asked that, none the less, the request for a mission, presented by many members, be included in the present Committee's conclusions.

The Committee took note of the information provided orally and in writing by the Government, as well as of the discussion in the Committee. The Committee noted with great concern, that in their comments, the Committee of Experts had noted the persistence of serious divergencies between the law and practice on the one hand and the provisions of the Convention, particularly concerning political opinion and social origin. The Committee also noted the allegations and information which gave rise to concern about the situation regarding national origin. The Committee expressed its firm hope that the Government would, in the very near future, take all the measures necessary to ensure full observance of the Convention and that these measures would take due account of the Committee of Experts' observations. The Committee requested the Government to receive a study mission to establish the facts and to report to the Committee of Experts. The Committee also requested the Government to provide to the Committee of Experts the detailed information it requested. The Committee fervently hoped to be able to see real and notable progress in the near future on the application of the Convention in law and practice.

On the proposal of the Workers' and Employers' members, the Committee decided to include the case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representative of Romania wished to state first that the Romanian delegation had come before the Committee in a spirit of constructive dialogue in order to set forth the actual conditions in his country. Secondly, the terms and descriptions used by several members in relation to Romania had been totally unacceptable. Thirdly, the conclusions, and especially the proposal of a special paragraph, were also unacceptable; the speaker rejected these decisions along with his rejection of the idea of an inquiry and of a review which was proposed in this case, which is totally unjustified. Romania was an independent, sovereign country which always welcomed persons of good will and good faith, but it did not accept any review or inquiry on its territory.

Turkey (ratification : 1967). A Government representative stated, first, that Martial Law No. 1402 was enacted to govern certain cases under exceptional circumstances only; secondly, that martial law was not in force in any part of Turkey since 19 July 1987 and, thirdly, that the Government had committed itself to removing some of the shortcomings of this Law and had in fact recently introduced a Bill to the Parliament. This Bill, which was presently debated at the Parliament, aimed at improving some of the provisions of existing legislation, particularly by restricting certain aspects of the powers of the martial laws commanders.

The Government would be happy to supply to the Committee of Experts the final version of this Bill at the time of its response to the Committee of Experts' report, as well as the texts of judgments concerning the reinstatement of persons dismissed under the provisions of Martial Law No. 1402. The Government was unable to discuss at this moment a text which was at the present undergoing legislative process but took note of the observations made by the Committee of Experts on this issue.

The Worker member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Finnish, Danish, Swedish and Norwegian national trade unions endorsed what had already been said by the Worker member of Turkey on Convention No. 98.

In the present case, the enforcement of the Martial Law and regulations had resulted, since the coup of September 1980, in the dismissing or transferring approximately 8,500 persons including university lecturers, school-teachers, civil servants, workers in public enterprises and public employees. The discrimination against civil servants and public employees still continued all over the country and the persons who had been considered undesirable were prohibited to undertake any job whatsoever in public service or state enterprises for the rest of their lives. These sanctions were not issued by the judiciary but through arbitrary administrative decisions.

The new Bill introduced in Parliament would restrict the powers of martial law commanders but the criteria on which dismissals or transfers could take place are still not strictly defined. The regulations for security investigations were still applied, without any judicial supervision, to collect information from public employees and civil servants about political opinions. This kind of intelligence service could not be justified in any State committed to the obligations established by the ILO Constitution and Convention No. 111.

The Finnish, Danish, Norwegian and Swedish trade unions urged the present Committee to appeal to the Government of Turkey to bring an end to all discrimination against civil servants and public employees by reason of their political opinions.

The Workers' members deplored the fact that, although martial law had been repealed on 15 July 1987, the situation remained the same as regards Convention No. 111. They recalled that during the state of emergency, certain exceptional disciplinary sanctions had been taken and noted, as did the Committee of Experts, that these are still applied. They noted that the draft legislation now should bring about certain improvements, even though the Turkish Confederation of Trade Unions (TURK-IS) and the Committee of Experts had certain doubts as to its contents but that, for the time being, the situation remained unchanged.

They recalled that they had already asked that the thousands of dismissed employees, who would forever be prohibited from working in the public service, be reinstated in their employment with compensation, after a fair trial. They also noted that, in spite of the repeated requests of the Committee of Experts, the Government still had not provided copies of any judgments. In the absence of information by the Government, it was necessary to refer to the information provided by the Turkish Confederation of Trade Unions and noted with regret that the Turkish Government did not apply Convention No. 111 which it had ratified.

The Workers members of Turkey stated that, as mentioned by the Committee of Experts, under Section 2 of Martial Law No. 1402, the competent authorities had to execute immediately every request of the martial law commanders to transfer or dismiss officials whose services were considered harmful for general security, law and order or public safety. The Turkish Government had been requested many times to take measures to repeal or amend these provisions so as to ensure that transfers or dismissals could only take place on the basis of clearly defined criteria; this case had also been the subject of a direct contacts mission, but to no avail. From September 1980 until the lifting of martial law, many people had been dismissed from public service in all the regions in Turkey through the implementation of the Act. In determining the element of harmfulness, various unreliable sources of information were used; security investigation reports of the National Intelligence Agency and of police, as well as informers and slanderers. This information was based on hearsay and biased political assessment. Furthermore, since it was considered confidential and not made available to the persons concerned, there were no means to correct or clarify them. The victims of this unacceptable practice had been 95 university lecturers, 2,515 school-teachers, 1,298 civil servants and 317 workers; some 4,000 of these were dismissed and about 4,509 public employees were transferred. Some of these had been reinstated but most had not. The Bill presented to Parliament was far from satisfactory since it retained the powers granted to martial law commanders, although it limited the duration of dismissal or transfer measures to the martial law period and provided that the persons concerned could apply for a re-investigation. Unfortunately, the Bill did not define or restrict the measures intended to ensure the security of the State, for instance by strictly defining the criteria on which dismissals and transfers could be based. This Bill, in fact, aimed at destroying all the positive results obtained through the courts. In addition, those who had been reinstated would not obtain a financial compensation for the wages or other benefits lost in the period during which they remained without employment. The Bill would not bring about progress nor solve the existing problems.

The speaker concluded his remarks by stating that although Turkey had ratified the European Social Charter, it had expressed reservations as to freedom of association and to the right to bargain collectively.

The Worker member of Spain stated that, since the Bill modifying the martial law maintained the powers granted to martial law commanders during the state of siege to ask the dismissal or transfer of public servants, it was impossible to note progress in the application of the Convention. The possibility of appealing to the courts or to other competent authorities or, as provided by the Bill, to ask a re-examination of the case, did not constitute a real guarantee since the public authorities would probably continue to apply the existing legislation of giving effect to Convention No. 111. Consequently, the legislation should absolutely be modified so that the military authorities would not continue to apply these provisions. He referred to the Resolution about union rights and their relation to the civil liberties adopted in 1970 by the Conference, among which are the rights established by Convention No. 111. The speaker emphasised that the only way to solve the problem of the dismissals and transfers of public servants would be to proclaim an amnesty, that is to reinstate all the persons concerned in the employment they had before their discriminatory dismissal or transfer, so that they could again enjoy all their rights.

The Employers' members pointed out that this case raised the issue of martial law, which was not directly within the ILO jurisdiction. They could only note the situation and the consequences of the state of emergency, while deploring that a country had to take such measures.

During the state of emergency, the martial law commanders had the right to dismiss or transfer public servants in so far as national security was threatened. The draft legislation presently being prepared should allow to reduce the period of application of dismissal measures; it should improve the situation since, according to the Committee of Experts, the alleged motives of dismissal were not always linked to the security of the country.

The Employers' members supported the Committee of Experts in requesting the Government to provide further information on this issue and on any amendments to martial law it would consider adopting. They noted the wish expressed by the Committee of Experts that dismissed public servants should enjoy the right to appeal and to ask the re-examination of their case. They could not understand the Government representative's statement that he was not able to provide the information requested on the Bill which had just been tabled in Parliament. They noted that in its last three reports, the Committee on Freedom of Association had pointed out that Turkey had always submitted the information requested. Once again, they trusted that the Government would act rapidly as soon as the circumstances would make it possible. They expressed the wish that the Committee's conclusions would reflect its hope that the consequences of the state of emergency would disappear and that the Turkish society would be freed from all political pressures.

The Government representative stated that the Government was requested to provide information and to take some legislative measures. Concerning the first request, the Government would provide information in the shortest time possible; as to the second one, the Government could not do anything more than drafting a Bill and submitting it to Parliament, which had been done in February 1989. The Bill had already gone through the Committee of National Defence and had yet to go through the Committees of Justice and Constitution, and then to the plenary session of Parliament. The Government clearly was not in a position to pass any judgment on this Bill at such premature a stage.

The Government representative concluded his remarks by stating that under article 125 of the Turkish Constitution, all Acts of the Government were open to judicial review. Moreover, the courts had decided to reinstate 3,406 persons out of 4,891, i.e. 70 per cent of all the persons in question here.

The Committee has taken note of the information given by the Government representative and the various opinions and comments expressed during the discussion. The Committee noted the conclusions of the Committee of Experts, according to which there subsisted both in law and practice profound divergencies concerning the full implementation of the Convention. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the contemplated revision of certain articles of Martial Law No. 1402 duly would take into account the observations of the ILO supervisory bodies and that the Government would continue its efforts so that measures to guarantee the security of the State be defined and restricted in such a fashion that they would no longer entail any discrimination based on political opinion. The Committee trusted that the Government would submit in the near future all the information requested to allow the Committee to verify whether the Convention was implemented and real progress accomplished.

On a proposal of the Workers' members, supported by the Employers' members, the Committee decided to mention this case in a special paragraph of its report.

The Government representative expressed his regret that the last conclusions of the present Committee with respect to Turkey were entirely disproportionate, compared to the conclusions reached by it concerning other countries. The conclusions concerning Turkey were not only disproportionate from the standpoint of the compatibility of national practices to ILO standards, but also unproductive in terms of serving the general goals of the present Committee. Furthermore, the Government did not agree with the points raised by the Workers' and Employers' delegates in placing Turkey in a special paragraph.

Convention No. 119: Guarding of Machinery, 1963

Central African Republic (ratification: 1963). See under Convention No 29, the written information sent by the Government.

In addition, a representative of the Central African Republic recalled, concerning the application of the Convention, that a draft Decree had been drawn up during direct contacts between the Central African Republic authorities and representatives of the office in 1980. This text, along with a number of others, had been submitted for examination to the Council of Ministers but, owing to political changes in the country, the text had been taken up anew and brought up to date before being submitted to the new constitutional procedure for the adoption of texts by the competent bodies, a rather lengthy procedure. The Government undertook to indicate, in its next report, the adoption of these texts, including the one concerning guarding of machinery.

The Government's next report would also take into account the observations of the Committee of Experts on the delay in providing reports. The Government was aware of the problem this posed and it shared the Committee of Experts' observations. It would do all it could to have report sent to the ILO so that the application of Conventions and Recommendations by his country could be evaluated and so that information on national practice could be provided.

The Employers' members recalled that this Convention provided for specific measures such as the definition of dangerous parts and dangerous machinery. The problem had been the object of Committee of Experts' comments for 12 years and had been discussed perhaps five times in the present Committee. Direct contacts had taken place in 1980 and during the mission, the appropriate draft legislation had been prepared. That draft was still lying dormant nine years later. The present Committee should express its concern about this extreme delay. The Government should be called upon to make special efforts to remedy the non-conformity of the legislation with the provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' members stressed the seriousness of the difficulties which existed in this case. The draft Decree drawn up with the assistance of the Office still remained only a draft nine years later. One had to be aware that this Convention was a very important technical Convention, involving the safety of workers. The Workers' members thus hoped and asked that the Decree be finally issued and that it enter into force before the next meeting of the Committee of Experts with a copy of the text being sent for examination by that Committee.

The Government representative stated that there had indeed been a delay in adopting the draft Decree, but that steps had already been taken in practice to ensure respect for protective standards, thanks to the action of labour inspectors who were responsible for ensuring the application of standards in relation to hygiene, safety protection and workers' health. An effort was being made in practice in regard to protection, and it would be strengthened by adoption of the draft Decree.

The Workers' members took note of the Government's willingness to ensure respect for the provisions contained in the draft Decree by means of labour inspection, but they stated that as long as there was no such decree or other legislation, it was not possible to impose any penalties.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted the persistence of serious divergencies between the law and practice on the one hand and the provisions of the Convention on the other hand. The Committee expressed the fervent hope that the legal provisions would be adopted in the near future, so that the Government would be able to report definite and substantive progress next year.

Convention No. 134: Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers), 1970

Nigeria (ratification: 1973). The Government has provided the following information:

The Government greatly regrets that it has not been able to supply copies, or relevant extracts, of reports of inquiry, or samples of statistics, in conformity with paragraphs 1 to 3 of Article 2 of the Convention. It also regrets that it has not been able to provide the other information requested by the Committee of Experts. The Government indicated that problems had been encountered in obtaining the relevant information and statistics. This is why the Government had not been able to furnish information in response to the previous comments of the Committee of Experts. The Federal Ministry which should provide the information required to supply a full reply to the comments of the Experts has not responded to repeated requests that it do so. More recently, the Ministry concerned has been more co-operative. Every effort will be made to provide the necessary information to the Committee of Experts before its meeting in March 1990.

In addition, a representative of the Government stated that his Government had not been able to supply copies or the relevant extracts of reports of inquiry, samples of statistics compiled in conformity with paragraphs 1-3 of the Convention, nor the other information requested by the Committee. The speaker explained that the Government was experiencing problems in getting the required information and statistics, which prevented it from supplying any information in reply to the previous comments of the Committee of Experts. The Federal Ministry of Transport which had the information required to enable the Government to submit a reply had not responded to the Government's incessant requests. He stated that every effort would be made to provide the necessary information to the Committee of Experts before its meeting in March 1990.

The Workers' members recalled that Nigeria had ratified this Convention 15 years ago but that the special regulations had not yet been adopted. The legislation mentioned by the Committee of Experts did not give effect to the Convention provisions. They welcomed the Government's commitment to provide information on these important matters in future, and urged it to fulfil its commitments.

The Employers' members stated that this was again a case which repeated itself: eight questions had been put to the Government on this Convention; during the past three years, the Committee of Experts had regularly made observations; and the Government had not sent any report during six consecutive years. The Convention concerns important issues for seafarers, since they concern their security and their protection against accidents. The Government should answer very rapidly.

The Workers' members stated that this question should be taken up next year in the present Committee since it received no answer this year; in addition, in 1990 the Committee will treat the General Survey on Conventions concerning seafarers.

The Government representative stated that he was now responsible for relations with the ILO and that he undertook to submit the requested reports and information in due course.

The Committee has taken note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted that the conclusions of the report of the Committee of Experts mentioned the persistence of divergences between the legislation and certain important provisions of the Convention. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in the near future take all necessary measures to put the legislation into conformity with the Convention and that it would send next year a report to the Committee of Experts for examination. The Committee hoped it would be able to note significant progress in the near future.

Convention No. 139: Occupational Cancer, 1974

Guinea (ratification: 1976). A Government representative stated that after the labour legislation had been revised, with the help of the technical services of the Office, many provisions had been substantially modified as regards hygiene and occupational safety and health in the workplace. ILO standards had often served as a source of inspiration, despite the fact that Conventions which had been ratified had not always been accompanied by legislative texts necessary for their implementation.

The present Convention was an example of such a ratified Convention. The new Labour Code, Ordinance No. 003/PRG/SGG/88 of 28 January 1988, provided for the adoption of legislation for the application of certain provisions relating to health and safety in the workplace. The drafting of such texts was achieved with the collaboration of the social partners, notably the trade unions. Progress was slow due to the lack of documents and there were plans to revise, inter alia, the list of occupational diseases and the definition of hazardous substances. He added that, for the first time, reliable information was available and the help of the Office was welcomed by all. His delegation's mandate was to contact the Office's technical services with a view to drawing up as quickly as possible an adequate legal framework for protection against occupational diseases and occupational cancer in particular. Comments made by the Committee of Experts would thus be followed up.

The Employers' members considered the information provided by the Government representative to be positive in that, 13 years after ratification of Convention No. 139, the main legislative provisions on occupational safety and health matters had been adopted. Nevertheless, the specific measures needed to ensure full conformity with the provisions of Convention No. 139 were still lacking. They viewed positively the fact that the Government was ready to request the assistance of the Office to ensure that the provisions adopted which deal with highly technical and complex questions enabled the provisions to be implemented correctly. They hoped that, with the help of the Office, the necessary first steps could be taken to implement protective measures against occupational diseases and occupational cancer.

The Workers' members drew attention to one very positive point, namely, that Guinea had ratified the present Convention just two years after its adoption. Nevertheless, they considered that progress was very slow on its implementation. Referring to the comments of the Committee of Experts in 1984, 1986 and 1989, they stressed the usefulness of the Office's help, since the new Labour Code was prepared with its assistance, but they noted that regulations were still lacking in the fields covered by the Convention. They felt that the technical assistance of the ILO should be requested as regards the development of regulations to implement the Convention's provisions requiring very specific technical measures which were difficult to define. They thought it was necessary to adopt appropriate laws and regulations with which effectively to combat the plague of occupational cancer and to guarantee conformity with the present Convention.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted, however, that the ordinances and the specific measures noted by the Committee of Experts were still not stated so as to bring law and practice into conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted, however, the wish expressed by the Government for assistance from the ILO in this field. The Committee therefore requested the Government to take all necessary steps for the ordinances and the application texts to be adopted so as to make it possible at an early date for the full application in law and in practice of the Convention in question to take effect. The Committee expressed the hope that concrete progress in this respect could be reported to it by the next meeting of the Committee of Experts and therefore to this Committee next year.

II. OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Territories

New Zealand (Niue Island). A Government representative referred to the concern expressed by the Committee of Experts concerning the Government's failure to fulfil its obligation to provide reports with respect to the Niue Island on Convention No. 105 concerning the Abolition of Forced Labour, 1957. As had been indicated at this Committee last year, the Government requested technical assistance from the regional office of the ILO in order to resolve the problems concerning the transmittal of reports. The regional office had agreed to arrange a visit to the Island to provide such assistance. Unfortunately, the visit was not possible due to the suspension of regular flights to the Island. There were signs indicating that air service would be resumed. In any event, the Government of New Zealand would do all it possibly could to ensure that the regional office representative would visit the Island.

Finally, as had been explained to this Committee last year, the constitutional relationship with the Niue Island did not allow New Zealand to actively assume the Island's responsibility to draw up this report. New Zealand's only responsibility is to convey the reports to the Office once they have been completed. Consequently, he expressed his hope that, with the help of the regional office, the report would be completed and delivered shortly.

The Workers' members thanked the Government representative for the information provided, as well as for the spirited co-operation and good faith he had shown. The Government was making every effort to arrange for a visit from a representative of the regional office, but geographical obstacles had been in the way. Therefore, it was not possible to expect more than the Government has offered. Nevertheless, this Committee should mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

The Employers' members endorsed the statements made by the Workers' members.

The Committee noted the information supplied by the Government representative which described the situation which made it difficult to satisfy its obligations, in particular the difficulties encountered in assuring the necessary assistance to the Niue Island, but that this situation would be resolved shortly.

The Committee found that no response had been made to the comments by the Committee of Experts. Nevertheless, the Committee noted the assurances provided by the Government representative. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

III. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

Grenada. A Government representative explained that following a visit from the ILO Regional Adviser for Standards, all relevant instruments were submitted to the Cabinet in 1988. However, the Cabinet had not yet taken a decision to refer the matter to the legislative body. A new minister had recently taken over responsibility in this area. He had attended the Conference and had acquired a better understanding of the ILO and its procedures. He hoped that the Cabinet would submit the instruments to Parliament in the near future.

The Employers' members noted that what the Government representative had said on this matter was the same as the position described in the report of the Committee of Experts. It was necessary, therefore, for the Committee to note that, contrary to the obligations which arise from adherence to the Constitution of the ILO, these instruments have not been submitted to the competent authorities within 18 months of adoption. It followed that the Committee must request the Government representative to try to ensure that his Government complied with its constitutional obligations. They noted that submission of instruments to the competent authorities was practically the first step after adoption. The Government had failed to do this for seven years, and this must be mentioned in the appropriate place in the report of the Committee.

The Workers' members made two points. First, that it was necessary to remember that once a Convention was adopted by the International Labour Conference, it must be submitted to the relevant legislative body, not just to the Minister of Labour. This was to enable Parliament to consider whether it was able to ratify the Convention or not. This process was an exercise both in providing information and in initiating the ratification procedure. This was an essential process, and failure to adhere to it was all the more serious when it had not been observed for several years. They also suggested that the Government should have contact with the ILO Regional Adviser for Standards in order to obtain assistance in relation to what needs to be done and how to do it. They had the impression that there was a lack of knowledge as to these matters. They suggested that it would be of assistance to the Government to make reference to this in the appropriate part of the report of the Committee.

The Committee has noted the information supplied by the Government representative and the difficulty to which he has referred. It noted that certain measures were taken with a view to submitting the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities but that this submission has not yet taken place in conformity with the Government's constitutional obligations. The Committee reminds the Government that it can obtain the assistance of the ILO in relation to these matters and decides to make special mention of this in the relevant paragraph of its report, with the hope that real progress can be noted next year.

Haiti. A Government representative, the Minister of Social Affairs, explained that for many years the previous Government had not considered it necessary to submit unratified Conventions to the legislative chamber. In 1988, after the election of the new Government, a number of Conventions were submitted on the initiative of his predecessor, the then Minister of Social Affairs. However, that Government had remained in office for only a short time and since its overthrow there had been no legislature. In spite of the difficulties and instabilities which characterised life in Haiti the Minister had recently submitted a number of Conventions for consideration. He was confident that there would be a favourable outcome in relation to some of them in the near future.

Events since 1986 were largely responsible for the failure to submit the Conventions in question to the competent authorities. He was confident that the Council of Ministers would deal with the matter in the near future.

The Workers' members present thanked the Government representative for his explanation. They understood the problems which had faced his country over the last few years. They hoped for a period of calm to permit the reconstruction of the country and to enable it to do better in relation to its international obligations. They reiterated that once Conventions had been adopted by the International Labour Conference, the duty of a member State was to submit the instrument to the competent authorities. This was to provide information to the legislature, and to permit an examination in order to determine whether the country was able to ratify the Convention. This submission to the competent authority must take place within 18 months of its adoption. It was a matter for regret that in the case of Haiti this had not occurred for more than seven years. Finally, they expressed the hope that the Government would soon be able to provide information relating to the submission of the relevant instruments to the competent authorities. It was necessary for the Government to convey this information to the ILO for purposes of examination by the Committee of Experts. The report of the present Committee should reflect this.

The Employers' members thanked the Government representative for the information he had provided. Like the Workers' members they acknowledged the problems with which the country had been confronted in recent years. They noted that there was no legislative chamber at present. They asked the Government when he thought one would be put in place. Finally, they emphasised the importance of submission to the competent authorities, and agreed with the Workers' members that this point should be mentioned at the appropriate point in the present Committee's report.

The Government representative indicated that legislative provisions relating to elections had already been adopted. A National Council had been set up with responsibility for the oversight of these elections. No date had yet been fixed for the holding of the elections, but he anticipated that the National Council would publish a timetable within the next two to three months, and that the elections would be held before the end of the year.

The Committee took note of the information given in the report of the Committee of Experts and also of the statement made by the representative of the Government of Haiti concerning the question of submission to competent authorities of instruments which were adopted by the 67th to 72nd Sessions of the Conference and by the 64th and 65th Sessions. The Committee took note of the explanations given by the Minister concerning the political and administrative difficulties which had prevented a timely submission of these instruments to the competent authorities. The Committee was interested to learn that the Government of Haiti agrees that the submission of these instruments which has not so far taken place will occur as soon as possible when these obstacles are overcome. The Government is asked to report to the ILO when this is done. This will be noted at the appropriate point in the report of the Committee.

Islamic Republic of Iran. A Government representative stated that, as had been noted by the Committee of Experts, certain instruments had been submitted to the Council of Ministers for subsequent submission to the National Parliament, which was competent to legislate on these matters. The processes involved in the preparation of instruments for submission were long, complex and difficult, as they involved inter alia the translation of texts, and their scrutiny in order both to ensure that the spirit of the national legislation was respected and to consider the degree to which national laws might be affected in the future. This required patience, good will and caution. The Government expressed the hope that progress would be accomplished in this matter, and that its country would no longer appear amongst those cited as not having complied with their obligation to submit.

The Employers' members stated that, according to the Committee of Experts, the instruments of the ILO adopted since the 62nd Session had not been submitted to the competent authorities. Some of these instruments were being examined by the Council of Ministers but, in order to fulfil the constitutional obligation of submission to the competent authorities, these had to be submitted to the national Parliament, which was competent to legislate on them. The Committee should apply the same criteria to all the countries in objectively established violation of an obligation and should mention in its report that the obligation to submit had not been respected.

The Workers' members referred to the work of a national tripartite committee, to the examination of certain instruments by the Council of Ministers and to the hope expressed by the Government representative that his country would not be included the following year amongst those having failed to comply with the obligation to submit. They considered there was a chance of progress and that the Committee should state in its report that it was hoped that the obligations would be respected.

The Government representative stressed that the national tripartite committee had taken part in the preparation of the documents now being examined by the Council of Ministers. Amongst these instruments were those adopted by the 75th Session of the Conference.

The Committee had noted information submitted by the Government representative and the difficulties which he had described and the Committee noted that measures had been taken with a view to the submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities, but that such submission had not yet occurred in compliance with the obligations under the Constitution. It further noted the assurances given by the Government representative that submission would take place. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report in the hope that genuine progress would be seen the following year.

Jamaica: See under IA.

Mauritius. In response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 60th, 65th and 69th Sessions of the Conference have been submitted to the competent authorities.

On addition, a Government representative acknowledged, first of all, that his Government had not submitted its comments on paragraph 88 of the report of the Committee of Experts. Certain local circumstances, such as the restructuring of the Ministry, have delayed the submission of the reports mentioned in that paragraph. His Government had started reviewing certain aspects of the labour legislation, including the Conventions to which its attention had been drawn. A tripartite advisory committee had been convened to look into certain aspects of the national labour legislation and this exercise was almost completed. The observations of the Committee of Experts would be submitted to this tripartite advisory committee and, as soon as the appropriate legislation was prepared, they would be submitted to Parliament.

As regarded paragraph 113, the Government representative stated that, indeed, at the time of the meeting of the Committee of Experts his Government had not yet submitted certain instruments to the competent authority. However, as he had explained in 1988, his Government had started processing all the files and submitting the instruments to Parliament. The first group of instruments was sent in May, 1989, and a telex to this effect had been sent to the ILO; a further copy being submitted through the normal diplomatic channels. The speaker had already handed over a copy of the submission documents to the Secretariat in question. In an effort to complete the exercise, groups of such sets would be submitted to Parliament in the forthcoming weeks.

The Employers' members recalled the importance of fulfilling the constitutional obligation of replying to the comments of the supervisory bodies, which had apparently not been done for four Conventions in this case. They remarked that in its written reply, the Government indicated that it had supplied information on Convention Nos. 26, 94, 98 and 99. If this is correct, the information had arrived, although with some delay. This case could therefore be concluded on a satisfactory basis.

The Employers' members observed that, as regarded submission of instruments adopted at earlier sessions of the International Labour Conference to the competent bodies, a longer-term omission had to be noted in the appropriate part of the report of the present Committee. For seven years no information of this type had been supplied. In the written information communicated by the Government, it was indicated that the instruments of the 60th, 65th and 69th Sessions of the Conference had now been submitted. The Employers' members considered that this was progress and hoped that, in the future, all of the obligations would be respected in time.

As concerns the failure to send reports on ratified Conventions, the Workers' members were not satisfied with the written reply of the Government since – although the Government replied that the reports concerned had been sent – they had not been received. They regretted that, because of this, the case should continue to be mentioned in the appropriate section of the present Committee's report.

As regarded the obligation to submit instruments adopted by the Conference to competent authorities, the Workers members noted that, according to the Government written reply, the instruments adopted at the 60th, 65th and 69th Sessions had been submitted. Firstly, this represented a delay of eight years and secondly, the Government had not provided any proof of this submission. The Committee of Experts required copies of the submission documents to the legislative body and only in providing same did a government fulfil its constitutional and administrative obligation. After all, Parliament could do nothing until submission had taken place. When a delay of many years occurred, there was a backlog of a great number of Conventions which became difficult to study and led to problems in according eventual priority for ratification. In mentioning this case in the appropriate part of the present Committee's report, they hoped that it would be clear exactly what was required so that the necessary steps for submission could be accomplished.

The Committee took note, as regarded paragraphs 88 and 113 of the Committee of Experts' report, of the information submitted by the Government representative and the difficulties that he spoke of or reported on. The Committee noted that certain submission documents had been received, indicating that measures have been taken to submit to the competent authorities some instruments adopted by the Conference in conformity with the constitutional obligations. It noted that no reply had been received with regard to the comments made by the Committee of Experts on the period under review. The Committee decided to mention this case of non-reply to the supervisory bodies in the appropriate section of its report.

Papua New Guinea: See under IA.

Philippines. The Government representative stated that the appropriate steps had been taken to bring the Conventions in question to the attention of the proper competent authority. The President of the Republic of the Philippines had already submitted to the Senate – which was only resurrected in mid-1987 – Conventions Nos. 144 and 159, and within the year, Conventions Nos. 150 and 151 would likewise be submitted. To show his Government's commitment to this, he observed that, for two consecutive years now, members of the Philippines' Senate had attended the International Labour Conference, this year including the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Labour and Employment and two others. In addition, the Regional Adviser on Standards had visited his country last year. Such concern, and technical assistance from the Office in assisting the governments in fulfilling their constitutional obligations, would lead to the timely submission of the required reports.

The Workers' members noted that, unfortunately, for over seven years there had been no report and no proof of submission. They stressed that copies of the official document showing that new Conventions had been submitted to Parliament had to be communicated. Welcoming the presence of Filipino senators at the Conference this year, they hoped that they would understand the importance of submission and would oblige the administrative authorities to do what was necessary for Parliament to be able to examine any possibilities for ratification. They hoped that this dialogue would contribute to an improvement next year and that recourse would be had, where necessary, to the technical assistance of regional advisers or other help from the Office.

The Employers' members welcomed the willingness expressed by the Government representative to live up to the obligations enshrined in the ILO Constitution. While pleased with the intention of the Government to ratify certain conventions, they stressed that this should not be confused with the question of submission which had a value of its own. Submission had to take place even if no ratification followed. This case involved a failure in submission for over seven years and they therefore hoped that the Government would present a report to the ILO on the situation in the near future, thus respecting its obligations.

The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government representative. The Committee noted that no information had been received concerning measures taken to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities. The Committee noted the assurances provided by the Government representative to ensure that the situation would not recur. It decided to mention this case in the relevant section of its report.

Suriname. In reply to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government wishes to recall its previous statement at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference in 1988. In that statement the Government gave some clarification on the political situation in the country during the period 1980-87 which prevented the submission of ILO instruments.

The National Assembly was constituted in 1987 after free, general elections. However, in the present stage of democratisation and reconstruction of the State, the National Assembly has still to deal with a great number of Bills and different questions regarding the country's development. The Government has done its utmost to meet its obligation concerning the submission of the instruments to the competent authorities, but due to difficult circumstances, such as the lack of staff, it has not been quite feasible to make up the arrears on the submission of Conventions and Recommendations in the past year. It may be mentioned that the Cabinet has approved the request for ratification of Conventions Nos. 98, 154 and 158 and the process of submission of these Conventions is now in a final stage. As regards other Conventions which are not yet submitted, the Government is making preparations to have them submitted to the competent authorities as soon as possible.

In addition, a Government representative stated that, because of the political situation prevailing in the country during the period 1980-1987, ILO instruments could not be submitted to the Parliament. The Government had done its utmost to meet its obligations but, due to the difficult circumstances such as the lack of manpower, it had not been feasible to submit Conventions and Recommendations in the past year. The Cabinet, however, had approved the request for ratification of Conventions Nos. 98, 154 and 158 and the process of submission of these Conventions was now in a final stage. As regards other Conventions which were not yet submitted, the Legal Department was making preparations to have them submitted to the competent authorities as soon as possible.

He expressed his conviction that the Government would report more progress for the next year.

The Workers' members pointed out that the present Committee had received no information whatsoever concerning the submission of Conventions for the last seven years, which meant that the Government either had omitted to submit the instruments to the Parliament or to communicate the documents to the Committee of Experts. The first duty of a country is to submit to the Parliament within 18 months the new Conventions which had been adopted at a Conference. He expressed the hope that this would be the last time this question would have to be stressed.

The Employers' members stated that, once again, the lack of submission was explained by the shortage of personnel or the political situation. Since this Government's constitutional obligations had not been fulfilled, this omission would have to be reported.

The Government representative reiterated his Government's firm intention to make every possible effort to fulfill its obligations.

The Committee has taken note of the information, both oral and written, given by the Government representative and of the difficulties which he referred to. The Committee noted that the Government had supplied no information whatsoever on the measures adopted to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference, in conformity with its constitutional obligations. The Committee noted the assurance given by the Government representative according to which the necessary measures would be adopted as of now to fulfil its constitutional obligations. The Committee decided to mention this case in the appropriate section of its report.

Trinidad and Tobago. In response to the comments made by the Committee of Experts, the Government has indicated that the instruments adopted at the 66th and 67th Sessions of the Conference have been submitted to the competent authorities.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Resolutions

Report of the Resolutions Committee

1. The Resolutions Committee, set up by the Conference at its 3rd sitting on 8 June 1989, was originally composed of 227 voting members (88 Government members, 62 Employers' members and 77 Workers' members). An appropriate weighting system ensured equality of voting strength.

2. The first business of the Committee was to elect its officers. On the proposal of Mr. Macey (Government member, New Zealand), speaking on behalf of the Asian group, Ambassador Glaiel (Government member, Syrian Arab Republic) was unanimously elected Chairman. The Chairman was elected unanimously as Reporter. The Committee elected as Vice-Chairmen Mr. Castle (Employers' member, United Kingdom) and Mr. Morton (Workers' member, United Kingdom).

3. The Committee had before it 15 resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders, these resolutions were all considered receivable. They were then presented by their authors in accordance with article 17, paragraph 5 (a), of the Standing Orders and in the following order: (a) resolution concerning the effective participation of delegations to the International Labour Conference; (b) resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth; (c) resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to sustainable and environmentally sound development; (d) resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories; (e) resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment; (f) resolution concerning environmental protection and employment; (g) resolution concerning AIDS and the workplace; (h) resolution concerning drugs and human rights; (i) resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment; (j) resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and its future tasks in social and economic development; (k) resolution concerning development, employment and environmental protection; (l) resolution concerning development, employment and the protection of the environment; (m) resolution concerning the achievements of the ILO on its 70th anniversary, its role and the necessary strengthening of its activities in a changing world; (n) resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation; and (o) resolution concerning the role of the ILO in environmental protection and employment.

4. After these presentations, and before the vote held in accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5 (a), of the Standing Orders, the following resolutions on related subjects were combined by their authors:

(a) a resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to sustainable and environmentally sound development, submitted by Mr. Andersen, Government delegate, Denmark, Mr. Kristinsson, Government delegate, Iceland, Mr. Lidal, Government delegate, Sweden, Mr. Riikonen, Government delegate, Finland and Ms. Ruge, Government delegate, Norway; a resolution concerning environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mr. Ahmed, Workers' delegate, Pakistan, Ms. Andreassen, Workers' delegate, Norway, Mr. Baker, Workers' delegate, United States, Mr. Cal, Workers' delegate, Italy, Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland, Mr. Edstroem, Workers' delegate, Sweden, Mr. Etty, Workers' delegate, Netherlands, Ms. Foulks, Workers' delegate, New Zealand, Mr. Gopal, Workers' delegate, India, Mr. Sanchez Madariaga, Workers' delegate, Mexico, Mr. Mansfield, Workers' delegate, Australia, Mr. Maruyama, Workers' delegate, Japan, Mr. Mercier, Workers' delegate, Canada, Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, Mr. Mourgues, Workers' delegate, France, Mr. Muhr, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, Mr. Redondo, Workers' delegate, Spain, Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark and Sir Frank Walcott, Workers' delegate, Barbados; a resolution concerning development, employment and environmental protection, submitted by Mr. Andreiev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria, Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic, Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR, Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba, Mr. Haibizai, Workers' delegate, Afghanistan, Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR, Mr. Nagy, Workers' delegate, Hungary, Mr. Neubert, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia, Mr. Tsagaan, Workers' delegate, Mongolia and Mr. Yanaev, Workers' delegate, USSR; a resolution concerning development, employment and the protection of the environment, submitted by Mr. Schweitzer, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg; and a resolution concerning the role of the ILO in environmental protection and employment, submitted by Mrs. Baljinnyam, Government delegate, Mongolia, Mr. Chernyshov, Government delegate, USSR, Mr. Fomich, Government delegate, Byelorussian SSR, Mr. Lipatov, Government delegate, Ukrainian SSSR, Mrs. Molkova, Government delegate, Czechoslovakia, Mr. Natchev, Government delegate, Bulgaria and Mr. Noack, Government delegate, German Democratic Republic. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the five texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning environment, development and employment;

- (b) a resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegation of the Islamic Republic of Iran and by Mr. Hoobakht, Employers' delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran; and a resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment, submitted by the Government delegations of Bolivia, Chile, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua and Peru. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the two texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment;
- (c) a resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and its future tasks in social and economic development, submitted by Mr. Andreev, Workers' delegate, Bulgaria, Mr. Bochow, Workers' delegate, German Democratic Republic, Mr. Bulgak, Workers' delegate, Byelorussian SSR, Mr. Escandell Romero, Workers' delegate, Cuba, Mr. Haibizai, Workers' delegate, Afghanistan, Mr. Kovalevski, Workers' delegate, Ukrainian SSR, Mr. Nagy, Workers' delegate, Hungary, Mr. Neubert, Workers' delegate, Czechoslovakia, Mr. Tsagaan, Workers' delegate, Mongolia and Mr. Yan-aeu, Workers' delegate, USSR; and a resolution concerning the achievements of the International Labour Organisation on its 70th anniversary, its role and the need to strengthen its activities in a changing world, submitted by Mr. Schweitzer, Workers' delegate, Luxembourg. The authors of these resolutions agreed to combine the two texts as the following resolution: resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the ILO and strengthening of its future activities.

5. In accordance with the procedure laid down in article 17, paragraph 5 (a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee determined the first five resolutions to be considered among the nine remaining before the Committee and their order of priority. Owing to a change in the composition of the Committee, there were at this time 245 voting members (97 Government members with 2,666 votes each; 62 Employers' members with 4,171 votes each; 86 Workers' members with 3,007 votes each).¹

6. The first resolutions and the votes cast for them were as follows:

- (1) resolution concerning environment, development and employment 2,200,649 (weighted votes).

¹ Subsequently, further changes were made in the composition:

- 4th sitting on 15.6.89, 246 voting members (97G, 62E and 87W);
- 6th sitting on 16.6.89, 244 voting members (97G, 60E and 87W);
- 7th sitting on 19.6.89, 234 voting members (97G, 50E and 87W);
- 8th sitting on 20.6.89, 232 voting members (97G, 49E and 86W);
- 9th sitting on 21.6.89, 231 voting members (97G, 49E and 85W);
- 10th sitting on 22.6.89, 230 voting members (97G, 49E and 84W).

- (2) resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation 2,134,673 (weighted votes).
- (3) resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories 1,821,429 (weighted votes).
- (4) resolution concerning the effective participation of delegations to the International Labour Conference 1,698,392 (weighted votes).
- (5) resolution concerning the role of enterprises in employment growth 855,270 (weighted votes).

7. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5 (b), of the Standing Orders, at its 7th sitting the Committee set up a Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the remaining resolutions before the Committee should be examined.

8. The Working Party was composed as follows:

Government members: Mr. Guerbov (USSR), Mr. Melas (Austria), Mr. Stiglich (Peru).

Employers' members: Mr. Glade (USA), Mr. El-Herrawi (Egypt), Mr. Jessup (New Zealand).

Workers' members: Mr. Lamprecht (German Democratic Republic), Mr. Mainassara (Niger), Mr. Tapiola (Finland).

9. At the Committee's 11th sitting, the Government member of Austria, Chairman of the Working Party, announced that the Working Party had met and that it had favoured the following order of priority:

- (6) resolution concerning the promotion of self-employment;
- (7) resolution concerning drugs and human rights;
- (8) resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the ILO and strengthening of its future activities;
- (9) resolution concerning AIDS and the workplace.

10. The Committee took note of the information given.

Procedural issues

11. At the beginning of the 4th sitting, the Chairman proposed to proceed to the general discussion of the draft resolution which had received the greatest number of votes in the ballot. At this point the Government member of Peru stated on behalf of the Latin American members of the Government group that these members had reservations concerning the manner in which the scrutineers for the ballot to select the first five resolutions had been appointed. The Latin American group had not been consulted on their appointment and it would be appropriate for other regional groups to give their opinions in this issue. He noted secondly that the vote had been counted in secret, and that Government delegates had not been allowed access as observers to the room in which the vote had been counted, although no provision of the Standing Orders prevented members of the Committee from observing the counting of the vote. Third, since it was an established practice in the Resolutions Committee for the three groups to use ballot papers of different colours in order to facilitate the weighting of the vote, the announcement of the results should distinguish between the votes cast by each group so as to ensure that the entire procedure was carried out in an equal and transparent manner. Fourth, Committee document D.5, which gave the results of the vote, did not specify the number of votes cast for the remaining resolutions, even though such information could be a useful point of reference for the Working Party set up to propose the order in which these resolutions should be examined. Fifth, at the 3rd Sitting, the representative of the Secretary-General indicated that the Government group had appointed two of its three representatives in consultation with the members of the group. The Latin American group, however, had not been consulted and considered that regional groups should also be canvassed. The Latin American group therefore wished to register its concern and displeasure at the Committee's procedures up to this point and reserved the right to raise the matter before a plenary session of the Conference.

12. The Chairman recalled that in the case of the Employers' and Workers' groups two nominations of scrutineers had been communicated to the Secretariat by each group. Two nominations had also been provided from the Government members. Prior to the ballot, he had announced to the Committee the names submitted and had heard no reservations expressed.

13. The Legal Adviser explained that, in accordance with article 17 (5) (a) (iii) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the total number of points secured by each resolution was calculated separately for each group, but the Standing Orders contained no provision requiring that the number of points should be announced by group. The basis of the procedure which had been followed was established practice but there was nothing to prevent the introduction of a modified procedure in consultation with the three groups concerned.

14. The Government member of Argentina emphasised that no provision in the Standing Orders prevented announcement of the result of the ballot by identifying the vote of each of the groups. The issue for the Latin American Governments was that the scrutineers of the ballot alone had access to this information, making them privy to information not shared with the other members of the Committee who, because they were not permitted to attend the count as observers, had no means of obtaining such information. This privilege of the scrutineers was the reason behind the criticism of their having been designated without regional consultations.

15. The Government member of Costa Rica pointed out that the Standing Orders in no way prohibited members of the Committee from being present when the vote was counted, nor was there any requirement that ballots be counted in secret. The Government member of Panama said that there had been no explanation of procedures for the appointment of scrutineers so that when their names were communicated to the Committee, he had not known whether proper procedures had been followed or not. For the future the procedures should be better defined.

16. The Government member of India strongly advised that, to avoid recurrence of such doubts at subsequent sessions, in future full consultations should take place with the Chairman of the Government group at the International Labour Conference before the Government group had nominated scrutineers. It might be preferable for the ballots to be counted in the presence of the full Committee, as happened in certain other secret ballots in the ILO, so that there could be no doubt whatever concerning fairness.

17. The Government member of Australia stated, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding, that his role as co-ordinator of the Government group in the Governing Body gave him no status in this regard at the Conference. Therefore he was not the person to have been consulted on the appointment of the scrutineers or of the members of the Working Party and, indeed, he had not been consulted on these matters.

18. The Legal Adviser, referring to the suggestion that the votes cast for the remaining resolutions should be announced, noted that in accordance with the Standing Orders, members of the Committee were required to record their priorities for five resolutions only. The Working Party had the role of proposing an order of priority for the consideration of the remaining resolutions. It had been the practice in the past not to announce the number of votes cast for the remaining resolutions so as to permit the Working Party to fulfil its mandate in full freedom and because, since the members of the Committee were only called upon to express five preferences, it would be of little value to record the priorities given to the other resolutions. With regard to the suggestion that the vote should be counted in public, he noted that, within the framework of article 61 (2) of the Standing Orders, which aimed, in particular, to ensure the maintenance of order, especially with respect to the complicated operation of tallying ballots pursuant to article 17 (5) of the Standing Orders, the Committee had delegated the responsibility of counting the vote to the scrutineers; according to past practice, the counting had been done outside the meeting room. There were no provisions in the Standing Orders to prevent others from observing the process. The procedure followed in the ballot was based on established practice to ensure calm and accuracy, but nothing prevented the modification of this procedure for the future.

19. The representative of the Secretary-General noted that on at least two occasions the groups had been requested to hold consultations regarding the appointment of scrutineers and members of the Working Party. The Secretariat had played no role in consulting the groups or organising consultations in this respect. It had merely received nominations, read them out in the Committee and noted the Committee's reaction. He recalled that, whereas the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee had well-established structures for consultation, the Government members had not, and suggested that a mechanism by which the necessary consultation could be ensured might be envisaged at future sessions. In reply to a question from the Government member of Nicaragua, he said that the two proposals for Government members of the Working Party had been received from the Government members of France and the USSR respectively.

20. In reply to a question raised by the Government member of the Islamic Republic of Iran, the Chairman noted that in his view no doubt had been expressed as to the result of the ballot. The Legal Adviser stated that there having been no objection expressed at the time of the ballot or upon the announcement of the result by the Chairman, this result must be considered as no longer open to challenge.

21. The Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen noted that most of the points of procedure raised concerned the Government group only and did not affect the other groups. If, however, proposals were to be made to change established practice such as announcing the results of the ballot in terms of group voting, announcing the results of resolutions not included among the first five or having the ballots counted in open session, both the Employers' and Workers' groups would require full consultations on these issues.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING ENVIRONMENT, DEVELOPMENT AND EMPLOYMENT

Presentation of the five original texts

22. This resolution resulted from the combination of five resolutions, as stated in paragraph 4 (a) of this report.

23. The Government member of Norway, introducing the original resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to sustainable and environmentally sound development, recalled that environmental issues were now at the top of the international agenda and that a proper response to the environmental challenge at all levels was a matter of survival, requiring enormous efforts to be made. He noted that the publication of the report entitled Our Common Future had done much to stimulate international awareness of environmental issues, an awareness demonstrated by the fact that five draft resolutions on the subject had been submitted to the present session of the International Labour Conference. Because the world of labour was closely linked to factors affecting the environment, the ILO had an important role to play both in viewing the workplace as part of the larger environment and in striking a balance between the needs for a healthy environment and employment creation. The draft resolution stressed the need for involving employers and workers in environmental concerns. It also urged the ILO to take account of environmental requirements in its technical co-operation programme and international labour standards, and to see the task of preserving and improving the environment as one with potential for employment generation and alleviation of poverty.

24. Introducing the draft resolution concerning environmental protection and employment, the Workers' member of Sweden stated that the problem of damage to the environment was now so serious as to threaten all human, social and economic activity. The direct impact of environmental issues on the world of work could be seen in the effects of drought, hazardous pesticides, pollution of raw materials and disposal of toxic waste. Though the effect of these problems was felt differently in various countries, the problems themselves were international in character. The working environment should be seen as a vital part of the larger environment and educational programmes to improve the working environment would have a positive effect on the wider ecology. The basic issue was not one of a choice between jobs and a clean environment – both were equally necessary and interconnected. Employment policies and environmental management policies must be mutually reinforcing and at the international level the ILO, with its unique tripartite structure, must fully co-operate with other organisations in working for an improved environment.

25. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic introduced the draft resolution concerning development, employment and environmental protection by noting that the three subjects mentioned in the title were closely interlinked. It was the responsibility of those representing workers to ensure that a proper balance was struck between the right to a healthy environment and the need for employment, since both were vital aspects of the same issue: the welfare of workers. Similarly, issues of job creation, improvement of working conditions and the working environment were all involved in this issue. Co-operation at the international level was indispensable both because pollution knows no boundaries and because development and environmental concerns must go together.

26. The Workers' member of Luxembourg presented his draft resolution concerning development, employment and the protection of the environment by noting that while industrial development had brought many benefits, it had also brought dangers, as demonstrated by a series of recent environmental disasters originating from workplaces. Pollution and toxic waste were problems of an international character and could only be dealt with by concerted international action.

27. Introducing the draft resolution concerning the role of the ILO in environmental protection and employment, the Government member of Czechoslovakia noted that the main issues had been raised by those presenting the other texts on the subject. The inter-relationship of the needs of a healthy environment and for employment and development and the global character of all of the questions had been stated. It was particularly important that any plans and strategies for economic and social development in the future should take the needs of the environment into account. The socialist countries had both undertaken and supported many international initiatives to improve the environment.

General discussion

28. The Workers' Vice-Chairman found the wide support given to this text reassuring. It was an expression of what the Director-General in his Report had called "a strong sense of our common destiny". Workers were doubly involved in environmental issues, first as producers and therefore potential agents of pollution and, secondly, as inhabitants of the environment at large. Often workers were obliged by their economic activities to increase pollution of which they were also the victims, often more so than the public at large, because of their proximity to the source of pollution. Because of the close links between the working environment, the quality of workers' lives and the environment in general, the ILO's competence in the matter was clearly established. The key task, which the text addressed, was to replace the negative links between employment creation and the environment with positive ones: that is, to create employment which was "conducive to the establishment and maintenance of a clean and healthy environment". It outlined the approaches governments could use in the design of employment and economic policies which would implement this principle. In this connection it was to be noted that many activities for environmental improvement, such as housing improvement, conservation and environment supervision, were in fact labour intensive. The Workers' members believed that three essential factors should be contained in these policies – genuine tripartism at all levels, observance of international labour standards, and emphasis on the alleviation of poverty. These factors were compatible with economic growth. The Workers' members, while giving their total support to the principles contained in the text, stressed that the final wording should incorporate several key areas. These included the intensification by governments and the ILO of their efforts in regard to safety in the workplace; the integration of environmental issues into ILO projects and programmes; and the establishment of a methodology by which periodic reviews can be carried out to monitor performance in this regard. The ILO should improve internal liaison and make full use of its expertise, as well as form links with other international organisations and a tripartite meeting of experts should be held on the subject. In conclusion, the Workers' Vice-Chairman recalled to the Committee the pertinence of the statement which the Director-General had made in his Report: "Human beings are both the means and the end of economic development".

29. The Government member of Norway, on behalf of the Nordic Governments, expressed his satisfaction that this text had headed the list of resolutions to be discussed. That five drafts on this topic had been submitted to the Committee demonstrated the importance ascribed to the issues and confirmed the belief of all constituents that the ILO did indeed have a role to play, a fact reflected also in the 1990-91 Programme and Budget. The subject-matter was clearly within the ILO's competence: the relationships between environment and employment, between the working and general environment and between ILO technical co-operation activities and international labour standards, as well as the need to give increased attention to training on environmental concerns. The text adequately covered the issues held to be important by the Nordic countries and they felt confident that the resolution would be adopted unanimously by the Committee.

30. The Government member of Tunisia affirmed his Government's great interest in the draft resolution, which had far-reaching implications, particularly for economic and social conditions in developing countries. The text could, however, be improved both in substance and in form and for this purpose he would submit amendments at the appropriate time. If, however, the Committee should decide that the draft resolution reflected all viewpoints and decided to adopt it quickly and unanimously his Government would support this and refrain from submitting amendments.

31. The Government member of the United States said that his delegation was pleased that the Committee was taking up a substantive subject with broad appeal. Global interdependence was a fact of contemporary life made especially vivid by environmental concerns. Referring to a statement made at a recent OECD ministerial meeting, which the United States had endorsed, he said that the economic, social and ecological aspects of environment problems were issues of great importance to the general public. The Committee had a responsibility to fashion a resolution that was clearly drafted and addressed the most significant matters of public concern. It was important to integrate more systematically and effectively economic and environmental decision-making so that a proper contribution could be made to sustainable economic development and employment creation. The United States' concern for the environment had been demonstrated by its wide participation in international activities on the subject. He noted that while many international bodies were concerned with the environment the special risks and hazards of the workplace were concerns that fell within the mandate of the ILO. Employers and workers needed a stable and healthy environment to maintain the productive capacity essential to the well-being of the world's citizens. His delegation believed that the ILO could focus most constructively on this issue, as well as on employment creation and occupational health, while leaving other special and complex issues of the general environment to other international organisations which were competent to deal with them.

32. The Government member of Brazil said that the draft resolution had many positive elements. His Government gave high priority to environment programmes and had participated in international meetings on the subject. The text of the draft resolution could be improved by some amendments.

33. The Government member of the Ukrainian SSR stated that the draft resolution contained a number of important ideas and proposals for the improvement of co-operation on environmental matters. The conservation of ecology was becoming an acute problem that could not be solved by the efforts of any individual country alone. The adoption of resolutions on the environment at previous sessions of the Conference and at regional conferences and the fact that consideration of long-term problems had been raised in plenary this year were an indication that the threat of ecological disaster was of central concern to ILO member States. The impact of the resolution would depend on the extent to which it could affect government policies. While measures taken at the national level were important, they were not sufficient to combat the negative consequences of ecological problems. Global measures would have to be taken to deal with global negative consequences but that would not be possible without the co-operation of all States in the United Nations system, which should work together to make more rational use of natural resources and to reduce the emission of harmful substances. The ILO should co-operate with other international organisations and should call for measures to diminish the negative effects of ecological imbalance in developing countries. Standards should be set and technology developed to tackle these problems, taking into account the requirements of all countries.

His delegation had listened with great interest to the views put forward by other speakers and looked forward to participating in a constructive dialogue on this subject.

34. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, while commending the authors for their efforts in merging five texts, and welcoming the enunciation of some important principles on the protection of the environment, felt that the merged draft could do with considerable amendment to make it more positive, meaningful and forward-looking. It should be focused on preambular paragraph 18, which referred to the ILO's sphere of competence. He expressed the concern of the Employers' group that whatever standards in this area were defined should be applied equitably and uniformly to all enterprises, whatever their type of ownership or nationality. He noted that many enterprises had already undertaken measures to improve safety and health at work and the environment and although such measures were costly the employers considered them most worth while.

35. The Government member of Senegal said that the problem of development and the environment had never been as topical as at present, affecting all countries of the world. Various international meetings had been held recently to discuss environmental questions such as atmospheric pollution, the greenhouse effect, deforestation, soil erosion and changes to the eco-system. As concerned Africa, the critical economic situation caused by drought demonstrated how destructive, or even catastrophic, the interaction between economy and ecology could be. To produce enough to keep up foreign payments, developing countries were forced to extract too much from their land, turning once fertile areas into desert. It should be recalled that growing poverty and unemployment increased the pressure on natural resources. The threat to these resources was becoming acute and efforts should be made to protect them. The most serious threat was the risk of nuclear or chemical warfare. Settlement of regional disputes and disarmament would release resources which could be used to alleviate poverty, to aid development and to create favourable conditions for the transfer of technology, as well as for the protection of the environment. Environment and development were inextricably linked and the environment could not be protected if growth did not take into consideration the cost of the destruction of the environment. All international organisations, including the ILO, should ensure that their programmes supported economic but environmentally sustainable development. UNEP should co-ordinate international co-operation aimed at finding a solution to this critical problem. The ability to strike a balance between development and a healthy environment depended on a well-informed public, as well as the participation of NGOs, scientists and industry and there was no better forum than the ILO for tripartite dialogue and the development of projects for a healthy environment. It was up to governments to protect the rights of their peoples and to correct the imbalance between development and the use of natural resources. Problems of poverty, underdevelopment, the debt crisis and unemployment would never be solved and there would be no future growth if the needs of developing countries were not taken into account. This implied a new stage in international relations that would make far-reaching changes possible while still recognising the needs of development. Each nation, people and individual had the right to a healthy environment and governments, international organisations and NGOs should co-operate in adopting standards aimed at developing an effective policy on environment and ecology.

36. The Government member of Algeria was glad that it had been possible to create a satisfactorily merged text from the draft resolutions on environmental problems originally submitted by several delegations. There was a universal awareness of these problems and everything possible should be done to protect the environment and ensure for mankind a quality of life that was compatible with a healthy environment. Protection of the environment could not be tackled only partially and he would welcome a draft resolution that clearly defined both the general problem, that is the global environment, and the problem of specific concern to the ILO, working conditions. The only rational approach was a global one, as the future of all peoples would be affected. He did not share the opinion of speakers who felt that the draft resolution should be confined to the working environment, believing rather that the problem should not be removed from the global context. The draft resolution had the merit of taking into account the needs of developing countries and it was essential to establish close links between their development and the protection of the environment. He would submit some amendments which would clarify and strengthen the draft resolution, which his delegation supported.

37. The Government member of the Netherlands welcomed the priority given to this resolution which his Government considered to be of the utmost importance and fully within the ILO's mandate. It constituted a comprehensive view of a major world issue which could only be dealt with through a global approach in which all countries and segments of society should participate. It also provided a well-balanced view on how the complex relationship between the environment and development could be treated. The ILO, along with other international organisations, could play a catalytic role, not only by co-ordinating and monitoring programmes, but also by preparing an institutional framework to implement sound environmental policies on a global scale. The resolution correctly emphasised this. It referred to decisions taken previously at international forums and to the Declaration of The Hague, the latter clearly indicating the way in which countries and the international organisations should co-operate in developing a set of common objectives and means of achieving them. Environmental issues could not be separated from those of economic development. As the Director-General had pointed out in his Report, many countries faced an urgent need to develop their resources and economies, often under very difficult conditions. While economic growth was a prerequisite to overcoming poverty and unemployment, it could also prove detrimental to its own objectives by causing irreversible environmental repercussions which posed a threat to the future of mankind. The ILO clearly had a role to play in the issue of environment and development. The working environment not only formed a basic part of the environment at large but also provided a base from which to take specific steps for improvement. Furthermore, the ILO's tripartite structure and its experience in technical co-operation allowed it to make a unique contribution to the issue of the environment and development. He urged the Committee to support the resolution.

38. The Government member of the United Kingdom declared that his Government gave its support to international action on environmental matters, both welcoming close collaboration between the ILO and the UNEP and endorsing the central message of the recent World Commission on Environment and Development on the importance of environmentally sound economic development. It was anxious that the report should be followed up at all levels, as provided for in United Nations General Assembly resolutions 42/186 and 42/187. It looked forward to participating in the ILO meeting which was to be held as a result of a resolution from the Fourth European Regional Conference. His delegation believed that the proposed United Nations Conference on Environment and Development to be held in 1992 would be the most comprehensive and most important meeting in the near future for the appraisal of environmental problems and policies. The ILO should certainly participate in this Conference. With regard to matters of specific ILO concern, he noted that environmental projects which had employment as a significant consideration were best carried out at the national level, as discussions on transboundary problems tended not to have employment as a primary focus. It should also be remembered that environmental measures did not always have a positive effect on employment, and their costs and benefits needed to be weighed carefully to avoid restricting economic activity. As far as the resolution was concerned he emphasised that its provisions should be limited to those which were within the ILO's mandate and to inter-agency co-ordination. If these considerations were reflected in the final wording of the resolution, his Government would support it.

39. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic said that the priority given to the resolution by the Committee indicated the importance attached to this issue. In the German Democratic Republic it was recognised that the continued welfare of the nation demanded that economic development could not ignore the importance of maintaining an ecological balance. It was therefore making every effort to economise its use of resources and to ensure that measures to renew resources were being made. Non-renewable resources were replaced wherever possible, or, where there were no alternative resources, the efficiency of the production process was being improved to rationalise their use. The resolution rightly spoke of the need for international action. National action, while important, was insufficient on its own. As environmental problems became increasingly pressing, it was necessary that international organisations take appropriate action within their fields of competence. The Director-General had stressed that the specific task of the ILO was to improve the working environment and the resolution set out areas of action for the ILO. The resolution also called for development of better co-operation between international organisations. One instrument for this would be the proposed United Nations Conference in 1992 and, in particular, the preparation for it. Although the United Nations General Assembly had not yet convened this meeting, the UNEP had already begun preparatory work. The ILO's contribution should involve the health of workers and their working environment. It should participate along with other specialised agencies in the preparatory meetings.

40. The Government member of Israel supported the main themes of the draft text which recognised first the urgency and universality of the problem of environmental degradation, and secondly the need for international action and mutual co-operation. In the Mediterranean region, where, for example, chemical wastes released into the sea would be harmful to all countries, it was gratifying to see the beginnings of regional co-operation. It was to be hoped that these initial steps would lead to further co-operation and that in the effort to work together to improve the physical environment, the human environment would also be improved. Eventually resources currently devoted to arms might be used to improve the common welfare of the region. Turning to Israel's own efforts, he announced that recognising the central importance of environmental issues, Israel had recently established a separate ministry concerned with environment. He said that finding solutions to environmental problems and implementing remedial action were not simply questions of scientific and technical know-how. Priorities had to be assigned and strategies devised, while the allocation of resources for the protection of the environment competed with other needs. Co-ordination at the national and international levels was essential.

41. The Workers' member of Spain reiterated his group's strong support for the draft resolution and noted that any amendments they would propose would be to strengthen the text, not to weaken or limit it. The draft resolution affected everyone, governments, employers and workers, both as citizens of individual countries and as members of the world community. It showed also that everyone had responsibilities in the field. There was a great need to understand the broad objectives and not to be guided by short-sighted interests. When looking at issues such as development and employment creation, the future of the generations to come and of the planet itself had to be kept in mind. The ILO had an important role to play in the area and its tripartite structure was most appropriate to the definition of solutions to many environmental problems.

42. The Workers' member for Jordan agreed with previous speakers on the importance of the resolution. The threat to the environment was a threat to everyone and it was proper that the international community should adopt measures which sought to protect our future prosperity. It was essential that the measures adopted should be wide ranging and not be limited to a narrow view of the environment. Nuclear and other weapons, the militarisation of space, underground nuclear testing, marine pollution by shipping, nuclear and chemical waste, and the refusal to allow inspection of nuclear installations were all potential causes of widespread contamination which mankind had reason to fear. He urged the Committee to give the resolution its most serious consideration and to make every effort to strengthen rather than weaken its provisions.

43. The Government member of Italy pointed out that the issue of environmental protection was redefining fundamentally the framework of international law and international co-operation. Whereas before these fields had concentrated on the spatial aspects of obligations between countries, concern for the environment introduced the element of time, since it involved obligations to future generations. Neither our institutions nor our traditional conceptualisations were adapted to these new dimensions. Inevitably also these new developments were viewed differently as civilisation evolved and from this point of view it was vital to strike balances in the ways in which the resources of the planet were used, and by whom, and between the often competing needs for employment and a habitable environment. Solutions could only be achieved if the issues were tackled comprehensively, taking into account political, social, economic and scientific dimensions, and at local, national, regional and international levels. Italy recognised that the industrialised countries had a particular responsibility in that regard and that the cost and burden of preservation of the environment could not be sustained by the developing countries unaided. So many obstacles had to be overcome such as the often contradictory requirements of international trade and environmental concerns, or of freeing world markets while pursuing interventionist policies for the good of the ecosystem, not to mention the conflicts amongst various countries and peoples. These obstacles could be surmounted only in the full realisation of the shared destiny which the global environment represented. Issues of environment and development constituted a new chapter of human rights which must not only be protected but actively promoted. The draft resolution was a small but very important step in this direction.

44. The Workers' member of Iraq welcomed the high priority given to the draft resolution and supported the proposals it contained to preserve the environment. He deplored the irreversible damage being done to agriculture in certain areas of the world. A previous speaker had referred to the creation in his country of a ministry especially responsible for the environment. It would be appropriate for that ministry to look into how poisonous gases were being used to maim and kill the innocent. The resolution should deal with the question of the environmental damage caused by advanced weapons and call for their suppression.

45. The Government member of Spain congratulated the authors of the merged text on producing a coherent draft. The need for international action reflected in the text was clearly recognised by those who had already spoken in the Committee. It should be recognised that national and international activities relating to the environment must be co-ordinated and complementary. The draft before the Committee, however, did not deal only with the environment but also with development and the question of employment. It was not only ecological in scope but social too. The challenge was to achieve a balance amongst these areas of concern. Provisions of a general environmental purport in the draft text should be redrafted so as not to lose sight of the fundamental balance among issues of development, employment and the environment.

46. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic noted that the priority given to the resolution illustrated the feeling within the Committee of the extent to which the environment was threatened and the lack of means currently available to protect it. There was a pressing need for all countries and workers to collaborate in solving the problems caused by the pollution created in the past. However, the resolution could be strengthened by the inclusion of fuller reference to the true reasons for pollution and particularly the sources of toxic waste. Such waste should not be sent to developing countries and it should be disposed of where it was produced. Nuclear testing was also a great threat to the environment and over the past five years changes in the climate and temperature had been noted which adversely affected vegetable and animal life. All these problems should be fully taken into account and a paragraph should be added to the present text of the resolution concerning the creation of an international committee for monitoring the environment at all levels.

47. The representative of Palestine urged the Committee to strengthen the resolution in order to make it more universally applicable. Environmental problems could not be adequately tackled without the inclusion of measures to guarantee human rights and freedoms, since all peoples had to obtain their freedom before they were able to turn their attention to safeguarding the environment. It was therefore important in this context for countries to rid themselves of colonialism. The use of poison gases, the production of nuclear waste and nuclear testing were all the responsibility of developed countries, but their effect harmed all the peoples of the world. Poisonous and deadly gases had been used in the past by imperial countries and were now being employed to suppress the liberation struggle in Palestine.

48. The Government member of Hungary emphasised that environmental hazards caused internal problems in each country but that pollution did not observe boundaries and had regional and sometimes worldwide negative effects. Small and medium-sized countries were in the worst position in this respect and international action and co-operation between countries was clearly required. The ILO was competent in the field of the environment and could make a useful contribution to international action in this area. His delegation fully supported the draft resolution, which he hoped would be adopted by consensus in the Committee.

49. The Government member of Australia welcomed the priority given by the Committee to environmental issues and stressed that his country was actively engaged in both bilateral and multilateral initiatives to address the global problems involved. His country supported the concept of sustainable development as a basis for promoting economic activity in an environmentally sensitive manner in order to protect and enhance the interests of current and future generations. His Government was committed to continued positive national and international economic growth in order to satisfy fully the legitimate social and economic aspirations of all communities and to the need for close integration of environmental and developmental policies that would take full account of environmental and developmental costs and benefits in all aspects of economic development with recognition for the special needs of developing countries. Australia had given priority to the promotion of universal adherence to the 1987 Montreal Protol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer and to supporting the Intergovernmental Panel on Climatic Change established by the UNEP and WMO. Emphasis should be given to establishing framework Conventions on the protection of the atmosphere and climatic change, with protocols being negotiated subsequently on specific issues as scientific knowledge developed. Research should also be intensified to improve knowledge regarding the greenhouse effect and its impact. His Government attached great importance to the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) as the central catalytic and co-ordinating body of the United Nations system in the field of the environment and considered that the proposed United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in 1992 would provide an unparalleled opportunity to obtain broad international agreement on measures to address environmental problems.

50. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany noted that the industrialised countries had learnt painfully the importance of safeguarding the environment and of international co-operation in this connection. Problems affecting the climate, the fauna, the flora and the seas concerned all countries, as illustrated particularly vividly by the example of her country, which was located in the centre of a continent and suffered from sources of pollution from every direction. Both industrialised and developing countries had to work together in order to combat this problem and awareness had to be increased of the need to combine environmental protection and development policies and, consequently, to reorganise current economic activities.

51. The Government member of India emphasised that every effort was being made by developing countries to improve the environment, notwithstanding their adverse economic situation, the debt problem and the prevailing trade imbalances that they faced. However, much responsibility for environmental degradation devolved on those who had been instrumental in causing many world-wide problems such as acid rain, the depletion of the ozone layer, industrial pollution and the dumping of hazardous wastes. Quoting from a recent speech of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, he shared her view that it was intolerable for countries which had already become industrialised to expect others to pay the price in this context to the detriment of their people's hopes and ambitions and well-being. Mass poverty was frequently at the root of environmental degradation and its elimination was essential for sustained environmental improvement. However, care should be taken not to establish conditions linking the provision of development resources to environmental measures. All environmental measures should be complementary to national and regional efforts and should not in any way be a substitute for them. The central role of the ILO in this area remained in the field of employment and the ILO should be careful not to undertake activities that amounted to duplication of the work of other specialised agencies of the United Nations. His delegation gave its broad support to the draft resolution before the Committee, although it was somewhat long and unwieldy. He supported the proposal made by the Government member of Senegal that a working group be established to consider amendments when submitted.

52. The Government member of Canada noted that 1987 had been a decisive year in the international community for consideration of environmental issues and that in that year the General Assembly of the United Nations had called on all specialised agencies to incorporate environmental concerns in their programmes and activities. The Governing Body of the ILO had taken action accordingly and it would be very useful for the International Labour Conference to give guidance on the subject through the present draft resolution. The North-South aspect of the resolution was important, since it was essential that environmental action should embrace the concepts of sustained economic growth especially in developing countries. Environmental policies should emphasise the prevention of damage to nature rather than costly remedial measures, and development plans should give emphasis to increased production, economic efficiency, technological development and sound resource management. Responsibility for environmental measures should be shared by governments, the private sector and individuals, particularly where difficult decisions had to be taken, and the ILO could play a valuable role in guiding the attitudes of employers, governments and workers in such choices. However, he agreed with previous speakers that any ILO activities concerning the environment should fall firmly within its own mandate and its particular capabilities, since action by all the specialised agencies would be all the more effective for being concentrated within their own areas of competence. The text of the resolution therefore needed to set out the most effective possible responses that could be made by the ILO and its constituents to the problems in question.

53. The Government member of Nigeria emphasised that developing countries had been used for the disposal of toxic wastes produced by industrialised countries and that dangerous pesticides and other substances, which were banned in developed countries, were frequently used in the Third World, thereby endangering the local populations. He welcomed the fact that the conscience of the world had been alerted to such practices and was convinced that the ILO, with its tripartite structure, could contribute to finding lasting solutions to the problems caused by pollution.

54. The Government member of Malta noted that the pursuit of prosperity through industrialisation had resulted in irreparable harm to the planet. Clearly this had to stop but while some countries were able to pursue ecologically sound policies, others could not afford to do so. It was important, therefore, that developing countries should be helped to preserve their environment rather than forced by economic necessity to destroy what remained. His Government strongly supported the resolution.

55. The Government member of Qatar expressed his Government's support for the draft resolution while calling on the meeting not to forget the damage being caused to the environment in Palestine by the use of weapons and chemicals. All peoples had the right to live in a healthy environment. The requirements of developments and preservation of the environment were not easily reconciled and this constituted a challenge for international organisations. Only international co-operation, free of threats of war and hatred, would lead to a peaceful and healthy environment.

56. The Government member of the USSR stressed the importance to human survival of international co-operation in the field of environmental protection. Technologies must be developed which not only preserved the environment but which were not wasteful of resources. The USSR had been highly supportive of international efforts on the environment, including the 1992 United Nations Conference, and had proposed cosmic monitoring of the global environment, making use of existing satellite capacity and the creation of a United Nations centre for emergency ecological assistance. Financial resources needed to solve ecological problems could be made available through the process of disarmament. The ILO had long been involved in environmental questions such as the working environment, occupational training and the relationship of employment to the environment. Co-operation between the ILO and UNEP should be strengthened and the USSR particularly supported the proposal in paragraph 2 (m) of the draft text to hold a special tripartite meeting of experts to examine the work of the ILO in the field of sustainable and environmentally sound development. In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the resolution would be adopted unanimously by the Committee.

57. The Government member of Mongolia noted that her country was one of the co-authors of the draft resolution and was pleased at the strong support which it had received in the Committee. Her own countries attached great importance to the question of the environment and had established a special ministry responsible for this question. She endorsed the points made by previous speakers to the effect that international co-operation on the environment was of the utmost importance and that international efforts must be co-ordinated and complementary with national and regional programmes. She, too, hoped that the Committee would adopt the resolution by consensus.

58. The Government member of the Byelorussian SSR said that mankind was confronting the destruction of the balance between the needs of human society and those of nature. All had a duty to prevent the destruction of our natural environment. He supported the proposal for international monitoring of the ecosystem. The ILO had clear competence for the questions dealt with in the draft, and increased co-operation between the ILO and UNEP should be promoted, especially as regarded technical co-operation concentrating on development in rural areas. His delegation fully supported the draft resolution.

Consideration of amendments

59. One hundred and forty-eight amendments, numbered from D.6 to D.154, were submitted for examination.

Amendment of the title of the resolution

60. Amendment D.152, submitted by the Workers' members of Egypt, Iraq and Jordan, sought to replace the title of the resolution by the following new title: "Protection of the environment, employment, the working environment and development".

61. Introducing the amendment, the Workers' member of Iraq stated that, in order to be consistent, the title of the resolution should reflect its content and specify that it referred to the working environment in particular. He also emphasised that the environment in general was important to everybody, and not just to any one group of countries or to any one continent.

62. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the great majority of the Workers' group did not support this amendment. It was their firm belief that, as set out in paragraph 5 of the preamble to the resolution, the working environment formed an important and integral part of the general environment. Any formulation which implied that they could be viewed separately was therefore to be avoided. The present title was brief and succinct and should be maintained.

63. The Employer's Vice-Chairman agreed with the Workers' Vice-Chairman that the present title was more elegant and succinct than that proposed in the amendment. The word "environment" encompassed all forms of the environment and not just the working environment.

64. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Nordic Governments, also agreed with the points made by the Workers' and Employers' Vice-Chairmen.

65. The Workers' members of Bahrain, Iraq and the Syrian Arab Republic, in supporting the proposed amendment, emphasised that there was a fundamental link between the environment in general and the working environment, and that this should be reflected in the title of the resolution. The proposed amendment, by laying emphasis on working conditions, made it clear that the resolution was firmly within the mandate of the ILO.

66. The Government member of Czechoslovakia noted that the socialist Government members of the Committee were opposed to the amendment. Since the vast majority of the Committee were not in favour of this amendment, he hoped that progress could be made and that the Committee's time would not be wasted.

67. The Government members of Qatar, the Syrian Arab Republic and Tunisia, in supporting the amendment, emphasised that it was important for the title to reflect the content of the resolution and to link the protection of the environment in general with the working environment in particular.

68. The Workers' members of Bulgaria and the Ukrainian SSR noted that the original title was a more accurate reflection of the contents of the resolution, which firmly established that the working environment was an important and integral part of the general environment. They urged the Committee to adopt a more positive approach in its consideration of the draft resolution.

69. The Government member of Egypt, in supporting the amendment, said that the key concept added by it and which did not appear in the original title was the "protection" of the environment.

70. The Government member of India, in order to help the Committee progress in its work, proposed to sub-amend D.152 to read as follows: "Protection of the environment, including the working environment, employment and development”.

71. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the proposed sub-amendment still effectively separated the working environment. The present title to the resolution was still to be preferred.

72. The Government member of Kuwait supported the proposed sub-amendment as a compromise proposal, while the Government member of Tunisia noted that the real subject of the resolution was the environment and the working environment, and felt that that should be reflected in the title.

73. The Government member of China and the Workers' member of Egypt supported the sub-amendment and called upon the sponsors of the original resolution to be more flexible in supporting the proposals of other members of the Committee. The Government member of Yugoslavia expressed her appreciation to the sponsors for having submitted the draft resolution on a subject of vital interest to all. She added that now that the Committee had embarked upon the exercise of making the resolution ultimately acceptable to all members of the Committee, its sponsors should enable it to reflect as broadly as possible other members' views, concerns and interests. She appealed to the sponsors to demonstrate more readiness and flexibility at the present early stage. She supported the sub-amendment of the Government member of India.

74. The Government member of Norway expressed his appreciation at the efforts made by the Government member of India to enable the Committee to advance in its work, but felt that the word “protection” was not sufficient since the resolution called for the more dynamic approach of the “improvement” of the environment as well.

75. The Government member of Egypt sub-amended the wording proposed by the Government member of India to read as follows: “Protection and improvement of the environment, including the working environment, employment and development”. This sub-amendment was found acceptable by the Government member of India.

76. The Workers' Vice-Chairman proposed to sub-amend the proposal before the Committee further to read as follows: “Protection and improvement of the environment, employment and development”. This sub-amendment did not find favour with the proposers of the other sub-amendments before the Committee, and was consequently withdrawn by its author.

77. A number of speakers from different groups, including the Employers' group, in response to a suggestion that the question of the title should be discussed at a later stage, stated that it was important to decide this question forthwith, since the title defined the scope of the resolution and, as such, gave direction to the Committee's deliberations. Other speakers, however, supported the motion to postpone consideration of the title.

78. The Government member of India explained that his original sub-amendment had been put forward in a spirit of compromise in order to avoid votes in the Committee at this early stage in its work.

79. The Government member of Denmark emphasised that the draft resolution before the Committee was of great importance and had resulted from the merger of five original draft resolutions. It was clear that an overwhelming majority of the members of the Committee supported the original title of the resolution.

80. Amendment D.152, as sub-amended by the Government members of India and Egypt, was put to a vote by show of hands. It received 247,509 votes in favour, 8,428 votes against, with 598,637 abstentions. The amendment, as sub-amended, was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

81. The result of the vote was challenged under article 65, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders by the Workers' member of Jordan on the ground that persons not entitled to vote had voted.

82. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on a point of order, noted that article 65, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders laid down that a record vote should be taken if the result of a vote by show of hands was “challenged”. He therefore requested the Chairman to give a ruling as to what constituted a “challenge” in this context. The Chairman replied that the only criterion to be followed was that set out in article 65, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders, which was quite clear.

83. A record vote on amendment D.152, as sub-amended by the Government members of Egypt and India, was taken. The result was 243,295 votes in favour, 4,214 votes against, with 602,301 abstentions. The amendment, as sub-amended, was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

Amendments of paragraph 1 of the preamble

84. Amendment D.86, submitted by the Employers' group sought to delete the word “all” in the first line of paragraph 1 of the preamble, to delete the word “only” in the fourth line and to delete the word “public” in the fifth line.

85. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, introducing the amendment, noted that although his group supported the sentiments set out in this paragraph, some of the adjectives used to qualify them were inappropriate. By way of illustration, the use of the word “all” to qualify economic and social development policies made the concept too broad, since some policies, such as those of a financial nature, might not have any effect on the environment. He added that to qualify the word “health” by the adjective “public” would be too restrictive.

86. The Government member of India supported the amendment.

87. The Workers' Vice-Chairman was prepared to agree to the deletion of the word “all” in the first line and “public” in the fifth line. However, he sub-amended amendment D.86 to retain the word “only” in the fourth line. The amendment, as sub-amended, was adopted.

88. Amendment D.35, submitted by the Government members of India and Sri Lanka, also sought to delete the word “all” in the first line. In addition, it sought to replace the words “be designed effectively to” in the second line by the word “also”.

89. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India pointed out that the prime intention behind economic and social development policies was not necessarily to protect and improve the environment. Thus the word "also" should be added.

90. The Employers' group supported the amendment.

91. The spokesman for the Workers' group noted that although his group felt that the existing wording carried greater obligation and value, they were prepared to accept the amendment. The amendment was adopted.

92. Amendment D.15, submitted by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, was withdrawn by its authors in favour of amendment D.71.

93. Amendment D.71, submitted by the Government member of Tunisia, and seconded by several members of the Committee, sought to replace the words "real factors of progress" in the last line of paragraph 1 of the preamble by the words "essential factors for lasting development".

94. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of Tunisia noted that the concept of lasting development was drawn from the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development. This concept should be defined in the first paragraph of the resolution.

95. The amendment was supported by the Workers' member of Iraq and the Government member of India.

96. The Government member of Norway expressed a preference for the wording contained in amendment D.15.

97. The spokesman for the Workers' group strongly supported the existing wording, which emphasised the value of policies and activities that were compatible with the environment as factors of progress. He proposed to sub-amend the amendment by replacing the word "essential" by the word "real" so that the final words of paragraph 1 of the preamble would be "real factors for lasting development". The amendment, as sub-amended, was adopted.

98. Amendment D.154, submitted by the Employers' members of Iraq, Kuwait and the Syrian Arab Republic, sought to add, after the words "factors of" in the last line of paragraph 1 of the preamble, the words "economic and social". The amendment was adopted.

99. Paragraph 1 of the preamble, as amended, and paragraph 2 were adopted.

Amendment of paragraph 3 of the preamble

100. Amendment D.87, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to replace paragraph 3 of the preamble by the following text:

Recalling that one of the fundamental concerns of the ILO is the improvement of working conditions, and particularly the protection of life, workers' health, the work environment and employment promotion;

The amendment was supported by the Workers' group and adopted by the Committee.

Amendments to paragraph 4 of the preamble

101. Amendment D.36, submitted by the Government members of India and Sri Lanka, sought to add after the words "considering that" in the first line of paragraph 4 of the preamble, the words "appropriate attention should be given to", and to replace, in the second line, the words "should be a guiding principle for" by the word "in".

102. Introducing the amendment, the Government member of India noted that although he agreed with the sentiments expressed in the original text, the ILO had its own mandate to follow and it would be going too far to require that all ILO activities be made subject to environmental concerns.

103. The Government member of Norway pointed out that the original wording was based on the language used in United Nations General Assembly resolution 42/187, which set out that sustainable development should become an essential guiding principle of the United Nations. However, in order to advance the work of the Committee, he did not oppose the amendment.

104. The Employers' Vice-Chairman supported the amendment and the spokesman for the Workers' group, although not concurring with the amendment, did not oppose it. The amendment was adopted.

105. Amendment D.88, submitted by the Employers' group, sought to add, after the word "sound" in the second line of paragraph 4 of the preamble, the words "economic and social". The amendment was adopted.

106. Amendment D.151, submitted by the Workers' members of Iraq and Jordan, sought to add, after the words "contribution to the" in the last line of paragraph 4 of the preamble, the words "national, regional and". The amendment was adopted.

107. Paragraph 4 of the preamble, as amended, was adopted.

Amendment to paragraph 5 of the preamble

108. Amendment D.142, submitted by the Workers' members of Egypt, Iraq and Jordan, sought to add, after the words "environment forms" in the first line of paragraph 5 of the preamble, the words "and the protection of the lives of workers form" and to add, after the word "environment" in the last line, the words "and in the protection of workers' lives".

109. The Workers' member of Iraq, introducing the amendment, noted that the protection of workers' lives was an essential concept that should be included in that paragraph of the resolution.

110. The Employers' Vice-Chairman gave his support to the principle behind the amendment, but felt that it did not readily fit into the structure of paragraph 5 of the preamble and would be better placed elsewhere in the preamble. A more suitable location would be in paragraph 10 of the preamble.

111. The spokesman for the Workers' group said that his group gave its full support to the protection of workers' lives, but noted that the majority of the Workers' group would prefer to see the proposed wording included in a different part of the resolution.

112. The Government members of Denmark and Czechoslovakia emphasised that the protection of workers' lives was essential, but that the proposed wording could not be logically included in paragraph 5 of the preamble.

113. The Government member of Kuwait said that the amendment improved the content of paragraph 5 of the preamble. The Government member of India, commenting on the suggestion put forward by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, felt that the inclusion of the amendment in paragraph 10 of the preamble would have little value or relevance since the protection of workers' lives needed to be ensured on a national basis, while paragraph 10 referred specifically to international co-operation to that end among all countries and organisations of the United Nations system.

114. The Employers' Vice-Chairman recalled that the constituents of the ILO came together precisely to devise measures to protect the lives of workers at the international level through co-operation between states, employers and workers.

115. The Government members of Algeria and Tunisia, and the Workers' members of Iraq and the Syrian Arab Republic noted that the principle behind the amendment was accepted by the Committee as a whole and was therefore not controversial. The only remaining question was the location of the proposed wording. The best place for this was paragraph 5 of the preamble.

116. The Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Government member of Denmark proposed to include the amendment elsewhere in the resolution and warned the sponsors of the amendment that if a vote were taken they might lose altogether a proposed wording that had received the support of the whole Committee. In reply to a question by the Chairman, the Workers' member of Iraq confirmed that the authors of the amendment wished it to be placed in paragraph 5 of the preamble.

117. The amendment was put to a vote by show of hands. There were 156,868 votes in favour, 0 against, with 575,219 abstentions. The quorum of 484,806 not having been reached, the amendment was not adopted.

New paragraph

118. Amendment D.49, submitted by the Workers' group, sought to add, after paragraph 5 of the preamble, the following new paragraph:

Convinced that it is necessary to tackle the problems of pollution at source, by taking preventive measures at the workplace.

Introducing the amendment, the spokesman for the Workers' group emphasised the importance of dealing with the problems of pollution at their source. Since this was often the workplace, the Workers' group was firmly of the view that it was important to focus on preventive measures there in order to improve the environment.

119. The Employers' Vice-Chairman stated that the group could accept the general purport of the amendment proposed but questioned the meaning of the words "at source". The pollution problem might well arise at a point later in the production process, such as during handling or transport, and "at source" did not convey this sense. Also the pollution might occur elsewhere than in the workplace, such as outdoors.

120. The spokesman for the Workers' group, in order to accommodate the Employers' concerns, proposed to sub-amend the amendment to read as follows:

Convinced that it is necessary to tackle the problems of pollution at the earliest opportunity, by taking preventive measures, including at the workplace,

121. Amendment D.49, as sub-amended, was adopted.

122. Amendment D.62, submitted by the Workers' group, was withdrawn by its authors in favour of amendment D.51.

Amendment of paragraph 6 of the preamble

123. Amendment D.89, submitted by the Employer's group, sought to replace paragraph 6 of the preamble by the following text:

Convinced that policy measures at the national and international levels should take into account the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation.

124. Introducing the amendment, the Employers' Vice-Chairman noted that his group, although approving in general terms the basic sentiment expressed in the original paragraph 6, had been somewhat confused by some of the terms of the original formulation, such as the phrase "judicious policy measures". Their amendment was intended to clarify these problems.

125. The spokesman for the Workers' group, while appreciating the merit of the proposed amendment, considered that an important idea contained in the original wording of the paragraph had been omitted from the Employers' proposal, namely the positive links that could be established between the requirements of environmental protection and job creation. Any long-term employment creation scheme had to create the necessary environmentally sound conditions for the work to be carried out if it were to be successful. He therefore proposed to sub-amend amendment D.89 to read as follows:

Convinced that policy measures at the national and international levels should take into account the positive links that can be established between the requirements of environmental protection and employment creation.

126. Amendment D.89, as sub-amended, was adopted.

127. Amendment D.144, submitted by the Workers' members of Iraq and Jordan, which sought to amend the original wording of paragraph 6 of the preamble, therefore became inapplicable.

128. Amendment D.69, submitted by the Government member of Israel, was withdrawn by its author, since his concerns had been covered by the adoption of amendment D.89, as sub-amended.

Amendments of paragraph 7 of the preamble

129. Amendment D.26, submitted by the Government member of the United States, and amendment D.90, submitted by the Employers' group, both sought to delete paragraph 7 of the preamble.

130. Introducing his amendment, the Government member of the United States remarked that although his delegation favoured the adoption of the present draft resolution, it felt that in its present form it contained a number of problems as regards the parameters of the ILO's mandate and that certain of the current paragraphs went beyond the Organisation's mandate. Paragraph 7 of the preamble in its original wording referred to areas such as desertification, the development of transport, water pollution, the breaching of the ozone layer and the hothouse effect. These were serious problems that merited international attention, but did not lie within the competence of the ILO. The problem of industrial waste and its effects on workers' health might well lie within the mandate of the Organisation, but by seeking to bring in other larger problems, its credibility could suffer.

131. The Employer's Vice-Chairman, introducing his group's amendment, said that paragraph 7 of the preamble in its current form was redundant and added little in the context of the ILO. Its deletion would also make the resolution more concise.

132. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya emphasised the importance of paragraph 7 of the preamble within the resolution in setting out the general problems affecting the environment.

133. The spokesman for the Workers' group maintained that paragraph 7 had value in its original form since it referred to a number of very important issues. However, he noted that the sponsors of the amendments to delete the paragraph had not questioned the importance of the issues raised in the paragraph, but merely how they related to the work of the ILO. In fact, the problems raised in the paragraph greatly affected the lives of working people. By way of illustration, desertification was a major environmental problem of concern to rural workers. When fertile land was rendered arid, the workers often had to leave their lands and migrate to urban areas. Similarly, the breaching of the ozone layer affected outdoor workers in certain countries by raising the incidence of skin cancer. He proposed, in view of his group's opposition to the present amendments, that their sponsors might wish to withdraw them in favour of amendment D.8, which clarified the relationship of environmental problems to the work of the ILO.

134. The Government member of Algeria supported the remarks of the previous speaker as regards desertification, which was affecting millions of workers throughout the world. An example of this was the way in which the Sahara was spreading into the south of his own country, causing mass migration towards the north. Paragraph 7 in its original form was therefore an integral part of the resolution, since the protection of the environment was a universal problem and global co-operation was required in order to take measures to improve the environment. Those who wished to delete the paragraphs were in effect adopting a fragmented approach to this question.

135. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic also emphasised the importance of the preambular paragraph in question and felt that it should contain a reference to the effects of nuclear explosions on plant life and on the health of individuals. He also stressed the importance of the subsequent preambular paragraphs, which referred to the improper use of pesticides.

136. The Government member of Norway noted that previous speakers had eloquently set out the importance of paragraph 7 of the preamble. He also agreed with those speakers who had maintained that all the activities proposed in the resolution should be within the competence of the Organisation. Although the Nordic Governments preferred the original wording, they were prepared to accept the changes proposed in amendment D.8.

137. The Employers' Vice-Chairman proposed a sub-amendment to amendment D.8 and withdrew amendment D.90.

138. The Government member of the United States noted that amendment D.8 related the problems to which it referred to the role of the ILO. He therefore withdrew amendment D.26 in favour of amendment D.8 as sub-amended by the Employer's Vice-Chairman.

139. Amendment D.8, submitted by the Government members of Belgium and Luxembourg, sought to replace paragraph 7 of the preamble by the following text:

Noting in particular the problem of the damage caused, in whatever manner, to the soil, sub-soil, atmosphere and cosmos, to water, flora and fauna, and to human health; and considering the resulting effects on all the fields covered by the activities of the International Labour Organisation,

140. The Employers' Vice-Chairman sub-amended amendment D.8 to read as follows:

Noting in particular the problem of the damage caused to the environment, in whatever manner, and to human health; and considering the resulting effects on all the fields covered by the activities of the International Labour Organisation, on the grounds that the word "environment" already encompassed the soil, sub-soil, etc., and nothing was to be gained by listing them.

141. The Government member of Belgium, introducing amendment D.8, recorded his agreement with the sub-amendment put forward by the Employers' Vice-Chairman. He explained that many of the ideas contained in the amendment had been taken from the original text, but that it had been the intention of the authors of the amendment to group together the fields in which environmental damage occurred and to qualify the wording by making it relevant to the activities of the ILO.

142. Amendment D.8, as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman, was supported by the Government members of Luxembourg and the United States and by the Workers' Vice-Chairman.

143. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya noted that the wording of paragraph 7 of the preamble should include reference to the harmful effects of nuclear experiments.

144. The Government members of India and Malta proposed to sub-amend amendment D.8, as sub-amended, by replacing the words "on all" in the fourth line by the words "on any of".

145. The Government members of Belgium and Luxembourg, and the Employers' Vice-Chairman found the amendment, as further sub-amended, acceptable.

146. The Government member of Tunisia, however, felt that paragraph 7 of the preamble should remain in its original form. The relationship of drought and desertification to the competence of the ILO had been explained by previous speakers and it should be recalled that preambular paragraphs did not call for ILO action, but merely set the context of the resolution. Drought and desertification were extremely topical and important problems, as set out in the Report of the World Commission on Environment and Development.

147. The Government member of China questioned whether the proposed amendment as sub-amended was not very close in its terms to paragraph 2 of the preamble already adopted and thus a duplication.

148. The Workers' member of Jordan emphasised that reference should not be made to hazardous problems without the causes of such problems being identified. One of these causes was nuclear testing, which was often carried out underground.

149. The Government member of Egypt, noting that the causes and reasons for environmental damage should be recorded in the wording of paragraph 7, proposed to add, after the words "in whatever manner", the words "inter alia by industrial waste, the development of transport, water pollution, the breaching of the ozone layer and the creation of conditions giving rise to a hothouse effect".

150. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya proposed to further sub-amend the above sub-amendment by adding, after the words "inter alia", the words "by desertification, the waste generated by various nuclear experiments".

151. The Government member of Malaysia introduced a further sub-amendment by proposing the addition of the words "and marine" before the word "pollution" in the sub-amendment put forward by the Government member of Egypt. This sub-amendment received general acceptance.

152. The Government members of Belgium and Luxembourg, and the Employers' Vice-Chairman, said that they saw little value in enumerating various causes of environmental damage. Indeed the purpose of their amendment was to avoid such a listing. They preferred the wording of amendment D.8, as sub-amended by the Employers' Vice-Chairman and the Government members of India and Malta, but without the sub-amendments proposed by the Government members of Egypt and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya.

153. The sub-amendment proposed by the Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was put to a vote by show of hands. There were 18,683 votes in favour, 0 against and 73,615 abstentions. The quorum of 68,443 not having been reached, the sub-amendment was not adopted.

154. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, pursuant to article 65, paragraph 7, of the Standing Orders, challenged the vote and requested that the sub-amendment be put to a record vote. The Government member of Denmark requested clarification as to the grounds on which the result of the vote had been challenged. It was explained that the challenge concerned the number of votes cast.

155. The sub-amendment proposed by the Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya was put to a record vote. There were 31,372 votes for, 0 against with 94,603 abstentions. The quorum of 68,443 not having been reached, the sub-amendment was not adopted.

156. The Government member of France, speaking on behalf of the Industrialised Market Economy Countries (IMEC) Government members, reaffirmed the importance they attached to the draft resolution, which basically dealt with the future of mankind. However, because of the attitude adopted by some of the members of the Committee, very little progress had been made with the amendments proposed to the resolution. The amendments that had been proposed by the members of his group were of real importance to them in order to improve the resolution. However, in view of the situation facing the Committee, they were prepared to withdraw all their amendments in order to enable the Committee to obtain a tangible result from its work. He appealed to the other groups to respond to this gesture of goodwill in a similar manner so as to avoid a situation in which the Committee's work would come to naught. The following amendments were thus withdrawn: D.13, D.14, D.27, D.63, D.28, D.16, D.29, D.64, D.25, D.65, D.17, D.9, D.30, D.10, D.11, D.66, D.18, D.19, D.20, D.21, D.22, D.31, D.32, D.33, D.34.

157. The Government member of Belgium noted that amendment D.8, which was currently under consideration by the Committee, was not in fact included in the above statement since it was the subject of a series of sub-amendments. However, if legally possible and if the authors of those sub-amendments that had not yet been voted on by show of hands were prepared to withdraw them, the authors of amendment D.8 would also be prepared to withdraw their amendment in order to advance the work of the Committee.

158. The Government member of Egypt requested the Secretariat or the Legal Adviser to give a reply to the question from the Government member of Belgium in order to enable the delegation of Egypt to take a decision concerning its sub-amendment.

159. The Workers' Vice-Chairman noted that the present draft resolution was of special importance to the workers of every country and from the point of view of the co-operation among trade unions that it represented. The Workers' group had wished to improve the wording of the resolution, but in view of the statements by the previous Government members it would be willing to withdraw its proposed amendments. Amendments D.50, D.51, D.52, D.53, D.59, D.54, D.55, D.56, D.57, D.58 and D.61 were thus withdrawn.

160. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic, for the same reasons as those given by the Government member of France, withdrew amendment D.12.

161. The Government member of Tunisia thanked the previous speakers for their open and co-operative attitude. Great co-operation and an openness of spirit had also been shown in the work of the Committee by the Government members of developing countries, who had participated actively in the debate in order to proceed to the adoption of a resolution that responded to their legitimate preoccupations. While welcoming the positive attitude adopted by the previous speakers, he noted that most of the amendments that had just been withdrawn had been submitted by the original co-authors of the resolution. The impact of their gesture was, therefore, debatable since the resolution in its present form did not fully reflect the concerns of developing countries. He asked the preceding speakers if they would be ready and willing to consider the amendments submitted by the developing countries and to accept them without discussion in the same way that they had withdrawn their own amendments. He added that an appeal for adoption of the resolution by consensus had been made early in the work of the Committee by the Government members of a number of developing countries, and that this proposal should have been adopted. He requested the other members of the Committee who had just withdrawn their amendments to specify which of the amendments proposed by members from developing countries would be acceptable to them.

162. The Government member of Egypt stated that the non-aligned countries and countries in the Third World suffered more than the developed countries from the environmental problems referred to in the resolution. If the amendments proposed by members from developing countries were to be adopted then it would be possible to achieve a positive result from the work of the Committee, in contrast with the previous year. He made an appeal to the IMEC group to adopt a more positive position and accept the amendments submitted by the developing countries. Such an approach would enable the Committee to adopt a balanced resolution which took due account of the concerns of all groups.

163. The Government member of Norway welcomed the withdrawal of amendments by the IMEC and other countries, as well as by the Workers' group. He had hoped that the appeal made by the Government member of France would have been heeded and that the Government members of Tunisia and Egypt would have been able to withdraw their amendments, since a number of these would give the Nordic Government members considerable problems. He appealed for the adoption of the resolution in its present form by consensus as this would be a major achievement for the Committee. He also noted that the resolution had been sponsored by other groups in addition to the IMEC countries, namely the socialist governments, the western and socialist workers. This illustrated the broad support behind the present text.

164. The Workers' member of Jordan, thanking those sponsors who had withdrawn their amendments, wondered, however, why the amendments had been presented in the first place if their authors had not intended to pursue them seriously. He suggested that those who had sponsored such a large number of amendments knew it would take a long time to discuss them. All the members of the Committee wished to discuss the first five priorities. In order to make serious progress in the work of the Committee a working group should have been set up representing all the regional groups. This had not happened because a minority wished to impose its will upon the Committee.

165. The Employers' member of Kuwait thanked all those members who had withdrawn their amendments. However, he wondered why this gesture had come after so much time had been lost. He recalled the work of the Committee in 1988 and said that it was most unfortunate that the Resolutions Committee had not produced results. The authors of some amendments, however, did not wish to withdraw them. In one of the amendments the occupying authorities in every region of the world were asked not to use toxic gases. A resolution concerning the environment affected the environment as a whole and it was inconceivable that, in this context, the Committee should refuse such an appeal not to use poison gases. His group had made an appeal at the 1st sitting of the Committee for a positive spirit of solidarity to be adopted towards the work of the Committee, but this had not been heeded. The Arab members had consulted with the other groups, but there was resistance by some members to adopting any resolution concerning the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. If the members of the Committee wished to adopt a positive attitude they should be ready to adopt three resolutions, and not confine themselves to one.

166. The Government member of Argentina praised the good will shown by the IMEC countries in withdrawing amendments and supported the proposal put forward by the Government member of Tunisia that the amendments submitted by members from developing countries who had not co-sponsored the resolution should be accepted without discussion, so that the present highly important resolution could be adopted. Indeed, the resolution referred specifically to regions in countries whose amendments had to be taken into account, such as the countries of the Amazon basin.

167. The Workers' Vice-Chairman assured the Committee that the members of his group had proposed its amendments in all seriousness. He added that the Workers' group had held 12 meetings which had been open to all the members of the Workers' group. The decisions both to submit and to withdraw their amendments had been taken by the group as a whole without dissent. While supporting the draft resolution in its present form, the Workers' group had felt that it could be improved in a number of ways, and for that reason had submitted a small number of amendments. He considered that the evidence of the lack of the spirit of compromise within the Committee had been shown by those who had called for a record vote on the three-word title of the resolution. Such problems had been evident throughout the Committee. He said that the proposal made by the Government member of Tunisia that a whole block of amendments should be accepted by the Committee without discussion was unreasonable. Amendments, in order to be adopted, needed to be considered. He asked the Committee whether the workers in developing countries would really be better served by the adoption of no resolution at all rather than the resolution in its present form. At this time in the work of the Committee it was still possible for a resolution to be adopted. It might not suit everybody perfectly, but it would be of much greater benefit than the adoption of no resolution at all.

168. The Government member of Egypt, in response to the comments made by the previous speaker concerning the record vote taken on the title of the resolution, expressed his surprise at the position of a group of countries that sought to adopt a resolution concerning the environment within the framework of the International Labour Organisation, yet objected to a title that reflected the need to protect and improve the environment, which was undoubtedly the major purpose of any resolution on the subject. Furthermore, he recalled that the same group of countries objected to another amendment proposing to add the words "working environment", which would have established a link between the problems of the environment as a whole and those particularly related to the ILO. He pointed out that the proper place for a resolution that was concerned only with environment was in the UNEP. Finally, he asked, through the Chairman, to know the position and intention of the Employers' group concerning the amendments presented by them on the resolution.

169. The Government member of Kuwait supported the proposal of the Government member of Tunisia to adopt the amendments put forward by members from the developing countries without discussion and proposed that a working group be set up to examine the five priority draft resolutions so that they could all be adopted.

170. The Employers' member of Jordan raised the point that the sub-amendments to amendment D.8 could not be withdrawn without their authors' consent. Last year no progress had been made in the work of the Committee as a result of the obstinacy of some of its members. The resolution before the Committee was of great importance and should refer to the problem of the use of the toxic gases by occupying authorities.

171. The Government member of India informed the Committee that his delegation, together with the delegation from Sri Lanka, had submitted their amendments because the draft resolution in its present form was too lengthy, in some cases imprecisely worded and not properly balanced, since it did not adequately take into account the views and interests of developing countries. In addition, some of its demands went beyond the competence of the ILO. He and the Government member of Sri Lanka had therefore submitted constructive, serious and legitimate amendments. Other amendments submitted by other sponsors, especially some of those from the Employers' group and the one from the Government member of Malta, also had considerable merit and deserved careful consideration. He therefore encouraged the Committee to proceed with the discussion of the remaining amendments.

172. The Workers' member of Iraq said that it was his understanding that a compromise could be reached to adopt all five resolutions before the Committee if all amendments were withdrawn but some groups had made such a compromise impossible. He therefore supported the proposals made by the Government members of India, Tunisia and Egypt.

173. The Employers' Vice-Chairman said that his group was concerned that the Committee should adopt a resolution that was meaningful, worth while, well-constructed and of use to the world at large. His group had worked hard to try to improve the resolution through their amendments. While it was easy for the sponsors of the resolution to withdraw their amendments, those who had not had a part in drafting the text currently before the Committee understandably had greater difficulties. If there were to be a general consensus to withdraw all amendments, it might be that his group could give positive consideration to the adoption of the resolution. However, his group could not envisage withdrawing their own amendments while being required to support those put forward by other members of the Committee unconditionally.

174. The Workers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the resolution in its current form did in fact reflect the problems of developing countries. Indeed, its sponsors included Workers' members from developing countries, including a Workers' member from India. He re-emphasised that the choice before the Committee was basically to accept the resolution in its present form or no resolution at all. This second alternative could not be in the interests of the developing countries.

175. The Government member of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya wondered whether the withdrawal of the amendments submitted by the co-sponsors of the resolution was a political tactic. His own amendments to the resolution promoted the interests of workers and were designed to improve the resolution. He called on the Committee to adopt some of them. The Arab group assigned great importance to the resolution on the environment, but also considered the adoption of the resolution on the conditions of workers in the occupied Arab territories to be essential. Although the Workers' Vice-Chairman had said that the alternatives before the Committee were the adoption of no resolutions or of the present resolution in its current form, that solution had not been adopted in the Committee in 1988. Indeed, no resolution had been adopted in that year. The procedures used in the present year had, however, been very different from those of 1988 and the rules of procedure had been followed closely. He called upon the Committee to follow the suggestion made by the Government members of Tunisia and Egypt and to adopt the draft resolution on the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories.

176. The Government member of Tunisia specified that his suggestion had been that the Committee should adopt some of the amendments he had put forward. He was prepared to withdraw amendments D.73, D.74, D.76, D.77, D.80, D.82, D.83 and D.84. He then repeated his request to the representative of the IMEC group to indicate whether that group would be willing to accept without discussion a certain number of draft amendments submitted by the developing countries.

177. The Government member of France pointed out that many of the Government members of the IMEC countries who had submitted amendments had not been co-sponsors of the resolution. Their authors had attached great importance to their amendments and had only withdrawn them at this late stage in order to advance the work of the Committee. In reply to the previous speaker, he noted that certain of the amendments still before the Committee might well be acceptable to the IMEC group, but that that group could not agree to adopting them without discussion.

178. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic thought that those who had withdrawn their amendments had not properly examined the changes they proposed to make. His delegation did not want to hinder the adoption of any resolution that could be of benefit to workers. The resolution on the environment was of interest to all the members of the Committee, but was not complete. It could be improved by the adoption of the amendments put forward by members from developing countries. He emphasised the importance of the resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, which concerned dangers in those territories resulting from the activities of the occupying authorities.

179. The Government member of Norway noted that the draft resolution had a clear North-South perspective and included measures to alleviate poverty and generate income. The Government members of India and Sri Lanka had put forward many constructive amendments. Although the Government members of the Nordic group did not fully agree with all of them, in the spirit of compromise at this stage they were prepared to accept them.

180. The Workers' member of the Sudan noted that not all the Workers had agreed to the withdrawal of all the proposed amendments. If the Committee wished to change its method of work it would have to adopt all the first five resolutions.

181. The Chairman, noting that many amendments had not been withdrawn, suspended the sitting to enable consultations to take place concerning how the Committee might proceed with its work in the short time remaining. After consulting the officers, it was determined that the substantive work of the Committee should be deemed to have been concluded. At this point, although the Committee had adopted paragraphs 1 to 7 of the preamble of the first draft resolution, it had not completed its consideration of the first draft resolution. Consequently, with regret, the Committee had no resolution to propose for adoption by the Conference.

182. At an earlier stage in its discussions, while waiting for amendments to the above-mentioned draft resolution, the Committee had started and completed its general discussion on the second-ranked draft resolution. The following paragraphs reflect that discussion.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING DEVELOPMENT, FOREIGN DEBT AND THE SOCIAL OBJECTIVES OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

Presentation of the resolution

183. The Government member of Venezuela noted that he was presenting the draft resolution on behalf of the Governments of Argentina, Bolivia, Chile, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua and Venezuela as well as Costa Rica, Cuba and Suriname, which endorsed the draft resolution. He added that on 24 June 1986, the Conference had adopted a resolution concerning foreign debt at the initiative of several Latin American governments. Indeed, under the terms of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, debt constituted a danger to prosperity everywhere. Economic and financial policies were only acceptable if they were oriented towards the economic and social development of the populations concerned. Since 1986, the economic situation of developing countries had deteriorated and foreign debt had played a fundamental role in that deterioration. The servicing of debt and the structural adjustment measures that had been imposed had resulted in a tightening of public expenditure, and particularly social expenditure, and had endangered the fundamental rights of the population and, as a consequence, social peace. The balance-of-payments situation and servicing the debt had made developing countries into net exporters of capital and had led to difficulties in the implementation of the Conventions that had been ratified on trade union rights. This assessment had been confirmed by the events in Caracas in February 1989. The principal Venezuelan trade union organisation had recently organised, without any significant incidents, a demonstration which drew attention to the critical situation as regards incomes. The draft resolution that was being presented reaffirmed the premises and principles of the 1986 resolution. It invited the Conference to reconsider the payment capacity of developing countries. It also appealed to economic and financial institutions to give priority to dealing with all the problems associated with debt. The Director-General was invited to keep the Governing Body and the Conference informed of the cost of structural adjustment policies in terms of unemployment and poverty. He was also invited to intensify the necessary measures to strengthen the role and influence of the ILO in international discussions on the problems arising in that field and to continue to ensure that international financial bodies took fully into account the situation of debtor countries. The expansion of employment and the protection of incomes should continue to form the basis of any strategy to promote stable economic and social development. Finally, the Governing Body was requested to invite the Director-General to convene another high-level meeting on the theme.

General discussion

184. The Workers' Vice-Chairman emphasised the unity and deep concern of his group regarding this issue. All workers were concerned by the problems of debt, and particularly those in developing countries. It was for this reason that the Workers had given the draft resolution their second priority. The preamble made particular reference to the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia; indeed, the subject lay clearly within the mandate of the ILO. An examination should be made of the effects of debt for the activities of the Organisation, as had been done in the November 1987 High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment, in the Programme and Budget for the next biennium, and in this year's Report by the Director-General to the Conference. Reference should also be made to the World Employment Programme. ILO activities in this context should be intensified since the financial situation and the situation as regards freedoms had deteriorated. The debt burden was becoming heavier while the efforts made in many countries were negated by the deterioration in their trade balance. Those most affected by this situation and least responsible for it were the workers. The problem was particularly serious for the developing countries, although in an increasingly inter-dependent world, it also affected the industrialised countries. Indeed, responsibility was shared. It would be desirable to cancel part of the debt and to redesign its servicing, which was clearly too burdensome, by linking interest payments to the price of raw materials. Parallel efforts should be made to promote employment. The Workers had always believed that the social dimension of this problem needed to be taken into account. This was also the approach in the Director-General's Report to the Conference and the documents of the High-Level Meeting. This was the approach adopted in the draft resolution. In order to combat the negative human and social consequences of this problem such as, for example, constraints on social expenditure, it was necessary to ensure the participation of the social partners in the search for solutions and in the stimulation of international co-operation. The Workers' Vice-Chairman also referred to a number of reservations entertained by his group regarding certain passages in the draft resolution. He referred, for example, to paragraph 7 of the preamble and emphasised that the wording of the end of this paragraph should be revised in order to avoid giving the impression that failure to implement International Labour Conventions was condoned. Reference was also made in both the preamble and paragraph 3 of the operative part to the so-called "Guatemala" agreement. It would be desirable to find a wording which gave greater emphasis to the universal nature of debt problems. Furthermore, the above agreement contained principles which were not supported by the Workers. Operative paragraph 5 (d) called for the convening of another high-level meeting. The impact and success of such a meeting would depend, as in the case of the November 1987 Meeting, on the quality of the preparatory work. The 1987 Meeting had been valuable in particular because it had made international financial institutions aware of the concerns of the social partners. It was now necessary to give practical application to the conclusions of that Meeting in countries where structural adjustment policies were being applied, concerning which the financial institutions should consult the social partners. It was therefore important to hold another meeting at the appropriate time and, in the meantime, to take any measures that might be necessary.

185. The Government member of Venezuela indicated that her country was one of the authors of the resolution. She said, in particular, that examination of the issue of debt by the specialised agencies showed the complexity and importance of the problems involved. These problems persisted and were even deteriorating, despite the measures taken to improve the situation. The consequences were serious, particularly for working conditions and even for economic sovereignty and democracy in the countries concerned in Latin America and other regions. The ILO had understood the need to take action regarding these situations, particularly through the adoption of a resolution on this subject in 1986 and through the convening in the following year of the High-Level Meeting. Certain follow-up measures to the Meeting had already been adopted and the draft resolution was directed along these lines. The draft resolution was motivated precisely by a fervent desire to contribute to the improvement of the structures, machinery and procedures at the disposal of the Organisation in its efforts to ensure that national economic adjustment and restructuring policies were not pursued to the detriment of employment, income and economic development levels and did not add to the difficulties of implementing international labour Conventions. The resolution was supported by other States, including Costa Rica, Cuba and Suriname, in addition to its original sponsors. The authors had agreed to make a number of changes to the text of the resolution, such as the deletion of paragraph 5 of the preamble and part of operative paragraph 3.

186. The Government member of Zaire emphasised the interest felt by all developing countries, and particularly the African countries, in the resolution. As indicated in the Director-General's Report, the debt burden had become crushing and structural adjustment measures, such as the reduction in social expenditure, were particularly difficult to apply. Drought, the world economic recession and the economic factors behind the crisis added to these difficulties. All resources should be mobilised, including international aid. The action taken by President Mitterrand in cancelling the debts of a number of countries had been particularly appreciated. It was the duty of the ILO to attend to the social aspects of structural adjustment policies. Zaire had agreed to such policies and was attempting to align them with social progress. Among other measures, it had set up a consultative council for development in which efforts were made to harmonise the interests of the State and the social partners in this context.

187. The Government member of Nicaragua emphasised the burden of debt and its serious social and economic consequences for developing countries. In Latin America, Africa and South-East Asia 950 million people lived in a state of absolute poverty. The 1980s had been a decade lost to development and all the toil of the workers had been in vain. Their income had been swallowed up in debt-servicing. All their efforts had, in the end, served to increase the wealth of the richest countries and that situation had clearly had negative consequences on the living and working conditions of workers in the poorest countries (the reduction in public, and particularly social, expenditure, in wages, food subsidies, currency devaluations, etc.). The ILO, whose role consisted of ensuring the implementation of social policy, should take action to combat the deterioration in the situation of workers in the Third World.

188. The Government member of France also emphasised the economic consequences (the risk of a world economic recession had not disappeared) and the financial and social effects (the appearance of explosive social situations) of the external debt problem. They could only be solved by the combined efforts of all countries. The creditor countries needed to do more. France had come to this decision several years ago; President Mitterrand had announced a Bill to cancel the French public assistance debts of the 35 poorest and most indebted countries. France would also soon be taking measures for the so-called "middle-income" countries. The debtor countries should create new development through sound economic management. For those reasons, his country supported the resolution, although he had some reservations on a number of points which he felt were outside the scope of the ILO.

189. The Workers' member of Cuba noted that he supported the statements made by the spokesman for this group, but wished to lay additional emphasis on a number of points. The adoption of the draft resolution was a signal of the heightened awareness of the dramatic problem. The draft resolution recalled the 1986 resolution. Since then, the situation, particularly as regards workers, had deteriorated. There had been a dangerous escalation of the problems involved and of social tension. The risk of a social explosion was evident. All efforts towards development had been nullified, wages had decreased by 20 to 30 per cent in the developing countries and the situation had been worsened by structural adjustment measures and high bank interest rates. In Latin America the economic and social deterioration had led to popular uprisings, particularly in Venezuela and Argentina. The future was compromised. This situation was a manifestation of the crisis in the capitalist system and a policy of strangulation was being applied to developing countries, which had become net exporters of capital, since their outgoing financial resources now exceeded their income. The attempts made up to now to resolve this situation, such as the Baker Plan, had been failures. In order to obtain further credits, the countries concerned had to surrender their enterprises. It was the ILO's role to encourage concertation between governments, the social partners and other interested parties in the search for a solution, which should result in the elimination of unequal conditions in the terms of trade and in the removal of protectionist measures. In essence, this involved the establishment of a new international economic order. The ILO had much to say and do to this effect.

190. The Government member of the United Kingdom noted that the submission of the draft resolution clearly showed the concerns of the international community regarding the serious problem under discussion. External debt had both social and economic consequences and major efforts had been made by the international institutions to find a solution to the problem. Progress had been made, but the situation remained serious. Initiatives had been taken to lighten the servicing of the debt or, in any event, to prevent it from becoming heavier. The speaker referred to the proposals put forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the international agreement that he had obtained at the Toronto Summit. The novelty lay in the distinction that was made between middle-income countries and poor countries. In effect, Mr. Lawson had proposed a series of measures to restructure the debts of the poorest and most indebted countries which were trying to pursue positive policies. The British Government had decided to convert a number of aid loans into grants and had made other proposals concerning countries with large arrears to the IMF. He had proposed that if these countries adopted solid adjustment programmes they should be given the possibility of drawing on the ESAF (Emergency Standby Adjustment Fund). A global solution to the problem was not the best approach, and he favoured a case-by-case and country-by-country approach. The United Kingdom had adopted this approach. The role of debt reduction in the next stage of debt strategy was a matter primarily for the banks. The IMF and the World Bank were encouraging compensatory measures to protect vulnerable groups during adjustment. The real situation must not be lost sight of, particularly as regards the impact of the foreign debt problem on individuals. The ILO should not duplicate the work of international financial institutions, but it was right and proper for it to consider whether it could do anything more within its field of competence to attenuate the effects of the debt burden on individual workers.

191. The Government member of Israel also emphasised the seriousness of the problems facing debtor countries and the complexity of their relations with international financial and other institutions. Urgent action was needed to prevent the problems becoming more serious over future decades. Financial arrangements needed to be found and in order to do so, an examination had to be made of what had not worked in the past. In short, self-criticism was needed. The speaker made the following points. In the first place, the cancellation of a large part of the debt was inevitable, as was its rescheduling, taking into account the specific situation of certain countries. The internal policies pursued by debtor countries should ensure that certain situations were not repeated and should therefore result in internal reforms that were painful, but inevitable; they would clearly take time. Emphasis had been laid on the fact that the debt burden should be shared and should not weigh particularly heavily on the most vulnerable. The problem lay within the competence of the ILO. Solutions should not, however, be imposed. A programme should be formulated by the debtor countries themselves and they should take the appropriate measures. If the programme was able to convince the international community, assistance could be given for the development of the country in question. Such assistance was also in the interests of the creditors since, without recovery, they would not be repaid. Solutions should be equitable and should be aimed at social stability. Creditors and debtors should take initiatives and enter into dialogue. The ILO was clearly concerned in this process.

192. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic considered that external debt was one of the principal problems affecting international relations. The subject had been dealt with in the Director-General's Report and in the Conference, particularly in plenary session. The draft resolution had been given second priority by the Committee, thereby illustrating the wish of its members to encourage other efforts to find just solutions to this problem. The speaker referred to the 1986 resolution and to the High-Level Meeting and emphasised that follow-up measures should be taken along these lines. The draft resolution set out a framework for such measures. The debt of developing countries had increased considerably from 1986 to 1988 (1,320,000,000 dollars as against 1,152,000,000). Indeed, the preamble to the resolution noted this deterioration. Net movements of capital showed that debtor countries had become exporters of capital. Paragraph 7 of the preamble of the draft resolution noted that this transfer of wealth abroad was detrimental to employment, social services and economic development. The resolution referred to the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia and called for just and equitable solutions to be found; the speaker referred in this connection to operative paragraphs 4 and 5. He gave particular support to the convening of a second high-level meeting so that debt problems could be resolved in accordance with the social objectives of the ILO. He hoped that the resolution would be adopted by consensus since it was in the interests of all countries.

193. The Government member of Tunisia welcomed the presentation of the resolution. He emphasised that the African countries as a whole attached particular importance to the debt problem, which was jeopardising their development. The problem was central to the concerns of Africa, as had been illustrated at the ILO Regional Conference held in Harare. A resolution had been adopted on that occasion on the economic situation in Africa. The Conference had noted that economic insecurity was a major problem for workers, employers and governments and had emphasised the way in which it paralysed development and employment on that continent. The export of capital to service the debt had made the countries in the region into net exporters of capital. The Conference had welcomed a number of positive measures taken recently and had noted the report of the High-Level Meeting. It had welcomed, in particular, ILO initiatives to encourage financial institutions to take new measures which took into account the social dimension of the problem. Finally, the Harare Conference had called for the implementation of the 1986 resolution. For all these reasons, and in view of the economic difficulties at the world level referred to in the Director-General's Report, Tunisia firmly supported the draft resolution. The ILO was fully able to examine each of its provisions and the speaker hoped that the resolution would be adopted by consensus, as amended by its authors.

194. The Government member of the United States considered that it was entirely appropriate for the ILO Conference to discuss international economic problems where they affected employers and workers. The world had evolved and the growth process involved many hardships, but also gave the possibility of economic and social progress. A growing number of countries were realising that, in order to pursue the economic well-being of their citizens, they had to accept the global market with all its political, social and economic implications. The United States had engaged in a revolutionary structural adaptation process when that had been necessary. The speaker referred in particular to the automobile sector. Workers and employers had co-operated to help this sector out of its crisis. Problems persisted, but confidence had returned. This was an example that could serve as inspiration to workers throughout the world. However, there was no ready-made solution or single remedy to the problems which arose. Commitments needed to be made at all levels in order to make enterprises efficient and dynamic, which presupposed good worker-management relations. In the United States deregulation had been undertaken while maintaining protection for workers and consumers. Decision-makers had agreed to give up certain of their prerogatives and to consult the workers, who had been ready, in exchange and in the spirit of co-operation, to adopt greater flexibility. The Government had encouraged this development without imposing any solutions. In fact, there had been no miracle formula, but everyone had learnt from each other. Much depended on the decisions taken by employers, workers and individual trade unions and their combined wisdom, and on government co-operation. In the ILO, the workers, employers and governments were well aware of these problems. There was a need to take into account the impact of the measures that were adopted on the production units themselves. Consideration should not be confined to one aspect, namely debt, but should be extended to all the factors giving rise to economic difficulties. In brief, it was necessary to consider how the fundamental economic malaise should be treated and to reflect upon the way in which employers, workers and governments could deal in an overall manner with the employment and development aspects of economic problems. International financing was only one of these aspects.

195. The Government member of the Syrian Arab Republic stated that the debt problem needed a rapid solution. It was necessary to analyse problems and find a solution to them in accordance with the ILO Constitution. The various draft resolutions presented to the Conference, and particularly the one that had been placed in third position, confirmed these problems. He made reference to the sufferings of the Palestinians and the attitude of the Israeli Government to them. He added that the search for solutions should take into account this special situation. Man, who was the objective of the initiatives which were to be taken, should be the focus of any solution. The ILO should contribute to these efforts. The solutions found to the debt problem should be in line with the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, which encouraged the Organisation to co-operate in economic and social development. External debt shackled development. All of the resolutions that had been presented had very important objectives. He referred again to the situation of Arab workers in the occupied Arab territories and to the necessity to plan for their economic and social development. The violations of rights which were being perpetrated in these territories were having dramatic consequences for their development. He stressed again the necessity to obtain support for the developing countries so that their heavy debt burden could be relieved.

196. The Government member of Israel raised a point of order stressing that the previous speaker had exceeded the limits of the resolution under discussion.

197. The Employers' Vice-Chairman indicated that the Employers' group shared the concerns which had been expressed on the debt problem. He added that there could not be social progress without economic growth and that it was therefore necessary for there to be a favourable climate for the development of human resources. Individual initiative was particularly important, especially in the creation of enterprises, which should be encouraged. He remarked that growth in employment was particularly high in small and medium-sized enterprises, which provided one way of solving the problems of underemployment and unemployment. As many previous speakers had pointed out, heavy debt and high interest rates were obstacles to economic growth. He added that his group supported the resolution, but would propose amendments to encourage the ILO to act within its own field of competence.

198. The Government member of the USSR also stressed the importance of the debt problem in many countries and the fact that it was becoming worse. Servicing of the debt had become such a heavy burden that developing countries were now net exporters of capital. Fluctuations in exchange rates, the fall in the price of raw materials and protectionist measures reducing the capacity of debtor countries to pay. The solution of the debt problem was now more political than economic and required radical restructuring of international economic relations on a just and democratic basis. He shared the concerns of the developing countries which had had to reduce their social expenditure and the standard of living of their people which had subsequently given rise to difficult social situations. The objective of structural adjustment programmes should be not only to increase the capacity to service the debt but to create conditions leading to economic growth and the improvement of conditions of the populations in developing countries. The USSR was ready to give a moratorium of up to 100 years to the least developed countries and, indeed, to cancel the debt in some cases. With regard to other developing countries, his Government was ready to find a solution to these problems in co-operation with other countries and with the active participation of the United Nations. The ILO had an active role to play in regard to the social consequences of external debt. His delegation was in favour of the resolution.

199. The Government member of Czechoslovakia expressed the full support of his Government for the proposed resolution. He believed that debt currently appeared to be an instrument for the transfer of capital and that aid had become exploitation. Economic dependence of the affected countries had become worse and risked becoming permanent. Capital transfers jeopardised the future, hampered the development of humanity and threatened stability and world peace. In conformity with the provisions of the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, the ILO had the duty and the competence to examine international financial policies from the point of view of their social consequences. The Czechoslovak Minister had emphasised the fact in the plenary sitting of the Conference, as had Mr. Blanchard, during the ceremony held in his honour. An approach based on individual cases was insufficient. A global solution was necessary, and the ILO should contribute to this. The future, and the lives of millions of people, should not be sacrificed. External debt was in many cases a consequence of relations imposed by richer and more powerful countries and a permanent solution would require the realignment of these relations.

200. The Workers' member of the Syrian Arab Republic referred to the report of the Governing Body and the Report of the Director-General. The latter had examined objectively the importance of the social aspects of this issue as well as its direct effect on structural adjustment policies. The ILO should participate in the strategy of the United Nations Fourth Development Decade, and should, in this forum, emphasise these aspects. Serious problems hung over the developing countries. They lacked resources, and both their populations and their debts were increasing. These problems were acute. Insufficient financial resources and very high interest rates had led to a growth in unemployment, a decline in productive activities and a decrease in the availability of products. He supported the resolution and called on the other delegates to do likewise.

201. The Government member of China also emphasised the importance of the resolution and stressed the support which his Government gave to it. The problems of development and external debt weighed heavily on many developing countries. If no solution was found, then they would pose serious constraints for development and stability. His Government was convinced that the course of action should be based on equity. International consultation was necessary for this purpose, and the ILO, which was fully competent to do so in its field, should take part. Indeed, the outcome of the High-Level Meeting had produced good results. A new page had been turned in the development of the Organisation's activities and the way had been opened up to find solutions. The operative part of the resolution contained many acceptable requests, and this applied in particular to the call for a second high-level meeting to be convened. The adoption and implementation of this draft resolution should further enrich the Organisation.

202. The Workers' member of Jordan supported the spokesman of the Workers' group and expressed his gratitude to the authors of the resolution which would be useful to both developing and developed countries. Due to bad management of the loans from international institutions, the expected results had not been achieved, while high interest rates had endangered the ability of debtor countries to make repayments. This situation had been to the advantage of the industrialised countries and the financial institutions, which had held out false promises to the unemployed in the Third World. He also expressed his reservations with regard to the costs of expert missions which had made visits to appraise the problem. These very unfavourable conditions had led not only to an increase in unemployment, but also threatened social stability and therefore, international security. Renegotiation of the debts was an absolute priority and more capital must be directed towards the Third World. The ILO should adopt the present draft resolution as the Organisation had particular credibility because of its tripartite composition and because it embraced all of the forces of production. It was necessary to encourage the movement of capital towards the Third World which was only possible within a climate of democracy, peace and free expression.

203. The Employers' member of Argentina stated that the problems under discussion were common to a large number of countries. It was a matter of answering such questions as how resources should be transferred from debtor countries to creditor countries without compromising policies for growth; what the time limits should be; and what the consequences for employment policies would be. The development of the situation had been dramatic. Countries had not been prepared for this. Recently, however, awareness had been shown by the World Bank and by a certain number of people and countries (for example, the Baker Plan, the Brady Plan, the plans of France, Japan, Spain, etc.). It was incumbent on the ILO to emphasise the social effects of these developments. It could also encourage such developments as enterprise creation and the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises. It was now the time for long-term strategies rather than short-term ones. Governments, which had to deal with huge debts, must call on the foreign currency amassed by the private sector which was limiting investments. As well, many governments had not supported the initiatives of the private sector. Consideration should be given to such questions as the respective roles of the State and the private sector and the manner in which interest rates were fixed (banking conditions or calculations based on realistic possibilities). The ILO had obviously a role to play in this debate that should not be a demagogic one but had an intelligent policy.

204. The Workers' member of Nigeria stated that he was pleased with the high priority given to this very serious question. Debt was not only a threat to developing countries but also to the world economic system. He supported the statements made by the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group but wished to reply to statements which had been made subsequently. The solution did not lie in aggressive policies for debt repayment and in the social costs that such policies would imply. There was no economic policy, however reasonable, which did not have social impact. Even those countries which had sought to resolve the problem of external debt by devoting 50 per cent of their export earnings to its repayment had not found the correct solution. The distinction made between the public debt and the trade deficit was certainly important, but the practical effects were not clear. Many countries, including Nigeria, had sought to re-schedule their debt. The economic cost to do so was enormous and the problem was not really resolved. While the history of the debt crisis in developing countries as well as their relations with the industrialised countries should be analysed, it was also necessary to analyse the consequences of debt. It was doubtful that the debtor countries had to become more reasonable. Those countries which had embarked upon a policy of deregulation and which had favoured private initiatives and market forces, were no less in debt than other countries. It was, in fact, the simplistic formulas which had been applied to the Third World which had aggravated the situation. He also referred to the development of multinational enterprises as a contributory factor to the export of capital. There was no doubt that the ILO should discuss those questions in order to ensure that social factors were not forgotten. The ILO held a unique position in this issue and the contribution which it could make to a solution was reflected in the resolution.

205. The Employers' member of the United States recalled that he had been present at the adoption of the 1986 resolution and the controversy that it had aroused. Progress had been accomplished. The High-Level Meeting, held in November 1987, had resulted in conclusions which would serve as the basis for ILO programmes in this field; through the Committee on Employment the ILO was in the forefront of the debate on structural adjustment; and Mr. Blanchard had established an interdepartmental working group at the International Labour Office which would examine this question. A resolution could have a positive effect if it referred to methods, such as the encouragement of private initiative and deregulation policies, which could realistically improve the situation.

206. The Workers' member of Senegal expressed his support for the authors of the resolution and for the spokesman of the Workers' group. Developing countries found it difficult to bear the burden of external debt. The harmful consequences for Africa and for developing countries in general need not be recalled. He thanked President Mitterrand, as others had done, for his generous gesture towards the poorest countries, and he appealed to the industrialised countries to provide aid now that developing countries had to deal with drought and an invasion of crickets. Piecemeal aid was no longer sufficient to resolve the problem.

207. The Workers' member of the German Democratic Republic expressed his agreement with the spokesman of the Workers' group. He added that he fully supported the resolution, which was a logical follow-up to the 1986 resolution. All countries were affected by the increase in external debt. As the Report of the Director-General had pointed out, the 1980s had been a lost decade for Africa and Latin America in particular. The flight of capital was indeed a plague for entire regions. The figures were alarming and the international financial institutions had contributed to the problem. The interest paid by debtor countries amounted to more than had been lent, and, as the Report of the Director-General had pointed out, developing countries had become net exporters of capital. He shared their concern. Disarmament measures taken by the socialist countries and related agreements should release more resources for development. He supported the idea of a second high-level meeting. The problem under discussion concerned all of humanity and the ILO should concentrate its attention on it. He hoped that the Conference would adopt this resolution.

208. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany pointed out that placing this resolution second was significant. The problem of debt was considered to be one of the most important problems. He pointed out the competence of the economic and financial organisations such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The ILO had expressed its opinion during the High-Level meeting. As for his own country, the Federal Republic of Germany believed that it had an important role to play in this issue and had consequently taken measures in regard to the least developed countries, and to sub-Saharan Africa in particular, by either cancelling debts or giving grants. He added that a global approach towards indebtedness should not be adopted. Instead the situation prevailing in each country, as well as the manner in which each country could improve its situation, should be taken into account. An exchange in experiences was in the interest of these countries given the world's interdependence. Structural adjustment measures should help to regulate the problems either as a whole or in part, and facilitate the improvement of the living conditions of the poorest. International organisations such as the ILO could not work miracles in the issue of indebtedness. It was necessary to be realistic and not ask too much of them. Although these institutions were an essential factor in international co-operation, they had not created the problem and could not resolve it on their own. The ILO should make proposals within the context of its role. To this extent the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany supported the resolution.

209. The Government member of Nigeria stressed that the debt problem touched millions of people and that it had taken on alarming proportions which was a threat to economic, political and social stability, as well as being a factor in unemployment. Many developing countries had to pay more than 30 per cent of their income in debt-servicing. This was to the detriment of social services and economic development and was putting at risk peoples' lives and the security of property, while the harm caused by structural adjustment programmes was becoming unbearable. A way out of the crisis must be found. The ILO, because of its tripartite structure, and, furthermore, because the Declaration of Philadelphia stressed that poverty endangered the prosperity of everyone, could and should contribute to finding such a way. Agreement on this had been apparent during the discussion on the draft resolution. Nations were more and more interdependent. Total repayment of the debt was not possible and the situation was creating tension in international relations. The time had arrived to hold a real conference on the question of debt cancellation.

210. The Government member of Algeria considered the problem to be one of the most crucial for both debtor and creditor countries. It had taken on particularly serious proportions because it jeopardised the security of the world economy, and indeed, international stability. This very particular economic situation compromised the future. Terms of trade were deteriorating and the debtor countries were receiving insufficient foreign currency from the sale of their raw materials. They had to deal with protectionist policies and the refusal to transfer technologies, which was retarding industrial development. At the same time they were suffering from cyclical economic crises, while demographic problems and numerous natural disasters had added to these difficulties. The burden of debt was unbearable. Developing countries had become net exporters of capital and the economic and social repercussions of this were numerous and serious. The shortage of foreign currency had contributed to negative economic growth, and to a drastic reduction in social expenditure and the purchase of foreign goods. Initiatives such as those taken by France and by President Mitterrand should be hailed. However, the middle-income countries should not be forgotten. It was urgent to establish a general framework and fix the criteria for debt repayments which would not destroy national economies and would maintain their internal stability. The ILO, because of its tripartite structure, was an appropriate forum for such negotiation. Radical approaches must be envisaged since one could not demand debtor countries to do more than what was possible. Many speakers had pointed this out with disarmament in particular being mentioned. This action would be a factor in national stabilisation.

211. The Workers' member of Somalia recalled that the foreign debt problem was a complex issue affecting developing countries at a time of severe economic difficulties resulting from the world economic recession. The last decade had in effect been lost for development. The general deficit in the balance of payments of developing countries had resulted in lower real incomes, low productivity, food shortages, unemployment and an increase in the cost of living. Structural adjustment policies were far from proving their worth as remedial measures, while the fall in commodity prices from developing countries was compounded by the increased cost of imported capital goods from industrialised countries. In order to resolve the problem of unjust terms of trade a new international system of economic relations was needed. The adoption of this important draft resolution by consensus would therefore enable the ILO to contribute to the solution of this critical problem and prevent the development process in the indebted countries from being further undermined. Another high-level meeting would be instrumental in promoting consultations and dialogue to that effect. International co-operation needed to be strengthened in the interdependent world economy for the mutual benefit of both industrialised and developing countries.

212. The Government member of Venezuela thanked previous speakers for their support for the draft resolution. He repeated that the text was a follow up to the 1986 resolution and to the High-Level Meeting. It was necessary for an update because the situation had not improved. The role of the ILO, as far as the social effects of the situation were concerned, was very important and conformed fully to the Constitution of the Organisation and to the Declaration of Philadelphia.

CONSIDERATION AND ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

Consideration of the report

213. The Committee considered the draft report at its 12th sitting. Corrections to specific paragraphs were submitted by various members for incorporation into the report. A certain number of general remarks were also made about the proceedings of the Committee.

214. The Government member of Qatar expressed his regret that because members had not shown sufficient goodwill not one resolution had been adopted by the Committee. He expressed the hope that a solution could be found next year to the impasse and that all the parties concerned would co-operate to achieve positive results.

215. The Workers' Vice-Chairman also regretted the lack of results to the Committee's work and said it was necessary for all to reflect upon their responsibilities in this situation so that it could be improved in the future.

216. The Government member of Tunisia, speaking on behalf of Government members of the non-aligned countries, regretted that for the second time in two years it had not been possible to adopt a resolution. He further regretted that fact because the draft resolutions given priority in the present year dealt with subjects which were of prime importance to the developing countries. The Governments of the developing countries had been anxious to make an active contribution to the work of the Committee by presenting resolutions on themes of common interest and by submitting amendments aimed at making the draft texts balanced, acceptable to all and formulated in a manner which could be easily adopted by the Conference. He added that unfortunately these governments had been forced to admit that not all the Committee had shown this spirit. Certain members had proposed that the draft resolutions be adopted by consensus, but they had not been heeded. The countries for which he was the spokesman also regretted that the decision to withdraw amendments to the first resolution had not been announced sooner. Indeed, if that had been the case, an agreement on the resolution, vital for all humanity, would doubtless have been achieved. The manner of the withdrawal had been aimed at creating an effect of surprise rather than efficacy, whereas informal consultations and negotiations would certainly have been successful. He noted that the amendments of the developing countries had never obtained the agreement of the other groups. He deeply regretted that situation and was planning to voice these and other reservations again, if appropriate, during the plenary sitting of the Conference.

217. The Employers' member of Jordan also expressed his regret that for the second time a resolution presented by the Arab countries had met with obstacles at the Committee because of the submission and discussion of a large number of amendments. He expressed his concern in regard to that, because the situation in the territories in question was particularly worrying. He hoped that a draft resolution on the issue would be adopted next year. He also referred to the visit made by the Secretary-General of Histadrut to the Secretary of Labor of the United States, during which it appeared she had made certain commitments concerning the Arab resolution.

218. The Government member of Israel, on a point of order, stated that the preceding statement was, in his view, an attempt to open a debate on a subject which was not on the agenda.

219. The Government member of Canada said that it was not his intention in this sitting to return to the difficult issues which had confronted the Committee. Consequently he would not respond to the remarks of the Government member of Tunisia on behalf of the non-aligned group. He could speak on behalf of the IMEC Governments in expressing the hope that the principles of good will and good faith involved in that statement would in fact be lived up to next year so that the Resolutions Committee could again contribute in a constructive way to the important work of the ILO.

220. The Workers' Vice-Chairman wished also to express his reservations on the statements which had just been made by the Government member of Tunisia. If the latter wished to formally raise the question he also would wish to comment on different aspects of the situation raised, and the reasons which had led to it. He rejected the accusations and the reservations which the Government member of Tunisia had raised. He could not accept, in particular, the implications in certain statements that the Workers' group had not helped the debate by submitting amendments to the first resolution. He pointed out that no other initiative than that of the IMEC Government members had been made and that the resolution had been sponsored by Workers' members from developing countries. He believed that for some members of the Committee certain amendments had greater priority than the resolution itself. He repeated that in his view a resolution without any amendments would have been preferable to no resolution at all.

221. The Government member of the United States categorically rejected as unfounded insinuations made about the United States Secretary of Labor. These had no basis and were totally inappropriate.

222. The Chairman of the Committee noted that certain speakers had expressed their feelings concerning the work of the Committee. They had expressed their bitterness and had made a number of clarifications. These statements were important because they indicated directions for the future. Lessons should be drawn from them. The Committee was unique of its kind. It had just adopted a report which informed the Conference and the workers of the world of its work and of its disagreements on draft resolutions concerning the environment, debt, occupied Arab territories, etc. Five of these texts had been considered as priorities and, in spite of everyone's efforts, no result had been achieved because the procedure could be used to thwart the progress of the work. That situation, which had also occurred the previous year, should be reflected upon and efforts should be made to find a solution. The continuation of that state of affairs was dangerous. Good will should prevail and be translated into deeds.

Adoption of the report

223. At its 12th sitting the Committee adopted its report. Many members, including the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen, expressed their warm congratulations to the Chairman for the manner in which he had conducted the discussions in the Committee. Together with the Chairman, they also thanked the Secretariat for its work.

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Thirty-third sitting

Saturday, 24 June 1989, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mrs. Molkova

THIRTEENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – The first item on our agenda is the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee. I give the floor to Mr. Hammond, Government adviser, Canada, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to submit the report.

Mr. HAMMOND (Government adviser, Canada; Chairman of the Selection Committee) – I have the honour to submit to the Conference the thirteenth report of the Selection Committee, which is to be found in Provisional Record No. 4L. The report deals solely with changes in the composition of committees.

I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – The discussion of the report is now open. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

REPORTS OF THE GOVERNING BODY AND THE DIRECTOR-GENERAL: DISCUSSION (concl.)

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – We will now continue the discussion on the Reports of the Governing Body and the Director-General.

Original – Arabic: Mr. ABU KHORMAH (Workers' delegate, Jordan) – In the Name of Allah, the Merciful, the Compassionate! I have the privilege of joining previous speakers in congratulating the President of the 76th Session of the Conference for the confidence that has been placed in him by this assembly. This confidence, which is well-deserved, is also placed in his country, which is a friendly nation, and in the African continent, which continues to fight for independence, for national sovereignty and against all forms of racial discrimination.

In taking the floor as we are about to conclude the work of this session of the Conference, I should like to pay tribute to the President, to his wisdom, his experience and his efforts, which have now been crowned with success. I am also happy, in my own personal capacity and on behalf of the trade unions of Jordan, to address myself to Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, to congratulate him and wish every success in his work. We are confident that he will meet our expectations and do as well as his predecessor, Mr. Francis Blanchard, who put his stamp on the life of this Organisation and did a great deal to help us achieve the noble goals of our institution.

The Director-General has chosen for his Report this year a subject which is particularly interesting and highly topical, namely, Recovery and employment. In the face of the threat of destabilisation of the world economy, this choice of subject is particularly welcome, especially within the tripartite framework of our Organisation, which was described by Mr. Francis Blanchard, the former Director-General, as the parliament of the world, since the ILO groups government, employers' and workers' representatives. This Conference will therefore have a considerable impact and tremendous influence on life in our societies if, through our discussions, we can reach a consensus on the ways and means of solving international problems, especially in the social sector.

I am particularly happy to note the progress made by trade unions towards achieving prosperity for workers and towards obtaining observance of fundamental human rights and trade union rights and freedoms. In my country, we firmly believe that these rights and freedoms make a considerable contribution to democracy and to economic recovery particularly in the developing countries – and that it will also help us achieve our objective of progress.

My country is a developing country; that is why we feel that economic recovery can be achieved only in an environment of peace, disarmament and intergrated development. Poverty, wherever it exists, is a threat to all, even the rich countries.

The peace we are striving for is peace based on justice and law. But peace and freedom in the world can only be achieved by reducing zones of tension, by respecting the rights, freedom and sovereignty of all peoples and by eliminating the instinct of domination and expansion, so as to ensure that no country is any longer treated as a power in the game of international relations, because all conflicts – even regional and limited ones – can only hinder economic recovery.

Statistics show that arms spending constitutes the lion's share of the budgets of all countries in the world, in particular those of the developing countries. In addition, hundreds of billions of dollars are spent every year on arms tests – in particular on nuclear weapons and on the space arms race. There is no doubt that if these considerable amounts were devoted to development, poverty and illiteracy could be eradicated and there would be a chance of achieving true economic recovery.

How is it possible to believe that economic recovery can be achieved in the face of demographic explosion and dwindling food and agricultural production not to mention the increase in the number of poor people, the deterioration in basic and health services – especially in developing countries – the problems of unemployment and social tension, and the violence they engender, the deterioration of the environment, the increased desertification of our planet and the harmful effect of the use and depositing of toxic substances which threaten nature and possibly our very existence.

These problems can only be solved and overcome through a well-structured international effort, in the framework of the United Nations, and through the efforts of the specialised agencies. This further highlights the role which should be played by the ILO and by dialogue with a view to ensuring democracy and respect for the rights of all peoples and eradicating selfish goals of supremacy.

At the time when democracy is gaining ground, there are still people who cling to an egoistical and nationalistic approach, even here in this body.

There is yet another obstacle in the way of economic recovery – one which threatens international stability – that is the debt crisis. This is a truly disastrous problem confronting the Third World countries, a crisis which is at the very heart of the conflict between the creditor countries and the indebted countries. It is no longer merely a financial problem, but is now an international political problem which has created economic and social tensions.

This problem calls for a rapid solution and the re-consideration and re-examination of the economic system. The debt burden should be reduced, in particular for the least developed countries. The draconian measures imposed by the IMF and the World Bank should be lightened or even eliminated, so that these two institutions could become veritable assistance-centres and not institutions that curb economic development.

The Report of the Director-General furthermore describes the lot of the workers in Palestine in the occupied Arab territories, and I would like to thank the Director-General for this efforts in this area to follow up the resolutions of the International Labour Organisation, adopted in 1974 and 1980. I wish also to thank the members of the mission sent by the Director-General for their well-founded conclusions.

I would like to point out that our unions have worked together with this mission of inquiry and, as the Report says, we should emphasise the persistence with which the occupying territories have violated trade union rights and freedom, its discriminatory policies, exceeding the crimes of Nazism and those of South Africa. The imposition on Arab workers of the wearing of badges and the ban on their freedom of movement is proof of discrimination. This is glaring evidence that the Tel Aviv authorities continue these practices regardless of their international obligations and the ILO resolutions which Israel continues to ignore.

I will not go into the policies of annexation, the creation of settlements, the expulsion of trade union leaders, the detention of hundreds of workers, not to mention the hundreds of innocent victims, the continuation of the forced occupation policy, the rejection of the peace initiative, the production of nuclear arms without any international control, the refusal of the right of the Palestinians to self-determination on their territory, Palestine in accordance with United Nations resolutions passed from 1947 to the present and to their historic and legitimate rights at a time when Israel no longer has any moral or legal justification for pursuing such practices.

Does this not imply that the international conscience should clearly assert itself and denounce these violations and urge Israel to accept peace initiatives before it is too late? Not to mention the need to reconsider Israel's membership in our institutions if this country does not hold to its commitment.

At a time when we are denouncing these human rights violations, we should also denounce the practices of the South African Government, and we would like to reaffirm the legitimate rights of the Black majority in South Africa.

The climate of détente now firmly rooted today calls for more dialogue to enable us to solve our international problems and crises. The only fora in which this objective can be achieved are those of the United Nations and its specialised institutions.

We should therefore strive in unison for the good of mankind and for the attainment of international peace, so that future generations may prosper in peace and tranquility and that prosperity may be guaranteed to all those who for so long have suffered from war and tension.

A calm dialogue is our only option.

Original – Arabic: Mr. TIZMAAGHZ (Government delegate, Islamic Republic of Iran) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! “O soul at peace, return unto thy Lord, well pleased, well pleasing! Enter thou among My servants! Enter thou My Paradise! (The Koran, Sura of the Dawn). We offer our condolences to the Islamic world, to the weak and all those fighting for a cause, on the loss and death of the leader of the Islamic nation, and the leader of the Islamic Republic, our Master Imam Khomeini – may the mercy of God be with him. We hope that Almighty God has taken him into paradise, along with all true martyrs.

The world has lost a leader, whose equal has not been seen during the past decades. No one has been able to render sufficient praise, either by word of mouth, or in writing, to this great leader who has uprooted colonialism, imperialism and Zionism and torn down all the Pharaonic idols of our age, in the same way that the Prophet (May the prayers and peace of God be upon him) tore down the idols of the Qaaba. The Iman was a source of inspiration and his light will guide future generations.

We should like to take this opportunity to thank the member States, their Excellencies the Ministers of Labour, workers' and employers' organisation, who have offered us their condolences and proclaimed mourning – and we hope that they will all be patient.

“Peace be upon him, the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised up alive!” We belong to God and we shall return to Him. The Islamic revolution will spread in the same way that Islam spread after the Prophet Mohammed (May the prayers and peace of God be upon him).

Mr. President, I should like to congratulate you upon your election to the Presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference and wish you every success.

The Director-General, in his Report and Annexes, refers, after 70 years since the creation of the ILO, to many problems. They bear witness to the fact that the world situation has not improved and that the ILO has not succeeded in attaining its hopes and its objectives.

The ILO's achievements, whatever they are, are few and hardly commensurate with the scope of its aspirations. It is for this reason that we feel bound to speak of the obstacles and restrictions that have thwarted the attainment of these objectives.

We note that the world economy is deteriorating and that the prices of raw materials and natural resources from the Third World have dropped, while the prices of production of the industrialised countries have increased. The countries of the North have conquered the countries of the South and they are continuing to exploit the weak and to suck their blood. Security and peace have been trodden underfoot as a result of the inhuman ambitions of world imperialism. The Third World countries, Africa and Latin America have to face up to major economic difficulties. All this means that the basic rights of the disinherited are violated without the international organisations doing anything at all to prevent this.

In his Report, the Director-General speaks about poverty, hunger and the widening gap between the poor and the rich. We are concerned about this widening gap because millions of people are dying of hunger while the world is overflowing with food. More than one thousand children die every minute while millions of tons of wheat are thrown into the sea to maintain high price levels. This tragic situation obliges us to speak up on all matters, whereas world imperialism takes no notice of this tragedy and continues its policy of exploitation. We must wage war against this chronic disease and institute actions that will establish economic links between the Third World countries who hold the major share of natural resources and all countries who do not have imperialist ambitions.

While congratulating the new Director-General, our brother Mr. Michel Hansenne, I hope that his term of office will auger well for the attainment of the noble objectives that reunite us within this Organisation. We hope that, through the Director-General, we shall witness significant changes in the activities of the ILO so that it becomes the right arm of peace-loving nations and applies international labour standards in order to guarantee social justice and to respect the principles of mutual co-operation.

In addition to adopting new Standing Orders which would facilitate his task and enable him to take the necessary action against the obstacles that have hampered the progress of the international community, we should turn our attention to the expenditure of the Organisation, the length of its meetings, its structure and its relations with member States.

We hope that the Organisation will free itself from the grip of imperialist and colonialist States, especially the Great Satan and the Zionist enemy. By means of their financial contributions, the imperialist forces succeed in buying the conscience of this Organisation. It is the duty of the Governing Body to adopt a serious approach to guaranteeing the independence of the Organisation, by relying on governments who do not impose financial conditions or by taking special measures to enrich the Organisation from a budgetary and financial standpoint. We are entirely prepared to co-operate in this vital field.

We insist on the necessity of technical co-operation, vocational training, the funding of projects and the adoption of international standards that do not serve imperialism and do not pose moral obligations.

We are sorry to have to point out that there is a basic error in the assessment contained in the Report of the Director-General of the suffering of Palestinian workers and employers in the occupied territories of Palestine.

Amongst the odious practices and violations of basic rights, it is relevant to note: the application of collective sanctions, the martyrdom of scores of young heroes and the repression by the Zionist occupation authorities of the heroic Islamic uprising in Palestine. Although the Director-General acknowledges these facts, not only does he fail to advocate any practical measures but he even covers up these odious practices. Has man therefore been created without a position so that the Director-General does not have to take a position on occupation? Has not the time come when we should no longer allow the Zionist enemy to be in the midst of the United Nations family and the International Labour Organisation?

We are also sorry to say that many governments, who do not govern according to God's law in their political, economic, social and legislative life, also have similar practices to those of the Zionists. We believe that our support of the "intifadah" of the heroic Palestinian people and of those combating racial discrimination in South Africa constitutes the cornerstone of our foreign policy. We shall continue to give our support to all those striving for liberty; we condemn any violation of human rights; we call for the elimination of apartheid; we strongly abhor the policy of State terrorism and ask that everyone should respect the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and adopt a clear attitude towards State terrorism.

This year, our honourable Conference was marked by a serious event – a terrorist sect, which has nothing to do with labour problems and the principles of the Organisation, was invited to attend. This constituted an extremely dangerous plot and had clear imperialist intentions. This plot was thought up with the assistance of various officials from the Office and Western governments who want to impose their will on the Organisation. While thanking the majority of governments and workers' and employers' organisations for the excellent attitude they adopted, we hope that this will be the first step in our efforts to unite against world imperialism. Free democracy held its head high. The majority of member States at the Conference proved that they were capable of braving these wicked plots and they respected the principles of the Organisation in accordance with its Constitution. We thank the President of the Conference, Mr. Nkomo for the excellent way in which he conducted the discussions on this matter: his attitude will remain a symbol of honour and dignity for the Conference in the future and movements of this kind will no longer be able to interfere with its proceedings. May God confer victory upon you and light up your way. Victory only comes from Almighty God.

In concluding, on my own behalf and on behalf of the delegation accompanying me and the Muslim Aranian people, I wish the Conference every success and hope that it will live up to the expectations placed in it and that it will assume its full responsibilities at this vital turning point in history.

I thank you for your attention, May the peace, mercy and grace of God be with you.

Mrs. FOULKES (Workers' delegate, New Zealand) – I would like to congratulate the officers of the Conference on their election and extend my best wishes to them for the success of the remaining days of the Conference.

I would also like to wish the Director-General well in his new tasks and responsibilities. Those tasks will be particularly stressful in this period of readjustment for all international institutions. The New Zealand Minister of Labour in his speech to the Conference challenged the Director-General to review the mechanism of the ILO. I join myself to that challenge, as the Organisation is too vital to the lives of workers internationally to allow inefficiencies or tradition to hold back its progress.

May I also commend retiring Director-General Blanchard for adopting as the major theme of his final Report the issue of how growth and social progress can be restored in the coming decade. This is precisely the theme that the workers' movement in New Zealand is focusing on at this time in its history.

In his Report, the Director-General drew attention to some of the imbalances that have existed in the process of growth in the past year. In particular, the growth in the OECD countries has not eased the burden of Third World debt, nor has it improved the conditions of life of all the communities and sectors within the OECD. In short, growth is not a sufficient condition for social progress, nationally or internationally.

New Zealand has not been spared many of the global problems that the Director-General drew to the attention of the Conference, and I would like to share with you the response of the workers' movement in New Zealand to these problems.

New Zealand has not shared in the growth phase of the last year; indeed its economy has contracted. Although levels of public debt and foreign debt are not of conventional debt crisis proportions, they are uncomfortably high and require appropriate fiscal and structural responses. The reactions of the Government to the problems of the economy – involving as they do the traditional IMF restructuring initiatives of deregulation, public sector cuts, tight monetary problems, liberalisation of the finance, privatisation, etc. – have traumatised many sectors of the workforce and have been extremely uneven in their impact.

The New Zealand Council of Trade Unions do not deny the necessity for change. Further, even when changes that it opposed because of their pace or impact or inequality, have been made, the CTU has not simply sought to reverse what has been done. It has been prepared to face the new reality of the prevailing economic order and to move on to face the future.

In New Zealand, as in many of the industrialised countries, the political debate is trying to give the impression that communities have a choice between only two solutions. They may return to negative forms of interventionism or embrace a brave new world of market forces.

We believe that a reliance on market mechanisms is not consistent with the attainment of full employment, equity or personal security. At the same time we recognise that mechanisms have to be found to deal with the globalisation of economic activity, the rapid pace of technological change and the demands of consumers for both public and private sector outputs, for more diversity and for a greater control over the forces that shape their lives.

The CTU has advocated a third choice that lies between the anarchy of an unregulated market economy and the stifling impacts of management by negative forms of intervention.

The essence of the third way is a more participatory style of management of change, operating on the macro-economic level in the design, implementation and review of social policies, on the path to adjustment in different sectors and industries and in the review of methods of work at the level of the workplace.

The problem that we, and I suspect most other countries, have is that we have not developed the institutions or methods of work to allow for a more equitable and participatory style of social and economic development to emerge. We are operating labour market systems that were designed for the productive conditions of the last century and not for the conditions that we are likely to face as we start off to the next one.

We will have our problems as we try to break out of the reactive, conflict-driven approaches of the past, not the least of which will be the lack of vision of the employers' organisations within our country. Their calls for a withdrawal of all state influence and central co-ordination overlook the fact that many of New Zealand's most profitable enterprises built their success on primary resources and marketing co-ordinated by the State. For our part, the workers' movement is prepared to look back at its past in order to face the challenges of the future.

The trade union movement in New Zealand is approaching the end of its first 100 years of struggle. Much has been won. Yet as the union movement looks towards 1990, the vision of a confident and more secure future for working people is starting to fade.

Across all sectors and industries the conditions of work are unravelling. In the meat industry, freezing works' closures continue. The forests grow, but there is no investment for new processing facilities and new wood-based industries to take advantage of emerging opportunities.

In manufacturing, cheap imports are forcing local producers out of business, and a funding crisis in the health sector threatens ward and even whole hospital closures. Tens of thousands of state workers have been laid off, or lost their union protection or been forced into casual or contract work as commercialisation, cutbacks and privatisation have hit nearly every branch of the public service.

In the face of all this, New Zealand unions have to think very carefully about how they look at the next century of struggle. The New Zealand economy, and New Zealand society along with it, are changing massively. Some of the change is simply a consequence of New Zealand being caught up in the momentum of world forces – such as the types of technology that are leading to an increasingly international economy. Some of the changes are a reaction to economic circumstances or political decisions of the past – such as the need to manage an accumulated public and private sector debt. Some of the changes flow in the wake of deliberate government decision – for example, to deregulate the finance sector and float the dollar. Some of the changes are driven by ideological agendas – like the desire of the Business Roundtable to deregulate the labour market and de-unionise workers.

Whatever the source of change, there are two common points to make.

Firstly, the way change impacts on workers is not predetermined or inevitable – the management of change is crucial in determining who it affects, how it affects them, and how it affects their future prospects.

Secondly, by and large, the unions have been excluded from the management of change, be it at the level of government policy or at industry of workplace level.

Despite the gains of 100 years of struggle, the fact is that they have been won by a union movement that has been forced into a narrow, reactive role.

Unions have been kept away from the “big levers” of government and management. They have had to respond to the economic and social conditions that governments and management policies have created.

During periods of full employment and sustained economic growth, this was less critical as there was a role for unions in making sure that working people got a fair share of the fruits of progress. It is in bad economic times that the limits of a negative role are exposed. Unemployment and fear for the future have combined to shatter hope and confidence among workers.

These conditions have been worsened by the conditions of a new age. Like it or not, the economy is now more open and more international. Technological change is gaining momentum. The skill requirements of a modern economy are constantly rising. It is no longer sufficient to tinker with the system in New Zealand. Workers must play a more assertive role in shaping the system to avoid being crushed by it.

In New Zealand trade unions have condemned and resisted progress as change rolled over the rights and jobs of workers. But change has rolled on anyway, shaped by others for others.

If trade unions are to be influential, a new approach to organisation is required. I believe there is a tremendous untapped reservoir of experience, knowledge and commitment in the ranks of organised labour. It can be mobilised to tackle the problems of unemployment, inequality and insecurity.

A new role for New Zealand unions, specifically a more active and continuous involvement in negotiating key government and management policy initiative, will require unions to change, to face hard decisions and to be party to dishing out the deficits and not just the surpluses.

Unions have to believe that the economy can be managed in a way that is less harmful to workers, even in bad economic times.

We are confident that the union movement can meet the challenges of this new age. The alternative is to leave to other parties and interests the design of the future and the place of workers in it. And that is not an acceptable option. Our third way recognises that the world is constantly changing. The change brings challenges but it responds to the future through a process of consultation, participation by those who are affected and the working out of the best way to progress.

Planning and the constant review of the changing world have to take place at four levels. They are general government economic policy, government social policy, adaptation of individual sectors and industries, and at the workplace. And the aim of the consultations must be: to create jobs; to improve security; to reduce inequalities; and to engender mutual respect within the community.

But when we try and do this, it soon becomes clear that we do not have any mechanisms through which consultations and negotiations on large issues can take place. The task is to get an agreement to set up such institutions. It does not really matter what name is given to an agreement to set up a network of new structures to allow a third way to be followed. The Prime Minister of New Zealand has called it a “compact” and we are currently working to negotiate this compact with the New Zealand Government. But the name does not really matter.

At each level of participation in decision-making – government policy, industry adjustments, workplace levels – there are three basic strategic choices for change. The first is voluntary. With this approach, new methods of work develop by mutual and voluntary agreement between the affected parties. In short, a voluntary strategy is the status quo. Not much has happened in New Zealand with that regime. Will it change if it is left as it is?

The second option is a facilitative approach by Government. Here the Government encourages and assists new participatory methods at all levels of decision-making but does not force them.

The final option is for structured change, with legislation setting up new bodies and defining new rights and obligations in the various parties to work through the system.

Obviously, different strategies can be applied at different levels. The different mixes of strategies and levels lead to a range of options for compact processes at different areas. The union movement is currently deciding which part it wishes to select as it starts on the next century of struggle. Before finalising policy, however, some basic questions have to be tackled. What is our preferred option for work? What is the minimum combination of structures within an economy? Do we have the knowledge, time and people to take a wider role in managing change? What changes do we have to make to union structures and methods of work to allow unions to fill that role effectively? How do we blend industrial activity into the new methods of union work? Are ready to take the responsibility for the consequences of our own decisions?

The workers' movement in New Zealand has identified the options for new methods of work towards promotion growth and social progress. It is prepared to examine its own limitations in a search for a new role for unions and a new method of managing change. We have serious differences with the Government about how it is reacting to current short-term issues of economic management. Indeed, our own Government would be well advised to note the warning of the Director-General that too rapid a process of deflation is counterproductive, particularly because of its effects on investment.

We have engaged, and will continue to engage, in the contemporary issues of economic policy. But we will also look at the future and try to forge a constructive approach to the world of work from where it is today. I congratulate the compassion and vision of the approach of the ILO to the challenges of the future, and I associate the workers' movement of New Zealand with all progressive forces attempting to convert that vision into a real experience and into the daily life of the working people of this world.

Mr. NAIGOW (Minister of Labour, Liberia) – Please allow me, on behalf of my delegation, to associate myself with those speakers who have preceded me in congratulating Mr. Nkomo on his election to the presidency of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. May I convey my warmest congratulations to the other officers of the Conference. I wish to further congratulate the new Director-General of the ILO, Mr. Hansenne, on his well-deserved election to the high office of the Director-General of the ILO. I would also like to pay tribute to Mr. Francis Blanchard, the retired Director-General of the ILO, for the good services he rendered the ILO member States.

The President has brought to this high position of the Conference a wealth of experience and we are convinced that this is not only an achievement for him but also for his country and the continent of Africa. In this connection, I am confident that, under his able leadership and his wise guidance, the deliberations of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference will further the Organisation's contribution to social development. We are particularly happy that a son of Africa is the chairman of this Conference at a time when problems of external debt have forced poor countries in Africa to export capital desperately needed to revive development.

The Director-General has included in his Report to the Conference this year the topic "Recovery and employment", which is of great interest to Africa, especially to the sub-Saharan region.

My delegation share the view of the Director-General that economic growth alone will not provide solutions to our problems; it must be accompanied by some social progress since human beings are both the means and the end of economic development. We agree with him that there is need for economic growth which would generate employment and also fight poverty.

It is saddening to note that at this time when the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary and is taking stock of its achievements, the continent of Africa is going through its eighth year of economic recession without any sign of recovery from such recession or depression. Regrettably, the average per capita income in the region in 1987 was lower as compared to that of 1980. Besides that, real wages have dropped sharply in most countries, and others have experienced a dramatic fall in real income since 1980. The productivity of labour also declined on the average during the 1980s. The combination of such unfavourable trends has led to a growing poverty in the region to the extent that it is now believed that half of the population now lives below the poverty line; and the situation is worsened in the areas of education, nutrition, health and housing. The fact that the unemployment situation in the region has reached crisis proportion, cannot be overemphasised, because, at present Africa's urban unemployment rate stands at 10 per cent, almost double the rates of unemployment in Latin America and Asia and, as such, is the highest in the world.

Regrettably, at the time such an alarming unemployment situation is prevailing in the region, JASPA has revealed in its studies, that as many as seven million modern sector jobs have been lost since 1980. The consequence is that the deprived African labour force has reached the limit of its endurance, as evidenced by the numerous civil eruption leading to loss of lives in a number of African countries.

Besides that, it is crystal clear that the social fabric and the much needed political stability of the African society is threatened. How can one expect any prospect of economic recovery of social progress in such circumstances?

And so I venture to say that there is an urgent need for the development and effective utilisation of Africa's vast reservoir of human resources. In this regard the developed and the developing countries have their parts to play. They could in the first instance establish employment exchanges to allow the flow of workers across national and international borders. Additionally I would like to call upon the developed countries and international and financial institutions to implement the recommendations of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment which, among other things, call for the writting off of foreign debts. My delegation would like to stress also the need for adjustment in national policies and international economic relations with the aim of creating employment opportunities to narrow the gap between the haves and the have-nots in the human family.

My country, Liberia, like other developing countries in the African region, is also faced with the problems of economic recovery and mass unemployment the consequence of which is being borne by the State, the employers and the workers alike. However, we are striving to overcome this sad situation with a sober sense of concern for our people by encouraging the creation of a good union climate. For example, we are encouraging workers to play a strong leadership role enabling workers, employers and Government to be one, thus strengthening the tripartite approach to unemployment and problems of recovery. To combat unemployment, the Government has taken several steps. First and foremost it has enshrined in the Liberian Constitution the right of every citizen to work and the right to equal opportunity, the prohibition of discrimination and forced labour. It has initiated labour-intensive agricultural programmes to generate employment. It has divided Liberia into 13 political subdivisions known as counties, and in each county is constituted a local council vested with powers to make decisions in local matters affecting them directly. It has launched the Green Revolution which requires all Liberians to invest in any of the three sectors of the Liberian economy, namely rural, urban and informal sectors. For the success of the Green Revolution, the Government is in the process of relocating the University of Liberia outside Monrovia to increase the capacity for manpower development. It has also engaged in the development of economic infrastructures such as the construction of farm-to-market roads, highways between Liberia and the neighbouring sister States, reforestation, construction of ports, radio stations, power plants as well as social infrastructures like low-cost houses for police, army and the workers, pipe-borne water, hospitals and seafarers' school. It has encouraged the establishment of co-operative societies and medium-sized enterprises. For their purpose the Government has introduced a land reform Bill in the national legislature to allow nationals as well as non-nationals to own land in fee simple to enable them to obtain loans from the commercial banks when necessary by pledging such conveyance. The Government is also in the process of restructuring the Ministry of Labour to enable it to take the additional responsibility of employment creation and promotion.

I wish further to state that, as an indication of my Government's interest and concern for the welfare of the workers in Liberia, the National Social Security and Welfare Corporation was established with the mandate to implement three schemes, namely, the Employment Injury Scheme, the National Pension Scheme and the Welfare Scheme. Thus far, the Employment Injury Scheme which was launched in 1980 has been extended to cover all employees in private, public and governmental sectors, with the assistance of the ILO.

I wish to mention, however, that despite all these corrective measures introduced by the Government, an upsurge of unemployment and underemployment still remain our major problem due to the rapid growth of the population and the limited employment opportunities. We therefore need the assistance of the ILO in implementing the projects already in the pipeline, amongst which are: food-processing technology, employment promotion in urban and informal sectors, improvement and development of employment services, labour statistics, employment market information system and the strengthening of the training department of the national port authority.

I wish to acknowledge with thanks the ILO technical assistance extended to the Government of Liberia already in the area of planning, social security and other related projects which were designed to bring about economic recovery and social progress. We appeal to the ILO to consider assistance in the areas mentioned above and the expansion of the ongoing projects.

We are particularly grateful to the Director-General for the Director Contacts Mission which visited Liberia in early May this year. This mission has led to the debate on the proposed Labour Code in the National Legislature, and its adoption in law is imminent.

Finally, my delegation believes strongly that only with the political will and moral obligation can there be lasting peace and prosperity for workers the world over. Liberia unequivocally supports the fundamental principles of the ILO and will continue to do everything to live up to its requirements.

Original - Spanish: Mr. AMADOR ZAMORA (Employers' delegate, Costa Rica) - On behalf of the Costa Rican Union of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprise I should like to congratulate the President on his election and Mr. Francis Blanchard on the success of his work.

I think it would be appropriate to clarify certain points that have been made about alleged violations of trade union rights by Costa Rica, alluding in particular to the employers. I consider it both necessary and opportune to make these clarification so as to place on record before this Conference and the delegates, the necessary elements for judgment in order for an objective assessment of the democratic realities of our country to be made.

It has been said that the solidarity organisations enjoy privileges denied to the trade unions and that the right to work has become null and void because they have been turned into dismissal offices. In order to understand better our solidarity associations and what is meant by the word solidarity, I would like to quote sections 1 and 2 of the Solidarity Associations Act:

"Section 1. Solidarity associations are humanistic social organisations through which man is identified with the needs and aspirations of his fellow men, and thus uses his resources and his efforts to satisfy these needs and aspirations in a just and peaceful manner. Their management and administration is exclusively in the hands of the affiliated workers.

"Section 2. The main purposes of these solidarity associations are to afford justice and social peace, worker-employer harmony and the full development of their members."

Solidarity is a manifestation of two principles: freedom of action and freedom of association laid down in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and in the political Constitutions of the democratic countries, as is the case of Costa Rica.

The Costa Rican employers, as firm defenders of both principles, consider with respect any initiative by the workers aimed at their own well-being. We consider furthermore that the solidarity movement, as stipulated in section 8 of the Act, paragraph CH, is not a movement which discriminates against trade union organisations and co-operatives, because it is forbidden to carry out any kind of activity tending to combat or hamper in some way, the setting up of these two types of organisation.

We, the employers, consider that the solidarity movement defends freedom of action and programmes connected with it, in all sectors of our social activity. We, the employers, do not dictate the course of action of the organised groups of workers but, on the contrary, we are happy to see them looking for ways of organising themselves in order to achieve their own well-being, thus promoting suitable worker-employer harmony.

It has been said that the solidarity movement has been used by the employers to encourage unemployment, but it is worth while looking at the statistics of our country, which show that open employment in 1982 was 9.4 per cent and in July 1987 it had decreased to 5.5 per cent. It should be pointed out that among the promises made by the President of the Republic, Dr. Oscar Arias Sanchez, there was one to create 25,000 new jobs each year during his term of office. We are happy to accept this challenge and we have contributed to a large percentage of these new jobs being created in the private sectors, thus promoting untraditional exports which this year will exceed a total of 400 million dollars.

It has also been said that the implementation of structural adjustment programmes is putting an end to the remains of the social reforms which our country promulgated at the beginning of 1940, under the Government of Dr. Rafael Angel Calderón Guardia, including social guarantees and a Labour Code which enabled our country to achieve social justice without facing the problems which now affect the neighbouring countries.

It has further been claimed that the recently drafted regulations on trade union freedom have drawn violent opposition from the most conservative employers and the solidarity organisations. I should like to make it perfectly clear before this Organisation that Costa Rican employers welcome an ongoing dialogue with a view to social consultation within the tripartite framework established by our Organisation, the ILO.

Costa Rican employers are aware of the benefits afforded by harmonious worker-employer relations and that is why we reiterate our openness to ongoing dialogue with workers and with the Government of the Republic in order to lay down the foundations of proper economic recovery and to achieve sustained development leading to continued generation of employment and the achievement of a $2,000 million level of exports in 1992 and – why not – enabling us to aspire to be one of the first developed countries in Latin America.

We are aware of the seriousness of the external debt affecting our national economy. That is why we believe in the necessity of sound public finances and clear-cut rules enabling private enterprise to contribute to the offsetting of our heavy external debt, while social programmes for the benefit of the poorest continue to be carried out.

To say that in Costa Rica we have sacrificed social programmes to the implementation of structural adjustment programmes is simply not true, because proper negotiations and implementation of those programmes have led to benefits for all Costa Ricans. For example, this has made it possible to contain inflation, which is unquestionably the highest price any people can pay.

The present administration is developing a programme to build 80,000 housing units. This is a goal which, without any doubt, benefit the most impoverished citizens and foster realistic solutions to the problem of housing, which affects the majority of the developing countries.

I would like to conclude by pointing out that Costa Rica is a small rural democracy which, in a few days, will be celebrating 100 years of democratic life. Over the years, it has passed legislation ensuring a series of rights and social guarantees which play a prominent part within Chapter V of our political Constitution, of which all Costa Ricans are proud and which, we are also fully aware, have brought great benefits in terms of social peace, which we all enjoy, and which we are ready to preserve and to strengthen day by day.

Original – Arabic: Mr. HOWAYDI (Workers' delegate, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya) – In the name of God, the Merciful and the Compassionate! First of all, I should like to join the previous speakers in congratulating the President on his election to the Presidency of this session of the International Labour Conference. This testifies to the confidence which this Conference has placed in him. We are all the more pleased to see that the choice fell on a citizen of a fraternal African country, to which we are linked by our common struggle, objectives and destiny. We are convinced that his wisdom and ability and that of the other officers will enable the work of this session of the Conference to be crowned with success.

I should also like to congratulate Mr. Hansenne, the new Director-General of the International Labour Office, on his election to his new important office. We hope that under his leadership, the activities of the International Labour Organisation will be stepped up and progress will be achieved in every area, especially in the defence of human rights and trade union freedoms, in order to achieve our noble and humanitarian objectives and to put an end to injustice, oppression, exploitation, racial discrimination and all of the crimes committed against human beings in our time – crimes which endanger security and peace throughout the world and which are most clearly and tragically illustrated by the racist and inhuman practices of the occupation authorities in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories and by the yoke and domination imposed on the peoples of South Africa and Namibia by the White racist minority.

In pursuance of the Constitution of our Organisation, the ILO has a crucial role to play in the struggle against all forms of colonisation, exploitation and injustice, and to combat all of the iniquitous rules which encroach upon the rights, freedom and dignity of mankind.

In Annex III of his Report, the Director-General gives an account of the report of the fact-finding mission of the ILO to Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. It shows us that the heroic popular revolution, led by a generation of angry Palestinians through their popular committees, has highlighted some truths which are now so flagrant that the occupation authorities can no longer conceal them from international public opinion. These realities are essentially caused by the suffering, injustice and tragedy to which the Palestinian people has been subjected by the occupation of its land by a racist entity. Yes indeed, the popular Palestinian revolution has lifted the veil from the shameless exploitation perpetrated by the racist occupation authorities in an attempt to crush the Arab identity of the Palestinians and to devastate the Palestinian economic structure.

The report of this year's mission of the ILO contains a number of conclusions which imply a denunciation and condemnation of the racist practices of the occupying entity, which violates the most elementary rights and freedoms. The occupying authorities murder dozens of innocent women and children daily, using the most abhorrent methods of physical annihilation, since they resort to plastic bullets, burn citizens to death and bury them alive. To this should be added arbitrary arrest, banishment, prohibition from travelling, restrictions on religious freedom, violation of the right to education and social protection, the policy of confiscation of land and water resources, the establishment of settlements, the pursuit of a policy of discrimination against, and exploitation of Palestinian workers, the denial of trade union freedoms, arrest of trade unionists and closure of trade union premises in occupied Palestine.

From this rostrum, we salute the struggle of the Palestinian Arab people and especially the popular Palestinian revolution. We proclaim our firm and unshakeable position of support to this revolution until the total liberation of Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories.

The Special Report of the Director-General on the application of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia presents an analysis of the dramatic situation in which the people of South Africa and Namibia live under the yoke of inhuman racist repressive practices. The results which cannot be achieved using the information and figures contained in this report confirm the inherent link between the racist Pretoria regime and the racist policy of the Zionist entity which seized Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. We should like to confirm here our support for the legitimate struggle in which the people of South Africa and Namibia will be engaged until their liberation and confirm our denunciation and condemnation of the colonialist and racist policy of the Pretoria regime and anyone who supports it.

The Report of the Director-General, deals with a vital subject – Recovery and employment, structural adjustment and its social cost – and reviews the major objectives of labour legislation. We, within the General Congress of Producers of the glorious Socialist People's Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, have discovered for ourselves, through the socialist Jamahiriyian doctrine, the error and vanity of traditional solutions which are used to pull the wool over the eyes of the workers of world; indeed, many workers have suffered in societies based on injustice which have tried to exploit workers, through their sweat and toil, and use them as a docile means to serve their objectives.

We believe that it is very important that the questions discussed by the International Labour Conference should be on a higher level and go beyond the mere discussion of secondary matters such as wage increase, improved working conditions, or other stop-gap measures; according to our experience, the radical solution lies in suppressing wages and encouraging workers to free themselves and become partners in production. We are convinced that the role of the ILO could be enlarged if it geared its activities to studying the experiences of peoples so that it could gain from these. This would constitute a creative contribution to the solution of problems that workers have to confront throughout the world. From this rostrum, we invite the ILO, through its bodies and structures, to study the experience of the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya. It would then see how we have succeeded in advancing beyond our previous stage – when we were merely concerned in defending workers' secondary rights – to attain the noblest objective, i.e. that workers should gain the fruits of their efforts in the production process. We sincerely hope that the conscience of workers throughout the world will understand the nature of the relationship between the three factors of production – which are the basic elements in the production process; "the worker" is the most vital element in this process. The initiative must be given to workers because they are producers of what the world consumes. The income from this profit should not line the pockets of those who exploit workers – it should go to the workers because it is the result of their toil and sweat. Workers should no longer continue to claim part of the production; they should raise their voices to gain what they deserve: their share in the production.

We believe that the main task of this Organisation is to devote all its capabilities and all the work of its regular conferences to the cause of this noble objective and to attain the ideals contained in its Constitution.

If we study seriously the nature of the rights of the working class in the production process and if we analyse all the factors of production – or what is called in traditional economic systems the "components of production" – we reach the conclusion that the traditional system of salaried employment is unfair because the compensation given to the worker is not commensurate with his efforts in the production process and the hours he devotes to work. If we compare the outcome of these efforts and this approach, we are aware of the injustice involved – whether it is on the part of the employer, either individual of the government.

The relationship between the factors of production in national law gives each of these factors a share in production which is commensurate with the effort involved; whereas the bonuses granted to workers under a wage system only compensate for part of their efforts. The surplus goes to line the pockets of the employers, whose wealth increases, while workers continue to be deprived and suffer ignorance, sickness and poverty. The exploiters and the capitalists, for their part, profit from the good things in life.

The unfair social struggle is therefore still continuing between the rich and the poor, the powerful and the weak and it is still the law of the strongest which prevails.

Original – Russian: Mrs. TODOROVIC (Workers' delegate, Yugoslavia) – I should like to congratulate Comrade Molkova and Mr. Nkomo on their election as officers of this 76th Session of the General Conference of the International Labour Organisation. At the same time, I should like to take this opportunity to convey the sincere gratitude and greetings of the Council of the Yugoslav Trade Union Confederation to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his contribution to solving major issues of considerable importance for the work and life of workers, and our sincere congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Michel Hansenne, who has assumed the functions of Director-General.

The proposals and the report submitted to us at this session of the Conference demonstrate that many issues are common to all the workers of the world and that the problems of development must be resolved in such a way as to enable the needs and objectives of development to be more speedily met, through co-operation and mutual understanding between developed and developing countries. This need is not only felt by the developing countries, but also derives from the economic relations and interdependency which now exist among countries, so that the population of the whole world shares the same fate.

Based on the realisations, achievements and results attained by the International Labour Organisation, which this year is celebrating its 70th anniversary of successful work, we in our country are also constantly working to improve conditions of work and the occupational and legal protection of workers. The economic reform and the market orientation of enterprises, equitable treatment of public, mixed and private enterprises, the opening up of considerable possibilities for the investment of foreign capital, the establishment of share-holding and joint-stock companies – all of these are efforts aimed at enabling us to keep in pace with the opportunities and requirements for our country to become an equal partner in the international division of labour and to establish the economic conditions necessary to forge more solid links between our economy and that the developed countries. As a result of the high debt and the negative trends in the economy during the past few years, inflation is growing at a faster rate and this adversely affects the material and social situation of workers. Last year, real wages continued to decline (last year by 8 per cent and in the first three months of this year, by an additional 12.5 per cent). This makes it increasingly difficult to secure essential living conditions for the families of workers, especially those employed in traditionally low-paid branches, such as the textile and footwear industries, forestry, wood processing, stone and sand, construction, and others, which employ approximately one-third of all jobholders.

Reduced capital investment and the slowdown in the introduction of modern equipment and machinery exacerbate working conditions, resulting in an increase in the occupational disability rate and a decline in productivity. On the other hand, the introduction of new technologies, where this has been possible, has created what is known as technological labour surpluses in a situation where employment is already declining, while the number of unemployed, especially among women and young persons is increasing.

In view of these facts, it is incumbent upon us here at the Conference to propose that full support be given to further efforts within the framework of the ILO towards the solution of the so-called debt crisis, as a prerequisite for putting a stop to the impoverishment of the economy and of the workers of countries which are doomed to drown in debt as a result of currency exchange and interest rates. The results achieved so far are obviously not sufficient. May I mention, by way of example, that last year the amount paid out to cover interest in our country exceeded the amount allocated to wages; obviously, no amount of productivity can compensate for this. This problem is particularly acute in the underdeveloped regions of our country, such as Kosovo, Montenegro and Macedonia, which urgently need regional development. In view of all this, we fully support the approach taken in the Director-General's Report as regards the urgent need to resolve economic and social problems which loom over the next decade as well.

The reforms aimed at releasing enterprises from their social costs mean that it is not clear where social welfare payments will come from, and this threatens the already low standard of living of families dependent upon such payments. We are aware that the Director-General's Report states that economic growth in itself will not solve these problems without the active participation of the developed regions and all social groups; we agree with the evaluation to the effect that only a global approach, in which includes social policy as a component part, can yield satisfactory results.

The Council of the Yugoslav Trade Union Confederation emphasises the need for structural changes in the economy taking into account the conservation of a healthy human environment (water, air and soil), but our own material resources are inadequate. This is why it is necessary to seek the assistance of the ILO in the solution of this problem which is still before us. The threat from contamination of water, air and soil knows no boundaries.

The economic and social reform now under way in our country presupposes an internal trade union reform, a reform of the workers' mass organisation itself. The basic positions which are under discussion among our members, provide some indication of the changes to be undertaken. Obviously, under market conditions in our country too, the trade union cannot participate in determining social development by assuming entire responsibility for everything, even for the actions and decisions made by the Government and the management of enterprises. In the trade unions, members are becoming increasingly aware of the fact that the union must mature into a partner which has the right to conduct negotiations with the Government and the management of enterprises and to use every means in defending its proposals and to do everything necessary to ensure that the worker's interests and needs are respected as those of the irreplaceable factor of production.

A worker's motivation does not, as it is known, depend only upon how much he earns. On the other hand, subsistence wages are an inadequate stimulus for any worker, whether he is a machine-tool operator, a teacher, a doctor or an engineer. That is why the Yugoslav Trade Union Confederation has established its position regarding the issues on which it is insisting. This renewed trade union, in anticipation of its Congress, asserted its autonomy and independence, from its position on wages, social policy and employment, to personnel policy and the rights and obligations of workers. This attitude taken by the trade union has yielded results on many issues. For the first time, its members, represented on a mass scale, are dealing with issues of collective agreements, clearly defining the relations, rights and duties of employers and trade unions. Of course, all of this involves difficulties and uncertainties, for instance in regard to relations in mixed enterprises and other similar entities, but we are convinced that for all of these uncertainties, there will be solutions which are appropriate to our conditions. The constitutional amendments adopted last year have affirmed the workers' right to strike. Not all stoppages in our country have been designated as strikes. This is why the unions have drawn up their own rules governing the use of strikes as a means of struggling. However, there is also a need to introduce certain provisions in the new Act respecting labour relations in order to guarantee certain rights of workers (as regards health care, disability, benefits and pensions) and to prevent possible abuses.

The Act respecting labour relations, which is in the course of being adopted, brings major changes. The position taken by the Yugoslav Trade Union Confederation is as follows: There can be no threat to the level of occupational safety already achieved and to the position of the workers; greater freedom and responsibility must be given to the collective in taking internal decisions, while the standards laid down in ILO Conventions and our previous legislation must be adhered to. This also applies to the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). In our country the Yugoslav Trade Union Confederation took the initiative ten years ago to propose that a solution be found to the problems arising in the application of this Convention. In the name of "protection of women", in practice this Convention became an obstacle to the employment of women, especially if one considers that our labour legislation views assistance, understanding and care for children as the responsibility of both parents, and not only that of the mother. In other words, exemption from night work can be applied to either of the parents, and not only to the mother, as well as to a single parent. As for the protection of health and the psychological well-being of workers employed on night shifts from the effects of prolonged night work, this must be guaranteed on an equal footing for both women and men, except, of course, during pregnancy, when women are treated separately; if the women breastfeed, protection is extended for six months after the birth of her child. Statutory paid maternity leave runs from 180 to 360 days (depending upon the policy regarding population growth and the birth rate). We support the proposal to embark upon the elaboration of a new Convention on night work for women because the prohibition of night work for women has frequently been used as a ground for discriminating against women in regard to employment.

I am convinced that this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference will make a major contribution in the development of labour relations and for the workers, and I wish to thank you for this in advance.

Original - Spanish: Mr. ARAGON MARIN (Employers' delegate, Nicaragua) - May I first of all express my congratulations to the President on his election. These last days have given us evidence of his skill in chairing our work, the success of which is thereby assured.

I would like also to welcome Mr. Michel Hansenne, the new Director-General of the ILO, whose qualifications and experience will provide effective guidance in the activities and tasks of our Organisation.

In addition I wish to pay tribute to the years of unceasing effort and dedication Mr. Francis Blanchard has given our Organisation. During his term as Director-General he has made a major contribution to the good functioning and consolidation of the ILO, for which we are all grateful.

The Report of the Director-General before us gives a general economic picture which fills us with fear and concern. Workers, employers and governments of developing countries are suffering the effects of an economic system which merely disadvantages the national economies of these regions.

Employers are not spared the effects of the crisis. On the contrary, we are at the very heart of them and daily bear the pressure of the consequences.

Our companies in the Third World are suffering from the lack of proper conditions necessary to face the unfair competition of the international market. In general, the situation in our productive infrastructure represents a level of costs drastically reducing our moderate profits. Thus, we are in an extremely serious economic position.

The consequences of the unfair international economic situation are that employers are faced with a two-fold tension. On the one hand, workers are developing a dynamic struggle for their rights which, without questioning its justice, is at times, beyond both our possibilities and our control. On the other hand, the aggressive fiscal policies of governments designed to reduce their fiscal deficits and increase financial input through taxes also place our enterprises in an extremely difficult situation. It should be frankly admitted that private initiative at times compounds the errors of leadership and the strategies of the governments.

In order to face the present economic crisis, it is not enough to change the international terms of trade. It is not enough to give our products equitable price treatment. We must add to this a set of national policies which truly encourages employers and creates a viable economy.

No solution to the crisis is feasible, unless due account is taken of the specific realities of the productive units.

Thus, in implementing measures for structural adjustment, effort should be made to incorporate social factors into the necessary objectives for economic recovery, with the sacrifices this implies.

The external debt and its implications is another matter which should be borne in mind. Not only is it harmful to governments and workers but also it seriously hampers economic growth and improved productivity of Third World enterprises.

These thoughts lead us to the conclusion that, indeed, without true tripartism, it will be difficult to achieve specific objectives while progressively overcoming the crisis.

In order to attain these objectives, the social partners must be ready to make the necessary concessions and agreements required by each enterprise. The workers must be ready to moderate their claims according to objective indicators and the possibilities of the enterprises. The employers must fully assume all social responsibilities incumbent upon them as guarantors of employment, and the governments must fully understand that, from the State's point of view, there can be no substitute for the dynamics of the social partners.

These tripartite efforts should not take place only within a national context but should also have an influence on world economic decision-making bodies and in the industrial development sectors.

In Nicaragua, we employers are truly committed to putting forward our legitimate interests and claims as a group, we therefore advocate daily the strengthening of a tripartite system which would recognise and involve all forms of property without any exclusion. In this system, account should be taken of the large, medium and small sized enterprises in the various branches of activity.

At this point, recalling the words of many Nicaraguan producers at the national tripartite meeting in the agricultural sector held in April this year, we would like to point out that the possibilities of economic recovery are greatly disturbed and hampered by the economic embargo to which Nicaragua is at present subjected.

The economic embargo has limited our possibilities of re-equipping our machinery and procuring spare parts. It has led to severe shortage of raw materials and inputs, and has hampered the profitability and growth of private enterprise.

In this context, peace is a national aspiration and not only a slogan of the Government. The employers need peace in the country in order to recover the productive zones which were abandoned during the armed conflict.

We need peace in order to offer workers stable employment and to put an end to recurrent mobilisation for military duty and its effects on production and the emotional well-being of workers' families.

We need peace to prevent the national economy from collapsing, and to obviate the need for restrictions and limitations on trade unions and employers' organisations. Although undesirable from an economic standpoint, such restrictions and limitations could prove necessary to ensure the country's survival.

We appeal to all countries and governments of the world, without exception, to contribute to efforts towards peace in the Central American region, to enable Nicaraguans to solve their own differences without any intervention or interference.

We have a right to a better future. And for this reason we have confidence in our final destiny.

Mr. GATTEGNO (Employers' delegate Israel) – I would like to congratulate the President of the Conference on his election.

Permit me to commend the Director-General on his Report, Recovery and employment. This is, in my humble opinion, a highly sophisticated analysis of the complex problems related to growth and social progress. He explores the question of whether growth is always associated with job creation or whether growth may be the result of increasing productivity, or abolishing employment rigidities, etc.

I fully agree with the Director-General that economic growth and social progress must advance together, since they are inextricably intertwined. Social legislation is never economically neutral; unless wisely and carefully introduced, it will slow down development or even cause economic reversal.

One of the factors that has contributed notably to the presently high unemployment rates throughout much of the world is labour market rigidity. This rigidity has interfered with the necessary adjustments required to cope with a changing marked and technological conditions. Therefore, present arrangements embodied in collective agreements and government regulations need to be re-examined in order to permit more appropriate responses to a changing world.

Thanks to measures based, to a great extent, on a tripartite socio-economic charter, and to economic measures taken by a broad coalition Government, Israel has managed to reduce inflation from almost 400 per cent in 1986 to 19 per cent in 1987.

The rate of unemployment was not seriously affected in 1987 by the anti-inflationary measures; it hovered around 6 per cent. In 1988 it began to rise steadily and in recent months reached 8.5 per cent.

One of the severe difficulties from which our economy has suffered, has been the exorbitant interest rate of 19.7 per cent per annum (overdraft). Only recent has it been reduced by 3 per cent per annum. Export growth has fallen from 8 per cent in 1987 to 4 per cent in 1988; there has been a serious drop in new investments.

One of the difficulties that our economy faces is the rigidity of wages and fringe benefits. The recently passed Minimum Wage Law is particularly harmful, not only because of its escalatory effects on wages in general, but also for the unprecedented interference of the State in the autonomy of social partners to negotiate freely on wages.

Another "self-inflicted" difficulty results from certain regulations and benefits prescribed by our Unemployment Insurance Law, namely, the great leniency in qualifying refusal to take available employment as justified. This results in the absurd situation of a high unemployment rate and a considerable number of vacancies.

Night work by women was forbidden up till 1986, where legislation was enacted to permit night work by women subject to certain provisions, such as providing transport to and from work, appropriate rest periods, etc.

I would like to comment on the respect of the ILO mission on the situation of Arab workers from the administered territories, contained in Appendix III.

The mission defines riots and acts of terror committed in these territories against Jewish and Arab populations as "uprising" or "intifadah" (in Arabic), thus following the introductory remarks to last year's mission report by the Director-General. At the same time, the mission assumes a critical attitude towards the definition of state security used by the Israeli authorities as being very broad. They consider that the refusal to give certain jobs to Arab workers constitutes a discriminatory practice. It seems to be presumptuous on the part of the mission to act on matters that involve state security considerations of Israel, for such an area surely is outside the scope of the ILO mission to the region.

This year's mission presumably did not have the benefit of pursuing and analysing the Experts' report on ecology, water supply and health services submitted to the recent Nairobi Conference with regard to the administered areas. This report bases its findings on comparison and progress made since before 1967 till now, thus presenting a true and objective picture.

On several occasions in recent years, in their remarks in the general discussion of the Director-General's Reports to the ILO Conference, the Israeli Employers' delegates have requested that a comparison and progress report be included in the mission's findings – in vain.

This failure disqualified the report, in my opinion, both from the academic as well as the moral point of view.

Another weakness of the report of the mission is the incomparability of the sources of information so far as their reliability is concerned.

While all the facts and figures submitted by the State of Israel and its various organs, such as the Central Bureau of Statistics, are of proven and internationally recognised reliability, the information contained in Annex 2 (Communications received from Arab countries and organisations), is unchecked, of questionable reliability, based often on hearsay evidence, newspaper information or gossip.

May I point out that a not generally known aspect of the administered areas is that in certain sub-branches of manufacturing the tax burden on enterprises in those areas is less than that borne by Israeli enterprises, an arrangement that creates difficulties for Israeli producers.

The mission's report draws attention to the distinction in Israeli practice between condition of employment on a monthly versus a daily basis. Monthly workers in Israel enjoy better conditions. The accusation is that since most of the workers coming from the territories are employed on a daily basis they are discriminated against. The above distinctions was enacted in the 1950s, long before the territories came under Israeli administration, and it is prevalent in a number of branches. In those branches both Israelis and Arab workers are employed under daily conditions.

The mission has also misunderstood Israeli law and practice regarding paid annual leave. Two weeks' paid annual leave comprises 12 working days and two days of rest. Therefore, a worker entitled to two weeks' leave, whether Israeli or Arab from the territories, is paid for 12 working days. The worker's entitlement to paid leave increases with seniority and therefore an Arab worker whose seniority entitles him to more than 12 days' leave can claim the additional leave from his employer.

Many speakers here have abused their right to participate in this discussion by making false and unrestrained accusations attacking my country. Far be it from me to enter into discussion or to retaliate.

May I point out, however, in my closing remarks that too much suffering and material waste have been the result of terror, riots, acts of self-defence and measures to re-establish public order.

Time and again Israel has called for the Arab nations to abolish their fundamentalist enmity and hatred of Israel and sit down to negotiate peace with no preconditions attached.

With this view, the Government of Israel has recently elaborated a peace programme which deserves the support of all nations. We hope that the better atmosphere and understanding displayed recently in international forums and the eventual resolution of some outstanding regional conflicts will have a beneficial influence on the conflict-ridden Middle East.

Original – Portuguese: Mr. DA SILVA (Workers' delegate, Brazil) – In the name of Jesus Christ, the Saviour of mankind, I would like to congratulate all those who were elected to preside over this distinguished assembly.

First of all, I should like to express, on my own behalf and on behalf of the National Confederation of Workers and Educational and Cultural Institutions, our great satisfaction in being represented here and speaking on behalf of all Brazilian workers.

Our satisfaction is even greater because of the fact that the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is the first to be held after the promulgation, on 5 October 1989, of the new Constitution of Brazil, which, as well as having a great effect on the whole of Brazilian society also represents significant headway in the field of fundamental rights and guarantees, particularly in the field of social rights and workers' rights.

From this point of view, based on sovereignty, citizenship, social values of work and free initiative, multipartism and human dignity, the Brazilian Constitution has as its principal aims the building of a free, fair and united society, the eradication of poverty and marginalisation, the reduction of inequalities in the social and regional fields and the promotion of common well-being, without any form of prejudice.

In the field of principles, guarantees and fundamental rights, we have drawn up modern democratic provisions, which are in keeping with the most advanced legal systems in the world.

I should like to mention some of these provisions. Against any form of discrimination: the aim is to promote the well-being of all without prejudice based on race, sex, colour, creed, age or any other form of discrimination.

Against the discrimination of women: men and women shall be equal in their rights and their obligations.

Against terrorism and racism: we reject racism and terrorism. Racism is a crime which cannot be justified or accepted and is punishable by imprisonment, according to the terms of the law. We also consider as an unjustifiable crime the practice of terrorism.

Against salary discrimination: any difference in salaries, in duties, and in the conditions of admission to employment, based on sex, age, colour or civil status, is prohibited, likewise any discrimination in salaries and in the conditions of admission to employment of handicapped workers.

Social rights: the Constitution recognises the following as social rights – education, health, work, leisure, security, social security, the protection of motherhood and assistance to the homeless.

Workers' rights: much progress has been made in the field of workers' rights – protection against dismissal without reason, unemployment benefits, payment of holidays, maternity leave with the guarantee of employment and of wage for 120 days, minimum paternity leave of five days.

Particular mention should be made of the extension of the time-limit set to lodge complaints about employment relations, a six-hour working day for workers with uninterrupted shifts and the reduction of the working week to 44 hours from 48 hours.

Trade union freedom and autonomy: Brazilian trade unions have finally obtained total freedom and autonomy; they are completely free from the government trusteeship. Trade union leaders now enjoy the right to organise. The principle of trade union unity by professional category has been maintained. The new provisions have brought about the creation of thousands of new trade union organisations, which means, in practice, the adoption of trade union pluralism as set out in the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

The right to strike: this is guaranteed by section 9. It is up to the workers to decide whether or not to strike. The law defines which services and activities are essential and provides for the urgent needs of the community.

Justice at work: the representation of all categories is maintained at each level of the judiciary system, whose normative powers have been re-established.

We cannot fail to mention three very important points within the framework of social order. Old age pensions have been raised to grant them an appropriate level of purchasing power, which has been reduced over the years. This provision has been applied since April of this year. The protection of the environment, which is a topical question on the international level, is appearing for the first time in our Constitution; in fact a whole chapter has been dedicated to it. Finally, the protection of the Indians is included in the Constitution, with the recognition and respect of their customs, their language, their beliefs, their traditions and their rights to the territories they occupy. The Indians, their communities and their organisations, have the legal capacity to defend their rights and their interest.

The Brazilian nation has finally been endowed with a modern and complete legal system which, if correctly applied, will represent considerable social headway for all sectors of our society.

Unfortunately, none of the conquests, none of the progress achieved in the legal system will be able to profit the huge mass of workers, or the Brazilian people in general, whilst we go on being crushed by the burden of the foreign debt which forces us to spend some $12 billion each year simply on interest payments, without paying off the capital at all.

It is not right that a developing economy struggling with serious problems of population growth, with problems of protection the environment enabling a rational exploitation of its resources, with policies and high protectionist barriers established by the industrialised countries, and with high inflation, should have to spend a portion of the few resources produced by its activities and to hand over the equivalent of 4 per cent of its GDP on the service of debt, the burden of which varies according to factors and interest which are completely foreign to the will and the legitimate interests of our nation.

While the creation of at least a million new jobs per year is absolutely necessary, the economy has been practically at a standstill since the beginning of the 1980s. We are continuing to use all our export earnings and the small profits from our production to meet the obligations imposed by the servicing of a debt which urgently needs to be revalued.

If, after having contracted debts with low maintenance charges, we are obliged to pay fluctuating interest rates, why not take into consideration the real value of the debts?

Why sacrifice a people which is fighting, which is suffering, which is desperately trying to get back on to its feet and is faced with a completely opposite international situation.

The time has come for the creditor countries, to reflect seriously on this fundamentally financial and economic problem, but which is rapidly shifting to the political and social fields, and causing concern about conflicts no one could predict the end of.

Thus, while announcing the good news of the promulgation of our new Constitution, we feel compelled to warn this assembly about the problem of foreign debt, the solution of which we think is of fundamental importance if we are to achieve the objectives promoted and advocated by the International Labour Organisation; namely, universal and lasting peace based on social justice.

Mr. PUTHIRASIGAMONEY (Workers' adviser, Sri Lanka) – I would like to read the following statement on behalf of Mr. Perera, Workers' delegate of Sri Lanka.

It is a pleasure and a privilege to address this august assembly. At the outset, I wish to convey the best wishes of my delegation and of myself to the President for the successful conclusion of the activities of this session.

We offer our congratulations to the Director-General on his appointment and for the presentation of a very comprehensive Report.

We note that his Report subtly underscores the necessity for canvassing public opinion the world over to meet the immense problems the United Nations system is confronted with.

It has to be borne in mind that failure of member States to comply with, and conform to, their constitutional obligations will endanger and perhaps even impose restrictions on the urgent and important activities of the ILO.

In Sri Lanka, under the leadership of His Excellency Renasinghe Premadasa, a new era has dawned – an era to alleviate poverty, reduce wastage, stamp out corruption and usher in peace and prosperity.

The priorities of the Government had necessarily to change in the recent past a consequence of terrorism in the north-east as well as in the south and elsewhere. Though this did retard the development in certain fields and certain areas, yet on gigantic schemes such as the Mahaweli Scheme and the Million Houses Scheme work valiantly carried on and the Poverty Alleviation Scheme is now getting into swing. A unique feature is that even the opposition parties are supporting the Government in this laudable scheme which will ultimately benefit about 50 per cent of the 16 million population of Sri Lanka.

Trade, commerce, industry, shops, offices and factories continue to function even under the difficult circumstances.

This is an era of structural adjustment in most Asian economies. Most of the SAARC region countries trail far behind the ASEAN countries in economic growth rates.

On the other hand, the newly industrialising countries such as the Republic of Korea, the Republic of Taiwan, etc. have made rapid growth.

Capital-intensive industrialisation has seen increase in exports. Labour-intensive projects have resulted in employment opportunities increasing with better wages. Sri Lanka too is adjusting accordingly and is presently tackling unemployment. Action is being initiated to recruit immediately 25,000 trainee teachers, 10,000 policemen, 5,000 nurses and about 10,000 technical, clerical and other allied grades.

A significant event this year in the labour sphere is the Government's very generous and unprecedented gesture in offering relief to a wide spectrum of workers who lost their jobs as the result of failure to return to work when certain services were declared essential services.

On the initiative of His Excellency, Ranasinghe Premadasa, the Government has now decided to review the cases of those who lost their jobs in 1980, on compassionate grounds, and to grant much relief to those who refused to respond and had been left in the lurch by their trade unions. Our union, which spotlighted the plight of the dependants of these workers from the very outset, applauds this magnanimous gesture on the part of the Government.

Another significant matter is the providing of a glass of milk and a substantial snack to about 4 million schoolchildren in every government school in Sri Lanka.

Unemployment continues to be the major issue in the country, especially amongst educated school-leavers. On the other hand, the unrest in certain parts of the country dissuades local and foreign entrepreneurs from venturing out and investing in new projects that could generate employment.

Unfavourable climatic conditions will result in decimated crops – which will create further problems. If tourism does not improve fast and meaningfully, our hotels will continue to have a large number of vacant rooms with possibilities of lay-off and even retrenchment of employees in this trade.

I am happy to state that employees in ministries, government departments, state corporations and statutory boards have been benefited by substantial increases in salaries and wages during the past year. It is believed that employees in the mercantile sector have also received similar benefits.

Valiant efforts are being made in the plantations sector to bring down the cost of production of tea and other traditional exports such as rubber and coconut, because at present the cost of production is more than the sale prices – thereby making it virtually unviable.

A major change is in the offing with regard to the conversion of the joint contributory employees provident fund, for employees who have more than 12 years to remain in the service of such statutory institutions and the mercantile sector.

We are thankful to the Government for introducing a pension scheme for farmers and for fisherfolk.

My union, which represents over 60 per cent of the unionised white-collar and blue-collar workers of Sri Lanka, very much appreciates the Government exploring the feasibility of introducing a national health insurance scheme for the workers and the people of Sri Lanka.

The PRESIDENT (Mrs. MOLKOVA) – This concludes the discussion of the reports of the Governing Body and of the Director-General.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all those who have participated in the general discussion.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.30 p.m.)

Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee

Objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile

1. The Credentials Committee examined objections to the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Chile lodged by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) and by a group of Chilean Workers' organisations, members of the "Central Unitaria de Trabajadores" (CUT).

2. The ICFTU claimed that the Chilean Workers' delegation had not been nominated in accordance with the provisions of the ILO Constitution. The objection was essentially based on the continued violation of workers' rights in Chile – recent examples of which had been treated in Case No. 1309 in the 265th Report of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association, in particular as regards the sentence of internal "banishment" (relegación) being served by the leaders of the CUT, Mr. Manuel Bustos and Mr. Arturo Martínez – and on the Government's failure to consult with the CUT and the "Confederación Democrática de Trabajadores" (CDT), the most representative Chilean Workers' organisations. The member organisations of the CUT stated that the most important organisations had proposed to the Government the candidatures of Mr. Manuel Bustos, Vice-President of the "Confederación Textil" (CONTEVECH) and Mr. Arturo Martínez, President of the "Confederación Gráfica" (CONAGRA), as Workers' representatives at the Conference, and that the Government had not taken these candidatures into consideration. For this reason the CUT objected to the credentials of the Workers' delegation nominated by the Chilean Government.

3. In a written reply to the Committee, Mr. Lazo Rodríguez, Under-Secretary of Labour and Government delegate of Chile at the Conference, stated that the objection by the ICFTU was based on the same arguments as those made in 1986, 1987 and 1988, and that in June 1988 the Committee had recalled the 1985 decision of the Conference not to invalidate the Credentials as justification for the fact that none of its members had suggested invalidation. In the absence of new elements, it would be inconsistent for the Committee now to deviate from its previous position. Although the Government repeated its position that the Committee was not competent in questions of freedom of association, it wished it to be recorded that clear progress had been made in Chile on this question in the context of the process of transition to full democracy undertaken by the Government with the participation of many sectors of the opposition. In this respect, the Government was examining the question of ratification of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). As was shown in the documentation accompanying the reply, the Government has nominated the Workers' delegation in strict compliance with the terms of the ILO Constitution, after having consulted the most representative Workers' representatives, including the "Confederación de Trabajadores del Cober" (CTC), the "Confederación de Empleados Particulares" (CEPCH), the "Confederación de Trabajadores Bancarios", and the "Confederación Marítima de Chile" (COMACH), organisations whose leaders were at the same time also leaders of the CUT or the CDT. The CTC, CEPCH and the "Confederación de Trabajadores Bancarios" had declined the invitation to make a nomination.

4. Attached to the reply was a list of the most representative workers' organisations with legal personality as at May 1988, a Notarial Certificate authenticating the consultations which took place with these organisations and a copy of the correspondence carried out with the said organisations on the nomination of the Chilean Workers' delegation to the Conference.

5. At the invitation of the Committee, Mr. Lazo Rodríguez, Under-Secretary of Labour and Government delegate of Chile to the Conference, attended a meeting of the Committee. In reply to questions from the Workers' member of the Committee, Mr. Lazo Rodríguez stated that the appointment of the Workers' titular delegate had been made by the group selected to participate in the Workers' delegation of Chile through the consultation procedure described in the Government's reply, and was based on the support for Mr. Medina Gálvez by numerous trade union organisations as well as that of his own union. As could be seen from the documentation provided by the Government, it was true that several important confederations did not support the candidature of Mr. Medina Gálvez but these organisations had not offered any alternative proposals. The Government has confined itself to consulting the most representative organisations which had selected candidates through their own procedures. Union leaders Bustos and Martínez were currently serving sentences of internal "banishment" (relegación). While such a measure rendered rather difficult participation in any activity, including union activity, these leaders had not been disqualified from exercising their union functions.

6. Replying to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Lazo Rodríguez added that the invitation to the consultation procedure had been addressed to all the most representative organisations with legal status, including those whose leaders were opposed to government policy. The Government could not thus be reproached for the fact that three important organisations had refused to participate in the consultation process.

7. In reply to questions from the Employers' member of the Committee, Mr. Lazo Rodríguez stated that several of the organisations which had subscribed to the document sent by the CUT had made proposals or had simply declined their invitation to join the consultative process, as was stated in the report provided by the Government. The proposals made in the CUT document had been made for the Credentials Committee's benefit and had not been made on the occasion of the consultation process in Chile. On the other hand, while the Government was aware that the nomination of the same person as Workers' delegate at past sessions of the Conference had been criticised in the Committee, this nomination was the responsibility of the organisations involved and not of the Government.

8. Mr. Lazo Rodríguez concluded by reaffirming that in the context of the transition process towards full democracy, referred to in the Government's written reply, and besides examining possible ratification of Convention No. 87, a Bill had been presented to the legislature aimed at formally permitting the establishment and registration of union organisations at the umbrella level ("centrales"). As soon as this Bill was passed, the Government would consult the large umbrella organisations, such as CUT and CDT, and any others at this level which might later come into existence, on the nomination of the Chilean Workers' delegation to the International Labour Conference.

9. The Committee believed that, in view of the unsatisfactory situation on freedom of association in Chile, reflected in the 265th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body, Case No. 1309, it was extremely difficult for consultations to take place in an atmosphere of freedom which would ensure respect for the spirit as well as the letter of the Constitution.

10. The Committee noted that this year again, while the Government had consulted the most representative of those organisations which had legal status, the nomination finally made had not taken place in agreement with the most representative organisations, who were at the same time leaders of the large "de facto" umbrella organisations, such as CUT or CDT, had again declined the invitation to nominate representatives because of the Government's refusal to involve these two organisations in the consultation process. The Committee also noted that four of the organisations consulted – "Confederación Textil" (CONTEVECH), "Confederación Gráfica" (CONAGRA), "Federación Nacional de Sindicatos de Trabajadores del Petróleo" and "Federación Nacional de Trabajadores Ferroviarios" – had proposed Mr. Manuel Bustos and Mr. Arturo Martínez.

11. The Committee again expressed concern at the seriousness of the trade union situation in Chile which, according to the 265th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 1309), had not recently improved. The Committee believed that progress achieved in Chile, in the context of the process of transition towards democracy, had not as yet been reflected in the consultation process for the nomination of the Chilean Workers' delegation to the Conference. Although the Committee was of the opinion that the Chilean Workers' delegation was not representative, it decided not to propose invalidation and trusted that, once the Bill referred to by the Government delegate of Chile in his statement was adopted, all the most representative workers' organisations would be consulted in compliance with the provisions of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution.

12. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

Fourth report of the Credentials Committee	1

Provisional Record

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Fifth item on the agenda: Night workReport of the Committee on Night Work

1. The Committee on Night Work was set up by the International Labour Conference at its fourth sitting on 8 June. It was originally composed of 181 members (77 Government members, 54 Employers' members and 50 Workers' members). To achieve equality of voting strength, each Government member was allotted 1,350 votes, each Employers' member 1,925 votes and each Workers' member 2,079 votes. The composition of the Committee was modified 11 times during the session and the number of votes attributed to each member was adjusted accordingly.¹

2. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. P. K. Suma'mur (Government member, Indonesia).

Vice-Chairpersons: Mr. B. Noakes (Employers' member, Australia); and Ms. R. Dreifuss (Workers' member, Switzerland).

Reporter: Ms. J. Walgrave (Government member, Belgium).

3. At its eighth sitting the Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the following members: Mr. A. Callimachos (Government member, Cyprus); Mr. P. A. Leech (Employers' member, United Kingdom); Ms. R. Dreifuss (Workers' member, Switzerland); and the Reporter of the Committee.

4. The Committee held 19 sittings. It had before it Reports V (1) and V (2), prepared by the Office on the fifth item of the agenda of the Conference: "Night Work".

Introduction

5. Mr. Morozov, Assistant Secretary-General of the Conference, welcomed the delegates and referred to the importance of their work, which would affect the conditions of work and life of millions of workers throughout the world. The Committee was established to adopt Conclusions concerning new and revised standards on night work. Its mandate was to consider a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) as well as new standards on night work for both men and women workers in all branches of activity.

6. The Representative of the Secretary-General presented Reports V (1) and V (2) which had been prepared by the Office to serve as a basis for the Committee's discussions, in particular the Proposed Conclusions at the end of Report V (2). These envisaged the revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), through a Protocol to provide more flexibility in the Convention, and the adoption of new standards, in the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, on night work in general. This conformed to the mandate given by the Governing Body when it placed the issue of night work on the agenda of this Conference.

7. The Representative of the Secretary-General also reported on actions leading up to the Governing Body's decision and summarised the rationale for the Proposed Conclusions in Report V (2). The idea of revising Convention No. 89 had developed over many years. While profoundly divided opinions had been expressed in the Governing Body and elsewhere on many occasions, the working party on international labour standards established in 1984 by the Governing Body had classified Convention No. 89 among those to be revised. Furthermore, in its 1985 Resolution on equality of opportunity and treatment between men and women in employment, the International Labour Conference had called for regular examination of ILO instruments containing special protective measures for women, including in particular Convention No. 89, to determine their continuing appropriateness.

- (a) 9 June: 188 members (78 Government members with 252 votes each, 54 Employers' members with 364 votes each and 56 Workers' members with 351 votes each);
- (b) 12 June: 182 members (78 Government members with 225 votes each, 54 Employers' members with 325 votes each and 50 Workers' members with 351 votes each);
- (c) 13 June: 180 members (78 Government members with 50 votes each, 52 Employers' members with 75 votes each and 50 Workers' members with 78 votes each);
- (d) 14 June: 178 (78 Government members with 833 votes each, 51 Employers' members with 1,274 votes each and 49 Workers' members with 1,326 votes each);
- (e) 16 June: 178 (77 Government members with 2,550 votes each, 51 Employers' members with 3,850 votes each and 50 Workers' members with 3,927 votes each);
- (f) 17 June: 170 (77 Government members with 2,150 votes each, 50 Employers' members with 3,311 votes each and 43 Workers' members with 3,850 votes each);
- (g) 20 June: 162 (77 Government members with 1,776 votes each, 48 Employers' members with 2,849 votes each, and 37 Workers' members with 3,696 votes each);
- (h) 21 June: 161 members (77 Government members with 1,739 votes each, 47 Employers' members with 2,849 votes each, and 37 Workers' members with 3,619 votes each);
- (i) 22 June: 144 members (77 Government members with 1,110 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 2,849 votes each, 37 Workers' members with 2,310 votes each);
- (j) 23 June: 142 members (77 Government members with 1,054 votes each, 31 Employers' members with 2,618 votes each, 34 Workers' members with 2,387 votes each);
- (k) 24 June: 138 members (77 Government members with 930 votes each, 30 Employers' members with 2,387 votes each, and 31 Workers' members with 2,310 votes each).

8. The fundamental question posed by the revision of Convention No. 89 concerned how far it was possible to go to make the restrictions on the night work of women in industry more flexible. Points one to three of the Proposed Conclusions suggested a possible answer. They were based on several considerations. There were only 20 countries with no legislative restrictions on the night work of women. In many countries, the restrictions had not created problems and their modification or repeal was not a priority. In others the restrictions were increasingly controversial due to concerns for economic efficiency or the principle of equality of treatment between men and women in employment. This controversy was illustrated by denunciations of Convention No. 89 and further denunciations announced for 1991. Finally, there had also been strong trade union resistance in certain countries to the repeal or modification of the restrictions on night work for women. The Proposed Conclusions took these considerations into account. The Protocol would allow exemptions from the prohibition on night work and variations in the duration of the night period to be introduced by agreements between employers and workers. These agreements could only be reached within a framework established by national legislation after consultations with the most representative organisations of employers and workers. This approach would allow States which had ratified Convention No. 89 to continue to adhere to it and new ratifications to occur. The Protocol would, it was hoped, provide the necessary flexibility for those countries seeking derogations from its provisions. The Representative of the Secretary-General noted that four-fifths of the governments that replied to the Office's questionnaire had supported a Protocol to revise Convention No. 89 and that three-quarters of these had accepted the approach found in the Proposed Conclusions.

9. The premises on which the proposed new standards on night work in general were based were quite different, but were also confirmed by a substantial majority of responses to the Office's questionnaire. First, it was recognised that in some cases night work is indispensable for social or technical reasons, and that in other cases it allows for more intensive use of equipment and installations, thus helping to raise the productivity of undertakings and to create employment. Second, night work exposed workers to particular drawbacks and hazards that should be reduced and compensated. The approach found in the Proposed Conclusions did not restrict access to night work, but was aimed at improving the working conditions of night workers. This would include not only extra pay, but also measures concerning working time, surveillance of health, provision of social services and other matters. A Convention would contain broad principles on the subject and allow for progressive implementation. It would be supplemented by a more detailed Recommendation. More than 90 per cent of the government replies had supported new standards. A large majority had preferred the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

10. In conclusion, the Representative of the Secretary-General noted that numerous responses had been received to the questionnaire contained in Report V (1). A total of 90 governments had responded, nearly a record for a standard-setting activity. Numerous employers' and workers' organisations also submitted comments. Because many of the responses were very detailed, it had been necessary to summarise them briefly to stay within the length limitations for Report V (2). The responses had aided the Office's attempts to weigh the diverse implications of night work and the controversies surrounding the subject in order to find formulations which might be acceptable to the Committee and Conference, taking into account the wide diversity of economic and social conditions in the member States of the ILO. Finally, since the responses to the questionnaire showed that the terms used often led to a variety of interpretations, the Proposed Conclusions were more explicit on certain points, such as the definitions of "night", "night work" and "night worker".

11. Before proceeding with the general discussion, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson noted that the Proposed Conclusions contained both a Protocol to revise Convention No. 89 and a new Convention and Recommendation. She proposed that the new instruments be discussed first and the Protocol last. Because knowledge of the proposed new instruments was not as advanced as on revision of Convention No. 89, early consideration of the new standards was needed. Moreover, the discussion could bog down if the most contentious matter, revision of Convention No. 89, were discussed first. She added that the order of the Office's presentation was historical and administrative and need not be taken as a proposal for the most appropriate order of discussion. Most countries were more interested in the new than the old standards.

12. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson strongly opposed the proposed change. He argued that Convention No. 89 was the fundamental problem. It was discriminatory, out of date and would become irrelevant unless it were changed. New standards were secondary and more controversial. Further, a better foundation for new standards would emerge from discussing the Protocol to Convention No. 89 first.

13. Several Government members endorsed the proposal of the Workers' Members to consider the new standards first. Others disagreed. The proposal was adopted by a vote of 131,355 in favour, 16,200 against, with 100,325 abstentions.

General discussion

14. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated the fundamental position of the Employers' members on the question of night work: Convention No. 89 should be repealed or otherwise disposed of since it could not be justified on any grounds. The prohibition on night work of women in the Convention was an impediment to economic and social progress. It was contrary to the interests of women because it was inherently discriminatory in nature and denied them equal opportunities in employment, thus treating them as second class citizens. He argued further that Convention No. 89 was contrary to Convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation. The prohibition of night work could only be justified in terms of Convention No. 111 if it were protective in nature. Employers did not view it as protective. Another discriminatory aspect of Convention No. 89 was its applicability only to certain sectors of activity. This created discrimination between groups of women. Additionally, governments found it increasingly difficult to ratify the Convention. A number of them had denounced it and further denunciations were likely. For these reasons Convention No. 89 should be repealed or otherwise disposed of.

15. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson also opposed the adoption of new instruments on night work. New and detailed standards for all workers were unnecessary and undesirable because they would limit the flexibility necessary for the operation of economies and enterprises. To deny access to night work or put obstacles in its way would be detrimental to economic growth and development and reduce opportunities for job creation. For example, the services sector could not operate without night work and it was the fastest growing sector in many countries. The allegedly harmful effects of night work had not been proved and remained a matter of contention even among experts. The Employers' members considered that Report V (1) overemphasised the negative aspects of night work and gave insufficient attention to the positive aspects. General conclusions on the effects of night work on social life were inappropriate since individuals differed in their responses. Standards on night work should be developed through collective bargaining so that local circumstances could be taken into account. If, nevertheless, a Recommendation were to be proposed, the Employers' position would depend upon the content of the instrument.

16. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated the workers' firm conviction that night work is unnatural, that it must be reduced to the minimum extent possible and that the situation of night workers must be improved. On the first point, she stated that a new branch of science, chronobiology, had confirmed the unnaturalness of night work. It interferes with the natural resting and waking periods of the human organism. Further, while no specific illness had been attributed to night work, night workers suffered from early ageing, from depression and from sleep and digestive disorders. Night work also inhibited social and family life. It reduced possibilities for promotion and career development due to lack of access to training programmes and other avenues of advancement. Workers often resorted to night work only to supplement low wages with night bonuses or to resolve family problems such as lack of child care during the day. This often resulted in high levels of stress. Research had shown that women working at night average four hours less sleep during a 24-hour period than other workers. The voluntary nature of night work was thus an illusion. Acceptance of night work was therefore in most cases the result of economic, family and social constraints.

17. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson also argued that recourse to night work should be reduced to the minimum possible level and that it could not be justified purely for economic reasons. Further, employment that had been generated from night work often meant unemployment elsewhere. While night work was sometimes required for technological reasons, technology could also be used to reduce night work. Convention No. 89 provided one obstacle to the spread of night work which should be built upon.

Protection should be extended to men and to women in the service sector and in industry. International rules were now needed to improve the situation of all night workers and compensate them as far as possible for the drawbacks of night work. Before concluding her remarks, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson welcomed the Employers' calls for equality of opportunity and treatment and hoped they would be heard again. Finally the Workers' members were ready to enter into a dialogue on night work and to take up the work of the Committee by reviewing in detail the Proposed Conclusions in Report V (2).

18. The Assistant Legal Adviser responded to several questions put forward by the Employers' members. The first question was whether Convention No. 89 could be repealed or otherwise disposed of and if so, in what manner. The answer was that once an International Labour Convention was ratified and entered into force, it became a treaty subject to international law. Such a treaty could only cease to exist in accordance with the provisions of the treaty itself. ILO Conventions contained no provisions for abolition or repeal other than provisions for denunciation by ratifying States. The second question posed by the Employers' members concerned the possibilities for changing the provisions of Convention No. 89. The Assistant Legal Adviser responded that the normal means of revising a Convention was to adopt a revised Convention which incorporated the new or amended provisions into the terms of the original Convention. However, a simpler procedure, by means of a Protocol, could be envisaged when the proposed revision left the provisions of the existing Convention largely intact and simply replaced one or more articles by a revised text or inserted additional provisions as in the present case. It was for this reason that the Office had proposed the revision of Convention No. 89 by a Protocol as the simplest method. The third question was, if Convention No. 89 were revised by a Protocol, what options were there for member States that (a) have ratified Convention No. 89, (b) have not ratified Convention No. 89, (c) have denounced Convention No. 89? The Assistant Legal Adviser explained that States that had ratified Convention No. 89 could ratify the Protocol. Their existing obligations under the Convention would thus be modified by the provisions of the Protocol. States that had not ratified Convention No. 89 would have the option of ratifying the Convention with or without the Protocol. It would be open to States which had denounced Convention No. 89 to ratify the Convention with the Protocol if the flexibility which it introduced enabled them to reassume the obligations of the Convention as revised by the Protocol. Lastly, protocols are not complete instruments in themselves but are supplementary acts to treaties, thus States could not ratify the Protocol without ratifying the Convention.

19. Many Government members expressed the view that Convention No. 89 was contrary to the principle of equality between men and women. The prohibition of night work for women could hamper the professional and career prospects of women. One Government member pointed out that in his country women had begun to work increasingly in places previously dominated by men, and they had come to view the ban on night work as discriminatory. Other Government members believed that women who wished to work at night should have that choice. Several emphasised their belief in the fundamental equality of all workers. They therefore considered that a specific prohibition of night work for women was unjust. However, where restrictions and protection were required, they should be provided for both men and women as the harmful effects concerned both sexes. Several Government members also mentioned that in their view the prohibition or restriction of night work of women violated Convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation. However, provisions aimed at maternity protection should be retained.

20. Some Government members indicated that though they were bound by Convention No. 89, the economic and social conditions in their countries had changed since ratification. One such Government member noted that even though his Government had been trying to reduce the number of night workers there had been an increase in the number of women working at night under temporary exceptions permitted by Article 5 of Convention No. 89. Another Government member added that in his country industrial growth and low levels of unemployment had led to the need for more night workers, including women.

21. Several Government members made specific reference to revising Convention No. 89 by a Protocol. One member stated that it was appropriate to partially revise the Convention to make the definition of "night" and the scope of the prohibition flexible enough to take into account the circumstances in individual countries. Another member expressed support for a Protocol in view of the longstanding controversy surrounding the Convention. One Government member, who still saw the need for some protection for women, would support a Protocol in order to accommodate the wishes of those who felt that the prohibition was discriminatory and restricted the employment opportunities of women. The relationship between equal opportunity and protection was different in different countries. Furthermore, there were differences in stages of development, geography and climate. The Protocol would provide the necessary flexibility to take these differences into account. It could also solve the practical difficulties of application and ensure wider acceptance and future ratifications.

22. According to many Government members, night work could not be abolished. Most saw the necessity of some night work in order to provide essential services such as health care and police and fire protection. Additionally, some Government members stated that there were technological and economic reasons justifying night work, such as to operate continuous processes, to maximise returns on investments for equipment and machinery and to aid the development of the economy. Nevertheless, most Government members who spoke stated that night work should be kept to a minimum, that conditions should be improved for those who did work at night and that special protection should be ensured for certain categories of workers. Regarding the conditions under which night work is performed, several Government members considered that adequate compensation should be provided for the drawbacks of night work. This could take the form of financial compensation, surveillance of health care, reduced working time, additional annual leave, provision of welfare services such as food and drink, special arrangements for housing and transport.

23. A few Government members referred to the special position of women in society, in particular their reproductive function. This required special protective measures regarding night work. Others referred to specific categories of workers that needed protection, such as young workers, pregnant women, nursing mothers, mothers of young children and disabled persons. One Government member stated that Convention No. 89 still had relevance in her country and that if the provisions of the Convention were relaxed, adequate safeguards were needed to protect the interests of women other than pregnant women and nursing mothers, particularly with regard to the personal security of women workers.

24. Several Government members addressed the effects of night work. One Government member considered that the effects of night work on health were controversial even among experts. It would not be appropriate for the ILO to state the effects of night work in the proposed instruments. However, a Government member saw the need to indicate specific hazards and drawbacks for both men and women. Another Government member emphasised that a general ban on night work could be supported by research that had shown the harmful effects of night work. She referred to the discussion that had been held at the ILO in November 1988 at the Chemical Industries Committee and recommended the report and Conclusions on night work that had been adopted. In addition, she recalled the 1977 ILO publication, Night work, which had demonstrated the negative effects of night work on the circadian rhythms of workers and on their family and social life. Night work should be minimised for both men and women. When night work was performed, working hours should be limited. One Government member agreed with the Workers' Vice-Chairperson regarding the negative effects of night work. A Convention should aim at reducing or minimising night work, not just providing compensatory measures. Finally, a Government member felt that while some workers could cope with night work and saw advantages for themselves in it, there were others for whom night work presented health and social drawbacks. Several Government members considered that these drawbacks were as harmful to men as to women.

25. Many Government members expressed their support for new instruments either separately or in conjunction with the adoption of a protocol to Convention No. 89. Several Government members stated that the focus of the work of the Committee should be the adoption of a new Convention supplemented by a Recommendation. These should be aimed at achieving favourable conditions for night workers, both men and women, and compensating them for the drawbacks and inconveniences of night work, including health problems and the negative effects on family and social life. One Government member argued that new instruments should be adopted to improve the working conditions of all night workers and to provide equal opportunities for all men and women, but that only basic principles should be included. The member States should be allowed to choose measures that were the most suitable for their own circumstances. In her general statement of support for the approach of a Convention and a Recommendation, one Government member stated that night work of women should not be unrestricted. Furthermore, regulation by collective agreement would allow for the specific interests of employers and employees to be taken into account.

26. Several Government members emphasised the importance of flexibility in the approach to be taken so that the instruments could be applied in all countries in the light of the needs of each country and employment possibilities for women. With specific reference to the needs of developing countries, one Government member believed it was doubtful that a Convention of the type proposed would be easy to implement in the foreseeable future considering the diversity in existing law and practice in various countries. Thus international standards in the form of a Recommendation were preferred. The difficulties of application had to be seen in the context of different stages of development. A flexible approach would enable developing countries to adopt standards at their own convenience without interfering with their economic development. A Recommendation would have considerable value as a guide-line for the development of national policies, legislation and practice on the subject.

27. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson expressed her satisfaction that the dangers and drawbacks of night work had been recognised by several Government members of the Committee.

28. After hearing views expressed by Government members of the Committee, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson saw some common ground, but also some widespread differences. He was heartened by statements of several Government members that prohibitions on night work were discriminatory and should be removed and that night work was essential to their economies. He was also pleased that there was support for a flexible approach. Concerning the remarks that had been made on the alleged harmfulness of night work, he reiterated that there were different points adopted by different experts. He further believed that many studies had not been soundly based and had not given sufficient attention to contrary points of view. Night work might be different but it was not necessarily dangerous. It could require different approaches, but employers were already taking these. Workers also might need to make adjustments, which they already were doing. Regarding the impact on family and social life, he stated that not all workers were married or had family responsibilities and many of them preferred to work at night. Freedom of choice should be possible.

Consideration of the Proposed Conclusions contained in Report V (2)

PROPOSED INSTRUMENTS ON NIGHT WORK

A. FORM OF THE INSTRUMENTS

Point 4

29. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 4. The Employers sought deletion of the point because new standards were unnecessary and undesirable, as explained in the general discussion. Night work could be regulated sufficiently by national laws and collective agreements. This would be the most flexible and realistic approach. The Workers' members as well as numerous Government members opposed the amendment on the grounds that developing new standards was the most important part of the Committee's work. Since recourse to night work was growing, it was especially important to provide protection to night workers. New standards could be discussed without prejudicing flexibility. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

30. Point 4 was adopted without change.

Point 5

31. The Committee rejected a motion by the member States of the European Community to postpone consideration of Point 5 until after the discussion of Points 6 to 21. The vote was 20,250 in favour, 22,725 against, with 6,300 abstentions.

32. Having regard to the adoption of Point 4, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete Point 5.

33. The Employers' members also withdrew an amendment to insert a reference to revision of Convention No. 89 after confirmation that the subject would be considered after completion of the discussion of Points 4 to 57.

34. The Government members of Canada and Japan and the Employers' members submitted identical amendments to delete "Convention supplemented by a" so that new standards would take the form of a Recommendation only. The Employers' members considered that a Convention which entailed binding obligations on those States which ratified it would reduce needed flexibility. They referred again to the importance of night work to industry and service and to national economies. The Government member of Japan added that night work should be dealt with by individual countries. The Government members of Canada and Japan considered that if a Convention were to be adopted, it should contain only general principles and should provide a maximum of flexibility. The Workers' members, as well as several Government members, opposed the amendment. The Convention was not directly applicable within member States, thus during the ratification process they could consider the best approach in the light of their own laws, regulations and national situation. It was crucial to provide a minimum of protection to workers in the form of a Convention which carried legal obligations, supplemented by a Recommendation which would provide further guidance. A text which would be sufficiently flexible and acceptable to most members could be worked out. The Government members of Canada and Japan withdrew their amendments.

35. The amendment of the Employers' members was rejected by a vote of 19,125 in favour, 26,550 against, with 2,250 abstentions.

36. Point 5 was adopted without change.

Point 6

37. Point 6 was adopted without change.

Point 7

38. A proposal by a majority of the member States of the European Community to postpone discussion of Point 7 was withdrawn after it was agreed that the Drafting Committee would deal with the appropriate references in the Preamble after the Committee's decision on the proposed Protocol.

39. The Government member of Canada and the Employers' members offered identical amendments to delete Point 7. Point 7 contained references to several ILO Conventions and Recommendations on night work of women. Mention of the instruments could be viewed as support for the measures which in their view were discriminatory and incompatible with ensuring equality for women. The Government member of Canada considered that the references could create practical and political problems for ratification, especially in the light of Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They pointed out that the Preamble to a Convention had no legal effect. Mentioning other instruments merely indicated the existence of previous normative action of the ILO and recognised that many member States were still bound by relevant standards. The Conventions and Recommendations that were cited also reflected the history of the ILO's struggle to protect workers. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the Office had included the references to point out that for some categories of workers there was a prohibition on night work in ILO instruments. Persons subject to exemptions and derogations under these instruments would be covered by a new Convention. Several Government members supported the view of the Workers' members in opposing the amendments.

40. The amendments were rejected by a vote of 19,125 in favour, 27,675 against, with 1,125 abstentions.

41. In the light of this vote, the Government member of Uruguay withdrew an amendment to delete references in the Preamble to certain ILO instruments on night work of women. After discussion, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment to add references to the Conventions on night work of women which preceded Convention No. 89, since the current practice was to list only the most recent instruments.

42. Point 7 was adopted without change on the understanding that the references to a Protocol to Convention No. 89 would stand only if the Committee decided to adopt such a Protocol.

New Point

43. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point to the Preamble including a reference to other relevant international labour standards. The reference to maternity protection in the Preamble needed to be expanded by including the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952. Often women were employed at night because they were paid less, thus it was appropriate to refer to the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951. Reference to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 was important because it provided that instruments on maternity protection were not considered discriminatory. In addition, migrant workers often performed night work rejected by nationals and there should be a reminder that discrimination based on nationality was prohibited. Reference to the Convention on Occupational Health Services, 1985, reflected concern about the effects of night work on the health of workers.

44. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The Preamble should not be a historical narrative of ILO activities. It should include only standards directly relevant to the subject at hand. The Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 was the only one which met this test, and so the Employers' members submitted a subamendment to delete all references except those to the Maternity Protection (Revised) Convention, 1952. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment. The subamendment was adopted by a vote of 3,900 in favour, 800 against, with 5,300 abstentions. The amendment as subamended was adopted.

45. A new Point was adopted.

Point 8

46. In view of decisions taken by the Committee on previous points, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete Point 8.

47. The Government member of Argentina submitted an amendment stating that night work had been determined by studies to be fatiguing and prejudicial to workers' health, and thus that a general prohibition of night work was justified from a medical point of view. The Workers' members supported the amendment. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and argued that there was no evidence to justify a general prohibition of night work. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 4,150 in favour, 5,350 against, with 1,150 abstentions.

48. The Workers' members submitted an amendment that would delete the statement that night work "allows for more intensive use of equipment and installations, thus helping to raise the productivity of undertakings and to create employment". They recognised that night work in some cases was indispensable for social and technical reasons, but they could not accept its introduction for economic reasons. It was not the role of the ILO to support the argument that night work raised productivity and created employment. In fact, night work in one enterprise or country often meant unemployment elsewhere, in particular if the only motivation to use night work was to compete in international markets. In addition, faulty production often resulted. Instead of encouraging night work, new technology should be used to reduce its extent.

49. The Employers' members opposed the amendment. The Office's text was factual and unchallengeable as it was obvious that when enterprises used night work and there was more intensive use of equipment and installations there would be an overall increase in productivity and employment. They knew of no study which concluded that night work resulted in low productivity. The Committee had no mandate to make a decision about restricting night work. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 4,400 in favour, 4,750 against with 1,250 abstentions.

50. After considerable discussion, the Employers' members withdrew amendments to delete "in some cases" from the first line and "in other cases" from the second line. They felt the text would have been improved by an unambiguous statement that night work was essential.

51. Point 8 was adopted without change.

52. After considering the views expressed by the Committee and in view of the fact that they had submitted a further amendment, the Employers' members withdrew an amendment to delete Point 9. They had argued that the Point was too broad and therefore unjustified. "Hazards" implied risks and dangers to health that did not exist for all workers as implied by the text. "Compensated" carried connotations of financial reward for hazards, which they opposed and felt the Workers' members should oppose as well. According to the Workers' members, Point 9 was an excellent basis for the Committee's work. It justified the need for a Convention to protect workers from the harmful effects of night work. This view was supported by several Government members.

53. The Workers' members and Employers' members offered amendments which would have opposing effects on the Office text. The Workers' members sought a strong statement on the effects of night work, while the Employers' members sought a less categorical statement. The Employers' amendment would have replaced the statement that "night work nevertheless exposes workers to particular drawbacks and hazards that should be reduced and compensated" by "in some circumstances night work may give rise to inconveniences which should be recognised and appropriately dealt with, where practicable". The Employers' members maintained that it could not be demonstrated that night work was harmful in all cases. It was more appropriate to refer to inconveniences than hazards and drawbacks. Measures could be taken depending upon the nature of the inconveniences, but only when practicable, since some inconveniences, such as those of a personal nature, could only be dealt with by the person concerned. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. Inconveniences was a weak word which called into question the need for international standard-setting activities. The existence of hazards clearly required standards. Additionally, the amendment did not impose compensation for "inconveniences". The Workers' members evoked the costs to night workers who needed, for example, to obtain transportation during odd hours. Compensation was required in many such cases.

54. The amendment submitted by the Workers' members sought to replace the phrase "nevertheless exposes workers to particular drawbacks and hazards that" by a statement that night work "is detrimental to the health and social life of workers. The drawbacks and hazards to which workers are exposed" should be reduced and compensated. They repeated their conviction that night work is detrimental in the great majority of cases. A few exceptions could not be the basis for standards.

55. The Committee voted to examine the amendment of the Workers' members, and not the amendment of the Employers' members, by a vote of 5,100 in favour of examining the Workers' members' amendment and 3,950 in favour of examining the Employers' members' amendment.

56. The Government member of Malta submitted a subamendment to the effect that night work "could be" detrimental instead of "is" detrimental. The Employers' members supported the subamendment. The Workers' members opposed it because it was contradictory to their efforts to strengthen the Office text. The subamendment was rejected by a vote of 4,200 in favour, 5,300 against, with 750 abstentions.

57. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment seeking to delete the words "and hazards" and to replace the word "are" by the words "may be". The Workers' members opposed the subamendment as weakening their text. Put to the vote, the subamendment was rejected by a vote of 4,050 in favour, 5,850 against, with 300 abstentions.

58. A subamendment was submitted by the Government member of the USSR according to which the first part of the Workers' amendment would read "is detrimental to the health and perturbs the social and family life of workers". The Workers' members agreed to the subamendment as it enriched their text. The subamendment was adopted by a vote of 5,450 in favour, 3,950 against, with 1,000 abstentions.

59. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted by a vote of 5,600 in favour, 4,250 against, with 500 abstentions.

60. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment seeking to insert "and in particular changes in circadian rhythms," to emphasise that it was the physiological consequences of night work, not the work itself, which embodied risks. The effect of night work on circadian rhythms was well known. The Workers' members supported the amendment as it brought out an important way in which night work was harmful. The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the ground that it introduced a further note of contention. Changes in circadian rhythms did not apply to all night workers in all circumstances and was out of place in the text. A Government member opposed the mention of one specific hazard of night work. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 69,972 in favour, 78,302 against, with 23,324 abstentions.

61. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment that would insert "under certain circumstances" in the description of the effects of night work. While he agreed that night work could have negative effects, it had not been shown that there were negative effects in all circumstances. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They contended that night work was harmful even under the best of circumstances and reiterated their previous statements that in a few cases there might be only minor consequences of night work, but that in most cases there were serious disturbances. The amendment, however, did not even recognise variations in individual reactions to night work. It referred only to "circumstances" which were external factors.

62. The Employers' members supported the amendment. The text of Point 9 as amended was absolute and categorical in its assertion that night work in all circumstances is detrimental to health and disturbs the social and family life of all workers. "Under certain circumstances" encompassed individual differences and was not limited to external circumstances. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected by 72,471 votes in favour, 79,968 against, with 13,328 abstentions. A record vote was requested, with the result that the amendment was rejected by 76,636 votes in favour, 84,133 against, with 16,660 abstentions.

63. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to replace "compensated" by "night work compensation should reflect national law and practice". The amendment would take account of those existing legal requirements and provisions of collective agreements which regulated the compensation of night work. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. It was inappropriate in the Preamble which should indicate the general intention to ensure that better protection of night workers would be provided. Of course, national law and practice would be taken into account, but it should adapt to the international standard and not vice versa. The Employers' members supported the amendment as it provided more flexibility by encompassing the varied circumstances and arrangements for compensating night work. The amendment was put to the vote and rejected by 78,302 votes in favour, 82,467 against, with 12,495 abstentions.

64. Point 9 as amended was adopted by a vote of 105,791 in favour, 64,974 against, with 4,998 abstentions.

65. The Workers' members submitted an amendment proposing to reverse the order of Points 8 and 9. It would be more logical to state first the reasons workers needed to be protected by the Convention. The Employers' members opposed the amendment and maintained that the fundamental issue was night work itself and the economic imperatives attached to it. A Government member supported the amendment. Attention needed to be drawn first to the drawbacks and hazards of night work and then to the fact that night work might nevertheless be required in some circumstances. The amendment was adopted by a vote of 74,970 in favour, 4,165 against, with 89,964 abstentions.

66. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson made a general statement on the Employers' Group position in the light of the decisions taken so far by the Committee. The Committee had taken a decision to propose the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation. If there were to be instruments, they should be realistic. There was no point in adopting instruments that could not be ratified or implemented. Many of the proposed provisions would prevent ratifications. The Employers' members were not indifferent to night workers but they were also concerned about unrealistic attitudes towards the positive impacts of night work. A one-sided approach ignored the issues of economic growth and employment. Modern economies were 24-hour economies and a prohibition or restriction of night work would therefore lead to serious disadvantages. He urged the Committee to understand the issue in this light and thus to work towards realistic and appropriate provisions.

New Point

67. The Workers' members submitted an amendment proposing a new Point with the following text: "The Preamble should also state that, wherever possible, advantage should be taken of scientific and technical progress and of innovations relating to work organisation in order to limit recourse to night work. Research to this end should be promoted." Though the Committee was not seeking to prohibit night work, the Workers insisted that it should be limited and that research to this end should be promoted. The Employers' members opposed the amendment since it implicitly suggested that night work should be limited, which was unacceptable and furthermore did not belong in a Preamble. Limits on night work would have serious economic effects and undoubtedly would create unemployment. Furthermore, governments would have difficulty taking action consistent with the amendment. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to delete "limit recourse to" and to insert "secure improvements in the approaches taken towards." This was more consistent with the preceding text and with the normal role of a Preamble. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment as it was inconsistent with the intent of their text. The subamendment was rejected by a vote of 64,533 in favour, 89,131 against, with 17,934 abstentions.

68. The Government member of New Zealand submitted a subamendment to delete the final sentence of the amendment. She considered that it would be difficult for governments to apply. The Employers' and Workers' members supported the subamendment and the subamendment was adopted.

69. The amendment as subamended was adopted by a vote of 97,461 in favour, 62,818 against, with 6,272 abstentions.

70. A new Point was adopted.

Point 10

71. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained the implications of the definitions considered in Point 10 of the Office text. The substance of the subsequent Points would be significantly affected by the definitions that might be adopted of "night", "night work" and "night worker". Various Points included the term "night work" and others "night workers". For example, Point 17 referred to prohibition of "night work" for women workers during periods before and after childbirth. This meant that the prohibition would apply to any woman worker from the moment she worked at least three hours during the night, even if it only happened once. However, the use of the term "night workers" in Point 18 implied that the provisions on reduced working time or extra pay would apply only to workers who worked at least three hours during the night on a permanent basis, or within the framework of a shift work system, or on at least 25 days in any calendar year. In other words, the use of the terms "night worker" as opposed to "night work" in a Point limited the number of workers affected by that Point. In addition there was a close relationship among the three definitions. The term "night" was used to define "night work" and the term "night work" was then used to define "night worker".

Clause (a)

72. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment suggesting deletion of "which should comprise not less than eight consecutive hours," so that the definition of "night" would be left to national authorities. He maintained that the definition should take into account geographical and social conditions as well as seasons. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. An international consensus was needed on a definition in order to know how to protect night workers. Several Government members also argued against the amendment on the basis that the Office text accurately reflected the replies of governments to the Office questionnaire. A definition of "night" was essential as a basis for standards in this field and for their application. The Employers' members supported the amendment. They noted that greater flexibility in the Convention was necessary in view of the diversity of national approaches and conditions. One Government member considered that there would be fewer problems in applying standards on night work on the basis of a national definition of "night". The amendment was rejected by a vote of 69,139 in favour, 99,127 against, with 1,666 abstentions.

73. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to define "night" as a period "of at least 11 consecutive hours, including the interval between 10 o'clock in the evening and 7 o'clock in the morning.". The Employers' members opposed this as far too restrictive. The language was taken from the definition of night found in Convention No. 89 but without the possibilities for variation in the night period that were allowed in that Convention. Although a longer period for the definition of "night" had been used in Convention No. 89 because the Convention sought to protect women by prohibiting night work, the new standards concerned both men and women and did not prohibit night work. A definition more appropriate to the practicalities of night work and the diversity of circumstances was needed. Several Government members also opposed the amendment. Having heard the support for the Office text, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

74. The Employers' members introduced an amendment such that the night period could be no more, rather than no less, than eight hours. This would be in accordance with the common understanding of night. The Workers' members objected to limiting the possibility for a longer period. The amendment also failed to take account of legislation which already had longer periods. Some Government members voiced their preference for the Office text as it would allow for a longer period. Having considered the views expressed, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

75. The Government members of Belgium, Greece, France, Ireland, Italy, the Netherlands, Portugal and the United Kingdom submitted an amendment proposing to change the length of the period defined as night from not less than eight hours to not less than seven hours. This would take account of the different definitions of night in various countries. The text still provided "not less than", thus those countries with more than seven hours would be unaffected. Those with lower periods would find it easier to adjust to seven than to eight. The Employers' members supported the amendment for the same reasons and were of the opinion that since the definition was so basic to the rest of the text, it should be flexible. In opposing the amendment, the Workers' members reminded the Committee of the wide support for the Office text during the discussion and in the responses to the Office questionnaire. In fact, the majority of the countries proposing this amendment had supported a period of eight hours. In view of the existing legislation in these countries, eight hours should not present a problem for most of them. Two Government members opposed the amendment and referred to the Office text as a balanced compromise, while one other Government member supported it because it was more flexible. Put to the vote, the amendment was adopted by a vote of 81,144 in favour, 80,801 against, with 7,938 abstentions. A record vote was requested, with the result that the amendment was adopted by 86,632 votes in favour, 80,801 against, with 7,497 abstentions.

76. The Employers' members submitted an amendment which would insert "by agreement or" in order to allow the period of night to be determined by agreement in appropriate circumstances between employers and workers, as an alternative to determination by the competent authority. This would reflect the practical situation where collective agreements dealt with such matters. The Workers' members and several Government members opposed the amendment on the ground that to ensure adequate protection for workers, the definition must be in national legislation. Two Government members supported the amendment since it was consistent with the practice in their countries. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 69,090 in favour, 93,296 against, with 3,332 abstentions.

Clause (b)

77. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to change the definition of "night work" from "a period of work of which at least three hours are performed at night" to "work of any duration carried out during the night". They wished to strengthen the Office text by providing that any work performed during the night was considered night work. Need for transportation, for example, often existed when working time extended very briefly into the night. Two Government members supported the amendment because they viewed the three-hour period in the Office text as too long. The Employers' members, and some Government members, opposed the amendment as it would mean that the benefits of the Convention would apply to a person who worked only a few minutes during the period defined as "night". The Convention could thus reach those who were not genuinely in need of special protection. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

78. An amendment was submitted by the Employers' members such that "night work" would "relate to work in which the majority of working hours" are performed at night. This would avoid extending coverage of the Convention to workers with short periods of work which happened to overlap with the period defined as "night". It was also within the spirit of an earlier proposal from the Office referring to work performed "mainly" at night. The Workers' members and several Government members opposed the amendment as it departed too far from the Office text. If the amendment were adopted, it could lead to a situation where people who worked a significant number of hours during the night or until 1.00 or 2.00 a.m. would not be covered. This could have serious consequences, for example regarding pregnant women. In view of the discussion, the Employers withdrew the amendment and announced that they would support a subsequent amendment to allow the competent authority to determine the period.

79. The Government member of Switzerland submitted an amendment to provide that "night work" would be a period of work of which at least three hours of work was performed "between midnight and 4.00 o'clock in the morning" rather than performed at "night", as provided in the Office text. There should be a core period and this was the period which covered disturbances in circadian rhythms. After several statements that the amendment was too restrictive, it was withdrawn.

80. The member States of the European Community submitted an amendment to define night work as the period of work "which includes a portion of the night to be determined by the competent authority in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers". This replaced "of which at least three hours are performed at night". It provided flexibility which could meet the concerns raised in the discussion thus far. The amendment was adopted by consensus.

Clause (c)

81. In response to a request from the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference explained why the Office had included night work for 25 days in the definition of "night worker". The definition covered workers who performed night work on a permanent basis and those who worked at night as part of a shift system. However, there was a third category who worked at night relatively frequently, perhaps on work of a seasonal nature. The benefits of the Convention should extend to them, too, when they performed night work on a considerable number of nights in a year. The number 25 was chosen.

82. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to define "night worker" as an employed person who "works mainly at night or who works within a system which necessarily implies night work". They further proposed a subamendment replacing "mainly at night" with "works most of the time during the night". The Employers' members opposed the proposal since it was vague and carried with it the implication that a person who worked a small amount of time on night work would be considered a night worker. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment and hoped that by the second discussion a better formulation could be developed to cover those workers who must occasionally work at night.

83. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace "is engaged in night work on a permanent basis", by "performs work in which the majority of working hours are performed at night on a permanent basis, or in the course of a calendar year". They explained that they wished more clarity in the text. Night workers should be those who performed a majority of their working hours at night. In view of the previous discussion on Points 10 (a) and (b), they proposed a subamendment to replace the words after "performs" with "night work on a permanent basis as determined by the competent authority, after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers". They also indicated that they would make a similar proposal regarding shiftworkers and support an amendment proposed by the member States of the European Community concerning occasional night workers. The Workers' members opposed both the amendment and the proposed subamendment. The Office text referred to three categories of night workers: persons performing night work on a permanent basis, or as part of a shift system, or on a casual basis. It was only in the last case that a revised definition might be needed. The first two categories were clear and did not require definition by the competent authority. Some Government members supported the idea of having the competent authority define all three categories of night workers, while others thought it was unnecessary or inappropriate. The amendment as subamended was put to the vote. It was rejected by a vote of 61,397 in favour, 83,147 against, with 3,332 abstentions.

84. The Employers' members then submitted an amendment to replace "within the framework of a shift work system, or on at least 25 days in any calendar year", by "in the case of a shiftworker, a worker who regularly performs at least one-third of his working hours at night". This would exclude shift systems in which only a short part of the shift occurred at night. They also submitted a subamendment to add "to the extent determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers". The Workers' members urged the members of the Committee to reject the amendment and subamendment. A majority of shiftworkers would be excluded, especially in view of the definition of night – at least seven hours – which had been adopted earlier. Shiftworkers could spend less than one-third of their working hours at night, but nevertheless be significantly affected by night work. Shift work was the most traditional form of night work, and needed no further definition by the competent authority. The Employers' members said that their intent was not to exclude genuine night workers, but to provide more flexibility to Governments in defining them. The amendment, as subamended, was rejected with 61,789 votes in favour, 84,133 votes against and 4,998 abstentions.

85. The Government member of Switzerland withdrew an amendment to replace "25" with "90". The member States of the European Community submitted an amendment to replace "at least 25 days in any calendar year" by "a certain number of days determined by the competent authority after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers". Both the Workers' and Employers' members supported the amendment, which was adopted by consensus.

86. Point 10, as amended, was adopted.

Point 11

87. After it was confirmed by the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference that "all employed persons" included full-time and part-time workers, the Workers' members withdrew an amendment that would have explicitly included the latter category.

88. The Government members of Austria and Canada submitted identical amendments to delete the exemption from the Convention of "those employed in agriculture, stock-raising, fishing, maritime transport and inland navigation." Because the dangers to health and other consequences of night work were applicable in all branches of activity, the protection of the Convention should apply to night workers in all areas of the economy. If special difficulties were to arise with respect to certain categories of workers, there was adequate flexibility under Point 12 to exclude them from the scope of the Convention. The Workers' members supported this position. Several Government members agreed and stated that it would be discriminatory to exclude these branches of activity. Exclusions of limited categories allowed under Point 12 should depend on the conditions in each country and not be prejudged by a provision in the Convention that excluded entire branches of activity. The Employers' members argued against the amendment. There were special problems in these sectors which warranted exclusion. For example, work was affected by seasonal and climatic factors. Some Government members spoke of the difficulties that their countries would have in applying the provisions of the Convention to these sectors. Put to the vote, the amendment was adopted with 257,550 votes in favour, 223,100 against, with 33,150 abstentions.

89. Point 11 as amended was adopted. The Drafting Committee would be asked to decide if the words "of both sexes" should be deleted since "all employed persons" would encompass both men and women.

90. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to require agreement, rather than consultation, with the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before limited categories of workers could be excluded from the scope of the Convention. Since exclusion was such a serious action, the best way to ensure protection for workers and control the process was to require agreement from the workers concerned. Otherwise, the provisions could be used to escape obligations. A few Government members supported the amendment since such an agreement would be required in their countries. The Employers' members objected to the amendment since workers would be unlikely to agree to their own exclusion. There was sufficient protection for workers since exclusion could only occur when there were special problems of a substantial nature. Several Government members believed that if there were no agreement between the employers and workers, the Government needed to take the decision, otherwise the decision-making process would be inhibited. The Workers' members responded that failure to agree would mean no exclusion, not a deadlock in decision-making. However, the Employers' members noted that the decision not only affected the exclusion of workers, but the obligations of employers. A decision would therefore need to be taken by the Government. The amendment was put to the vote with the result that the amendment was rejected by 219,300 votes in favour, 286,850 against, with 10,200 abstentions.

91. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete "limited" before the categories of workers who could be excluded from the Convention. The intent was to allow greater flexibility to Governments in deciding which categories might need to be excluded. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. Exclusions must only be possible in relation to limited groups, not broad sectors, which should be strictly defined in relation to the problems in application that might be present. After several Government members expressed their opposition to the amendment as violating the spirit of protection that the Convention should have, the Employers' members withdrew the amendment.

92. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that an exclusion of a category of workers would be "on a temporary basis". Decisions to exclude should be effective only until a solution could be found to the problem that warranted the exclusion. This would require periodic re-examination and promote wider application of the Convention. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as too restrictive. Problems which justified exclusion of certain categories of workers could be long-term or even permanent. They might relate to the industry, the sector or the nature of the work itself: these could not be changed easily, if at all. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by 216,750 votes in favour, 270,250 against, with 21,700 abstentions.

93. Point 12 was adopted without change.

94. The Government members of Canada and Switzerland submitted identical amendments which, by deleting the second sentence, would remove the requirement on States (in their reports under article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO) to "describe all measures taken with a view to progressively extending the provisions of the Convention" to workers who had been excluded under Point 12. They argued that there would always be categories of workers and enterprises to which the Convention could not apply and could not even be progressively extended. Another Government member pointed out that reports under article 22 were usually on an annual basis. Since the Governing Body could determine the form and content of such reports, this second sentence was not really necessary. The Employers' members supported the amendment for the same reason. The Workers' members objected and felt that frequent reviews could help to overcome the problems that led to the exclusion. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that provisions similar to Points 12 and 13 were contained in many ILO Conventions. They were designed to give flexibility, thus encouraging ratifications. In addition, the information would assist the supervisory machinery to determine if the conditions in Point 12 had been met. After the vote, the amendment was rejected with 200,100 votes in favour, 288,150 against and 10,200 abstentions.

95. Point 13 was adopted without change.

96. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment providing that "necessary" measures, rather than "specific" measures, would be required with a view to reducing and compensating for the drawbacks and hazards inherent in night work. The Workers' members maintained that "specific" was more appropriate because it indicated measures which could be chosen specifically to meet specific problems of night work. After considerable discussion and wide support from Government members for the Office text, the amendment was withdrawn.

97. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment which sought to replace "and compensating for the drawbacks and hazards inherent in night work", with "drawbacks found to be inherent in night work and eliminating, where possible, hazards in night work and properly compensating employees in conformance with national law and practice". In his view this would provide a broader approach than the Office text. It would aim at reducing hazards, rather than merely compensating them. Further, compensation would conform to national provisions. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They saw a problem with "found to be inherent" and felt the amendment reintroduced a doubt about whether there were always drawbacks in night work. Since hazards were related to the disturbance of biological rhythms, such risks could not be totally eliminated. In addition, national provisions on compensation should conform to the Convention, not vice-versa. A Government member agreed that as long as there was night work there would be hazards and drawbacks associated with it. The Employers' members supported the amendment. It contained three important elements: reduction of drawbacks; elimination, where possible, of hazards; and compensation in conformity with national law and practice. The last was an important change from the Office text because it recognised the variety of ways that compensation was approached in different countries. One Government member thought that the Workers should be attracted to the amendment since it aimed at eliminating hazards, though she agreed that the words "found to be" could be objectionable. A subamendment submitted by the Government member of Cyprus to delete "found to be" was adopted unanimously.

98. The Government member of Uruguay proposed a subamendment to replace "in conformance with national law and practice", by "taking into account national conditions", while the Workers' members proposed a subamendment to delete "in conformance with national law and practice" altogether. Though the Workers did not like the word "eliminating" because there would always be some residual hazards, they could support the amendment if their subamendment were accepted. The Workers also felt that it was unnecessary to make reference to national law and practice in each Point, since Point 20 provided that the Convention could be implemented by national law and practice. The Employers' members supported the amendment either as it was or with the subamendment of the Government of Uruguay. The Government member of the United States opposed both subamendments. In response to a concern of the Workers' members, he said that the intent was that "compensation" would extend to various types of compensation, not just financial compensation. Put to the vote, the subamendment of the Workers' members was adopted by a vote of 237,150 in favour, 226,850 against, with 35,700 abstentions. A record vote was requested by the Government member of the United States, with the result that the subamendment was adopted by a vote of 247,350 in favour, 233,250 against, with 33,150 abstentions. With adoption of this subamendment, the subamendment offered by the Government member of Uruguay fell. The amendment as subamended was then put to the vote and was adopted with 438,042 votes in favour, 17,850 votes against, with 22,950 abstentions.

99. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States would replace the second sentence by the following text: "Any such measures may be introduced progressively and should be in accordance with national law and practice." This amendment would delete the reference to Points 15 to 19 because they had not yet been discussed. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and insisted that the Convention must provide, as a minimum, a coherent package of measures which were essential for attenuating the consequences of night work. These could be established progressively. The minimum measures were contained in Points 15 to 19. The Employers' members, in supporting the amendment, maintained that States which ratified the Convention would assume the obligation to implement the entire Convention, including Points 15 to 19 if they were to be adopted. Thus the reference in Point 14 was unnecessary. The amendment kept the reference to the progressive introduction of specific measures, but added that the measures would be in accordance with national law and practice. This would allow the needed flexibility to take account of conditions in different countries. In response to a question from the Committee on the implication of adopting Point 14 with the amendment, the Representative of the Secretary-General commented that the insertion of the phrase "in accordance with national law and practice" in this context would mean that obligations under the Convention could be adapted to national law and practice. This went against the normal understanding of a Convention: a State that ratified a Convention must adapt national law and practice to the Convention. The term "progressively" already introduced flexibility. A vote was taken, with the result that the amendment was rejected with 180,900 votes in favour, 285,600 votes against and 7,650 abstentions.

100. The Employers' members and the Government member of Canada submitted identical amendments which would delete the requirement that measures "include, as a minimum, those referred to in Points 15 to 19 below". The Convention should be limited to general principles. The Workers' members reiterated the fundamental importance of having as a minimum the measures in Points 15 to 19. The word “progressively” allowed time for adaptation to local conditions and for choice of the appropriate forms of implementation. The Representative of the Secretary-General was invited to comment on the effect this amendment would have on Points 15 to 19. Assuming that Points 15 to 19 were adopted, he said that the effect would be the same with or without the amendment. In other words, ratifying States would have the obligation to implement as a minimum any provisions included in the Convention. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 188,550 in favour, 261,273 against, with 20,400 abstentions.

101. Point 14 as amended was adopted.

New Point

102. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which would add a new Point as follows: “All the member States should ensure equality of treatment of all protected persons without discrimination based on race, colour, sex, religion, language, political opinion, national origin, nationality, ethnic or social origin, invalidity or age.” The comments of the Workers' members focused on the fact that night work in many countries was performed by migrant or seasonal workers or by minorities who were denied certain rights or could not exercise them. This provision would ensure non-discrimination in the application of the provisions on night work. The Employers' members felt that ILO Convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation already adequately covered the issue. Inserting the amendment in the Convention was inappropriate and would cause confusion. Further, the scope was wider than Convention No. 111 since invalidity and age were included. It might actually prevent the provision of special measures designed to assist disabled persons or affirmative actions to assist women with, for example, career advancement. Several Government members raised similar concerns, though several could support the amendment as drafted. After being voted upon, it was rejected by a vote of 229,500 in favour, 233,200 against, with 28,050 abstentions.

Point 15

103. The Government member of Canada and the Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete Point 15. They believed that the provision on health assessments was more appropriate in a Recommendation than a Convention. A Government member supported the amendment for an additional reason, that Point 15 did not distinguish between the abilities of smaller and larger enterprises to implement such a provision. The Workers' members opposed the deletion. They maintained that a health assessment would be valuable to workers, in that special contra-indications of night work could be identified, and to employers, who should be interested in having night workers who were less susceptible to health problems. Several Government members supported this view. One emphasised that in developing countries the provision would be an incentive for workers who seldom sought health care to have a health assessment. After extensive discussion, both amendments were withdrawn. The Employers' members announced that they would argue for drafting changes instead.

104. The Employers' members then submitted an amendment to replace Point 15 with the following: “Workers should have the opportunity to seek advice to assist their adaptation to night work.” The Office text was too broad. An opportunity to obtain advice where difficulties were encountered was preferable to an absolute right to an assessment which would not be required in all cases. The phrase “at regular intervals” was too vague and could mean every day. Finally, “without charge” implied that all enterprises, large or small, in developing or developed countries, would have to be in a position to provide the assessment. The Workers' members opposed the amendment since the right to a health assessment was a vital point in the Convention. They pointed out that the assessment need not be performed by a medical doctor nor be at the cost of the employer since public health services could be used. The assessment should cover the four main health problems that could be caused or exacerbated by night work – gastric problems, sleep disturbances, depression (mood problems) and epilepsy. “Regular intervals” would be defined under national legislation and would be reasonable. The text did not provide “upon demand”. The Government members who supported the amendment agreed to the vital nature of the provision. The Employers reminded the Committee that the Convention, as amended, would apply to all forms of work in all branches of economic activity. The obligations of this Point were too great. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 139,062 in favour, 249,400 against, with 17,200 abstentions.

105. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment proposing to replace “Workers should have the right, before taking up an assignment as a night worker and at regular intervals thereafter” with “In circumstances where night work presents a hazard or problem, as determined by the competent authority, employees may be given the opportunity” to undergo a health assessment. The Workers' members objected to deleting the right to an assessment. The amendment inserted the notion that night work did not always present hazards or problems. Further, there was no reason to mention competent authorities. They would be involved automatically in the implementation process. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to delete “as determined by the competent authorities” and to replace “may” with “should”. The Workers' members maintained their objections. The subamendment was rejected by a vote of 142,029 in favour, 191,350 against, with 58,050 abstentions. The amendment was also rejected with 145,168 votes in favour, 212,850 votes against, with 27,950 abstentions.

106. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to remove the reference to adaptation of workers to night work. The appropriate goal was to adapt night work to workers. Furthermore, it was necessary to prevent medical findings from being used to the detriment of workers. Thus, the amendment sought to replace “to facilitate their adaptation to this type of work, particularly as regards sleep, meals and out-of-work activities” by “to reduce the harm of night work on health. There should be a guarantee that the medical findings which concern them will not be transmitted to others without their consent and will not be used to their detriment.” The Employers' member argued against the amendment. First, it implied night work was always and in all circumstances harmful to health. Second, it seemed inconsistent with the Workers' position that harm was inherent in night work and could not be removed. If the position were true, workers needed assistance in adapting to night work. Finally, the inclusion of a provision on medical records was inappropriate in this Convention. A Government member added that unlike some situations where work could be adapted to workers, night could not be changed into day. The amendment was put to the vote with the result that it was adopted by a vote of 174,150 in favour, 159,057 against, with 47,300 abstentions.

107. Point 15 as amended was adopted.

New Point

108. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which would insert a new Point as follows: "Arrangements should be made to ensure that at all hours of the night workers who have an accident or are taken ill at the workplace should receive first aid and, where necessary, be taken quickly to a nearby medical centre." Since night workers were especially vulnerable and would have the same need for medical attention in case of illness or accident as day workers, this provision should be in the Convention rather than the Recommendation. "Arrangements" was flexible enough to accommodate small enterprises and various medical care systems. The Employers' members argued that the provision should remain in the Recommendation. They would support it in the Recommendation even though there were some drafting problems. "First aid" was not well defined and "nearby medical centre" would create problems if there were no centre nearby. Some Government members also felt that the provision should be left to the Recommendation so as to retain the flexibility needed for ratification. Other Government members wanted it in the Convention to ensure that governments would be required to make necessary arrangements, especially in countries where health services were not well developed and night workers were greatly disadvantaged in this respect. The Workers suggested a subamendment to delete "nearby" which was adopted by consensus. The amendment was then adopted as subamended by a vote of 206,400 in favour, 164,690 against, with 23,650 abstentions.

109. The Workers' members submitted another amendment to transfer a Point from the Recommendation. The amendment was the same as Point 53 except for the exclusion of the words "as far as possible". The text of the amendment read: "In determining the content of night work, account should be taken of the fact that the human organism is more sensitive at night to certain environmental disturbances such as toxic substances, noise and vibrations, as well as to certain forms of work organisation such as piece-work, assembly-line work or work according to a pre-established rhythm." The Employers' members opposed this provision in either a Convention or a Recommendation on two main grounds. First, it sought to give validity to a number of assertions that were not scientifically proven nor generally agreed among experts. Second, it would require changes to be made in the content of night work based on these controversial matters. The content of some work could not be changed. For example, heavy construction had the same nature whether it was performed during the day or during the night. Several Government members opposed insertion of this provision in the Convention. Since the practical consequences were vague, it would be difficult to implement and was therefore more appropriate in the Recommendation. In the light of the discussion, the Workers' members withdrew the amendment.

110. The Government member of Switzerland and the Employers' member submitted identical amendments to delete Point 16 on safeguards for workers who for health reasons were incapable of performing night work for a given period. They considered that this Point disregarded the existence of regular sick leave and invalidity benefits that would be available in such cases. Though "safeguards" were not specified, the Point implied an obligation to engage workers during the day who were not able to work at night. This would be impossible in some cases, for example in a bakery where there might not be day work. The Employers' members felt that the Office text was too vague. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They suggested that the Point was important though the text could be improved. Put to the vote, the amendments were rejected with 130,118 in favour, 198,350 against, with 15,050 abstentions.

111. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the Point with the following text: "In accordance with national law and practice, appropriate measures should be established for night workers certified as being temporarily incapable of working at night for health reasons." The new text would, in their estimation, provide greater clarity and aid interpretation. "Safeguards" was too vague; it would be replaced by "appropriate measures". In order to take into account the conditions in different countries, the measures would be taken in accordance with national law and practice. "Certified" instead of "recognised" implied that the competent authority would identify the workers who were incapable of performing the work. "Temporary" was more limited than "for a given period". The Workers' members and a few Government members opposed the amendment even though they wished to see more precision with regard to the meaning of "safeguards". "Special measures" was no improvement and "certified" was no clearer. National legislation would specify who would recognise the workers in question. It was important to be aware that some persons would still be able to work, but not at night. Such workers needed protection against dismissal and loss of income. The Employers' members pointed out that there were serious economic implications attached to the Workers' suggestion to maintain the employment and income of someone who could not work at night. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 141,040 in favour, 219,300 against, with 8,600 abstentions.

112. The Workers' members submitted an amendment which would replace "Safeguards should be established" by "The employment should be maintained". The Point, if amended, would aim at preserving the employment of workers who for reasons of health could not work at night. Clarification was sought from the Office on Point 16. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the Office had been particularly concerned with avoiding provisions that would inhibit widespread ratification. It thus had built in flexibility in several places: exclusion of certain branches of activity that seemed particularly troublesome (though the Committee had eliminated these exclusions), authority to exclude limited categories of workers and progressive implementation. In addition, in substantive provisions such as this one, flexibility was inherent in the wording of the Point. The term "safeguards" was included with the expectation that ratifying States would choose safeguards in the light of national conditions. These safeguards could be other than maintenance of employment. The Recommendation provided guidelines on what the safeguards might be: Point 39 provided for transfer to day work, and when transfer was not possible, for sick leave and corresponding benefits. The Workers' members offered a sub-amendment to insert the phrase "and the income preserved" after "maintained". After considerable discussion and statements by the Employers' Vice-Chairperson and many Government members that since the amendment referred to only one kind of safeguard, it could have serious economic effects, and would create privileges that no other categories of workers had, the Workers withdrew the amendment. They noted that they would have to reflect on this matter before next year's second discussion in order to arrive at the right solution. Several other amendments were withdrawn in the course of the discussion on this point including a proposal by the Workers' members to add reasons of "family" and by the Government member of Canada to add "as well as for reasons related to maternity".

113. Point 16 was adopted without change.

114. The Chairperson indicated that after consultation with the two Vice-Chairpersons, he had decided to open a general discussion on Point 17 before proceeding with consideration of the amendments. It was hoped that this discussion could set the stage for reaching consensus on the Point.

115. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson began by stating that in principle the Workers' members supported a prohibition on night work for pregnant women and for a period after childbirth. ILO tradition supported this position, in particular in Article 5 of the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952. Some persons argued that no protection was necessary for pregnant women since pregnancy was a normal physiological state, not a disease. But perhaps a middle road could be found. Pregnancy, for various reasons having to do with individual conditions and the state of the health of the woman, could mean that the woman could not or should not perform night work. In these circumstances, the woman should not be compelled to work at night. The idea of avoiding a requirement to work at night, both in law and practice, should be the most important feature of a revised text. In addition, the following areas could also form part of a consensus:

(a) The Convention should not impose outright prohibition, but on the other hand there were circumstances in which a woman should not be required to work at night. The right of refusal would have to be meaningful in practice.

- (b) A period could be defined before and after childbirth during which a pregnant woman would be absolutely protected from night work.
- (c) The period could be extended to take account of special problems such as malnutrition or poor health.
- (d) Strong provisions on protection against dismissal as in paragraph (3) needed to be included, but necessary exceptions could be discussed.
- (e) The principle in paragraph (4) on protecting maternity leave and benefits also needed to be maintained.

116. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson said that the Workers' Vice-Chairperson had presented the situation clearly and accurately. The Employers shared the concern for pregnant women and those who had recently given birth. They also recognised the different approaches that had been taken, on the one hand to provide protection and, on the other, to give women the maximum amount of choice in the light of equality of opportunity and treatment. The Employers also considered that there needed to be an intermediate course. The following points should be taken into consideration:

- (a) As a general proposition, pregnant women and women who had recently given birth should not be compelled to perform night work.
- (b) The period of three months referred to in the Office text required further discussion as to practicability.
- (c) Regarding paragraph (2) on the extension of the specified period for health reasons, there was room for a general understanding regarding the requirement of a medical certificate concerning incapacity to work.
- (d) There were three different considerations related to paragraph (3). First, there would be no basic problem with protection against dismissal during the period to be specified in the preceding paragraphs. However, the Employers wished to seek a qualification which would make the protection applicable only in circumstances that were connected with the pregnancy or maternity. Second, the protection of income had two elements. In regard to assignment to day work, the Employers would want it made clear that this might not always be possible. With respect to the provision of other income protection such as maternity leave, social security benefits or other appropriate means, the Employers had no intrinsic problem. However, the phrase, "income should be protected" might be interpreted to mean that income must be maintained at the same level. This would not always be possible.
- (e) Employers had no problem in principle with paragraph (4).

117. Several Government members raised specific problems related to ratification of the Convention depending upon whether Point 17 were to be included in the Convention and, if so, in what form. Several Government members, in particular from Canada, New Zealand, the Netherlands and the Nordic countries, stated that their countries could not ratify the Convention if it contained a general prohibition on the night work of women during a period before and/or after childbirth. The Government member of Sweden pointed out that under Swedish legislation special protection could be allowed only for biological reasons. No research findings indicated that night work was more detrimental for pregnant women than for other workers. Thus the issue had to be considered on an individual basis. The Government members of Canada and Ireland also favoured a positive right to refuse night work since a prohibition violated the principle of equal opportunity and treatment in employment which was applicable in their countries. The Government member of Japan stated that the wishes of individual women should be respected, and therefore there should be no uniform prohibition on night work of women. However, to secure the health of the mother and child there should be a period, as long as possible, during which a woman could refuse night work. Some of these Government members also stated that they appreciated the fact that national approaches differed due to a wide range of social customs and economic conditions. In addition, a right to choose might not be exercised freely in practice due to economic pressures. However, they pointed out that countries which prohibited night work of women could still ratify the new Convention even if it did not contain a prohibition, while those countries which could not allow a prohibition could not ratify a Convention which required one.

118. Several Government members pointed out that night work of women was prohibited in their countries during periods of varying lengths before and after childbirth. These included the German Democratic Republic, the USSR, Bulgaria and Hungary. The Government member of the USSR stated that legislation in his country was based on findings that the female organism was most vulnerable during pregnancy. However, based on the discussion of problems in other countries he would be prepared to withdraw his amendments which would extend the period of prohibition in the Convention. The Government member of Gabon supported a prohibition in order to protect those women who might be inclined to risk their health for additional income, but for a shorter period than was provided in the Office text. The Government member of Uruguay was concerned that if women were allowed to choose night work, they might be forced into it by their employer. He also suggested that since the proposed period was longer than the period for maternity leave in national legislation, it could create problems in practice with respect to other women who were subject to less favourable provisions. The Government member of India questioned the advisability in paragraph 1 (c) of requiring consent from the competent authority. This could cause unnecessary delay. She also suggested that attention be given to the issue of just cause for dismissal.

119. The Government member of Belgium suggested that the approach in the Office text be supported since it contained a combination of rights and prohibitions which reflected the situation in a wide range of countries.

120. As a result of the general discussion, the Committee requested the Office to draft a revised text for Point 17 which would take into account the views expressed and the problems of ratification that had been identified. The Office prepared the following text:

17. (1) Measures should be taken to ensure that an alternative to night work is available to women workers who would otherwise be called upon to perform such work –

(a) for a period of at least three months before the expected date of childbirth and at least three months after childbirth;

(b) for additional periods during pregnancy, or during a specified time beyond three months after childbirth the length of which should be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, in respect of which a medical certificate is produced stating that this is necessary for the health of the mother or child.

(2) The measures referred to in (1) above may include transfer to day work where this is possible, the provision of social security benefits or an extension of maternity leave.

(3) During the periods referred to in (1) above –

(a) a woman worker should not be dismissed or given notice of dismissal except in cases of serious fault on her part or closure of the enterprise;

(b) the income of the woman worker should be maintained at a level sufficient for the full and healthy maintenance of herself and her child in accordance with a suitable standard of living. This income maintenance may be ensured by any of the measures listed in (2) above, by other appropriate measures or by a combination of these measures.

(4) The provisions of this Point should not have the effect of reducing the protection and benefits connected with maternity leave.

121. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference introduced the revised text that had been prepared by the Office. He stated that in revising the text, the Office had sought to ensure that ratifications would not be prevented. To this end, the Office avoided the use of “prohibited” or “prohibition” which, if included in Point 17, would result in the inability of several Governments to ratify the Convention. A “right” to choose or refuse night work had also been avoided, since countries which had a prohibition on the night work of women would then be unable to ratify. The new text provided that “Measures should be taken to ensure that an alternative to night work is available to women workers who would otherwise be called upon to perform such work”. The Office had retained the reference to the period of three months before and after childbirth. No consensus had been reached on a different period. Moreover, it seemed appropriate to go beyond the minimum period of maternity leave in the Maternity Protection Convention, 1952. Paragraph (2) referred to a series of measures that could be provided as an alternative to night work. The list was not exhaustive and other measures could be adopted. In paragraph (3) the Office had tried to accommodate the concerns that had been raised about expressing protection against dismissal in absolute terms. Thus the revised text included an exception for serious fault on the woman’s part or closure of the enterprise, which was similar to article 4 (2) of the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952. The provisions on maintenance of income in clause (b) of paragraph (3) took into account the point that it might be impossible to guarantee previous income which comprised regular pay plus supplements for night work. Reference was made to a sufficient level of income as was provided in Article 4 (2) of the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952.

122. The Employers’ Vice-Chairperson believed that the new text reflected the Committee’s discussion on the Point and to a large extent satisfied the employers' major concerns. The Office had produced an alternative to Point 17 which avoided using some of the terms that would have caused problems. However, the Employers' members would propose subamendments to portions of the text in which the details of the provisions still presented some difficulties. For example, the three-month period remained unacceptable and the provision on dismissal should be improved.

123. The Workers' members also welcomed the new text to Point 17 and felt it accurately reflected the Committee's discussion. There were several issues that the Workers' members would also address through subamendments. A concern that they had raised in the discussion related to the freedom to choose. Such choice could often be illusory when women workers were unable to defend themselves in the face of pressure from employers. It was not paternalistic to say that under severe economic constraints a right to choose did not necessarily mean a free choice. The advantage of the revised Office text was that it did not speak of an absolute right, but of measures to ensure that such a right could be exercised.

124. The Government member of Canada also expressed general support for the revised text. A ban on night work during a given period was considered discriminatory and paternalistic, thus he welcomed the new approach. The majority of the member States of the European Community and the Government member of Cyprus added their support for the revised text because it did not refer to an outright prohibition of night work. The Government members of the European Community, however, wished to avoid too much detail in the provisions on protection against dismissal and income maintenance. Similarly, the Government member of Cyprus suggested that the dismissal provisions could be modified. The Government member of China added his Government's general support for the revised text. He emphasised the importance of protecting the employment and income of women during the three-month period before and after childbirth as provided in the Office proposal. He further emphasised that the detrimental effects of night work were especially important in the case of maternity. Measures should be taken to ensure that during a specified period night work was not undertaken by pregnant women and recent mothers. The Government member of Yemen stated that it would be difficult to ratify a text which did not provide sufficient protection of nursing mothers.

Paragraph (1)

125. The Committee agreed that the first three lines would be examined by the Drafting Committee in order to ensure that the French text corresponded with the English.

Clause (a)

126. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to change the period from at least three months before and three months after childbirth to six weeks before and six weeks after. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment. They reminded the Committee that member States had agreed in the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised),

1952, that the period for maternity protection should not be less than 12 weeks: that was 37 years ago. The Office text doubled the number of weeks which was consistent with the goal of providing extra protection specifically for night workers. The Employers' members responded that the period during which alternatives to night work would be available should correspond to the minimum period provided in the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952. The period was sufficient since clause (a) would affect women with no particular medical problems. A doubling of the period was arbitrary and unjustified. Further, a longer period would have economic implications which could not be supported by many countries. The Workers' members felt, however, that alternative measures would not necessarily be costly for employers since a worker might not be on leave but in alternative employment, or receiving benefits under social security. One Government member supported the change to six weeks since the total period of six months was impracticable. However, another Government member supported the Office text even though his country provided a much longer period. Put to the vote, the subamendment was rejected by 178,450 votes in favour, 236,500 votes against, with 27,950 abstentions.

Clause (b)

127. The Committee agreed that the Drafting Committee would examine the effect of the comma after "pregnancy" in the first line on the meaning of the clause.

Paragraph (2)

128. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to insert "or other appropriate benefits" after "social security benefits" in the second line to encompass benefits which might not be recognised as social security benefits as such in some countries. The Workers' members submitted a different subamendment to replace "may" with "should" in the first line and to insert, after "social security benefits" in the second line, "or any other appropriate means, or through a combination of these means". The "should" would mean that paragraph (2) would be an exhaustive list of the measures that should be taken to ensure an alternative to night work. The Employers' members preferred "may" because the paragraph should include examples of measures, not be exhaustive. The second part of the Workers' subamendment was acceptable as consistent with theirs. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference pointed out that the obligation to take measures was contained in paragraph (1). Paragraph (2) indicated some of the measures that could be used to meet that obligation. The Employers' and Workers' members agreed to drop their subamendments.

129. The member States of the European Community submitted a subamendment to state that the measures referred to in paragraph (1) "should provide that the women workers concerned are protected against dismissal and that their income should be protected by means which", and to delete paragraph (3). It would simplify the text by referring to job security and income protection without introducing concepts of serious fault and suitable standards of living that would be difficult to determine. The amendment was withdrawn after objections from both the Employers' and Workers' members.

Paragraph (3)

Clause (a)

130. The Government member of Cyprus submitted a subamendment to replace clause (a) with the following text: "Being unable to or taking the option not to perform night work should not be considered as a valid reason for lawful dismissal or for the serving of notice of dismissal for a woman worker." After considerable discussion, the Workers' members and Employers' members stated their preference for other subamendments, and the subamendment was withdrawn. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to delete after "dismissal" the remainder of the clause and to insert "for reasons solely connected with pregnancy or childbirth". "Serious fault" had different meanings according to national law and practice and there were economic reasons other than plant closure which could justify dismissal. They preferred to prohibit dismissals that were solely connected with pregnancy or childbirth. The Workers' members opposed the subamendment. They believed that the burden of proof would be on the woman to show that dismissal was for reasons of pregnancy or childbirth. They thus submitted a subamendment to prohibit dismissal "except for compelling reasons not connected with pregnancy and childbirth". The representative of the Secretary-General commented that it was normal to use the word "justified" in legislation on dismissal. The Employers' and Workers' members agreed to replace the word "compelling" with "justified" in the Workers' subamendment and it was adopted. Clause (a) thus read as follows: "a woman worker should not be dismissed or given notice of dismissal except for justified reasons not connected with pregnancy and childbirth."

Clause (b)

131. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that he was satisfied, based on the remarks of the Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference, that the text did not imply maintenance of full pre-existing income. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to provide that measures for income maintenance would be "in accordance with national law and practice". The Workers' members repeated that there was already a general Point in the Convention on implementation. After similar comments from Government members the amendment was withdrawn.

Paragraph (4)

132. The Workers' members submitted a subamendment to insert "and parental leave" after "maternity leave", to recognise that some national legislation provided leave and benefits to women after childbirth under parental leave provisions. Such provisions might apply following maternity leave, or maternity leave might be included under parental leave provisions. In response to comments made in the course of the discussion that the subamendment went beyond the subject under discussion, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the attempt was not to cover fathers, but to ensure that mothers were protected from reductions being made in their parental leave entitlements. Furthermore, the reference was within the context of Point 17 and thus would be interpreted with respect to measures that could be taken to provide alternatives to night work for women. The Employers' members opposed the subamendment as they considered that it created legal uncertainty. Since the Point was concerned with mothers, the reference only to maternity leave was appropriate. A Government member added that member States which provided maternity leave under the label parental leave still could comply with the terms of this paragraph. Put to the vote, the subamendment was rejected by a vote of 199,950 in favour, 204,250 against, with 47,300 abstentions. The amendment to replace Point 17, as subamended, was adopted.

133. Point 17, as amended, was adopted.

134. Identical amendments were submitted to delete Point 18 by the Government members of Canada, Federal Republic of Germany, Ireland, Netherlands, United Kingdom, Kenya, Uganda and Zimbabwe and the Employers' members. They argued that the subjects were more appropriate in a Recommendation. The reference to compensating employees for the drawbacks of night work in Point 14 was sufficient. Moreover, Point 18 was too absolute in calling for reduced working time or extra pay for night workers since it was inconsistent with practice. There were working time arrangements under which day and night workers were treated the same. For example, in some cases all workers on rotating shifts received the same remuneration which took into account the night rotation. A Government member pursued these points. She maintained first of all that since in many countries hours of work and pay were not subject to legislation, those countries could not ratify the Convention because Point 20 required that in so far as the provisions of the Convention had not been given effect by other means, they must be implemented by laws or regulations. Further, another group of countries who operated continuous processes on a rotating basis and averaged out pay and bonuses could not ratify the Convention unless they provided extra pay or reduced working time for the part of the rotation which occurred at night.

135. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson responded that the interpretation by the previous speakers of Point 18 was incorrect. It applied to "night workers", not "night work". It did not require extra pay according to each hour worked at night, but that night workers be granted reduced working time or extra pay. Individual countries would decide how much would be paid and in what manner. Rotating systems or other arrangements would not be disturbed. She added that Point 18 was necessary in order to identify the measures to which Point 14 referred. The principle of reduced working time or extra pay should be established in the Convention. Because of the nature of night work, priority should be given to reduced working time. However, in some regions wages were so low that workers accepted longer hours to supplement their income to the detriment of their health. Thus extra pay might alleviate the need to work longer hours at night.

136. A Government member supported deletion of the Point because she felt that it could have the opposite effect in developing countries. There would be even more incentive to work longer hours with an increase in night pay. Several Government members shared the views expressed by the Workers' Vice-Chairperson. Reduced working time and extra pay were central issues in trying to alleviate some of the drawbacks of night work. The practice in many countries already corresponded to the provisions of Point 18 and Point 20 provided sufficient flexibility for implementation. Put to the vote, the amendments to delete Point 18 were rejected by 189,200 votes in favour, 232,000 votes against, with 19,350 abstentions.

137. The Employers' member presented an amendment to replace Point 18 with the following text: "Compensation for night workers when performing night work should be determined in accordance with national law and practice". This would reflect the various approaches to compensating night workers. The Workers' group opposed this amendment as it no longer specifically mentioned reduced working hours and extra pay. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment in favour of one to be offered by the Government member of the United States.

138. The amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States proposed to replace Point 18 with: "Compensation and hours of work of night workers should be established by national law and practice." The Employers' members introduced a subamendment to include "by collective bargaining or", which was accepted by the author of the amendment. This amendment was still unacceptable to the Workers' members because the Office text was more specific as to the scope of compensation required. A Government member agreed since "compensation" did not necessarily mean extra pay and "hours of work" did not imply a reduction of working time. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 206,400 in favour, 215,450 against and 6,450 abstentions.

139. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to clarify that reduced working time would be "without loss of earnings". Otherwise, the provision would not be protective nor adequately compensate night workers for the drawbacks and health hazards of night work. The Employers' members opposed the amendment as it would impose serious financial restraints and rigidities. In many countries reductions in working time had been accompanied by reductions in wages. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference noted that the Office had not found it necessary to specify "without loss of earnings". ILO standards on hours of work had always envisaged full compensation. For example, this was stated in Recommendation No. 116. The Employers' members objected. This was not a standard or practice in many countries and should not be included in a Convention. Put to the vote, the amendment was adopted by a vote of 200,400 in favour, 19,350 against, with 202,100 abstentions.

140. An amendment presented by the Government member of France provided that reduced working time or extra pay should be decided upon "in particular through collective agreements". This emphasised that in many countries these matters were determined through collective bargaining. Both the Workers' and Employers' groups found such an addition unnecessary and the amendment was withdrawn.

141. Point 18 as amended was adopted.

Point 19

142. Discussion on Point 19 began with the submission of two amendments calling for the deletion of the Point. The intention, as explained by the Government member of Canada and by the Government members of the Netherlands and the United Kingdom, was to transfer this Point to the Recommendation. The Employers' members supported this proposal. The Workers' members argued that it was important to specify the package of measures that were introduced in Point 14 for night workers. Point 19 opened the chapter on social services which would be developed further in the Recommendation. One Government member pointed out that there were social services which would not be provided by the Government, while under Point 20 ratifying Governments had an obligation to implement the provisions of the Convention. The amendments were put to a vote and rejected with 189,200 votes in favour, 207,300 votes against and 15,050 abstentions.

143. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace the text by "Where night workers perform night work, appropriate social services should be provided where practicable". There were two reasons for this. First, night workers did not need special social services while doing day-time work. Second, in some cases it was not practicable to provide social services, for example on construction sites or in small businesses. The Workers' members found this unacceptable as it weakened the Office text. There were a number of social services, mentioned in the Recommendation, which could not be limited to the night period, for example housing or nurseries. As to "practicable", the Workers felt that this was unnecessary because Point 20 made it clear that national conditions and practice would be taken into account. A Government member said that the amendment was too restrictive and went on to list a series of social services to which night workers were entitled in his country and which could not be limited to the night period. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 174,150 in favour, 234,800 against and 25,800 abstentions.

144. The Workers' members presented an amendment to add "such as transportation, rest rooms and facilities for meals", in order to make it clearer what type of social services were meant. The Employers' members found this unnecessary. It would be more appropriate to refer to the Recommendation. The wording suggested that transportation had to be provided, which was misleading and did not reflect what was said in the Recommendation. A similar comment was made by a Government member who felt that the three examples did not give enough information about social services. The amendment was withdrawn.

145. The discussion then continued on another amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States. This amendment sought to add "in the same manner as provided for other workers". Night workers were said to often receive less social services than day workers. The Convention should therefore ensure that they received the same. Special needs, such as transportation, should be handled in the Recommendation. The Workers' members agreed that night workers should not be worse off and this was a point which could be developed for inclusion during the second discussion. However, the amendment implied that night workers did not have specific needs and this was counter to the meaning of Point 19. Some Government members acknowledged that night workers had special needs, but also believed that night workers should not have inferior conditions. It was pointed out that there were great differences between developing and industrialised countries. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 175,139 in favour, 204,700 against with 32,500 abstentions.

146. Point 19 was adopted without change.

New Points

147. A number of amendments proposing new Points were submitted. The first was submitted by the Workers' members. It contained three ideas: night work should be organised to avoid overtime, working of two consecutive full-time shifts should be prohibited, and breaks to enable workers to rest and eat should be provided. The Workers' members felt that it was necessary to mention these points briefly in the Convention. They would be developed further in the Recommendation. The Employers' members stated that provisions of this nature were more appropriate for the Recommendation and found it difficult to accept three different notions combined into one point. Taken separately, they had no objection to avoiding overtime as this depended on good management. They could not accept the prohibition of two consecutive shifts because there were exceptional cases, as mentioned in the Recommendation, and two consecutive shifts did not necessarily include night work. As to the third point, they felt that there was no need to prescribe breaks in the plural as there should be no difference between night workers and day workers. While they had no problem with the general provision, they found it too categorical and difficult to implement. Several Government members voiced their preference for including such provisions in the Recommendation. One Government member observed that during night shifts it was preferable to grant several short breaks rather than one long break. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson was pleased to note that members of the Committee seemed to be unanimous in wanting to take these points up during the discussion of the Recommendation, and withdrew the amendment.

148. Three identical amendments were submitted to include Point 56 of the Recommendation in the Convention, which stated that "Before introducing night work, the employer should consult the workers' representative concerned." The Government member speaking on behalf of the member States of the European Community announced that in view of the need to formulate the Convention in such a way as to permit wide ratification, the eight member States who had submitted an amendment to delete the Point, withdrew it. The Government members of the Nordic countries believed that workers should be consulted but asked for clarification whether such a provision in the Convention would restrict ratification. The Representative of the Secretary-General explained that the Office had preferred to avoid clauses in the draft Convention which would make it difficult for a large number of governments to ratify. He pointed out that the guarantee with Workers' representatives at the enterprise level would be difficult in many countries. For this reason, this provision had been placed in the Recommendation. Several Government members favoured consultation of workers' representatives but felt it could not be an obligation for Governments and should therefore be in the Recommendation. The Employers' members, though they had no objection to consultations in principle, considered that a Convention should not contain direct obligations on employers at the enterprise level. The amendment was not flexible enough to account for situations where the need for an urgent decision precluded time for consultation, or in new establishments where the workforce had not yet been constituted. The Workers' members maintained that even in countries where there was no legal basis for workers' consultation, the principle could be adopted. Further, consultation meant informing workers in good time and allowing them to judge whether the reasons put forward justified recourse to night work. The final decision was left to the employer. The amendments were adopted by a vote of 152,736 in favour, 150,923 against, and 37,296 abstentions.

149. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted an amendment to add a new Point as follows: "The Workers' representatives concerned should also be consulted regularly on the forms of organisation of night work that are best adapted to each undertaking and to its personnel." They considered that since the Committee had agreed to a new point on consultation on the introduction of night work, consultation on this subject was also appropriate. The Employers' members reiterated that such a provision should be included, if at all, in a Recommendation. The Workers' members believed that the principle should be included in the Convention now, even if a better formulation needed to be sought before the second discussion. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 161,616 votes in favour, 165,168 votes against, with 31,968 abstentions.

150. A new Point was adopted.

Point 20

151. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference explained that Point 20 was a standard provision which was included in many ILO Conventions. It presented a wide range of possible means of implementation. All amendments were withdrawn and Point 20 was adopted without change.

Point 21

152. Point 21 was adopted without change.

C. CONTENT OF THE PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION

Points 22-26

153. Concerning Points 22, 23, 25 and 26, the Chairman explained that they were identical Points to Points that had been adopted in the Convention.

He hoped there was no need to discuss them further. Points 22 and 23 corresponded to Points 10 and 11, while Points 25 and 26 corresponded to Points 20 and 21. Point 24 should be deleted since it referred to activities that were now covered by the Convention.

154. The Employers' members noted for the record that they had raised some concerns with regard to some of these Points, which they would pursue in the second discussion. The Workers' members agreed to the inclusion in the Recommendation of the amended Points that had been adopted in the Convention, but also stated that they would take up certain points again in the second discussion.

155. With respect to Point 25, the Employers' members had submitted an amendment to replace "should" with "may", which they felt was more appropriate for the text of a Recommendation. The Committee had then requested comments from the Legal Adviser on the second sentence of Point 25, which stated that, in the event the provisions of the Recommendation had not been given effect by other means, "they should be implemented by laws or regulations". The Representative of the Secretary-General reported that the need for the second sentence in a Recommendation was less obvious than the need for it in a Convention, because a Recommendation did not create binding obligations. The Committee agreed that the Drafting Committee would consider the subject.

156. Subject to necessary modifications by the Drafting Committee to make the texts correspond with the texts as adopted in the Convention, Points 22, 23, 25 and 26 were adopted. It was agreed that Point 24 would be deleted.

Point 27

157. The Government members of Finland, Norway and Sweden as well as the Employers' members, submitted amendments to delete Point 27. The sponsors of the amendment argued that the Office text was too restrictive and did not take account of modern practices such as flexible and compressed hours. Many workers preferred extended hours with correspondingly long leisure hours. In these cases, the eight-hour limit on night work would be exceeded. In Sweden it was common for night workers to work 10 or 11 hours a night but on fewer nights in a week so that weekly hours averaged 33 or 34. Several Government members gave other examples of flexible arrangements, some motivated by the difficulty of access to remote worksites. One Government member expressed concern for the economic implications of reducing or limiting working time in developing countries. Thus, it would be best for the determination of hours of work to be left to collective bargaining so that the needs of various economic sectors and industries could be met. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. They insisted that normal hours for night workers needed to be, in normal circumstances, limited to no more than eight since the balance between work and leisure needed to be maintained on a daily basis. Longer shifts often required more time to recover, so extended leisure was an illusion. Marginal workers often suffered most by being forced into extended night-work systems because of lack of other job opportunities. The Recommendation must provide guidance on the best way to protect night workers. It should not permit flexible arrangements that would be to their detriment. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 175,824 votes in favour, 178,376 votes against, and 15,984 abstentions.

158. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to delete " , except in the case of work which includes substantial periods of mere attendance or standby". Exclusions and variations should be left to national legislation or the social partners. Since the Recommendation was not a binding text, it was not necessary to describe all possible exceptions. The Employers' members, however, felt that the ILO Recommendation would be held up as the standard which should be used as a yardstick in collective bargaining. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that he felt there could be a misunderstanding about the term "normal hours of work". Some understood it as not referring to normal circumstances but to the standard hours that people normally worked and beyond which overtime was paid. The majority of the member States of the European Community also opposed the amendment as being too rigid. The amendment was withdrawn.

159. The Government member of Switzerland submitted an amendment such that normal hours of work for night work should not "normally" exceed eight per day. It was to recognise a practice, common in his country, of 12-hour shifts on Sunday in continuous processes. The workers themselves often preferred schedules with 12-hour shifts. These were accompanied by longer periods of leisure and permitted workers to go to work less frequently than schedules with eight-hour shifts. The Employers' members supported the amendment as it removed some of the rigidity from the provision. Normally the limit would apply, but there would be other situations where it was not relevant. The Workers' members and some Government members suggested that it did not improve the text. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 154,512 votes in favour, 170,496 against, with 37,296 abstentions.

160. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to replace "in any 24-hour period," by " , on the average, over a period determined by the competent authority,". Though the amendment did not meet all their objections to the Point, the Employers' members felt that it provided more flexibility. The Workers' members and some Government members stated that it weakened the text. They emphasised the need to maintain daily rhythms of life for night workers. Further, in regard to this Point and other Points of the Recommendation, it was not necessary to refer repeatedly to interpretations by competent authorities or implementation by law and practice. Decisions by the competent authority could restrict collective bargaining, for example. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 156,288 in favour, 200,688 against, with 14,208 abstentions.

161. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to allow for exceptions "when permitted by the competent authority", to accommodate certain situations which required longer hours, for example oil and gas exploration where access to worksites was difficult. The Employers' members agreed that this would provide more flexibility. However, the Workers' members considered it unnecessary because of the use of the term "normal hours of work". The intent of the Point, in their view, was to ensure that night work would not normally exceed eight hours. A specific provision was needed to protect night workers from the negative effects of long hours of work involving night work. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 158,064 votes in favour, 168,720 against, with 33,744 abstentions.

162. The Government member of the United States submitted an amendment to allow additional exceptions "in cases providing for alternative schedules as agreed upon through collective bargaining or other agreements between employers and workers." This would accommodate agreements which provided for more than eight hours in a work day. The Employers' members supported this amendment as well as numerous Government members, who considered it would best suit the needs of a variety of countries. The Workers' members, though they preferred the Office text, proposed a subamendment to delete "or other agreements between employers and workers". Exceptions not agreed through collective bargaining would be unacceptable. The Government member of the United States opposed the subamendment. Put to the vote, the subamendment was adopted with 197,136 votes in favour, 165,168 against, with 23,088 abstentions. The amendment as subamended was adopted by consensus.

163. Point 27 as amended was adopted. The Committee agreed that the Drafting Committee would consider the use of the word "normal" in view of the discussion which had taken place on this Point.

Point 28

164. The Government member of Australia submitted an amendment which was subamended to read as follows: "Except when other arrangements are agreed upon through collective bargaining". This would qualify the requirement that normal weekly hours on average would not be more for night workers than for day workers, and would be consistent with the amendment that had been adopted to Point 27. The Employers' members agreed. The Workers' members opposed the amendment and pointed out that Point 28 differed from Point 27 in that it referred to "night worker", not "night work" as in Point 27. Furthermore, not all collective bargaining resulted in optimum protection for workers, especially marginal workers such as migrant workers. A Government member observed that the words "on average" provided sufficient flexibility and that a limit on weekly hours as provided in the Office text needed to be retained. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed that Point 28 was different in referring to "night worker", but the definition of "night worker" encompassed a broad range of persons. In addition, various work arrangements should not be precluded. It must be kept in mind that some work performed at night was performed over a longer period than during the day. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson responded that this situation was contrary to the spirit of protecting night workers. Put to the vote, the amendment as subamended was rejected by a vote of 159,840 in favour, 182,928 against, with 10,656 abstentions.

165. The Government member of Sweden submitted an amendment to delete "weekly" so that in making comparisons with day workers, account could be taken of daily and annual normal hours as well. The Employers' members agreed. The Workers' members, however, believed that weekly hours of work was a traditional, practical concept. A vote was taken and the amendment was rejected with 150,960 votes in favour, 188,256 votes against, with 19,536 abstentions.

166. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that the normal weekly hours of work of night workers should "be less than" in place of "not exceed on average" those of day workers. This was subamended to read "be less on average than". To prevent problems of interpretation the text should clearly state that night workers should work fewer hours on average than day workers performing the same work. The Employers' members and some Government members opposed this as too categorical; differential treatment between day and night workers was not always justified or appropriate. Put to the vote, the amendment as subamended was rejected by 145,632 votes in favour, 177,600 against, with 19,536 abstentions.

167. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that the normal weekly hours of night workers should not exceed 40 hours per week. They maintained that this was a widespread standard and its implementation would not be too demanding. The Employers' members disagreed. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 159,840 votes in favour, 179,376 against with 17,760 abstentions.

168. Point 28 was adopted without change.

169. Two amendments were presented to delete Point 29. The Government member of Australia withdrew his amendment, but the Employers' members maintained theirs on the grounds that the drafting of Point 29 was unacceptable. They could not agree that night workers should be given priority over day workers in regard to reductions of normal weekly hours of work, especially when they worked in the same establishment. The same applied to additional days of paid leave. Both measures had serious economic implications and could affect employment. The Workers' members considered Point 29 important. Priority only meant that if it were not possible to reduce the working hours of all workers, night workers should be given priority. Implementation would be subject to the situation in each country. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 129,611 in favour, 181,152 against and 15,984 abstentions.

170. An amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States would give night workers the same treatment as other workers with regard to the reduction of working hours. This view was supported by the Employers' members. The Workers' members reiterated their position and added that Paragraph 9 of the Reduction of Hours of Work Recommendation, 1962 (No. 116), stated that measures to reduce working hours should be carried out progressively and that priority should be given to industries and occupations involving mental strain and health risks for the workers. In their view, this applied to night workers. As this principle had already been adopted by the three groups long ago, deletion of Point 29 would be a step backward. The Employers' members argued that this argument was not valid. Recommendation No. 116 only referred to particular industries and occupations and not to night workers. The amendment was put to the vote and was rejected with 137,085 votes in favour, 166,944 against and 21,312 abstentions.

171. An amendment presented by the Workers' members aimed at replacing "or" by "and", which would require both the reduction of normal weekly working hours and additional days of leave. The Employers' members were strongly opposed. They wanted to maintain the option of providing one form of compensation or the other, which was closer to practice. The Workers' members decided to withdraw the amendment but said that they would propose a better formulation for this Point next year.

172. The Government member of the United States presented an amendment such that "the granting of paid leave" was "as agreed upon through collective bargaining or other agreements between employers and workers". The Employers' members supported this amendment as it provided flexibility. In the opinion of the Workers' members this amendment made the text less flexible, as it reduced the scope for legal action. However, in case the amendment were adopted, they introduced a subamendment to delete "or other agreements between employers and workers". Both the author of the amendment and the Employers' members accepted the subamendment. Two Government members pointed out that the amendment eliminated an important point, that of additional days of leave. The amendment as subamended was rejected with 129,611 votes in favour, 166,944 against, and 28,416 abstentions.

173. An amendment submitted by the Government members of the European Community proposed to add "These subjects should preferably be determined by way of collective agreement". It was explained that it had become a tradition in the European Community to settle working time issues through collective bargaining because they affected both workers and employers. This system had proved to be successful in arriving at acceptable conditions and, even though they realised that Point 25 already covered this possibility, they wanted to state their preference and to suggest that other countries follow the same pattern. The Employers' members supported the amendment. The Workers' members, while agreeing that this might be applicable in Europe, believed that one should not clutter the Recommendation with such procedural statements. All were aware that it was possible to negotiate on these issues, but there was no need to state this again. Several Government members agreed and stated that Point 25 already covered all the possibilities for implementation. The statement of preference might not apply to all countries. The amendment was put to the vote and rejected with 147,001 votes in favour, 166,944 against and 8,880 abstentions.

174. The Government member of Canada submitted an amendment to insert "When the nature of the work makes such measures necessary" at the beginning of Point 29. This was to indicate that there were many types of night workers and not all needed preferential treatment. The Employers' members found this amendment to be more practical than the absolute terms in which Point 29 was stated. The Workers' members reminded the Committee that it had already decided that night workers needed special measures. Two Government members said that the amendment was sensible. It might be found that there were other workers who were in need of higher priority. The Workers' members responded that priority for night workers did not exclude priority for other workers as well. Again, the amendment questioned the need for special measures for night workers. The amendment was put to the vote and rejected with 130,647 votes in favour, 170,496 against and 12,432 abstentions.

175. Point 29 was adopted without change.

New Point

176. A new Point after Point 29 was proposed by the Workers' members to ensure "that, in cases of continuous shift work, two consecutive days of leave should be granted of which at least one should regularly fall upon the official rest day of the country concerned". They felt that it was an important Point as it would help night workers to recover normal rhythm and to participate in a normal social life. The Employers' members were strongly opposed. The Point referred to continuous shift workers and not night workers. There was obviously a lack of understanding about continuous shift systems. Sometimes it was not possible to give consecutive days of rest. To make them coincide with official rest days was even more difficult. It was not practical to meet this restriction. One Government member speaking for the Government members of the European Community found that this amendment did not solve problems, but instead complicated matters, especially in such areas as public services. The amendment was put to the vote and rejected by a vote of 137,381 in favour, 213,897 against, with 12,173 abstentions.

Point 30

177. Point 30 was adopted without change.

Point 31

178. Because the Employers' members found the word "prohibited" too strong, they submitted an amendment to replace it by "restricted". They explained that in continuous shift work, it was essential that workers stayed in their places until their replacements had arrived. Not all overtime caused difficulties for the worker. The Workers' members could not accept this amendment as it would not go beyond Point 30, which already referred to avoiding overtime. Point 31 concerned "occupations involving special hazards or heavy physical or mental strain" and a stronger term had to be used. The Employers' members considered that the term "restricted" was stronger than "avoided". One Government member spoke in favour of prohibiting overtime at night in dangerous or strenuous work. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected with 147,815 votes in favour, 166,944 against and 31,302 abstentions.

179. Point 31 was adopted unchanged.

180. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace "full-time shifts" by "shifts of eight hours or more, including a night shift". The Employers felt that this clarification was necessary because two full-time shifts did not necessarily include a night shift. The Workers' members proposed a subamendment to delete "eight hours or more". However, this was not acceptable to the Employers' members because in many systems shifts were as short as four hours. The subamendment was withdrawn. A few Government members stated that they did not support the amendment, which was put to the vote and rejected by 135,642 votes in favour, 217,375 against, and 17,390 abstentions.

181. An amendment by the Employers' members to replace the word "prohibited" by "avoided" was withdrawn in view of the rejection of a similar amendment to the preceding Point. However, the Employers requested that their concern about the absolute character of the word "prohibited" be recorded. The Government member of Australia also withdrew an amendment but wished to express his concern about the narrow range of exceptions mentioned in Point 32. He also observed that force majeure had different meanings in different legal systems. In withdrawing his amendment, the Government member of Canada pointed out that there may be exceptional circumstances which would warrant exceptions and these should be determined by the competent authority.

182. Two amendments presented by the Employers' members and the Government member of Canada proposed to delete the second sentence of Point 32. The Employers' members argued that reporting to the competent authority on each exceptional case would place a heavy and costly burden on the employer. The Government member of Canada said that notification created problems and additional costs, but did not improve the protection of workers. The Workers' member pointed out that the answers received to the questionnaire indicated that reporting was an "effective form of control". It would help to reduce the practice of double shifts, which was particularly harmful. A Government member speaking for the Government members of the European Community said that there were other forms of control which could be worked out between employers and workers, as they had suggested in their own amendment. Other Government members expressed the opinion that the second phrase just added to bureaucratic procedures and was redundant. The amendments were adopted by a vote of 170,422 in favour, 153,032 against and 33,041 abstentions.

183. Point 32 as amended was adopted.

New Point

184. An amendment to insert a new Point after Point 32 was submitted by the Workers' members: "In the case of shift work involving night work, a rest period of eleven hours between two shifts should be guaranteed". They felt that it was important to prescribe a minimum rest period for recuperation, especially for countries which did not have legal provisions on daily rest. The Employers' members opposed the proposal because it was phrased in absolute terms and did not allow for exceptions. Certain shift rotas did not permit an eleven hour rest period. Points 30 to 32 already provided sufficient protection for workers. While one Government member objected to the lack of exceptions, another Government member said he would go as far as to prescribe a rest period of no less than two shifts. The Workers' members offered a subamendment to add "as far as possible" which was adopted by consensus.

185. A new Point was adopted.

186. Several amendments were presented concerning Point 33. The Government member of the United States withdrew his amendment but pointed out that in his country there were many cases in which rest periods were not considered as hours worked. The Employers' members presented an amendment to insert "a break or" breaks because they wanted to include the possibility of there being only one break. The Workers' members accepted this amendment because during a short period of night work only one break might be necessary. The amendment was adopted.

187. Other amendments were withdrawn. However, the Government member of Switzerland expressed his preference for several short rest pauses during shifts. This had proved to be more favourable during night work from a medical point of view. There was a brief discussion of an amendment presented by the Employers' members to add "in accordance with the practice for day workers". The Workers' members opposed this amendment because it was clear that night workers needed special breaks in order to reduce fatigue, in addition to breaks for meals. One Government member observed that day workers often had lunch breaks of one hour or more and that this was unsuitable for night workers. The Employers' members withdrew the amendment but wished to record that they felt strongly about avoiding differential treatment between day and night workers.

188. Four amendments were presented by the Employers' members and the Government members of Australia, Canada and Denmark, the Federal Republic of Germany and the Netherlands to delete the second sentence of Point 33. The Employers' members explained that the question of paid breaks opened up a whole new area of debate. Current negotiations on more flexible working time arrangements included the question of breaks. In continuous shift systems breaks were usually paid, but in other cases they were not, as for example in hotels and restaurants. If breaks were paid they tended to be shorter. A wide range of practices should be reflected and absolute statements should be avoided. The Government member of Australia was concerned that the sentence was too restrictive. He preferred the wider definition in Point 35 which referred to "appropriate financial compensation". Other Government members preferred to leave such questions to collective bargaining and were opposed to making paid breaks an obligation. The Workers' members felt that the sentence was important because there was a tendency for workers not to take breaks if they were not paid. After clarification from the representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference that the first sentence alone would not imply that the breaks were to be paid, the Workers' members insisted that the second sentence be maintained. The amendments were put to the vote and adopted with 184,334 votes in favour, 154,771 against and 22,607 abstentions.

189. Point 33 as amended was adopted.

Point 34

190. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Australia to take into account cases where night work was not more demanding than the same work performed during the day. Not all work was carried out with the same intensity at night and an absolute statement should be avoided. The Employers' members supported this view. The Workers' members did not accept the amendment because it again questioned the more demanding nature of night work. They believed that this Point was very carefully worded as it only referred to the "same work performed during the day". The amendment was rejected by a vote of 158,249 in favour, 187,812 against with 10,434 abstentions.

191. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members would have replaced the word "demanding" by the word "arduous" which had been used in the Office questionnaire. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference explained that "arduous" normally referred to physical strain whereas "demanding" also covered mental strain. The Workers' members then withdrew the amendment.

192. Point 34 was adopted without change.

193. The Employers' members submitted an amendment so that Point 35 would read as follows: "Night work should give rise to the payment of appropriate compensation". They wished to preserve the concept that compensation could be other than financial and the spirit of Point 18 in which reduced working time and extra pay were alternatives. Because the Recommendation contained separate sections for hours of work issues and for remuneration, the provisions could be construed to be cumulative. The Workers' members considered that it was entirely appropriate to allow both to be provided. The Recommendation should not have a lesser content than the Convention. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference explained that in drafting Point 18, the Office had taken into account the fact that the Convention created binding obligations. So as not to discourage ratifications, it had provided a choice between reduced working time or extra pay, though of course it was possible to do both. However, the Recommendation was a series of suggestions on how the issues of working time and remuneration could be addressed for night workers. As it stood, the Recommendation suggested that both reduced working time and extra pay be granted. The Employers' members offered a subamendment so that the phrase would be "appropriate financial compensation or reduced working time" to make it clear that only one or the other was recommended. The amendment as subamended was rejected by a vote of 123,913 in favour, 149,554 against, with 31,302 abstentions.

194. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert "carried out at night" after "night work". They recalled that under the definitions that had been adopted in Point 10 (b) night work could encompass hours not actually worked during the night. Not all night work should lead to extra compensation, only the part carried out at night. The Workers' members opposed the amendment. The definition of night work was already restrictive enough. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 110,001 in favour, 194,768 against, with 13,912 abstentions.

195. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following text to the end of the Point: "Such compensation should be additional to the remuneration paid to the day worker." This was to provide a definition which would be the basis for determining kinds of compensation, distinct from remuneration, that were appropriate, such as time off in lieu of financial compensation. The Employers' members objected for several reasons. They believed that the reference to day workers was unclear and the use of the word "remuneration" was inconsistent with the use of "compensation" in the rest of the Point. Moreover, additional remuneration was not always paid for the night portions of shift rotations but averaged out for day and night work. The Workers' members then introduced a subamendment to replace "the day worker" with "a day worker performing the same work". The subamendment was accepted and the amendment as subamended was adopted. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson requested the Drafting Committee to consider the appropriateness of the use of the word "compensation".

196. The Workers' members submitted an amendment that would allow the compensation, at the night workers' request, to be taken in time off. The Employers' members agreed to a subamendment to provide that the compensation could "by agreement, be taken in reduced working time". The amendment as subamended was unanimously adopted.

197. The Government members of the European Community presented an amendment to add the following provision: "Such compensation should respect the principle of equal pay for men and women for identical work, or work of equal value." The Employers' and Workers' members agreed and the amendment was adopted.

198. Point 35 as amended was adopted.

199. The Committee then considered an amendment by the Employers' members to change the title before points 34 and 35 from "Remuneration" to "Compensation". This would better reflect the contents of the Points. The Workers' members could agree to changing it if the notion of financial compensation were kept. A subamendment to change the title to "Financial compensation" was adopted and the amendment as subamended was adopted.

Point 36

200. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the Point because they believed that the provision did not accord with practice. Special financial compensation for night work was not always incorporated into the basic wage or rate or considered in the determination of leave, holidays and the like. However, they withdrew the amendment in favour of the following one.

201. The Government member of India submitted an amendment which would replace the Point with the following text: "The appropriate financial compensation should be decided by the competent authority in consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers". Because of the various approaches in different countries to providing compensation for night work, the competent authority should be authorised to decide. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment to insert "collective agreement or" after "decided by". The Workers' members opposed the amendment and the subamendment. To them, this Point was of crucial importance to night workers. Workers often found themselves, as a result of illness or accident, with reduced income because financial compensation for night work had not been incorporated into their basic wage or considered for calculating benefits. The amendment would remove the essential protection that the Point was designed to provide. With regard to decision by the competent authority or through collective agreement, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson repeated that Point 25 provided adequate alternatives for implementation. One Government member supported the Office text because financial compensation for night work was taken into account in his country for the purposes indicated in Point 36. Put to the vote, the amendment as subamended was rejected by a vote of 140.859 in favour, 187.812 against, with 17.390 abstentions.

202. Point 36 was adopted without change.

Point 37

203. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference pointed out that the same text as Point 37 had been included following Point 15 of the Convention. The Office had tried not to repeat provisions in the Recommendation that had been included in the Convention as the Recommendation was a complementary text to the Convention. The Committee was asked if it agreed to delete Point 37 from the Recommendation on that basis. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson commented that a country which had ratified a Convention had bound itself to the provisions. A Recommendation indicated how the Convention could be applied. But with regard to countries which had not ratified a Convention, she could not agree to delete a Point from the Recommendation unless a Convention had the same value as a Recommendation for non-ratifying countries. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference responded that a State which did not ratify a Convention should refer to both the Convention and the Recommendation. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson agreed that a Point that appeared in the proposed Convention would not have to be repeated for the reason just stated.

204. The Committee agreed to delete Point 37 from the Recommendation.

Point 38

205. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace "night work, especially when this is undertaken by rotating crews" by "night and shift work", but announced that if there were opposition, they would withdraw the amendment. The amendment was withdrawn as the Employers' members felt it went beyond night work.

206. Point 38 was adopted without change.

New Point

207. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany submitted an amendment to add a new Point with the following text: "In this instrument 'workers' representatives' should mean persons who are recognised as such by national law and practice." However, in view of the lack of support from both the Workers' and Employers' members, the amendment was withdrawn.

Point 39

208. The Government members of the European Community submitted an amendment to replace paragraph (2) with the following: "If such a transfer is not possible, these workers should benefit temporarily, in accordance with national law and practice, from appropriate benefits." The revision in the Office text was proposed due to problems that would be faced by the member State of the European Community because of the nature of their social security legislation. There might be confusion with temporary total disability and permanent disability provisions. The amendment would allow countries to adapt the provision to their own circumstances. The Employers' members supported the amendment but offered a subamendment to clarify the text. The first words "If such a transfer is" would be replaced by "If transfer to day work". The Workers' members preferred the Office text for two reasons. First the provision for "a given period" in paragraph (1) was preferable to "temporarily". Secondly, the reference to sick leave should be retained because the case of a night worker being unable to do night work for health reasons should be assimilated to sick leave. The Workers' members offered a subamendment to delete "temporarily". Both subamendments were adopted and the amendment was adopted as subamended.

209. Point 39 as amended was adopted.

New Points

210. An amendment submitted by the Government members of the European Community to insert into the draft Recommendation the text of Point 17 that had been adopted in the proposed Convention and an amendment by the Workers' members to add a similar Point on maternity were withdrawn in view of the decision of the Committee not to repeat provisions in the Recommendation which had been included in the Proposed Convention.

Point 40

211. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert "As far as practicable" at the beginning of the Point. Though they had no disagreement with the general intention of the Point to reduce the travel time of night workers to and from work, the objective could not always be attained. It was basically the responsibility of workers, not the employer, to get to work and back. The Workers' members opposed the change and challenged the contention that the transportation of night workers was entirely their own responsibility. The principle of proportionality would not require measures that were impracticable. The Point merely listed examples that could be taken. A Government member supported the amendment but disagreed with the employers' arguments. The problem was both for communities and employers. However, the Point needed some qualification as some of the measures, such as housing complexes, were very expensive measures. Another Government member stated that the subject of transportation for workers should not be in an international standard. The Employer Vice-Chairperson added that though he had said that it was the responsibility of workers to get to work and back, the employers also accepted that measures should be taken to assist workers in that respect, but this was not always practicable. Several Government members supported the Office text because it correctly expressed the joint responsibility for such measures, while another Government member reminded the Committee that smaller enterprises were also concerned. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 168,683 in favour, 170,422 against, with 15,561 abstentions.

212. Several Government members of the European Community submitted an amendment to delete "limit or" so that measures should be taken to reduce the travel time of workers, but not to limit it. In response to discussion on whether "limit" was the same as reduce, the Representative of the Secretary-General commented that the Office text had contemplated that the word "limit" would be relevant to an enterprise which was going to implement night work for the first time, while "reduce" would apply when night work had already been undertaken. The amendment was withdrawn.

213. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add "and to improve the safety of such workers travelling at night". The Employers' members supported the amendment and it was adopted.

214. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to clause (c) to insert "or collective" after "individual" to accommodate the possibility that transportation for groups of workers might be appropriate. In place of the amendment the Committee agreed to amend clause (c) of the Office text by striking the word "individual".

215. An amendment was submitted by several Government members of the European Community to delete clause (d). Their concern was that the mention of the building of housing complexes could interfere with national housing policies or discriminate against other workers or groups who also had serious housing problems. However, both the Workers' members and Employers' members pointed out that this was just one consideration that could be taken into account by governmental authorities and employers. Nothing would prevent the housing from being available to others but attention should be paid to the needs of night workers when housing plans were being developed. In view of the discussion, the amendment was withdrawn.

216. Point 40 as amended was adopted.

217. Two amendments were submitted to delete Point 41. The Government member of Canada withdrew his amendment. However, the Employers' members maintained their amendment because they found Point 41 inappropriate for a Recommendation. The question of compensation had already been dealt with in other Points. Travel expenses of workers were not normally borne by the employer. If the employer became liable for extra expenses incurred by night workers, it would be difficult to deal with the variety of circumstances involved, such as workers with their own transport or those using public transport or taxis. If workers were allowed to choose their own means of transport, excessive claims could be made. The Workers' members supported the Office text and pointed out that only expenses that were greater for night work would be compensated, and that such compensation had to be appropriate. There was no mention of the worker being able to choose the means of transport. One Government member observed that if Point 40 were not properly applied, then Point 41 would at least cover the extra costs of transport at night. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 136,900 in favour, 166,944 against and 22,607 abstentions.

218. Point 41 was adopted without change.

219. The Employers' members introduced an amendment which combined points 42 and 44. Where practicable, night workers should have access to a place which could be used both for resting and for eating. It was not always practicable to provide separate facilities for resting and for eating, especially in small enterprises. Their formulation was more flexible. The Workers' members opposed the amendment because they felt the Points should be considered one at a time. A room for rest was particularly important for night workers. As to the Employers' concern about practicability, this had already been discussed. The Recommendation obviously did not ask for the impossible. One Government member pointed out that in many legal systems there was no concept of proportionality and the wording of laws had to be followed exactly. This made an addition of a phrase such as "where practicable" necessary. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 144,337 in favour, 168,683 against with 19,129 abstentions.

220. Point 42 was adopted without change.

221. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to make it clear that employers were not expected to provide the facilities mentioned in all circumstances. One had to bear in mind that this was not always practicable. The Workers' members stressed the importance of food for night workers. Eating during the night posed a problem because gastric functions were reduced. Studies had shown that nutritious drinks and light food were more appropriate. It was of course realised that special cases existed, for example, short shifts, and measures could be adapted to individual enterprises. However, it was important to state the principle without reservations. The Employers' members pointed out that the subject under discussion was the facilities to be provided and not the type of food. In many cases the workers brought their own food. One Government member stated that the Office text already said what the Employers wanted to say. This was also the understanding of the Workers' members which had submitted an amendment to strengthen the text. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 136,271 in favour, 177,378 against and 20,868 abstentions.

222. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to make clear that employers should provide facilities. The Employers' members were against the categorical nature of the amendment. Not all employers could provide facilities for meals. The amendment was rejected by a vote of 151,293 in favour, 161,246 against with 22,607 abstentions.

223. Point 43 was adopted without change.

Point 44

224. Point 44 was adopted without change.

Point 45

225. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to replace "distribution" by "availability", because in their view "distribution" implied that the food was to be provided free of charge. In the opinion of the Workers' members, this notion was included in neither "distribution" nor "availability", especially in the French text. After confirmation from the Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference that the intent of the Office text was not to imply provision of food free of charge, it was decided to refer the matter to the Drafting Committee.

226. Point 45 was adopted without change.

227. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to reverse the order of Points 44 and 45. The words "at least" in Point 44 should refer back to Point 45 and not Point 43. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference explained that the Points had been put in the order for a specific reason. The general Point was followed by the minimum essential step and then by a desirable one. The Employers' members said they preferred the present order of Points. The amendment was withdrawn.

Point 46

228. Point 46 was adopted without change.

Point 47

229. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to include "training and re-training" for night workers. They attached great importance to giving night workers an opportunity to advance in their careers, especially as many night workers were in dead end jobs. The amendment was adopted unanimously.

230. Point 47 as amended was adopted.

Point 48

231. Several Government members of the European Community submitted an amendment to delete "with family responsibilities, of workers undergoing training and of older workers". This would avoid discrimination among various categories of workers when deciding on the composition of night crews. The amendment was withdrawn in view of the opposition of the Employers' and Workers' members, who felt that the Point would be robbed of its meaning.

232. Point 48 was adopted without change.

New Point

233. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point as follows: "Except in cases of force majeure or of actual or imminent accident, workers should be given sufficient notice of a requirement to work at night to enable provision to be made for personal, educational and family responsibilities." The Employers' members suggested a subamendment to delete the words after "night". The subamendment and amendment as subamended were adopted.

234. A new Point was adopted.

Point 49

235. An amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace "arrangements regarding" with "training opportunities including" would ensure that night workers could benefit from all types of training opportunities rather than just paid educational leave. The amendment was adopted.

236. Point 49 as amended was adopted.

237. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace "priority" by "special consideration" so as not to upset seniority systems, affirmative action plans or other established priorities. With support from the Employers' members, the amendment was adopted.

238. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to insert "where necessary" after "night workers". Under paragraph (1), night workers would be given special consideration for day work if they had the necessary qualifications. Thus they were already qualified. Paragraph (2) covered the situation where they might need training for carrying out the particular job. The Workers' members accepted this explanation and supported the amendment. They wished to ensure that workers would not be transferred to lower skilled day jobs. The amendment was adopted.

239. Point 50 as amended was adopted.

Point 51

240. The Employers' members and several Government members of the European Community submitted amendments to delete Point 51. The Employers' members objected to the Point because it did not specify that the worker had worked on night work for a number of years with the same employer in order to be eligible for an early or phased retirement plan sponsored by that employer. They withdrew the amendment but said that the subject would have to be taken up again in the second discussion. The sponsors of the other amendment expressed concern about the ability of social security systems to take these priorities into account. They withdrew their amendment in favour of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members to replace "priority" by "special consideration". That amendment was adopted.

241. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to insert "voluntary" before "early retirement" to preclude forced retirement. The amendment was adopted.

242. Point 51 as amended was adopted.

New Point

243. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add a new Point with the following text: "The refusal to accept night work should not lead to a reduction of social security benefits, particularly unemployment insurance, except for professions which generally imply night work." The Employers' members opposed the amendment on the ground that few occupations required or "implied" night work. Several Government members objected because of the implications that it would have for their social security systems. Further, the amendment contained no concept of reasonability or relationship to whether the unemployed person's previous work was performed at night. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 87,690 in favour, 128,760 against, with 21,090 abstentions.

Point 52

244. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete, "in particular through appropriate lighting and the presence of sufficient supervisory staff". Specific measures should not be mentioned. It was the standard of maintaining the same level of protection that was important. The Workers' members wished to ensure that measures would take into account the specific needs of night workers and especially the isolation that they often experienced. The Committee agreed to delete the references to lighting and supervisory staff, but on the basis of another amendment to add, "in particular through avoiding as far as possible isolation of workers during night work".

245. Point 52 as amended was adopted.

246. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete this Point. They objected to stating as fact that the human organism was more sensitive at night to certain environmental disturbances and forms of work organisation. They repeated what they had argued throughout the course of the Committee's work: these contentions had not been scientifically proved and were not commonly accepted. Further, they noted that Report V (1) said that the issue had not been sufficiently studied. The Workers' members responded, as they had already done numerous times throughout the course of discussion, that there were studies that had reached conclusions in support of the statements in the Office text. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson cited several specific studies. She stated that according to the field of chronobiology, substances were absorbed differently depending upon the time of exposure, and this must be considered with regard to night workers. An Employer member emphasised that this Point would create special difficulties of application in the chemical industry. Emission levels may have to be the same during the night as during the day. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the Point would not necessarily mean that limit values would be different, but that the different effects on night workers would have to be taken into account in organising work. One Government member reiterated her remarks during the general discussion that it had been conclusively established that there were harmful effects of night work. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 88,800 in favour, 117,660 against, with 21,090 abstentions.

247. The Workers' members withdrew an amendment to delete "as far as possible", but wished the record to reflect their view that in most cases the problems could be dealt with through improvements in work organisation.

248. Point 53 was adopted without change.

Point 54

249. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the reference to trade unions so that the Point would refer only to workers' representation functions. They felt that "trade union functions" was not normal ILO terminology and that only functions related to the enterprise were appropriate; these were workers' representation functions. The Workers' members and some Government members felt that the terminology was appropriate and that night workers should not be prevented from engaging in trade union activities just because they worked at night. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected by a vote of 89,910 in favour, 135,420 against, with 4,440 abstentions.

250. Point 54 was adopted without change.

New Point

251. The Workers' members sought to add a new point as follows: "Assignment to night work should not be used to restrict activities of trade unions or of workers' representatives." The Employers' Vice-Chairperson rejected the implication that employers would exhibit such bad faith. The previous Point stated the same idea in a positive way. Put to the vote, the amendment was rejected with 97,680 votes in favour, 102,120 against, with 27,750 abstentions.

Point 55

252. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference pointed out that this Point had been included in the Preamble of the Convention. In accordance with the Committee's decision not to repeat Points from the Convention in the Recommendation it should not be included here. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson asked whether the fact that it was in the Preamble to the Convention, where it had no operative effect, had the same legal value as if it were in the Recommendation. The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference considered that a paragraph in the Preamble to a Convention would have value close to that of a substantive provision in a Recommendation. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated it was upon this interpretation that they agreed to the deletion of the Point from the Recommendation. It was an issue that needed further reflection.

253. Point 55 was deleted from the Recommendation.

Point 56

254. Point 56 was deleted from the Recommendation as it was contained in the Convention.

New Point

255. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to add the following Point: "Statistics on night work should be improved and studies on the effects of different forms of work organisation, particularly of shift work systems, should be intensified." The Employers' members agreed and the amendment was adopted. The Government member of Cyprus asked that the record reflect that in some countries this might not be possible or be within national priorities.

256. A new Point was adopted.

257. The Workers' members proposed to replace Point 57 with the following text: "The forms of organisation of night work that are best adapted to each undertaking and to its personnel, as well as other issues relating to night work such as occupational health and social services, should be subject to an agreement between the employers and the workers' representatives concerned and the workers' organisations." They wished to strengthen the Office text. The Employers' members felt the amendment went too far. They had no problem with consultation, but the proposal was in contradiction with employers' decision-making on these matters. The Workers' members withdrew the amendment but said they would come back to this issue in the second discussion.

258. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to provide that there should be consultation "as well as on other issues relating to night work such as occupational health and social services". Workers needed to participate in the protection of their own health. The Employers' members submitted a subamendment so that the amendment would read as follows: "as well as on occupational health measures and social services". The subamendment was adopted and the amendment as subamended was adopted.

259. Point 57 as amended was adopted.

Proposed partial revision of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948, (No. 89)

260. Consideration of the Protocol to revise Convention No. 89 was begun by a general discussion. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson recalled the historical background of Convention No. 89. She paid tribute to the countries which had accepted to refrain from recourse to night work of women in industry despite the problems posed by international competition. The Convention still had an important role to play, especially in countries where women workers were seen as a cheap and docile labour force and needed protection. In many countries, protective legislation to limit night work of women had been inspired by the Convention. Equality of opportunity was advanced as an argument against the prohibition of night work of women, but such equality was slow to be realised in practice. Women still received inferior wages and still had the major burden of family responsibilities. Different studies had shown that due to women's double responsibilities, women night workers had on average four hours less sleep than men. This was a serious threat to health. As long as women still suffered from discrimination, they needed protection. In countries which had ratified the Convention, trade unions had used it in their struggle to limit night work and to improve working conditions. The Workers' members had therefore concluded that the Convention was still important and a minority opposed even discussing the Protocol since it introduced the possibility of derogations. However, the majority of the group believed that with certain changes, the Protocol could give new vigour to the Convention and could be used to the advantage of women. For this reason they were willing to collaborate constructively and follow the general orientation of the Protocol as proposed. She warned, however, that if the Protocol was to be used to destroy the Convention the Workers' members would resist such a move with all their force. She also appealed to Government members which had not ratified the Convention to abstain from weakening protection of women through changes to an instrument they did not plan to ratify.

261. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson recalled that the adoption of the Protocol had been the priority issue for the Employers. For them Convention No. 89 was no longer appropriate as it was out of step with the promotion of equality of opportunity and in contradiction with Convention No. 111. The changing character of industrial work and advances in technology had permitted great improvements in working conditions. The preference of the Employers' members was to adopt a Protocol which would remove the prohibition on night work of women in industry. Several countries which had ratified Convention No. 89 were having difficulty in abiding by it, some had denounced it, and others were considering denouncing it. On the other hand, the Employers recognised that there were specific circumstances when women needed special protection, in particular concerning maternity. But instead of a prohibition of night work, women should be allowed to choose.

262. The Government member of Denmark announced that the Nordic countries had not ratified Convention No. 89 because national legislation did not permit differential treatment between men and women. However, they considered the Protocol important, supported the Office text and wanted to participate in the discussion.

263. The Government member of Canada stated that Canada had not ratified Convention No. 89 and did not support the Protocol. They believed that only maternity should be protected, and were satisfied with the terms of the proposed Convention which helped to improve working conditions for all night workers. Canada would abstain from the adoption of the Protocol.

264. The Government member of Uruguay said that his country had ratified Convention No. 89 but later denounced it. A national debate on the subject in his country had reached the conclusion that the Convention was discriminatory. Even if it were made more flexible, it would still contain a principle to which they were opposed. They felt that the proposed new Convention and Recommendation should replace Convention No. 89. They would abstain from the adoption of a Protocol.

265. The Government member of Belgium asked Committee members to be realistic. Even though there were excellent instruments against discrimination, they were not sufficiently applied. Few countries, for example, had ratified Convention No. 156 on workers with family responsibilities. In practice inequality still existed and protection was therefore still necessary. Belgium had ratified Convention No. 89 and would support the Protocol.

266. The Government member of Switzerland said that his country had ratified Convention No. 89 but would consider denunciation if it was not made more flexible. In his opinion, the emancipation of women had advanced a great deal over the last 40 years. The majority of working women were employed in non-industrial work to which the Convention did not apply. The Convention was not only discriminatory, but was no longer adapted to modern needs.

267. The Government member of the German Democratic Republic said that a general prohibition was no longer acceptable because it prevented women from having access to employment in high technology fields for which they had acquired skills and advanced education. Instead, governments should take measures to help women cope with family responsibilities.

268. The Government member of Malta said that his country had ratified Convention No. 89. In the Protocol they wished to include the same provisions on maternity protection as those in Point 17 of the proposed Convention.

Point 1

269. Point 1 was adopted without change.

Point 2

270. The Workers' members presented an amendment to delete this Point. They did not understand why the Protocol should have such a Preamble when Convention No. 89 did not have one. As the Protocol would only partially revise the Convention, a minimal text which showed the link between the Convention and the Protocol would be sufficient. The Employers' members opposed the deletion of the Preamble. It showed the basis for the provisions of Point 3. Several Government members supported the Preamble because it explained the reasons behind the Protocol. The amendment was withdrawn.

271. The Workers' members presented another amendment to insert a new clause to "recall that, as long as equality between men and women is not fully realised in society or in the enterprise, the drawbacks and hazards inherent in night work particularly affect women". The Committee's preceding discussions had shown that night work affected women more adversely due to the inequalities in society. This should be reflected in the Preamble. The Employers' members were opposed to such a subjective statement since the other two clauses dealt with factual information. In order to prevent the creation of a platform to limit the scope of the Protocol, they proposed a subamendment to add "in the periods before and after childbirth". This was immediately rejected by the Workers' members and the subamendment was withdrawn. The amendment was put to a vote and rejected by 97,680 votes in favour, 101,010 votes against, and 23,310 abstentions.

272. Another amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to insert a new clause after clause (a) to "note that the obstacles to the promotion of women in professional life, through access to skilled and highly paid occupations, should be removed". There was a need to encourage the access of women to better careers and to supplement Article 8 of Convention No. 89. The Employers' members found the arguments convincing and the amendment was adopted.

273. The Government member of Australia withdrew an amendment but expressed the view that the Preamble did not adequately reflect the aim of eliminating discrimination between workers on grounds of sex.

274. Point 2 as amended was adopted.

Point 3

275. Before the discussion of Point 3 began, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson addressed a question to the Office with regard to the scope of action that could be taken by Protocol. He noted that the Proposed Conclusions provided that the variations from Article 2 and the exemptions from Article 3 that might be allowed could only be introduced by means of an agreement between employers and workers. Would it be possible for the Protocol to provide for variations or exemptions directly by law? There had been some amendments submitted to this end. The Representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference stated that any amendments which had been submitted by the deadline would be considered and that it would be for the Committee to decide, based on the amendments that would come before it, how far to go in the revision of Convention No. 89 and by which means.

Clause (a)

276. The Government member of Japan submitted an amendment to modify clause (a) to read as follows: "National laws or regulations, adopted after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, may determine variations in the duration of the night period as defined in Article 2 and exemptions from the prohibition of night work contained in Article 3 or may provide that such variations and exemptions be introduced by means of an agreement between an employer or group of employers or one or more organisations representative of the employers concerned, and one or more organisations representative of the workers concerned." This would have the effect of permitting variations and exemptions by national legislation as well as by agreement. The Government of Japan believed that the competent authorities should have this possibility in order to accommodate the various situations in different countries. Consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers would still be required. The Employers' members supported the amendment because it provided great flexibility.

277. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson argued against the amendment. The Workers' opposed any proposal that would put into the Protocol a negation of the Convention. Even if the Committee were legally competent to adopt such a provision, it would be unthinkable to let member States decide whether to apply the Convention. She expressed her consternation that the proposal had been submitted by a country which had not ratified the Convention since it would have a significant effect on those countries which had. She appealed to the Government members who might support such an amendment to have the courage to denounce the Convention rather than to undermine its integrity in this fashion.

278. One Government member expressed support for the flexibility offered by the amendment. There were some countries in which collective bargaining was not a very widespread practice. In such countries, governments should be able to act. It was also important to consider developing countries. Development should not be impeded. Another Government member also supported the amendment. Employers would be seeking variations and exemptions and workers, in principle, would be against them. A neutral authority should be able to decide under what conditions variations and exemptions should take place.

279. One Government member pointed out that this was a very important question of principle. It appeared that the amendment would open the way to allowing completely optional enforcement of Convention No. 89. This seemed a very unusual procedure and he wondered if it had been done before. Another Government member expressed opposition to the amendment. First, consultation was not sufficient. There must be agreement between the social partners. Second, the amendment removed the sense of the Protocol. It would mean the ability to denounce the Convention by acceptance of the Protocol.

280. A Government member sought clarification about the ability of a government to give its final consent to an agreement that might have been reached regarding variations and exemptions. For example, could it reject an agreement providing for exemptions? The representative of the Secretary-General of the Conference pointed out that the Office commentary in Report V(2) stated that final review by the national authorities was exactly the sort of condition which governments could establish under clause (b) of Point 3.

281. The Committee asked the Legal Adviser to comment on the receivability of the proposed amendments to the Protocol which would permit derogations directly by national laws and regulations or by the competent authority. He began by distinguishing between the intention of the decision to consider a Protocol and the limits which were applicable under the Constitution and the Standing Orders. The intention, as clearly expressed in the documents submitted to the Governing Body, was to allow variations and exemptions without other limits than the requirement of an agreement between the social partners under conditions fixed by national laws and regulations. There were cases in which the prohibition of night work of women might not be considered to be to their advantage; but the claim that variations and exemptions were more favourable required confirmation by the women workers concerned through their representative organisations. This was clearly stated in the Office commentary in Report V (2) under Point 3.

282. The Legal Adviser continued by examining the question of how far the Committee could go in enlarging the possibilities for variations and exemptions. Nothing in the decisions of the Governing Body or the provisions of the Constitution or Standing Orders permitted the conclusion that the Conference was strictly bound by the intentions behind the work which had led to the Proposed Conclusions. The only limit was that the revision must be partial. It was, however, necessary to recognise that the amendments which allowed variations and exemptions directly by national laws and regulations went beyond usual practice in that they fixed no limits on the power to derogate through legislation. If this path were followed, it would be quite possible to introduce such limits through subamendments.

283. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that after having heard the Legal Adviser's comments, he understood that the Committee and the Conference were free to take the courses of action that had been proposed in various amendments. These would give authority to governments to determine variations and the scope of exemptions from certain provisions. However, such a course went beyond other revisions of Conventions. Some of the amendments that had been proposed to bring about variations and exemptions did not stipulate limits on government action. The Employers' members had thus decided to propose a subamendment. After "Article 3" in the amendment, the following would be added: "in respect of limited categories of women workers when the application of the provisions of the Convention to them would raise special problems of a substantial nature".

284. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson opposed the subamendment. As she understood the Legal Adviser's remarks, the amendment submitted by the Government member of Japan and others which were similar were receivable. However, she had three questions. What was the effect on other articles of the Convention? Since the Governing Body did not intend for the revision to go beyond Articles 2 and 3, could Governments be relieved of the obligations of the Convention without limit in contradiction to Article 15? Finally, would this procedure create a dangerous precedent with regard to future standard-setting activities of the ILO? Though it might not contradict this Committee's mandate, did it not affect the legal context of other standards? After all, ratifying States expected that other ratifying States would maintain their obligations. Otherwise the entire mechanism of control would make no sense.

285. The Legal Adviser responded that, from a strictly legal point of view, Article 15 would not be modified by the Protocol. As far as the wider implications were concerned, it was up to the Committee and the Conference to decide.

286. Regarding the subamendment that the Employers' members had submitted, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that it was designed to meet the concerns expressed in the discussion and to take into account the remarks of the Legal Adviser. It was an attempt to give Governments greater flexibility, but to place some limits on how far they could go in order to meet the practical problems that had arisen with regard to Convention No. 89. It would permit a whole range of possibilities: continuing the prohibition as provided in the Convention and applying it according to the present provisions, introducing variations or exemptions by agreement, requiring the government authority to give final approval of agreements, and, finally, introducing limited variations and exemptions by law where there were substantial reasons and subject to the requirement for consultation.

287. The Workers' members opposed the sub-amendment. In their view, it was cosmetic in nature. No guidance was given as to what problems of a substantial nature might be. The original text of Convention No. 89 described conditions which warranted exceptions, such as cases of force majeure or where perishable materials might be lost. But in the sub-amendment, the determination of the meaning of "substantial" would be left to governments.

288. A Government member asked the Legal Adviser to verify that some ILO instruments allowed decisions to be taken by governments, even on exemptions, after consulting the employers' and workers organisations concerned. The Legal Adviser responded that some instruments contained such clauses. However, the issue was different with a revising instrument. The question was not how to place limits in a Convention that would be submitted for ratification, but how, through a revising instrument, the requirements of an existing Convention would be reduced.

289. The Government member of Japan explained further the reasons for submitting the amendment. There had been no intention to undo the intent of Convention No. 89, but rather to take into account the need to make the instrument more flexible. In Japan, women were prohibited from working at night, not just in the manufacturing industry, but in all industries. Exceptions were determined by national laws. Before their enactment, labour laws, including such exceptions, were submitted for agreement to an advisory council composed of representatives of employers' and workers' organisations and independent experts. The amendment reflected the Japanese context and it had not been expected that it would create conflict or confusion. Therefore the amendment would be withdrawn and the issue could be taken up again in the second discussion. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson announced that the Employers would move the amendment. He added that their intention was not to remove or negate the prohibition in the Convention, but to provide more flexibility without giving total freedom of action to governments.

290. One Government member commented that though he appreciated the efforts of the Employers to limit the sweeping provisions of the amendment, it would be difficult for governments to define the limited categories or the special problems. In many cases, governments would want to allow exemptions for economic reasons rather than because of difficulties of application. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson warned that a dangerous decision was being proposed. The criteria in the subamendment were not clearly defined and it did not refer to the need to protect women. Furthermore, clause (b) allowed governments to determine the level at which negotiations regarding variations and exemptions would take place and the conditions to which they would be subject. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that the criteria were the same as those in Point 12 and there had been no objection. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson stated that the new Convention, where there had been no pre-existing prohibition, was not the same as the Protocol. Put to the vote, the sub-amendment was rejected by a vote of 83,266 in favour, 111,724 against, with 16,864 abstentions. The Government member of Japan withdrew the amendment in favour of continuing the discussion in the following year. The Employers' members also withdrew support for the amendment but would support other amendments with similar objectives.

291. The Employers' members submitted an amendment to add at the end of clause (a) "or, in the case of no agreement being reached, by decision of the competent authority". If no agreement could be reached regarding variations or exemptions, it was necessary to provide a possibility for the competent authority to intervene. The priority accorded to agreements was preserved. They offered a sub-amendment which would add at the end of the amendment "provided that the decision of the competent authority shall relate to limited categories of women workers when the application of the Convention to them would raise special problems of a substantial nature". The Workers' members opposed the amendment with or without the subamendment. It still left authority to States to decide without including criteria for such decisions. There were two paths that could have been taken to provide more flexibility in the application of Convention No. 89. One was to allow States to decide on variations in the definition of night and exemptions from the prohibition according to criteria established in the Protocol. The second was to establish a procedure which would safeguard the interests of women workers by requiring an agreement. The Office had chosen the procedural approach. The amendment, however, would mix the two approaches and give authority to States without establishing clear limits. A Government member offered a subamendment to the subamendment to insert: "be taken after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers and shall" after "shall". The Employers' members agreed to the change. They considered that their proposal now contained adequately clear limits, in fact the same ones that had been accepted for the new Convention. A Government member supported the Employers' amendment. Without a provision of this type, his Government would have to seriously consider denouncing Convention No. 89. Decisions on exemptions allowing women to work at night could not be left solely to the social partners. If no agreement was reached, a neutral body, namely the competent authority, should be able to decide. The Workers' members remained opposed to the amendment as subamended. The words "special problems of a substantial nature" were far too vague in the context of the Protocol. Put to the vote, the amendment as subamended and further subamended was rejected with 87,482 votes in favour, 101,184 votes against, and 22,134 abstentions.

Clause (b)

292. The Government member of India submitted an amendment that would add at the end of clause

(b), "including the approval of any agreement in this regard by the competent authority, if considered necessary". After a clarification from the Representative of the Secretary-General that this type of provision could be included in national laws or regulations under clause (b) as it stood, the amendment was withdrawn.

Clause (c)

293. The Employers' members submitted an amendment which would replace clauses (c), (d), (e) and (f) with alternative provisions on pregnancy and maternity protection. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated that it was appropriate to provide protection during a period before and after childbirth. The Committee had taken a decision on this by its adoption of Point 17. However, the amendment differed from the new text of Point 17. They were prepared to subamend it to conform. In addition, they pointed out that the Office text started with the premise of a prohibition in clause (c). The prohibition could be lifted if certain conditions were met. In contrast, the amendment dealt directly with cases where exemptions had been granted. The Employers felt that their amendment was a less complex approach. The Workers' members preferred the Office text with a few minor changes. The Protocol should differ from the new Convention on night work. The Committee had found a formulation in Point 17 of the Convention that was relevant both for countries which had a prohibition and for those which provided free choice. However, the Protocol concerned only Convention No. 89 which prohibited the night work of women. The limits on derogations therefore must be more rigorous. The flexibility that the Protocol would provide should be particularly restricted with regard to maternity protection. Put to the vote, the amendment as subamended was rejected with 85,374 votes in favour, 99,076 votes against, with 22,134 abstentions.

294. The Workers' members submitted an amendment to replace the words following "lifted" in the fourth line by "at the specific request of the woman worker concerned provided that neither her health nor that of her child will be endangered". The Employers' members, on the understanding that the amendment replaced all words in clause (c) after "lifted" agreed and the amendment was adopted.

295. Point 3 as amended was adopted.

Adoption of the report, proposed Conclusions and resolution

296. At its 19th session, the Committee adopted its report, subject to changes requested by various members, as well as the proposed Conclusions as they had been amended by the Drafting Committee.

297. The Workers' member of France stated that in his opinion the work of the Committee had resulted in decisions which went against the interests of the workers and the vocation of the ILO. While the new standards might one day permit reduction and partial compensation of the hazards of night work, the socially indispensable protection provided by a prohibition was lacking. In addition, the protection provided by Convention No. 89 had been practically eliminated on the pretext of equality of treatment of women. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that this statement represented the views of a small minority of the Workers' members and that the Workers' members as a whole supported the approval of the resolution to place "night work" on the agenda of next year's Conference.

298. The Committee adopted the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Night Work".

299. Concerning the resolution, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson stated the strong reservations of the Employers' members. They were not favourable to the adoption of a Convention and Recommendation on night work, especially as found in the proposed Conclusions. The resolution was consistent with the decisions that the Committee had taken, but it did not have the Employers' support.

300. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson expressed the attitude of the Employers' members toward the Committee's work thus far and the proposed Conclusions that it had reached. They remained unconvinced of the need to regulate night work through the adoption of new instruments, in particular a Convention. The extremely varied nature of night work, its complexity and the variety of circumstances under which it was carried out made it unsuitable for international regulation. By analogy, one could imagine the difficulties of covering all forms of day work by a single Convention. The draft instruments were unacceptable because they proceeded from the premise that all night work was hazardous to health and disturbed social life. This premise was incorrect, and it had led to errors in the provisions of the instrument. Moreover, the instruments were insufficiently flexible and did not take into account all forms of night work. Some persons seemed to believe that night work was only carried out in large industrial undertakings, whereas night work increasingly was found in small enterprises and the service sector. The proposed Convention in its present form was not capable of wide ratification nor of effective application. Insufficient attention had been given in the Committee's discussion to the essential nature of night work in national economies and to its benefits, in particular job creation. With respect to the revision of Convention No. 89, some limited improvement had been made. However, the discriminatory nature of the prohibition of night work of women remained and required further attention in the second discussion.

301. The Workers' Vice-Chairperson considered that the position of the Employers' members was inconsistent with that of the Employers' members on the Governing Body, who had agreed that new standards on night work in general would be considered by this Committee in addition to the revision of Convention No. 89. She also regretted that there was still disagreement over the fact that night work has drawbacks for workers. There was still much important work to come. She would identify remaining problems with the texts of the proposed Conclusions during the plenary session at the Conference. Some of these related to the definitions of "night" and "night work", which would deprive too many workers of the protection provided by the Convention and Recommendation.

302. The Employers' Vice-Chairperson pointed out that his statement on the Employers' position with respect to the new instruments was not inconsistent with the decision that had been taken by the Governing Body. The Governing Body had called for the examination of the possibility of new standards on night work. After such examination, the Employers' members continued to maintain that the nature of night work made it inappropriate for regulation by new standards, in particular by a Convention.

303. Several Government members felt that the Committee had carried out a very constructive dialogue. They hoped that common ground could be found for achieving the best possible texts in the second discussion.

304. The Chairman thanked the Committee for its co-operation and for the very important work that it had carried out.

305. The present report, the proposed Conclusions, and the resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Night Work" are submitted for consideration.

Proposed Conclusions

I. PROPOSED INSTRUMENTS ON NIGHT WORK

A. Form of the instruments

1. The International Labour Conference should adopt new standards on night work.

2. These new standards should take the form of a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation.

B. Content of the proposed Convention

3. The Preamble should refer to the provisions of international labour Conventions and Recommendations on the night work of children and young persons, and specifically to the provisions in the Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention and Recommendation, 1946, the Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948, and the Night Work of Children and Young Persons (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921.

4. The Preamble should also refer to the provisions of international labour Conventions and Recommendations on night work of women, and specifically to the provisions in the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948, and the proposed Protocol thereto, the Night Work of Women (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921, and Paragraph 5 of the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952.

5. The Preamble should also refer to the Maternity Protection Convention, 1952.

6. The Preamble should state that night work is detrimental to health and disturbs the social and family life of workers. The drawbacks and hazards to which workers are exposed should be reduced and compensated.

7. The Preamble should state that in some cases night work is indispensable for social or technical reasons, and that in other cases it allows for more intensive use of equipment and installations, thus helping to raise the productivity of undertakings and to create employment.

8. The Preamble should state that, wherever possible, advantage should be taken of scientific and technical progress and of innovations relating to work organisation in order to limit recourse to night work.

9. For the purposes of the Convention:

- (a) the term "night" should mean a period, which should comprise not less than seven consecutive hours, determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers;
- (b) the term "night work" should mean a period of work which includes a part of the night to be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers;
- (c) the term "night worker" should mean an employed person who is engaged in night work on a permanent basis, or within the framework of a shift work system, or on a certain number of days in any calendar year to be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

10. The Convention should apply to all employed persons of both sexes.

11. A Member which ratifies the Convention may, after consulting the representative organisations of employers and workers concerned, exclude wholly or partly from its scope limited categories of workers when the application of the Convention to them would raise special problems of a substantial nature.

12. A Member which avails itself of the possibility afforded in the preceding Point should, in its reports on the application of the Convention under article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO, indicate the particular categories of workers thus excluded and the reasons for their exclusion. It should also describe all measures taken with a view to progressively extending the provisions of the Convention to the workers concerned.

13. The Convention should provide that specific measures should be taken with a view to reducing drawbacks inherent in night work and eliminating, where possible, hazards in night work and properly compensating employees. These measures may be introduced progressively and should include, as a minimum, those referred to in Points 14 to 20 below.

14. Workers should have the right, before taking up an assignment as a night worker and at regular intervals thereafter, to undergo a health assessment without charge and to receive advice designed to reduce the harmful effects of night work on health. There should be a guarantee that the medical findings which concern them will not be transmitted to others without their consent and will not be used to their detriment.

15. Arrangements should be made to ensure that at all hours of the night workers who have an accident or are taken ill at the workplace should receive first aid and, where necessary, be taken quickly to a medical centre.

16. Safeguards should be established for night workers recognised, for reasons of health, as incapable of performing this type of work for a given period.

17. (1) Measures should be taken to ensure that an alternative to night work is available to women workers who would otherwise be called upon to perform such work –

- (a) for a period of at least three months before the expected date of childbirth and at least three months after childbirth;
- (b) for additional periods during pregnancy, or during a specified time beyond three months after childbirth the length of which should be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, in respect of which a medical certificate is produced stating that this is necessary for the health of the mother or child.

(2) The measures referred to in Paragraph (1) above may include transfer to day work where this is possible, the provision of social security benefits or an extension of maternity leave.

(3) During the periods referred to in Paragraph (1) above –

- (a) a woman worker should not be dismissed or given notice of dismissal, except for justifiable reasons not connected with pregnancy or childbirth;
- (b) the income of the woman worker should be maintained at a level sufficient for the full and healthy maintenance of herself and her child in accordance with a suitable standard of living. This income maintenance may be ensured by any of the measures listed in (2) above, by other appropriate measures or by a combination of these measures.

(4) The provisions of this Point should not have the effect of reducing the protection and benefits connected with maternity leave.

18. Night workers should be granted reduced working time without loss of earnings or receive extra pay.

19. Appropriate social services should be provided for night workers.

20. Before introducing night work, the employer should consult the workers' representatives concerned.

21. The provisions of the Convention may be implemented by laws or regulations, collective agreements, works rules, arbitration awards or court decisions, a combination of these means or in any other manner appropriate to national conditions and practice. In so far as they have not been given effect by other means, they should be implemented by laws or regulations.

22. Where the provisions of the Convention are implemented by laws or regulations, there should be prior consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

C. Content of the proposed Recommendation

General provisions

23. For the purposes of the Recommendation:

- (a) the term "night" should mean a period, which should comprise not less than seven consecutive hours, determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers;
- (b) the term "night work" should mean a period of work which includes a part of the night to be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers;
- (c) the term "night worker" should mean an employed person who is engaged in night work on a permanent basis, or within the framework of a shift work system, or on a certain number of days in any calendar year to be determined by the competent authority after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

24. The Recommendation should apply to all employed persons of both sexes.

25. The provisions of the Recommendation may be implemented by laws or regulations, collective agreements, works rules, arbitration awards or court decisions, a combination of these means or in any other manner appropriate to national conditions and practice. In so far as they have not been given effect by other means, they should be implemented by laws or regulations.

26. Where the provisions of the Recommendation are implemented by laws or regulations, there should be prior consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

Hours of work and rest periods

27. Normal hours of work for night work should not exceed eight in any 24-hour period, except in the case of work which includes substantial periods of mere attendance or stand-by or in cases in which alternative working schedules have been agreed upon through collective bargaining.

28. Normal weekly hours of work of night workers should not exceed on average those of workers performing the same work by day in the branch of activity or the undertaking concerned.

29. Night workers should have priority in the application of measures for reducing normal weekly hours of work or should be granted additional days of paid leave.

30. Work should be organised in such a way as to avoid, as far as possible, overtime before or after night work.

31. In occupations involving special hazards or heavy physical or mental strain, overtime before or after night work should be prohibited, except in cases of force majeure or of actual or imminent accident.

32. In cases of shift work involving night work, the working of two consecutive full-time shifts should be prohibited, except in cases of force majeure or of actual or imminent accident.

33. In cases of shift work involving night work, a rest period of 11 hours between two shifts should be guaranteed as far as possible.

34. Night work should include a break or breaks to enable workers to rest and eat.

35. The scheduling and total length of the breaks referred to in Point 34 above should take account of the more demanding nature of night work compared with the same work performed during the day.

Financial compensation

36. Night work should give rise to the payment of appropriate financial compensation. Such compensation should be additional to the remuneration paid to day workers performing the same work and –

- (a) should respect the principle of equal pay for men and women for identical work, or work of equal value; and
- (b) may by agreement be taken in the form of reduced working time.

37. Where financial compensation for night work is a normal element in a worker's earnings, it should be incorporated in the basic wage or added to it for the purposes of calculating the remuneration of paid annual leave, paid public holidays and other absences that are normally paid as well as for the fixing of social security contributions and benefits.

Health

38. Employers and the workers' representatives concerned should be able to consult the occupational health services, where they exist, on the consequences of various forms of organisation of night work, especially when undertaken by rotating crews.

39. (1) Night workers who are recognised, for reasons of health, as incapable of performing night work during a given period should be transferred, whenever possible, to day work.

(2) If transfer to day work is not possible, these workers should be granted, during the period referred to in paragraph 1 above, appropriate benefits, in accordance with national law and practice.

Social services

40. Measures should be taken to limit or reduce the time spent by night workers in travelling between their homes and workplaces and to improve their safety when travelling at night. Such measures may include –

- (a) co-ordination between the starting and finishing times of night work and the schedules of local public transport services;
- (b) provision by the employer of collective means of transport for night workers where public transport services are not available;
- (c) assistance to night workers in the acquisition of appropriate means of transport;
- (d) the building of housing complexes within a reasonable distance of the workplace.

41. Where night workers incur heavier expenses in travelling between their home and their workplace than those borne by other workers in the undertaking, the employer should pay appropriate compensation.

42. Suitably equipped rest rooms should be made available to night workers in appropriate places in the undertaking.

43. The facilities provided by employers for their personnel to obtain meals and beverages while at work should be devised in such a way as to meet the needs of night workers.

44. So far as possible, the employer should make available to night workers, at appropriate places in the undertaking, food and beverages suitable for consumption at night.

45. Night workers should at least have access to a place where they may prepare or heat and eat food which they have brought.

46. The extent to which night work is performed locally should be one of the factors to be taken into consideration when deciding on the establishment of crèches or other services for the care of small children, choosing their location and determining their opening hours.

47. Within the framework of measures adopted by the public authorities, by other institutions and by employers to encourage training and retraining, as well as cultural, sporting or recreational activities for workers, the specific constraints on night workers should be duly taken into consideration.

Other measures

48. In cases of shift work, the special situations of workers with family responsibilities, of workers undergoing training and of older workers should be taken into consideration when decisions are taken on the composition of night crews.

49. Except in cases of force majeure or of actual or imminent accident, workers should be given sufficient notice of a requirement to work at night.

50. Measures should be taken, where appropriate, to enable night workers, like other workers, to benefit from training opportunities including paid educational leave.

51. (1) Night workers who have completed a given number of years on night work should be given special consideration with respect to vacancies for day work for which they have the necessary qualifications.

(2) Preparations should be made for such transfers by facilitating the training of night workers where necessary for tasks normally performed by day.

52. Night workers who have completed a considerable number of years on night work should be given special consideration with respect to facilities for voluntary early retirement or phased retirement where such facilities exist.

53. The employer should take the necessary measures to maintain by night the same level of protection against occupational safety and health hazards as by day, in particular avoiding, as far as possible, the isolation of workers.

54. In determining the content of night work, account should be taken, as far as possible, of the fact that the human organism is more sensitive at night to certain environmental disturbances such as toxic substances, noise and vibrations, as well as to certain forms of work organisation such as piece work, assembly-line work, or work according to a pre-established rhythm.

55. Night workers who have a trade union or workers' representation function should, like their colleagues who assume such a function by day, be able to exercise it in appropriate conditions.

56. The workers' representatives concerned should be consulted regularly on the forms of organisation of night work that are best adapted to each undertaking and to its personnel, as well as on occupational health measures and social services.

57. Statistics on night work should be improved and studies on the effects of different forms of work organisation, particularly of shift work systems, should be intensified.

II. PROPOSED PARTIAL REVISION OF THE NIGHT WORK (WOMEN) CONVENTION (REVISED), 1948 (No. 89)

58. The International Labour Conference should revise the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), by adopting a Protocol authorising:

- (a) variations in the duration of the night period as defined in Article 2;
- (b) exemptions from the prohibition on night work contained in Article 3.

59. The Preamble to the Protocol should:

- (a) note the on-going discussion and developments in national law and practice concerning the prohibition of night work by women workers, in particular with regard to equality of opportunity and treatment for men and women in employment;
- (b) note that obstacles to the advancement of women in working life, through access to skilled and well paid occupations, should be removed;
- (c) indicate that these developments should take place with full respect for the interests of women workers, including the need for maternity protection.

60. The Protocol should add an Article to Part I of the Convention which should provide as follows:

- (a) National laws or regulations, adopted after consulting the most representative organisations of employers and workers, may provide that variations in the duration of the night period as defined in Article 2 and exemptions from the prohibition of night work contained in Article 3 may be introduced by means of an agreement between an employer or group of employers or one or more organisations representative of the employers concerned, and one or more organisations representative of the workers concerned.
- (b) These national laws or regulations should determine the circumstances in which such variations and exemptions may be permitted, the level at which they may be negotiated and the conditions to which they should be subject.
- (c) It should be prohibited to apply the variations and exemptions permitted pursuant to Point 60 (a) and (b) above to women workers during periods of at least three months before the expected date of childbirth and at least three months after childbirth. This prohibition may be lifted at the express request of the woman worker concerned on condition that neither her health nor that of her child will be endangered.
- (d) The prohibition provided for in Point 60 (c) above should also apply to additional periods during pregnancy or during a specified time beyond three months after childbirth, in respect of which a medical certificate is produced stating that this is necessary for the health of the mother or child.
- (e) During the periods referred to in Point 60 (c) and (d) above, women workers should be protected against dismissal and their income should be protected through assignment to day work, extended maternity leave, social security benefits or any other appropriate means, or through a combination of these means.
- (f) The provisions referred to in Point 60 (c), (d) and (e) above should not have the effect of reducing the protection and benefits connected with maternity leave.
- (g) Information on the variations and exemptions in force should be included in the reports on the application of the Convention submitted under article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

Resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Night Work"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the fifth item on the agenda,

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of Governments, proposals for a Convention and a Recommendation concerning night work and for a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948,

Decides that an item entitled "Night work" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion with a view to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation concerning night work and of a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948.

President: Mr. Nkomo

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 107: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107. I should like to invite the officers of the Committee – the Chairman, Mr. España-Smith, Government delegate, Bolivia, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. de Regil Gómez, Employers' delegate, Mexico, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' delegate, Denmark, as well as the Reporter, Mr. Helms, Government adviser, Denmark, to come to the rostrum.

I give the floor to Mr. Helms, the Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report

Mr. HELMS (Government adviser, Denmark; Reporter of the Committee on Convention No. 107) – I have the honour to submit the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107, as contained in the Provisional Record, No. 25.

The Committee carried out the second discussion on the revision of Convention No. 107. I should stress that the proposed Convention is an all-embracing Convention and goes well beyond the normal scope of ILO instruments. It attempts to deal with the major problems faced by indigenous and tribal peoples, without breaking these problems up into small segments to suit the fields of competence of the organisations of the United Nations system. The whole exercise has been carried out with the full co-operation and support of the United Nations and the specialised agencies.

This has also meant that we had to deal with a number of extremely difficult and sensitive questions, on which opinions were deeply divided and strongly held. The Committee had to find a balance between language which would, on the one hand, have expressed the aspirations of the indigenous and tribal peoples themselves, as well as the concern felt by the international community for their problems; and, on the other, the need to have a realistic text that could be ratified and provide a basis for national and international action. I would like to think that we have been reasonably successful in this.

Amongst the difficult issues we have before us, I would draw your special attention to three. The first was the use of the term "peoples" rather than "populations", with implications and interpretations going far beyond dictionary meanings. The Committee accepted, without voting, the word "peoples" with a clause to explain that this should not be construed as having any implications as regards the rights which may attach to the term under international law. This provision again was supplemented by a statement from the Chair, which I have incorporated in my report and which you will find in paragraph 31.

The second was the requirement to consult these people, in good faith and in a form appropriate to the circumstances, with the objective of achieving agreement or consent. This wording was adopted by the Committee after a vote. I am certain that the importance of this provision will not be lost on you, nor I trust, on the indigenous and tribal peoples themselves.

The third major issue was the whole question of land rights: the concept of territories, ownership, possession, and transmission of land rights, surface and subsurface resources, and relocations. The text that the Committee adopted and submits to you is contained in Articles 13 to 19 of the proposed Convention. Agreement on this text was only reached after long and sometimes painful discussions as the Committee sought to cover a wide variety of situations and of concepts. Several times it looked as if agreement was not possible. The consensus at the end could not have been finally reached but the determined and diplomatic efforts of the Chairman, the leaders of the two groups, and a number of governments.

The Committee adopted, with much less difficulty, the provisions on recruitment and conditions of employment, on vocational training, handicrafts and rural industries, on social security and health, on migration across borders and on administration. These had been discussed last year and by and large the Committee was satisfied with the draft text before it. That they were more easily adopted does not diminish their importance.

I believe that the proposed Convention represents a significant expression of the international community's concern for peoples who have suffered discrimination, injustice, dispossession and shameful treatment. A text alone cannot atone for centuries of wrongs, but it can make a statement of intent. I hope that this proposed Convention, which will take the place of Convention No. 107 as the only major international instrument in this field, does make that statement.

In its work, the Committee was fortunate in having the participation of several organisations representing indigenous and tribal peoples. This was an element lacking in the 1956 and 1957 discussions, and we are grateful for the representatives of international non-governmental organisations who spent many patient hours with us so that we could have the benefit of their views and their attitudes.

I also thank the representatives of national non-governmental organisations who attended our discussions.

I know that the indigenous representatives were often very dissatisfied with our procedures and our decisions, and that some felt obliged to leave the room on a couple of occasions. One can sympathise with their strong feelings but, nevertheless, I am confident that the ILO must establish ever closer links with these organisations as it develops its programmes for indigenous and tribal peoples. We feel that this should be a relationship of partnership in a common endeavour. The representatives of these peoples who are attending the Conference are not all satisfied with the results of our discussions, and they will inform you of their reservations themselves from this podium. The Committee, however, was able to accomplish the objectives set for us by the Governing Body three years ago, that is the removal of the assumption in Convention No. 107 that these peoples should disappear; it is the replacement of this assumption by the principle of respect for their cultures and ways of life and the improvement of many of the already positive protections offered in the old Convention. None of us can be entirely satisfied – such is the price of compromise – but we can use the very considerable achievements in the proposed Convention to continue the efforts of the international community for the improvement of these peoples' treatment in every country where they live.

The partnership we hope to continue with indigenous and tribal peoples becomes all the more important in the light of the resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples which the Committee unanimously adopted and which I now also submit to you along with the report. It is important that the ILO should seize on this opportunity to strengthen its activities for indigenous and tribal peoples. We feel that special efforts must be made to promote the ratification of the Convention and to carry out a programme of surveys, studies and technical co-operation projects. We are confident that the Governing Body and the Director-General will lend their full support to such a programme. We are also confident that the other agencies of the United Nations system and other international organisations will join the ILO in these efforts.

It is my hope that the plenary will adopt the proposed Convention and the resolution unanimously, thus showing the importance that we all attach to the problems of indigenous and tribal peoples and demonstrating your intention of a new role for them in our common future.

I cannot end without expressing my admiration and gratitude to the Chairman of the Committee, Ambassador España-Smith, and to the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. de Regil Gómez and Mr. Svenningesen, for their devoted efforts to bring our work to a successful conclusion. Without the high statesmanship and spirit of accommodation that they showed, we would never have reached agreement. I also want to express my thanks to the secretariat and the interpreters, and with these words I commend the report, the proposed Convention and resolution to the plenary for adoption.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Original – Spanish : Mr. DE REGIL GOMEZ (Employers' adviser, Mexico; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 107) – Mr President, first of all allow me to congratulate you on your election and on the success of this Conference.

There is no doubt as to the international prestige of the ILO today, prestige earned over 70 years of an existence dedicated to the solution of the major social problems of the entire world, with particular emphasis on problems of labour and social security. The tripartite composition of our Organisation has enabled it to have a unique perspective, totally different from that of other international bodies. We in the ILO have a special and unique advantage in that we see the problems confronting us from a political, technical and profoundly pragmatic point of view and for that reason our work has contributed the element of change which is required by our times. This is confirmed and ratified by the international community on the occasion of the revision of Convention No. 107.

In 1957 Convention No. 107 was a milestone for the international community. At the time it was a basic instrument to adapt the national reality of many countries, then emerging from colonialism or underdevelopment, to a totally new and different world situation from that existing at the end of the Second World War. At that time the ILO heeded the demands that did exist, took up many people's concerns and took on the task of acting as the crucible to forge many points of view into a new reality.

However, the political and social dynamics of the second half of the twentieth century have moved very quickly, in some areas breathtakingly, so the political field has been one of these areas and thus in three decades we have seen more independence movements and national liberation movements than we did at the beginning of the century. The world has changed and the ILO cannot be indifferent to the need for change.

It is clear that Convention No. 107 was an instrument with a high political content. For that reason, perhaps, the international community and its organisations felt that the ideal place for revising and amending a text relating to the groupings thought of as indigenous or tribal should be this Organisation. Thus, many bodies, including the United Nations, encouraged us to revise the only existing international instrument in the international community on indigenous and tribal populations.

The challenge was undoubtedly of universal interest. Governments with indigenous or tribal communities living in their countries reviewed their internal structure. Governments which did not have such communities saw an opportunity to practise diplomacy in human rights and to give their own views. The workers, whose ranks include many members of such communities, took up the banner, while employers endeavoured to put what is basically political, with a high degree of regional emotiveness, which we feel goes beyond the framework of action and responsibility of this Organisation, into a social context.

In was on this basis that we began our second discussion on the revision of Convention No. 107.

As is clear from the text of the report submitted, the first political element resolved was the one relating to peoples, the term now used instead of "populations", as in the past. The concept of a "people", adopted by consensus, clearly avoids the political connotation of that term in the language of international law and takes on a definition which implies a community of persons living in an independent and sovereign country whose population includes such communities.

It is right and just to point out that the consensus achieved in the Committee was possible largely thanks to our Chairman, Mr. Raúl España-Smith, the Ambassador of Bolivia, who with his gifts as diplomat, jurist and negotiator managed to come up with a wording to denominate these communities as "people" without implying any conclusions as to self-determination, secession or separatism in the countries concerned. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Svenningsen of Denmark, immediately understood the draft solution and thanks to his experience and skill the Workers' group was also able to express its support for this wording.

However, we should point out that the matter of political concepts relating to national sovereignty should not be dealt with in the ILO in the future.

In our opinion, the report gives a suitable clarification of the polemic which has arisen in the last few years with respect to the term "territories" and its relation to indigenous communities and itinerant or territorially mobile tribal groups. The terms "people" and "territories" raise the thorny problem of sovereignty with respect to a given area, particularly if we consider that such a region does belong to an independent country if it has the three necessary traditional requisites for a nation, namely territory, people and government.

The problem becomes more acute when we consider that certain countries have used the term "territory" to refer to a region inhabited by indigenous communities, including territorial reservations, whereas many other countries, perhaps the majority, use "territory" as a definition of the national region and they use it to qualify the sovereignty of the country. The term "lands" was fortunately in the original text and has been translated in the text approved by the Committee. "Territory" therefore should be considered as an area of geographical habitat.

Once again we are dealing with a political matter which has great problems of national interpretation and a high degree of emotional sentiment. This of course is matter which goes beyond the normal framework of the ILO, however, despite the difficulties, the Working Group established to review this part managed after many hours of discussion and analysis to reach a consensus which covered practically the entire content.

I must here express my thanks to those participated in the Group for their skill in negotiation, their wise points of view and their perseverance.

The few remaining matters on which there was no consensus in the Working Group were solved by the Committee in a series of votes which show that the following points must be taken into account. First of all political matters should not be dealt with in the ILO; secondly, many countries have reservations on this part; and thirdly, natural resources and subsoil products is the domain of each individual country.

Fortunately, the wisdom of our Chairman and the great skill of the delegates of the Committee in the three different groups enabled us to reach a satisfactory conclusion. On this particular point it should be noted that the Employers' group cannot accept any responsibility since it does not have political control in the respective countries. Governments must solve problems regarding lands in the light of their respective legal, political and economic systems.

The part relating to technical aspects was dealt with quickly, not only because it is a matter which really belongs to the ILO, but also because the first discussion on Convention 107 dealt in detail with this.

Finally, I should like to say that, for our group, the report adequately covers technical and political solutions and we feel that the report and proposed Convention should therefore be adopted by the Conference.

The ILO should not deal with matters which do not relate to the working world and should avoid dealing with political matters.

The solution to this exceptional problem has been found thanks to the good offices and the great skill of those who participated in the Committee, particularly our Chairman. I also wish to thank the members of the Office, particularly, Mr. Ali and Mr. Swepson for their interest in our point of view and the attention that they have given us. I should like to thank the Workers' group for their contributions to the debate and, particularly, I should like to thank Mr. Svenningsen and his close co-workers. In my group I must express my thanks to all delegates for their participation, their great knowledge of the matter and their great loyalty and discipline. To the Secretary of the IOE I should like to express thanks for their experience and guidance in complicated terms of the Conference.

I recommend the proposed Convention to the Conference for adoption.

Mr. SVENNINGSEN (Workers' delegate, Denmark; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 107) – I wish, on behalf of the Workers' group, to make some comments with regard to the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

The Workers' group is satisfied that the term "peoples" is used throughout the proposed Convention in line with the aspirations of these peoples.

While the term "peoples" is used in the proposed Convention, other parties in the tripartite discussion insisted that this could only be on the basis of a qualification that the use of the term should have no implications as regards the rights which may be attached to the term under international law.

The Workers' Group felt that this qualification was unnecessary, but was faced with the alternative of seeing the word "populations" retained in the text.

This would have been detrimental to the interests of the peoples concerned and contrary to the notion that the revision of Convention No. 107 should be progressive and not retrogressive. On this basis we reluctantly came to the view that there was no alternative but to accept this qualification.

The Committee was faced with many complex and difficult questions. Our task was not easy and the drawing-up of this instrument was the result of the efforts of the parties concerned to find common ground.

While the proposed Convention does not satisfy all the expectations of the Workers' group, we believe it is certainly an improvement on the present Convention as well as a basis for future progress.

The section relating to land and resources was one of the most difficult for the Committee to reach agreement on. The result concerning this part of the proposed Convention falls well short of our aspirations, particularly with regard to rights to resources and the explicit recognition of rights to ownership and possession of territories. We are also of the view that the provisions relating to the removal of indigenous and tribal peoples from their land and the inalienability of land ownership could have been much stronger.

The Workers' group felt strongly that, in line with the removal of assimilationist sentiments from the text, the proposed Convention should require the consent of the peoples concerned on matters affecting them.

In the final analysis, we were able to obtain only a provision that government should engage in consultations with a view to obtaining agreement or consent. It is regrettable that some parties have stated that even this provision is too onerous.

The Workers' group worked closely with representatives of indigenous and tribal peoples' groups, in line with our strong commitment to and support for their involvement in decision-making on issues which affect them.

The Workers' group included persons from indigenous and tribal backgrounds and their input was invaluable in the work of the group and the Committee as a whole. However, we regret that we were unable to accept all proposals from the indigenous NGOs and that we were not always able to fulfill their expectations.

In summary, the Workers' group believes that the proposed Convention will pave the way for a great deal of work in the coming years, including technical assistance by the ILO.

We are aware that the ILO already has extensive contacts with groups and institutions representing tribal and indigenous peoples. We would urge the ILO to expand and intensify these relationships as we believe they have a good deal to offer in this area.

While the expectations of many were high, the result represents progress and we believe that the proposed Convention will prove to be a valuable instrument.

Finally, I would draw your attention to the resolution submitted by the Nordic Governments. The resolution is comprehensive, self-explanatory and has received broad support in the Committee. The Workers' group is pleased to associate itself with this resolution. In conclusion, I would like to thank all the members of the Committee and also the officers working so closely with us. We are very proud to say that we have had really a fantastic time at this Committee. It was difficult for all of us to reach agreement but I am sure that we achieved a good result seen from the Workers' group and I would like to thank all the Committee members and the officers.

Original - Spanish: Mr. ESPAÑA-SMITH (Government delegate, Bolivia; Chairman of the Committee on Convention No. 107) - I had the honour of chairing for the second time the Committee dealing with the partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). The Committee at the end of its work drafted the report and the proposed Convention which have now been submitted to the Conference for consideration.

First of all I should like to highlight the dedicated and fruitful co-operation given me by the Vice-Chairmen of the Committee. Under the sure guidance of Mr. Jorge de Regil, Vice-Chairman and spokesman for the Employers' group, and Mr. John Svenning-sen, Vice-Chairman and spokesman for the Workers' group, both groups participated in a spirit of intense co-operation and dialogue, which was matched by that of the Government representatives participating in the Committee.

With a view to conciliation, the three groups dealt with the thorny matters covered in the Convention, many of which pertain to areas and matters which are not usually dealt with in this Office - a difficult exercise to be sure. The fact that we have come to terms with such a complex matter by drafting a text which is sufficiently universal and flexible to deal with a great variety of situations constitutes, to my way of thinking, a demonstration and a product of the great conciliatory potential and capacity of tripartism.

I should also like to underscore the ongoing and efficient support given us by the Office, particularly through the representative of the Director-General, Mr. Aamir Ali, and through Mr. Lee Swepson.

It is worth recalling that the revision of the Convention began last year, during the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference, when we were celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. That time of reflection coincided with the first stage of revision of one of the most famous ILO Conventions in the field of human rights. This year is also significant in that, as the ILO is celebrating its 70th anniversary, the Conference has before it a proposed Convention designed to perfect and consolidate an uncompleted and important task for the benefit of the indigenous and tribal peoples in the world.

The time is now ripe for a new international Convention which is revised and updated to take into account evolving perspectives and the aspirations of the indigenous and tribal peoples themselves. With a view to understanding and heeding the opinions and needs of those peoples the Commission heard the delegates of various non-governmental organisations directly representing them. Moreover, various delegations of the three groups also included indigenous representatives.

I should once again like to express my thanks to the representatives of those peoples for having told us about the reality of their lives and for having let us know about their frustrations, hopes and aspirations.

The Committee dealt with more elements than it did in the first reading, which enabled us to move more easily towards a consensus and to focus debate on certain topics on which there was a great diversity of opinions and perspectives. Fortunately, we were able to achieve a proposed Convention based on broad agreement. Perhaps it would be appropriate now to highlight some of the central aspects of the proposed Convention now before the Conference.

First of all, we managed to completely overcome the integrationalist and assimilationist approach of the original Convention No. 107. The proposed Convention takes as its basic premise respect for the specific characteristics and the differences among indigenous and tribal peoples in the cultural, social and economic spheres. It consecrates respect for the integrity of the values, practices and institutions of these peoples in the general framework of guarantees enabling them to maintain their own different identities and ensuring self-identification, totally exempt from pressures which might lead to forced assimilation, but without ruling out the possibility of their integration with other societies and life-styles as long as this is freely and voluntarily chosen.

In the new and modern approach taken by the proposed Convention, a fundamental innovation is the introduction of the term "peoples" as a concept which suitably expresses the identity which each and every one of these peoples has or feels it has within the context and framework of the national States in which they live. It should also be pointed out that the Committee decided to include a clause explaining the scope of the term "peoples" within this proposed Convention. Article 1, paragraph 3, expressly states that "the use of the term 'peoples' in this Convention shall not be construed as having any implications as regards the rights which may attach to the term under international law". This explanatory text was supplemented by a statement which I made in the report, on behalf of the Committee, to the effect that the interpretation of the word "peoples" has no implications with respect to the right to self-determination as understood in international law. In my own opinion, this statement is relevant, since the ILO's mandate and scope of action does not enable the Organisation to define, grant or restrict the right to self-determination, a responsibility which belongs to other fora.

Another of the most important aspects is the part on land. The proposed Convention contains a general provision which establishes the special importance for the cultures of these peoples, of their relationship with the lands or territories, or both as applicable, which indigenous peoples occupy or otherwise use, and in particular the collective aspects of this relationship. The proposed Convention also provides that the rights of ownership and possession of the peoples concerned over the lands which they traditionally occupy shall be recognised, and, in other cases, the right to use lands not exclusively occupied by them, but to which they have traditionally had access for their subsistence and traditional activities. On the same subject, the proposed Convention stipulates that governments must take steps as necessary, within the national legal system, to resolve land claims by the peoples concerned.

Governments must also identify the lands which these peoples traditionally occupy, in order to guarantee effective protection of their rights of ownership and possession.

The proposed Convention also recognises the broader concept of access to habitat, which includes the right to use of environmental resources. This is the meaning given in the Convention to the term "territories".

Another extremely complex and thorny issue was that of natural resources. In the discussion on this topic, due account was taken of the fact that national legislation and ways of dealing with this matter vary considerably. Therefore, in addition to drafting a basic standard aimed at protecting the rights of these peoples with respect to natural resources in their lands, a complete exception is made for cases in which the State retains the ownership or other rights to natural resources.

The proposed Convention also stipulates that adequate procedures for consultation and free consent must be applied when the relocation of these peoples is considered necessary as an exceptional measure, and provides for their right to return to their tradi-tonal lands, whenever possible, as soon as the grounds for relocation cease to exist or, if this is not possible, the right to appropriate compensation.

The proposed Convention provides for the establishment of ways and means of ensuring that these peoples actively participate in decision-making and in planning and administering programmes which concern them.

I should also highlight the fact that the proposed Convention improves the provisions relating to the elimination of negative discrimination and the enjoyment by indigenous peoples of internationally recognised human rights. In this context, the proposed Convention stipulates that in application of national laws and regulations to these peoples, due regard shall be paid to their customs and cultures. It also stipulates that indigenous and tribal peoples must have access to adequate health services and social security schemes and the opportunity to acquire professional and vocational training and education, with due regard for the specific characteristics of their cultures, languages and way of life, on an equal footing with the rest of the national community and with adequate participation in planning and decision-making. The proposed Convention also contains an improved part on recruitment and conditions of employment.

There is no doubt that after the Conference has adopted the proposed Convention, which I hope will be the case, member States will give active and speedy consideration to its subsequent ratification. This would open up new vistas for work within the ILO, as set out in the resolution accompanying our report to the Conference, with measures to enhance dialogue between governments, employers' and workers' organisations concerning the objectives and contents of the Convention, with the active participation of the organisations of the peoples concerned. This resolution also urges the ILO to issue updated studies and reports on the social and economic situation of these peoples and to implement programmes and projects of technical co-operation which would directly benefit indigenous peoples, most of whom, as we know, are still facing a situation of great economic vulnerability, poverty and unemployment. I should like to point out, as a useful example, the fact that in my country, Bolivia, the ILO has been providing efficient technical co-operation for the benefit of our indigenous peoples, which make up most of our population. I hope that these programmes will be supplemented by others carried out for the benefit of the indigenous peoples of the Amazonian region of Bolivia. I feel that this type of ILO activity should go hand in hand with the joint support of other agencies of the United Nations system, and can also be part of multi-bilateral programmes.

To conclude, I am convinced that the proposed Convention submitted to the Conference today is a text which has been qualitatively improved, enriched and modernised, and one which, within the scope and terms of reference of the ILO, has achieved a balance between the possibilities of member States and the genuine aspirations of indigenous and tribal peoples. I consider that this will be a fundamental instrument; it is the only international instrument now in existence which aims to guarantee the rights and improve the living conditions of the 300 million people who make up the indigenous and tribal peoples of the world.

Mr. CRATE (representative of the International Organisation of Indigenous Resource Development) – I would like to comment very briefly on our own ideals and objectives as indigenous peoples. We did not come here to be passive observers while diplomats, labour leaders and executives decided what to do with us. We did not come here to give your deliberations our tacit approval by our presence. Finally, we did not come here so that the International Labour Organisation could tell the world it had consulted indigenous peoples during the revision of Convention No. 107. Because in point of fact we have not been consulted.

What I have observed here during the past few days has been a shameful display of greed, justification of genocide, and an attempt to gain international approval for a continuing process of oppression of the weak and poor by the rich and powerful.

The Employers' representatives and the States appear to have forgotten the very purpose of international law. Over and over again I have listened to arguments that a particular human right cannot be recognised for indigenous peoples because it would conflict with the national laws in some States. There is not a single State in this room that will permit this Conference to make any provisions that will require changes in its own domestic law. Somehow, the domestic laws of States have become sacrosanct. Apparently we already live in that ideal world where each State has adopted national laws that can no longer be improved. I am forced to conclude that existing domestic law represents the highest standard that the International Labour Organisation is willing to set.

I say that you have forgotten the objective of international human rights law, the objective of standards setting. International human rights standards have been established specifically because States do approve domestic legislation that legalises the abuse of human rights. How can we forget that Hitler's Jewish Decrees were valid domestic German law? German domestic law between 1939 and 1945 legalised murder and torture.

We as indigenous peoples have as our objective the establishment of international law that will encourage States to revise, improve, and raise their standards for the protection of human rights. We thought that was also your objective here. Existing national law has provided the legal basis for our subjugation and oppression. If existing national law establishes the basis for your standards, why do you come here?

Some States, those States that have entered into treaties with indigenous peoples, have decided to use this occasion to rewrite history. They are disturbed by the fact that they have entered into treaties with indigenous peoples. These diplomats have been instructed to tell this International Labour Conference that there are no treaties with indigenous peoples. Treaties, they say, can only be entered into between States and intergovernmental organisations. Their legal logic leads them to conclude that the treaties signed with indigenous peoples are therefore not really treaties at all. Two or three hundred years after the treaties were signed with our people, which provided the basis in international law for the establishment of their States, they have decided that no treaties were signed at all. They claim now, in retrospect, that the treaties are only contracts signed with corporate "persons".

I want to remind these States that the treaties with our nations were signed because you required our approval, our assistance, our co-operation, our land, our resources, our friendship and our trust. Those States came to treat with us in international law. You recognised our sovereignty then because you wanted our land. Now you want to declare by proclamation that we are no longer sovereign. When and how did we cease to be sovereign? When did our territories become yours? By what process did you gain ownership and possession other than by your own proclamation?

I am appalled and saddened by the discussions that are taking place. You have already our territories. You have left us almost nothing. What have you really got to fear if we ask you now to leave enough for us to live on? What is the difference between our claim and the claim of oppressed colonial peoples who want to live in their own homelands? Why, when it comes to human rights, do your ideals suddenly vanish? Why are the few States who stole indigenous land to establish their territories allowed to set the standards for the entire world?

I do not know what you are going to do with us now. Most of the States that established the existing minimal standards in 1957 have not ratified them. I think those States will continue to evade ratification of the proposed Convention. They will have succeeded in weakening this Convention, but nevertheless, they will not ratify it. Those States have set as their objective the weakening of indigenous human rights.

We call upon the international community this one last time – remember what you told the world when you came here. You wanted to eliminate forced assimilation and prejudice. That is what you told us.

Ms. VENNE (representative of the International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs) – My name is Sharon Venne; I am a Cree from the Treaty Six territory in western Canada. I have been asked by representatives of indigenous peoples to address this plenary. We come from indigenous territories in Canada, South America, the United States, the Nordic countries, Japan, Australia and Greenland.

Our purpose is to express our views and positions in regard to the ILO revision process on the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

Firstly, we want to raise the issue of the sorely inadequate ILO procedures that relegated us to an indirect and demeaning level of participation during the ILO Meeting of Experts on the Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), in September 1986 and during the two-year revision process.

We appreciate the efforts of the workers who put forward amendments which reflected our positions. It must be pointed out, however, that the most critical provisions were not agreed upon in an open and viable fashion within the Committee on Convention No. 107. Instead, amendments were negotiated in private where we were barred. This is true for all the land and resource provisions which are the "soul" of the proposed Convention. The issue of indigenous peoples was determined in the same fashion: behind closed doors.

Critical matters regarding our fundamental economic, social and cultural rights have been discussed and decided by Government, Employers' and Workers' delegations. We were silent observers as our rights were bartered and settled. It is an indescribable feeling to sit and have people who know nothing about us make decisions and judgements. The pain of being invisible in a room makes one wonder about the state of mankind.

We are of the firm view that the inadequacy and inappropriateness of the ILO procedures contributed to the failure of the proposed Convention to provide fair and objective standards on our most essential issues. The direct and effective input with the consent of indigenous peoples on major questions affecting us should be the central principle of all international forums, including the ILO.

It is highly inappropriate and prejudicial for governments which have been cited for violations of Convention No. 107 to have been in a position of influence throughout the process. We urge that more respect be demonstrated in the future.

In the proposed Convention, there are a number of violations of the principal objectives which are as follows:

First the use of the term "peoples" (Article 1, paragraph 3): it is unfair and racially discriminatory to limit our rights as peoples under international law. We are entitled to the same rights as other peoples and any possible double standard in this regard should be eliminated without question.

Second, denial of indigenous consent: one of the underlying principles in the proposed Convention is the need to respect indigenous peoples and cultures. Yet, Article 6 provides only for consultations with indigenous peoples when government measures directly affecting us are carried out. Unless the principle of consent by indigenous peoples is entrenched in the proposed Convention, our lives and territories will remain vulnerable to destructive government action.

Third, indigenous customs and institutions (Articles 8 and 9): the proposed Convention only recognises our rights to our own customs and institutions to the extent that they are not incompatible with fundamental rights defined by the national legal system. Such a limitation is an invitation for further assimilative measures by governments and is therefore contrary to the objectives of the ILO revision process.

Fourth, indigenous lands and resources (Articles 13-19): let me only highlight the following: first, the revised Convention stipulates respect for the relationship we have with our lands or territories but then proposes an unacceptably ambiguous definition of the term "lands" in a manner that could curtail our territorial rights. Second, only land rights based on present, and not past, occupation are explicitly recognised. Third, Article 15, paragraph 2, is likely to open the door to all forms of resource exploitation on indigenous lands by governments without indigenous consent. In this way, Article 15, paragraph 2, may render meaningless any guarantees to effectively protect our land rights under Article 14, paragraph 2, and would thus result in an application more regressive than the original Convention No. 107.

We are outraged and bitter at the prejudicial treatment of our territorial and resources rights by the Employers' group in the tripartite Committee. This group consistently sought to limit and deny us full recognition of our rights to land, resources and other matters. This persistent insensitivity and opposition is difficult to understand. The Employers' narrow approach of self-interest renders the proposed Convention deficient and fatally flawed.

We want to pay full tribute to the Governments of Botswana, Colombia, Portugal and Ecuador, who never wavered in their commitment and determination to establish uplifting and appropriate international norms. We will not forget their positive and enlightened input. We should also like to call attention to the spirit of co-operation of the Nordic countries.

The countries which have constantly sought to weaken government obligations in the proposed Convention and facilitate circumvention of their obligations in the future will learn from the example of the representatives from the States mentioned. We believe that some governments were especially detrimental to the revision process.

Indigenous peoples world-wide are concerned that unacceptable standards are being set. Harmful precedents could result which could adversely affect standard-setting processes in other international forums.

The proposed Convention is saturated with unnecessary qualifications, such as "where appropriate" and "where possible", in respect to government obligations. This will make enforcement highly problematic.

We urge the delegates to carefully consider the impact of this proposed Convention from an indigenous perspective.

Original - Spanish: Mr. ONTIVEROS YUL-QUILA (representative of the Indian Council of South America) - I am speaking on behalf of the Indian Council of South America. I am the general coordinator of the organisation and a member of the Kolla nation, which inhabits northern Argentina.

As regards the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), the Indian Council of South America promoted its revision by participating in 1986 in Cosquín, Argentina, where we adhered to the principles of decolonisation of the United Nations, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.

Since 1977, when we indigenous peoples participated in the sessions of working groups, and the Sub-commission and Commission on Human Rights, Convention No. 107 has been denounced as having a content which is colonialist, integrationist and advocates forced assimilation of our peoples into the so-called "national societies" of the member States of the ILO. We indigenous peoples are considered indirectly as "cheap labour" in that Convention. It is very important to recall that in 1957 most of the African continent and other regions of the world, including South America, were subjected to a latent colonialism, a scourge which still exists today.

In 1988, when the pertinent committee of the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference dealt with the revision of the Convention, we recognised that a colonialist and despotic spirit still prevailed with respect to our peoples; it was present in the minds of most of the representatives of governments and employers, particularly those representatives of States which have an indigenous majority in their territories; what these States have in common is the deplorable existence of racial discrimination and racism similar to, and in some cases even worse than, the segregation which prevails in Southern Africa.

In 1989, at this 76th Session of the Conference, it has been absurd for us to watch, from the observers' seats, deprived as we were of the right to speak or to vote by the regulations and structures of the ILO, the Government and Employers' delegates of a large part of the world (Canada, the United States, Argentina, Brazil, Bolivia and Venezuela) behave like representatives of the old colonial empires which despoiled the Americas, denying us the right to exist and express our identity as peoples in the cultural, social and economic fields.

On the other hand, I am gratified to see the change of approach and the objective attitudes adopted by the delegations of Colombia and Ecuador and most of the Workers here. We also appreciate the fact that the delegations of Portugal and Botswana have understood our demands, which are based on the present moral and ethical way of thinking of peoples.

The indigenous organisations of South America are aware of the fact that the proposed Convention adopted is weaker than the original as regards the articles dealing with lands and territories, because it "denies" the existence of indigenous peoples and their future. What rights have States which constituted themselves by usurping the territories of our ancestors peoples and governments? What rights have member States to deny us the use of natural resources of the surface and sub-surface? What rights have States and employers to deny us food, education, and housing appropriate to our cultures at our workplaces?

Distinguished representatives of States, what has our continent come to? The Americas, a continent which has been ruined by man's exploitation of man and the usurping not only of indigenous territories but also of the right to exist as peoples, which we began to do long before any State existed.

We are convinced that the democracy of peoples, of cultures and of labour, have suffered a setback at this 76th Session of the Conference, not because anyone wished this to happen, but because the economic interests of governments require the consolidation of their existence at the cost of indigenous territories and peoples.

Lastly, as regards the proposed Convention, will we be able to improve it? We are firm in our commitment to continue working to improve it, without denying those who are attempting to deny us as indigenous peoples.

We would appeal to the International Labour Organisation to broaden the existing channels of communication with our peoples and our organisations, which are just as representative as those of employers and workers, and we ask that measures aimed at a better understanding between the governors and the governed be undertaken to ensure that we are recognised as equal to any of the other peoples with whom we live in this world, for the good of humanity.

Mr. BARSH (representative of the Four Directions Council) – The Four Directions Council is an association of indigenous North American people, working together in the fields of human rights and development. Grand Captain Alexander Denny, traditional leader of the Mikmaq people of maritime Canada, was originally to have spoken to you today, but has experienced some passport difficulties. He conveys to you through me, his warmest greetings and his regrets.

It was a very different world when the ILO was born 70 years ago. Since that time, decolonisation has quadrupled the number of independent States, and the problems of modernisation and social inequalities have globalised. New problems, new vicissitudes, and new forms of economic organisation have appeared, challenging the continued vitality of the ILO's tripartite structure. The role of the employers, for example, is ambiguous now that national economies are dominated in many cases by state bureaucracies or by transnational corporations. Traditional trade union structures are being stretched to include peasant farmers, rural craftsmen, informal workers, and the armies of the unemployed.

The principle of social partnership is still basically sound, but the nature of the relevant social partners has been changing, and it must change. The revision of ILO Convention No. 107 involves far more than labour standards. It involves, and it must involve, redefining and revitalising the concept of social partnership, by bringing indigenous and tribal peoples into co-operation and partnership with governments, workers and employers at both the national and international levels.

Indigenous people are not all workers, employers, or members of governments, but some of them fall into each of these categories. Some are factory workers, migrant farmworkers, fishermen, and trade unionists. Some are independent businesspeople and employers. Many indigenous peoples have their own governments. In the tripartite Committee on the revision of Convention No. 107, there were indigenous people sitting as delegates in all three groups. So you must understand that indigenous peoples are discriminated against as whole societies, not just as workers, or any other category within the current tripartite structure. Indigenous peoples are discriminated against as workers, as employers and as governments, because racism cuts across the lines of the traditional social partnership.

The ILO first examined the situation of indigenous peoples more than 30 years ago. At that time, the concerns of the ILO were chiefly segregation, exclusion, and landlessness, which combined to concentrate indigenous peoples in the least-paid, least-protected ranks of labour. The aims of the original 1957 Convention were to stem the loss of land, and at the same time ensure equality of access to education, training and employment for those who left the land. But this has not been enough. Indigenous peoples need to be able to develop their remaining lands, rebuild and strengthen their own families and communities, and reverse the corrosive effects of powerlessness and despair. They need to enjoy equality as societies and cultures, not merely as individuals.

The spirit of the old Convention was to achieve the equality of individuals through assimilation. The spirit of the revision must be to achieve the equality and development of peoples, through social partnership.

The proposed Convention introduces a number of broad principles of social participation and co-operation: respecting and supporting the full development of indigenous peoples' own values and institutions; affording indigenous peoples a measure of control over their own social and economic development, as well as a role in regional and national development planning; consulting with indigenous peoples in good faith, and with the aim of achieving their agreement to measures which may affect them; and devolution of control over social, educational and health programmes, to the greatest possible extent.

The revision includes, within this general framework, a variety of specific social and economic rights, among which the right to land deserves particular mention. The issue of land rights posed considerable difficulty for the Committee because of the need to adopt general principles which could be applied to widely differing legal and economic systems. It was impossible to draft these provisions of the revised Convention with precision. But we think their meaning in the final text is clear, when read together with the Articles of the proposed Convention on non-discrimination (Article 3), consultation (Article 6), control of the development process (Article 7), flexibility of application (Article 34), and compatibility with other international standards and Conventions (Article 35).

As under Convention No. 107, indigenous peoples have the fundamental right to own the lands they occupy, including the use of all associated natural resources. In addition, they may now have the right to the continued use of resources on land they do not exclusively occupy, as for hunting, fishing or herding, as well as the right to the consideration of claims to lands which they may have lost.

In those legal systems where the State ordinarily retains ownership of subsoil resources such as minerals, the proposed Convention discourages any unnecessary state interference with indigenous people's continued enjoyment of other rights and resources. Exploration must be preceded by good-faith consultations and by impact assessments, which would then constitute fundamental criteria for project approval. If exploitation is approved, indigenous peoples have the right to share in the benefits, participate in the management and be compensated for any damage to their lands.

We think this formula, while somewhat more complex, and perhaps confusing, than that contained in Convention No. 107, is compatible with a wider range of national conditions, and offers indigenous peoples at least as much protection if it is faithfully applied. As Article 13 of the proposed Convention indicates, land is of special importance to indigenous peoples and their cultures, and the provisions of the proposed Convention as a whole must be considered in favour of undiminished land rights.

I had the privilege of participating in the 1986 Meeting of Experts which established the aims and broad outlines of this revision process. The three aims we recommended at that time were: deletion of the original Convention's integrationist or assimilationist orientation, strengthening land rights and promoting the right to self-development. I would not say that the text we now have before us represents the full aspirations of the member peoples of the Four Directions Council, or of any other indigenous peoples. The proposed Convention is nevertheless a very small step forward. It is valid and necessary as a basic minimum charter for increasing indigenous peoples' participation in the decisions that affect their future.

Indeed, we see the proposed Convention chiefly as a challenge for States and indigenous peoples to begin to get together and to build a future co-operatively based on mutual respect and dignity. Therefore, we urge you to adopt it and take up the challenge it poses.

. Ms. SAYERS (Workers' advisers, Canada) – I am here as a Workers' adviser, but more importantly as an indigenous person representing approximately half a million people in Canada. Being a Workers' adviser was a small way in which indigenous peoples could have input in this process. I should like to express my appreciation to the Canadian Labour Congress for allowing me to be a part of their delegation even though I am not a trade unionist.

Indigenous peoples, our rights and priorities, are not a subject that falls within the ILO's competence or expertise. Yet in 1957, the ILO, in some way hoping to "help" indigenous peoples, passed the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). In 1985, a revision process was begun and discussions took place. At no time was input from indigenous peoples ever considered in detail.

Ordinarily, when the ILO is facing a sophisticated and technical question, experts or specialists are called in. Their advice and input are taken seriously in the adoption of appropriate standards because otherwise lives could be endangered. The question of indigenous peoples is an extremely involved and technical question, yet the ILO did not call on the experts, the indigenous peoples. The governments, employers and workers are not experts on indigenous peoples, yet it was they who had the power to make decisions. The Workers' group was the only one which took the time to listen to us. I would like to thank the Workers' group for their untiring and persistent efforts on our behalf.

Previous speakers have outlined the minimal amount of input by indigenous peoples in this process. I shall not go into detail, but because indigenous peoples themselves did not fully advise and because their input was not thoroughly and seriously considered, our lives may be endangered by the setting of standards that do not adequately address the issues that determine our very existence.

This forum is one which is used for bargaining and negotiating to achieve a desired result. But how can you negotiate and bargain over who we are and what our rights are? This is not a normal labour issue concerning which each party gives and takes something of what they want. How can you bargain away something which does not belong to you?

No one is happy with this proposed Convention; certainly not the Workers, and many governments have expressed reservations. Having participated fully in this process and having been involved in the Working Party on lands, I know that the results are the best that can currently be achieved in this forum, where countries retain their polarised positions, insisting that their legislations cannot accommodate the proposed Convention, and where employers take a hard line. Concern has been expressed about the political overtones of the references to peoples, territories, ownership of lands and resources and retaining jurisdiction over our lives. But even if this is the best result that can be obtained here in this forum, it does not mean that we, as indigenous peoples, have to accept it, especially if it does nothing for us.

I warned the Committee during the discussions on land that they needed the support of indigenous peoples and that without it Convention No. 107 would be meaningless. I cannot look on the result as one to which indigenous peoples can give credence. As indigenous peoples all over the world come to know of the contents of this Convention, condemnation of the ILO will begin again and the Organisation will be in the same boat as before the revision process began. I believe that in the next few years the ILO will be scrambling to keep the standards set by other international forums.

I have been told by governments, by workers and by employers that my expectations for this Convention were too high. But is it too much to ask for respect – respect for who we are, respect for our rights, respect for our way of life and institutions. We, as indigenous peoples, have suffered the greatest loss here, for in trying to help us, this Convention is bound to hurt us.

The terms peoples and territories have been qualified, our customary laws failed to be recognised and respected, our inherent right to consent watered down to consultations. No, we, as indigenous peoples, do not have to accept this and we do not. We will continue to survive, along with our laws and institutions, in spite of Convention No. 107.

The objectives of the revision were to keep the Convention in line with developments in international law and to remove the assimilationist orientation. These objectives have not been met. The proposed Convention is now subtly assimilationist as opposed to being blatantly assimilationist, and instead of being a leading instrument in international law, it is an instrument which fails to reflect current developments in that field.

I ask all of you today, what has been the purpose of this two-year revision process? What has been achieved? Perhaps it would have been better to address these issues in other appropriate forums where time is not limited and input from indigenous peoples' positions are respected and taken into account.

Before closing I should like to recall that the person who presented the report talked about painful discussions. All the pain he referred to was the pain of the indigenous peoples that were present. As a worker, I was privy to all of the decisions that were being made and I want you to know that they were the hardest ones of my life. Choosing between the lesser of two evils, do we choose a standard that is not high enough? Or do we let it go and end up with standards that are even lower than those contained in the proposed Convention? These were not easy decisions and I am not sure that we made the right ones. All I can say is that I should like you to think very seriously when you are considering this Convention what your decision will be with regard to it.

Original – Spanish: Mr. ROZAS (Workers' adviser, Peru) – We have just concluded our revision of Convention No. 107 of 1957, trying to include the best intentions of the various sectors with regard to a minimum legal basis for the respect and promotion of the rights of indigenous peoples throughout the world.

In the proposed Convention there are terms, such as "peoples", adopted after long debates, whose scope and meaning will be determined in accordance with the competence of the International Labour Office. Agreement was also reached on rights of ownership to the territories which are necessary for indigenous peoples if they are to develop and exist as peoples and sectors separately from other sectors of the national societies in which they are living. Moreover, one must understand very clearly the positions of various countries and what effective social participation means in some of them.

In the last 30 years, the world has developed and changed, since most of the African countries have achieved their independence in that period. This has had a great impact on the approach to world problems. What has happened with respect to the problems of land, the respect and proper use of resources which are held in trust for future generations? On the other hand, there is a need for some sectors to use certain resources if they are to continue their civilisations. This gives rise to a need for standards with a legal framework for indigenous peoples who often live in regions with great natural resources. All of this has been said and I would not repeat what has been said.

When moving towards the adoption of this proposed Convention, I think that each of us must be aware of the very difficult task that lies ahead: the task of making it possible to ratify this new instrument in each of the member States in which these indigenous peoples live. This will make it possible to move towards the development of basic and inalienable rights which have not been respected thus far. This has brought about a situation of social injustice which opens the door to the development of violence, as in my country, which is currently afflicted by violence and irrational extremism.

We have, then, an arduous task ahead of us. We must use this proposed Convention to protect and promote the rights which will serve as a basis for harmonious development within the national societies where the indigenous peoples live.

The principles of this proposed Convention must also serve to generate more realistic development in the underdeveloped regions where the force of the world economic system is felt most keenly and has turned our countries into the lowest-ranked in the world.

It is now in your hands to adopt an instrument which seeks to meet the needs of our time, since the values which motivated the adoption of Convention No. 107 30 years ago cannot prevail today. It is therefore our responsibility to implement it fully and I would appeal to the International Labour Office to ensure a working dynamic. I also hope that States will ratify this proposed Convention so that, in close co-operation with workers, employers and representatives of the indigenous groups, they can put into effect an international legal instrument like the one proposed, which is intended to be a minimum platform for rights on which we should build, in accordance with the differing realities in the various countries prepared to ratify this proposed Convention.

It only remains for me to express my thanks to my fellow workers, who have taken up our proposals in a fine spirit of solidarity. I should also like to express my thanks to some Employers and Governments who have lived up to their responsibilities, thus showing that the ILO is prepared to take up claims whose importance is such as to qualify for examination at this forum.

My particular thanks go to all members of the International Labour Office, especially the Office for Latin America and the Caribbean, which has given significant support over the past years to consultation within the South American region. Once again thank you and I hope that this august assembly will adopt the proposed Convention.'

Ms. SALWAY (Employers' adviser, United States) – I am honoured to be here today in support of the proposed Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries. I am here as a member of the United States Employers' group and also a member of the Lakota people, commonly known as the Sioux, and extend the greeting "How kola" which is a greeting of friendship.

This year marks the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation. The vision of this Organisation is to help countries put into practice the principles of social justice, freedom, economic security and equal opportunity for all. The mission is to contribute to balanced economic and social progress in each nation and to the well-being and fulfilment of the individual.

The focus on indigenous and tribal peoples in this special anniversary year is appropriate as these peoples constitute the largest disadvantaged group in the world. In their 70 years, the ILO has done much to achieve its mission but, as the need to revise Convention No. 107 indicates, much remains to be done to achieve equality and social justice. The adoption of the proposed Convention is one small, albeit very important, first step to reverse the disintegration and disenfranchisement of indigenous and tribal peoples.

Convention No. 107 was adopted in 1957 in an atmosphere of integration and assimilation policies of many nations and international groups. In the ensuing 32 years, changes have occurred in the thinking about the integration approach at both the national and international levels. However, there are still many governments that believe that integration is the ultimate solution to indigenous and tribal peoples.

In the United States, the "termination" policy became law in the 1950s. Many tribes no longer had their unique status as sovereign nations, and the assimilation of Indian people in general was the policy. In the Indian Self-Determination Act, enacted in 1975, the United States Congress flatly states: "The Indian people will never surrender their desire to control their relationships both among themselves and with non-Indian governments, organisations and persons." The termination laws and assimilation policies were revoked in less than 20 years. While the integration and assimilation laws and policies did not work the way the Government envisioned, an unforeseen positive benefit occurred for Indian people. The children of those Indian people who lived through and bore the brunt of the integration and assimilation policies are grown and well-educated.

These children have grown up either without a cultural identity or a poor sense of pride in their people. Their parents were hesitant to pass on culture, traditions, or a sense of pride in a heritage for which they were punished for practising; these children have demanded recognition of that culture. These children have grown up during the social upheaval of the civil rights movement for human rights and recognised that development at the expense of people and the environment should not be pursued. They have recognised and continue to recognise that the political, economic, cultural, and social rights of their people must be protected, maintained and developed.

I urge you to adopt the proposed Convention, with its freedom of choice spirit, rather than continue with the integration approach. It did not work in the United States, we have not been integrated, we exist as a separate people. In fact, American Indians are the fastest growing minority group in the United States. Do not let even one generation go by without a sense of culture and peoplehood, your nations will be diminished for it.

In adopting the proposed Convention, you will acknowledge the use of the term "peoples" in an international instrument. Many governments fear the unqualified use of the term because it is thought to convey the right of self-determination, contained in other international instruments. By virtue of this right, people may freely decide their political status among other rights. Because the ILO does not have the competence to acknowledge a political right, the use of the term "peoples" in this proposed Convention has been qualified and shall not be construed as regards the rights which may attach to the term under international law.

In their deliberations, the social partners reached a consensus on the term "peoples" and the qualification of its use, therefore I support its inclusion in this proposed Convention. The use of the term "peoples" strengthens the existing Convention even in its qualification because no other term reflects the cultural collective and indigenous society as a whole. What indigenous people are seeking is not the creation of a new State, but the recognition of their right to be different and to maintain their identity, and a degree of autonomy within existing States. As peoples, they are advocating social, economic and cultural pluralism.

The indigenous people, who participated in discussions on the revision of Convention No. 107 as non-governmental organisations, rightfully sought the unqualified use of "peoples"; they are not entirely satisfied with the outcome. Many governments wanted to maintain the use of the word "populations" or a stronger qualification of the word "peoples"; they are not entirely satisfied with the outcome. To both of these groups I say, self-determination is a right that is inherent to peoples. This does not change, regardless of the fact that a government may not recognise it or an international Convention attempts to qualify it. It is a recognised human right and, as such, is living, dynamic and evolutionary and must continue to be exercised by all peoples.

In the United States, Indian nations are and have always been sovereign nations. The settled doctrine of the law of nations is that "a weaker power does not surrender its independence, its right to self-government, by associating with a stronger and taking its protection". Thus, the right to self-determination of a people does not cease when independence or another possible status is achieved. The rights of governments to rule and nations to exist emanates from the people, and not the other way around.

I put forth a question to all of us here, to ask ourselves "What is the true state of the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples in those nations who have voiced the most concern over the use of peoples and self-determination?"

One of the most crucial questions contained within Convention No. 107 deals with indigenous land rights. This Convention provides standards for protecting economic, cultural and social rights for indigenous people. The flourishing of indigenous peoples, the strengthening and development – let alone the very survival – of their societies, economies, cultures and lifestyles depends upon adequate land and resource bases.

The Committee has tried to arrive at a text which would be relevant to a wide variety of countries, and which would not present constitutional and other legal impediments to ratification. This revision expands the 1957 text, which made certain assumptions.

First, it defined and ensured the individual's right to own land; and, second, it recognised that the practice of displacing indigenous peoples or dispersing them from the land and territories they occupied should not go unchecked. This revision recognises collective ownership and that the right of possession equals that of ownership. It also provides procedures for protecting and guaranteeing those rights which have, in the past, been violated and threatened. The proposed Convention also outlines (in Article 15) the rights to natural resources in their lands and territories.

Again, I repeat, indigenous peoples' very survival depends upon adequate land and resource bases.

In concluding my remarks on the revision of Convention No. 107, I would like to draw attention to three important areas.

Firstly, these revised standards are only a minimum level. Governments should strive to seek national legal standards that exceed these minimum levels. Indigenous people must be involved in setting and implementing higher standards than are in this Convention, in a national process.

Secondly, the Articles in this revision call for the government to do many things. Beware of laws, programmes, institutions, organisations and other vehicles in which indigenous people do not have a genuine role as decision-makers, managers and implementers. As Indian people in the United States have learned, we must control our own resources and institutions for self-determination to be truly exercised and recognised.

We have spent many, many years overcoming an entrenched government bureaucracy for Indian people, but not participated in by Indian people.

Finally, the true value and force of the ILO and these instruments lie in the application of the standards. Many countries have been called to task, even during this session, for not meeting the standards of the existing Convention. This is a critical area where indigenous people can and must participate to the fullest extent possible – their very lives depend on it.

As an indigenous person, I personally feel the proposed Convention could have and should have been much stronger; however, I support the proposed Convention and urge you to adopt it.

Mr. FORTUNE (Government adviser, New Zealand) – The proposed Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries deals with issues that are of considerable and direct importance to New Zealand. We are a country with a significant indigenous people, a people whose rights are enshrined in a Treaty which will be 150 years old next year.

Discussion in the Committee on Convention No. 107 has been very useful. It has focused international attention on the values and aspirations of an important sector of the population in many countries: indigenous peoples. We have endeavoured to play an active and constructive part in the proceedings of the Committee, in the hope that the proposed Convention emerging from it is in accord with the principles of partnership being followed by my Government as regards relations between the indigenous and non-indigenous people of New Zealand. Many of the proposals we have made have been designed to take account of the developments that have and are taking place within New Zealand on issues that are directly relevant to the proposed Convention. Others have been designed to make more clear the expectations and obligations envisaged under the proposed Convention.

The tripartite nature of the ILO system and the way the Committee operated were not conducive to producing a simple text which could accommodate all the concerns of all those involved. We now have before us a text which, while it represents a commendable effort of negotiation and compromise, causes us some difficulties. We think it appropriate to place on record some comments on the proposed Convention.

The proposed Convention deals with rights of indigenous and tribal peoples. It is our clear understanding from the record of the Committee meeting and from the language of Article 1, paragraph 3, itself that the use of the term "peoples" is not to be taken as granting or implying rights that go beyond the scope of this Convention.

The spiritual dimension of life is of great importance to indigenous people and lies at the heart of their relationship with the environment. We are particularly pleased that the proposed Convention now contains explicit reference to the spiritual values of indigenous and tribal peoples.

Article 8 gives the peoples covered by this proposed Convention the right to retain their own customs and institutions, where these are not incompatible with fundamental rights defined by the national legal system or with internationally recognised human rights. The Article also provides that procedures shall be established to resolve any conflicts which may arise. While New Zealand does not have any procedures specifically for this purpose, we should note that an existing tribunal, the Waitangi Tribunal, could conceivably consider disputes of this nature.

Articles 9 and 10 deal with the relationship between national legal systems and customary laws of indigenous peoples. As we have already noted, the Criminal Justice Act in New Zealand has been designed to accommodate the needs of more than one culture and permits the court to commit offenders to the care of the Maori community itself. None the less, preference cannot be given in all cases to non-custodial sentencing, for example in the case of repeated violent offending. In the absence of an adequate qualifier, my delegation has some difficulties with these Articles as presently worded.

We recognise that the Articles relating to land were the result of a long and difficult negotiation and formed part of a package. Acceptance of this package has allowed us to complete our work. However, we must note that much of the language of these Articles is, in New Zealand's view, unclear. We have already expressed our particular concern with the vagueness of the concept of benefits in Article 15, paragraph 2. If the intention of this Article is to ensure that indigenous peoples are not excluded or discriminated against in relation to the benefits received by the larger community, we have no need to reserve our position on this point.

We should also like to make clear that our understanding is that Article 16 should in no way be interpreted to encompass the situation of illegal occupation.

As we have stated in the Committee, we consider that Article 17 could have been improved by providing for the recognition rather than mere respect of the procedures established for the transmission of land rights in Article 17, paragraph 1.

The New Zealand Government acknowledges the rights of indigenous peoples to the control and enjoyment of those resources which they wish to retain. At the same time, it may be appropriate for Governments to take measures to re-endow indigenous peoples with certain lands and resources to ensure self-management and self-reliance in the true spirit of partnership.

Negotiation of the package precluded discussion of Articles 20 to 36. However, we would like to note that we had the following concerns about these Articles.

New Zealand would have liked the Articles relating to health and social security to have made clearer that social security schemes should be applied on a non-discriminatory basis and that indigenous people are entitled to enjoy the optimum standard of health consistent with that enjoyed by the rest of the community. The holistic and community nature of indigenous health could also have been emphasised.

With respect to Article 31, our view is that educational measures should be taken not only to eliminate prejudices but to ensure that the values of indigenous peoples are understood.

It is the intention of the New Zealand Government, if the proposed Convention is adopted, to take it back for further study and consultation, in partnership with the Maori people in New Zealand. It is the Maori people who are indirectly affected by its contents. We will then be in a position to make a decision on ratification.

Mr. ARNESEN (Government adviser, Norway) – I have the honour to speak on behalf of the four Nordic Governments represented in the Committee – Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden.

We have not ratified the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), even though we do have indigenous peoples within our States, namely, the Sami people of Norway, Sweden and Finland, and the people of Greenland who have home-rule within Denmark.

The reason for our non-ratification of Convention No. 107 is to be found in its integrationist approach and paternalistic form, which is acceptable neither to our indigenous peoples nor to our Governments. In our countries, we seek to establish a situation of co-operation and mutual respect between governments and indigenous peoples, with self-identification and cultural freedom as keywords.

The land rights of the Sami are being revised by government commissions in Finland, Norway and Sweden. Finland has for a long time had an elected body representing the Sami, while in Norway the first elections to such a body will take place in September this year. A proposal to establish an elected assembly was presented to the Swedish Government just a few days ago. Greenland's home-rule status has its ten-year anniversary this year and includes political autonomy and extensive land rights.

Against this background, our Governments have been happy to support and participate actively in the revision of Convention No. 107, with the aim of creating an instrument based on the principles I have just mentioned. More so, because our indigenous peoples themselves have for a number of years been very active in the support of indigenous peoples around the world and in helping to develop standards for indigenous rights in international law. One might say that in this case governments are now following in the footsteps of indigenous peoples in recognising and addressing the need for such standards.

Even though we have before us a proposed Convention, it is virtually a new instrument we have created, with a quite different scope from that of the old Convention No. 107. The keywords in the new instrument are "co-operation" and "mutual respect". The standards set are minimum standards and governments should consider going beyond these.

The resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples, adopted by consensus in the Committee, points to the importance of co-operation in order to give effect to the new instrument. It calls upon the combined efforts of governments, indigenous peoples and international organisations, including the ILO, to help fulfil the aims of the proposed Convention.

In the course of our work, the need for flexibility in the instrument's provisions and in their national implementation, has been repeatedly pointed out. Given the enormous variations of national circumstances and of the position of indigenous peoples, flexibility stands out as a sheer necessity.

This is especially true in the part dealing with land rights. As an example I would like to quote the explanation given by the ILO of the term "ownership" as this has been understood in the proposed Convention, as it reads in our Committee report, paragraph 163:

The Government member of the United States sought a clarification from the Office on the term "ownership" as used in Convention No. 107. A representative of the Secretary-General said that the problem of dealing with the meaning of "ownership" in Convention No. 107 had often arisen in the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which had recognised on a number of occasions that the exact contents of the concept of ownership varied in different countries and under different legal systems. The Committee of Experts had concluded that it was difficult to say precisely that what was called "ownership" in one country had exactly the same implications in another country. The Committee of Experts had also concluded on a number of occasions that firm, permanent and assured possession did not constitute a violation of the requirement of ownership in Convention No. 107, which was considered to be among the ILO's "promotional" Conventions in many respects. This concept had been considered to be a good interim measure until full conformity with Convention No. 107 had been achieved. While the Committee of Experts had not found an exact equivalence between "possession" and "ownership", it had not found the firm assurance of possession and use to be in violation of the requirement for "ownership".

As we all know, indigenous peoples and their cultures cannot survive without the retention of their lands. This is reflected in many provisions of the instrument. Our governments are especially happy to see the need for environmental protection included in the text. In this connection I would like to quote a few, but highly relevant lines from the report of the Brundtland Commission of 1987:

Tribal and indigenous peoples will need special attention as the forces of economic development disrupt their traditional life-styles – life-styles that can offer modern societies many lessons in the management of resources in complex forest, mountains and dryland ecosystems. Some are threatened with virtual extinction by insensitive development over which they have no control. Their traditional rights should be recognised and they should be given a decisive voice in formulating policies about resource development in their areas.

I cannot end this intervention without giving the most well-deserved praise to the secretariat of our Committee, Mr. Ali and Mr. Swepston, as well as our able Chairman Ambassador España-Smith and our Vice-Chairmen Mr. De Regil Gómez and Mr. Svenningsen. The task before the Committee has been extremely difficult, and it gives great credit to the tripartite system of the ILO and its office that this task has been fulfilled to such a high degree.

Mr. KICKINGBIRD (Government adviser, United States) – Before I refer to my prepared text I would like you to know that I am a member of the Kiowa Tribe of Indians. I have felt fortunate because on the Committee on Convention No. 107 several members of the United States delegation are also Indians: on the Workers' bench, Mr. Jim Murry, my Blackfoot brother, on the Employers' bench, my Lakota sister, Miss Salway whose speech you have already heard. The Lakota are also known as the Sioux. Miss Salway forgot to mention that yesterday was a Sioux national holiday. In 1876 General Custer took 200 cavalrymen into the Valley of the Little Bighorn to interrupt a Sioux family picnic. There were 6,000 Sioux family members gathered and the response was overwhelming. It has become enshrined in United States history as the Battle of the Little Bighorn.

What I would like to urge is that tomorrow you show an overwhelming response in favour of adopting our proposed Convention. To explain why let me return to my prepared text.

The United States is pleased to have been involved in the revision of Convention No. 107. We believe our goal of removing language and policy focused on integration and assimilation has been achieved. The ideas of integration and assimilation of indigenous peoples are not in keeping with the abilities or aspirations of indigenous peoples throughout the world. During the committee work on the revision of Convention No. 107 I described several measures in United States law and policy which: provide recognition and support of American-Indian governments in the United States; acknowledge the authority of tribal rights to surface and sub-surface lands, minerals and other natural resources.

Thus, the language of the proposed Convention is in keeping with the domestic policies of the United States. This was another of my goals that I described at the beginning of our work in the Committee.

The third goal was to focus on issues and adopt language that would attract a wide consensus to permit ratification by many member States and thereby benefit indigenous peoples around the world. One area of warning that the United States supported was a qualified use of the term "peoples". We felt that the use of "peoples" was important so that indigenous people knew that governments were listening to the desires that they had expressed. We felt that a qualified phrase was important to keep a focus on the issues of Convention No. 107 and the work of the ILO as well as the concerns of many governments.

The Committee on Convention No 107 achieved a consensus that the use of the term "peoples" in the proposed text does not imply any rights except those set forth therein, and in particular, the Committee report makes clear that "peoples" does not imply the right to self-determination as that term is used and understood in international law. Because this is the clear understanding of the use of the word "peoples" in the proposed Convention the United States was able to support the wording of the said Convention. Adoption of the proposed Convention remains the final test of the work of our Committee. It is my hope that we have written a document that can live in the laws of the nations who are Members of the ILO. It is my hope that we have written a document that will live through the lives of the indigenous peoples who dwell in our nations.

Original – Spanish: Mr. APUNTE FRANCO (Government adviser, Ecuador) The delegation of Ecuador would like to express its position with respect to the discussion at this session of the Conference concerning the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107).

My delegation put forward a series of amendments to the Office text on the basis of the results of the first discussion on the proposed Convention at the 75th Session of the International Labour Conference. The proposals were based on the guiding principles of my Government's policy in favour of indigenous people, who make up a considerable part of the Ecuadorian population, as well as on the recognition of the fact that Ecuador is a multi-ethnic and multi-cultural State.

Some of these proposed amendments were accepted by the Committee on Convention No. 107 and have been incorporated in the final text submitted to this plenary sitting. Others, however, were rejected during the consultations, so judiciously guided by the Chairman of the Committee, on Part II of the proposed Convention (Land); however, despite this, my Government did not oppose the adoption by consensus of the proposed text.

My country's delegation, however, would have preferred Article 13 of the proposed Convention to read as follows: "In applying the provisions of this Part of the Convention governments shall respect the special importance for the cultures and spiritual values of the peoples concerned of their relationship with the territories which they occupy and, in particular, the collective, global, unitary, inalienable and imprescriptible aspects which the legal possession of such land should have”.

Likewise, my delegation would have wished Article 15, paragraph 2, to include the elements proposed in the amendment put forward by my country, namely: (a) state ownership of sub-surface resources, (b) notwithstanding such state ownership, the Government should promote agreements with organisations representing indigenous peoples before proceeding with prospecting or exploration of such resources when the latter are located in the territories inhabited by such peoples and (c) such agreements must contain clauses concerning compensation for damages or expropriation of indigenous peoples' shares in profits derived from subsurface resources, concerning employment of local labour, concerning the prohibition of foreign colonisation, concerning the presence of foreign technicians and workmen only subject to authorisation, and concerning supervision by indigenous organisations of compliance with the agreement.

My delegation deplores the failure to take account of its proposal on the inclusion of a new Article 10 which would guarantee, through international agreements, the right of indigenous peoples to freedom of movement within their territories when the latter are divided by borders between countries.

My delegation also had to associate itself with the proposal to withdraw all the amendments put forward regarding Articles 20 to 36; however, in these very amendments, Ecuador proposed social policy measures aimed at raising the standard of living of indigenous peoples. Thus, as regards recruitment and conditions of employment, my country would have welcomed the inclusion of the principle of remuneration equal to that fixed for equivalent work in other sectors of the population. Likewise, Ecuador proposed that the crafts, rural and community industries, traditional and subsistence activities be recognised as a right of indigenous peoples, for the realisation of which the State should provide the necessary resources, as well as access to technology.

We also proposed that the promotion of non-agricultural production alternatives be considered as a priority programme of States faced with the problem of migration of indigenous peoples to the cities for lack of land.

My country also proposed that the State should replace its concept of self-sustained and limited economic development with one which is compatible with an ecological balance. With regard to health we feel that there should be agreements between the representative organisations of indigenous peoples and the State. With respect to recognition of the right of intercultural bilingual education at all levels – primary, secondary and higher – there was another Ecuadorian proposal. We also wanted to have the various languages of indigenous peoples put on an official footing, together with the adoption of a national official language.

We also proposed self-management in education programmes and services for indigenous people in administering and managing such educational policies and should involve the representative organisations in developing bilingual intercultural education.

The Government of Ecuador also raised the matter of participation by indigenous organisations in legal reforms to draw up legal instruments enabling indigenous peoples to exercise the right to create their own educational institutions. The implementation of intercultural education should gradually correspond with the human, economic and other resources available, to put such resources on an equal footing with other sectors of the national population. Indigenous children should learn to read and write in their indigenous language and should choose whether they want education in their own language or the national language. Literacy training should be structured to ensure that it contains national and indigenous aspects.

Ecuador proposed that indigenous peoples should be informed of their rights and obligations in their various languages and dialects.

My delegation finally raised the matter that indigenous peoples should participate in preserving their own cultural heritage and that research on indigenous culture should be carried out in consultation with the various indigenous organisations. The results of such research should at least be conveyed to the indigenous peoples in the national language. Archaeology, ethnography and culture would be best served by setting up museums, by agreement with the representative organisations.

These are the main aspects with Ecuador would like to have had included in the proposed Convention. We regret the fact that they did not receive due consideration in the Committee.

My delegation hopes that the work of this Conference committee will lead to a better life for indigenous peoples in conditions equal to those enjoyed by the other sectors of the population.

Mr. MURRY (Workers' adviser, United States) – I would like to join the supporters who have spoken in favour of the proposed Convention.

It was a difficult task to arrive at an agreement within our Committee. There were many, many areas of disagreement, and with that disagreement there was much controversy. Both as a Workers' representative and as an indigenous person, I share the frustration of my brothers and sisters within the indigenous groups who assisted us in our work. Workers' representatives would have liked to have had more say in adopting the term “peoples” in place of “populations”. We would have liked to have had expanded rights under the land section of the document. But the fact of the matter is the proposed Convention is an improvement over Convention No. 107, and that of course means an extension; it means an expansion of human rights for the indigenous peoples of the world.

With the adoption of the proposed Convention, it is imperative that there be an intensification of ILO activities in connection with indigenous and tribal peoples: These peoples deserve no less.

In closing I thank our Committee Chairman, the Employers' Vice-Chairman and our Workers' Vice-Chairman, John Svenningsen, for their hard work. But, my friends, the adoption of this proposed Convention is only the beginning. We have much more work to do to ensure the basic human rights of the indigenous peoples of the world in which we live.

As a worker, as an indigenous person, I have confidence that the ILO can meet this challenge.

Original – Spanish: Mr. NIÑO (Government adviser, Venezuela) – First of all, might I express the thanks of the Government delegation of Venezuela to Ambassador Raúl España-Smith of Bolivia, the Chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), for his dedication, skill and excellent chairmanship during the second reading of the proposed Convention. The unanimous decision of the Committee to entrust him with the not easy task of presiding over its discussions was a just recognition of his work in 1988. My delegation would also like to express its thanks to Mr. de Regil Gómez, the Employers' Vice-Chairman from Denmark for their constant co-operation and for the work achieved.

Venezuela participated in the first and second discussions of the proposed Convention. During this exercise of revision, which has been arduous and difficult, we have always been guided by a spirit of co-operation and understanding. We spared no effort to ensure that the proposed Convention would be definitively universal in character; we worked to create a multilateral legal system based on equity and which would yield results that would be balanced, satisfactory and acceptable for all. From the outset of the Committee's work we maintained that the proposed Convention should be analysed in the light both of generally recognised legal concepts and institutions enshrined in national legal systems, and of the relevant principles of international law.

Despite all of these efforts Venezuela, like other countries of the Latin American region, has serious difficulties with the text submitted to us today for adoption. We are aware that this is a thorny and multi-faceted problem and we recognise that it is an important one, but the proposed Convention – as we said clearly in the Committee – includes concepts which by their nature and scope are in conflict with standards contained in the Venezuelan national Constitution and with some specific provisions of our legislation on the subject. Our Government will examine the proposed Convention carefully and constructively but, given the circumstances I have just outlined, the delegation of Venezuela can but reserve its position with respect to the text submitted for adoption.

Original – Spanish: Mr. RIOS MUÑOZ (Government adviser, Colombia) – When the ILO decided to revise Convention No. 107 this was a major decision: on the one hand it showed that the area of its competence extends to all human groups who work for their livelihood, and, on the other, it recognised that after 32 years, the Convention needed to be brought into line with changes in the rights of peoples, and human rights, understanding of others and awareness of the importance of ecosystems.

This is the spirit in which Colombia participated in the meeting. Twenty-two years ago it ratified Convention No. 107, and as a consequence, followed a policy of co-habitation with its indigenous peoples and recognition of their basic rights. Colombia has respected the right of ownership, recognising the right of indigenous people to over 12 million hectares of land in the Colombian Amazon region. In the same way it has undertaken major efforts to offer these peoples basic services, to protect their fundamental rights and in particular their social and cultural identity, developing machinery so that they can participate in decision-making processes on the policies, plans and actions affecting them. This policy is closely linked to the environmental policy which aims to ensure the protection, recovery and sustained enjoyment of natural resources, particularly in fragile ecosystems of the Amazon area, where my Government considers the indigenous peoples to be the guardians of these resources.

In concluding the revision of Convention No. 107, there is no doubt that significant progress has been made on aspects related to the recognition of the authenticity of indigenous peoples, their customs and cultures as well as their health and education. We have gone beyond the paternalist and integrationist approach which previously characterised the Convention. Here, Convention No. 107 has been enriched. In other areas, however, we have very serious concerns.

In achieving a broad and flexible document we have left to free interpretation terms and concepts which, since they can be dealt with differently within the constitutional framework of each country, should have been clearly defined for the future; expressions such as "land", "territory", "environment", for example, which were not defined, will create confusion when implementing the proposed Convention.

For the first time mention is made in the proposed Convention of sub-surface resources but nothing is said of the rights of the indigenous peoples, the protection of their habitat and crops or their community as regards the consequences of the exploitation of these resources.

Lastly, we regret that the opportunity was not taken, when revising Convention No. 107, to introduce topics of vital importance for the development of indigenous peoples, topics such as the study and structure of customary law, and the protection of ecosystems.

We feel, therefore that the proposed Convention only partially satisfies the expectations that we had when the revision of Convention No. 107 began. If it is adopted, Colombia will make it known to the indigenous communities and their representative organisations, before submitting it to the Congress of the Republic for ratification. In any case, we will continue to implement our policies in respect of indigenous peoples in a progressive spirit and to ensure that their rights are recognised.

The PRESIDENT – There being no other speakers, we shall move on to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107, paragraphs 1 to 179. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report, paragraphs 1-179, is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES IN INDEPENDENT COUNTRIES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 107: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the proposed Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries, appended to the report, beginning with the Preamble.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the operative part of the proposed Convention, which we shall adopt Article by Article.

(Articles 1 to 36 are adopted seriatim.)

The PRESIDENT – May I take it that the proposed Convention is adopted as a whole?

The PRESIDENT – In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the provisions of the Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries, as adopted by the Conference, will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for the preparation of the final text.

RESOLUTION ON ILO ACTION CONCERNING INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON CONVENTION NO. 107: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The Conference has before it a resolution on ILO action concerning indigenous and tribal peoples. If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We have now concluded our consideration and adoption of the report, proposed Convention and resolution on indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries. May I take this opportunity to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. España-Smith, the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. de Regil Gómez, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Svenningsen, the Reporter, Mr. Helms, as well as all the Committee's members and the secretariat for the excellent work they have performed.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda this afternoon is the report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work.

I invite Mr. Adewoye, Government adviser, Nigeria, Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Tarnow, Employers' adviser, United States, Vice-Chairman, Mr. Wright, Workers' adviser, United States, Vice-Chairman, as well as Mr. McLellan, Government adviser, Canada, Reporter, to come to the rostrum.

I call on Mr. McLellan, to submit the report.

Mr. McLELLAN (Government adviser, Canada; Reporter of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work) – Initially, I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. Nkomo, on your unanimous election as President of this important session of the Conference.

This afternoon I am pleased to submit to the International Labour Conference the report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work. The report, which can be found in Provisional Record No. 23, covers the proceedings of the meetings which, on the basis of a first discussion, have led to Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation.

The report also contains the texts of two resolutions, one proposed by the Government delegate of India concerning harmonisation of systems of classification and labelling for the use of hazardous chemicals at work, and another to place on the agenda of the next session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work".

Our Committee held 16 sittings and examined 481 amendments. Many of these amendments required long deliberation, careful analysis and the establishment of working groups, and had far-reaching effects on the final text. I must stress, however, that the discussion in the Committee clearly demonstrated a spirit of shared concern for the workers' safety and health at work. As a result, the Committee was able to arrive at a consensus or an acceptable compromise on a vast majority of the issues, and voting was only necessary on four occasions.

The most significant development during these Committee proceedings concerned the broadening of the scope of the document from coverage of hazardous chemicals only to coverage of all chemicals used at work. This proposal by the Workers' group was raised earlier in our discussions and several governments indicated their support for this approach. As a result, the Workers' and Employers' groups developed a compromise position for coverage of all chemicals, which is reflected in the final text.

Our task in the Committee was facilitated by previous ILO action, including the Conventions and Recommendations listed in the preamble to the Proposed Conclusions, and the report of the Meeting of Experts on Harmful Substances in Work Establishments, which was held in May 1987.

The first section of the proposed conclusions, Scope and Definitions of the Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention, refers to the fact that the Convention should apply to all branches of economic activities in which chemicals are used. The term "chemicals", "hazardous chemicals", "use of chemicals at work" and "branches of economic activity", have been defined for the purposes of the Convention.

The section entitled Preventive and Protective Measures contains general principles for a national policy on chemical safety, such as the classification of chemicals, the responsibility of the supplier for labelling, and the provision of chemical safety data and information sheets. It also provides for the identification of chemicals by the user, and also the responsibility of employers for labelling or marking, for providing information for workers' training and for operational control measures, including the monitoring of exposure to chemicals.

Other sections refer to the duties and rights of workers.

The conclusions proposed with a view to a Recommendation provide guidance on how to transpose the principles of the Convention into national legislation. As a result, these conclusions contain more detailed provisions which could be included in national legislation. Although the large number of amendments placed a heavy burden on our Committee, our deliberations and our activities were greatly facilitated by the able guidance of our Chairman, Doctor Adewoye, and thanks to him the final conclusions were accepted in a spirit of co-operation.

Our equally able Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Tarnow for the Employers' group, and Mr. Wright for the Workers' group, in addition to being professionals, shared a strong sense of concern and responsibility for the health of workers. They shared a tolerance for the ideas of others, and also demonstrated creativity in the development of solutions to key issues. The delegates, who considered the 481 amendments and the development of this report, are commended.

In addition, I would like to acknowledge the work of those who served on the Drafting Committee. All have earned a well-deserved word of thanks.

Last but not least, I would like to express the gratitude of our Committee members for the excellent help and assistance we received at all times from the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Kliesch, and his team of experts, secretaries, translators, clerks, typists and all others, who so ably carried out their tasks and were available at all times to respond to our wishes good humour and efficiency. In my opinion, their hard work helped bring the activities of our Committee to a successful conclusion.

In summary, it gives me great pleasure to submit and recommend the adoption of report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work, the Proposed Conclusions and the two resolutions, to the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The PRESIDENT – The report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work is now open for discussion.

Mr. BARKER (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom) – I am speaking in place of Mr. Michael Tarnow, who was elected as the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work.

On behalf of the Employers' members of that Committee, it is my pleasure today to commend the report of the Committee to the Conference. We believe that we have produced in this report the basis of an important future instrument, designed to protect the safety and health of all those who work with chemicals.

I should like, first, to pay tribute to the Chairman of the Committee, Doctor Adewoye, who has shown great skill, understanding and diligence in guiding us through our deliberations. We have also appreciated the responsible and courteous way in which contributions to our debate have been made and received, and the spirit of co-operation and reconciliation which has been a feature of most of our work for these past two weeks. For that, we are indebted to the Committee as a whole. The way in which the Committee has worked has reflected the genuine interest of all three sides in our subject and a shared belief in its importance.

I must also place on record our gratitude to the ILO for an excellent document as the starting point for this year's discussion.

Based on this discussion, we have reached conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation, which reflect the compromises reached as a result of our debate in the Committee.

Over the next year, and before we return to our subject at the 1990 Session of the Conference, the text of our report will need to be carefully reviewed. We need to determine the modifications that could be introduced to it in order to maximise the potential for ratification. Any such modifications would certainly receive serious consideration by Employers' delegates at next year's Conference. In that regard, we would draw attention to three issues: first, the scope of the instrument, especially as it defines chemicals and as it refers to requirements involving non-hazardous chemicals; second, areas of potential overlap and conflict with other international instruments; third, the substantial level of recognition and redundancy of words in our report as it currently stands.

The report is not perfect, but we endorse it. We will support modifications, in the main, only for the purposes which I have just described. Further, we encourage Government and Workers' members to minimise duplication and to seek to avoid the enormous number of amendments which we have seen this year.

No one should expect that there can be anything gained next year from a return to issues which have been rejected this year.

We look forward, therefore, to the finalisation of these documents at next year's session, and we leave this year with the resolve to think further and constructively on our subject during the intervening period of review.

Mr. WRIGHT (Workers' adviser, United States; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work) – Four-and-a-half years ago, on the night of 4 December 1984, the world suffered the worst industrial accident in its history when a cloud of toxic gas was released from a Union Carbide chemical plant in Bhopal, India. More than 2,000 people died that night. Victims continue to die from respiratory damage at the rate of several a week. But as terrible as the Bhopal disaster was, we must remember that most chemical injuries and diseases occur in ways that are far less dramatic and far more routine. It may be a plantation worker poisoned by pesticides after entering a sprayed field, or a transport worker breathing toxic vapours when unloading his cargo, or a maintenance worker on a chemical plant burned by a gas flare when he opens the line, or a worker in virtually any industry dying of cancer 20 years after first exposure to a chemical no-one thought was hazardous at that time.

These tragedies occur in ones and twos. Some are accidents, many more from diseases caused by the long-term effects of toxic chemicals. Many of these illnesses are not even recognised as occupational since they occur only after a long latency period.

No-one knows how many such cases there are. Only a few countries have made estimates and they are largely guess work. But if we use those estimates and extrapolate to the world as a whole, the number of deaths each year resulting from chemical accidents and the illness at work is at least several hundred thousand and may exceed 1 million. That is a tragedy equal in size to Bhopal every day. I repeat, every day. And yet those deaths are preventable, for even the most hazardous chemical can be used safely.

Many of the Employers' members of our Committee represent companies with excellent safety records who work in co-operation with employees and their representatives to keep their plants safe, and so the goal before us of ensuring safety in the use of chemicals at work is achievable.

The report of the Committee represents one small step towards that goal. This is not the first time the ILO has considered the issue of chemical safety. Conventions and Recommendations now exist on benzene, asbestos, occupational cancer, the working environment and occupational safety and health generally. In 1987, a meeting of experts convened by the ILO agreed that a new instrument was needed on the subject of safety in the use of chemicals at work, including provisions for disseminating information on chemicals to employers and workers, education and training, monitoring and control measures in the choice of safe technology. As a result, the Governing Body placed this question on the agenda of this 76th Session of the Conference for the first stage of the double discussion procedure leading to the adoption of a Convention and a Recommendation.

The Workers' group believes that the document before you is a good one. It is not, of course, perfect. We would urge delegates to review it carefully over the intervening year so as to improve its language in the 77th Session of the Conference. But the principles in the Committee report form a strong basis for ensuring safety in the use of chemicals at work. Several issues deserve special mention. Most of the provisions of the proposed instruments deal with chemicals which have been defined as hazardous by the competent authority or the supplier. But just as any chemical can be used safely, if the proper precautions are taken, any chemical can be dangerous under some conditions. To give but one example, the Bhopal disaster occurred when water, simple water, a chemical not classified as hazardous by government, entered the wrong storage vessel. Then, too, the competent authority or the supplier may have failed to properly classify a chemical to which workers are exposed. Therefore, workers and their representatives must have the right to know the identities and the important properties of all chemicals in the workplace, not just those that the government agency or manufacturer happens to think are hazardous.

The proposed provisions maintain that right, while putting the least possible burden on chemical suppliers.

Trade secrets have been a contentious issue in the past. The report's conclusions will protect genuine confidential business information, but would make such protection subordinate to the protection of workers' health and safety. The conclusions leading to a Recommendation would give workers and their representatives access to this information, so long as they agree to use it only for the purpose of workers' protection and to take reasonable steps to prevent its disclosure to potential competitors. We think that strikes an appropriate balance.

One issue which sometimes divided the Committee concerns the export of hazardous chemicals, especially those which have been banned or restricted in the exporting country. The Workers' group believes that importers and importing countries deserve comprehensive information about such restrictions. That right is especially important in developing countries. We urge governments and employers in the developed countries to recognise this need and work co-operatively to include appropriate provisions in next year's instrument.

Over the intervening years, many governments will carefully study our conclusions, with a view toward possible ratification of the resulting Convention. We hope that review includes more than a narrow comparison with existing national law and practices; rather the guiding principle should be whether the provisions of a possible Convention are appropriate for the world as a whole. Indeed, Conventions would be useless if they did not sometimes lead to changes in national law and practice.

The report before you required the best efforts of all participants in the Committee. On the Workers' side, I would like to recognise the contributions of our Secretary, our Deputy Vice-Chairman, Mr. Passey and Mr. Sorokin, our assistant from the Workers'

Relations Branch, Mr. Maninat, and Mr. Trudel, who served on the Drafting Committee. I would like especially to commend the Employers' group and its Vice-Chairman, Mr. Tarnow. While we sometimes disagreed with the Employers, we never had cause to doubt their integrity or their commitment to workers' safety and health. Government members of the Committee also demonstrated great technical expertise, practical knowledge and an ability to look beyond narrow national or regional interests. The Office, represented by Mr. Kliesch and his staff, provided an excellent text and invaluable support, often working till 2 and 3 in the morning to prepare for the next day's meetings. Our reporter, Mr. McLellan, had the difficult task of summarising a lengthy and free-wheeling discussion. Most of all, our Chairman, Mr. Adewoye, deserves praise for his effective leadership and gentle humour without which we could not have succeeded.

I believe our deliberations represented tripartism at its best, a spirit not just of compromise but of working together to find the best possible solutions to complex problems.

On behalf of the Workers' group, indeed on behalf of workers throughout the world who so desperately need protection from the harmful effects of the chemicals they use, I respectfully urge the adoption of this report.

Mr. ADEWOYE (Government adviser, Nigeria; Chairman of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work) – Mr. President, this being my first opportunity to address the plenary sitting of this Conference, please permit me to join others in congratulating you on your well-deserved election as the President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. Also, as the Chairman of the Committee and on behalf of all its members, I should like to express our appreciation to the Governing Body and to the International Labour Organisation for the timely decision to place the item of safety in the use of chemicals at work on the agenda of this year's session of the Conference. It is thus apparent that the ILO has been fully conscious of the growing awareness in the world regarding the hazards associated with the use of chemicals.

Several Conventions and Recommendations already adopted by the International Labour Conference have direct or indirect relevance to the control of chemicals at work. Also, within the framework of the international programme for the improvement of working conditions and environment, the ILO assists governments and enterprises by means of Conventions and Recommendations, codes of practice, manuals, guides, technical advice and publications, research, information and technical co-operation projects. We are also informed that it was in response to the report of the Meeting of Experts on Harmful Substances in Work Establishments, which was held in May 1987, that the Governing Body decided to place the question of chemical safety on the agenda of this session of the International Labour Conference.

The committee set up by the Conference at its fourth sitting, which I had the honour and the pleasure of chairing, has in the first two weeks thoroughly applied itself to the problems associated with the use of chemicals at work.

The Committee has expressed these problems clearly in its report and it has proposed corresponding conclusions with a view to a Convention and a Recommendation on the issue.

The Committee worked very diligently throughout these sittings in a determined effort to support the standard-setting activities of the International Labour Organisation. Despite some disagreements on technical opinions, there was wide general agreement regarding the noble objective of protecting the life and health of workers through the improvement of working conditions, among others.

It is my belief that the amendments submitted to the Committee during its sittings were intended to cover as completely as possible the problems in the sector because of the general concern of members to protect the health of workers in the use of chemicals at work. It is also a reflection of the fact that fibre chemicals continue to contribute positively to the social and economic development of the world, where most workers handle chemicals in one form or the other.

Expressing concern about the various systems of classification and labelling for the use of chemicals at work and for the transport of dangerous goods, the Committee after thoughtful discussions adopted a resolution proposed by the Government member of India concerning the harmonisation of such systems. This resolution invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General to assess the size of the task of harmonising national and regional criteria and classification systems established for the use of chemicals at work; to prepare a report on the result of this assessment and present this report as soon as possible; to establish co-operation with other international bodies to ensure a system of harmonised national and regional criteria and classifications which protect workers using chemicals. The resolution is strongly recommended for serious consideration by the Conference.

Before I leave, I would like to inform the Conference that an excellent spirit of tripartism prevailed in the Committee throughout its sittings. First, I should thank the Government members – both as individuals and as groups – for performing their tasks creditably. Many thanks also go to the imaginative Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Tarnow, and to the resourceful Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group, Mr. Wright. These two gentlemen demonstrated considerable knowledge of the subject of our discussion and gave tremendous devotion to their respective tasks. With the efficient co-ordination of the well-blended efforts of members of their respective groups, the Committee was able to resolve most issues before it without resorting to voting – a clear demonstration of an excellent spirit of co-operation. Mr. McLellan, the Committee's distinguished Reporter, also deserves my thanks for demonstrating his vast expert knowledge in the Committee's main business and the preparation of its reports. Of course, my tribute should not end without expressing my special thanks and unreserved appreciation to the immense efforts of Mr. Kliesch and the devoted members of his team of the Committee's secretariat. Despite an unprecedented number of amendments received by its secretariat, the well-coordinated operational machinery already put in place at the secretariat for the whole exercise proved more than equal to the task.

As a result, the Committee enjoyed a flawless service throughout its sittings.

In conclusion, I would like to call on the Conference to accord to the report – the proposed conclusions and resolutions – its fullest support in the interest of all workers of the world.

Mr. NARAYAN (Government adviser, India) – Mr. President, since I am taking the floor for the first time I would like to congratulate you on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. My delegation would like to congratulate the International Labour Office for producing an excellent working document for the preparation of international instruments for safety in the use of chemicals at work. My delegation also appreciates the strenuous tripartite efforts made to extend the scope of the proposed instruments and improve their contents.

The Committee as a whole has shown a great sense of commitment to the cause of safety at the workplace. It has been able to resolve many complex issues despite varying perceptions. The Government of India attaches considerable importance to the subject of chemical safety and supports the adoption of a Convention and a set of Recommendations on the subject as early as possible.

The subject is extremely complex and there is, in reality, no adequate and comprehensive legislative treatment. The Committee was therefore faced with an immensely difficult task. The basic problem is the very definition of the word "chemical". All substances, by their intrinsic nature, are chemicals. While many substances do not pose hazards in ordinary conditions, even water, which sustains most forms of life, many, in combination with other substances, cause a major hazard to life as we have witnessed in Bhopal.

The Committee has manfully tried to tackle the problem of hazards posed by substances which are innocuous in normal conditions by taking a broad meaning of the word "chemical". However, the definition proposed by the Committee requires considerable improvement so that, while we cover hazards from all chemicals, we also do not lose sight of the main object which is to deal effectively with chemicals which cause the greatest hazard. It is important to have an order of priority in dealing with the question of the safety of chemicals as they touch virtually every aspect of modern life.

We strongly believe that the International Labour Conference must adopt an instrument which can be implemented by a majority of its Members. We do not imply that the Convention should merely embody the existing national laws and practices. In that event the value of an international instrument would be greatly diminished. The instrument therefore should provide a goal which is capable of realisation.

We would be extremely pleased if due account was taken of the special problems facing the developing countries and a provision made for the extension of application of the proposed Convention to different branches of economic activities and different categories of persons in a phased manner. India has a vast unorganised sector of economic activity. Small farmers dominate its agricultural sector. It would be unrealistic to expect them to be able to discharge their responsibilities as employers in the manner you would expect of the managers of a factory.

There are examples of ILO instruments which provide for ratification by stages. We feel that this kind of flexibility should be built into as many Conventions as possible.

The main emphasis of the Conclusions proposed with a view to a Convention and the pre-requisite for its implementation relates to laying down the criteria for hazardous chemicals and establishing a system of classification and labelling of chemicals. This will require not only expertise but also allocation of resources for the setting up and maintenance of an organisation, and it will imply a heavy burden, especially for developing countries. Besides, a number of classification and labelling systems already exist; however, they are not appropriate to the workplace and they cause confusion in the mind of the user, because of their differences.

The Government delegation of India has therefore suggested that the ILO should take the lead in harmonising the system for the national and regional criteria for hazardous chemicals and their classification and labelling. The resolution moved by my delegation was amended to the effect that the International Labour Office should assess the problem and come up with a report. We expect the ILO to take up the task immediately and to submit a report as soon as possible, so that the Governing Body can study the matter and take appropriate action.

The proposed instrument does not address the control of major accident hazards, except in a peripheral manner. However, we appreciate the efforts made by the ILO in preparing a code of practice on the subject. We believe that the highest consideration must be given to safety in large chemical factories, as they pose a great hazard to the lives of workers and members of the public in the vicinity, as well as to the environment. It will be of immense value if the ILO proceeds expeditiously with the task and proposes a separate Convention on the subject.

With these observations, my delegation fully supports the recommendations made by the Committee.

The PRESIDENT – There being no other speakers, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work, paragraphs 1 to 236. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK:
ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption, point by point, of the Proposed Conclusions. We shall begin with Points 1-3. May I take it that these Points are adopted?

(Points 1-3 are adopted seriatim.)

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO THE ADOPTION OF A CONVENTION, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the adoption of the Conclusions proposed with a view to the adoption of a Convention, Points 4-26. May I take it that these Points are adopted?

(Points 4-26 are adopted seriatim.)

CONCLUSIONS PROPOSED WITH A VIEW TO THE ADOPTION OF A RECOMMENDATION SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK:
ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the adoption of the Conclusions proposed with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation, Points 27-49. May I take it that these Points are adopted?

(Points 27-49 are adopted seriatim.)

The PRESIDENT – I now put for adoption as a whole the Proposed Conclusions submitted by the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work. May I take it that the Proposed Conclusions as a whole are adopted?

(The Proposed Conclusions as a whole are adopted.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM ENTITLED "SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK", SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – You now have before you a resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work". May I take it that the resolution is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

RESOLUTION CONCERNING HARMONISATION OF SYSTEMS OF CLASSIFICATION AND LABELLING FOR THE USE OF HAZARDOUS CHEMICALS AT WORK, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON SAFETY IN THE USE OF CHEMICALS AT WORK:
ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – You now have before you a resolution concerning harmonisation of systems of classification and labelling for the use of hazardous chemicals at work. May I take it that the resolution is adopted?

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – That concludes our consideration and adoption of the report, conclusions and resolutions of the Committee on Safety in the Use of Chemicals at Work. May I take this opportunity to thank the Chairman, Vice-Chairmen and Reporter of the Committee, as well as all its members and the secretariat for the excellent work they have done.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE APPLICATION OF STANDARDS: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The next item on our agenda is the Report of the Committee on the Application of Standards. I would like to ask the officers of the Committee to come to the rostrum: Mr. Elmiger, Government delegate, Switzerland, Chairman; Mr. Wisskirchen, Employers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany, Vice-Chairman; Mr. Houthuys, Workers' adviser, Belgium, Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Kchaou, Government adviser, Tunisia, Reporter.

I call on Mr. Kchaou, the Reporter, to present the report.

Original – Arabic: Mr. KCHAOU (Government adviser, Tunisia; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Speaking for the first time in plenary at this session of the Conference, I must say it is a pleasure for me to associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating you on your election as President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

It is an honour for me to be able to submit to the Conference the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, contained in Provisional Record No. 26. The Committee was set up under article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference to discuss the third item on the agenda, "Information and reports on the application of Conventions and Recommendations".

In accordance with its customary practice, the Committee divided its work into three parts. Firstly, the Committee discussed the application of standards and the discharge of the obligations resulting therefrom; it then went on to discuss the general survey by the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations which this year concerned social security protection in old age. Thirdly, the Committee considered a number of individual cases.

The report of the Committee of Experts was the main basis for discussion both in the general discussion and in the consideration of individual cases.

The members of the Committee also engaged in an exchange of views concerning the report of the Fifth Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers.

The Committee started with the first part, that is the obligations binding member States. In this way, it assessed the evaluation made by the Committee of Experts and studied the positive and negative aspects of the current situation.

Among the positive aspects, the Committee expressed its satisfaction with the increase in the number of ratifications. In 1988 90 new ratifications by 27 member States were registered. Thus, the total number of ratifications by 31 December 1988 was 5,401. This followed a decline in the number of new ratifications in previous years. However, this satisfaction did not prevent certain members of the Committee from emphasising that a large number of Conventions had still not been ratified by member States. These members also said that the number of Conventions concerning basic human rights that had been ratified recently was very low as was that of ratifications of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The reasons for this low number of ratifications were discussed, and this is dealt with in paragraph 9 of the report. The Committee also took note of the ratifications that had come in since 31 December 1988, of which paragraph 10 gives a detailed account.

As regards the negative aspects, they concern the denunciation by four States in 1988 of the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45) The Protection against Accidents (Dockers) Convention, 1929 (No. 28) was also denounced by one member State. Thus, the number of denunciations not accompanied by the ratification of a revised Convention is 53. The Workers' members in the Committee expressed their concern at the number of denunciations. Some members proposed that the Organisation should investigate the reasons for this, so as to be in a position to react more rapidly.

As regards general issues relating to international labour standards, the discussion this year, was richer than it has been in the past not only because of the unprecedented number of speakers – 53 – but also because of the content of what was said. The characteristic feature of this session as compared with earlier ones was that we spoke with one voice regarding major problems, after many years of difficult discussion aimed at reconciling contradictory interests and positions. Thus, this is the first time, as the Workers pointed out, that there was such unanimity regarding the principle of the universality of standards, the role and work of the Committee of Experts, and the nature of the relationship between the different supervisory bodies.

The discussion highlighted the Committee's unanimity regarding the permanence of the fundamental objectives of the ILO and the unique value and dynamism of its standard-setting activities, as well as the dedication of the member States and occupational groups to these objectives and values. Several speakers recalled the importance of the established standards of the ILO and noted the essential role played by the Organisation in promoting a balanced economic and social development. They also emphasised the impact of international standards in the search for solutions to the problems linked to the protection of human rights and those of the most underprivileged social groups, to the guarantee of full employment, and to health and safety at work. Thus, it was felt, international labour standards made an important contribution to the promotion of social justice, which is an essential pre-requisite for long-lasting peace.

As regards future standard-setting activities, some members considered that the Organisation should first try to review and modernise existing standards, while others considered that the Organisation should elaborate new standards, stressing the importance of broad active participation by all member States in this process. Some speakers expressed the hope that flexibility would be introduced in the different standards in order to reconcile the universality of these standards with the different national situations as regards political systems and levels of development. The required flexibility, however, should apply only to the formulation, and not to the implementation, of standard.

As regards the supervisory bodies, interventions this year showed a notable improvement. The representatives of the three groups, in the main, recognised the quality of the work of the Committee of Experts carried out faithfully with respect to its tradition of independence, objectivity and impartiality.

The question of the interpretation of Conventions and the role of the supervisory bodies in this respect attracted comments from different delegations, whose positions are reflected in paragraphs 21 to 24 of the report.

The application of the Employment Policy Conventions, 1964 (No. 122) elicited a considerable amount of discussion. This discussion lays a new foundation for the dialogue that has been established between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee and the complementarity between the different supervisory bodies. It is particularly significant this year because it is a continuation of a much broader-based discussion which took place in plenary when delegates commented on the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment.

Paragraphs 30 to 39 reflect the unanimity of the members of the Committee regarding the importance of employment and of the objectives laid down in Convention No. 122. There was also unanimity regarding the analysis given in the general comments made by the Committee of Experts. Some speakers requested that the Committee of Experts be encouraged to continue its activity in this field and to undertake similar action with respect to other Conventions. Most speakers attached special importance to the difficulties encountered by developing countries, particularly in Africa and Latin America, in drawing up and implementing valid employment policies in an international environment characterised by foreign indebtedness. Several speakers expressed their approval of the Committee of Experts' analysis of the high levels of foreign debt and the deterioration of the terms of trade. Numerous speakers also emphasised the negative impact of structural adjustment programmes on employment and incomes.

Some members of the Committee pointed out that these consequences gave rise to difficulties, not only in the application of Convention No. 122, but also in that of other essential Conventions, for they felt that the effect of these programmes was to restrict the exercise of trade union rights and human rights in general.

Some African speakers were of the view that the debt problem was critical from the economic and social point of view and might have very dangerous political repercussions. Many members of the Committee also emphasised the responsibility of international financial institutions, which had underestimated the social cost of structural adjustment policies and programmes. These speakers called upon the International Labour Organisation to play a more active part in this field than in the past. They also called for a follow-up to the conclusions of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987.

The discussion also gave rise to comments on certain aspects of employment policy referred to in the report of the Committee of Experts, such as training schemes, incentives for the creation of self-employment for the unemployed, employment of young persons and the reduction of hours of work. The concern expressed by the Committee of Experts as regards certain forms of flexible employment contracts was the subject of an exchange of views and opinions between the members of the Committee.

Generally speaking, it was considered that the consultative and negotiating bodies were the best means of developing employment promotion policies.

Among other issues that were considered within the general discussion, we can include the role of employers' and workers' organisations. The Employers' representatives emphasised the large number of comments that the Committee of Experts had received from employers' and workers' organisations, which reflected the interest these organisations had in implementing ILO standards. Numerous members of the Committee shared the Committee of Experts' hope that a large number of States would be able to ratify Convention No. 144, in view of the positive results achieved by tripartite consultations.

There was also a very useful discussion on the need to send in reports on the application of Convention in good time.

In this respect, the Employers' and Workers' representatives and a large number of Government representatives expressed misgivings regarding the deterioration of the situation. They put forward proposals aimed at preventing the trend from continuing. These proposals included assistance that the ILO could afford to member States to help them to draw up their reports and to train qualified personnel, extension of the time limit for reports, and co-operation between the social partners.

There were other questions considered in the general discussion and contained in the report. These include the Seventh African Regional Conference of the ILO held in Harare from 27 November to 7 December 1988 (paragraphs 48 to 50) and the subject of relations with the European Communities (paragraphs 54 and 55).

The second part of our Committee's work was devoted to the Committee of Experts' general survey based on the reports requested under article 19 of the Constitution and regarding the application of the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention (No. 128) and Recommendation (No. 131), 1967, in so far as they applied to old-age benefits.

Deliberation on this survey was very full; 25 paragraphs of the report are devoted to it, that is Part C, paragraphs 56 to 80.

The Committee unanimously appreciated the quality of the Committee of Experts' survey which supplied valuable information on the general situation of old-age protection through social security and on the problems facing States in this area. The Committee emphasised the role of general surveys since they allow a global view of the subjects covered by the specific instruments involved, independent of their ratification.

The Committee stressed the role of social security in general and the need to provide protection for the elderly, whose pensions are often their only means of support. It was recalled that social security has always been at the forefront of the ILO's concerns and that Conventions No. 102 and 128 and Recommendation No. 131 have been classified by the Governing Body as instruments requiring priority promotion.

The Committee expressed concern at the relatively low number of ratifications registered for Conventions No. 102 and 128, that is 32 and 14, respectively.

The Workers' representatives expressed hope that the general survey would give new impetus to ratification of the two Conventions, particularly because they contain certain flexibility clauses. The Employers' representatives for their part emphasised the need to launch an information campaign in order to overcome the obstacles to ratification and they furthermore emphasised the importance of co-operation in that respect between the ILO and the member States.

The members of the Committee also discussed various aspects of old-age benefits, such as the maintenance of their purchasing power, the expansion of their scope and the conditions under which they are granted. With respect to equality of treatment, some speakers emphasised the special social security situation of migrant workers and the need for considering men and women on an equal footing. The Committee suggested to the representative of the Secretary-General that, at its forthcoming November Session, the Governing Body might study the desirability of elaborating a new instrument regarding equality of treatment for men and women in social security matters.

By a resolution of the Conference, the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations was invited to express its views on the report on the Fifth Session of the Joint ILO-UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the recommendation concerning the Status of teachers, which took place in October 1988. The Committee listened to the representative of the Director-General of the United Nations Economic, Social and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO), who emphasised the close relationship that existed between improvements in the professionalism required of teachers, which concerned primarily UNESCO, and the working conditions of teachers, which fell within the fields of competence of the ILO. She also provided information regarding the opinions and recommendations contained in the report of the Joint Committee and expressed her organisation's desire to continue co-operating with the ILO in order to encourage States to improve teachers' working conditions and to grant them a social status corresponding to the importance of their tasks and of their role in society.

During the discussion, members of the Committee raised a number of questions, including the ways and means of implementing the recommendations contained in the report, the deterioration of education and the relationship between that deterioration and the professionalism of teachers, the extent to which existing labour Conventions apply to teachers and the possibility of elaborating international labour standards for this profession.

The Committee took note of the fact that the majority of international labour Conventions were applicable to the teaching profession, particularly the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) and the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151). It also observed that the ILO's supervisory bodies had already taken decisions establishing that the teaching profession was not to be considered an essential service and therefore enjoyed the right to strike, to collective bargaining and other trade union rights.

Discussion was continuing at present with UNESCO regarding the proposal to establish a Convention on teachers' working and employment conditions.

Most of the Committee's work was devoted to studying a series of individual cases which had been discussed by the Committee of Experts and which were contained in the latter's report. These cases concern the implementation of ratified Conventions, the obligation to transmit reports in that respect and the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The Committee devoted 14 of its 23 meetings, including two night sittings, to individual cases. The Committee followed the same working procedures as it had followed in earlier years when studying individual cases. You will find a summary of the Committee's discussion on individual cases in the second part of the report.

In the last section of the first part of the report, the Committee draws the Conference's attention to a certain number of conclusions that it reached after studying the individual cases. In paragraphs 103, 104 and 106 the Committee expressed its satisfaction with the measures taken by a number of governments to guarantee the application of ratified Conventions. The Committee was able to examine certain cases where progress had been made in addition to the 46 cases studied by the Committee of Experts concerning 29 member States. These conclusions were proof of the success of the various supervisory bodies and of the willingness of member States to participate in the supervisory machinery. Furthermore, the Committee drew the Conference's attention to a number of special cases that present particular difficulties, one of them being the application of ratified Conventions. These special cases are outlined in paragraphs 108 to 113.

The Committee also draws the Conference's attention to cases where it has observed considerable shortcomings in the constitutional obligations concerning either the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities (paragraph 94) or the supply of reports (paragraphs 98, 99, 101 and 118).

The Committee expressed its satisfaction about the large number of governments who had co-operated with it by submitting information regarding the situation in their countries, either in writing or orally when each individual case was studied. This year there were 50 such States.

The Committee also regretted that three governments had not participated in the discussions about their countries in spite of the repeated invitations addressed to them. The Committee also expressed regret that six other countries had been unable to participate in the discussion in the Committee, of cases which concerned them, either because they were not represented at the Conference or because their representatives had left before the work had been completed.

That was a summary of the important points that the Committee on the Application of Standards discussed and which are included in the report. It is my pleasure to be able to inform the Conference that the work of the Committee this year was characterised by a very positive atmosphere. All its members participated with constructive dialogue and in a spirit of collaboration and understanding.

This atmosphere certainly augurs well for our Organisation, which is celebrating the 70th anniversary of its foundation this year. The Organisation's standard-setting activities are, without a doubt, among the most important activities in our Organisation in its efforts to achieve the noble objectives which it was created to accomplish and which are those of all our peoples.

It is my pleasure to express my thanks and my congratulations to all those who have contributed in any way to the success of the Committee's work, for which I was the Reporter and for which it was my honour to draw up the report. In particular, I would like to mention the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Elmiger (Government delegate of Switzerland) who guided the work of our Committee very competently and very wisely. I would also like to thank the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Wisskirchen, the Employers' Vice-Chairman and Mr. Houthuys, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, who demonstrated enormous experience and a great spirit of co-operation.

I would also like to mention Mr. Sidibé, the Director of the Department of Standards and representative of the Director-General in the Committee, and all his assistants for their devotion and their efficiency. Before I conclude my statement, I would like to inform you of an error in the report. Please insert the following correction on the last page of the report (p. 111), in the index by countries to observations and information contained in the report; concerning Papua New Guinea, Part One, General Report, add '102' after paragraphs 94, 101.

Finally, I invite the Conference to adopt the report presented to it after making the above correction.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Original – German: Mr. WISSKIRCHEN (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – Our Committee presents to the Conference its unanimously adopted report. This report contains all the essential elements of our very thorough consultations in the Committee. We are particularly gratified to note that in contrast to previous years there is no longer any fundamental dissent as to the significance, the importance and the content of an effective supervisory system of the ILO.

The reports of the member States and the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which is based on a verification of these reports, belong to this supervisory system consisting of several stages. The report of the Committee of Experts is the indispensable basis of our work. Every step of this supervisory system is built upon the outcome of the previous steps. Our Committee reports to the Conference upon the results of its consultation in the report before you. It goes without saying that we hold the objectivity, independence and impartiality of the work of the Committee of Experts in the highest esteem. However, it is equally clear that we do not blindly accept all of the evaluations and interpretations of the Committee of Experts. We Employers have made this quite clear, as far as was necessary.

I should only like to say briefly here that we Employers have never recognised the virtually unlimited freedom to strike. We feel that the restriction referred to by the Committee of Experts – the endangering of the life of the population – is unrealistically broad. Such an extreme limit is not accepted in any member State.

Something else that is unclear is the line drawn by the Committee of Experts as regards political strikes. What is declared to be an admissible protest against the policy of a government in a democracy is in fact a strike against the parliament elected by the entire people because in a democracy policies are ultimately determined solely by the freely elected parliament.

The Employers hope that a dialogue with the Committee of Experts will lead to a review of such interpretations. The Committee on Freedom of Association should also be included. In this year's report, for the first time, the Committee of Experts has explicitly mentioned the importance of the relationship between the two supervisory bodies – the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts – and we feel that this implies the possibility of change through dialogue.

We have no doubt that peace in the 70th year of the ILO's existence depends on social justice to a very large extent. We have all witnessed many attempts to organise freedom anew and better. Should they succeed, in spite of many setbacks, this should also have a positive impact on social relations.

While continuity is an important plus for the ILO, a timely recognition of, and reaction to, structural change and a transformation of people's outlook are also important. Signs of such change are to be seen in the increase in denunciations of some Conventions or in new forms of employment. In this field of employment policy, the Committee of Experts expresses concern at the increase in part-time work and temporary contacts in the market-economy States. They take virtually no account here of the fact that in these States more and more individuals, for an increasing number of reasons, seek such forms of employment and engage in them of their own accord. These changes are the result of structural change in the production and service sectors as well as in social relations – that is, primarily, of the substantial increase in family incomes and the changed views concerning the possibility of combining a job, family obligations and other personal interests.

In this context, we feel that the Committee of Experts is being rather one-sided in asserting that these forms of employment do not correspond to the Convention's requirement of full employment. What is most illogical, however, is that the Committee of Experts views the same forms of employment in the centrally planned economies with interest, but without criticism. We refrain from making any forecast as to the chances of success of the centrally planned economies may have if they adopt only some features of the successful market economies.

The Committee of Experts has submitted a remarkable general survey on the legislation and practice with regard to the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128), and Recommendation (No. 131). Unfortunately, the reports sent by member States under Article 19 of the ILO Constitution do not contain sufficient factual and, especially, statistical information. Despite the stress placed by the Committee of Experts on the flexibility of these instruments, they have been ratified by only a small number of States. This contrasts with the fact that almost every State today provides old-age benefits its citizens, and an increasing number of States do have some sort of system – albeit sometimes only for certain sectors of the population and often only for public servants.

The general survey and our Committee have dealt thoroughly with some major problems of old-age protection. Chief among these is the question of financing, intimately linked to other major problem such as the effect of the ageing population in industrialised States, coupled with earlier retirement and longer periods of training and generally shorter working life. With increasing life expectancy, this results in a significant increase in the length of time for which a pension is paid. Overall, the proportion of the population drawing pensions is increasing with respect to the active population, placing the old-age benefit systems under a great deal of pressure. The same applies to countries with a high rate of inflation. One cannot attack the causes of inflation simply by indexing of pensions. We feel it is superficial to assert, as does the Committee of Experts, that many of the problems currently besetting old-age protection are due to external economic factors. Old-age pensions are only a part of the overall economic and financial situation of a State. There are fluctuations in the situation and, in any case, today's active population must pay the pensions for yesterday's. To that extent, it comes down to the question of an equitable distribution of burdens among the generations. Therefore, the question of the retirement age is not only a factor of employment policy; a more flexible approach to retirement would, above all, broaden the opportunities for individual choice; such a choice is, of course, also linked to the financial consequences of the fluctuations referred to. Our Committee can agree with the Committee of Experts when they say that it is a matter of social justice to provide older people with a fair share of what they themselves contributed during their working life.

It must be pointed out that we spent one entire sitting on the report of the Joint ILO/UNESCO Committee of Experts on the Application of the Recommendation concerning the status of Teachers. We employers attach a great deal of importance to these issues in a world of rapid change in which lifelong education must become the rule. We doubt, however, that it would be appropriate for this comprehensive report to be submitted to our Committee, because the impression remains that the various teachers' associations should have only one forum in which to put forward their claims.

The essential tasks of our Committee are, as always, to verify whether and to what extent member States have complied with their obligations under the Constitution and the Conventions they have ratified. These important discussions are clearly indicated in great clarity in the Appendix to our report, and I can only recommend most warmly to anyone who is interested to study these individual cases.

The conclusion on six cases contained in paragraphs 108 to 113 of the General Report reflect only a small part of this. Nicaragua is not included among these countries. We employers have a somewhat different view of this based on facts, negative experience and unfulfilled promises. We have just heard very bad news of a recent example reported in the international press. On the 21st of this month, three leaders of the Agricultural Employers' Association, an affiliate of the COSEP employers' association, were expropriated by the Nicaraguan Government. This happened immediately after COSEP and its agricultural members had criticised the Government's agrarian policy. Now that event, I think, blatantly contradicts the promises made by the President on 30 January this year in the National Assembly. It is admittedly often difficult to achieve an absolutely just evaluation in each individual case. However, the Employers do not regard and have never regarded as a criterion for decision whether a member State is a developing or an industrialised country or what political system it applies. The only determining factor is the degree of discrepancy between the Convention on the one hand and legislation and practice on the other, the duration of this discrepancy and especially its importance for the individuals affected. Naturally, particular importance is given to whether a large number of people or the whole population of the country are denied basic human rights. It seems quite pointless to endeavour to be evenhanded in dealing out praise and censure among member States or among the various categories of member States.

What we have achieved this year has called for a great effort of concentration and discipline on the part of the entire Committee. I should like none the less to make special mention of our Chairman, Mr. Elmiger, who guided our Committee gently yet successfully. Our thanks go also to our very assiduous Reporter, Mr. Kchaou, and especially to the very professional work done by the many staff members of the Office under the leadership of Mr. Sidibé. Excellent co-operation also took place between the Workers' and the Employers' groups in this Committee. We shall and we must criticise one another and put up with differences of opinion, but we should like to thank Mr. Houthuys for his co-operation.

I should like to thank personally the other members of the Employer's group who have fully supported me.

We recommend the report of our Committee to the Conference and to the Committee of Experts for their thorough examination.

Original French: Mr. HOUTHUYS (Workers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Standards) – I recommend that you begin reading the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards from the end, as some people read the last page of a novel to see whether there is a happy ending and whether they finally fall in love.

In paragraphs 123, 124 and 125, we read, amongst other things: "As was pointed out in paragraph 13 of the report of the Committee of Experts, the general discussion, richer than ever, had enabled the Committee to observe that it had made an important step – a decisive one, it hoped – towards the reconciling of views and questions of substance such as: the universal value of standards, the complementary nature of the different supervisory bodies and the foundation of their working methods on the same principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality." Paragraph 124 continues that for this reasons "dialogue had progressively become a many-varied and irreplaceable thing, especially in its tripartite dimension, which made the Organisation unique. The Committee was one of those privileged places where dialogue could be pursued and deepened ..." And paragraph 125 tells us "Indeed, only the guarantee of the effective application of standards in good faith and on equal basis for all could confer credibility on the standard-setting work of the ILO. This carried the message that the Organisation addressed to the world 70 years ago, namely: that peace and social justice go hand in hand. Clearly the 70th anniversary has not yet seen this hope become a reality, as shown particularly by the discussions within the Committee concerning the application of the Employment Policy Convention, No. 122." It ends by saying that in a rapidly and widely changing world, where economic and social structures and even systems are in flux, where the need to take account of the social cost of adjustment policies is apparently still not fully appreciated, where the right to work and social achievements are often questioned in the name of economic rationality, the ILO has to double its efforts so that its international standards can promote balanced economic and social development, integrating that human factor which it was set up to defend."

This is the spirit in which we have worked, and, I believe I can say without exaggeration, with success. Turning to the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), since employment is the first, major concern of workers, we must bear in mind the Director-General's Report, "Recovery and employment", discussion of which took place in the plenary session; mention should also be made of the resolution, which was not carried, on the very serious problem of external debt and its harmful consequences on a social level. In that field there are plenty of initiatives for the ILO to take together with the other international institutions such as the United Nations, the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank and others, because it is no longer possible to work in isolation; in other words we must pool our efforts and work together to achieve success. A great major concern of our Committee was the first or basic obligations of countries. Special efforts must be made to submit Conventions to legislative bodies, the maximum of information and assistance from the Organisation. Once they have been submitted, preparation and examination for ratification can be undertaken. We are pleased to note that there has been real progress, but there is still much to be done everywhere in the world to ratify and apply the essential Conventions which directly affect human rights, including the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) dealing with national tripartism.

After ratification, the submission of reports and replies to questions and direct requests should not only be sent in more regularly, but also be much fuller in content.

May I draw your attention to the meaning and value of article 19 of the Constitution? Under this article, it is possible, with the assistance of government, workers' and employers' organisations, for the Committee of Experts to carry out an overall study of an extremely important subject, both for the countries which have and which have not ratified the relevant Conventions.

What have we seen this year? Well, social security, the greatest social achievement after the war, is far from perfectly applied and at times of crisis or economic difficulty is what is affected most seriously. Within social security, old-age pensions are still the worst treated: the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) has been ratified by only 32 countries and the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128) by as few as 12 countries. We would insist that in both industrialised countries and developing countries dynamic action in solidarity with older workers and their families should be given priority. The Workers also expressed the wish that the subject to be decided on by the Governing Body next November should take into account the general survey and the discussion in the Committee and not be limited to the question of equality of age between men and women.

Speaking of general surveys, we must also refer to the situation of teachers. The Joint ILO-UNESCO report on the Recommendation concerning the Status of Teachers is, I would say, rather alarming. One knows, nevertheless, or should know, that education is the first prerequisite for development and progress. The development of education around the world was described in the discussion in such terms as "lack of prestige", "decline", "deterioration", "discriminatory", "humiliating", etc. When you know the dual task for the teachers' organisations – on the one hand to contribute to the quality of education and on the other to defend professional interests – the public authorities should ensure that the status of teachers corresponds with the grandeur of their vocation. I believe it is also high time for a Convention to be drawn up for teachers, not just a Recommendation, as at present.

As a European, I would like to draw attention to paragraphs 54 and 55 of the report. While the single market for 330 million people is in full preparation for 1992, there are two points which concern us particularly. First, the relationship between the ILO and the EEC and here there is a great deal to clarify, because the EEC enjoys more and more authority and there must be good, clear co-operation between the EEC and the ILO. There are also a number of legal questions to be settled.

The other question concerns what we call the social dimension of the EEC. Today and tomorrow the European Summit is meeting in Madrid. Europe cannot just be economic, monetary, industrial and financial; the ILO, with its Conventions and Recommendations, has an important role in the EEC social system and the Director-General, Michel Hansenne, is well aware of this from the time when he was Minister of Labour in Belgium. We have had general discussions in three phases: the report of the Committee of Experts, the basic indispensable foundation, with its great, unquestionable authority, then the general survey of pensions and old-age and thirdly the Joint ILO-UNESCO report on the teaching profession. However, the longest, hardest and most delicate task was the dialogue with 50 governments this year on important questions which concern them. I would like first to thank, on behalf of the Workers, all the governments that were prepared to talk frankly, openly and encouragingly with the Committee. Of course, the number of cases unfortunately had to be limited. This, however, did not prevent, and I stress this, all countries having to make an effort to take to heart all the comments on all the Conventions in the Committee of Experts' substantial report. We are very happy this year to note the progress made in legislation and in practice in a number of countries, which may be found in the report of the Committee of Experts. I will mention only two particularly pleasing and satisfactory cases: Bangladesh's full implementation of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and Poland's restoration of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). We hope that these countries and others will see real economic and social progress. But of course there have also been many cases which give rise to great concern and anxiety and, I have to say, instances of default.

It is well put in the report and its Appendices. The most important result of our discussions may be found in the special paragraphs. But I want the meaning of the special paragraphs to be clearly understood. They are not sanctions or condemnations but an expression of the fact that we discussed important problems meriting special attention. For example, we asked, insistently but also with confidence, the Central African Republic, Colombia, the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Romania and Turkey to take careful note of the conclusions, hoping – in a constructive spirit which may be seen in the paragraph – that changes would take place shortly. The fact that Islamic Republic of Iran is not mentioned does not mean that our concern over the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) has diminished. The fact that the United Kingdom does not have a special paragraph in the report does not mean that it does not deserve it. The roll-call vote that we just lost, as well as the very firm conclusions in the report, show that freedom of association is abused and misapplied in this co-founding member State of the ILO. We would also have liked to express ourselves more clearly with regard to Turkey.

One fact is clear, however. The Workers' Group unanimously feels that the ILO Conventions are today, like yesterday and like tomorrow, as valuable for industrialised democratic countries as for any other. This applies to all the Common Market countries as well as all the OECD countries. Unfortunately it seems that this has not been fully or properly understood by the Employers' side this year. In some cases, especially in industrialised countries, the traditional co-operation has failed and sometimes broken down completely. We have also felt some concern on hearing certain Employers' delegates criticising, in our opinion unfairly, and dangerously the work of the Experts and the interpretation of Conventions. As workers we regret these trends and hope that after due reflection we shall be able next year to resume co-operation more completely. This does not prevent me from sincerely and warmly thanking Mr. Wisskirchen for the work which we have been able to do together. We must become real social partners who, both in collective negotiations and here at the ILO, are capable of taking responsibility independently of governments. In conclusion, we very sincerely congratulate our Chairman, Mr. Elmiger, who has done so well that some of us would like to nominate him for life.

We thank the Reporter, Mr. Kchaou. Finally, thanks and congratulations are owed to Mr. Sidibé, Mr. Zenger and all the fine secretariat team, which contributed so well to the success of our work. To the workers on the Committee I wish good luck and real social progress next year. I ask the Conference to approve the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Mr. AHMED (Workers' delegate, Pakistan) – I should be brief at this late hour, but what has been remarked today in the Workers' group is that in many committees the members have themselves been guilty of ILO standards by working late and not observing standards on hours of work. I think this is equally applicable to the members of this Committee. I also, as a member, as a result of the honour bestowed upon me by the Workers' group in appointing me as secretary, have been guilty of violating ILO standards by working even on weekends and at late hours on many days; but it was for the betterment of working men and women, helping to improve their working and living conditions and enhance their dignity.

We have spent almost three weeks in Geneva in this highest forum, the Conference of the ILO, which is considered as a world parliament of labour. One of our important tasks is to establish international labour standards. Coming from a Third World country, from Pakistan, we believe that this important constitutional task entrusted to the Conference is immense value to working men and women and that those who contribute their precious time are meant to bring something really positive to people who work all over the world.

The principles outlined in the form of ILO Conventions and Recommendations require not only to be ratified by member States in order to demonstrate their commitment to the ILO Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, but also to be applied both in letter and spirit. This important Committee is meant to see that standards are observed in member countries; it therefore plays a very important role because universal and lasting peace based on social justice cannot be attained without respecting international labour standards, which relate both to human rights and to improving working and living conditions and enhancing the status and dignity of working men and women.

In this respect, we believe that the human rights which have been proclaimed by this assembly are indivisible. They are applicable to the working classes all over the world, whether they belong to the East, West, North or South, and at the same time require to be fully implemented. In my own country, we the workers' group, filed a complaint previously for failure to implement certain ILO Conventions, and our Government was placed on special list for many years for infringement of those ratified Conventions. Now that we have a newly-elected democratic Government, our Prime Minister has undertaken to devise a labour policy in conformity with ILO Conventions, as well as to establish a review board to reinstate those victimised trade unions that were dismissed previously. This is a positive aspect that has been brought to the notice of this Committee by the workers; the Committee has noted some progress in real terms.

We are thankful to the members of the Committee, and particularly the Workers' group who have been assisting us in this noble task; we hope that they will follow up the progress that the Committee hoped would be made by governments.

Secondly, I would mention some aspects which have to be considered – which have been stressed by the previous speaker – and which I will mention briefly. One is the development of promotional activities in member States by the ILO in the form of technical assistance so that member States, and particularly the Third World countries, can develop their infrastructures so as to ratify and implement ILO standards, in respect of both education and training. This has been outlined in the report very eloquently.

A further aspect, which has been also stressed by other distinguished colleagues, is employment. Full employment is very important for workers but, because of problems in connection with the international imbalance of trade, and consequent indebtedness, the situation in the Third World countries is very grim. We believe that for structural adjustment in terms of human resources development to be more effective, technical co-operation must be further extended.

We are sorry that one of the resolutions which was moved, about resolving the debt problem of Third World countries, could not come to the plenary although it was very relevant in terms of improving the employment situation.

Lastly, in relation to the review on social security in old age, while this is a very important review carried out by the Office, we would expect – as has been stressed in the paragraph on migrant workers – that the ILO would extend more help to member States to devise a social security scheme for migrant workers in those receiving countries which are still behind in this respect, because migrant workers contribute a lot to the development of those countries, in particular to the general welfare; therefore they deserve our full support and attention.

A final aspect that I would submit is about teachers, as eloquently set out in the report.

A further point, as stressed by the distinguished Vice-Chairman of the Employers' group, Mr. Wisskirchen, is the right to strike. We believe that freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining are meant to achieve harmonious industrial relations. A strike does not mean that workers are anti-State or that they intend to jeopardise the national interest; they are the most patriotic force in every country and they contribute to social and economic development. A strike is also a means of resolving disputes amicably and therefore it should not be taken as an act against the Parliament – what is called the elected Parliament. As governments ratify Conventions, they also enter into obligations to implement them by constitutional means. Therefore what has been stated by the experts and by the Committee on Freedom of Association is very important for the workers. When employers go into liquidation, efforts should be made to resolve the situation amicably.

Lastly, it is my duty to assert with other speakers what good work has been done by our Chairman, representing the Government of Switzerland, ably and dedicatedly, as well as by the distinguished Reporter, the representative of the Government of Tunisia, and by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, as well as in particular our spokesman and Vice-Chairman of the Workers' group who has been doing this work for the last many years with great dedication and assisted also by brother Thomas and brother Hickey and other officers – and particularly the members of the Workers' group of the Committee, and in general the members of the Committee who have been working late, as well as the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Sidibé and his good team. I thank them sincerely for the good work. Before concluding, I would also wish – because this might be the last occasion to speak in this plenary – a good and happy life in the struggle still to be waged and I would respectfully urge the adoption of this useful report.

(Mrs. Molkova takes the Chair.)

Original – Spanish: Mr. SANCHEZ SORIANO (Workers' delegate, Dominican Republic) – In reading the report that has been presented by the Committee on the Application of Standards, I would like to refer particularly to Freedom of Association and Protections of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) and to the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105).

Concerning Convention 105, the context of the report submitted by the Committee (regrettably, neither the Minister of Labour nor the Employers of the Dominican Republic are present here) does not correspond to the reality of the treatment of the Haitian population in the Dominican Republic.

From the substance of the report, it would appear that the Dominican Republic is a paradise for Haitians.

We think that the Committee of Experts that went to the Dominican Republic last year, following a complaint that we submitted here in 1983 on forced labour led us to believe that, this year, the Dominican Republic would be condemned for its treatment of our Haitian brothers in the Dominican Republic.

However, there seems to be a routine as regards the contents.

The Minister of Labour of the Dominican Republic has made a pact with the Employers and before this Conference has distorted the facts regarding the Haitian nationals. Everyone will remember the massacre of more than 30 Haitians in the Dominican Republic this year which caused an international outcry and a protest against the forced labour there.

The Committee of Experts that went to the Dominican Republic and met trade union and government representatives and employers submitted a precise report on this subject, but it is not in this document. We think that the way in which it is drafted will in no way help us to change the situation affecting Haitian nationals in the Dominican Republic.

As regards Convention No. 87 referred to by the Vice-Chairman of the Drafting Committee, he spoke of the problem of strikes and those to be considered in a political context.

For instance, in the Dominican Republic on Monday and Tuesday of last week there was a national strike of 48 hours which was a plebiscite by the Dominican Republic to say 100 per cent "No" to the failed economic policy implemented by the central Government, a policy that is in accordance with terms laid down by the International Monetary Fund. This national strike has a great deal in common with Convention No. 87, because it is related to the solidarity strike of the public sectors which takes place when an economic policy affects the conditions of life and work of the Dominican Republic people. Then, the public service workers have an obligation to show solidarity with the sectors opposing the policy, and in this respect the workers in the public sector in the Dominican Republic did apply Convention No. 87 regarding the solidarity strike.

As a result of this strike 5,000 people were detained, of which more than 2,000 are still in prison. Hundreds of people were beaten, more than six were murdered, there were violation of domicile – such are the consequences of the repressive policy of the central government which the Minister, speaking before this Conference, did not even mention in connection with the situation in the Dominican Republic.

Quite apart from this brief digression on these two matters – I should like also to talk about the persecution to which we are subjected here in Switzerland.

I arrived here Friday night and therefore could not get here on time. I therefore sent a telegram to the people who are responsible for this event. The organisation that I am in charge of is that which is the main organiser of strikes against economic policy.

Saturday morning the Swiss political police, apparently on a report from the central Government, entered my hotel room without a search warrant or anything. They interrogated me on my trade union and political activities since 1970. My passport was taken away. I was frisked and they took note of everything that was in the place.

Today I sent a cable to my organisation and trade union in the Dominican Republic reporting this and also informing them that I am under surveillance by the Swiss political police. I have been photographed many times in the street by both video and ordinary cameras.

This is more proof that freedom of movement is restricted even in this so-called “paradise” in Switzerland. I formally protest against this treatment and I demand respect for my physical integrity.

Mr. HICKEY (Workers' adviser, United States) – On behalf of the United States Workers' delegation to this Conference, may I offer our warm congratulations to Mr. Nkomo on his election.

My purpose in taking the floor at this time is to support and amplify two of the points made by the Workers' Vice-Chairman of our Committee on the report which is now before us: points which Mr. Houthuys necessarily treated in summary fashion, but points which we consider it important to further discuss and stress.

These points arise as a result of the discussion this year of the United Kingdom case, which involved the Government's compliance with its obligations under Convention No. 87.

The case concerned the dismissal of 13 public service employees at Government Communications Headquarters (GCHQ) of the British Government because of their refusal to give up their membership of the unions of their choice. In the judgement of the Committee of Experts, this constituted a violation of Article 2 of Convention No. 87.

Time, of course, will not permit me to discuss the many legal ramifications of this case, the differences in legal view between the British Government and the Committee of Experts with respect to alleged or asserted confusion between Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 51, and the like.

In any event, this is not essential to the focal point of this discussion. Suffice it to say that, whatever their merit, this case reached an impasse when the Committee of Experts pointedly recommended further negotiations by the United Kingdom Government with the union to resolve the problem and the Government refused to do so.

Last year, when this recommendation was specifically called to the attention of the British Government, it was met with the same curt refusal to do so, on the ground that “it would serve no useful purpose”.

Again this year the same recommendation of the Experts that the United Kingdom Government “should undertake renewed negotiations” was admitted by the representative of the Government before our Committee with the further observation that the unions had formally rejected any negotiations of a non-strike clause which lay at the boundary line of their concerns over this case.

Again, however, the United Kingdom Government repeated its refusal to enter into further negotiations on the grounds that they “could serve no useful purpose”.

In the course of his reply to the United Kingdom Government, the Workers' delegate of the United Kingdom informed the Government representative that only a month or two ago the civil service trade unions had said that they would be prepared to negotiate a non-strike agreement and he urged the British Government to do what the Committee of Experts had asked them to do – “negotiate a non-strike deal”.

In the face of all this, the representative of the United Kingdom maintained his position and refused to enter into further negotiations.

The Committee's conclusions, which are contained in Part Two of this report now before you, inter alia, and I am quoting again, “note with regret that the Government had dismissed some GCHQ workers during the proceedings pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association” and further noted “that the Government does not consider it useful to hold negotiations with the workers' association” and “expressed the firm hope that the Government would reconsider its position”.

Accordingly, it was in this context that the Workers proposed that these conclusions be mentioned in a special paragraph of its report because this was an important case where the Government had emphatically refused negotiations with the trade unions concerned.

The Employers rejected the proposal of a special paragraph on the grounds that: (1) a complex legal question was at issue which could finally be resolved only by the International Court of Justice; (2) the case was not typical; (3) the existence and extent of freedom of association in the country were not at stake; and (4) it was merely an individual case discussed only for the third time.

The proposal then proceeded to a record vote which the Workers lost and, as Mr. Houthuys has just told you, by a surprisingly small margin because of the opposition of the Employers in combination with a sufficient number of Governments.

From what I have sketched for you thus far on the course of the discussion in the United Kingdom case, it should be apparent that the igniting force for the special paragraph proposed by the Workers was the adamant refusal of the United Kingdom Government to renew negotiations with the British trade unions concerned, despite the recommendation of the Experts to do so and despite the concession by the United Kingdom Workers' member that the British trade unions were willing to negotiate a no-strike agreement and thus give assurances that there would be no cessation of operations at GCHQ. In point of fact, this was the precise declaration of the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Houthuys, as the reason this was an important case and why it should be highlighted as such in a special paragraph.

It should be equally clear that this reason for the special paragraph was ignored by the Employers who obscured the heart of the issue before the Committee and did not even address it but, on the contrary, described it as a complex legal issue which could be resolved only by the International Court of Justice.

This same misconception of the real issue on the special paragraph was evident from explanations given by a preponderance of Governments voting against the special paragraph.

Without taking your time to discuss these explanations in detail, let me characterise them as being clearly influenced by the United Kingdom Government's written position – which was given wide circulation throughout the Committee – that the case was a technical one and in no way a breach of freedom of association.

In short, it is our conviction that the effort by the Workers for a special paragraph in this case was lost because of a failure on the part of the Employers and certain Governments – for reasons extraneous to what was really involved – to perceive its real purpose, and that was to urge and encourage the British Government not to slam the door shut on further negotiations with the trade unions. If this does not represent a violation of freedom of association, then we Workers don't know what does.

Now, I give you this case as a background because the Workers in this Committee believe it illustrates – and in fact triggered – a perceptible trend towards inequality of treatment in cases involving large and powerful industrial countries – as contrasted with developing countries – when it comes to applying the observations of the Experts in an impartial manner, and you just heard Mr. Houthuys a few moments ago say that this was a worrisome development as between Workers and Employers.

We believe that this drift is dangerous and should be avoided, and I will try to tell you why.

This year in the general discussions, as you have heard from our Reporter, 53 members (which is the highest number of members ever recorded in the history of our Committee) after many years of difficult dialogue in the Committee, spoke with one common voice in stressing the vital importance of the principles consistently enunciated and followed by the Committee of Experts in maintaining the independence of the supervisory system, the universality of its standards and the necessity of applying them with objectivity and impartiality. These are not just words. You will find them recorded in paragraph 13 of our report which is before you and which was unanimously adopted by the Committee as very important principles.

You will also find in paragraph 20 of our report – also unanimously adopted by our Committee – that faithful adherence to these same principles equally applies to the Conference Committee in pursuance of its work.

In my own intervention on behalf of the United States Workers I emphasised the importance of this equality of application of these principles to all countries, regardless of their size or their power, their geographical location, or their political persuasion. In my view, our Committee cannot project two faces – one for the developing countries and another for the industrial States. In short, I try to stress the point that if this Committee is to continue to merit the accolade of “the conscience of the ILO”, it must be perceived as applying the standards impartially wherever breaches occur. If it did not do this, in my view our Committee would suffer a loss of credibility.

Now I said that on 8 June, and I repeat it now, because the Workers on this Committee perceive this drift I spoke of a moment ago, away from respect for the observations of the Experts and from a faithful application by our Committee of the principles of objectivity and impartiality. All you have to do, and I will not take the time to quote from it, is look at paragraph 21 of our report for confirmation of what I am saying.

Now we detect this trend on the part of the Employers (see again paragraph 21 of our report, where an industrial power is involved – a large industrial power) and by governments where public servants are concerned. We think it is clearly perceptible if you will take a look at the countries mentioned by Mr. Houthuys in the Committee's report on “Special cases” in paragraphs 108 through 113. Now he has already named them to you so I won't repeat them but you will note in those paragraphs the absence not only of the United Kingdom case but also of the cases of Japan, under Convention No. 87, and the Federal Republic of Germany, under Convention No. 111. All three of these cases are undeniably serious cases involving violations of fundamental human rights in the view of the Committee of Experts. They are undeniably important cases where, regrettably, acceptance of the observations of the Experts has been declined and in fact challenged, for reasons which are either politically inspired or otherwise extraneous, to an impartial application of universally applicable standards.

As our Workers' Vice-Chairman has already informed you, a special paragraph is not a condemnation of a court. In this Committee where dialogue is pre-eminent, its fundamental purpose is to highlight the case as one of importance and to encourage and to stimulate compliance with obligations freely assumed. That's its purpose. In some cases, but not all, the abuse is flagrant and long continued and is noted with grave concern, and is so described and articulated in the special paragraph, particularly by as able a man as our Chairman was this year – I can't pay him sufficiently compliments, he was that good. But, in other cases the infractions may not be this abusive or grave but they may, nevertheless, be viewed as matters of concern and importance, enough to highlight and encourage resolution.

Such was the situation, I respectfully submit, in the United Kingdom case when viewed from the perspective of the Government's adamant refusal – twice repeated – to re-enter into negotiations as recommended by the Experts, and, in particular, after an offer this year by the United Kingdom Workers' representative to negotiate a no-strike agreement which was, after all, the root cause of the British Government's difficulties.

Now in summary, with the United Kingdom case as a background and triggering force, I have tried to explain our concern for departure within this Committee from unanimity of respect for, and adherence to, the principles of impartiality and objectivity in the general discussion, inequality of treatment and application in the discussion of certain individual cases.

It is contradictory and it is alarming to hear, on the one hand, a pledge of allegiance to the observations of the Committee of Experts and the principles they espouse, and on the other hand, in certain individual cases, to hear that the Experts are wrong and that we can expect no change. The Workers' of this Committee view this contradiction as an alarming twist on a slippery slope. We think it is dangerous because if it persists and is not stopped, and now, it will do irreparable injury to the tripartite system which is the soul of the ILO as you all know, and so, also, of its Committee of Application of Standards.

If cleavage develops between Workers and Employers in their conceptions of what constitutes impartial assessments of powerful industrial countries, equally with those accorded developing countries, it could paralyse the effective and essential co-operation which has traditionally characterised the work of this Committee.

In short, in reaching our evaluation of a country's compliance with its obligations, the shadow of a double standard should be regarded as an unwelcome intrusion – whether it comes from the East or the West.

These are my thoughts. I felt strongly obliged to submit them for serious consideration by the delegates here assembled, by the esteemed Office staff with whom we work, and, in particular, by my colleagues in this Committee for whom I have the greatest respect.

(Mr. Mkomo takes the Chair.)

Original – Spanish: Mr. MEDINA GALVEZ (Workers' delegate, Chile) – This morning the Vice-Chairman of the Workers' Group, Mr. Muhr, recommended that we examine this report very carefully, because it contained much food for thought.

We Chilean Workers consider that it is also very important that we bear in mind Provisional Record No. 28 of 1988, which also concerned the work of this Committee. On that occasion we referred constantly to the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

With regard to paragraph 8 of the report which refers to governments that have not ratified the international conventions of the ILO, the Workers' members of the Committee on the Application of Standards repeatedly called on those governments to ratify and apply properly Conventions Nos. 87, 98, 144 (on tripartite consultation), 135 (on workers' representatives) and 151 (on labour relations in the public service).

On 20 June the Minister of Labour and Social Welfare, Mr. Arthur Errazuriz, officially announced at this Conference that Chile was considering ratification of Convention No. 87. This is particularly important for the Chilean Workers who have frequently urged the Government to do so from this very rostrum. Trade union leaders from all over the world have regularly called for strict compliance with ratified Conventions. Many countries, including our own, have not ratified, for example, Convention No. 1 on the eight-hour working day, Convention No. 14 on the same subject and Convention No. 30. Why do I say this? Because when you think that in 1886 the Chicago martyrs gave their lives for an eight-hour day, it seems impossible that 103 years later there are still people working more than eight hours a day.

On 29 April last, Chile ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. On 27 May it ratified the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights. I emphasise the ratification of these covenants because article 7 of the latter embodies important principles of freedom for workers. Article 8 too is important because it is on the same lines as article 5 of Convention No. 7, which refers to the right of workers' and employers' organisations to establish and join federations and confederations. Paragraph 60 of Provisional Record No. 26 refers to old-age protection and calls on governments to ratify conventions Nos. 102 and 128, as the spokesman of the Workers' Group as already mentioned, and to implement Recommendation No. 131. What does the Constitution of the ILO say? That people who have paid their debt to society deserve just remuneration, exactly as the Director-General's Report says when it refers to a social wage. And what have we trade union leaders asked for? Comprehensive medical care for every worker on retirement. What have we asked for? A shorter working day for men and women, for women workers with family responsibilities, for men over the age of 55. What do we base this demand on? On the Forty-Hour Week Convention, 1935 (No. 47), which unfortunately only eight countries have ratified after 54 years. This should give us food for thought, because those who drafted Convention No. 47 in 1935 certainly had a view of the future in which technology, automation and demographic growth would inevitably lead to a shorter working day.

This is why the workers' delegate of Chile are asking the Committee on the Applications of Standards to look into the situation of workers next year.

To conclude, I would like to express my gratitude to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Elmiger, to the Employers' and Workers' and to the Reporter for the excellent and detailed report on the problems facing the world of work. I would also like to thank the members of the secretariat and the translators, who recorded so faithfully the opinions voiced by delegates from all over the world. I believe that this Committee on the Application of Standards, personified by its Chairman, its two vice-chairmen and its Reporter, meets the requirements voiced by Aristoteles who said that important decisions must be taken with wisdom, and prudence – which is exactly what happened in this Committee.

Original – French: Mr. MOURGUES (Workers' delegate, France) – Mr. President, before broaching the subject of my intervention, I would like to congratulate you and the other Officers for the way in which you have guided the work of the Conference.

In the appreciations from this rostrum concerning the work of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, it appeared that too much time was devoted to the consideration of critical situations in respect of which the Government of the countries concerned, after a great deal of discussion, made little response indicating willingness to enter into discussion in order to arrive at solutions.

Some of them even went so far as to consider the requests formulated last year or in previous years as an interference in the domestic affairs of their countries. However, it was proven during this session that the interest shown in dialogue within the Committee could lead to tangible results and was likely to get things moving – particularly as regards freedom of association. This dialogue, though necessary and constructive, cannot conceal the fact that in certain cases the situation remains unchanged, even if the governments do take part in the work of this Committee. In such cases participation goes no further than words.

In this context a number of countries could be classified according to the criterion of the continuous lack of will to implement.

During the coming years, therefore, we should be particularly careful on this point, otherwise the Committee on Standards will lose its credibility if in such cases it were to limit itself merely to fruitless dialogue producing no results.

From our point of view, we should consider that the very fact of being a Member of the ILO, of abiding by its Constitution and ratifying its Conventions, constitutes a commitment for governments not only to maintain dialogue but to implement these Conventions and to apply them effectively, to redress situations which are not satisfactory and to accept all the supervisory procedures prescribed in the Convention.

On the basis of these considerations, in view of the obvious fact – as we all know and many of us regret – that during discussions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Romanian Government in particular contributed no new information which would have made it possible to shed light on the situation in so far as discrimination is concerned, we wish, together with other Workers' delegates and in accordance with the provisions of article 26 of the Constitution of the ILO, to lodge a complaint with the International Labour Office for violation of Convention No. 111 by the Government of Romania. We, the complainants, that is, the Workers' delegates of the Federal Republic of Germany, the United States, Ivory Coast, Canada, Denmark, Spain, Italy, Japan, the United Kingdom, Switzerland, Venezuela, Zambia and of course of France, we the complainants, request that in order to follow up this complaint a Commission of Inquiry be set up in conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

We sincerely hope that the situation which has prompted us to submit this request will cease to deteriorate as it has been doing during the past few days and that the Romanian Government will reconsider its attitude towards both the ethnic minorities and towards its own commitments with the International Labour Organisation.

Original – German: Mr. NOACK (Government delegate, German Democratic Republic) – On behalf of the tripartite delegation of the German Democratic Republic, I should like to reiterate the reservations contained in Part II of the report, page 85. These reservations are necessary in the light of the Committee's conclusions. The information provided orally by the Government representative of the German Democratic Republic concerning the implementation of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111) in law and in practice were not appropriately reflected and not sufficiently heeded in the discussion. Once again, we have the impression that a double standard is being applied in the drafting of the conclusions. We believe that ways must be found of avoiding this in the future.

Original – Spanish: Mr. MEZA SOZA (Government delegate, Nicaragua) – In view of the hour I will be extremely brief. The Government delegation of Nicaragua would like to join those who this afternoon have commended the results of the work of our Committee on the Application of Standards. Without prejudice to the reservations noted in certain specific cases, and those that we have pointed out with respect to our country, we can but recognise the efforts that have been undertaken to obtain an overall positive balance from the work of this very important Committee. The excellent work done by the Chairman of our Committee and the other officers of the Committee, supported by the impartial high quality work of the ILO secretariat, has certainly been of great value.

In commenting upon the results, I must none the less deplore allusions made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman to my country. It was claimed that in the light of the major calls for a boycott of agricultural production launched in the past few days by a political sector of COSEP, the Government was going to take no measures and was going to yield to blackmail and pressures, thus allowing overt action by those who aim to use the economic crisis as a political weapon to destabilise our country. My Government and the Presidency of the State of Nicaragua have undertaken international commitments and are meeting them but we have never, never, agreed to treat with impunity those who would like to drag us and our nation into economic chaos. Our Employers' Vice-Chairman should reflect on what reaction a country should have if during or after a war, a politicised sector of entrepreneurs called for a boycott of economic activity in order to completely destroy the national economy. This tribunal should not be used to defend impunity under the pretext of freedom of enterprise. The tone used this afternoon of confrontation, of attack, of total intransigence encourages contradictions which are an obstacle to the different sectors in our country uniting their efforts to achieve national recovery.

Finally, the Government of Nicaragua would like to reiterate its call for economic co-operation and frank dialogue with the employers of Nicaragua, without prejudice, preconditions, blackmail or destabilising political attitudes, in the hope that the international organisation of employers will understand once and for all that instead of encouraging contradictions it would be better for it to use its good offices and its influence with a view to finding an alternative for a negotiation which would lead to greater results for all.

Let us hope that reason and maturity will win the day over the gratuitous enmity which has been demonstrated towards our Government for many years, for its energies and forces are surely worthy of a better cause.

Original – Arabic: Mr. AL-KHALIDI (Government delegate, Saudi Arabia) – In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! The spirit that has prevailed in our work during our deliberations in this Committee has been better than in previous years. It seems that there is a political agreement amongst the super powers on how to work together which is leading to dialogue. We are seeing this at present. The excellent leadership of Mr. Elmiger with the help of our Reporter, Mr. Kchaou, the co-operation, if limited, between the Workers and the Employers, the efforts by the experts who prepared our work and presented an excellent report, the untiring work of the Committee and the secretariat under the leadership of Mr. Sidibé – all this enabled us to do our work and present the report you have before you.

In my statement when we were discussing the report, I put forward a few ideas that would help countries – especially developing countries – to live up to their constitutional obligations. The International Labour Office can help technically and provide guidance to countries that wish to ratify a treaty or a Convention. However, this help and assistance should be forthcoming before ratification, not after, as is the case at present; because many of the problems that we have witnessed in past years in this Committee, on which I have been working for more than 12 years, stem from the fact that a number of countries – member States – have ratified Conventions which are not consistent with their national legislation and the experts find contradictions between national legislation and Conventions.

This is why I should like to give the following advice to the International Labour Office and to the member States: first, member States that wish to ratify a Convention should consult the Office and ask its assistance to know how far their national legislation complies with the instrument texts; second, member States that wish to ratify a Convention and wish to get technical assistance from the International Labour Office should be able to do so; third, there should be a certain give and take between member States, which should be entitled to ratify in their own good time.

In conclusion, I would urge you to adopt this report immediately.

Original – French: Mr. DOLGU (Government delegate, Romania) – I have asked for the floor because my country has been mentioned by name on two occasions. I have some comments to make on the debate and on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards as concerns Romania's application of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111).

The work of the Conference and of its Committee on the Application of Standards has taken place this year in circumstances in which Western circles have stepped up their anti-communist offensive aimed at dismantling the socialist system. To that end, increasing pressures have been brought to bear as well as political and economic sanctions. A few minutes ago, you heard a representative asking for another sanction to be imposed on Romania, and this is not the first one, while the media do not hesitate to manipulate images and facts in order to present a distorted picture of the aims and objectives of the domestic and foreign policies of a number of countries including my own.

My country has in effect been put on trial by forces that have no appreciation of the calm and the civil order that in fact prevail in Romania. They may not like socialism, that is their business, but my own country does aspire to those values, and they have the right to do so, just as they have the right to aspire to freedom of association and human rights; but they must not be made use of for the pursuit of revisionist purposes.

There has been a deliberate attempt to distort knowingly and in bad faith the true state of affairs in my country which has already impelled us to reject as null and void the resolution on that subject adopted by the Human Rights Commission.

This was also our attitude about the case made in Budapest which was an understatement, so to speak, and there was also criticism from France as before without the slightest attempt at objectivity even going so far as using Hungarian names for specific localities in Romania.

I categorically deny that there has been any discrimination against ethnic Hungarians in Romania. As concerns training, employment, education or dismissals, the ethnic Hungarians in Romania are at home. Romania is their homeland and they enjoy full equality of rights with Romanians as well as with the other nationalities which all live together enjoying everything: the social and economic structures, the access to education, the newspapers and other cultural institutions, being free to make use of their mother-tongue in so doing.

Can we ask if it is the same situation that prevails in France in peripheral areas where there are local difficulties? In higher education there is no quota on the basis of criteria of national origin. I am well placed to know this and to say so since for nine years I served as a Rector of a university. There is no line, no orientation aimed at dispersing the ethnic Hungarians at the end of their studies to regions where the majority population is Romanian.

Romanian policy in regard to rural development has also been the subject of gross falsification. The Romanian authorities have repeatedly emphasised that that policy is designed to develop and modernise the whole economy, all rural areas by the establishment of new agricultural, industrial and service units by equipping them with facilities of all kinds – educational, sanitary and social and cultural – so as to bring living conditions in the countryside up to the level enjoyed in the towns. This is a process which involves the preservation of cultural values, too. I must emphasise, and access to those values as well as to the creation of legal and practical conditions to ensure the maintenance of rural housing or the rural habitat.

I also wish to emphasise that under the law these programmes are subject to public debate and are implemented after being adopted by the people's councils of the respective communes. I therefore deny categorically the fable which is current in France, Belgium and Switzerland concerning the mass destruction of villages and I reject the conclusions in this regard of the Committee, which are based on a priori policies and partisan approaches, going so far as unreservedly to accept information prepared by elements whose manifest aim is to bring about a revision of Romania's frontiers. How could we forget that the propaganda concerning the persecution of the Hungarian minority in Romania is strangely reminiscent of what went on under Regent Horthy, the propaganda that ended up in 1940, following Hitler's dictatorship over Vienna, with the dismemberment of my country and the atrocities which took place in northern Transylvania during four long years of occupation by the Horthy police and administration.

As concerns certain Western representatives who, in the Committee, have fired their poisoned arrows at us, I should like to say to them, and this is addressed first and foremost to the Workers' delegate of France, that their approach is hypocritical in that they make no mention of the fact that in some of their countries there is not even any awareness of the legal notion of minorities. Are there any minorities in France? They make no mention of the situation of the French-born Maghrebians, of the millions and millions of migrant workers who have no chance at preserving their language, their culture, their religion because they have to assimilate in order to survive. They make no mention of the violence which constantly opposes the oppressed and the oppressors in some of their peripheral areas and in some of their overseas territories and the deepening wretchedness and destitution of the Third World which is the result both of prolonged colonial domination and of the exploitation practised by banks, through trade and through the whole system of international economic relations dominated by the Western countries. The ILO has undoubtedly failed in its vocation; failed in its mission when it did not adopt the resolution on the debt burden of the developing countries.

The statement made by the Workers' delegate of France did not surprise me because France has long been trying to set itself up as the master and been preaching to us in the matter of human rights. I would ask this representative "Has there been and is there equality of opportunity in training, in employment, in the promotion of their respective regions, for the Basques, for the Bretons, for the Corsicans, for the French-born Maghrebians, and for the French overseas territories?" How can France, which is trying to be very influential, make proposals to us when it has over 2 million unemployed and over 700,000 people homeless. I am not convinced by these arguments and I am sure you are not, either. The approach adopted by certain Western representatives is cynical to the extent that their governments choose their targets in terms of their Euro-political criteria or, more prosaically, economic criteria. Romania has a potential market of some US$10 billion, but it would be quite different if the potential market offered by Romania were more of the order of $100 billion. Let us call a spade a spade!

Their approach is dangerously Euro-centrist in nature. If Europe is entitled to be proud of its cultural heritage it should not ignore that of other regions or play down the values which underlie the socio-political values of the Western countries. This Western crusade, conducted in the name of human rights by means of economic and political pressures and propaganda exercises, may very well in the long run aggravate the crisis in Africa, Asia and Latin America, just about everywhere beyond the frontiers of this little enclave of wealth and exploitation which is the Western world.

Once again we have demonstrated our availability for dialogue. Unfortunately, however, it has remained a dialogue of the deaf. We have supplied in this forum, as in others for that matter, arguments, facts, evidence, but some of our interlocutors accept nothing other than their own unrealistic and malicious version of the Romanian reality. They despise all our explanations, all our information, even when supplied from the most authoritative sources. In these circumstances I wonder about the very usefulness of pursuing such a dialogue.

To conclude, I dispute and I reject the merits of the conclusions reached by the Committee on the Application of Standards in paragraph 112 of the report, including the request to receive a commission of inquiry. I would like to express our concern at the tendency to use the ILO for political purpose which reflect the interests of certain countries or groups of countries, with no relevance at all to the aims and objectives of the Organisation. I would address to all Members of this Organisation an appeal to do everything possible to put an end to this tendency, which is contrary to the interests of the ILO.

Finally, while we firmly reject all interference, any attempt to supervise or inquire into our affairs, including the mission requested by the Workers' delegate of France, we are none the less open to dialogue with all those, be they private individuals or official representatives, who in good faith and without preconceived ideas would like to get to know the situation in my country on the spot, at first hand.

The PRESIDENT – I believed we have exhausted our list of speakers. I have taken note of the statement made by the last speaker and the reservations contained therein; these reservations which will be duly notified in the Record.

If there are no objections, I take it that the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – It remains for me to thank the Chairman of the Committee, his two Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter and all other members of the Committee and the secretariat for the amount of work they have done. I believe the Conference will agree with me that this is a very useful report.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.30 p.m.)

THIRD AND FOURTH REPORTS OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda concerns the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee. I invite Mr. Califice, Government delegate, Belgium, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to present the reports.

Original – French: Mr. CALIFICE (Government delegate, Belgium; Chairman of the Credentials Committee) – I have the honour and the pleasure of presenting to the Conference the third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee. They are contained in the Provisional Record, Nos. 24 and 29, respectively.

The third report contains the decisions of the Committee on the objection concerning the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua, the nomination of the Moroccan Workers' delegation and the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Nicaragua.

The Committee did not propose invalidation of the credentials of any of the delegations concerned.

In the matter of the nomination of the Employers' delegation of Nicaragua, the Committee requested the Governing Body to take the appropriate steps so that a mission of good offices could be embarked upon.

The third report also contains the decisions of the Committee concerning two communications; one from the Government delegation of Afghanistan and a late communication concerning the composition of the Workers' delegation of the Philippines.

As for the fourth report, it contains a decision of the Committee on the objections concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Chile.

In this connection I would like to state that in spite of the difficulties caused by the consideration of this question, the Committee was able to reach an agreement thanks to the spirit of co-operation of the Employers' and Workers' members of the Committee as well as to the goodwill shown by the Government of Chile delegate.

In this connection, the Government delegate of Chile this morning gave us the text of the motivation of the Bill which modifies the existing provisions on recognition of trade unions, which will permit the recognition of the existing national trade union federations which group together the already existing legal trade unions; this will mean they can be consulted officially for the establishment of the Workers' delegation at the International Labour Conference.

In view of the fact that the decisions contained in these two reports have been taken unanimously, the Conference is requested to take note of them in conformity with article 26, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

Now that we have completed our work I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to express my warmest gratitude to my two colleagues, Mr. Hoff, Employers' member, and Mr. Svenningsen, Workers' member, for their efficient and friendly co-operation. Thanks to the excellent spirit which prevailed throughout our discussion, the Committee was able to take its decisions unanimously for all the cases which had been placed before it.

The Committee had to meet this Sunday morning in order to complete its work. I thank the secretariat of the Committee for the efficient assistance it gave the work of our Committee.

The PRESIDENT – I wish to thank Mr. Califice. I have received a letter concerning the third report of the Credentials Committee from Mr. Meza Soza, Government delegate, Nicaragua, and with his agreement I would like to ask the Clerk of the Conference to read the letter to the Conference.

The CLERK of the CONFERENCE – The letter is dated 26 June 1989; it is written in Spanish and I will read it in that language.

(The Clerk continues in Spanish.)

Mr. President of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference,

The Government delegation of Nicaragua has seen the decision of the Credentials Committee concerning the objection to the credentials of the Nicaraguan Employers' delegate, Juan Ramón Aragón, and his adviser, Marcos González.

In this connection the Government of Nicaragua cannot but deeply regret that the honourable Credentials Committee once again has failed to recognise the reality prevailing in our country concerning the truly representative bodies of the Employers in Nicaragua, granting representativity to a sector which during the last years has lost that capacity.

The Government of Nicaragua has made very serious efforts to solve these problems and has gone as far as to propose the formula of alternative appointments to this post as a solution.

This alternative, however, has been rejected by COSEP, whose attitude does not make it possible to find a constructive solution for this well-known dispute.

In spite of the situation, the Government of Nicaragua will continue making every possible effort to find a practical solution to the problem of the representation of the Employers, in good faith and in a spirit of tripartite concertation.

*(Signed) Adrián MEZA SOZA, Government delegate, Nicaragua;
76th Session of the International Labour Conference.*

The PRESIDENT – The third and fourth reports of the Credentials Committee were adopted unanimously by the Committee. Therefore, the Conference is invited to take note of these reports.

(The reports are noted.)

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT – We move on to the next item on our agenda, which is the report of the Resolutions Committee. It is my pleasure to ask the officers of the Committee, Mr. Glaiel, Government delegate, Syrian Arab Republic, Chairman and Reporter; Mr. Castle, Employers' adviser, United Kingdom, Vice-Chairman; and Mr. Morton, Workers' delegate, United Kingdom, Vice-Chairman, to come to the rostrum.

I now call upon Mr. Glaiel, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Original – Arabic: Mr. GLAIEL (Government delegate, Syrian Arab Republic; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee) – I have the honour to present the report of the Resolutions Committee, contained in Provisional Record No. 27.

As you are all aware, this report contains no recommendation from the Committee addressed to the Conference for adoption. This is the second consecutive year that the Committee finds itself in this unsatisfactory situation. The resolutions put before the Committee all concern subjects of high priority to the International Labour Organisation – the environment, the social impact of debt on the developing countries, the situation of workers and employers in Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, the financing of the participation of delegations, the role of enterprises in employment growth and the problem of AIDS, as well as other important issues. The importance of these resolutions did not suffice, however, for them to be adopted by the Committee. At the closing sitting, many speakers expressed their bitterness and disappointment, as well as their sorrow, over this result, for all their efforts had been in vain, although the discussion had taken place in a calm atmosphere, and in a spirit of responsibility.

I trust that last year's experience and that of this year will give us food for thought, enabling us to find the means of overcoming the difficulties, which, should they persist, would undermine the essential objectives for which this Organisation was created and for which it has been working without respite. The situation facing us today is very disquieting, and an appeal must therefore be made to all groups and delegations so that a spirit of genuine and constructive co-operation may prevail, accompanied by a sincere political will, because only this will enable us to overcome rigid positions and preconceived policies, and to draw up texts which would meet the wishes of participants and realise the objectives of the Organisation. The general discussion on the first two resolutions testified to the importance of the subjects proposed and the interest which they arouse. The part of the report devoted to this discussion and the positive atmosphere which prevailed throughout should be a source of inspiration for the work which we shall undertake in the future in the interests of labour and workers.

In conclusion, I should like to thank Mr. Castle, Employers' Vice-Chairman, and Mr. Morton, Workers' Vice-Chairman, as well as all participants in the Committee and the members of the secretariat, who helped keep my spirits high in this Committee despite the difficulties I have just mentioned.

The PRESIDENT – The report is now open for discussion.

Mr. CASTLE (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – I wish to add my regrets that for the second year running we have no resolution to propose to the Conference. It is a pity, because we had a good number of resolutions to choose from, including the sixth, on self-employment, and the others mentioned by the Chairman of our Committee, which I think would have featured proudly in an ILO programme. Yet I do not think that it is impossible to achieve resolutions in this Committee, since not so long ago, at one of its meetings in which I participated, we were actually able to agree on six resolutions to propose to the Conference for adoption. Therefore, it is possible.

No doubt, today and in the days to come, we shall hear many people talk about what went wrong and what can be done to make things better. There will probably be suggestions to change the Committee's procedures or rules, but, for my part, I am not convinced that it is necessary to introduce changes. What I appeal to all of you to do is to look forward, not back. I am convinced that if we can concentrate on issues which we can address comfortably within the ILO's area of competence and if we all adopt a positive and constructive approach to our debates, then we shall once again see the Resolutions Committee perform the work for which it was intended, with effective results.

Before I leave this rostrum, I should like to give my thanks to Ambassador Glaiel and to Mr. Morton. Ambassador Glaiel had a very difficult task before him and I am amazed at how he managed to keep smiling, retain his good humour and show great tolerance. It is that tolerance that helped us to keep an even climate for our debate, and for this I thank him. Mr. Morton, with his unique training in the trade union movement, was always able to bring good commonsense to bear when it was most needed. Of course, I feel very sorry for the secretariat, which spent countless hours translating our amendments and working for us so that we were able to carry on with our business – unfortunately without much to show for it today other than a very good report. I should like to end by thanking all the people who participated in our Committee and expressing the hope that we shall be able to meet again next year in a better climate.

Mr. MORTON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) – You would expect me to join the previous speakers in expressing regret that the efforts of the Resolutions Committee have not produced a result. Of course, we have to recognise that the Constitution is designed to require a large measure of consensus. Even one delegate can seriously impede the progress of the Committee. This may be essential in an international organisation of this type. Nevertheless, the Workers' group felt that it was reasonable to expect that there should be such a consensus on several of the resolutions that were on the agenda, particularly the one concerning the environment. The Workers' group thought that this reflected what the Director-General called, in his Report, "a strong sense of our common destiny". Of course, the Workers group had particular interest in this resolution. They had concern for the inter-relationship between the working environment and the environment generally, for the need to establish positive links between employment creation and the maintenance and improvement of the environment, and several other points.

This resolution had an unusually wide range of sponsors, including Government and Workers' delegates from developing countries and Workers' delegates from Eastern and Western industrialised countries. Of course, it was always clear that a merged resolution cannot be perfect. In fact, any resolution can be changed indefinitely. Whether the changes are an improvement is a very subjective question. And the Workers' group submitted a small number of amendments to this first resolution – the smallest number of any group.

I have mentioned the first resolution, but the Workers' group were also very interested in the resolution on debt. They were anxious to see the Conference adopt measures that could, even to the slightest extent, assist workers in the poorer sections of society in those countries suffering under the grinding burden of debt. They were conscious of the fact, illustrated in the Director-General's Report, that this is a problem that is worsening, a problem on which no time should be wasted.

Indeed, on the third priority, a priority that was agreed both within the Workers' group and by the Committee, the situation of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, the Workers' group admitted that this resolution was not as global as the first one, perhaps not as uncontroversial, but that it did represent a persistent problem that was well illustrated by the Director-General's Report on the matter. The Workers' group was anxious therefore to be able to deal with this resolution.

I have mentioned the first three resolutions, but of course the Workers' group was also very concerned about the ominous problem of AIDS and the question of drug abuse, human rights, and also the possibility of improving the position of delegations to this Conference. All of these issues have come to nought, and we have to ask why.

It is not my purpose here at all to indulge in any recriminations whatever. Delegates should read the report. The report states – I believe accurately and clearly – what participants said they were going to do.

It states what participants said they had done and it states what they actually did. The three things do not always coincide, incidentally. The Workers' group does not claim perfection. In fact, on reflection, it may be that the Workers' group shared a failing of all the groups involve. Perhaps an earlier initiative should have been made although, admittedly, as the report shows, the signs were not propitious; but, possibly, earlier initiative should have been made to try to reconcile differences and arrive at a common approach to these issues.

However, I am bound to say, since I am speaking on their behalf, that the group did make every effort. They withdrew amendments; they quickly agreed to sub-amendments, they never called for a vote; and when they were faced with the prospect of having no resolution, they supported an initiative to withdraw their amendments, and, did so.

The first resolution to which I have referred involved no sectional or regional special interests. It would have assisted all workers and harmed none and therefore there was a reasonable hope that it would be adopted. We were not as optimistic about the second or the third resolution; but in the event, we have no opportunity of knowing whether progress could have been made.

The question is: What conclusions should be drawn? I support largely what has been said by the two previous speakers. It is clear that the work of the Committee has not, on this occasion, contributed to the amelioration of any human problem – oppression, poverty or health. However, I do not believe that this means that the Resolutions Committee cannot function. I do not join in those councils of despair that say that this proves that it cannot be done.

Most of the problems tackled by this Organisation arise from human failings – cruelty, ignorance and others. We have to ask ourselves how we can assist with those problems if we cannot organise our own affairs sensibly. I think that Governing Body should examine this question and I think all the delegates here should examine it and reflect on the situation.

In the old trade union fields, there is the picture of the manager, and I do not of course, address Mr. Castle or any of his colleagues, but far less progressive managers than these – the type who has a sign over his desk which says "Be reasonable – see it my way". We cannot afford to adopt that attitude. We have also to try to see the other person's point of view; and within the Workers' group I am bound to say that there were encouraging aspects of this Committee on which we shall hope to build.

Finally, I would like to thank the Chairman of the Committee and join Mr. Castle in his tributes to him. I would also like to thank Mr. Castle for his co-operation and friendliness and, of course, the secretariat; and it is my sincere hope that we can improve on this report next year.

Original – German: Mr. MARTINEK (Government delegate, Austria) – The Austrian delegation wishes to note that it would have liked to see the adoption today of as many resolutions as possible, and in any case, of the first three resolutions. We feel that, in view their very topical subject-matter relating to the work of our Organisation, the resolutions that were discussed this year could have been an important, and even a decisive contribution to the activities of the ILO.

In this connection, we should like to express our special thanks to all those in the Committee itself, and behind the scenes, who endeavoured to find a compromise solution. We sincerely hope that the contacts that have been made in this way will continue to be used in coming months and will enable us, at the 77th Session of the International Labour Conference, to achieve a result that will be satisfactory to all. I feel that a great deal of work remains to be done to this end. The Austrian delegation is willing to support all efforts in this direction.

Original – Spanish: Mr. de ROJAS (Government adviser, Venezuela) – I am making this statement on behalf of not only of my own delegation, but of many of the countries who sponsored the resolution concerning development foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisations, as well as other countries which, although they did not sponsor the resolution, gave it their support from the outset. This statement will sound rather bitter, but that has unfortunately become necessary.

We have found it necessary to make a declaration on this occasion to express publicly our dismay and disappointment at the fact that for the second time the International Labour Conference has been prevented from adopting any resolutions.

Our disappointment is all the greater since my delegation was the sponsor of one of the most important drafts submitted to the Conference for consideration. Venezuela, together with Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua and Suriname, submitted to this Conference the resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the ILO. As is known, this resolution received broad support from every sector of the Conference from the outset. Our resolution, which sought to continue the action started three years ago by this same Conference, at a time when the problems created by the foreign debt are causing increasing difficulties in the developing countries and are making the living conditions of the working populations of all our countries worse, received a frankly favourable reception and was ranked second in the order of priorities established by the Resolutions Committee.

It is not our intention to apportion responsibility. I think that is unnecessary because all those present here know perfectly well why it was not possible this year to adopt any resolution yet again. We believe, however, that we must express our opinion that the main cause of this situation resides in the archaic, anachronistic and obsolete procedure which governs the work of this Conference, and particularly the machinery for the adoption of resolutions.

The experience of the last three weeks, during which the Resolutions Committee should have completed the study and approval of at least the three or four resolutions which received top priority, leads us to believe that the time has come for the ILO to consider seriously whether it is not time to amend its procedures, particularly as regards the machinery for the consideration and adoption of resolutions. To our mind, the procedure followed by this Organisation is archaic because it has remained unchanged ever since the Organisation was set up. It is anachronistic because it does not correspond to the new realities of the world nowadays. It is obsolete because it is completely out of phase when you compare it with the international parliamentary procedures created after the Second World War.

But that is not all. The standard procedures applied by the International Labour Conference are completely lacking in openness and are managed in a clandestine fashion which makes it impossible to take decisions in a democratic atmosphere. We should add that the present procedure results in a considerable waste of time, efforts and resources.

The most obvious expression of this resides in the fact that after three long weeks of meetings, during which delegations actively participated and made serious and praiseworthy efforts to further our work and during which we had the benefit of all the services of the Conference – rooms with all the necessary facilities, interpretation, translation, production of documents, etc – after these long weeks we find that all these material and financial efforts have been useless because the work of the Resolutions Committee did not lead to any conclusive results and no resolution was produced.

At this time, when many of our countries are going through financial difficulties leading to drastic economic austerity measures, it is really a paradox that an international organisation should engage in the luxury of wasting resources as the ILO has done as a result of the working methods and the procedures applied.

My delegation considers that this situation requires serious reflection because the credibility and the prestige of the Organisation may be adversely affected.

We therefore wish to call on the member States of the ILO, and particularly the member countries of the Governing Body, to consider the desirability of starting a revision process of the procedures applied at this Conference for the adoption of resolutions, in order to make them more flexible, more open and more suited to the realities of the world today. All this, of course, bearing in mind the need to maintain the tripartite nature of the Organisation and a proper balance in the weight of each of the three sectors in the decision-making machinery.

Mr. MOHAMED (Government delegate, Somalia) – As I am speaking for the first time from this rostrum, may I be permitted to congratulate you on your well-deserved and unanimous election as the President of this very important Conference.

Allow me on behalf of the tripartite delegation of Somalia to express our dissatisfaction and disappointment at the outcome of the work of the Resolutions Committee of the Conference. We regret very much that the Committee is once again presenting to the Conference its report without any resolution annexed to it for adoption. It is almost becoming the tradition of the Committee to conclude its work without success. As a member of the co-sponsors of the resolution No. 3 concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, we were hoping that the Committee would demonstrate a spirit of good will and understanding and adopt a number of important resolutions before it. The resolution concerning environment, development and employment, and the resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation also dealt with subjects of high priority and they were welcomed and fully supported by my delegation. It was regrettable, however, that the Committee adopted only the first six preambular paragraphs of the first resolution after two weeks of busy work. Of course, when a resolution is submitted by any group, it is discussed and amended by the others with a view to improving it and bringing it into line with the competence of the ILO and in conformity with the procedure.

But the strange thing was that the majority of the amendments submitted to the Committee on the first resolution came from some of its co-sponsors, which caused us a considerable loss of time. We can only feel pity that on the 70th anniversary of the ILO, we have been unable to adopt one single resolution marking the Organisation's achievements and commitments to the basic principles and objectives set out in its Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia. We can only urge that we look to the future and discourage the ill-will and unprotective spirit that developed in the Resolutions Committee last year when the Arab group first submitted the resolution on the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. The tactics of delaying and abusing the provisions of the Standing Orders of the Conference employed by some minority delegations are unacceptable to my delegation and indeed wasteful of our time and energy. We hope that the future sessions of the Conference will be able to adopt some of the important resolutions tabled for the last two years by the different groups.

In conclusion, my delegation would like to express its sincere thanks and congratulations to the Chairman and the other Officers of the Committee who unreservedly did their best to bring the work of the Committee to a successful outcome. We also thank the delegates who contributed in a positive way to the discussions in the Committee in order to adopt a greater number of resolutions.

Original – Arabic: Mr. SAID (Government delegate, Iraq) – In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate! Firstly, might I address myself to Mr. Sami Glaiel, Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, and express to him our gratitude and our recognition of the competence and skill with which he chaired our Committee.

The Asian group made a very good choice when they proposed him to this post and in the Arab group, that it is my honour to represent; we consider that the competence shown by Mr. Glaiel is an honour to our group.

This is the second consecutive year that our Resolutions Committee has not been able to adopt important resolutions – resolutions that were considered as being of priority to the Conference.

This situation creates an unfortunate precedent and we feel bound to express our regrets and our sadness. We have to think very carefully and examine our consciences so that we can put an end to the abuse of procedures and techniques that are being used, which not only result in a waste of time and money but prevent the Conference from expressing its sincere desires on questions that are of vital importance to the members of this Conference.

This year, everybody in the Resolutions Committee had a clear desire; there was no ambiguity: there were three very important and urgent issues that were of a priority nature because the members of the Committee realised that the Conference had to participate and co-operate in making a constructive effort to propose appropriate solutions to the most urgent questions with which we are confronted – particularly since the Conference this year is commemorating the 70th anniversary of the founding of the International Labour Organisation. Indeed, it is commemorating seventy years' work and perseverance in the field of rights, liberties, working conditions, human dignity and the value of work.

The first three resolutions concerned: environment, development and employment; development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the International Labour Organisation; and the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories. These resolutions crystallise and give concrete expression to the interest shown by the international community in these questions at this crucial stage in history. Taking this unanimity into account, we would have thought that energies would have been mobilised and contacts entered into, with the best intentions, in order to be able to achieve resolutions that were acceptable to all, together with other resolutions that might serve the interests that we have.

In the Arab group and in the three subgroups of the Arab group, we have spared no effort since the beginning to express our determination and our will to speed up the work of the Committee because we knew how important these resolutions really were. With this good will, other countries in the non-aligned movement participated with us; there was also a fairly large number of Western countries to whom we would like to pay tribute here for the courage that they showed in adopting the right position.

What was the position of the other groups with respect to this good will? What was their position on this question that concerns man today? First, we were very surprised as regards the first resolution on the environment. More than 100 amendments were submitted – of which some amendments on the substance of the resolution were presented by the Arab group; however, there were no more than 40 such amendments and they were aimed at strengthening and enriching this resolution, making it more balanced and bringing it in line with the situation existing today in the world. The same applies to the amendments presented by Third World countries. All these amendments were aimed at strengthening this resolution as the countries concerned had not been involved in its formulation.

However, amendments were presented by those who had, in fact, participated in the merging of the resolutions.

Furthermore, to speed up the work of the Resolutions Committee, the Arab Group, during the different meetings – either individually with members of the IMEC group, or in meetings with the group of Latin American countries – expressed its readiness to withdraw its amendments on the understanding that there could be a consensus and that serious efforts would be made to speed up the work of the Committee so that it could conclude its work in the best possible way by adopting the largest possible number of resolutions; in particular the resolutions that had been given priority by the Committee. I am referring particularly to the resolution concerning the debt, which is very important for the Third World countries; and the resolution concerning Palestine which has the support of the international community. We would have liked to achieve satisfactory results for all, but unfortunately our efforts met with no positive response. Furthermore, and taking our initial position into account, the Arab group did not present any amendments regarding the second resolution concerning the debt because the Arab group was convinced that this resolution was balanced and objective and in line with the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1986. We were amazed that there amendments on this resolution – 70 in fact – and their purpose was to scarp the resolution and remove any meaning from it. One of these amendments even asked for a change in the title of the resolution deleting the term “debt” and replacing it by “economic recovery”.

An objective comparison between the results of the work of the Committee this year and those achieved last year enables us to draw lessons from what has happened and to reach conclusions.

Firstly, there is a minority of very important countries, which bear considerable responsibility in the field of international co-operation and which place themselves at the forefront of the defence of human rights. This small minority merely resorts to filibustering in order to prevent the adoption of any international resolution that does not fit in with its positions or correspond to its policies. Secondly, there is a small limited minority of member States of the Organisation that quite illogically and without any reasonable justification is opposed to the rights and freedoms of workers in Palestine. This small minority urges the International Labour Organisation not to assume its full responsibility with respect to these rights and liberties. It is as if this Organisation, which has a very noble humanitarian mission, were prevented from implementing its policies and carrying out its activities. This minority is preventing the Conference from expressing its will. The question therefore arises: in whose interest is the Conference prevented from speaking freely, and the majority from expressing its views, whether on the debt question or on the rights and freedoms of the citizens of Palestine, who are suffering from the inhuman and degrading treatment which is a violation of their dignity? If we recall what has happened over the last ten years, we see that this minority is always the same and has resorted to filibustering in order to prevent the Conference from adopting any resolution that condemned Israeli practices, which are contrary to all resolutions and international rules and which violate the rights of workers and people in Palestine that are in a situation of Israeli occupation and colonisation.

In 1978, 1982, 1983 and 1988, the Conference was unable to condemn violations of human rights and the breach of the Organisation's rules. We therefore ask again – are not Palestinian human rights, particularly those of Palestinian employers and workers, part of human rights in general? Human rights, which are foremost among the priorities of the ILO. We also ask another question: does Israel, as an occupying authority, enjoy special privileges or special treatment? Should not this mean that an attempt is being made to avoid condemning Israel every year, which simply encourages it to continue its policies and its inhuman practices against the Palestinians in Palestine and the occupied territories. This subject, however, will remain on the agenda of the International Labour Conference as long as occupation and colonisation continue in Palestine and the occupied territories.

We would appeal to the minority which extends its hegemony to this Organisation to change its tactics, and its attitude, which are contrary to human rights in the Third World, whether they concern the debt problem or human rights and freedoms in the world. This minority, because of its position in the International Labour Organisation, having contributed to the setting up of the Organisation and to the safeguarding of the Organisation's objectives, bears a very heavy responsibility regarding human rights, irrespective of race, religion or national origin.

We must strengthen the capabilities of the Palestinian so that he can stand up to Israeli occupation. This is not only a responsibility of the Conference, which is the highest level of authority in this Organisation. The other bodies of the Organisation must enable it to assume this responsibility, particularly the Governing Body and the International Labour Office, which both together and individually bear constitutional and organisational responsibility in this respect. We would welcome any serious initiative taken by the Governing Body and the Director-General that would enable us to improve the effectiveness of the International Labour Organisation so as to put an end to social injustice and the violation of the rights of the Palestinian people.

We hope that initiatives will be taken and will be developed so that adequate attention may be given to this problem, because all the different bodies work together in this Organisation. Concerted action would be one of the positive elements of the work done by the International Labour Organisation, which endeavours to discharge its responsibilities as regards the protection and safeguarding of the rights and freedoms of Arab employers and workers in Palestine and the other occupied Arab territories, until an end is put to Israeli occupation and colonisation.

The PRESIDENT – I must suspend our debate on this matter in order to proceed to a record vote on the Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries.

FINAL RECORD VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES IN INDEPENDENT COUNTRIES

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item on our agenda and shall now proceed to the final record vote on the Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries.

(A record vote is taken.)

(The detailed results of the vote will be found at the end of the record of this sitting.)

The PRESIDENT – The result of the final record vote on the Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries is as follows: 328 votes in favour, 1 against, with 49 abstentions. As the quorum is 249, I have the pleasure of informing you that the Convention is adopted.

(The Convention is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – It is my honour and pleasure to invite Mr. Michel Hansenne, Director-General of the ILO, to give his reply to the discussion of his Report.

Original – French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – It is my privilege and great pleasure this morning – for the first time in fact – to reply to the discussion of the Director-General's Report, Recovery and employment.

Very many of you participated in the discussion this year: 274 spoke, amongst whom there were 103 ministers. I would like to thank all of those who took the floor for their observations and comments, which, of course, will be a considerable source of inspiration to the Office.

The Conference session now drawing to a close has marked the 70th anniversary of our Organisation. This was celebrated during a ceremony attended – and we are particularly grateful to him for this – by Mr. Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, the President of the Swiss Confederation. In a forward-looking speech Mr. Delamuraz told us of his certainty “that we are on the path to a new world, provided that we can renew a vital impetus where obscuratism or violence have repressed it”. It was, he added, for the ILO to play a leading role in humanising this new world and – and I quote, “in imparting hope to every person, in reminding governments of respect for their obligations and in encouraging the social partners to find imaginative, consistent solutions”. As Mr. Delamuraz said, I believe – and I said so at the time, that if the Organisation wishes to remain true to itself it must also be capable of imagination in finding new solutions to the problems arising today. Faith and imagination, continuity and inventiveness – these I am sure, are the qualities that will enable the ILO to adjust to a changing world but a world which has to be all the more caring towards the working world.

Faith and imagination, I believe, determined the spirit that guided the Committee on the Use of Chemicals Substances, which was carrying out a first discussion of these questions with a view to the adoption next year of a Convention and a Recommendation which would be particularly welcome. Despite many difficulties – and night work – the same spirit quite clearly guided the Committee entrusted with re-examining the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) and with elaborating if possible new instruments on night work conditions for men and women in all branches of economic activity. This discussion was of great importance and I am happy that this Committee was able to conclude its work successfully.

Continuity and inventiveness also prevailed in the discussion, which at times were on extremely sensitive issues, in the Committee on Convention No. 107. I would recall that this Committee had to deal with the partial revision of a 1957 instrument on indigenous and tribal populations. The question was complex, as had been demonstrated by the discussions last year. The multiplicity of the problems covered by the proposed text in a particularly sensitive area where passions are quickly aroused made the work difficult.

It is therefore all the more satisfactory that we can record the success of this work, which is of concern to something like 300 million human beings, of various races and cultures, in dozens of countries and all regions of the world.

In preparing a Convention on new problems or in adjusting old instruments to new realities, I believe that our Conference has fulfilled its mission.

The Conference also paid a well-deserved tribute to Mr. Blanchard for his role within the ILO, and particularly during the 15 years when he was at the head of the International Labour Office. But the best tribute paid to him, surely, was the virtually unanimous adoption of the programme and budget for the next two years. We have rarely witnessed such a consensus, and I do not need to tell you that this tribute to my predecessor is for me also a source of considerable satisfaction at the beginning of my term of office.

This spirit of dialogue and the desire to find solutions to even complex and sensitive problems also characterised the work of other Committees. This was for instance the case of the Committee on Action against Apartheid. The Committee this year, for the first time, was to monitor the implementation of the Declaration concerning Action against Apartheid in South Africa and Namibia. I very much hope that the appeal by that Committee that we should support the United Nations Secretary-General in the difficult and delicate task of implementing Security Council resolution 435 will be heard. If the process that is to lead Namibia to independence continues without encountering major obstacles, we can hope very soon to welcome to the Conference a tripartite delegation chosen in full freedom by the people of that country.

I wish I could express the same optimism as regards the abolition of apartheid in South Africa itself. However that may be, our effort will continue untiringly and I shall be proposing to the Governing Body in the next few days some names for the group of independent experts called on to monitor and supervise the implementation of sanctions and other measures against apartheid; I shall also, naturally, be sending the message that the Conference entrusted me to transmit to the authorities of South Africa, urging them to put an end to this shameful situation and particularly to lift the state of emergency and free all detainees, particularly trade unionists.

The Committee on the Application of Standards was able, in a generally calm atmosphere, to play its unique role which consists in engaging in constructive tripartite dialogue so as to help member States to make progress in meeting their obligations in respect of ILO instruments. For we must not forget that going beyond the texts whose observance the supervisory bodies are entrusted with monitoring, it is the freedom, dignity, conditions of existence and sometimes even the lives of men, women and children that we have to safeguard and protect. The Committee's role doubtless appears more fundamental than ever at a time when, in various parts of the world, we are horrified to record daily, brutal violations of the most sacred rights of the human being.

This spirit of consensus, as you know, did not prevail in the Resolutions Committee. For the second consecutive year the Office will not be able to find in your work the source of inspiration on which it has so frequently drawn in the past. In view of what took place, I think it is worth while advancing a few considerations.

The Resolutions Committee of your Conference is no special forum or rostrum. The Committee is an integral part of our Organisation. Based as it is on tripartism, it calls for consensus and there can be no winners and no losers. And those who forget this will always condemn it to sterility. Do you really believe that that is the fate which we should reserve for it?

Before saying a few words on economic recovery and employment, which is the theme of the Director-General's Report this year, I should like to refer to the Appendix to that Report which concerns the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories. Like my predecessor, I am very sensitive to the fate of these workers because the problems there have worsened. Many speakers have talked of the need for the whole situation to move towards an overall settlement that would ensure peace in those lands. For my part, I intend to continue the action undertaken 11 years ago by the ILO in its field of competence. I shall even try to strengthen it. I trust that the ILO will be able to continue to benefit from the co-operation of all parties and that we shall see all the recommendations put forward in this Report applied in full.

But let us return now to recovery and employment, the general theme proposed for your attention this year: an essential theme, too, as the numerous statements that it has provoked have shown. It is not the first time – far from it – that we are speaking of employment in the ILO. Indeed, the Organisation's efforts in this field go back a long way. Need I recall, for example, the launching of the World Employment Programme in 1969, the World Conference on that subject in 1976 and the adoption of recent instruments such as the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169), or the Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention (No. 168) and Recommendation, 1988 (No. 176). This emphasis is not surprising. Employment constitutes a vital link between the economic and social spheres. Employment is not only a decisive factor in production, it also determines the citizens' standard of living and contributes to their integration in society. For the ILO, employment thus constitutes a necessary precondition for the development of workers' rights and social justice.

But while it is not the first time that the ILO has touched upon this matter, we must speak of it again today because the world has changed and continues to change very rapidly. Technological change, financial imbalances and new demands for international competitiveness force us to address the question once again and analyse the sometimes devastating effects of these and other factors on employment. Very many of you have spoken in this discussion. How can your speeches be summed up and, above all, what conclusions can we draw?

First, the problem of recovery and employment is universal, in that it arises in almost all countries, large or small, rich or poor. Many of your statements demonstrate this. Here are just a few examples. The United States Secretary of Labor, Mrs. Dole, pointed out that growth is not everything, it is not the sole aim. She explained to us that she had undertaken a policy of "growth-plus", that is to say continuous economic growth linked with the adoption of measures to help those who lack sufficient education and training to obtain the necessary motivation and qualifications for employment.

The Vice-President of the USSR State Committee on Labour and Social Questions, Mr. Tchechenko, explained, for his part, that the radical "perestroika" in the economy which is under way in his country necessarily involves the closure of unprofitable production units, a reduction in administrative staff and the release of a certain number of workers. The Government of his country is therefore making every effort to create new jobs, is taking measures for retraining and has set up a vast local network of placement centres.

Another statement that I should like to mention is that of Mr. Castro, Government delegate of the Philippines, who expressed his agreement with the idea that economic growth, while simplifying the task of reducing poverty and promoting social progress, does not guarantee that these social aims will be achieved. Economic growth, he told us, should be the means of ensuring the improvement of the life of each individual. What we want to see today in my country, he added, is growth in justice, which is a more difficult objective to attain.

And the Government delegate of Ecuador, Mr. Leoro Franco, insisted on the fact that intensive employment policies should inevitably be accompanied by measures of economic adjustment. He said in that connection that crash employment programmes for the development of small undertakings in the marginal areas of towns and the countryside were encouraged by his Government.

My first point was that it is a universal problem.

My second is that although the problem is universal, it does not arise everywhere in the same terms, so complicated and difficult to analyse is the nature of the links between growth and employment. While we can with difficulty conceive of lasting employment development without economic growth, a policy of growth cannot be pursued with the easy assumption that employment will automatically follow. Growth is a necessary condition, but it is not, or not always, a sufficient condition of employment.

And we, I mean the International Labour Organisation and its Office, are we capable of meeting the varying needs which form the subject of your concern? What can we do? In reply to these questions let us pass under review some of the most frequently mentioned situations.

Some countries have real growth but do not create sufficient employment or fail to provide with employment particularly vulnerable groups of people: the young, women and older workers. Other countries still register a low or zero rate of growth and continue to grapple with the problems of development. Yet others have implemented policies aimed at restoring growth but which have had, and continue to have, in the short term at least, negative effects on employment.

Why is economic growth seen in terms of employment recovery, whereas in fact it has brought in its wake only a low level of employment creation or even increased unemployment?

There is no universal explanation. National conditions are too varied and too complex to allow easy generalisations. The international environment sets the tone for the possibilities of employment creation in particular regions or countries. It is certain, for example, that considerable external imbalances characterising the world economy – and I am thinking particularly here of the problem of external debt – must be taken into consideration and dealt with in the context of efforts towards lasting recovery. Further efforts are essential in order to determine carefully the conditions in which a country can change its national policy with an eye to the desired improvements.

Let us return however to the three categories that I mentioned a moment ago. As for the first category, there are certain features which often characterise the countries which have achieved success in combining growth and employment. Among these we should cite the capacity to mobilise domestic savings and to use them effectively. Mention should also be made of models which have generated both productive investments and foreign currency resources: we must also note the presence of a well-trained labour force, both highly skilled and adaptable.

It must be emphasised that the majority of these countries have been built around a developed, modern sector where the employment situation is characterised by manifest unemployment, unanswered offers of employment and a critical shortage of skilled labour. Active policies thus have a specific role to play on the labour market. They must necessarily include training, retraining, the mobility of the workforce, special employment programmes directed towards the most affected groups, and incitements, designed to motivate both workers and employers.

The second category, that of countries with a low rate of growth or zero growth, is characterised by a modern sector that is relatively insignificant and often very fragile. The highly structured sectors of employment account for only a small portion of the labour market. Whilst the productive capacities of these economies must be sustained in order to develop, (and policies relating to the employment market should provide support in this respect), it is clear that modern urban sectors, especially those depending on the public sector, have often reached their limit of absorbing surplus labour.

In these countries, while unemployment increases, the classical problems, low incomes and low productivity – what we call underemployment – constitute permanent factors in the situation in the informal rural and urban sectors. There again, experience has shown that when the spirit of enterprise can develop and where dynamic policies encourage sustained growth, the number of productive jobs and the income of the poorest workers can be increased.

With regard to the informal sector, such a policy generally implies the renunciation of the administrative regulations and restrictions which unnecessarily impede activity, and the support of access to loans, to training, to appropriate technologies and to markets. These measures all aim at strengthening the productive machinery and the links with the modern sector.

The capacity of the rural sector to produce and to absorb manpower can be greatly consolidated when systems of incentives including adequate production prices are envisaged, when land ownership becomes more equitable and when production techniques become more efficient. The present concerns about certain short-term economic adjustments should not allow us to lose sight of the essential objectives of the long-term development of predominantly rural economies.

In the countries of the third category, where the policies to re-establish growth have had negative effects upon employment, structural adjustment policies have been implemented which, on a short-term basis at any rate, have brought about considerable cuts in jobs. A short-sighted financial and economic analysis has brought about catastrophic consequences; first of all from the point of view of unemployment and consequently from the social point of view, also from the political point of view and inevitably from the point of view of adjustment policies themselves.

In the countries of the third category there is an urgent need to combine structural adjustment with an equitable growth model which will lead to an increase of employment and reduction of poverty. I believe that the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment held in November 1987 provided an initial global reflection on how to achieve this aim. I would like to stress once again how imperative it is for macroeconomic policies to be supplemented by micro-economic policies aimed at improving the distribution of resources and their efficient utilisation. In this process, a substantial part of the new investments must be directed towards strengthening the productive capacity and increasing the productivity of low-income groups. These are some of the situations described in your speeches during this Conference. Facing the diversity of these situations, I will ask once again the questions I asked earlier: are we, the ILO, capable of responding to the different needs which you are concerned about? What can we do?

I am convinced that the ILO has a central role to play in response to these situations. The Organisation, to my mind, has two trump cards: firstly, its capacity to master and to analyse the problems of labour markets; and secondly, our tripartite structure.

First trump card. Labour market policies are within our sphere par excellence. A sphere where only too frequently, structural reforms are proposed without sufficient knowledge of the ways in which these markets function in the different countries of the world. We gained this knowledge after many years of experience. We are able to link labour market policies to macro-policies because this constitutes an essential component of any structural adjustment programme. Our experience in the labour market is available to all.

The ILO's second strength is tripartism or, in other words, actual participation of the social partners. A number of you have expressed appreciation of the emphasis placed in the report on dialogue and tripartite consultations. We know the great extent to which the debate on the definition of policies, which was carried out by the Employers' and Workers' groups in the Governing Body's Committee on Employment, has served to stimulate the Office and to encourage it to deepen its own analysis and to identify the fields in which a consensus seems to exist.

We must continue to improve our performance in the fields of employment and tripartism. First and foremost, we must export our knowledge and our expertise in both of these fields at the national level. Tripartism, in particular, has a crucial part to play in overcoming the crisis, and it is a key factor in the full implementation of an effective policy in this field.

At the country level, the ILO today offers advanced solutions culled from experience and reflection. In response to requests formulated by governments, the Office sets up special programmes in the field of employment. You are familiar, for instance, with those which are based on intensive utilisation of manpower and local resources in order to build rural infrastructures. Other programmes have been designed to create employment, boost productivity in the traditional sectors and treat the problems raised by a lagging public sector. In one word, the ILO must help countries to find appropriate solutions with the aid and the active involvement of the social partners. The Organisation will undoubtedly pursue these types of activities in the future, because the number of requests for aid continues to increase.

However, and this must be recalled time and time again, the ILO cannot act alone. It is impossible to dissociate the labour market from an overall development policy, on the one hand, and from financial readjustment policies, on the other hand. The ILO has, of course, always felt concerned by development policies. Recently, it has stressed the importance of financial policies in the employment field. This was a specific role of the High-Level Meeting on Employment and Structural Adjustment.

- It is certainly not up to the ILO to solve all the economic problems, particularly the monetary and financial ones, which stand in the way of world development. However, structural adjustments, which are inevitable and even desirable, not only for the solution of the debt problem, but also within the framework of any growth process, from which they are undissociable, have short and long-term social implications that our Organisation cannot ignore.

The importance of close international co-operation in the economic field seems unquestionable if the social objectives of our Organisation are to be reached. This co-operation is essential first of all in a situation where the problem of foreign debt continues to dominate the international scene and North-South relations, thereby jeopardising the future of world economic development as you have debated at length. But it is also essential at this particular point in time when, in New York, the international community is grappling with the future of the world in the context of the preparatory work for the International Development Strategy for the nineties. This is an opportunity for all, and for us in the ILO in particular, to look towards the future and to contribute to the emergence of a new understanding of development and of world solidarity, but also and mainly to encourage the trend which is growing, to place man at the centre of development. The positions you have expressed in this forum will help us and give us the authority to contribute to promoting in this context the prime importance of man in development. The ILO's active role in this respect was outlined eloquently by Jean-Pascal Delamuraz. He observed that the ILO's fate is bound up with that of other organisations and he pleaded for cohesion among them "so that major world-wide actions are not, or no longer, accomplished in a dispersed fashion contingent on sectoral circumstances, but are the result of global, concerted and logical undertakings".

This plea concerns us directly. It is indeed up to us to step up our action and to make our specific voice heard, the voice of the employers and the workers of the world, in order to bring about a reconciliation, in this new United Nations strategy, between the problems of development and those, just as real, connected with inevitable financial stringency.

In closing, please allow me, in a more general fashion, to return to the balance sheet which was drawn in connection with the Organisation's 70 years of existence. The ILO's impact and achievements have been stressed, but it is also important to turn to the future. We have found at this Conference that the objectives of freedom, social justice and improved living and working conditions, which are contained in the Constitution of the ILO and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, remain current issues. However, the content of labour and the context in which it is performed have obviously changed. These objectives and these changes constitute a challenge, or rather a series of challenges, for the ILO. This Organisation will have to resort to all its experience, all its knowledge and all its imagination to find new solutions to these problems which, although old, continue to arise in new forms today. I can assure you once again that I, for one, shall apply all my will and all my energy to their solution.

The PRESIDENT - I wish to thank the Director-General for his response to our discussion of his Report, and I would like to assure him of our considered view as to the importance of this Organisation and wish him well as he endeavours to keep the ship on course.

(The Conference adjourned at 12.45 p.m.)

Thirty-seventh sitting

Tuesday, 27 June 1989, 3.15 p.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

FINAL RECORD ON VOTE ON THE CONVENTION CONCERNING INDIGENOUS AND TRIBAL PEOPLES IN INDEPENDENT COUNTRIES (concl.)

The PRESIDENT – We shall now resume our work in connection with the final record vote on the Convention concerning indigenous and tribal peoples in independent countries. I shall now give the floor to the delegates who have expressed the wish to explain their vote. However, I would point out that we are not reopening the discussion on the matter, and I shall expect each speaker to limit his intervention to five minutes.

Mr. HOSSAIN (Government adviser, Bangladesh) – The delegation of Bangladesh welcomes and appreciates the efforts of the ILO to ensure that tribal and indigenous populations are treated fairly. We would like to reiterate the assurance of the Government of Bangladesh that it is totally committed to preserving and protecting the social, cultural and economic identity of the tribal peoples in Bangladesh. The strength of commitment of the Government of Bangladesh has been reflected in its ratification of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) and the recent legislation passed by the Parliament with a view to further strengthening the rights of tribal peoples and the machinery to enable them to manage their own affairs and preserve their socio-cultural heritage and separate identity.

While Bangladesh attaches great importance to the preservation of the socio-cultural and economic identity of tribal and indigenous populations through the provisions of Convention No. 107, it believes that any such Convention must draw a balance between national concerns and international standard-setting efforts.

My Government maintains that Convention No. 107 preserves this delicate balance between national interests and international responsibility. In the opinion of Bangladesh, this essential balance has not been adequately ensured in the new Convention, so that my delegation has had to abstain. We hope that this explanation of the vote of Bangladesh will be duly reflected in the Record of the Conference.

Mr. MALVIYA (Government delegate, India) – At the outset, I would like to mention that the question of partial revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) is of special significance for India which has a tribal population of nearly 60 million comprising almost one-fifth of the total indigenous and tribal populations in the world. I may also mention that India is one of the few countries which has ratified the Convention No. 107, doing so in 1958.

Our Constitution gives high priority to the protection of tribal populations as well as to their socio-economic development, in accordance with their ethos, customs, traditions and religious beliefs. The socio-economic enactments concerning the tribal populations in my country go beyond most of the provisions contained in the revised Convention which we have just adopted. Land laws have been enacted in all the states of my country preventing alienation of tribal lands. Our national forest policy seeks to involve the tribal population in the management and conservation of forest resources. Our state governments have formulated policies aimed at comprehensive rehabilitation of tribal populations displaced by major projects. Article 46 of the Indian Constitution enjoins on the state government special care to promote the education and economic interests of the scheduled tribes. The Fifth Schedule of our Constitution empowers the Governors to exclude any scheduled tribal area or a part thereof from the application of any state or central legislation. Tribes Advisory Councils constituted under the Fifth Schedule are consulted and fully involved in the formulation of policies for tribal development.

My delegation would like to reiterate that the tribal populations in India are not comparable in terms of their problems, interests and rights to the indigenous peoples of some other countries. Hence we have expressed our reservations on the use of certain expressions like “peoples”, “territories”, “treaties”, etc., which are not relevant to the tribal situation in our country. We are happy that Article 34 of the new Convention provides the desired flexibility to the nature and scope of the measures to be taken having regard to the conditions characteristic of each country.

Before I conclude, I must say that we do not have any major problem with the basic objectives of the new Convention, and the measures suggested therein are in conformity with the progressive tribal policy of my Government.

Mr. RICUPERO (Permanent representative in Geneva, Brazil) – The Brazilian Government delegation participated actively and constructively in the discussions of the Committee on Convention No. 107 with the objective of elaborating a text which would take account of the new reality regarding problems in this area and of the new solutions which are being proposed. To that end, we have been guided by the new Brazilian Constitution which embodies a great num-per of innovative and advanced principles on this matter, many of which were adopted at the initiative of representatives of the Brazilian indigenous communities.

During the discussions in the Committee, the Brazilian Government delegation stated that the new Convention deserves a better fate than Convention No. 107 – that is, the new Convention should be flexible and universal enough to enable a great number of States to ratify it. The poor performance of Convention No. 107, which only 27 States ratified, could and should be considerably improved on.

The tripartite system that characterises the ILO and the methodology adopted by the Committee in its work led to the approval of many provisions of the new convention as a package deal – a majority of its Articles being accepted with no discussion and no consideration of the amendements proposed. In the view of my delegation, this gave rise to a text that is in many regards technically imperfect and conceptually inadequate.

The reservations made by my delegation during the discussions of the Committee are well recorded in its report and I see no useful purpose in repeating them once again.

For all those reasons, after thoughtful and careful consideration, we decided that an abstention vote would be the best way of faithfully reflecting the difficulties and problems which this text presents to us and which are mainly of constitutional nature.

I request that this statement be fully reproduced in the Record of the Conference, as representing not only the position of the Brazilian Government delegation but equally that of the Employers' and Workers' delegates, who asked me that this statement should also be made on their behalf.

Mr. WHITAKER (Government adviser, Canada) – My delegation voted in favour of the new Convention on indigenous and tribal peoples because Canada subscribes to the objectives of revising the assimilationist and integrationist approach of the 1957 instrument and because there is much in the new Convention that we can support. However, my delegation has serious concerns about certain elements of the revised text, particularly as regards Articles 13(2) and Article 14. These concerns are outlined in some detail in paragraph 150 of the report of the Committee, which is contained in Provisional Record No. 25.

Original – Spanish: Mr. DUPONT (Government delegate, Argentina) – Argentina shares the pluralistic view of the new Convention and endorses the enactment of national legislation which recognises the cultural and social identity of indigenous peoples and the granting of land to indigenous peoples to indemnify them for land dispossessed in the past.

In August 1988, the Argentine Parliament adopted an Act on antidiscrimination which imposes penal sanctions on those who commit acts of discrimination on grounds of race, religion or political view.

We feel that this instrument also considerably strengthens the rights of the indigenous communities. But my delegation abstained from voting for the adoption of this Convention since the text contains Articles difficult for my country to accept due to their conflicting with certain aspects of our legislation and since they facilitate interpretations which are in violation of our national Constitution.

During the debate which took place in the Committee, the Argentine delegation expressed its difficulties in accepting the term “people” without a clause referring explicitly to the fact that the term has no implication with respect to the right to self-determination. The inclusion in Article 6, paragraph 2, of the words “consent” and “agreement”, as was pointed out in the debate of the Committee, also creates difficulties for my country since it enables interpretations which would violate the concept of equality of all citizens before the law, as laid down in our Constitution.

Finally, in the part on land, despite the progress made in the text, there remain (particularly in Article 15, paragraph 2) requirements for consultation and participation which do not exist in our legislation at a national level.

Original – Spanish: Mrs. SAIF de PREPERIER (Government adviser, Peru) – Peru is one of the 27 countries that ratified the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107); consequently, this international instrument is fully in force in my country.

Given the importance of this subject for Peru, our delegation participated actively in the revision of Convention No. 107 with a view to updating the text and improving it on a multilateral basis to promote the rights of indigenous and native populations and to guarantee these rights in the various countries. We also wished to ensure that, within the international community these populations would be able to develop fully and transmit their cultural heritage.

In my country, there is very progressive legislation along these lines and I must highlight the fact that most of the criteria laid down in the new Convention are already contained in our legal instruments. However, the work which has taken place within this tripartite forum – at an international level – has been of considerable significance and receives our full support.

In this context, after the prolonged negotiations which led to a consensus text, our delegation nevertheless felt bound to express reservations with respect to the use in the Convention of some terms which could lead to ambiguous interpretations and create difficulties with our laws in force, on some points of the highest importance. These reservations are laid down in paragraph 156 of the report of the Committee on Convention No. 107 which we approved yesterday.

The authorities of my country feel that this is a matter of the highest importance and, bearing in mind the reasons I have just given, we decided to abstain from voting. We took this decision so that any difficulties that might arise from this ambiguous interpretation – to which I have just referred – might be cleared up and negotiated in consultation with all national sectors and, above all, with the representative indigenous communities in my country.

This procedure is vital to ensure that our national Congress, where all forces and political sectors of Peru are democratically represented, may express its views on the action to be taken by my country with respect to this Convention.

I would be very grateful if this explanation of Peru's vote could be recorded in extenso in the record of this meeting.

The PRESIDENT – These explanations and qualifications have been taken into account and will be reported in the Provisional Record.

REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: DISCUSSION
(concl.) AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We now move on to the next item on our agenda this afternoon, which is the Report of the Resolutions Committee.

Original - Arabic: Mr. TLILI (Government adviser, Tunisia) – On behalf of the Government delegations of the non-aligned countries, I should like to make the following statement.

The agenda of this session of the Resolutions Committee included questions of great importance for the world of labour, such as the environment, employment and development, debt and the social objectives of the ILO, the situation of workers in the occupied Arab territories, the financing of delegations to the Conference and the role of undertakings in growth and employment.

Unfortunately, the report placed before the Conference today by the Resolutions Committee does not recommend the adoption of any resolutions.

For the second consecutive year, therefore, the Conference is asked to note the inability of one of its main Committees to achieve specific results on questions falling directly within the competence of the ILO and which, moreover, have already found a broad area of agreement in other international fora.

This is an extremely serious situation which is very detrimental to the activity and the image of the ILO throughout the world.

The consequences of such a situation, as concerns our Organisation itself, are evident.

This situation is, on the one hand, the source of a complete loss in terms of resources, time and energy, and for two sessions it has only contributed to creating a deplorable atmosphere of incomprehension and tension.

On the other hand, this situation reflects a certain serious paralysis in the Committee's work. This Committee is the sole organ provided for in the Standing Orders of the Conference to deal with questions on the agenda of the session at the direct initiative of delegations, questions which generally require urgent action on the part of our Organisation.

This is why it is imperative that special attention be paid by the Governing Body and the Director-General to this question in preparing future sessions of the International Labour Conference.

For its part, the Government group of the non-aligned countries considers that the action to be undertaken should take two forms.

Firstly, the procedure followed in organising the work of the Resolutions Committee would benefit from being reconsidered. In point of fact, some non-constitutional procedural rules concerning the timetable of the Committee and its working methods could be improved in view of achieving greater efficiency. The Governing Body should take the necessary measures to this end.

Secondly, the conditions in which the Committee started on its work during the last two sessions could not possibly favour the smooth running of the Committee's work. Certain member States questioned the validity of resolutions which were duly adopted by the International Labour Conference and, although these States represented only a minority, they were able to prevent, through their use of procedural techniques, the majority from expressing themselves.

A new climate of frank and constructive co-operation should prevail over our work in future. It is, therefore, desirable that the entire Organisation, including its competent bodies, participate fully in its realisation.

These are the preliminary views formulated by the Government group of the non-aligned countries as their contribution in the search for a solution to a situation which should not be repeated.

In a general manner we endorse the opinion expressed this very morning by the Director-General concerning the proper role of the Resolutions Committee. We agree with him that this Committee should not be the scene of a confrontation between winners and losers.

We attach great importance to the fundamental role of this Committee which is to determine majority views on topical issues which require urgent action on the part of our Organisation.

We are convinced that this Committee could, in future, perform its function, providing that its procedures and methods can be revised in the light of the unfortunate experiences which we have just been through.

The group on whose behalf I have the honour to speak represents the vast majority of member States of the ILO. You are very well placed to realise this Mr. President, because your country is at the present time at the head of the non-aligned movement. The positions of our group are shared by the overwhelming majority of Workers' and Employers' delegates.

In spite of this, it has not been possible to give these positions their proper expression in the conditions which would allow them to be included among the resolutions adopted by the Conference. This is a question of fundamental significance which the Governing Body and the Director-General should study with great care – and very quickly – to allow us to find the necessary solutions.

With regard to the report of the Resolutions Committee at present before us, we are of course in favour of its adoption because it contains a summary record of the discussion which clearly reflects the positions taken by the various groups on the first resolution and points very clearly to the responsibilities of each and everyone in the absence of tangible results.

The report shows very clearly that a number of developing countries, from the very first session, called for the adoption of the first resolution by consensus – this was in vain.

A large part of the report also bears witness to the rigidity with which some groups received the draft amendments tabled subsequently by delegates from developing countries.

The statement of the co-ordinator of the Government delegations of non-aligned countries, which is contained in paragraph 216 of the report, summarises perfectly the views expressed by the group concerning the way the work of the Committee evolved.

Before concluding, I should like to take this opportunity to thank all those among Government, Workers' and Employers' delegations who have expressed within the Resolutions Committee their solidarity with the position and the concerns of the developing countries.

Lastly, I should like to pay a very warm tribute to Ambassador Glaiel, Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, for his constant concern to ensure the application of the rules and his concern for impartiality and the patience which he demonstrated in executing his very heavy responsibility.

Mr. TAN (Workers' delegate, Philippines) – Last year, at the 75th Session of the Conference, the Resolutions Committee failed to approve a single resolution despite its hard work. Some delegates appeared satisfied and others dissatisfied with this situation, but in fact they all would have liked certain resolutions to be passed.

During the current session of the Conference, some delegates once again seemed to welcome the fact that certain resolutions were not passed while deploring the fact that others were not. However, all the delegates, those who spoke during the Committee hearings of their various groups and those who spoke here on this rostrum, manifested a sincere desire to see resolutions adopted.

The very purpose of the Resolutions Committee, after all, is to approve resolutions for adoption. Some ILO veterans told me a few nights ago that the Resolutions Committee is supposed to be a shock absorber. Well, a delegate from one of the developed countries, who had 25 years of experience in the labour movement, said during one of our last debates that this was the first session of the ILO Conference he had attended and he was really shocked. So the Resolutions Committee does not seem to be much of a shock absorber!

After attending this Committee for more than ten years I had to undergo a quadruple bypass! So, all levity aside, we, in the Resolutions Committee, must look at this matter seriously. We have to find a solution and we should seriously ask why we have no resolutions after two years. The Resolutions Committee is called a Resolutions Committee precisely because it is supposed to approve resolutions. It is expected to examine amendments and subamendments on the presumption that these have been submitted, in order to really improve the resolution proposed.

We know that we cannot avoid politics in the ILO and that there are national, regional and even personal interests sometimes involved in various activities of the Organisation. Yet I think we should all understand that these concerns should give way to the best interests and to the objectives of our Organisation. Many, many years ago, a man named Jesus Christ confronted a mob of angry people who were about to stone a prostitute, a woman engaged in the oldest profession in the world, and he spoke the following words to them: "He among you who has not sinned, let him cast the first stone". I wonder what Jesus Christ would say today to the Resolutions Committee.

Original – Arabic: Mr. NASR (Employers' adviser, Lebanon) – It is most regrettable that for the second consecutive year, the Resolutions Committee has not been able to adopt a decision. There is no reason to believe that the Committee's chances will be better next year.

To be honest, the reason for this failure could be that the first resolution submitted was lengthy and complicated and needed some improvement. A further reason could be that the second resolution elicited confrontation between two parties present. The party which opposed the resolution prevented it from being adopted by engaging in a lengthy discussion on the first resolution. A further reason could be that the opponents of the third resolution fought against it by introducing amendments to the first two resolutions. It may also be that more than one of the parties present in the Resolutions Committee wished to adopt a suicidal attitude by accepting the worst, not only for themselves, but for others as well.

The Committee's failure this year is not due to a specific reason which would make it possible to avoid it next year. I do not expect the participants in next year's Session of the Conference to be pure and well-intentioned. This is why I should like to put the following questions to you so that you can mull them over between now and next year.

Firstly should we abolish the Resolutions Committee, as repeated failure is both a tragedy and a comedy for the Organisation and for ourselves?

Secondly, should we change the working procedures within the Resolutions Committee to make the adoption of positive and negative resolutions compulsory? I believe this would be possible if the procedures were changed appropriately, otherwise we may expect a third year of failure.

I do hope that I shall hear a solution other than the pious hopes that have been expressed. I hope that God will inspire the participants of next year's Session of the Conference to submit resolutions which will neither arouse dissent nor require improvement.

However, I wonder what we shall do if God is too busy to hear our prayers!

I hope that we will all give some thought to these questions that I have just put to you and that we will succeed in finding useful solutions.

Original – Russian: Mr. TSYBA (Government delegate, USSR) – On behalf of the Government delegations of the group of socialist countries, I should like to set forth our views concerning the work of the Resolutions Committee.

We expected that the Committee would achieve positive results, bearing in mind that it had before it for consideration resolutions concerning important issues for workers the world over and to which high priority had been attached. I am referring above all to the resolution concerning environment, development and employment, which was submitted by a considerable number of Workers' representatives from Eastern European and other socialist countries. The wide range of sponsors and the top priority attached to this resolution show that the protection of the environment is recognised as being a problem of extraordinary global importance, in which the ILO is called upon to play an important role.

There was also a very important resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the ILO, which would have provided for a number of measures to be taken within the ILO framework for tackling the problems of foreign debt and intensifying social protection for the peoples of the developing countries by means of economic programmes of structural adjustment.

This is an extraordinarily serious and sensitive problem. So is that addressed by the resolution concerning the protection of the rights and freedoms of Arab workers and employers in Palestine and other occupied Arab territories, which was given third priority. For many years now, the Government of Israel has been continuing its repressive policy against the population of the occupied territories and violating the rights of the inhabitants of those territories. This resolution would have condemned Israel's inhuman policies in the occupied territories. Unfortunately, our hopes for the adoption of these resolutions, all of which were broadly supported in the Committee, were not realised.

The lack of any concrete results of the Resolutions Committee for the second year in a row causes us deep concern. It seems to us that the Committee is failing to carry out its functions, and measures will have to be taken to correct this state of affairs. Of course, the main reason for the unsatisfactory work of the Resolutions Committee is the political difficulties, which could be overcome only on the basis of dialogue and compromise. However, a direct role is also played by the organisational and procedural aspects of the Committee's work, which also need improvement.

In conclusion, I should like to thank the Chairman of the Committee, Ambassador Glaiel, and his Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Morton and Mr. Castle, who in difficult circumstances endeavoured to preserve a constructive atmosphere in the Committee and to advance its work to the extent that was practically possible.

Original – French: Mr. KUMBU-KI-LUTETE (Government adviser, Zaire) – This is the second consecutive year in which the International Labour Conference has to note the failure of the Resolutions Committee, a failure which is felt all the more at a session at which the ILO is celebrating the 70th anniversary of its founding.

The Conference had expected on this occasion resolutions corresponding to the aims of liberty and social justice for which the ILO was founded.

The Resolutions Committee was not able to fulfil the noble mission of the ILO to which it should have given concrete form. How could the Resolutions Committee on the 70th anniversary of this important international organisation allow itself such a failure?

The resolution concerning the 70th anniversary of the founding of the ILO and its future tasks in social and economic development could have confirmed the preponderant role played by the International Labour Organisation and reinforced this preponderance for the future. How was it possible for the Resolutions Committee to accept such a failure when the resolution concerning development, foreign debt and the social objectives of the ILO as a problem of international urgency was so important? The foreign debt has such a detrimental effect on the economic life of every developing country.

The ILO could have come forth as a leading actor on the international scene through the adoption of a resolution on foreign debt.

The condemnation of violations of human rights and the protection of the rights and freedoms of workers and employers wherever this is urgently necessary might have reasserted the role of the ILO on its 70th anniversary.

No, the role of the ILO must not be diminished. The absence of consensus within the Committee to allow it to fulfil its mission and to attain the ILO's objectives should not weaken the effectiveness of the Organisation.

The lack of dialogue, the divisions that have resulted in the last two years in the break-down of collaboration must be rejected. It is our duty to throw off such attitudes and to bring about the triumph of tripartism, which remains the cornerstone of success in the consultations of the ILO.

This present session of the Conference should recommend the Governing Body of the ILO to take practical measures at future sessions to enable the Committee to concentrate on questions falling more within the competence of the ILO. For future sessions, we should expect the Committee to adopt the key resolutions on which it is competent.

If the situation cannot be clarified for the next session, we feel that the questions of a highly sensitive nature should be dealt with by special committees in order to leave the Resolutions Committee to tackle questions of substance pertaining to the very foundation of the ILO.

Mr. DANIELI (Government adviser, Israel) – The basic purpose of our Organisation is to try to achieve harmony and co-operation in solving outstanding problems in the social domain of our society. It is predicated on the assumption that the inherent divergence of interests in the field of labour between all social partners engaged in it, namely workers, employers and governments, calls for a concerted effort to establish a constructive dialogue between them. Thus, the Organisation is structured on a tripartite basis which is unique among United Nations specialised agencies and its Constitution and Standing Orders provide for a whole system of checks and balances between each of the three components to ensure this constructive dialogue on issues which fall within the mandate of the ILO.

The Resolutions Committee most regrettably did not provide for such a constructive dialogue this time, though it had before it two resolutions of pressing universal significance which enjoy broad tripartite support. It failed to do so because some, actually a minority of delegates, were once more insisting on the tabling and adoption of a politically motivated resolution of a nature that is bound to cause only political confrontation and polemics to the detriment of the work of the Conference as a whole.

Listening to some expressions of sorrow and regret that the Committee made no progress this year, and reading through the carefully worded statements of some, one realises that the constructive work of the Committee and its positive results were much less important to those delegates than their failure to impose on the Committee the adoption of a resolution to which the Committee allocated a lower priority. The adoption of these lower priority resolutions became the sine qua non for the conclusion of any other business. There was no justification whatsoever to subjugate a Committee to political goals of which some extend far beyond ILO's competence.

Our world is afflicted with enormous economic and social problems and is confronted with yet unresolved heavy political and military conflicts. In the economic and social domain, many of us are engaged in an uphill struggle. One may inquire whether we have already exhausted consideration of all these grave problems in the Resolutions Committee and in the International Labour Conference, or which member States were rightly singled out for widespread practices such as child labour, forced labour, semi-starvation wages and even for the crime of slavery.

And what about the situation of workers in countries where workers' rights are not violated for the simple reason that these rights are non-existent, or the situation in countries that are closed to the world or are immune, by virtue of a political conspiracy of silence?

I take it that the replies to those questions are known to all of us. Delegates may have been asking themselves how the Resolutions Committee should discharge its duties as a forum for deciding and adopting important social policy measures for the benefit of the working population of the world. The solution is rather straightforward; resolutions of a controversial, political nature should be avoided, and all efforts, time and energy should be devoted to resolutions which enjoy the widest possible support and consensus.

May I conclude by expressing the hope of my delegation that future sittings of the Resolutions Committee will yield positive and constructive results.

Mrs. RUGE (Government delegate, Norway) – The Nordic governments were co-authors of the resolution on environment, development and employment and on this basis I should join the previous speakers who have expressed regret that the Conference was not able to pass a resolution which had received such wide support from a number of groups in this Conference.

However, I trust that this will not prevent the Organisation and its Members from continuing to give priority to the activities relating to the environment and development in their future work.

I would also like to agree with those who feel that this fall the Governing Body should start a thorough discussion of these two years' experience of the Resolutions Committee and join those who hope that next year we will be able to have an atmosphere in which the Committee and the Conference will be able to pass resolutions on the themes to which the members of the Conference give priority.

Mr. HILBURN (Government adviser, United States) – Like other delegations that have already taken the floor, I too regret that it was not possible for the Resolutions Committee to adopt any of the resolutions that were originally submitted to the Conference.

We believe that several of them, had they been perfected during the process of debate and discussion, could have made a contribution to the work of our Organisation. That was particularly true, we felt, of the combined resolution on the environment. As was the case with other members of the Committee, we submitted a few amendments to that resolution, in absolute good faith, for the purpose of trying to focus the text on areas within the ILO's mandate. It is unfortunate that circumstances prevented its adoption.

While we regret that no resolutions were adopted, we certainly do not believe, however, that such an outcome was the worst that could have occurred. Worse in our view would have been the adoption of resolutions that introduced extraneous political issues or ignored the ILO's existing mechanisms to ensure that due process is observed whenever member States are accused of violating worker rights. One of the most consistent elements in our policy towards the ILO has been the firm belief that the Organisation should not condemn member States except through procedures elaborated to monitor the implementation of Conventions and to investigate complaints.

As the debate was closing in the Resolutions Committee last Saturday, several delegates made statements regretting the impasse that had blocked the Committee's work. We share the regrets, but not their analysis of the causes nor the view of those who believe that the Committee Standing Orders should be revised. The problem, in our opinion, does not arise because of the mechanics of the Committee's procedures. On this point I might add, as an aside, that when the structure package comes into force, it will include a major change dealing with the Committee's work. Premature efforts to change it might be counterproductive.

However we do believe that the key to a revitalisation of the Committee lies in a renewed commitment on the part of all members not to use the Committee to further a political agenda and a commitment to limit the Committee's work to technical, social and economic issues clearly within the ILO's mandate and to conduct its debate with a view to achieving a genuine consensus. If these points form the basis of its work, we feel certain that the Resolutions Committee can go forward again in a productive manner with the support of all of us.

The PRESIDENT – I hear no further requests for the floor. If there are no objections, I take it that the report of the Resolution Committee is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – What remains for me to do is to thank the Resolutions Committee, its Chairman and Reporter, its Vice-Chairmen, and the rest of the members of the Committee and members of the secretariat for their efforts. I have nothing to add to what the Director-General said this morning on this particular Committee. It is quite clear that something has to be done, particularly in view of the fact that all the items which were discussed or raised merit our immediate attention if we are to make this planet a better world to live in.

Many speakers expressed the hope that in future, this Committee will submit resolutions to the Conference. I join them in their hope that we will see some important improvement at the 77th Session, and not a situation of self-condemnation. This Organisation will collapse or survive depending on how we apply ourselves to issues that are placed before us. Many questions were asked today. I am not going to ask for answers today, but I hope that at the 77th Session we will get suitable answers to those questions and put resolutions before the Conference.

(The Conference adjourned at 4.30 p.m.)

Seventy-sixth Session, Geneva, 1989

Thirty-eighth sitting

Wednesday, 28 June 1989, 10.15 a.m.

President: Mr. Nkomo

COMMUNICATION TO THE CONFERENCE

The PRESIDENT – Before we turn to our agenda, I will give the floor to the Clerk of the Conference to read a communication.

Original – French: The CLERK of the CONFERENCE – The communication in question is a letter that has been addressed to you by the Permanent Mission of Switzerland to the international organisations in Geneva. I will read it in French.

Mr. President,

Referring to the statement made by Mr. Sánchez Soriano, Workers delegate of the Dominican Republic, it is my honour, on behalf of my Government, to provide the following details regarding the incident he referred to.

Mr. Sánchez Soriano, who arrived in Geneva on Friday, 23 June 1989, was the subject of a simple identity check on Saturday, 24 June 1989, by two representatives of the police authorities, inasmuch as his capacity as a delegate to the 76th Session had not been established. Mr. Sánchez Soriano complied courteously with this identity check and none of his personal belongings were confiscated. It was never the intention of the Swiss authorities to limit in any way whatsoever the exercise by Mr. Sánchez Soriano of his functions within the context of the International Labour Conference, once his capacity as a delegate had been recognised.

If the Workers' delegate of the Dominican Republic considers that his physical and moral integrity have been violated, the normal legal channels remain open to him; however, it should be noted that the International Labour Conference is not the appropriate place to bring these allegations.

Please accept the assurance of my high consideration.

*(Signed) Mr. Adler, Minister,
Deputy Head of the Permanent Mission of Switzerland.*

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON NIGHT WORK: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – The first item on our agenda is the report of the Committee on Night Work. May I ask the officers of the Committee to please come to the rostrum: Mr. Suma'mur, Government delegate, Indonesia, Chairman of the Committee; Mr. Noakes, Employers' delegate, Australia, Vice-Chairman; Mrs. Dreifuss, Workers' delegate, Switzerland, Vice-Chairman; as well as Mrs. Walgrave, Government adviser, Belgium, Reporter.

I will now give the floor to Mrs. Walgrave, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Original – French: Mrs. WALGRAVE (Government adviser, Belgium; Reporter of the Committee on Night Work) – I have the honour to present to this assembly the report of the Committee on Night Work and the conclusions reached by the Committee.

The Committee's terms of reference were to consider a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), and new standards on night work for all workers, regardless of their sex.

The discussions took place under the effective and reassuring chairmanship of Mr. Suma'mur, Government delegate of Indonesia, with the valuable assistance of Mr. Dumont, the representative of the Secretary-General, and his team. On many occasions extremely useful assistance was also received from the Conference's legal advisers. I would like to thank all these people for having led this first discussion to a satisfactory conclusion in spite of the long hours of work that resulted from the very large number of amendments submitted.

The subject that we had to consider was not a simple one and reactions to it vary.

The representative of the Secretary-General presented Reports V(1) and (2) prepared by the Office, and in particular the Proposed Conclusions at the end of Report V(2), which provided for the revision of Convention No. 89 by means of a Protocol and for the adoption of a new Convention, supplemented by a Recommendation on night work in general, in accordance with the terms of reference determined by the Governing Body when it decided to include night work on the agenda of the Conference. A total of 90 governments responded – which is nearly a record figure in the standard-setting activities of the ILO. The interest aroused by the question also was reflected in the large number of members on the Committee (always between 142 and 188 members).

First and foremost I must point out that the Committee decided that the new provisions should be examined before the Protocol.

We began with a general discussion which had a considerable influence on our subsequent work.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman was against the adoption of new instruments on night work for a number of reasons.

They would limit the flexibility required for the smooth running of the economy and of business. To create obstacles would be detrimental to economic growth and development and would reduce possibilities for job creation, particularly in the services sector.

The allegedly harmful effects of night work had not been proven and were the subject of controversy.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman considered that the prohibition of night work by women in industry was an obstacle to economic and social progress. Convention No. 89 was discriminatory in that it denied equality of opportunity for women and created discrimination between women workers themselves. The Workers' Vice-Chairwoman, on the other hand, expressed the conviction that night work was "unnatural" work, which had a negative impact on the health of workers and was detrimental to their social and family life. This work had to be reduced, in her view, to the lowest possible level and it could not be justified solely by economic reasons. Furthermore, she maintained, employment arising out of night work often meant unemployment elsewhere.

The majority of the Committee eventually accepted two basic concepts which influenced the Proposed Conclusions.

Firstly, the idea that night work "allows for more intensive use of equipment and installations, thus helping to raise the productivity of undertakings create employment". Secondly the idea, reaffirmed in the Preamble by the Committee itself, that "night work is detrimental to health and disturbs the social life of workers. The drawbacks and hazards to which workers were exposed should be reduced and compensated".

These two premises, in fact, are in line with the great majority of the replies to the Office's questionnaire, as was recalled by the representative of the Secretary-General.

The Committee, while aware of the drawbacks, recognised the fact that night work was necessary and could not be abolished. A new point was discussed and adopted with a view to taking advantage of the progress of science and technology and of innovations in labour organisation to limit recourse to night work.

And now I come to the choice of the instruments. Before tackling the important points in the conclusions themselves, allow me to make a few preliminary comments:

Firstly, in accordance with the Office's proposal, the Committee decided that it was essential to guarantee workers a minimum degree of protection in the form of a Convention, comprising legal obligations, supplemented by a Recommendation providing broader information. Secondly, taking account of the fact that a Convention ought to contain general principles and be flexibly worded, the Committee accepted the principle of gradual implementation of the Convention's provisions to give it the flexibility that would facilitate ratification.

Thirdly, concerning the choice of a protocol, a number of governments expressed the view that this Convention was against equality and that, in fields where limitations and protection were necessary, the instrument should cover both men and women since harmful effects did not distinguish between the sexes.

A majority supported the formula of the protocol in order to meet the wishes of those who felt that the ban was discriminatory and restricted women's possibilities of employment.

They all took account of the growing need for labour, including female labour, for night work. The important thing was to find a balance and the right ratio between equality of opportunity and protection. This balance varied according to the history and traditions of each country.

And that brings me to the content of the instruments.

First of all, following the order of the discussions, the new standards, i.e. a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, on night work.

As regards the Convention, the Committee, on the Office's proposal, defined the terms "night", "night work" and "night worker". This was a particularly necessary discussion in view of the implications of the definitions on the obligations provided for in the Convention.

The minimum duration of the period designed by the term "night" was reduced to seven hours (instead of the eight proposed by the Office). It was left to the competent authority in each country to determine, after consulting the employers and the workers, how much of the night would have to be worked for it to be classified as "night work".

Similarly, it was left to the competent authority to determine the number of days in a calendar year that would have to be worked at night for the workers concerned to be considered as "night workers" (that is to say in the case of casual or seasonal night work).

The Committee considered that the Convention should be of general application and decided not to accept the Office proposal to exclude agriculture, stockbreeding, fisheries, maritime transport and inland waterway transport.

Limited categories of workers could be excluded after consultation of the representation organisations of employers and workers.

The Committee decided that measures should be taken to reduce drawbacks, eradicate hazards where possible and to afford adequate compensation.

Measures were thus taken to preserve the health of the workers. In this respect, the Committee agreed to include a point from the Recommendation in the Convention relating to assistance to workers who had accidents or fell sick during the night.

Similarly, measures were taken in order to ensure an alternative to night work for pregnant women or those who had just given birth – especially during the three months before and after childbirth. The position of women in society, in the light particularly of their reproductive functions, required special protection measures. The general discussion which preceded the adoption of these specific measures showed that there was a general consensus in the Committee: workers, employers and governments enjoyed a sense of unity.

A number of delegations affirmed that their countries would not be in a position to ratify a Convention if it contained a general ban on night work by women during the period preceding and/or following childbirth. Other countries had made a provision in their legislation for women themselves to have the right to choose their period of rest.

Thanks to the assistance of the representative of the ILO, the Committee found an intermediate solution to provide protection and give women greater freedom of choice in the safeguarding of their health and that of their newborn child.

Other working conditions were also discussed: compensating for the inconvenience of night work by a reduction of working time or by bonuses or extra pay. Social services should also be provided for.

Then the Committee adopted conclusions on the content of a Recommendation which reiterates the principles of the Convention and above all aims at developing the means referred to therein, particularly financial compensation, health, social services and other measures including the right to training, family life and trade union life.

The most important discussion concerned the section "Hours of work and rest periods". For instance, the Committee considered that an exception could be made to the eight-hour limit on normal daily hours of work when collective agreements make provision for special hours of work. The Committee was against notifying the competent authority of cases of doubling of shifts. It furthermore opposed considering the break or breaks granted in the case of night work for purposes of rest or meals as time actually worked.

Lastly, the Committee had a long discussion on the Protocol partially to revise Convention No. 89. The Protocol was intended to allow for exceptions to the ban on night work and for the introduction of changes in the duration of the night period by agreement between social partners, it being understood that such agreements could be negotiated only within a framework determined in advance by national legislation after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers.

Such an approach would allow States which have ratified Convention No. 89 to continue to adhere to it. It would pave the way to new ratifications. It would give countries anxious to have greater flexibility the possibility of making exemptions to certain provisions of the Convention.

The Workers' Vice-Chairperson defended the principle of a protocol because so long as women remained the victims of discrimination they would need specific protection.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman was not enthusiastic but defended the protocol because it was in accordance with the principle of equality of opportunity between men and women.

The majority of the Government delegates agreed with the reasoning of the employers and workers. The Committee unanimously decided that obstacles to the promotion of women in professional life, impeding their access to qualified professions, should be removed.

Three amendments aimed at giving national authorities the possibility of deciding for themselves where no agreement could be reached were, after a long discussion, rejected, because this would have deprived Convention No. 89 of its substance.

This then is a brief summary of the conclusions that the Committee proposes to you. But before leaving this rostrum, I would like to express my warm thanks to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Suma'mur and to the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairpersons Mr. Noakes and Mrs. Dreifuss, for the remarkable job they accomplished. My thanks also go to the Drafting Committee and to my colleagues the Government delegates. I should like to thank you, Mr. President, and the delegates here for giving me your attention and I commend the Committee's report together with the conclusions to the Conference. I invite delegates to adopt the resolution concerning the inclusion on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference of an item entitled "Night work".

Mr. NOAKES (Employers' delegate, Australia; Vice Chairman of the Committee on Night Work) - Mr. President, allow me to join with the many preceding speakers who have expressed their pleasure at your election to your position, and to congratulate you on the way in which you have steered our deliberations to their conclusion.

The Conference has before it the report and the conclusions of the Committee on Night Work. My task is to present to the Conference the views of the Employers' group on that report and those conclusions.

In undertaking that task I am compelled to make it clear from the outset that we do have strong and serious reservations about many of the decisions so far made by the Committee. We therefore cannot associate ourselves with major parts of the conclusions or with that part of the resolution which calls for next year's discussion to be conducted with a view to the production of a Convention and Recommendation on night work in general.

Let me say immediately that our major concern in relation to night work has been, and remains, the prohibition of night work for women in industrial undertakings, which is contained in the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). This prohibition is discriminatory and in conflict with the ideals of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111). It restricts equal opportunity for women in employment and reflects the thinking and practice of the past. As a result, a number of the member States which ratified the Convention have either denounced it or are considering denouncing it.

The Committee has decided to introduce a degree of flexibility into the Convention by means of a protocol allowing for exemptions and variations where these have been agreed upon between Employers' and Workers' representatives. We considered this to provide insufficient flexibility and proposed a further change which would give greater discretion to governments under defined conditions. Our proposal was rejected by the Committee, but we will pursue this matter further in next year's discussions with the aim of securing an appropriate degree of flexibility.

The greater part of the Committee's activity was taken up with the consideration of the issue of proposed new instruments on night work in general and it is in this area that the Employers' group have their most serious reservations. The strength of those reservations should not be underestimated.

To begin with, we regard it as an extremely difficult task to frame any new instruments so as to appropriately cover the enormous range of activities, occupations and circumstances involved in night work. This task is made even more difficult when the draft instruments themselves are drawn up in such a comprehensive manner so far as the conditions of night work are concerned. And it is in our view particularly inappropriate to attempt to regulate night work by means of a Convention of such a nature. We therefore commence with the position that if any instrument is to be adopted, it should be in the form of a Recommendation. However, as I have said, we are strongly opposed to many of the provisions now proposed for both the Convention and the Recommendation. Perhaps I should state in some detail the concerns which we have already expressed to the Committee.

We believe first of all that both the reports and the texts developed by the Office for our consideration show a certain lack of balance, an over-emphasis on the allegedly negative aspects of night work, and an under-emphasis on its positive aspects. Secondly, there is a basic assumption underlying the texts so far adopted that night work is hazardous and has harmful effects on health, and on family and social life. This assumption represents a distortion of reality, and is an attempt to develop general rules from particular situations.

Support is sought for this assumption by reference to the results of a number of research studies. However, any objective analysis of research so far conducted indicates that the effects of night work on health remain a matter of contention, even amongst experts, and that the effects vary from individual to individual. Again, so far as the effects of night work on family and social life are concerned, it is undeniable that there is tremendous variation from person to person, with many workers choosing night work as a matter of preference.

We therefore maintain that as a result of erroneous assumptions about the effects of night work the Committee has been led into adopting a number of inappropriate provisions in the proposed texts.

Thirdly, there has been a refusal to acknowledge the great diversity of night work, and an overconcentration on large enterprises and large industrial undertakings. The truth, on the other hand, is that night work is carried out within a very large number of occupations, both skilled and unskilled, and to an ever-increasing extent by small enterprises, and by the services sector.

Fourthly, there has been a refusal to take sufficient account of the fact that night work is an essential part of modern economies, and has significant benefits in terms of economic growth and job opportunities. It should never be forgotten that for many workers the alternative to night work is not day work, but unemployment. So attempts to prohibit or limit or restrict night work either in a direct sense or in an indirect sense, by over-regulation and the imposition of unacceptable costs, will damage economic development and employment growth.

Economic development depends on the use to be made of capital investment and it is particularly important that plant and equipment is able to be used over as long a period as possible rather than restricting its use to a limited period.

These matters are important for all countries but they are of particular relevance to developing countries.

These are the concerns and difficulties of a general nature which we have with the conclusions of the Committee. It is important however that I should particularise and illustrate some of those concerns and difficulties so that our position is clearly understood. In the text of the proposed instruments, Points 6, 13, 14, 35 and 54 are unacceptable to us because of their erroneous assumptions about the effects of night work on health and on family and social life.

Point 8 is unacceptable because it starts from the position that it is necessary for action to be taken to limit night work.

Point 10 is unacceptable because it extends coverage of the instruments to all industries and sectors regardless of their circumstances.

Point 18 concerning reduced working time and extra pay for nightworkers is not acceptable because of its interference with matters more appropriately dealt with through collective bargaining and because it is directly contrary to current trends for greater flexibility in these matters. The same applies to Points 27 and 28.

Point 20 is unacceptable because it may limit the ability of employers to utilise night work.

Points 42 and 45 concerning resting and eating facilities raise problems of a practical nature, particularly for small enterprises and developing countries.

It will, I hope, be appreciated from this list, which is far from complete, that our concerns are not merely theoretical in nature but are real and practical concerns.

There is one further matter which should be mentioned in this context. Point 17 of the Proposed Conclusions concerns protection for women during the times before and after childbirth. This was a provision in which almost all of the text was adopted by consensus and that was a notable achievement by the Committee. However, it is necessary that I say two things about it.

The provisions extends the period of protection to three months before and three months after childbirth, in other words, a doubling of the period provided in the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103). Such an approach is based on the belief to which I have already referred – that night work is essentially harmful – and it will raise particular difficulties of ratification and application, most notably in the developing countries.

The provision also appropriately and correctly replaces the notion of prohibition of night work for women in the periods mentioned with the notion of choice and the provision of alternatives. This is of course welcomed by us, but as a result the inappropriateness and inconsistency of the prohibition approach retained in Convention No. 89 is even further demonstrated.

We will, of course, return to discuss all of these matters next year. However, it should be clearly understood that our support for a new instrument or instruments will not be forthcoming unless there is a significant change in the approach so far adopted by the Committee.

We will not support instruments which are unrealistic and impractical and which attempt to restrict an important feature of work in our economies. In our view, such instruments will have little chance of ratification or implementation.

What is required is a recognition of the reality of night work – a recognition that our economies are not eight-hour economies but 24-hour economies – and a much more flexible approach to the issues before us. I address those remarks not only to the Workers' group, but particularly to governments which have a responsibility to ensure that proposed instruments are capable of ratification and implementation.

I also wish to make some brief remarks about the decision that the Committee on Night Work should consider not one or two possible instruments, but three. That decision imposed enormous strains on the work of the Committee with severe time pressures and a resultant inability to engage in the normal amount of discussion and negotiation outside the formal sittings of the Committee. We believe that this was unfortunate and should be taken into account in planning committee agendas in the future.

It is also appropriate that I express our gratitude to the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Suma'mur, whose charm and good humour were an inspiration and assistance to us all. We are also grateful to our Reporter, Miss Walgrave, for her diligence in preparing a report which accurately and fairly presents a record of our discussions.

Our thanks go also to the representative of the Director-General and to the secretariat for the contributions they have made to the work of the Committee.

Finally, I should express my thanks to the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Dreifuss, for the manner in which the relationships between the two groups were for the most part conducted. She is an able and tenacious advocate for her group, and it is regrettable, as I have already indicated, that we had insufficient opportunities for the development of a greater understanding and accommodation between the positions of our groups. We hope that in next year's discussions we shall be able to convince the Workers' group and many governments of the need for greater flexibility in their approach towards the proposed instruments.

The PRESIDENT – The discussion of the report is now open.

Original – French: Mrs. DREIFUS (Workers' delegate, Switzerland; Vice-Chairperson of the Committee on Night Work) – Mr. President, allow me to congratulate you on your election and thank you for the excellent way in which you have conducted our discussions.

Our Committee had a very extensive and difficult task to accomplish. It managed to carry it out thanks to the competence, the commitment and the will to succeed of each of its members. Our Chairman, Mr. Suma'mur personified these qualities as did our Reporter Mrs. Walgrave. We owe to Mrs. Walgrave an excellent report, which not only reflects our work faithfully, but also provides a basis for our future work. What we have achieved in the Committee owes a great deal to the documents prepared by the Office and to the assistance that they supplied us with throughout our discussions. Thanks to our colleagues there.

The Employers' group and the Workers' group are not today of the same opinion regarding the conclusions reached by the Committee. However, we have found that excellent solutions could be found, when together we sought ways of providing true protection for workers while respecting the diversity of the legal systems of the member States. This is what we attempted, and I think succeeded in doing as regards mother and child care protection, outlined in Point 17 of the Proposed Conclusions. Even when our views differed, our discussions were always well-argued, courteous and constructive and the will to understand the various positions was always present.

I would like to thank Mr. Noakes, Employers' Vice-Chairman, for all his contributions to the good operation of our Committee.

The Workers' group tackled this first discussion on night work with hopes and misgivings. The hope of finally seeing the International Labour Organisation commit itself to a standard-setting activity in favour of nightworkers, be they men or women, working in industry and in other economic sectors in large and small enterprises. In our eyes, it was a question of bridging a gap, a particularly surprising gap since the harmful effects of night work have been (long) known to us, and have led, since the first session of the International Labour Conference exactly 70 years ago, to the adoption of special protection for women workers.

Misgivings too, because we felt that there was the risk of dismantling the only barrier to the extension of night work for economic reasons: the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) on the prohibition of night work by women in industry.

Apart from hope and misgivings, the aspect that guided our group throughout our work was a feeling of our responsibilities. We never forgot that the value of a Convention depends on its possibilities of wide-scale ratification and universal application. We took this into account in our proposals concerning the proposed new Convention and we bore this in mind when discussing the additional Protocol to Convention No. 89.

The conclusions before you today do not correspond to the ideal that has always been pursued by the workers: to limit use of night work to activities that are absolutely vital operation of the company, or in cases where it is made inevitable by technology, and therefore put an end to night work for economic reasons, both for men and for women.

Unfortunately, although the objective of limiting night work is the logical consequence of the harmful effects of this violence on biological and social rhythms, although this objective is being pursued and carried out in many countries, it is not on the agenda of the present Conference. The illusion that night work could create jobs is too tenacious, when in each country it is just a question of reacting to the pressures of international competition and of trying to maintain or attract to their territories jobs which will be lost elsewhere, at the cost of more arduous working conditions. The progress in technology, and this is a conviction shared by the workers of the world, should not have the effect of making work harder, but should alleviate human suffering. Technology should free us from night work and not serve as a pretext for demanding more and more of it. The standard-setting activities of the ILO should allow the member States to give up night work that is carried out purely for economic reasons knowing that their main competitors will do likewise!

But even if this objective were to be reached one day, we all know that it would not mean that we could totally eliminate night work. It may be indispensable and some workers will have to go on with night work. But the Committee recognised and confirmed that "night work is detrimental to health and disturbs the social and family life of workers". It observed that "the human organism is more sensitive [...] to certain environmental disturbances [...] as well as to certain forms of work organisation" during the night than during the day. It drew the conclusion that "specific measures should be taken with a view to reducing drawbacks inherent in night work and eliminating, where possible, hazards in night work and properly compensating employees". We consider these conclusions very important. The envisaged Convention should, however, given the present state of national legislations, take the form of a programme encouraging States progressively to implement the measures mentioned and proposed in the Recommendation, but leaving it to the States to choose the time and the means. The Convention therefore simply lists the fields within which action should be taken, leaving considerable latitude to States.

In connection with the proposed conclusions, there are two points about which we are particularly concerned.

First, the definitions of the terms "night", "night work" and "night workers" we feel are too restrictive. This is particularly serious in our view because these definitions determine the scope of the Convention and the Recommendation and in so doing exclude people who should be able to enjoy the protection provided for.

Second, we should like to emphasise, as we will next year, the non-discriminatory application of this protection, particularly bearing in mind the fact that night workers are usually recruited amongst the most vulnerable groups of workers, including women, migrant workers and ethnic minorities.

I now come to the partial revision of Convention No. 89. The Workers' group in the Committee on Night Work knows that in more than 80 countries the prohibition on work by women in industry is an effective barrier to the extension of night work in general. It also knows above all that progress in equality between men and women is moving slowly; and it is precisely because women have not yet reached their due place in the working world or in society that many employers want to have them work at night. Women are viewed as a source of badly paid and docile labourers, who are "resistant to monotony" and without ambition, because they have been offered narrow options from childhood, in school and in their professional lives.

As long as night work by women is used as a means not of broadening their opportunities but of exploiting the discrimination to which they are in general subject, the trade union movement will remain convinced that there is no contradiction between the objective of equality and these protective measures.

The Workers' group, therefore, did not feel it was necessary to revise Convention No. 89. It also noted that the difficulties in its implementation faced by certain States which have ratified it are relatively minor. It was consequently only to facilitate the overcoming of these difficulties that the Workers' group agreed to envisage elaborating an additional protocol.

As you have heard, our Committee had before it proposals which were aimed at leaving complete latitude to States that had ratified Convention No. 89 to determine any changes in the definition of the term "night" and any exemptions from the prohibition on women working at night in industry. Such a provision would have rendered the Convention meaningless and would have in fact achieved the avowed objective of employers which was purely and simply to abrogate Convention No. 89. Such a provision would have created an extremely serious precedent for the standard-setting activities of the ILO. Therefore, our group was relieved to see the Committee reject these amendments. The road now remains open to a solution which might gather broad support. The protocol must in fact provide for very precise limitations on the possibility of making exemptions to obligations under the Convention, either by setting the rules of procedure, as proposed in the Committee's conclusions, or by laying down strict criteria.

This work is concluding for us in the same way as it started: with misgivings, because we have heard the obvious denied, namely that night work is harmful, but with hope, because we have a good basis for continuing and concluding our work next year, and with a will to elaborate standards which can be ratified and applied by a large number of countries.

Mr. SUMA'MUR (Government delegate, Indonesia; Chairman of the Committee on Night Work) – Thank you Mr. President for the opportunity given to me to speak on this very important occasion. I should like also to thank Ms. Walgrave for her excellent presentation of the report of the Committee on Night Work, Mr. Noakes, the Employers' Vice-Chairperson and Ms. Dreifuss, the Workers' Vice-Chairperson. They were the real leaders of our discussions. Not only were they as courteous as they were eloquent, but also they kept the Committee focused on substance. Rarely have I heard arguments presented with such clarity, force and realism. In addition, I wish also to express my deepest appreciation and gratitude to the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Dumont, and his team, for the valuable assistance provided to me and all the Committee members throughout the work of the Committee.

I am sure that you will appreciate that our Committee was not assigned an easy task. We had to consider three instruments, each of which had its full measure of technical complexity and differing points of view. There were times when I was genuinely afraid that we would not be able to finish our work. However, with the good-will and co-operative spirit of many members, we were able to accomplish a great deal.

Night work affects 10 to 15 per cent of workers in industrialised countries and 5 to 10 per cent of those in developing countries. There is a lack of good statistical data, but I have no doubt that these numbers are increasing. In fact, a first and fundamental decision that was evident throughout the preparatory work and which went unchallenged in our Committee, was that we should not attempt to reinforce the restrictions on night work. In the new instrument we limited ourselves to conditions of work and life, while in the revision of Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89), we concentrated on exceptions to the prohibition on night work of women in industry. Concern for flexibility and competitiveness were implicit in the approach we took.

While we did not try to limit night work, we did take important decisions concerning the effects of night work. The provisions of the Preamble to a proposed Convention may seem unimportant, but they certainly were important in our case. The hazards and drawbacks of night work are clearly stated, both with regard to health and with regard to social and family life. It can be argued that night work does not affect all workers, and it certainly does not affect all workers in the same ways. But the Committee decided that there was a need to state clearly the problems which, sooner or later, affect the large majority of nightworkers. I have no doubt that this question will be a major issue during next year's discussion.

Since the Committee took a stand on the effects of night work, it was logical for it to adopt rather restrictive definition of "night", "night work" and "nightworkers". I will not bore you with the complexities of this triple definition, but the result is that we concentrate on the most important cases. This is just one example of the insistence by a number of Government members on a great deal of flexibility. Flexibility in the proposed Convention is also provided through the possibility of progressive implementation, provisions allowing limited exceptions and the fact that most of the substantive provisions are general principles rather than detailed obligations.

We had, as you have already heard, an excellent example of tripartite co-operation in the elaboration of provisions on maternity protection. I hope that next year we will find similarly agreeable compromises on health surveillance, compensation in reduced working time or extra pay, social services and other matters. This will not be easy, but I am encouraged by the first discussions to believe it will be possible.

The debate on the Protocol to provide increased flexibility to Convention No. 89 was also difficult. There seems to be agreement that a total prohibition on night work of women in industry is not always in the best interest of the women concerned and that it can be discriminatory or at least encourage discrimination. There is much less agreement on how this problem can be solved. The essential question was how much flexibility should be introduced, and in particular whether variations and exemptions could be introduced directly by national laws and regulations. We have not found an ideal solution, so once again there will be much to accomplish next year.

Night work is a subject which is worthy of the attention of the International Labour Conference. The controversy which surrounds the subject should be seen as challenge to our tripartite leadership, not a reason to avoid our responsibilities. The work of the Committee on Night Work showed that complex and difficult subjects can be faced and solutions found. I look forward to next year, when I hope we will be able to agree on instruments which will improve the lot of millions of workers in ways fully consistent with economic growth, equality between the sexes and the social goals of our Organisation.

Original – French: Mr. ELMIGER (Government delegate, Switzerland) – In view of the adoption of the report of the Committee on Night Work, I would like to make the following statement on behalf of my Government.

The Swiss Government, which long ago launched an initiative in the ILO for an in-depth discussion of the problems relating to night work, welcomes the fact that work has been started on the revision of the existing instruments with a view to adopting new general instruments on the subject.

My country, however, is one of the few Western industrialised countries pledged to the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89) and it has noted the encouraging work done in the Committee. My Government participated fully in the work undertaken, but would like to point out how much the need for flexibility should be reflected in the proposed instruments. Also, the proposed Protocol to Convention No. 89 seems to be marred by the absence of a role of surveillance and guarantee for the public authorities, notably as regards the respect of the principle of equality of treatment between men and women.

Women's emancipation has considerably progressed in the past 40 years. The majority of women workers are employed in the non-industrial sector, to which Convention No. 89 does not apply. Thus, as regards the continuation of our work next year, we must bear in mind the need to avoid making Convention No. 89 seem discriminatory and above all we must ensure that it is as well adapted as it can be to the needs of the modern world.

Original – German: Mr. GRUBER (Government adviser, German Democratic Republic) – I am speaking on behalf of the Government representatives of the socialist countries of Eastern Europe. We fully support the report of the Committee on Night Work.

From the report we can see that the Committee worked extremely hard and that thorough and lengthy discussion was necessary to obtain the objectives set, namely to draft Proposed Conclusions on future instruments on night work, including a Protocol revising the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). Nomen est omen; night work was necessary to achieve our goals.

There is no doubt that the constructive climate in the Committee contributed a great deal to the progress of our work. Without fruitful dialogue and efforts to respect the interest of the various partners, it would not have been possible to attain our objectives.

I would like, in particular, to emphasise the very able and wise chairmanship of the Chairman, Mr. Suma'mur. It is largely on his account that the work of the Committee ended in such a satisfactory way and within the time-limit. We should also like to mention the extraordinary technical competence of the two Vice-Chairpersons, Ms. Dreifuss and Mr. Noakes, and the efficient manner in which they sought acceptable compromises. We should also like to express our gratitude to the Reporter, Ms. Walgrave, as well as to Mr. Dumont, Mr. Thurman and their hardworking colleagues who gave the Committee the necessary support at all moments. I would like to add that the preparatory reports to the Conference were excellent and a very well-balanced basis for our work.

The deliberations in the Committee showed that the decision to place the subject of night work on the agenda of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference was entirely justified. Consequently, the ILO considered a really topical problem – a problem on which views differed greatly. This was also reflected in the Committee itself. As a result, it was not easy to reach a consensus on the Proposed Conclusions on future instruments.

We should like now to turn to points we feel should be particularly emphasised.

First of all, there was broad agreement regarding the fact that today it is not possible to prohibit night work in general for certain groups of workers. It is much more a question of creating, for those who do night work, the necessary conditions for such work.

Moreover, this attitude is in conformity with the interests of society, enterprises and individuals.

Second, it was clear, during the discussion that the prohibition of night work for women, as laid down in Convention No. 89, is not adapted to our times. This prohibition hampers the professional development of women and is in no way compatible with their growing emancipation.

Third, it was recognised that night work cannot be an end in itself, but that it should be restricted to a degree which is determined by general well-being and in conformity with vital requirements for scientific and technical development.

Fourth, it was recognised that workers who work at night are subjected to greater stress than those who work during the day and therefore, in the proposed Conclusions on future instruments on night work, reference was made both to special measures of protection of those working at night and the special efforts they make. The measures regarding health, financial compensation, reduction of hours of work and the creation of appropriate housing conditions all take the situation of night workers into account.

Fifth, we welcome the fact that in the field of night work, the co-determination and participation of workers will also be provided for in the future instruments. Examples of this include: the guarantee of the representation of trade union interests; the obligation to consult workers before introducing the night shift and the right of workers to be consulted on the forms of organisation of night work best adapted to each undertaking.

Sixth, it was possible to reach an agreement regarding protection in the field of occupational safety and health and the legal protection of the workers. This was based on the principle that night-work requires the same level of occupational safety and health protection as day work. This also applies to maternity protection, including the prohibition to dismiss women workers when they no longer do night work because of the birth of a child, before and after the birth. Last but not least, we have also made provision for the protection of workers who cannot temporarily do night work for health reasons – and this is worth noting.

Of course, it was not possible to find an optimum solution to all questions. The second reading next year will provide an opportunity and possibility to go more thoroughly into certain matters during the discussion.

Ms. BINTA (Employers delegate, Uganda) – Mr. President, since I am addressing the Conference for the first time, allow me to congratulate you upon your well-deserved and unanimous election to the presidency of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I wish also to congratulate you on the efficient manner in which you have conducted the deliberations of the Conference.

Allow me to express various concerns on behalf of the Employer members of the African region who participated in the Committee on Night Work. The priorities of developing countries and Africa, in particular, are the creation of employment and full utilisation of capital and labour. The proposed Convention and Recommendation on night work are biased towards the reduction of night work, thus making night work more expensive. If left in their present form, the proposed instruments will lead to a policy of very high labour costs, which many employers in the African region cannot afford. Should they be faced with this problem, they would be forced to resort to other means that will result in a serious drop in the level of employment.

To give you a telling example, point 17 of the text calls for measures in connection with childbirth which, though well intended, cannot be implemented by many developing countries and those in Africa, in particular. In addition, it would reduce employment opportunities for women workers. This is only one example amongst many others.

I should like to suggest that most of the inflexible provisions contained in the present proposed Convention and Recommendation be reframed so that the standards which they prescribe would be the result of collective bargaining.

I should like to appeal to this Conference and to the ILO to take a more serious and realistic view of the issues raised during the three weeks' discussions, so that next year's discussions will result in provisions that are flexible enough and can be put into practice by all regions.

Original – French: Mr. KUMBU-KI-LUTETE (Government adviser, Zaire) – The importance of the report on night work that the Conference is about to adopt will affect the working and living conditions of millions of workers throughout the world, especially in Africa. The Committee which has prepared the conclusions with a view to the revision and adoption of standards on night work in the context of the economic and social development of various countries, particularly Angola.

In this context, my delegation pays tribute to the efforts made by the Angolan authorities at the initiative of the President of that country who, seeking ways and means to improve conditions there and to speed up the process of independence in Namibia, have concluded a ceasefire throughout Angola following the historic meeting in Gbadolite, Zaire, of 15 Heads of State and the Vice-President of Tanzania and the President of the Moroccan National Assembly. This meeting between President dos Santos and Jonas Savimbi of UNITA marks the end of the civil war that racked this country.

The 15 Heads of State, under the aegis of President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia and the President of Mali, paid glowing tribute to President Mobutu Sese Seko for his efforts of mediation aimed at bringing about national reconciliation in that country. The workers of that country, who have suffered for several years and who have been prevented from working at night because there were no longer proper conditions for doing so, will now benefit from the recommendations which the Conference is about to adopt so that this country may recover its full freedom to work at night.

The acting President of the OAU, Mr. Moussa Traoré, President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia and the Malian President, speaking of behalf of the front-line States and Africa, have paid a great tribute to President Mobutu Sese Seko for his important success and thanked President dos Santos and Jonas Savimbi for their efforts to achieve this civil peace.

The ILO, which has a part to play in social and economic development, should assist Angola, which has just gone through a decisive stage of its history, in its social and economic development, because the protection of workers requires civil peace, which the 15 Heads of State, the Vice-President of Tanzania and the President of the Moroccan National Assembly have just achieved at this historic meeting in Zaire.

Mr. President, President Mobutu has asked me to congratulate you on your election to high office at this important session of the International Labour Conference, because your election coincides with this historic encounter, and it will be remembered that it was an African who presided over this session of the International Labour Conference, which has celebrated the Organisation's 70th anniversary.

Mr. GLADE (Employers' adviser, United States) – I believe we are still talking about night work, so let me address that issue. About one week ago I stood before you, addressing the Report of the Director-General. My remarks then, as now, related to the ILO's realism and relevance in meeting the challenges of the changing world of work. The United States employers have followed closely and with concern, and at times incredulously, the discussion on night work at this session of the Conference.

On behalf of my delegation, I support the comments already provided by Mr. Noakes about the contents of the proposed instrument, but I offer the following supplementary and general observations from the American business perspective.

First, let us recall that ILO Report V(2) introduced the concept of hazards associated with night work, thereby establishing an unproven bias against night work from the outset of the discussion. This resulted in several false assumptions on which the discussions were based. For example, the assumption that night work is intrinsically hazardous to health and should therefore be reduced and/or avoided and, where it must take place, should give rise to additional compensation in the form of financial remuneration, time off with pay, or both. The problem is that the basic assumption about night work being hazardous is unproven, as Mr. Noakes has clearly said. Further, the requirements for reduced working time and/or additional pay are unrealistic and do not represent current practice in a wide variety of enterprises where night work is common.

The instruments adopted by the Committee will apply to all economic sectors, with no exceptions of exclusions. Here again, we see a broad new approach that applies unrealistic and over-restrictive standards and fails to take into consideration the wide variety of enterprises and their workers who use night work to their mutual benefit.

It must also be noted that these proposed instruments will impose added cost on employers and on governments, a cost that, in one way or another, will be borne by the consumer – a party poorly represented by both government and workers in a tripartite deliberation.

In evaluating the outcome of the Committee's work, this plenary must also consider its impact on economic growth and employment opportunities in both developed and developing countries. In my country, for example, economic growth and job creation is greater and occurring more rapidly in small enterprises and in the service sector, both of which will be severely affected by the proposed Convention and Recommendation.

On the whole, the economy functions on a 24-hour basis, particularly in services like transportation, tourism, financial operations, communications, food and restaurants. It is unrealistic to place an additional burden and cost, as proposed, on this burgeoning, developing sector of the economy, thereby restricting its growth and impeding opportunities for job creation. Further, these services are often provided by small entrepreneurs who can ill afford the burdens placed on them by these instruments.

Again, in the ILO, we are facing the prospect of creating obstacles to the generation and sustenance of new employment opportunities. We should recall the ILO's original mission.

I need not recite the lengthy list of specific objections to the proposal. I believe Mr. Noakes has accurately drawn attention to these problems. What most concerns United States employers, though, is the outmoded approach taken by the ILO staff, the workers and many governments to the economic challenges and opportunities we all face.

The Committee on Night Work is only one example of this body's overriding preoccupation with regulations at a time when there is increasing agreement around the world that deregulation, and the resulting freedom for business to grow and create employment, is the order of the day. The United States employers submit that it is now time for the ILO to adopt the same attitude and to significantly slow down its attempts to broadly restrict what is more logical to address at the national and enterprise level.

The results of the Committee on Night Work are a prime example of over-regulation of a complex problem, for they fail to recognise the wide variety of practices, economic sectors, size of enterprises, the needs and desires of workers and real and compelling economic pressures.

For all these reasons, the United States employer community cannot support the report of the Committee on Night Work. We urge governments and workers to use the time before next year's discussion productively, to evaluate objectively the report and to come prepared to repair its many faults. I respectfully suggest that the credibility and relevance of the ILO depend on this.

Original – French: Mr. OECHSLIN (Employers' delegate, France) – My colleague, Mr. Noakes, speaking on behalf of the Employers' group, and the Employers delegates who supported him, Mrs. Binta and Mr. Glade, have forcefully expressed the disagreement of our group with the conclusions proposed in the report of the Committee on Night Work.

The existence of disagreement, even substantive, is nothing shocking in our Organisation; on the contrary, the point of it is to express such disagreement between social partners. This should be only the first stage, however, after which it is necessary to surmount differences and try to reach consensus. What would be very serious for our Organisation would be if the disagreement this year were to be repeated next year at the end of the Conference.

The possible opposition of the Employers' group to the adoption of instruments after the second reading might result in the Conference not adopting the proposed texts or in the required majority being only narrowly achieved.

The second possibility is hardly more satisfactory than the first. ILO instruments are only of practical use when they are ratified. Furthermore, a text like the one we have been dealing with will in most countries have to be implemented through collective agreements. What moral standing would a text have that has been rejected by the constituents of the Organisation that represents one of the social partners?

I have not however taken the floor to express resentment or make accusations, but to express concern with the final results and, especially, with the practical implications of the results of the work.

I sincerely believe that it is possible for the representatives of the three groups at this Conference to reach consensus on this subject, as well as on many others, which in this case, apart from achieving the necessary flexibility for the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised) 1948, (No. 89), would agree on certain basic principles for night work that would take economic requirements into account as well as the legitimate social needs of workers which would in general be valid for all countries, industrialised or developing, and take account of our enterprises (small or large) under industries, services and commerce. In my view, however, it is unreasonable to hope to achieve this consensus by adopting an overly perfectionist attitude or by trying to draw up binding rules applicable in all circumstances. It would be wiser to leave this up to the social partners who are directly concerned, based on certain principles that we had agreed on here. Only the people in the field can see all the consequences of these rules on employment and evaluate local peculiarities.

I must say that the ILO services bear a part of the responsibility for this, although they have acted in good faith. The questionnaire annexed to Report VI (1) seems to me to have led us into an approach which has complicated the Committee's task; and the concern to be as comprehensive as possible, which is understandable, has led to the opposite effect.

Concentration of the debates on essentials would make it possible to give more time to negotiation in the Committee's work. In just under two weeks, a Committee comprised of 188 members had to deal with almost 400 amendments. It could do so only through votes which obviously is a perfectly correct procedure, and applied according to the letter of the Standing Orders; but I do not think it lends itself to achieving consensus if used systematically and for fundamental issues.

I think the success of our work will not be measured by the adoption of just any text under any circumstances, but by the drafting of a text agreed on by consensus that will have a real impact and that will help employers and workers to solve together the problems posed by night work.

So, let us benefit from the wisdom of our Members who have provided for a second reading, and let us use well this period of reflection. I hope that our partners, Governments and Workers, will consider calmly and with serenity the concerns that we have expressed in good faith in the Committee and here this morning.

I very much hope that next year we will be in a position to give our support to the conclusions submitted to the Conference by the Committee.

Original – German: Mr. MUHR (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) – On behalf of the Workers' group of this Conference, I have to warn you against the dangers of praising tripartism in words but undermining it in practice.

The Employers in this Organisation have, for years, tried to place on the agenda of the International Labour Conference an item directed simply at the abolition of the Night Work (Women) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 89). You know very well that the majority in the Governing Body made no pronouncement on this matter. The item was placed on the agenda this year – and will be on the agenda next year – because we tackled the question from a wider perspective, i.e. by examining the health hazards inherent in night work.

Is there an attempt to attain, through the back door, the objective that could not be achieved in any other way?

The goal of this Organisation is to guarantee the rights of workers and protect their living conditions and health. Need I explain that working hours and working conditions are linked to workers' health? A number of scientific studies have proven that frequent night work can be harmful, especially if it disrupts family life.

Recognised requirements for the protection of workers should not however be sacrificed for economic objectives.

I am naturally familiar with the arguments. If our competitors, both at the national and international level, work around the clock, we have to do the same so as not to be squeezed out of the market. But it is precisely the task of our Organisation to create instruments that can be applied to everyone – and ensure that they are universally applied.

If we do the exact opposite and only establish standards on the basis of our own interests and needs, the whole point of this Organisation is lost. Tripartism is then not worth the paper it is written on. And it is not only in the case of this Committee that I can see that there is a tendency to move in this direction.

If we ruin this Organisation now in this way, the generations to come will be the ones to suffer. The three groups must understand their basic role – particularly the Workers and Employers; failing this there will be no future for this Organisation.

I therefore call upon the Employers' group to give up their policy of obstruction next year in this Committee.

This year the Workers have shown that they are not aiming at maximalistic achievements. We are aware that the instruments in this Organisation have to be drafted wisely if they are to have an impact on social conditions in the world. And we also know that night work cannot simply be prohibited. Unfortunately, it is necessary in many circumstances – far too many circumstances! However, there should not be recourse to night work merely to step up productivity and accelerate growth. The centre of our political and economic efforts must be concentrated on human beings – not the machine.

The PRESIDENT – Since there are no other speakers, we shall now proceed to the adoption of the report of the Committee on Night Work, paragraphs 1 to 305. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

PROPOSED CONCLUSIONS SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON NIGHT WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – We shall now proceed to the adoption of the Proposed Conclusions. If there are no objections, I take it that Points 1 to 60 are adopted.

(Points 1-60 are adopted seriatim.)

RESOLUTION TO PLACE ON THE AGENDA OF THE NEXT ORDINARY SESSION OF THE CONFERENCE AN ITEM ENTITLED
"NIGHT WORK", SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON NIGHT WORK: ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT – You now have before you a resolution to place on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference an item entitled "Night Work". If there are no objections, I take it that the resolution is adopted.

(The resolution is adopted.)

The PRESIDENT – We have now concluded our consideration and adoption of the report, conclusions and resolutions of the Committee on Night Work.

May I take this opportunity to thank the Chairman, the two Vice-Chairmen, the Reporter, as well as all other members of the Committee and members of the secretariat for their excellent work.

CLOSING SPEECHES

The PRESIDENT – We now proceed to the closing speeches of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. May ask Mrs. Molkova, Mr. Delpino and Mr. Gazarin to come to the rostrum, and I invite Mrs. Molkova, Government delegate, Czechoslovakia, and Vice-President of the Conference, to take the floor.

Mrs. MOLKOVA (Government delegate, Czechoslovakia; Vice-President of the Conference) – Now that we have come to the end of this 76th Session of the Conference, I have the privilege to follow the tradition and address a few words to the Conference.

First of all, I would like to thank my colleagues in the Government group for having nominated me for the post of Vice-President of the Conference, thereby conferring a great honour on my country, Czechoslovakia, and myself.

For many days we have been discussing the Report of the Director-General on economic recovery and employment, dealing with matters which affect the lives and interests of people throughout the world. The 70th anniversary of the ILO provided an opportunity to assess the results achieved, but we were all the time mainly looking ahead, trying to find ways and means for the ILO to make a meaningful contribution to the general effort of the United Nations system to promote balanced social and economic progress.

The ongoing process of détente ensuing, in particular, from the first steps initiated by the Soviet Union in the area of disarmament had a positive impact on the deliberations of the Conference.

On the whole we have achieved a broad measure of agreement. This session has proved that the ILO is called upon to contribute significantly to the improvement of the lot of workers, to the solution of major economic problems and to the promotion of basic human rights. The participation of Workers' and Employers' representatives, together with the governments, is very substantial in all these fields. The debate in the plenary, in which a large number of ministers took part, and the work performed by the Committees have confirmed the commonly agreed priorities of the Programme and Budget for the biennium 1990-1991. The Programme reflects the views of all the major components of the ILO membership. Its nearly unanimous adoption is of great importance and represents a prerequisite for unity of action and for the successful implementation of the Programme.

Under such conditions, further improvements in the democratic approach and consistent implementation of equality of rights is essential in order to make the ILO action still more effective.

I believe we can be satisfied with the support expressed by this session to the promotion of the quest for peace and disarmament and to the conversion of military expenditure to the promotion of social objectives. The Conference has again called for resolute action against apartheid in South Africa. With equal vigour the persistent violation of the rights of the Palestinian people was criticised from this rostrum.

I think the Conference will agree with me that the standard-setting committees worked hard and have achieved good results in setting forth the outlines of new Conventions and Recommendations concerning night work and safety in the use of chemicals at work as well as in revising the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107). This is a very positive achievement, as all these areas are of great importance for the pursuit of the ILO's long-term objective – the improvement of conditions of work and life.

With the same objective in mind, the Committee on the Application of Standards performed its difficult task. Its report has again confirmed that this Committee plays a key role in the ILO supervisory machinery and makes a unique contribution towards full understanding of the meaning and promoting the uniform interpretation of ILO instruments. An objective dialogue with governments based on the understanding of complex situations in member countries is, among other things, a source of information and experience for all who participate in the work of the Committee.

When calling attention to these positive features, I cannot leave unnoticed the failure of the Resolutions Committee to achieve any tangible results for the second consecutive year. Five draft resolutions submitted to the Conference concerning the role of the ILO in protecting the environment, as well as the consolidated text produced by the authors, underline the growing concern shared by all member States. To our regret, the Committee was unable to adopt the resolution during the time placed at its disposal. It is to be regretted as well that further draft resolutions dealing with important social problems throughout the world, in particular those which received the first three priorities, could not even be discussed. A thorough review of the procedure is probably called for to avoid similar deadlocks in the future.

In conclusion, allow me to express once more my gratitude to Mr. Francis Blanchard for his long and fruitful service to the ILO and convey my best wishes to his successor, Mr. Michel Hansenne. Mr. Hansenne, as the Secretary-General of the Conference, and all members of the secretariat deserve our admiration and thanks for the services provided to this session.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to say that it has been a great privilege for all of us to work under your skilful, competent and efficient guidance. I also thank my colleagues the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Presidents who, together with you, have contributed to the success of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

Original - Arabic: Mr. GAZARIN (Employers' delegate, Egypt; Vice-President of the Conference) - At the end of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference it is my honour to address you on behalf of the Employers' group, who have shown me the honour of electing me Vice-President of the Conference this year. This is a great honour for me as an Egyptian, an Arab and an African.

I should like, Sir, to start by stating that working under your presidency and in full understanding with the two Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Molkova and Mr. Delpino, has lightened the load of responsibility for us and enabled this Conference to be fully successful.

The International Labour Conference is a unique occasion of its kind because it enables the three parties concerned with work and production to meet and discuss social questions concerning the whole world, as well as problems which may appear to be exclusive to a single country or region but which are interdependent, involving the principles for which we have fought so long.

We have always defended and will always continue to defend human rights and the freedom of the individual, whatever his colour or race.

At earlier Conferences the ILO has discussed the odious racial discrimination practised by certain governments and oppressive and repressive acts committed by certain regimes. These questions have taken up a considerable part of the discussions and the work of the Conference. We hope that the day will soon come when these odious practices cease and these questions no longer appear on the agenda of the Conference, allowing it to discuss other important questions which awaiting their turn. In the end, right will prevail and good will triumph, by the grace of God.

I should now like to make some comments.

First, participation in the Conference. Thirty accredited Employers' members were not able to be present and some others could not be present for the whole Conference. This affected the voting balance of the Employers' group and weakened tripartite participation in the Conference. We know from past experience that absence is usually due to the fact that governments ask their employers themselves to bear the costs of their travel and living expenses during the Conference. This is beyond the resources of a large number of the employers and is against the Constitution, particularly article 13. This article, indeed, is violated by the large number of governments. This has been taken into account by the Credentials Committee, which reminded governments of their responsibilities, but I feel that we ourselves should state our position on this matter.

Secondly, another incident we have seen at the present session is the request presented by a religious community to participate in this Conference as observers. I do not wish to go into the substance of the question but I should like to say that our group has for many years been approached by a large number of groups that have asked to participate in our Conference as observers, without having any objective rules enabling us to adjudicate on such requests or determine the rights of observers. Indeed we consider that a large number of non-governmental organisations have gone beyond their rights of observers at our present session. We hope that the Governing Body will be able to draw up clear and precise criteria for the next session.

Thirdly, the Resolutions Committee, for the second year running, has been unable to adopt any resolutions. We believe that this is not solely due to differences of views over the resolutions within the Committee, but also to lack of time and the procedures followed by the Committees. We consider that procedures have got to be revised with a view to being simplified and that more time should be given to the Committee to discuss resolutions and recommend the adoption of some of them to the Conference.

Fourthly, we greatly appreciate the immense amount of work carried out by the supervisory bodies on the application of Conventions and Recommendations but when we consider the old Conventions and the various comments made on them by the Committee of Experts in previous years we wonder whether these comments do not sometimes lead to imprecise and contradictory results. The workload of the Committee of Experts is constantly increasing as a result of the growing number of Conventions and ratifications and we consider that we should revise the procedures and the frequency of presentation of reports by governments to the Committee of Experts. It is perhaps time to review the desirability of continuing to consider the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) in depth, which is not the primary function of the Committee. It has dealt with other subjects relating to employment in the first part of its report, but we consider that that also is outside the purview of the Committee of Experts.

In conclusion, I would like to express my thanks and appreciation to the members of the secretariat, who have worked day and night to make sure we receive documents translated into all the different languages in good time, and I should also like to thank the administrative services for organising the Conference and giving its members every assistance.

I should like to express my thanks and appreciation to those "unknown soldiers" who have worked long hours in the interpreters' booths to enable us to understand each other.

I thank all of you for your contributions to the success of the work of the Conference and in particular I should like to mention the Chairmen of the Committees who bore the heaviest responsibility and worked long hours, often very late.

Finally I would like to address to Mr. Hansenne, the Director-General, my best wishes for success in his management of the work of our Organisation in which we place all our hopes that he will enable us to resolve many of our problems and help us along the road to progress and well-being.

May God's peace and compassion be with you.

Original – Spanish: Mr. DELPINO (Workers' delegate, Venezuela; Vice-President of the Conference) – The 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is drawing to a close after having completed, not very successfully, a promising agenda and after having studied a report from the Governing Body and a report by the Director-General, both full of serious examinations, careful studies and conclusions that are undoubtedly based on common-sense and good judgement. It has been a session that leads us to congratulate, and more than to congratulate, to thank the technical staff, the advisers and the secretariat for the admirable work that has taken the form of documents of extraordinary importance that have helped to concentrate and guide our work, at the same time as making it more straightforward for us.

It is regrettable that no appropriate solution was found to environmental problems since today they constitute a subject which has a great deal to do with survival.

The same obstacles made it impossible to improve the ILO's position with respect to the foreign public debt of the developing countries and also prevented us from examining certain initiatives and projects, such as for example those of the President of France and Mr. Willy Brandt.

This year, 1989, has refreshed our memory. Two hundred years ago certain events happened which had the greatest effect ever on the social and political orders and which provided great benefits to human society.

The French Revolution gave birth to the proclamation of the rights of man and the rights of citizens, which will be celebrating its glorious bicentenary in a few days' time and due to which, since then in immortal France, in the words of a Venezuelan poet "beats the heart of glory".

The advent of the Industrial Revolution altered the relationship between men and modelled the society which today, with its ups and downs, we enjoy – some more than others.

May Day in Chicago, whose first centenary was joyfully commemorated by the proletariat of the world, marked with its indelible sign the honourable nature of work and the dignity of the worker, and put a stamp of anxiety on the struggles of workers.

We should carry out a universal campaign to have the first of May declared a fully paid public holiday in those countries where it is not recognised. The best way of commemorating the first of May is to apply international standards on employment and freedom of association.

Finally, it would be good if the ILO were to take the necessary steps to ensure that the United Nations General Assembly declared a year in the 1990s as International Labour Year.

The Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, a wise conclusion, was ironically the result of an exhausting outbreak. This 70-year old Organisation has endeavoured, with constant zeal, to tame, order and channel as smoothly as possible the changes produced in society by the Industrial Revolution.

Decolonisation, a political event of great importance which gave birth to a large number of new nations, and due to which a different balance of power was established, brought about at the same time the birth of a different type of political, economic and social relationship unthought of in the 1930s.

Somebody said (from this rostrum) recently that 70 years in the life of a person is a respectable period of time, but in the life of nations, of peoples and of organisations such as this it is nothing at all.

May it continue with the robust health which it enjoys today! May our descendants, at the end of the next 70 years, hand it on to their descendants as highly respected as it is today.

I congratulate you, Mr. President, on your well-balanced and firm manner of presiding over our working sessions. For me, it has been a great honour, during this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, to have been together with you, as one of the Officers of the Conference.

I also present my respects to the new Director-General in whom the family of the ILO places great hopes, and we hope that his work will lead to the greater strengthening of the ILO's foundations.

Original – French: The SECRETARY-GENERAL – Once again the three parties in the world of work have come together here in this unique forum in order to discuss their problems, which this year were both important and topical. Once again they have succeeded in their work, thanks to everyone's efforts.

But a Conference owes its success mainly to the manner in which it is guided by its officers, and in particular by its President. This success is therefore largely due to you, Mr. President. The Conference elected you unanimously to the presidency in an expression of its utter confidence in you and in the fact that you would be successful in guiding its work. It was not mistaken. With your competence, your firmness, your charm, you have guided the deliberations at all times in a manner worthy of the greatest of Presidents. The Conference can be proud of having chosen you and of having entrusted this important office to you. This opinion has just been confirmed by your Vice-Presidents, to whom we are also very grateful for their efficiency, their courtesy and their devotion in carrying out the tasks entrusted to them.

I should also like to thank all the officers of the committees, not only for their work, which as usual required steady nerves, extraordinary mental and physical ability, and an unflagging determination to reach consensus through dialogue and understanding. I should also like to thank them for the manner in which they did their work in close collaboration with my representatives and colleagues in these committees. Lastly, I should like to convey my most sincere congratulations to my colleagues, both visible and invisible, who helped you to bring the Conference to a successful conclusion. As the new Director-General, I was struck by the difficulty of the task and the ease with which the entire secretariat took it on with a discipline, a devotion and a professionalism that were quite exceptional. These qualities would not be maintained from one year to the next if the staff of the Office were not convinced that its work serves some purpose and that their efforts will help to improve working conditions in the world and to eliminate injustice.

Mr. President, for some years now, this Conference has carried on the tradition, and a very happy one at that, of presenting the President of the Conference with a souvenir of what one might call his "adventure". As Secretary-General, I have the honour to present this souvenir to you, and each time you look at it, you will undoubtedly remember the many occasions on which you had to call the Conference or a speaker to order. It will also remind you of the great honour the Conference bestowed upon you in electing you as its President. While expressing my gratitude to you once again, Mr. President, for the considerable work you have done, I should like to give you this gavel, which I hope will be a happy memento of this 76th Session of the Conference of our great Organisation.

The PRESIDENT – I wish to thank Mr. Hansenne. What he has not said is whether I am only taking one because there are now two of them here.

Presiding over the International Labour Conference is a unique experience, which I shall never forget. It is unique in the sense that not only did I forge friendships and make acquaintances with delegates from different countries, with different cultures and interests, but I have also learnt a number of lessons, the most important of which is that without tolerance and an honest will to listen, to allow for free expression and to accept the views of others, it is impossible to come to any positive results.

I wish to thank first those who sponsored my candidature and second, all of you for electing me as President of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference.

When I assumed my responsibilities as President of this session of the Conference, I stated that the success of the Conference would depend on the active participation and the co-operation of all of you. Now that we have concluded our work, I would like to thank you all for the unequivocal support you have given me throughout the Conference. The spirit of consensus which has prevailed in the last three weeks, despite some difficult moments, has enabled you, indeed all of us, to reach the impressive results which the Secretary-General, Mr. Hansenne, mentioned yesterday in his eloquent speech to the Conference. In particular, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the three Vice-Presidents, Mrs. Molkova, Mr. Gazarin and Mr. Delpino, who took upon themselves a large share of conducting the debates of this Conference. I would also like to extend my thanks to the Officers of all the Committees, who have played an important role in bringing the Conference to a successful end. Of course a Conference like this one has to rely on the services of the ILO staff, and I am sure you will all agree with me that we owe the competent staff of the ILO our thanks and admiration. During the last three weeks we have had many of them working directly with us, but there are so many others behind the scenes or in the interpretation booths, and in the printing workshops, whose work is indispensable to this Conference and to whom I would like to extend on behalf of all of you, our deepest gratitude.

Over the last three weeks, I have had on my right side Mrs. Nicole de Warlincourt, whose charm, untiring efforts, patience and competence have made my task much easier, for which I am most grateful. I have been showered with many messages of praise for the success of the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference. I should like to share all that praise with the Vice-Presidents, with all of you and with all the ILO staff. Without your co-operation, this session of the Conference would never have been a success.

A few moments ago, Mr. Hansenne gave me an authentic copy of the gavel I have been using throughout the Conference. I have two reasons for being proud of receiving this gavel: it will always be a reminder to me of those unforgettable three weeks of this 76th Session of the International Labour Conference, and also I am the first President of certainly many others to come to whom you, Mr. Hansenne, have handed this traditional symbol of authority. Please accept, Mr. Secretary-General, my most sincere thanks and also my best wishes in your new functions as Director-General of this great Organisation.

After three weeks of hard work and intensive negotiations between the social partners, the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference is coming to an end, a session which has had its special importance not only because of the substantial results it has achieved but also because it happened to coincide with the seventieth anniversary of our Organisation. Once more this Conference has proved that it is, and will always remain, the world's labour parliament. I think we can be proud of having taken today, as we do each year, one step further in achieving one of the most significant aims of this Organisation which is human dignity. Despite some problems in the Resolutions Committee, the results of the Committees on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the revision of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957, (No. 107), night work and chemical substances are a testimony for the hard work performed during the last three weeks by the various Committees.

It only remains for me to wish you all a safe and happy journey home and to thank you once more for your co-operation. As we disperse to our regions and countries, I wish you all bon voyage.

I now solemnly declare the 76th Session of the International Labour Conference closed.

(The Conference adjourned sine die at 12.30 p.m.)
