Whether we are believed or not, it is a fact that the United States employers have a positive desire to assist in every way possible to bring about rapid economic and social progress in all the countries that have so little and need so much. However, beginning in 1969, I have sat in this plenary six times and have heard my country, maligned and viciously attacked in parliamentary, unparliamentary and abusive language. One year it is to smear us as monopolists, imperialists, money-hungry capitalists, deniers of human rights; another year as colonialists, neo-colonialists (whatever that means); and now we are charged with aggression by the masters of aggression. We have not forgotten Latvia, Estonia, Poland, Hungary, Tibet—but have you so I would like to say also we were attacked last year on the basis of giving aid to other countries with designs of a selfish nature. Well, the many millions of taxpayers in my country have not had any designs on anybody but a desire to help. They have given $120 billion—yes, I repeat over $120,000 million—to the rest of the world, and what have they gained—an imbalance in their payments structure, which is a matter of real concern. I have been disturbed and upset by these speeches. It is not the fact that the Soviets and their satellites make them that disturbs me. From long I.L.O. experience I realise that the communist world is on the defensive, and propaganda is its effort at destructive achievement. To succeed, communism believes it must violently challenge all nations which possess true democracy and where people are truly free. The real and only reason I am upset by their violent, organised, correlated and collective attack is because I have noted reactions here which indicate that some of you may have been taken in by some of these vicious and planned efforts to create confusion and to obscure the basic purposes of this Conference.

So again, as in past sessions, I am forced to waste precious time which might have been used for constructive suggestions—yes, I am forced to point out to you the real purpose of the invective against my country and the real differences in their form of society and ours.

What I am going to say does have a direct and fundamental relation to the future of this Organisation. It has a specific relation to the question of progress for emerging and developing nations.

2 The detailed results of the vote will be found on p. 320.
Whether you like the United States or not is a matter of your own personal concern, a matter of your personal emotions. But you come here at great expense to your governments and to the I.L.O. for the sole purpose of helping mankind, and particularly the people of your own countries, to solve big social and economic problems. You, and the emerg­ ing and developing nations, particularly those from Africa, have so much to lose if the I.L.O. continues to degenerate further into a propaganda forum. You have much to gain if the United States and other highly developed, truly democratic nations continue to support an Organisation dedicated to social objectives and economic achievements, provided it is so conducted.

Despite the fact that communist agents and sympathisers circulate in practically all nations, most of you know perfectly well what would be the consequences of communist control and communist dictatorship in your nation. Actually, people everywhere want freedom. Not for one moment can anyone believe that a communist takeover in his country would produce freedom and independence.

Let me stress again to the uncommitted nations that once you go down the communist road there is no alternative choice, no turning back. But if you choose the free enterprise form of society, or even a so-called mixed economy, you can always change your mind. If you choose communism, you cannot return to the I.L.O. as free men, with free minds and a free choice to act on I.L.O. documents in what you believe to be the real interests of your people. You must always act according to the dictates of the central controlling communist Power, or go home and suffer serious consequences. The record proves that this is the communist way of life—adhere, conform, follow the party line, or be ostracised or worse. This is no idle statement. Even in small matters the iron control is evident. For example, the radio reported last Friday an incident in Yugoslavia. A prominent writer was sentenced to nine years in prison for insulting the Soviet Union. What had he done? He had visited the Soviet Union and had written about conditions there. Among other things he had said that Living Standards in the Soviet Union were only 40 per cent. as good as those in Yugoslavia. His report was not refuted or denied, but all the same he is in prison.

A prominent communist official made the boast that communism would bury the United States. He has been relegated to the status of a nonentity now, but not for making that statement. Communism cannot bury the United States—if it could, it would bury the whole free world. Ironically, the totalitarian nations of Eastern Europe have increasingly shown that trade agreements with the free world are most necessary to them, that they need the free world and its gigantic economic capacity.

Do I need to prove again, by resorting to the obvious comparisons, that the United States and other free industrialised nations have achieved tremendous economic progress and that this has been made possible by free people, free trade unions and free enterprise, achieving the world’s most massive economic capacity, the highest standards of living and the greatest opportunity for people in every walk of life? Do I have to recite figures again to show that communism does not meet the economic needs of its people, and certainly not their economic desires? Must I again suggest that you take a look at East Germany which, under communist domination, is in a very sorry state, while West Germany is a thriving, happy, free country? Must I again remind you of the almost daily slaughter of the courageous persons fleeing East Germany, leaving their possessions behind, fleeing because they love freedom and are willing to risk their lives for it—and I might say that today, 17 June, is the anniversary of the uprising of the people of East Germany in 1953, seeking freedom, which was put down by Soviet might.

But enough of these comparisons. Let us examine another facet of this strange pheno­ menon of slander and invective promulgated by the communists. In the six years I have been coming here I have been perplexed by the constant barrage of vituperation against my country. Certainly the Soviets do not indulge in this just because they want to hear them­selves talk or for altruistic reasons. They always have an objective in mind—and what is that objective? I believe I am beginning to understand it. They have sought to dominate this Organisation. In this they have failed and will continue to fail, because domination by them would end the constructive work of the I.L.O. for labour everywhere. So now they have the vain hope that because of the constant attacks they make upon the United States my country will in disgust withdraw from the I.L.O., and they have the vain hope that this would cause the collapse and demise of the I.L.O. Then they appear to think they could blame the United States and, at the same time, be freer to ply their aims at world domination.

Despite an occasional relapse into a softer line, they have at no time given up this major objective—world domination. It is, of course, apparent to you that they are very active in their efforts to subvert the newer nations to their ideology.

I believe another reason for their desire to cause the collapse of the I.L.O. is that it is no longer a profitable platform to them for propaganda purposes. People everywhere are becoming increasingly aware of the communist economic failures in agriculture, in living standards for their people and their inability to provide even an adequate supply of basic consumer goods.

The great economic expansion in the Common Market and in the E.F.T.A. has been a thorn in their side. They have frequently as­serted that capitalism is decaying and will soon disappear. Unfortunately for the communists, stubborn capitalism is not co-oper­ative and persists in proving them wrong constantly.

So again we hear the same old nonsensical clichés about monopolists, imperialists and colonialists, directed against the United States. Now they know, of course, that these charges are false. They know full well that they, not the United States, are the monopolists, the imperialists and colonialists. Indeed we might call it the Soviet imperialist colonialist empire.

No country that they have taken over by force or by infiltration has been freed from their oppression and repression.

The communists come here and talk glibly about human rights, freedom of association and all the other fine principles of this Organisation, while denying the enjoyment of these rights and privileges to millions of people under their domination. They even advocate resolutions against other nations for violation of I.L.O. principles when in fact they, the communist countries, are themselves far more guilty of such violations.

They must think that you and I are but children who will be impressed by their propaganda and that by pointing their finger at others they can conceal their own shortcomings.

With reference to their attack on us for our efforts to help South Viet-Nam repel aggression from the North, I would suggest that it would become them better if they were to prevail upon their aggressor communist brothers in Hanoi to come to the conference table as the President of the United States has so often requested.

As to the Dominican Republic, they may soon see their false tears when it becomes plain to the world by irrefutable documentation that communist incitement was the major cause of the debacle there. Judge them not by what they say but by what they do!

There are some among you who may have honest differences of views about American policy in Viet-Nam or in the Dominican Republic. But I remind you that the United States citizenry is made up of people from every country in the world, every country represented here, or by offspring of those people. Those people in our country support overwhelmingly the specific policies of our Government in Viet-Nam and the Dominican Republic, and may I remind you also that, within certain fair limitations, you can enter the United States and stay there if you wish, or you may leave freely without having to climb a barbed-wire covered wall under machine-gun fire.

Please understand that I do not hate the people who live under communism. Even among those who come here I find—when they are not on the platform—invading against my country—a number of them who are very attractive personalities.

My opposition to communism as a form of society is based upon my conviction that it does not work in the interest of people. No system of society can endure if it fails to meet the economic needs of its people.

But notwithstanding these statements, I desire to give credit where credit is due. I would like to compliment Mr. Bogacki of Poland for his restrained speech. I agree with much of what he said about the necessity for improved world trade as being the road to better things for the emerging and developing nations. I have every confidence in his first attendance at an I.L.O. Conference and because he may not know all of the background of the free Employers' rejection of the application of so-called employers from communist countries, I shall try once more to make the matter clear.

There is apparently no question about his qualifications as a manager; but that is exactly what he is. He is a manager of a business owned by the Government, which is the real employer. The Government determines the wage rates, the conditions of employment, and he dare not oppose their conclusions. In communist countries workers are not allowed to strike if their desires are not met. There is absolutely no similarity of employer-labour relations in a communist country with those prevailing in an open, free society. Since so-called communist employers always vote with their governments on I.L.O. instruments, their presence on the Employers' benches seriously lessens the impact of free employer votes on I.L.O. matters.

Of course, I have listened to charges that managers from nationalised industries in other countries do sit on the Employers' bench. This is true in some instances, but there is a great difference. Those people are from mixed economies where there are also private enterprise employers. It is in these latter that set the conditions of employment and the standards for workers. The nationalised industries in such countries conform to the decisions of the private sector. There is no such equalising force in the communist nations.

I will be very glad to visit with Mr. Bogacki or other so-called communist employers if they want to talk further about this.

In as much as this will probably be the last time I shall attend an I.L.O. Conference, I may be forgiven if I indulge in a little personal comment. My comment is this. I thank the Almighty and the founding fathers of my nation that I have been a free man. I thank Him also for the fact that the labour delegation and the Government delegation of the United States are also free men. I thank Him for the fact that we may disagree with each other without fear of reprisal or punishment. I was the son of immigrant parents; I lived in very poor circumstances as a boy. The fact that I have been able to achieve moderate economic success is not the thing that pleases me most, but that I have been able somehow to serve my fellow men. I would say to you as a parting wish, as a parting hope—and I mean to include all of you, those from the communist nations as well—that if you have not achieved this kind of freedom which it has been my pleasure to enjoy, and opportunities for people, I do hope, in the not too distant future, you will all have this kind of freedom so that we can be friends and understand each other and walk along the road hand in hand for the benefit and help of all mankind.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BAH (Workers' delegate, Guinea)—In bringing the fraternal greetings of the workers and the people of the Republic of Guinea to the honourable delegates at the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference, I should like to take this opportunity to extend to Mr. Raza, the distinguished representative of Pakistan, our warmest congratulations on the confidence which this assembly has shown in him by electing him President.

The workers of my country have also asked me to express their welcome, on their entry into our Organisation, to our sister country of Zambia and also Yemen, Malta and Malawi. We wish these new States full success in the consolidation of their independence and in their activities in international life, for the liberation of other peoples, for social progress and peace in the world.

We are thus optimistic when we see the tendency towards universality which the I.L.O. is showing every year and we hope that at the next session of the Conference the I.L.O. will finally admit to membership the valiant peoples, such as those of Viet-Nam, struggling for their freedom and unity, and the peoples of the People's Republic of China unjustly kept out of the UN bodies in spite of their 675 million inhabitants.

The Director-General of the I.L.O. in his Report touched on the important problem of the utilisation of human resources. We consider this problem to be absolutely basic to any country which really wishes to promote economic and social life conforming to the legitimate interests of its workers and of its labouring masses.

Man in fact is the most precious of all capital. Therefore, the efforts of every responsible body should be aimed at the constant improvement of the living conditions and the standard of life of the people of the country as well as the satisfaction of their constantly growing needs.

The achievement of such objectives presupposed, of course, methods of action which will lead all those persons firmly and in full liberty, to assume their responsibilities and to participate in the planning, the decisions and in the application of the economic, social and cultural programmes of their country. This requires an implicit individual and collective awareness which requires at all times a courageous and responsible attitude. To us, the true freedom of man as an element in society takes on meaning only through the lucidity with which man conceives and makes his own decisions, aimed at achieving all that affects the life of the community to which he belongs and, through that community, his own life.

That is why, when we achieved independence in 1958, we were well aware of the fact that sovereignty simply meant responsibility and that no people can feel free unless they are fully and totally responsible. It is in undertaking its responsibilities with conviction that our party, thanks to the farsightedness of its great leader, has succeeded in eliminating the old economic structures inherited from the colonial régime, which were based on a type of colonial trading company, and replaced them by a modern structure which perfectly coincides with the needs and aspirations of our people. Remaining uncompromising in their opposition to laziness, selfishness and irresponsibility, our productive forces, which have been freed from all domination and oppression, have courageously set to work and have contributed greatly to the rapid growth of our national economic bases. Today, thanks to the stability of our national currency and the proper management of our finances, we ourselves control our own economy which is perfectly healthy. Two economic development plans, one a three-year plan which has been completed and one a seven-year plan which has been started, have already contributed to a definite improvement in our communications, our infrastructure in roads, airports, ports and railways and have created throughout the territory a number of processing industries to meet the immediate needs of the population: mills producing wood for building and furniture, brick factories, textile mills, tobacco plants, match factories, canning plants, saw mills, and so on. Also, various hydroelectric dams have been built and an electric power station of great capacity has been in operation for a number of months.

Along with our industry, our agriculture is developing, thanks to the intensive activity of our peasant co-operatives and the numerous machines and modern equipment made available to them by our State. Handicraft works are also developing, giving a vigorous impetus to national economic growth.

In the social field we have more primary, secondary and higher schools. Thanks to reforms in this sector, our education is no longer anything like what it was under colonialism, the main objective of which was the training of a handful of subordinate staff and the maintenance of all the others in systematic ignorance. Our reforms are aimed at a deep knowledge of the great possibilities for exploitation of the rich cultural heritage of Africa, its history, its literature and its arts, with, at the same time, a fuller knowledge of mathematics and natural sciences. The efforts of the population are just as important in those aspects relating to the rehabilitation and the renovation of African culture and art, through the creation of national ballets and instrumental groups, which have already been applauded in a number of countries in Africa, Asia, Europe and America.

A modern stadium with 25,000 seats which was built at Conakry has contributed to the further encouragement for physical-culture activities in all fields.

The building of hospitals in urban centres and dispensaries in the most isolated villages is also being carried out and, thanks to the dynamism of our health services and of our mobile teams engaged in the control of the great endemic diseases, and the positive action of health personnel in maternity and child protection, diseases and mortality rates have diminished considerably.

Uncompromising war has been declared on illiteracy and considerable progress has been achieved in this field.

Our labour code, renowned for its revolutionary and democratic content, has been in force since 30 June 1960 (Act No. 1/AN/60), and this was followed immediately in 1961 by the Social Security Code. This last code is well known to the specialists of the I.L.O. and it is certainly one of the most progressive social security codes in the world today. It covers all social risks and provides for benefits of all kinds; it provides for a 100 per cent. refund of medical and pharmaceutical care costs—all of this without any contribution by the worker.

Our trade union movement, which achieved unity immediately after independence, is today a dynamic organisation in our country. Its work encompasses not only the defence of the interests of the workers of the Republic, but also, and above all, the education of the worker to enable him to participate in the management of national resources, in the planning, decisions and application of economic and social programmes. This education aims at making the workers more aware of the objective necessity to struggle constantly to ensure a permanent increase in national productivity and production.

The National Confederation of Workers of Guinea has, for this purpose, a great university, which was built in 1960 and which has contributed to the training of a number of African and Guinean leaders. Thanks to this training, our trade union movement has contributed to making available to the population many well-trained leaders as the heads of undertakings and administrative services.

We have made great progress in many fields, but we are aware that there is a great deal yet to be done. We are aware of our shortcomings and our backwardness, owing to reasons of an historical nature. But we are convinced that these shortcomings and backwardness will not remain eternal stumbling blocks in the path of progress of our people. Thanks to our revolutionary conscience, to the creative energy and to the capacity for mobilisation and organisation of our people, also thanks to the tremendous resources of our soil and our subsoil, we shall shortly overcome underdevelopment and make our contribution to the general efforts of the peoples of Africa and of the world in their struggle for social progress, peace, and for the happiness of mankind.

In this connection, the workers of the Republic of Guinea appreciate what has already been done by the I.L.O. and hope that in their desire for development and social progress, the I.L.O. contribution will continue. They also hope that further considerable efforts will be made by our international Organisation on behalf of other countries, notably the developing countries, in the training and advanced training of technical staff.

Another point has also drawn our attention. As everyone knows, it is obvious that our world today is characterised by great forward strides and rapid transformations in the political, economic and social life of various nations. This is particularly evident in the developing countries. That is why we feel that the I.L.O. must devote its attention to transforming its basic structure—particularly that of the Governing Body and other organs of the administration—in order to work towards an equitable distribution of seats at all levels.

I should be failing in my duty if I concluded my speech without expressing the profound indignation of the workers and the people of my country at the crimes perpetrated by Portuguese imperialism in its African colonies. Portuguese colonialism, despite the appeal of all the people wishing for peace and justice, continues to ignore the most elementary rules of fundamental human rights and persists in pursuing its hateful policy of exterminating the peoples of Angola, Mozambique and Bissau Guinea.

But we state solemnly that Africa will remain worthy of its destiny and will never renounce the reconquest of its total freedom regardless of the difficulties and violence which it may encounter. We are sure that Angola, Mozambique and Guinean Guinea will win their total independence.

We are also convinced that the International Labour Organisation, which is faithful to its policy of peace, justice and liberty, will not hesitate, as it has already done in the case of the racists of South Africa, to contribute to the elimination from our assembly of all unworthy representation of these Portuguese colonialists.

Mr. Fennema (Employers' delegate, Netherlands)—I have the honour to speak rather late in the debate on the Director-General's Report, and therefore I feel some hesitation in repeating what more than 150 speakers have already done before me—congratulating you, Sir, on your election as President of this Conference. Perhaps it is now more appropriate to congratulate you on the fact that the greater part of this Conference is already over and that a period of greater personal freedom for you is in sight.

But I should like to congratulate you, in particular, on the firm and decisive way in which you prevented a number of speakers, particularly those representing countries which entered this Organisation through the back door of the United Nations, from transforming this International Labour Conference into a political annex of the United Nations.

As I participated in the meetings of the Working Party of the Governing Body on programme and structure I think it is not for me at this moment to develop further thoughts with regard to the three major programmes, but rather to listen to what other delegates have to submit for the guidance of the Working Party. I have the impression that the three major programmes do not lead to very different views.

Probably to stimulate an animated discussion, the Director-General has already included in his Report his views with regard to the future tasks of standard-setting of this Organisation; and this appears to be a most controversial subject as long as a great number of delegates consider international standards as the primary tools for social progress. At last year's session of the Conference we heard many voices from the developing countries indicating that standard-setting activities are of little practical value for these countries. For instance, the Indian Government delegate, Mr. Dube, in the discussion of the report on women workers with family responsibilities, declared last year—and I quote—"What I have just said casts serious doubt on one very important function of the I.L.O.—its normative function. To be worth while norms must conform to the highest prevailing conditions, but because of their very nature they are bound not to be relevant to countries where such conditions do not prevail. I am constrained to remark that the I.L.O. should do its best to allay this misapprehension, if it is a misapprehension, regarding the lack of relevance to the majority of its Members of one of its most important functions.

At this Conference we have heard also many statements of the same nature, with which I feel myself in complete agreement, and if the I.L.O. wants to be more than an overloaded bureaucracy in an ivory tower, it should notice the winds of change in the nature of its activities.

The problem is to create jobs in the underdeveloped countries, and one cannot create jobs by standard-setting.

We know how difficult it is to obtain minor changes in the direction in which the I.L.O. is going. A little jet gun will not suffice to put the I.L.O. on another orbit. Fifteen years ago a Government delegate of the United States recommended that there should be more waste paper baskets in this conference building because the ashtrays were overloaded with waste paper. The situation is still exactly as it was 15 years ago, and will not change before this hall has shared the fate of the building where 30 years ago the International Labour Conference took place—the Bâtiment électoral near Place Neuve, now completely destroyed by fire.

On several occasions in the past I have already shown my dissatisfaction concerning the methods of the so-called debate on the Director-General's Report. It is really no debate but an incoherent rhapsody of speeches in which it is impossible for an ordinary human being to find his way, although it may be helpful to the Director-General because he can always find somewhere some support for every proposal or suggestion he has made.

I welcome, therefore, the proposal which has been supported amongst others by Mr. Grandval, Minister of Labour of France, to substitute for a long theoretical discussion of the Director-General's Report in plenary session the examination of this Report by a committee, where a real exchange of views could take place, with the result that the Director-General could receive a much clearer indication of the common trend of thought in the Conference. It seems possible to start such a new procedure on an experimental basis to find out how it works, because I think it becomes clearer every year that the present system is no longer a workable solution. Moreover, if the committee procedure were adopted, the speakers from this rostrum would no longer have to make their speeches in a conference hall where generally more than 80 per cent. of the seats are empty.

More important and more dangerous is the wind of change concerning resolutions relating to matters not included in an item on the agenda. Resolutions are meant, in my opinion, to provide an opportunity for expressing the general wishes of the Conference for the guidance of the Governing Body and the Director-General. But the resolution procedure was not meant to be used for condemning specific countries, where the Republic of South Africa was condemned by way of a resolution for its policy of apartheid, which is violating one of the fundamental principles of this Organisation, I can accept, because our Constitution provided no other means for action against such a defaulting Member. However, I think that the resolution procedure is abused in cases where the Constitution or the procedure of the Governing Body contain specific measures for taking action.

One member State is now accused by another member State of not having secured the effective observance of the Two Forced Labour Conventions; both member States have ratified these Conventions, but the one member State has not ratified these Conventions, but the question arises whether the accused member State is the only one in this Organisation which is not providing freedom of association to its trade unions. If it is not the only one, all other member States in the same position should not be omitted from the resolution, and particularly those which have ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 but which do not respect the obligations resulting from their ratification.

Another member State, by way of a draft resolution, is accused of not guaranteeing freedom of association to trade unions. There is no violation of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), as the member State has not ratified these Conventions, but the question arises whether the accused member State is the only one in this Organisation which is not providing freedom of association to its trade unions. If it is not the only one, all other member States in the same position should not be omitted from the resolution, and particularly those which have ratified Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 but which do not respect the obligations resulting from their ratification.

The queer thing about this last-mentioned draft resolution is that it also requests recognition of the right of free expression, although it was presented by a delegate and supported by the Government of a country where, six weeks ago, a young professor, Professor Mikailov, was condemned to ten months' imprisonment for publishing an article, " Moscow, Summer 1964 ", in which he had compared Soviet concentration camps to Nazi death camps. I do hope to see Professor Mikailov in this hall as a delegate of his country one day. He is the right man for the I.L.O., which he proved in his statement before the court: " I consider that Stalinism is no better than Fascism. That is why I have made the comparison in order to show that totalitarianism is always the same, regardless of whether it is Fascist or Stalinist, no matter under what sign, and no matter what social system it tends to realise."

This brings me to the next point with which I should like to deal. A number of delegates, in practice all coming from what they call socialist countries, in practice all coming from what they call socialist countries, with the Republic of South Africa was condemned by way of a resolution for its policy of apartheid, which is seats in the organs of the I.L.O., they want to be President of the Conference and Chairman of the Governing Body, and at the same time they play with the tripartite structure of our Organisation. This tripartite structure means that workers' and employers' representatives have to be independent of their Government and of one another, and the so-called principle of universality—which, by the way, is mentioned nowhere in the Constitution—can never overrule the principle of tripartism. It is clear that the situation is quite different in the other specialised agencies of the United Nations, where only governments are represented and where no tripartite structure is involved. We have to protect and to defend our Organisation against the winds of change if they blow the I.L.O. to the shores of dictatorship. We have to protect and to defend our Organisation against the winds of change if they blow the I.L.O. to the shores of dictatorship.

Unfortunately, the representatives of the communist countries do not show any signs of improvement in their human relations. It was not Western Europe that built the Iron Curtain and the Berlin Wall, which suppress the freedom of workers to migrate for employment and settlement, referred to in Part III of the Declaration of Philadelphia.

However, the problem of safeguarding freedom of association is under consideration by the Governing Body. Last year the Conference adopted a resolution concerning freedom of association. It invited the Governing Body of the I.L.O. "(a) to strengthen its efforts to induce all the States Members of the International Labour Organisation to ratify and apply Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, reminding them that fundamental principles of the Organisation are involved; (b) to study the possibility of including in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation certain essential principles contained in these Conventions; (c) to consider likewise how the machinery of the International Labour Organisation for the protection of freedom of association may best be strengthened; (d) in the light of findings resulting from the action recommended in (b) and (c) above, to consider including the whole question in the agenda of an early session of the Conference;".

As a result of this resolution the Governing Body at its 160th Session in November 1964 took the decision to ask the Director-General to prepare a background paper dealing with the possibility of amending the I.L.O. Constitution in order to include certain essential principles contained in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98, on the basis of which it could discuss the matter further at its 162nd Session. Such was the decision of the Governing Body, and, although the background paper has not yet been distributed, it is clear that, in the near future, the Governing Body will have to examine this question further.

I do hope that this examination will not only stop a further undermining of the tripartite structure, but rather will strengthen this very special feature of the I.L.O. Our task with regard to the social and economic development of the new countries needs the co-operation of free trade unions and free employers' organisations. These freedoms should not be abolished by the winds of change.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. POLYAKOV (Employers' delegate, U.S.S.R.)—Our Conference is approaching the end of its work. From this rostrum, delegates of many countries have mentioned the changes taking place in the world, and have not concealed their dissatisfaction with the programme, structure and methods of work of the International Labour Organisation. They have voiced disappointment over the fact that the Director-General's Report does not reply to a number of vital problems. This session has shown once again that the I.L.O. must at last become a genuinely universal international organisation that will react firmly to the events taking place in the world and will consistently and resolutely uphold the cause of peace and social progress.

The achievements of science in the twentieth century, and of the workers and engineers employed in industry, make it possible to solve the basic problems facing humanity: the fight against hunger, disease and poverty. Industry and science have the new tasks of harnessing the wealth of the oceans, the deserts and outer space.

The purpose of the I.L.O. is to work for social progress, for equal rights for all, for better working conditions and, above all, for peace. However, these vital problems—upon the solution of which depends to a great extent the establishment of peace throughout the world—and the struggles of the peoples for independence and freedom are still being handled slowly and vaguely by the I.L.O.

One of the main reasons is that certain circles are disconcerted by the new possibilities that have arisen of making better use of the I.L.O. as an instrument to promote international peace and security. Speaking of democracy, they repeatedly oppose the role of the I.L.O. as a centre for equal participation by all States. The main driving force in the present onslaught by reactionary forces against the basic provisions of the Constitution has always come from individual representatives of capitalist firms and organisations who regard the I.L.O. as their private reserve. Certain Employers from capitalist countries are still continuing at the sessions of the I.L.O. Conference to spread fear through the supposed menace of the socialist countries, encouraging their allies to continue discrimination, and trampling underfoot the legitimate rights of the socialist Employers. These arguments, however, are so outworn that they can no longer have any effect on any self-respecting person.

This morning the Director of the United States Chamber of Commerce has once again taken the liberty—as he has done every year for the past six years—of engaging in slanderous accusations against my country. He has long since acquired the reputation of a man who specialises in misinformation and in introducing discord in our work. Everything here irritates him: the successes of the socialist countries and the struggle of the peoples for their liberation. He even attempted to represent the aggressive war his country is waging in Vietnam as a benefaction. This pitiful demagogic onslaught cannot detract from the genuine advance of our countries, which are free from exploitation and enslavement. I sincerely pity you, Mr. Wagner, for history has written off the régime you praise. I hope that your successor will use more parliamentary language when he takes the floor.

We are not asking for charity here. We, the representatives of the great Soviet Union, which, thanks to the labour of our talented people, has turned in a relatively short span of time from an economically backward country into one of the major industrial powers of the modern world, insistently demand that an end be put to the reactionary role of the so-called "free" employers, and that the obsolete Constitution and Standing Orders be democratized.

Half a century ago the leaders of the capitalist countries arrogantly proclaimed that the days of the small nations were over and that the day of empires had come. Today we see that after the long nightmare of colonialism the sun is shining again in Africa. The hurricane of liberation has swept the colonial empires from the face of Africa. The prediction of Victor Hugo that in the twentieth century Africa would be free is coming true. In the same way as it is indisputable that the Nile flows through Africa, no one can deny the historical fact that the collapse of colonialism is closely linked with the Russian Revolution, which aroused the revolutionary spirit and energy of the African peoples. The great religion of free Africa, admits the Baltimore Sun, is socialism: almost everybody worships it or professes it in one way or another.

In its relations with the young States my country has established a new type of international economic relations based on the principle of equality and mutual advantage. We are engaged in multilateral co-operation with the developing countries in the economic, technical and cultural fields and in the training of their national personnel. The main value of our economic co-operation with the liberated countries is that it helps the peoples of those countries to lay the foundations of their own national economies and thus achieve genuine economic independence.

Today in the countries of Asia, Africa and Latin America, with the help of the socialist countries, vast construction work is going on. With the help of the Soviet Union alone, 500 industrial and other projects are being carried out. More than 400 industrial and other projects have been or are being carried out with the help of Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Poland and other socialist countries. Our trade ties are growing constantly. The Soviet Union is engaged in trade with 35 developing countries. During the past ten years the over-all volume of trade between the Soviet Union and those countries has increased five-fold. In exchange for the traditional exports of the developing countries the socialist countries are supplying equipment and the latest machinery. The conclusion of long-term trade agreements with the Soviet Union ensures the developing countries of a market for their products for several years ahead, and the continuous crisis-free growth of the socialist economy provides the most favourable prospects for further expansion of trade.

Under the impact of socialism the process of social renewal throughout the world is going ahead very rapidly. The socialist countries already account for 26 per cent. of the total surface of the earth and 35 per cent. of its population. The share of the socialist countries in world industrial output has risen to 38 per cent. During a short time, in the course of a single generation, our country has multiplied its economic potential. It has a highly developed industry, it has achieved an outstanding position in such branches of science as physics, chemistry, biology, cybernetics, and electronics. We have highly qualified engineering and technical personnel and a skilled labour force. My country has the services of people equipped with up-to-date knowledge and a progressive ideology. They are ready for great exploits and are capable of carrying out 600 new large-scale industrial plants were inaugurated in the past year and considerable technical progress has been achieved. More than 3,000 new types of machines were devised and some 1,200 devices for production control and automation. Further improvements were introduced in the material and cultural conditions of the people. Wages were raised for more than 1.5 million workers, and for employees in all the service branches. During the same period over 10 million people moved into new homes. There are 73 million people with advanced or intermediate school education, and 68 million, that is to say one-third of the total population, are engaged in some form of education.

Our successes are great, but our peoples are still not satisfied with what has been achieved. The economy poses problems that demand new solutions; such problems are due partly to the need to improve the administration of an expanding economy. We are now concentrating our forces on carrying out the present annual plan. The incontrovertible advantages of socialism are so obvious that they cannot be denied even by the ideologists of imperialism. It was not without sadness that William Randolph Hearst Jr., who had visited some of the European socialist countries, admitted that the humble worker has a better lot, a higher standard of living than ever before. He went on to say that socialism is here to stay and that no idle talk can change this fact.

The world is living in alarming times and here in this Conference attempts are being made to divert attention from the suffering of the labouring masses in many countries which are subjected to aggression. The sympathies of my people are wholly on the side of the patriots who are struggling for freedom. The whole world of labour emphatically condemns the war that has been started by the American imperialists in Viet-Nam and demands insistently that an end should be put to the aggression and that every people should be given the right to determine its own future. The activities of peace-loving forces, their unity and their determination to scotch the aggressors' plans are of great importance to the I.L.O. also. The I.L.O. must protest against the imperialist provocations in Asia and Latin America. Developments show that there is only one path along which international relations can and must now progress: the peaceful coexistence of States with different social and political systems, non-interference in the domestic affairs of other countries, the recognition of the right of all peoples. to live in freedom and independence and to determine their own future by themselves.

Mr. HAUSMAN (Employers' delegate, Israel) —Permit me, first of all, Sir, to congratulate you on your election to the presidency of this session of the Conference and at the same time to welcome the countries which have recently joined our Organisation.

The unprecedented growth of I.L.O. membership in the past few years has caused not only new initiatives but also a qualitative change in our Organisation. Almost all the department Members fall within the category of developing countries, and the Organisation is not fully prepared to meet the challenge of the situation. The imbalance existing now between the urgent need for increased technical assistance and the means and measures for the granting of such assistance cannot easily be overcome.

It may safely be assumed that one of the difficulties—the need for quite extensive changes in the structure, activity and programmes of the I.L.O.—is on the point of positive solution as a result of the steps that have already been taken as well as of those envisaged by the Director-General in his Report. Another difficulty is the lack of a sufficient number of experts willing to undertake missions in the developing countries. The present favourable economic situation and the shortage of highly skilled manpower in most of the developing countries are to a great extent responsible for this state of affairs.

I would suggest that to relieve this situation the I.L.O. could benefit not only from a renewed appeal to the industrialised countries to provide expert help to the needy countries but also from a co-ordination between the Organisation and individual countries which extend technical assistance on the basis of bilateral agreements. This could be done, I submit, by the I.L.O.'s concentrating more on such fields of activity as are aligned for long-term periods. On the other hand, short-term programmes, such as seminars, specific training courses and other specific activities, could be organised within the framework of bilateral assistance schemes.

I have a further suggestion to make in this connection to which I will return when speaking on regional activities.

I am in full agreement with the emphasis that has been placed in the Director-General's Report on the need to integrate policies and activities in the development of human resources with economic development planning. One of the major problems in the developing countries is how to activate within the shortest possible time potential manpower resources, entrepreneur initiative and the support and co-operation of the public. The natural medium for such activation in these countries is usually the government, since other potential sources of economic and social activity, such as employers' and workers' organisations, are either practically non-existent, or too limited in scope, means, status and vision to be able to play their proper role in co-operating step by step with the government in the process of development.

Such situations form a vicious circle in which the almost exclusive, and therefore excessive, activity and power of the government prevent the free growth of voluntary organisations.
On the other hand, only through the channels of such organisations is it possible to awaken and develop the forces dormant in a nation which is free and intends to remain free. This vicious circle can only be broken if the employers' and workers' organisations are made aware at an early stage of the development process of the importance of their role and if government make it the task of such emancipation by appropriate means.

Indeed, one of the important tasks which the I.L.O. should undertake is that of finding ways and means to foster the harmonious and balanced growth of all the forces, even if such growth would be less conspicuous than more rapid growth due solely to governmental activity.

As the Director-General clearly indicates, the technical assistance programme for the developing countries has to take the form, in coordination with other United Nations agencies, of over-all programming for general education, vocational training, workers' education, management development and economic and administrative development.

The planning and execution of such wide and integrated programmes require many teams of experts in the various fields of social and economic sciences and in public administration, and will need much greater resources than are at present at the disposal of our Organisation.
In addition, as has been indicated by the Director-General, such activity involves a much closer geographical contact with the developing countries because all planning and activity must be based on first-hand knowledge of local conditions. The strengthening of regional offices and activities, based on geographical distribution, is therefore well in line with the needs of our time.

This need for experts, together with the necessity for an intimate knowledge of local conditions, would suggest the advisability of considering the recruitment of some of the experts from within the regions themselves. If this suggestion were accepted the I.L.O. would have to elaborate a programme for the training and development of experts.

In addition to the first priority—namely that of rendering extensive technical assistance in developing countries—the I.L.O. cannot but continue or even increase its activity in the field of research and the dis-ssemination of information as well as in that of the administration and supervision of the existing International Labour Code. It must also watch closely and be sensitive to new problems arising in the industrially developed parts of the world, and must search for the solution of such problems as the social and economic results of automation.

Considering all these new demands and challenges on the one hand and the limited financial and human resources of our Organisation on the other, would it not be advisable to call a halt to, or at least to restrict to the minimum, for some years to come the standard-setting activity which absorbs so much of its human and financial means?

I agree wholeheartedly with the Director-General's proposals for a simplified procedure for the revision of Conventions and Recommendations, provided all the necessary safeguards are employed. Some delegates have suggested that the international standards should be adjusted to regional conditions and needs. I would like to express my opinion that once we abolish the principle of the universality of international standards we shall perpetuate the disparity between developed and developing countries and between countries with greater and lesser degrees of understanding of and susceptibility to social justice and freedom, and by our very decision we shall be defying the basic purposes and ideals of our Organisation.

TWENTY-FOURTH SITTING

Thursday, 17 June 1965, 3.15 p.m.

President : Mr. Raza

The PRESIDENT—We now resume our discussion of the Report of the Director-General.

Interpretation from French : Mr. TAMPUNGU (Workers' delegate, Congo (Leopoldville))—Mr. President, thank you for allowing me to speak in order that I may give you the reflections of the Congo workers on the Report now placed before the session by the Director-General. I associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating you on your election to the Chair. In the name of the workers of the Congo, I welcome the newest independent States whose representatives are here for the first time. I would like to express to the Director-General the satisfaction of the workers of my country for the positive constructive Report which he places before the delegates to this 49th Session. I confirm here the opinions of the Congolese workers already expressed here by my Workers' delegate comrades who were at the 47th and 48th Sessions and at the Second African Regional Conference on some of the matters dealt with in the Director-General's Report. The support of the workers of my country for the constructive and realistic proposals contained in the Director-General's Report is based on the fact that the Report meets their requests. The Director-General understands that without unity and co-operation it is difficult to bring a country out of its state of underdevelopment and raise the standard of living of the working population. Since our country's accession to independence, we have not ceased to call on the authorities for application of the national austerity policy, based on an economic and social development plan, in which the trade unions, peasants and employers must co-operate. Despite the difficulties of all kinds that my country is going through, this demand has been partially satisfied. The Constitution of the Congo, in the drafting of which we participated, sets up under government agencies at the central and provincial levels economic and social councils composed of representatives of the most common economic and social activities.

The National Council of the Union of Congolese Workers, which met in January of this year, did not merely call for application of the constitution clauses in this regard; in a document published after the meeting it also made definite practical proposals on the procedure to be followed regarding the formulation, conception, application and supervision of the plan, and regarding the operation of the economic and social councils.

For the third time the Conference has to discuss the programme and structure of the I.L.O. It is better to restrict ourselves to the items on the agenda of the session in the light of the objectives coming within the traditional competence of the I.L.O. Delegates in their speeches should avoid introducing questions which are within the competence of the other specialised agencies to which the I.L.O. States Members belong. This would avoid confusion and complication.

As for the new structure, it is preferable to give it time to prove itself in practice. However, the I.L.O. being the only tripartite inter-governmental institution, it would have been desirable for its structure to provide for machinery guaranteeing tripartism, not only in the Conference and the Governing Body but also at the level of the Directorate.

As for the programme areas of the I.L.O., the workers of my country approve the proposals regarding the utilisation of human resources for economic and social development. They have been ceaselessly calling for this from the Congolese authorities since we acceded to national sovereignty. They believe that to reach these objectives the I.L.O. will have to increase its efforts in the field of education. This should cover not only trade union officers but also the officials of the public administration responsible for employment problems and planning, and also management grades in undertakings in the private sector.

The I.L.O. could, within this same field, help governments to establish or develop, as the case may be, people's education in their countries. The personnel would then be available for the application and supervision of plans in public administration and private establishments. The masses, thus prepared, would readily make efforts which would enable plans to be applied in conditions favourable to economic and social development.
Regarding the development of social institutions, the Democratic Republic of the Congo has not ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention or the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention. On the other hand, social legislation in my country is in constant progress. The Constitution of the Congo guarantees freedom of association. Orders and decrees have been issued and applied regarding social security, contracts for hire of services, collective bargaining and collective agreements, occupational grading, labour management relations and representation of personnel in undertakings.

The first social elections were democratically organised in the various undertakings of the Congo in the second half of 1964. Of ten trade union organisations which put up candidates, my union was the victor with 65 per cent. of the votes, the other 35 per cent. being divided among the other nine organisations. This result confirms what we have always said here, namely that we are the most representative organisation, for on 31 December 1964 we had 92,413 paid-up members, more than 30 member federations and ten occupational associations, 70 permanent officers, 60 administrative officers, of whom 130 full-time officers were paid by our union, apart from the many volunteer workers. Although social legislation progresses and the trade unions develop, two main difficulties emerge: the lack of honest, competent trade union officers able to apply and supervise social legislation, and the ill-will or lack of understanding on the part of some employers who, on various pretexts, take a reactionary attitude towards the justified claims of the workers.

This attitude is an opportunity for extremists to exploit the population by dividing it, and then introducing war, under cover of economic stagnation and poverty. When a collective dispute arises, calumny and corruption displace justice, force is introduced and solutions imposed, instead of being negotiated. Some employers are so powerful that they can even subvert the present form of government. The action of the trade unions is described by them as subversion. These are motives which will lead governments, they hope, to mistrust the unions and adopt a hostile attitude towards their free development. The authorities can thus be tempted to establish a single trade union obedient to them, which will do nothing for the workers, as is already the case in some countries where the governments and employers, fearing the action of independent trade unions which would prevent abuses, regard the existence of more than one trade union as a restriction on development.

The I.L.O. must pay attention to the motives of governments that advocate a single trade union movement and should ensure that such unity does not crush the workers whom it is supposed to benefit. Trade union diversity and membership of international organisations are not a handicap to economic and social development. What is a handicap to development is the lack of an austerity policy based on a plan jointly produced and supervised by the whole community in accordance with the proposals contained in the Report of the Director-General. The African governments should know that their refusal to associate trade union representatives in the formulation and conception of economic and social development planning and their dictatorial attitude in imposing plans or points of view without negotiation or consultation are obstacles to their own development plans.

Regarding the results of economic and social policy since accession to independence, an African Head of State, well known for his "unitary" attitude, said this year that his economic and social policy was not profitable to the working classes of his country, but that it contributed to creating a bourgeois class among the public servants. This leads us to conclude that if the Head of State of that country had not stifled the action of the trade unions and if the laws had not established trade unions devoted to the State, and if the trade unions and free associations of employers and peasants had been associated in planning, then that Head of State would not have found himself in such a situation after eight years' independence.

On the basis of all these considerations and the experience drawn from the events since accession to independence, the workers of the Congo firmly believe that the time has come to unite all the population in order to consolidate independence and unity, with a view to putting into effect our reconstruction on the basis of an over-all plan. Therefore, they entirely share the opinion stated in the Director-General's Report that: "It is generally agreed that I.L.O. action in the field of labour relations and the development of institutions which determine and harmonise these relations must be inspired by the fundamental principle that efforts for economic and social development must be undertaken with the active participation of the interested parties; and that they must be based on a frank dialogue between the State and different organised social groups, a dialogue inspired by mutual understanding, by mutual respect for each other's autonomy and freedom of action, and by a determination to reach agreement.

We also approve the point of view in the Director-General's Report according to which: "Governments must also aim at establishing the necessary machinery for the examination and solution of differences which might arise between workers and employers, taking into account the interests of the nation as a whole.

The goal of economic growth will not be attained or brought any nearer by the elimination of the very notion of conflict, but rather by attempting to prevent conflicts from arising or, when they do, by applying methods of conciliation, negotiation or arbitration in order to bring out and emphasise the elements in the situation on which a more fruitful co-operation might be built."

The workers ask the I.L.O. to address the employers also, because it is in the interest of all that they should remain open-minded. Some of their attitudes do not facilitate the task of our governments in this field.

I now come to the question of living and working conditions. The workers of my country, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, accepting the utilisation of human resources and the improvement of conditions of life and work, feel that the action of the I.L.O. in this field must figure in the forefront of our priorities. For us this is a vital question. At the same time as the economy is developed, the conditions of work and life of the population must also be improved. These conditions are the subject of social disputes which sometimes disturb economic development. The I.L.O. must advise governments and draw the attention of employers to these matters. Economic development of the developing countries should not be achieved at the expense of the workers.

The association of workers in management has been approved by the workers of the Congo. This is indeed included in the action programme of our organisation, of which I am one of the national officers. That is the only way to be taken if one wishes the workers to feel responsible for the conduct of the undertaking. This objective must be reached.

The suggestions of the Director-General regarding the standard-setting action of the I.L.O. and the various interventions by delegates in the Conference have had the attention of the workers of my country. This problem is very delicate. In the opinion of our workers, the I.L.O. should pay attention regarding certain suggestions. The opinion that there should be a distinction between principles to which there cannot be any exception and measures for application in particular groups of countries are not bad in themselves. However, when one considers the historical background to this standard-setting action and when one considers relations between the countries, developed and developing, we Congo workers have our reservations.

Another situation is of concern to our workers, and that is peace. If programmes are to be achieved we certainly must have peace in the country. The situation in my country is not good. The workers therefore ask the representatives of the countries here to use their influence in their countries so that a stop to be achieved we certainly must have peace. This objective must be reached.

Mr. SATTLER (Employers' delegate, Hungary). The Report of the Director-General gives a concise account of last year's activities of the I.L.O.

I think that today it would be premature to evaluate the success of the reorganisation of the Office. Therefore, I should prefer to deal in my comments first of all with one of the three main fields of activity—namely the question of labour relations, and to contribute some ideas towards the elucidation of the problems prevailing in this domain.

In the course of production, there arise and exist amongst working people relationships of different kinds, both as regards their content and form. In the first place, I would mention the relationships among colleagues, the relationships between superiors and subordinates, relationships established by co-ordination of various fields of action, friendships, groups or party organisations based upon an identity of political views, trade union groupings and so on. All these relationships are essentially determined, however, both in respect of their form and content, by whether, in the respective society, production is carried out within the framework of a capitalist or a socialist régime.

It is well known that in my country we have a socialist economic system and on this basis the Hungarian employers can solve a great number of questions regarding labour relations in a different way from, and, in my humble judgment, more successfully than the employers in capitalist economies.

Therefore, I miss in the Report of the Director-General an analysis of labour relations on the basis of the circumstances obtaining in production under a socialist régime. Had the Director-General included this, the Report, in my opinion, would have been substantially more positive and his analysis deeper than the present one. A blind eye should not be turned to the fact that at present two kinds of production system do exist in the world, side by side and simultaneously, merely divided geographically from one another, so that any realistic evaluation of the actual situation demands, amongst other things, a precise analysis of labour relations within both capitalist and socialist societies.

As a matter of fact, this deficiency in the Report cannot be made good or completed in such a short, time-limited contribution as mine here. Nevertheless, perhaps I may be permitted to mention a few aspects.

A very important problem of employers under both socialist and capitalist production systems is that of constituting and stabilising a constant, basic staff. Socialist employers lay very great stress upon forming this basic nucleus and their endeavours are supported in my country by certain labour legislation provisions. In order to develop a permanent working staff we offer many possibilities for encouragement and appreciation, in both material and moral respects. Our aim is to increase the security of the whole working staff, who are faithful to their enterprise and to secure basic permanent manpower by granting various privileges.

The establishment of a stabilised personnel helps in the successful solving of disputes which may arise between employers and employees. Stable labour has more developed and more efficient working methods; it is therefore able to attain a higher standard of productivity; its human relationships are smoother, due to mutual adaptation and assimilation, than in production collectives where there is a high fluctuation of labour. In this connection we would point out the importance of creating a good atmosphere and a good workshop climate in factories and, generally, in all production units.

A clear outlining of the perspectives for each worker and employee contributes to the creation of a good atmosphere. In my country, we are very interested in the regular examination and furthering of the possibilities for teaching and promoting individuals or categories of labourers. Besides the establishment of a pleasant atmosphere, we are all the more forced to do this as we have to organise and ensure the replacement of labour, a task which is becoming more and more one of the most important problems of the employers in my country.

A constant and high level of training unskilled labour to become skilled labour must be obtained, relying, of course, on the workers themselves in agreement with them and with their approval. An efficient and stimulating way of replacing staff members, both administrative and technical, is to select the best of the workers' category for this purpose, choosing and applying the required training methods. An important methodological means of doing this is through the setting up of a so-called training and staff development plan, the open nature of which allows for discussion of it with the workers and employees concerned.

The very large and varied educational network maintained by the State provides considerable help in this direction. This state network is well completed by courses and extension courses organised in the factories and workshops. I will give only one example which may be of some interest: whereas in the past post-graduate training for engineers was given exclusively at universities and thus was tied to the site of the university, today it is possible to undergo post-graduate training at certain larger factories as well; such arrangements have been made, in the first place, at remote works, and in this way great progress has been achieved in comparison with the past even in this very delicate and important field.

Permit me to come back to this morning's debate. We listened to the speech of Mr. Wagner, the Employers' delegate of the United States. I have to revert to the words he spoke because he mentioned my country in terms with which I suppose the majority of us disagree and, what is even more important, which cannot be proved by facts. I shall not use the style of the popular press which was used by Mr. Wagner; I simply want to state that Hungary, my country, has been oppressed by only one country—Nazi Germany—in the past 22 years. That country was the aggressor and not the Soviet Union, which liberated our country from the Nazi yoke. But aggression exists in those countries which at this Conference we are not allowed to call by their names. Let us judge by deeds and not by words.

Finally, I should like to make some remarks about the special report of the Director-General on the policy of apartheid, a report which, as decided by last year's Conference, is before us for the first time. I think I can express in the name of all the participants in the Conference our energetic protest against the further measures for extending racial discrimination in the field of labour that the South African Government has taken since our decision last year. As appears from the report, the new legislation increases and extends the compulsion to work, puts into force further restrictions and gives a practically free hand to all tyrannical acts against the African workers by means of mere administrative procedures, evading all legal procedure should it be of any formal character whatsoever. Acceptance of such ideas as "work-shy persons" or "undesirable persons" offers clear proof of the fact that the spreading of arbitrary autocracy is included in the Government's intentions.

Please allow me to quote from a report submitted to the United Nations General Assembly, document A.5840, which states that: "The policy of apartheid, which is being carried out in South-West Africa by the South African racist régime, offers the foreign companies every opportunity for the exploitation of the indigenous inhabitants. In fact, the exploitation of low-paid non-European workers is a feature of the territory's economic system, especially in its mining industry and agriculture. This enables the foreign companies and the local European farmers to reap high profits, and makes any improvement in the living conditions of the Africans impossible."

It clearly appears from the document mentioned that we employers must protest against the apartheid policy because it is inhuman and because we have to protect the essential fundamental human rights.

For how long do the South African exploiters want to get astronomical profits through the work of slaves whom they use instead of decently paid manpower?

At this session of the Conference a number of speakers have already criticised the special report of the Director-General—for instance Mr. Kibuka, the distinguished Workers' delegate of Uganda, who said that the report falls short of the spirit of the Declaration. Though I agree that this report, being the first one of its kind, may not be satisfactory in every respect, may I, nevertheless, point out that the Director-General is proceeding in the spirit of our decision taken last year if he submits in his yearly reports suggestions for measures to be taken by the Conference in order to protect the South African workers from the shameful discriminatory measures of their Government. The Director-General itself emphasises that the present session should specify what kind of positive measures are to be taken in fulfilment of our decision last year.
Since it appears clearly from the Director-General's special report that the Government of the South African Republic did not send the reports requested by the I.L.O., I suggest that the Conference should establish a permanent committee to study this question. The Conference should charge this committee with the duty of submitting every year constructive proposals for action to be taken in addition to, or as part of, the special report of the Director-General.

Racial discrimination is a very close relative of colonialism and of oppression against struggles for freedom and independence. I therefore feel obliged, at the end of my speech, to protest against the terrific contradiction which exists when we talk here about welfare and about raising living standards, while workers and peasants, women and children, are being killed by oppressors in, for instance, Angola, in Mozambique, in the Dominican Republic and in Viet-Nam. The I.L.O. has to fulfil its noble duty—it has to raise its voice unmistakably and decisively against war and for peace.

The PRESIDENT—The last speaker asked a question of the Chair. He asked whether an attack on communism is relevant to the agenda of this Conference. My answer is that neither an attack on communism nor an attack on capitalism is relevant to the agenda of this Conference.

I made my position clear on the day when an intervention was sought on the question of the relevancy of matters to this Conference. I then stated that although I may not agree with your views I will not stop you from expressing them. The only limitations which I have imposed are two: one is that I will not allow attacks on Heads of States, and this is a matter of protocol and a matter of precedent; the other is that we should avoid references to theatres of war, and that is because we do not want an atmosphere of cold war to prevail in this hall.

We meet here in order to exchange our views and try to bring about a consensus. Apart from these two limitations that I have imposed, I have not questioned the right of delegates to express their views on matters which are not relevant to the discussion. I leave it to their good sense to decide themselves.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. AIZPURU-RÚA (Employers' delegate, Panama)—I feel highly honoured to come again to this rostrum to comment on the Report of the Director-General, in which he has this year, most prudently, merely outlined a limited number of questions which refer to the programme and structure of the I.L.O., which, in his opinion, have received the approval of the Conference.

In his Report the Director-General faithfully keeps the promise he made to submit this year new proposals and ideas on points which, because of their importance, deserve our attention.

Knowing as I do the various subjects set forth by the Director-General in the excellent Reports that he submitted for the 1963 and 1964 Sessions of the Conference, and having studied carefully the new questions which he discusses so clearly and insightfully in the Report to this 49th Session of the Conference, I feel that it is not only a pleasure but also a duty on our part to extend to him our warmest congratulations and our encouragement so that he may persevere, as he has so brilliantly done up to the present, in the study of the great social, economic, labour and technical problems which fall within the objectives of the International Labour Organisation.

In the chapter on international labour standards, the Director-General brings out the fact that many speakers have made the statement that standard-setting continues to be an essential role of the I.L.O.; and, with the authority which he unquestionably has, he also indicates the need for approving new international standards. There is no question but that international standards are the backbone of the I.L.O., but there is also no doubt that the present international standards, which make up a sufficient programme for I.L.O. action towards its various objectives, have come up against enormous difficulties of application in the developing countries and also in some of the underdeveloped countries. The difficulties are due to the fact that the standards were adopted by the Organisation under the inspiration of highly industrialised countries, which followed very closely their own national legislation without giving due consideration to the situation of the less developed countries and to those countries which are still developing and which, without exaggerating, I believe we can say represent the majority of the States Members of this great Organisation.

The consequence of this is hesitation in the ratification and application by the less developed countries of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference. Also, the result frequently is that these standards and recommendations are approved in a symbolic way, which runs counter to the interests of the Organisation because subsequently they are not applied, as the Organisation desires, to regulate social, technical and labour conditions in a universal way. All of this shows that it would be more effective for the I.L.O. to concentrate on the operational activities that it has to carry out with the objective of getting all countries to bring their national laws up to uniform standards in conformity with the principles of the Organisation. Such practical action would be pertinent in so far as concerns the study of conditions in each country, technical assistance which they require for strengthening their private economy or organising their own labour legislation, stimulating productive industry which constitutes the principal source of employment, and, finally, anything which will help underdeveloped and developing countries to make sufficient progress to permit the application and observation of the international labour standards of the I.L.O.

We also feel that international instruments must be more flexible and realistic so as to take into account the existing conditions in member States which have not achieved complete economic development in order to permit the application of these instruments without endangering the economies of these countries. Only fundamental principles, such as human rights, should be the subject of precise Conventions.

In his Report the Director-General, with his customary sincerity, puts a direct question to the Conference when he asks for an opinion on the establishment of a programme for the development of social institutions. The Employers cannot ignore the Director-General's question, and we must refer in a very concrete way to the ideas which he has advanced in this connection. We feel we must attain the first objective which he mentioned, with respect to the development of truly representative and independent workers' and employers' organisations. On solid foundations in each country, they may efficiently play its own active part in the national effort for economic and social development. The assistance which the I.L.O. can give on this aspect of labour relations and the development of institutions which govern labour relations in each country would be of great value, since it is on the basis of these principles, for which the Organisation stands, that true social development can be created in each country, that social problems in the labour field can be solved.

Concerning the second objective referred to in the Report, the development of representative organisations, we also agree that representative organisations which exist or which will be created in each country must have the opportunity of playing their proper role in the development of the society to which they belong, and we quite agree with the Director-General that it is the governments themselves, because of the preponderant role of direction and management that they play in the process of economic and social programming and planning, which are in the best position to stimulate the development of these social organisations and see to it that they do participate effectively in the construction of national programmes.

We also agree with the third point referred to by the Director-General, relating to the aid which the I.L.O. should give to the governments of member States in organising proper administrative machinery to solve the complex problems arising out of industrial relations. The governments need new guidance and technical advisers who can harmonise the various social tendencies so that they may all work towards the adaptation and application of international standards which must inspire the respective national legislations.

Finally, in so far as concerns the fourth point in this Part of the Report, we must say that at no time have the Employers opposed the improvement of workers' conditions within undertakings, and indeed in their own interests they have always been in favour of meeting the aspirations of the worker concerning social security so long as they are within the possibilities of the undertaking and the needs of the economy of each country.

In this connection, we must call attention to a divergency of opinion which the Director-General very honestly mentioned. This concerns the share of the workers in the administration of the undertaking. The Employers must say very firmly that this principle is not desirable. A free undertaking is governed by private initiative, which requires from the employers, in the field of industrial competency, originality, careful thought and commitment, and these human conditions cannot always be found in everybody. Therefore, the selective attitude of the management officials of any undertaking, and of the technical experts of the undertaking, is governed by very careful and detailed specialisation and choice; within this field of action any initiative on the part of workers, who are perhaps simply interested in general management questions, would be a failure. Moreover we must be very careful always to defend the principle of private enterprise which is the foundation of democracy and the foundation of the social doctrine in all republican forms of government. If you do not respect this principle, and if you work towards inadequate socialisation, you will lose the independence of the employer and will soon reach the concept and conditions of a communist régime which puts all the activities of the State under one single direction, where free initiative cannot operate, and regimentation is the principle of human relations.

Moreover, to what extent would it be in the interests of those affected to transform the worker into an employer?

In some countries of Europe the system of giving the worker a share in running the undertaking has been tried out. So far, we do not know the results of this measure. I think it would be a good idea if the I.L.O. could observe in those countries whether it has been beneficial or whether it has merely converted workers into more rigid employers than the owners or representatives of the undertakings themselves.

The Director-General devotes special study to human resources and economic development in Chapter II of his Report, with particular attention to raising the standard of productive employment and improving manpower skills. The help of the Organisation is necessary, and not just desirable, as part of the guidance function of the I.L.O., to which the Director-General quite rightly calls attention, in manpower planning through the determination of objectives for its development and utilisation, and the adoption of concrete measures directed towards these objectives. These human resources, which serve the workers as well as the employers and member States, must be the object of a full investigation by the I.L.O. so that the Organisation may identify clearly the existing needs in the underdeveloped and developing countries, rather than study and determine the abundance of such human resources in countries of broad economic development. The economies of the less developed countries require the technical assistance of the I.L.O. for their social progress so that they may obtain an increase in fully productive employment which is essential to their development. Therefore, we feel that the I.L.O.'s programme of action should give first priority to those countries.

We consider that the organisation of the developed countries should also receive the close attention of the I.L.O. It would be extremely helpful if we could obtain from the highly developed countries with great economic potentialities the assistance which they are well able to give to the lesser developed countries, assistance of all kinds, particularly that of a technical nature, so that administrators and specialists on manpower questions may be trained very rapidly in the new countries. We also repeat the observations we made at previous sessions of this Conference to the effect that priority must be given to manpower planning in rural regions which are more extensive in the lesser developed countries.

We share the opinion of the Director-General that improvement of the quality of manpower must be approached by the I.L.O., as a problem of vocational training in the developing countries, from differing angles; the I.L.O. must channel its work towards the creation of all types of specialised and skilled workers and managerial staff in those countries. We share this point of view because we feel that to the extent that this project of vocational training and of economic objectives is carried out in those countries, great achievements will be made in the utilisation of human resources and in social and economic progress, and the benefits will have repercussions on the universal welfare which is essential so that the peace, understanding and co-operation required by the interdependence in which all the nations of the world live today, may be achieved.

In conclusion, I should like to say that Panama has included in its legislation all the provisions set forth in the Conventions which have been approved up to the present and which is proved by the many laws of our present Labour Code. It is not necessary for me to tell you that in our country there is a system of absolute freedom of workers and employers because since 1903, when we became an independent and sovereign State, we have followed the principles of democracy as a system and as a doctrine, and these principles we are determined to maintain and defend because they represent the most deeply rooted tradition in the life of the Panamanians.

Mr. President, I should like to extend to you our congratulations on the well-deserved honour conferred upon you by your election to this high office. Your election was fully justified by your personal merits, and I must say the same most sincerely of the other Officers of this Conference.

Mr. BORHA (Workers' delegate, Nigeria)—Mr. President, I should like to associate the workers of Nigeria and myself, as their spokesman at this session of the Conference, with the sincere congratulations which have been expressed to you by preceding speakers on your election to your high and honourable post.

This year, as in years past, the Report of the Director-General deals with questions which are of vital interest to the workers of Africa and therefore to Nigeria. Of no less interest are the other items on the agenda such as agrarian reform, the problem of women workers and the role of co-operatives in economic development.

The workers of the developing countries, for whom these questions have special significance, sincerely hope that the deliberations of the Conference may lead to conclusions that will further strengthen them in their struggle against the social evils which persist in their respective countries.

To come here to this Conference hall, where so much history has been made and where so many warnings have been heeded and ignored, is for me and for many others an experience difficult to describe.

In the years that I have attended this Conference in company with other delegates from the newly independent States of Africa, the discussions, particularly in the past two years, have ceased to sound like echoes and have begun to sound like the substance and reality of African life itself.

Two years ago, in an episode which had no precedent in the annals of this Organisation or any other international body, the passion for justice, which had been fed by decades of exploitation in Africa, burst into full cry here in this hall. Those who were here will not soon forget the spectacle. It was a turning point in the history of the International Labour Organisation and a turning point also in relations between men and nations as these had been observed over many human lifetimes.

The result was the expulsion of the Republic of South Africa from the I.L.O. and the beginning of a process of isolation and retribution which sensible men everywhere can only hope will lead to a decent society in that unhappy country. Africans of all tendencies and all races may take pride in the fact that they were the authors of that historic process. It is to be hoped that the spirit of honesty and the principles of honourable behaviour which led to action in the case of South Africa will not go to waste in other areas in which the I.L.O. is concerned.

Here it is only proper that we should remind ourselves that, while the South African policy of apartheid is unique in its bestiality, the substance, if not the form, of that unique policy raises its repugnant head in seating certain member States of this Organisation and is condoned in the statutes and national practice of those States.

I refer to Spain and Portugal, whose attendance at this Conference is an affront to all men and women of all races and tendencies who uphold human dignity and believe in honourable behaviour in their relations with their fellow human beings.

The forced labour policy of Spanish colonialism in certain territories of Africa and the repressive measures of Portuguese imperialism in Angola, Mozambique, etc., is a sharp discord in the I.L.O.'s crusade to foster human harmony and progress based on social justice. It is to be hoped that these erring Members will read the writing on the wall and open their hearts to the voice of reason, which appeals to them from this rostrum to make a change for the better.

The Director-General speaks of "human resources in connection with labour relations, of trade union development and the growth of sound social institutions. These subjects are indeed inseparable and captivate the imagination of every African.

But what is not said in this Conference and what is not said in the parliaments and in the press of the countries of Africa is what every African sees happening all around him. Half a decade after the achievement of independence, the mass of African people, the human resources of this great continent, lie inert and untended. From one end of Africa to the other, social institutions are being eroded by the political parties of one-party States or they are being abolished outright. Trade unionists who were in the first rank of those who achieved the independence of their countries are imprisoned. Others are exiled and cut off from the working class they sought to serve.

All of this adds up to a loss of freedom and a loss of political expression by the African masses which may never be replaced. It sometimes seems to us Nigerians that the respect of our own Government for the rights of the trade union movement and the freedom of individuals is an isolated ray of hope where liberty in many places has died of disappointment.

It is true that nowhere on earth does the perfect society exist, but in reading the Report of the Director-General one is tempted to say that the prospects for the perfection of society are nowhere so dim as in the developing nations. Unemployment is general, social security is next to non-existent, education is all but inaccessible for the masses of the people. The simplest needs of the human body and of the human spirit are unfulfilled because of a combination of external indifference and internal indecision which stuns the imagination of anyone who believes in the mere possibility of social justice and civilisation.

I want to say to the Director-General, to my fellow delegates and to humanity at large that the problems of my people cannot be understood unless they are discussed with honesty. Things are not as they should be, politically, economically or socially, in the new countries of Africa, and no change will take place until this is understood and until the necessity for remedies is accepted. I urge from this rostrum, from which the spirit of Africa has been so eloquently expressed, that it is time to speak of Africa's problems and Africa's future on the basis of reality. Africa needs tools, not words, practice, not empty policies or arrogant theorising. The masses of our people ask: "Where is my job? Where is my child's school? Where is my house in which my family will be safe from disease and exploitation?"

These questions carry an implicit and urgent appeal to the whole human race for a concerted effort towards progress and social justice. Progress cannot be imposed; it must arise from the total commitment of the innate genius of the people who will benefit from it. That is why it is gratifying that, in spite of the present handicaps from which we suffer — handicaps caused by long years of political subjugation — the masses of the African people are determined to continue their forward march and to build for themselves a society of free men and women. It is also gratifying that the developing nations are showing increasing awareness of their obligations in Africa's crusade for advancement and the raising of the standards of its people.

Almost everyone from the developing nations who has spoken from this rostrum has stressed again and again the justified apprehensions of those nations about the widening gap between the prosperity of the developed nations and the imposed poverty of the developing nations. It is clear that, if Africa is to be delivered from poverty and disease, no piecemeal approach to its social problems will suffice. The relationship between the developed nations and the developing nations in the field of international trade should be critically re-examined. The developing countries cannot continue to absorb losses in the sale of their raw materials. Economic health cannot be achieved on either side in such a situation. This is a basic question in the problem of raising the living standards of the people.

Above all, the reconstruction of Africa must be seen as a commitment not only of the African people themselves but also of the developed nations, in one concerted effort so that results may be achieved with the minimum of delay. In other words an all-out economic development plan similar to that which performed a near miracle in the rehabilitation of Europe after the Second World War should be drawn up with the co-operation of the other specialised agencies of the United Nations. As a first step, experts should be made of the problems involved in the imbalance between the resources of the developing nations and those of the developed nations. From this, plans could be made to launch this world programme for progress and social justice in Africa.

Africa has found disappointment in slogans, and nowhere more bitterly than in the effort to achieve trade union unity on a pan-African basis. There have been many efforts to unite African labour. Innumerable initiatives have been taken, especially by the leaders of the African Trade Union Confederation, to unite Africa's working class, which was split in May 1960 by the unfortunate conference which resulted in the formation of the All-African Trade Union Federation at Casablanca. Nevertheless, the division persists; it persists because of a basic philosophical difference between the two sides. Major elements of the A.A.T.U.F. believe that trade unions must submit to the control of governments and political parties. A.T.U.C. members, on the other hand, believe that the trade unions should lend their full genius and strength to the task of nation-building while maintaining their traditional loyal independence. There are no differences between the two tendencies which cannot be resolved, but differences must be resolved on a basis of mutual respect and free and frank discussion; and above all on a basis of reality.

The reality is that Africans demand democracy and integrity in all their institutions and, after their bitter battle against colonialism, will not march backwards into servitude. An end should be put to irresponsible threats of "total war" against those who will not toe the line of those who serve ideas which, in my honest view, have no relevance to the African way of life.

I believe in pan-African trade union unity as well as in unity at the national level. Unity in our time is not impossible but the search for it should take account of realities so that the trade union dialogue on unity which goes on all the time in Africa may begin to produce fruitful results.

Twenty-Fourth Sitting 329
Interpretation from Russian: Mr. MAKHNYA (Government delegate, Ukraine)—It is pointed out in the Director-General's Report that it deals "only with general questions of programme and structure on which there already appears to be a clear consensus in the Conference." In fact, matters of structure are not even dealt with in the Report if the reorganisation of the Office, which was carried out without the participation of the Conference, is discounted. It deals exclusively with the three main programme areas of future I.L.O. activities.

The programme measures which were proposed by the Director-General at the 47th Session and are now described in greater detail deserve attention and close analysis. I will comment on only one of the three main programme areas—that is, human resources development.

One cannot fail to agree with the Director-General when he says that "human resources policies and programmes should be better integrated with, and geared to, economic planning." The experience gained in many countries, including the Ukraine, in the field of economic development shows that in order to achieve full employment and ensure skilled manpower supply economic development plans must be closely linked to the utilisation of the available manpower and to the training of the skilled manpower needed. That is why the better utilisation of manpower through expansion of opportunities for productive employment, improvement of skills through vocational training and education, full support in the tasks of national development and the association of the broadest proportion of the population in the accomplishment of these tasks are matters that must underlie the future activities of the I.L.O.

The Government delegation of the Ukraine made the point at the last two sessions that the I.L.O., like other specialised agencies, must have a clearly planned and consolidated programme, and this viewpoint was shared by many other delegations. At the 47th Session the Government delegation of the Ukraine suggested the following procedure for the preparation and approval of the I.L.O.'s programme. A draft programme would be prepared by the Director-General, and the Governing Body would examine this draft and then pass it for discussion and approval by the Conference. Then the Conference, having approved the programme, would instruct the Governing Body and the Director-General to carry it out within the framework of the approved budget. The Governing Body would submit an annual report to the Conference on the progress of implementation of this programme. We consider that such a procedure is the only appropriate one, corresponding to the Conference's role as supreme agency of the Organisation.

I would like to refer briefly to the fate of other proposals made in discussion of the Director-General's Report, and in the same connection to the activities of the Governing Body's Working Party.

At the 44th, 45th and 46th Sessions many resolutions were submitted on the programme and structure of the I.L.O. At the 46th Session alone, 20 such resolutions were tabled. Some of them were adopted, others not, while some were not examined at all. What is noteworthy is that none of these resolutions was in any way artificial; they were of vital concern, reflecting the need to ensure that the activities of the I.L.O. and its structures should correspond to the requirements of our day. This is a natural process, designed to rejuvenate the Organisation, and one which should in the course of the past few years have led to substantial results in so urgent a matter. Unfortunately, the whole process was slowed down. The Director-General considers that "in accordance with the spirit of the resolution on programme and structure adopted by the Conference, the Governing Body and its Working Party now provide the most appropriate machinery for elaborating a widely acceptable body of conclusions for the development of the I.L.O.'s programme and structure in the years ahead."

The Government delegation of the Ukraine cannot agree with this view of the Director-General. If a number of the proposals made by delegates come within the competence of the Director-General and the Governing Body, there are a number of others which relate to the Constitution and the Standing Orders. These are, in fact, the most constructive proposals which are designed to ensure the genuine democratisation of the I.L.O., and the solution of these important problems relating to programme and structure and to the Standing Orders must remain, as provided for in the Constitution, in the hands of the supreme body of the Organisation, the General Conference. That is why paragraph 3 of the resolution adopted at last year's session of the Conference clearly states that the proposals within the competence of the Conference should be referred to one or more of its forthcoming sessions.

At present this depends directly on the progress of the activities of the Working Party. It has necessary to speed up all the work of the Working Party, so that the most serious proposals, relating to structural changes, procedures for preparation and approval of the programme, etc., can be submitted for examination by the Conference not later than next year. There can be no question of indefinite postponement of a decision on such problems as strengthening the role of the General Conference, determining the functions of the Governing Body and its composition or procedure for the preparation and approval of the I.L.O.'s programme. It is necessary to do everything so that these problems may be solved next year. Otherwise the idea of considering the body of measures for adaptation of the I.L.O. to contemporary conditions will be quite fruitless.

The Government delegation of the Ukraine would also like to draw attention to the anomalous situation whereby the Chinese People's Republic, the German Democratic Republic, the Korean People's Democratic Republic and the Democratic Republic of Viet-Nam are not represented within this Organisation.

I cannot omit some reference to the hysterical outburst by Mr. Wagner this morning. All of his, as he called it, farewell speech, was devoted, not to the business of this Organisation, but to slandering the socialist countries and moralising to the representatives of the developing countries. This is apparently the sum of Mr. Wagner's contribution to the I.L.O.'s activities, so that it is unlikely that many tears were shed over the fact that he was addressing this assembly for the last time. His speech was a perfect demonstration of the pattern which holds of representatives of imperialistic monopolies when they witness the vast changes taking place in the world. One-third of the world has done away with domination and exploitation by monopolies, and has chosen the road to socialism. The stranglehold of the imperialists and monopolists is steadily loosening throughout the countries of Africa and Asia where most of the peoples have rejected capitalist development. The peoples of these countries are determining their own destinies and do not require the admonishments of Mr. Wagner and his like. He brandished the bogey of communism, but the peoples of all the countries about which he spoke know it is precisely the October Revolution which heralded the era of socialism and lit the torch of freedom from oppression by monopolies, from colonial domination and from exploitation of man by man. That freedom is now marching resolutely through the world. Mr. Wagner can see that light at home, when he rests in Miami, Florida, close to heroic Cuba. We can understand Mr. Wagner as a man. Some one like him must find it difficult to remain calm and collected when he sees the pattern of life he represents collapsing about him. Mr. Wagner thanked God for the freedom which he enjoys in his country. No doubt the representatives of the American monopolists do enjoy freedom. But whom should the millions of American Negroes thank who are deprived of the right to vote, who are murdered when they seek to obtain this right, whose children are not admitted to the schools? They fear not the bogey of communism but the white cloaks of the Ku-Klux-Klan, and their crosses upon which no small number of Negroes have been burned.

Mr. Wagner worries about the future of the peoples of the socialist countries and of the countries in the developing world. We can tell him straight away: it is not for you—the representative of the monopolies which are helping to strengthen the South African régime, expelled from this Organisation; which are supplying weapons and money to the Portuguese colonialists in order to stifle the freedom of Angola and Mozambique—it is not for you to worry over the future of the peoples of other countries. Those days are over when the imperialists and colonialists had such opportunities, and frequently with the help of the slave-driver's whip and gunboat fire. You, Mr. Wagner, should worry instead about the fate of the American Indians, once numerous and brave, now deprived of their rights and banished to reservations. Try to compare the freedom which you enjoy as a representative of the monopolies with the fate that has overtaken the people who were once the masters of your home country. Perhaps you will then understand what sort of freedom it is that you are here extolling. Mr. Wagner said that the same freedom is being brought to Viet-Nam and the Dominican Republic with the help of American troops, their bayonets, napalm bombs and poison gas. Why is this so? Precisely because the Vietnamese and the people of the Dominican Republic do not want those freedoms which are being foisted upon them by American imperialism, and are struggling for the genuine freedom and independence of their countries. That is why we demand from this rostrum that aggression by the American imperialists in Viet-Nam and in the Dominican Republic be ended.

Mr. SHIOJI [Workers' delegate, Japan]—Fellow delegates, ladies and gentlemen, let me express my sincere gratitude for your kindness in permitting me to address you at this session of the Conference on behalf of the workers of Japan.

At this very moment my heart is filled with profound respect for the I.L.O., the Organisation which has been working for many decades to attain social justice, which is the basis of permanent peace among mankind by raising the standard of living of people in all the parts of the world and by encouraging sound relations between labour and management.

First of all, I have the pleasure to inform you that on 17 May of this year, the Diet of Japan ratified the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The ratification of this Convention was much discussed between Government and labour, particularly in view of the national legislation covering public enterprises and government employees' unions. Needless to say freedom of association is one of the fundamental principles of the I.L.O., and the Constitution of our country also guarantees this solemn right. However, a part of the laws covering the employees of public enterprises was in contradiction to Convention No. 87. Therefore, the ratification was registered after the necessary legal amendments were completed in regard to this point. I would like to express my sincere thanks for the extraordinary efforts of the I.L.O. and the I.C.F.T.U., which brought about after such a long period of time the ratification of the Convention.

We of Doomei, the Japanese Confederation of Labour, were very happy to co-operate with the I.L.O. and the members of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association who came to Japan to discuss the problem concerning Convention No. 87, and we gave our full support to the Commission in fulfilling its task. It is therefore a most satisfactory conclusion to our efforts at co-operative participation that Convention No. 87 was ratified by the Diet in accordance with our suggestions.

As part of the process leading to the ratification of the Convention, many members of our Government, of the political party in power, and of the trade unions are beginning to realise that we should be able to deal with such problems ourselves as part of our own internal affairs, without any assistance from the I.L.O., in a country such as ours where a democratic and well-developed labour movement does exist. And I believe with satisfaction that this realisation will help the development of the democratic labour movement and will promote better relations between government and public enterprises and their unions in Japan.

Today, trade unions, as an important element in modern society, should take responsible action, on an equal footing with the government and employers, in order to promote social welfare.

In Japan, after the Second World War, there was such a tremendous rate of economic growth that trade unions also developed very rapidly.

A free democratic labour movement made particularly substantial progress and this is one of the main sources of economic development in Japan, as a result of which working conditions are improving and wages are getting better.

Therefore, in Japan, the main stream of the labour movement is now being formed by the democratic trade unions, which are based on the belief that the improvement of the living standards of workers and the development of the national economy are inseparably connected.

In this connection, I would like to inform you, as a Vice-President of the Japanese Confederation of Labour, that my Confederation, which is the national central organization of the free democratic labour groups in Japan, and which has two million members who are mainly private industrial workers, was formed last year as a significant event in the history of the labour movement in Japan.

Now, I would like to express my support for the Director-General's Report as a whole. In particular, I am greatly interested in the proposals concerning assistance to and co-operation with the developing countries. As Workers' delegate of an Asian member country, I would like to express my opinion on this point.

We can hardly hope for everlasting peace and prosperity for people all over the world without the economic development of the developing countries. However, at present, I regret to have to say that various kinds of assistance programmes make this problem complicated, because of the self-interest of the supporting countries, which do not always aim at real prosperity of the countries which are supported.

From this point of view, I believe that if the I.L.O., which is fair to all, strengthens its initiatives in promoting effective assistance programmes for the countries which are on the way to development, it will lead us to a more prosperous world.

To that end, we propose that the I.L.O. should study the methods and means of technical co-operation applicable to each developing country; it should ask for appropriate collaboration from the highly developed industrial countries; and finally it should intensify its practical activity in advising beneficiaries to accept such assistance without reluctance. Moreover, in connection with this problem, I want to call the attention of member countries and of all the organs of the I.L.O. to the following three important points. First, in developing its activity, the I.L.O. should observe carefully the present national conditions of the beneficiaries. All the nations have their own characteristics, which are related to prevailing circumstances. And to understand these I believe that we should avoid possible prejudices about such social realities as religions, ideologies, and cultures, as well as such social realities as economic and social systems.

It is necessary to observe carefully under what circumstances these realities have come into existence and in what conditions they have been established.

This is not always easy. We cannot expect good results if we deal with this problem from an ideological viewpoint, on the basis of a one-sided understanding, or of the standards of outside countries.

Secondly, I have to point out that today we find a gap between the level at which the I.L.O. aims and actual results.

For example, in those areas which have become free from colonialism recently and have had difficulty in their construction, it is often more urgent and important to get food, clothing, housing, and a place to work, than to have merely formal discussions about problems such as freedom of association, etc. It is very difficult to deal with this situation, and it needs wisdom.

There is a saying "know thyself". If the I.L.O. had unlimited power, or if the social and economic standards of the member countries were all at the same level, there would be problems if the I.L.O. distributed its efforts equally over all aspects of its task or assisted equally all its member countries. But unfortunately reality does not admit of this assumption.

Therefore, at present, we must choose the objects and the contents of the I.L.O.'s activities, with emphasis on countries which are still on their way to development and on the areas which have not yet attained complete self-determination. It is important for the I.L.O. to know correctly what is wanted in these countries and areas, and to exercise its limited force, finding specific and concrete methods, and focusing this force on them. And to achieve success it is also important that all highly developed industrial countries should co-operate voluntarily in the establishment of international justice without overemphasising their own interests.

Thirdly, there are tendencies which try to use the unhappy political, social and economic situation still existing in the world as an instrument of political propaganda to strengthen their own position in accordance with their special political ideologies.

It is against the founding principles of the I.L.O. to use it as a place of political propaganda; it will even be harmful to the achievement of its aims.

We must realise once again the original intentions and the fundamental purposes of the I.L.O. And we must make efforts to bring about a situation in which all countries in the world are able to co-operate with full confidence in one another. In this connection I should like to emphasise our wish to support and assist our brother trade unionists belonging to the free trade union movement of South Viet-Nam. I think it is proper to express our solidarity with our trade union brothers in their struggle to maintain their free trade union movement against any kind of totalitarian oppression. If the I.L.O. bears in mind these points, its activities will be more effective and glorious.

In conclusion, on behalf of the workers and free democratic labour organisations of Japan, I would like to say that we are convinced that our trade unions should co-operate with the I.L.O. for the proper development of its activities rather than just ask the I.L.O. to do things for us. And I want to say that Japanese workers are eagerly hoping to play an honourable and responsible part in the task of bringing about social justice in the world.

Once again I would like to express my deepest appreciation for the excellent job done by the Director-General and the I.L.O. Secretariat.

Interpretation from French: Mr. UZAMUGURA (Government delegate, Rwanda)—Mr. President, let me first add my congratulation to those already addressed to you on the occasion of your election to the presidency of the Conference. This choice recognises your humanity as well as your technical qualities. I should also like to congratulate the Director-General and all his staff on the excellent report now before us. I also bring to the Conference the fraternal greetings of the Government and people of the Republic of Rwanda and our warmest wishes for the success of the present session.

For the past two years, with the co-operation of an I.L.O. expert, Rwanda has been engaged in a task of social renewal, the two main objects of which are establishment of a labour administration adjusted at all levels to the duties which such an authority normally has to perform and possessing the necessary specialised personnel; and secondly, formulation of labour laws and regulations which will be genuinely our own. This task of social renewal is accompanied, in the Ministry of Planning and Co-operation, by preparation for general development planning, on which special committees referring to all sectors of economic activity have been working for nearly a year. One purpose of this is to permit a solution of employment problems and the raising of the skill levels of our workers, thus giving economic expansion the necessary impetus. The social policy I have described is being developed with due regard to two series of factors. First of all, local factors proper to Rwanda and stemming from ancestral habits and the customary organisation which in some fields momentarily outweigh more modern ideas. However, the real conditions of our country cannot be left out of account. We are determined to construct, and have decided that the process shall go forward harmoniously with order, peace and security for all. Secondly, we have regard to external factors and particularly to the international standards formulated by the I.L.O. These are decisive in most respects and have in particular inspired our new Labour Code. We consider that the universal standards set in all fields by the international labour Conventions andRecommendations must be a source of national labour law and therefore we have always paid the closest attention to the items placed on the agenda of this Conference.

Before dealing with the matters before us at the present session, I should like to reiterate the opposition of Rwanda to any policy of forced labour and racial segregation. We cannot approve of such policies which violate the fundamental principles of the Constitution of the I.L.O. This Constitution, given to all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, the right to pursue their material well-being, and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity. Accordingly, the Republic of Rwanda, which has already welcomed the proper reaction of the I.L.O. with regard to South Africa, will endorse any unanimous decision which may subsequently be reached condemning forced labour and racial segregation in all their forms. We are particularly disposed to support any effort to help Portugal, South Africa and Southern Rhodesia to understand better the realities of Africa and the map of the world, particularly those parts of it which formerly belonged to the colonial empires.

Rwanda asks the Powers whose attitude towards relations with those countries might, for reasons which it would take too long to explain here, be interpreted as even indirect support for the South African and Portuguese Governments, to be aware of their responsibilities in these matters. The armaments race now being intensified by the Government of South Africa and the Portuguese Government's ceaseless renewal of its reserves of arms and munitions (although no one has entrusted these two Governments with exclusive responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security) are a grave threat to the sovereignty, the very existence of our States, and to peace in the world. We urge the international community represented here to have regard to the gravity of these events. In saying this our Republic is no dupe. We know that before our accession to independence on 1 July 1962 there were conventions, pacts and agreements in which Portugal and South Africa did not fail to participate. However, the situation has worsened so much that it has become urgent to review the situation. History cannot be defied any longer and the I.L.O. should—if its tripartite character enabling it to do so—bring Portugal and South Africa and Southern Rhodesia face to face with the true facts. The African Continent is no longer a mere field for adventure or a source of decorations.

As regards the technical items on the agenda of the present session, the Republic of Rwanda has not always been able to rely on specific data because some of the situations to which the reports refer do not exist in its country. However, we think it reasonable to adopt the two Conventions and two Recommendations on the employment of young persons underground in mines, in the terms of the Conclusions proposed at the end of the 48th Session as recommended by the majority of the countries. Similarily, wishing to see the establishment of more social justice, we think that the conditions of employment of working women with family responsibilities should be placed on the agenda of this Conference. It may be pointed out that the Republic of Rwanda, and particularly its Ministry of Social Affairs, now headed, incidentally, by a woman, has an office for the emancipation and advancement of women, the object of which is to improve women's conditions of work by modifying traditional influences and giving the women of Rwanda vocational or other guidance towards the openings that the new structures of a modern economy are offering to them.

We remain persuaded that no development can be successful unless all available energies are mobilised for a common objective. We wish to ensure for every citizen of Rwanda, man or woman, the full exercise of all the fundamental rights and freedoms defined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in our own national Constitution. To do this we need substantial assistance, bilateral, multilateral, or both, to train our personnel and complete the liberation of our people.

The social and employment aspects of agrarian reform, on the other hand, give rise to no immediate comment on the part of the Rwanda Government. The particular agrarian structure of our country, in which private ownership predominates, does not make the preparation and implementation of an agrarian reform plan a matter of urgency. But this has not prevented us from setting up a parliamentary committee on agrarian reform. The results of its work will soon be known. In some parts of Rwanda hundreds of hectares of land are now being worked by farmers who have the provisional status of wage earners under the supervision of technicians from some of the international agencies. These farmers will accede in a few years' time to ownership of the land they cultivate and, dropping their status as labourers, will associate in co-operatives so as to work to the greatest possible advantage. This method is employed for large-scale tea and cotton cultivation, for instance, and should permit the standard of living of the farmers to be raised considerably.

Lastly, the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries is the object of special attention on the part of specialised committees of our Ministry of Planning. Already, appreciable technical assistance has enabled co-operatives to be educated and trained and co-operative ideas to be disseminated.

I should like publicly to ask the Swiss delegation to transmit to the Federal Council a further expression of the gratitude of the Government and people of Rwanda for the aid furnished to our country. Swiss co-operation enables us to envisage the rationalisation of our production methods and better utilisation of our human and material resources. We would therefore like to thank the Federal Council once again.

We hope that the proceedings of the present session regarding the co-operative movement will produce the main lines of a clear and flexible general Recommendation, leaving the details to the sovereign discretion of each government. The problems of our countries are so diverse that any attempt to handle them in every particular would require not a three-week or a six-week session but a whole year of unanimous and implemented decisions, with each country the subject of seminars and individual sittings.

In closing I would recall that Rwanda, like other African countries, would like to see Africa given the place it merits in the I.L.O. by adjustment of the structure and activities of the Organisation to the requirements of a changing world. Particularly we think the time has come to abolish the system of permanent seats on the Governing Body. This would be replaced by a scheme of two- or three-year rotation, which would enable all the countries to be kept better informed. Comparison of their particular experience and methods would reveal the ways in which our problems could be faced and solved. The Organisation could thus more easily follow our affairs and more effectively find solutions for our problems. We think that this change would decisively improve the I.L.O. and enable it to increase still further the considerable audience it now has in the African countries.

May I, last of all, in the name of the Government and people of Rwanda, congratulate the sister countries of Zambia, Yemen, Malta and Gambia on their accession to independence and full membership of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. TENG (Workers' delegate, China)—I feel it a great honour to represent the workers of my country in order to express their views concerning the Director-General's Report to the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference. Although I did not have the opportunity to attend the last two sessions of the Conference, I have followed with great interest the progress and evolution of the reorganisation and the operational activities of the International Labour Organisation under the capable leadership of Mr. Morse, the Director-General.

The developing countries of the world have at least two things in common: they have a tremendous quantity of idle or semi-idle manpower, and a great part of their heavily endowed natural resources lies undeveloped on the earth or underground. The logical thing to do is to put these two elements together and develop them to the maximum degree for the common benefit of mankind. A time-honoured Chinese saying urges us to work diligently on the land and exploit all the resources it contains. This is the only way that will lead us to great fortune.

Following the old Chinese proverb, the way out of economic misery is to put the unemployed and underemployed people to work on the land, to produce more foodstuffs, to open up mineral resources, to establish factories and workshops, large and small. A great number of the unemployed and underemployed people in the developing countries do not know how to increase food production, or to open up mineral and other natural resources, or to set up workshops and small-scale industries and make them productive and profitable. This is where the technical assistance of the I.L.O. should come in. In short, the I.L.O. should teach the people of the developing countries the most simple and effective methods of increasing food production, mineral production, industrial production, and so on.

The present session of the International Labour Conference is at grips with practical social and economic problems. Two committees are discussing problems of agrarian reform and co-operatives; two others are dealing with problems of young miners and women workers. These are very important problems, and I sincerely hope that the deliberations on them will lead to the adoption of appropriate and useful international instruments.

With regard to agrarian reform, the achievements of Taiwan in the past 15 or more years are worthy of our attention. The Government of the Republic of China adopted a peaceful and gradual process of agrarian reform in Taiwan, with the aid of the harsh and confiscatory methods used by the communist regime in mainland China. In Taiwan the land-to-the-tiller programme started soon after the end of the Second World War. The first step was to reduce the rent payable by tenant farmers to the landlords. The second step was to register all landowners and tenant farmers, including the location and the size of their farms. The third was the preparatory stage in which laws were promulgated, delimiting the maximum size of each farm in order to eliminate absentee landlords. The fourth was the enforcement stage in which over-size farms were sold to the Government, which pays for them in bonds or shares in certain government-owned factories, the ownership of which was thus transferred to the hands of former landowners. Cement, paper, iron and steel, coal, pineapple, tea, and other enterprises owned by the provincial government are now operated by the people who have got rid of the land that they could not till. They are making much more profit from these industries than the rent they formerly collected from the tenant farmers.

The tenant farmers in turn become independent farmers. They bought the land they till from the provincial government, after having made ten annual payments to the provincial authorities. Each annual payment was about equal in value to the annual rent a tenant farmer used to pay. The tenant farmers are the owners of the land that they now till.

As to the results of the agrarian reform programme in Taiwan, any casual visitor to a village in Taiwan will tell you that it has electricity and water services, good village schools and clinics, new houses with compost sheds and drying grounds at the side. Farmers own radio sets, electric fans, sewing machines and bicycles. Many of them even have brand-new television sets and refrigerators. The farms are well irrigated. A large amount of chemical fertilisers and insecticides is used; and the farms are closely planted with improved seeds. Double-cropping and triple-cropping are practised, and farmers are as a rule busy all day long tending crops, cultivating fruit trees and vegetables, raising poultry and pigs, and so on. Their average income increased by more than 10 per cent. last year. One of the reasons for the tremendous increase of agricultural production in Taiwan is that the agrarian reform programme made all farmers own the land they till. There is no rent to pay. Whatever they produce belongs to them, except for the tax money which every citizen has to pay to the Government.

I have dealt at some length with the agrarian reform programme of Taiwan. This is because it is the mainspring which triggers the industrialisation programme in my country. Because the farmers have grown rich in Taiwan, their purchasing power has increased so much that they demand more bicycles and sewing machines, woven goods and cosmetics, schools and hospitals, books and periodical publications, and so forth. My country is now in the fourth four-year economic development period, and our industry is growing much faster than our rural economy.

During the period of rapid economic development in my country, technical assistance from the I.L.O. is particularly important. We Chinese workers appreciate what the I.L.O. is doing in China in the training of motor mechanics and metal-trade workers. It is hoped that assistance will also be obtained in the training of instructors. In the period of rapid economic development in my country, it is extremely important that social progress should also take great strides forward. In the extension of social security coverage, the strengthening of labour union organisation, the increase of workers' education programmes, as well as the improvement of the vocational and technical training of workers, the assistance of the International Labour Organisation will be most welcomed by Chinese workers and will surely bear fruitful results.

With regard to the development of social institutions, and the improvement of labour-management relations and co-operation, Chinese workers pledge their full and hearty support to the aims and purposes of this Organisation in order to achieve the right of collective bargaining, the co-operation of management and labour in the continuous improvement of productive efficiency, and the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures. The number of collective agreements in my country has increased in recent years, and the sphere of their application has also widened considerably, thus furthering the development of the harmonious management relations and co-operation, offering Chinese workers a better and bigger share of the fruits of their labour. In this respect also, the rich technical experience and knowledge of I.L.O. experts will bear desirable results if they are brought into use in co-operation with the employers and workers of Taiwan.

I hope that the deliberations of the current session of the Conference will be crowned with the success they well deserve.

Mr. HARRIS (Representative of the International Council of Commerce Employers)—I am grateful for the opportunity given me here to put forward a number of the comments which the employers in commerce have found to be of importance upon studying the Report of the Director-General.

I need not emphasise to this high assembly the greatly increasing importance of trade both within individual countries and in the world economy as a whole.

The value of a commodity has always depended upon the ability of the trade to find consumers willing to purchase the commodity in question.
At the same time it also depends upon the training and skill possessed by the individual trader, and whether he is in a position to obtain the commodity at the lowest possible price.

The interests of the consumers are served in the best possible manner when the individual private trader, while constantly improving his personal training and knowledge, operates in free competition with other capable traders, who likewise strive to solve the problems of trade as a link between production and consumer in such a fashion as will be of the most benefit and least expense to both parties.

Wherever, by means of mechanisation and automation, mass production of commodities is arrived at, the importance of trade must be correspondingly enhanced. Mass production of goods will have no meaning if trade is not ready and prepared to convey the commodity from the factory via the wholesalers' stocks and the retailers' shops and out to the individual consumer, far or near.

It is the task of trade to unite towns, countries and hemispheres by locating and developing markets for the increasing production, and by acquiring, in payment, other commodities, which may in turn be sold at competitive prices.

During rapid development trade also undergoes a thorough change of structure and rationalisation. This change affects all forms of trade, from minor undertakings to large concerns with branches and subsidiaries spread all over the world; and from small shops to chain stores, supermarkets and department stores, in which sales methods are constantly being modernised and adapted to the desires and requirements of the consumers and to the ever-changing habits of consumption and purchase.

These constant changes in sales methods are again closely tied up with the migration of population from country to town, and concurrently in the large cities, from the town centre to the suburbs and environs of the city. An essential factor with which trade must reckon is the fact that employees and workers in and around towns and cities are to a greatly increasing extent motorcar owners, whereby they are enabled to make larger and more concentrated purchases. These purchases, which are frequently influenced by the fact that the wife works away from the home, again confronts trade with fresh problems. For trade must—as the faithful servant of the customers—be prepared to serve them at the times most convenient to them, that is, outside the customers' own working hours. This has the result that hours of work in commerce pose quite a different problem than do hours of work in other fields and callings. Evening hours, which are considered highly undesirable in other quarters, must to a certain extent be regarded, in commerce, as something to be desired, precisely out of regard for the employees and workers in other professions; at the same time trade will be able to ensure seeing that the working hours are not longer than elsewhere, since the trading establishments can close when others are at work.

In order to find a solution to the very difficult problem posed if we are simultaneously to benefit from the flow of commodities from the machines by finding markets near at hand and far away, while at the same time adapting ourselves to the changing desires and purchasing habits of the consumers, trade must have well-trained staff of all grades and ranks. The commerce employers have therefore studied with the utmost interest the observations of the Director-General on the question of improving the quality of the labour force by vocational education and training.

It might, however, be pointed out here that in providing training in trade and administration the theoretical side needs to be emphasised more than the practical side, in contrast to the situation obtaining as regards training for industry; in this connection it may perhaps be mentioned that the training and education of administrative personnel for industry will generally be so close to that for trade, that they may best and most conveniently be combined with it.

Apart from technical knowledge and ability which will usually be of the same relative level in all occupations, within the field of trade, owing to the personal contact with the customers, there is also a need for personal manners, deportment and culture, coupled with a knowledge of commercial languages, etc.

While there is a considerable difference between tuition in an ordinary primary school and the theoretical education imparted to technical apprentices and other young people, there exists in trade and administration no such sharp demarcation between the ordinary primary education given to the entire population and the subsequent theoretical education given to young people in trade and administration.

This state of affairs may—when it is recognised—facilitate the introduction and adoption of a system of comprehensive education in an economical manner; at the same time a basis may be created for the higher and most advanced forms of education in the field of trade, which will result in an increase of productivity of enormous value to the individual, to trade and to society.

I believe that these observations will be of immense importance in future development. For we can all see the time approaching when, in the great majority of industrialised countries, trade and administration will employ far more people than will be engaged in actually producing goods in industry.

But we can also see that rapid development of educational and training facilities could increase the productivity of the individual employee by 100 per cent.—indeed, in administration by many times over.

In countries suffering from manpower shortages in trade and administration, this shortage can be overcome by increasing the productivity of the individual by a quick build-up of education and training.

The commerce employers are very pleased to find that their view on education and training problems coincide so closely with the main points brought out in the excellent Report submitted to this Conference by the Director-General.

(The Conference adjourned at 5.30 p.m.)
TWENTY-FIFTH SITTING

Friday, 18 June 1965, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Raza

SEVENTH REPORT OF THE SELECTION COMMITTEE
Submission and Adoption

The PRESIDENT—The first item on the agenda is the seventh report of the Selection Committee. I call on Mr. Menon, Chairman of the Selection Committee, to present the report to the Conference.

Mr. MENON (Government delegate, India; Chairman of the Selection Committee)—I have the honour to present the seventh report of the Selection Committee, which has been distributed to delegates. The report recommends certain changes in the composition of committees. It also recommends the transmission of certain conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform to the Committee on Co-operatives. I commend the report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT—The report is now open for discussion. As there are no remarks I take it that the report is adopted.

The PRESIDENT—We now resume discussion of the Director-General's Report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. ARMENDARES (Government delegate, Argentina)—The Government delegation of Argentina would not have chosen to take part in the discussion on the Director-General's Report again, since the Minister of Labour and Social Security, as Minister attending the Conference, gave a detailed analysis of the Director-General's Report in the sitting of Friday, 4 June, indicating the Argentine position on this subject.

However, in this assembly, most unfortunately, expressions have been used which in no way represent the truth and in fact even further give a thoroughly distorted picture of what is actually happening in Argentina, thereby unnecessarily harming not so much my Government as my country, and I therefore feel that I have to rectify these statements.

On the pretext that the Minister in his statement slandered the trade union movement in Argentina, one delegate, completely ignoring the subject being discussed and the proper language which should have been used, took advantage of the rostrum to insult a Minister and a Government. This is an unfortunate fact, but it happened, and it distresses us as Argentinians.

The statement that the Argentine trade union movement had been attacked is totally and absolutely false, as anyone can see by reading the statement of the Minister, unless, of course, you understand that adhering to the basic principles of freedom of association proclaimed by the International Labour Organisation is tantamount to attacking the trade union movement.

An attempt is being made to give a deplorable picture of Argentina at a time when economic and financial questions closely connected with the recovery of my country are being worked out at the international level.

It is true that there was no Argentine Workers' delegation at the 48th Session of the International Labour Conference, but this was due exclusively to the leaders of the General Confederation of Labour of Argentina (C.G.T.) whom the Argentine Government had designated as those who should attend this Conference. This is not just a statement on my part. It has been confirmed by the I.L.O. The Credentials Committee of the 48th Session of the Conference considered that the Argentine Government had strictly applied the provisions of the Constitution of the I.L.O. Moreover, the Committee on Freedom of Association of the 48th Session of the Conference considered that the Argentine Government had strictly applied the provisions of the Constitution of the I.L.O. Moreover, the Committee on Freedom of Association reached the same decision in its 83rd Report to the Governing Body, which was approved by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session, by virtue of which the complaint made by the C.G.T. was rejected since it was clearly proved that the Argentine Workers' delegates were in no way prevented from leaving their country to come to the 48th Session of the International Labour Conference. It was recommended that the Governing Body should decide that there would be no point in continuing examination of the case. This is referred to in paragraphs 299 to 303 of the report of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

At this assembly the so-called "combat plan" of the Argentine C.G.T. has also been defended in terms criticising my Government for its attitude towards this plan. Fortunately, we are not alone here either. We have the authority of the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Governing Body behind us. In paragraph 290 and the following paragraphs of the 83rd Report of the Committee to which I referred a moment ago it is made quite clear that the so-called combat plan was not related to any truly occupational strike by the trade unions following the directives of the C.G.T. but that it was the result of activities extra-normal to the trade union movement, harmful to the public order and of a political character. The report further states that the action to bring pressure to bear on the authorities consisted of occupying undertakings and depriving the employees of such undertakings of their freedom, these being offences punishable under ordinary law. The report states in paragraph 297 that in view of these events—that is to say the strike, accompanied by the occupation of undertakings with a view to bringing pressure to bear on the Government in order that it should adopt measures in the economic, social and political field—the Committee did not consider that the behaviour of the trade union leaders involved made it possible to allege in this case that there had been any violation of freedom of association, in the light of the principles which have always been applied in this field.

The economic recession of the years 1962-63, for which the Government which I represent is in no way responsible, had its impact on the labour market and caused abnormal unemployment, but it did not reach the magnitude which some persons have claimed. There is no statistical basis for such claims.

To clarify this situation, very serious studies were made which showed the true extent of unemployment. Thus in July 1963 the National Development Council of my country, along with the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, completed the first manpower inquiry through the methods recommended most strongly by international bodies: by a sample survey of homes. This is a periodical study, since the first investigation was followed up in April, July and August 1964 in Buenos Aires and its suburbs. Comparing the unemployment rate in July 1963 with October 1964, the 1964 rate shows a decrease in the number of unemployed from 8.8 per cent. to 5.7 per cent., which indicates a decrease in unemployment of 37.5 per cent.

The results of these studies confirm the process of economic recovery of the country, with employment indices which are higher, greater utilisation of unemployed manpower and a higher production rate, which is reflected in the gross national product, which last year grew by more than 8 per cent. This process has been accompanied by an increase in real wages following the high rates of increase awarded to pensioners, commercial employees, workers in industry and agricultural workers. Taking the index 100 for September 1963, the date when Dr. Arturo Illia became President of the Republic, the total wage income of unemployed workers in industry increased by 86.5 per cent. and in agriculture by 166.8 per cent.; for commercial employees the increase was by 151.4 per cent. and for pensioners 148.3 per cent., whereas the cost of living measured by the same index rose by only 44.8 per cent. These figures show very clearly a definite substantial increase in real wages in my country.

It has also been alleged that the Minister of Labour of Argentina has interfered in the life of trade unions. Again this is an error, making false, empty and untrue accusations which could never be proved before the Committee on Freedom of Association. Moreover, the accuser himself can at any time appeal to Parliament, to which the Minister of Labour is responsible in the final instance—Parliament, which for the first time, thanks to the irrevo­ cable decision of my Government, represents all the sectors of national life, and in which particular there are a number of labour leaders.

The episode which obliged me to take part in the discussion in no way alters the position of my Government with respect to the trade union movement—quite the contrary. It even further strengthens it. We continue to believe, along with the Director-General, that rep­ resentative organisations of workers must play an active and constructive part in the develop­ ment of the society to which they belong.

The designation by the Argentine Government of a Workers' delegation, whose journey and expenses it paid and who came to this meeting to insult us gratuitously, speaks very clearly of our irrevo­ cable decision to respect the independence of trade unions, but it also shows how difficult it is to govern when you have to face lack of understanding or in­ tolerance.

However, nothing and no one can turn us aside from the path we have determined to follow. We are restoring the absolute in­ dependence of democratic institutions, and with them we shall continue to fight for the happiness, peace, freedom and progress of the Argentine citizens.

The President—I have received a note from the Workers' delegate of Argentina requesting that he should be allowed the floor to reply to the points which have been made by Mr. Armendares, Government delegate, Argentina, in the speech which he delivered just now. This speech which was delivered by the Government delegate of Argentina was in reply to certain points which had been made by the Workers' delegate, Argentina. If I now give him the floor I fear there may be a similar request again from the Government delegate of Argentina to reply to the points made in the Workers' delegate's speech and this will not end if I go on giving the right to reply. I therefore decide that there is no point of order and that the right of reply does not apply to the reply which has been given to a certain attack made in a certain speech.

Mr. Gibson (Employers' delegate, Australia)

—Mr. President, may I say on the occasion of my first appearance on this rostrum that I am privileged and proud to be here as the Australian Employers' delegate and, as their representative, to offer their congratulations to you on your appointment to the high office of President of this session of the Conference.
May I, at the outset, say that the employers of Australia support the searching examination which the Conference is undertaking in relation to the future programme of this institution and the areas on which it should concentrate in the future. To this end, may I direct some remarks to Chapter II of Part I of the Director-General’s Report which relates to human resources and economic development, and in particular, I would like to turn my attention to the section of the Report which deals with the development of social institutions.

After reviewing this matter in general the Director-General begins to state five principal objectives of the I.L.O. in this field. He states that: "The first of these objectives is the growth of workers' and employers' organisations which are genuinely representative and independent, organised on a solid basis and capable of playing an active part in the national effort for economic and social development."

We in Australia are wholeheartedly in support of this objective and affirm our belief in its fundamental importance. It is also true, as the Director-General states further on, that it is important in the context of each country to seek and develop appropriate institutional methods to achieve these aims. We in Australia, over the past 60 years, have applied ourselves to this important task, this task of developing strong independent organisations of workers and employers which are capable, not only of looking after the interests of their members, but of participating actively in the economic and social development of our country.

It is well known that in Australia we have adopted, for the purposes of settling industrial issues which arise between employers and the employed, the system of compulsory conciliation and arbitration. This system, of course, is not favoured in other countries, although it is being increasingly looked to in many of the developing countries, and indeed it is interesting to note that, when it was adopted in Australia, Australia was then essentially an agricultural country seeking to develop its secondary and tertiary industries.

What is generally not recognised, however, is that a fundamental prerequisite for the successful operation of the system of conciliation and arbitration is the recognition by the State and by the community of the independence of and necessity for strong trade union and employer associations. Under the Australian system both groups are encouraged to organise and, under the legislation, are given a legal status and the authority of law to pursue the legitimate interests of their members. As a result, the arbitration system in Australia has brought about an orderly development of strong unions and strong employers' associations which are recognised on all sides and which are looked to by the community and by the Government for assistance in promoting the development of the economy.

The legal status afforded to the organisations in itself protects them and their members from unwanted attacks from any side. The system itself, so far as it relates to the settlement of industrial disputes, has undoubtedly produced a code of wages and working conditions which have raised living standards to a point where they now match those of any country. It can therefore be said, whatever one's ideological attitude towards the system may be, that it has worked in the Australian context and that it has played a part in attaining the objectives referred to in the Report of the Director-General.

Important as all this may be, it is also well, I think, to reflect for a minute on the importance of these institutions—the employers' and workers' organisations—not only in the national context but also in the international context. The very basis of the I.L.O. is its tripartite structure. The existence of employers' and workers' groups is fundamental to the efficient operation of the Organisation. It is essential therefore, in the international context, that strong employers' and workers' organisations, able to act independently of each other and of their governments, should continue to exist and to be fostered, for it is only by the participation of such organisations in the international arena and in this institution that the best work can be performed. In this regard it is well for the I.L.O., when reviewing its programme and its structure for the future, to keep ever in mind the need, the basic and fundamental need, to protect the autonomy and the independence of each of these groups in the Organisation. Every time there is a breaking-down in the independence of any one of them, there is a weakening in the over-all strength of this Organisation.

Australian experience shows that the affording of legal status and national recognition to organisations of workers and employers does not mean that they should become subject to the control of the political machine. It is this particular aspect of Australian experience that we commend for examination, not only at the national level, but at the international level. We strongly support the lofty ideals which are expressed in the Report of the Director-General and trust that these aims will be achieved.

Mr. WEAVER (Government delegate, United States)—I join those who have preceded me in congratulating the President on his election. I also take this opportunity to welcome into the I.L.O. family the newest Members—Zambia, Malta, Malawi and Yemen. As has been said, we strongly believe that this increase in membership again demonstrates the strength and validity of the ideals upon which this Organisation is built.

In his excellent Report to the Conference, the Director-General reviews the major programme areas that appear to have had the general support of the Conference. These three major programme areas—human resources development, the development of social institutions, and conditions of life and work—encompass the broad spectrum of human endeavour within the competence of the I.L.O.

The Government of the United States subscribes fully to the central thesis of the Director-General’s Report. Concern for human resources development is as pressing a factor in my country than it is in others.

During my tour of duty with the I.L.O. I have tried, and I shall continue to try, to cooperate with all groups in this Organisation... which serves the working men and women of the world. But I hasten to remind delegates that co-operation, to be successful, has always to be a two-way street; therefore, I deeply regret that I find it impossible to discuss in the detail I had planned the Director-General's Report, in view of the provocative course of the debate during this session. Starting on 7 June, my country has been subjected to a series of distorted attacks by speakers from communist countries concerned with matters outside the competence of this Conference—matters which this Organisation cannot solve and which belong in the United Nations.

If these speakers were sincere, and not merely seeking to divert attention from the subversive activities of the international communist apparatus, they would have utilised the established machinery of the Resolutions Committee, which is designed for this purpose, to discuss the issues they raised. Instead, they sought to disrupt orderly debate in this hall by their politically motivated attacks.

While I objected to the statements of these speakers, I abided by the rulings of the President on 7 and 8 June, although I happened to have disagreed with them. I abided by those rulings because of my firm belief in the vital importance of the due process of laws as well as my deep respect for this house. I have expressed these thoughts many times from this rostrum. I am satisfied that the President has made every effort to guide the debate along appropriate lines. This effort, however, has been largely nullified by the consistent disregard of his ruling by speakers from communist countries. Therefore, I am constrained to comment on the issues involved and the policies of my Government in the manner suggested by the President on 8 June.

I think I should state at the outset that we believe that governments should derive their powers from the consent of the governed. History confirms that the American people believe in democracy—for themselves as well as for others. And by democracy we mean government by the majority; a government in which the supreme power is vested in the people and exercised by them, either directly or through their representatives chosen at periodic free elections where there is a choice of candidates representing varying points of view.

That is the kind of democracy in which we believe. I hasten to point out, however, that it is not the understanding of democracy by the communist countries who label themselves "democratic" and "socialist". I am convinced that they are neither. I would also propose a question at this point: why have they stopped using the word "communist" in describing themselves?

We have been reminded many times in the debate in this house that communist words often bear little resemblance to commonly accepted definitions. Such words as peace, aggression, imperialism, intervention, neo-colonialism and liberation have been sadly distorted—so distorted, in fact, that the so-called "liberators" had to build a wall to retain the "liberated" people.

The Soviet poet Evtushenko has written: "Comrades, you have to give words back their original meanings." I commend these very wise words to the attention of the communist delegates who have participated in this debate.

I might say, furthermore, in seeking to define our concept of democracy, that we do not believe that any group has the right to impose its system on others by force or by subversive techniques. But what do we see happening today? We see communist States engaged in subverting legitimate governments in Asia, Latin America and Africa. It has been said that the new imperialists of today are the Russians and the Red Chinese. Communist China's Premier, Chou En-lai, standing on African soil the other day, declared that Africa is ripe for revolution. He added that the same "exceedingly favourable situation for revolution" prevails in Asia and in Latin America.

As the Kenya Government spokesman has asked: what kind of revolution has Mr. Chou En-lai in mind? Most African States have gained their independence from foreign rule in recent years.

The only conclusion one can draw is that the revolutions Mr. Chou En-lai advocates would be aimed at existing African governments, with the aid of those whom his country has been training for years in guerrilla warfare and subversion.

Of course, the Communists do not call their actions those of subversion or aggression. In the distorted language of international communism they are "wars of liberation". They begin with infiltration, recruitment of dissidents, and propaganda and go on to guerrilla warfare, the establishment of so-called "liberation fronts" and then an outright attempt to overthrow governments by armed force.

While the communist countries pour in assistance to those subversive forces, their propaganda apparatus screeds its distortions at the intended victim and at any nation which dares to come to its help, calling them aggressors.

This is precisely what has happened in Viet-Nam. We are in Viet-Nam because we have a commitment to honour. We are not there as aggressors, but to oppose a policy of aggression from the North. We have no colonial or territorial aims there, or in any other part of the world. For the past five years, communist North Viet-Nam has sent increasing numbers of trained guerrillas into the South and, more recently, even complete units of the North Viet-Nam armed forces.

To meet this threat, 38 free nations are sending help to South Viet-Nam.

We are determined—I repeat, we are determined—to do everything necessary to preserve the right of South Viet-Nam to choose its own destiny.

We will not forfeit the battle against communist aggression in South Viet-Nam. If we did, the free world surely would soon have to face the same problem in yet another country.
The Communists already have proclaimed Thailand as their next target for guerrilla warfare in South-East Asia. The first stage is well under way with communist subversives killing Thai rural officials charged with improving the economic life of their people.

We will not quit—but we will negotiate. Since April, President Johnson has repeatedly invited unconditional discussions on Viet-Nam. Several other nations have sought consultations. Each effort has met with silence, slander, or the sound of guns.

If North Viet-Nam will cease aggression, cease subversion and accept the peace of its neighbour, the free world will be glad to pull its forces out of South Viet-Nam, because we—like most of the world—want peace in Viet-Nam. But it must be a peace which preserves the freedom of the South Vietnamese people to choose their own way of life.

Rather than wasting the time of the Conference in accusing the United States of waging a filthy war in Viet-Nam—and I would remind you that all wars are filthy, and that typical communist tactics in this one are hardly hygienic—would it not be more useful for Comrade Pimenov and his claimed 70 million Soviet workers to use their influence on North Viet-Nam to come to the Conference table?

Likewise, in the Dominican Republic a crisis arose which the Communists sought to exploit for their own purposes. When anarchy gripped the Dominican Republic last April the only apparent responsible authority asked the United States to send in armed forces. We answered the appeal. Over 6,500 persons were evacuated, and, of these, nearly two-thirds were nationals of 46 countries, from every continent, including Eastern Europeans whose delegates belabour us here.

It was an emergency action, taken to protect lives and to give the Inter-American system a chance to deal with a situation within its competence. And it is dealing with the situation now.

A cease-fire has been effected. The Secretary-General of the Organisation of American States and a three-man committee are consulting with all Dominican groups to bring about a political solution acceptable to the people as a whole. An Inter-American Peace Force has been set up, and those American troops still remaining are under its command. The O.A.S. will determine when the Peace Force will be withdrawn.

The O.A.S., I might remind you, is acting against civil disorder, and political chaos—actions incited by Communists, many of whom received guerrilla training abroad. The extent of this involvement is a matter of record in the Security Council, where it belongs, and the Organisation of American States.

Eastern European delegates have demanded the complete withdrawal of American forces from the Dominican Republic, but why have not the same delegates ever called for the withdrawal of the 80,000 Soviet troops still in Hungary nine years after the Soviet intervention that ruthlessly suppressed the aspirations of the Hungarian people?

I have sat in this hall and listened to speaker after speaker describe the needs of his country—for more rapid economic development, more industries, more training of workers, more co-operatives—all the things that the I.L.O., with the support of governments, employers and workers, can help and is helping, to provide.

I am proud—I hasten to admit—that my country has shared in the efforts at nation-building taking place around the globe, and we look forward to doing more.

We have also heard from this rostrum many delegates recite the problems they face: the population explosion, hunger, poverty, inadequate schools, etc. These are all grave impediments to progress.

But I submit that the gravest impediment to progress today is the conspiracy to subvert the developing countries, to steal their hard-won freedoms, and to take over legitimate movements of workers.

Let me ask how are we to quicken the pace of development enough to meet the needs of the emerging countries if our efforts are to be impeded by communist subversion parading as "movements of liberation"?

I think it is time that we—developing and developed countries alike—recognise communist propaganda and aggression for what they are: forces aimed at the destruction of the better standards of life in large freedom that most of us are trying to build.

For our part, our determination and commitment to freedom are without limit. This has been made amply clear by President Johnson, who, by words and deeds, has reaffirmed the concept expressed by the late President Kennedy in his inaugural address, when he stated that Americans are "unwilling to witness or permit the slow undoing of those human rights to which this nation has always been committed, and to which we are committed today at home and around the world."

"Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty."

Mr. BERGENSTROM (Employers' member, Sweden)—Mr. President, on behalf of the Danish, Finnish, Norwegian and Swedish Employers' Confederations I would like to congratulate you most sincerely upon your election to your high post at this Conference.

We have listened to this general debate with great interest. It is with a certain regret, however, that we have found that, to some extent, the discussion has transgressed not only the limits that have been set for the debate but also the competence of our Organisation itself. In this respect I should like to refer to the pertinent remarks made by the Workers' delegate of Canada, Mr. Morris, who rightly pointed out that, with regard to the activities of the different Members of the so-called United Nations family, "there must be an orderly and clear division of labour for the achievement of the great goals of mankind ." In this context it must be recalled that purely political matters are exclusively within the sphere of competence of the United Nations and that it can serve no useful purpose to try to duplicate here what is done in the General Assembly in New York.

Unfortunately, this has not been understood by all delegates here. The Scandinavian em-employers are sorry to note that political propaganda manoeuvres have somewhat drawn our attention away from the very important social problems which we have come here to discuss.

As I understand the situation, this debate should centre mainly around the Director-General's Report on the future activities of the I.L.O. and the report of the Governing Body Working Party on the programme and structure of the Organisation. Both these documents have been criticised in the course of the debate on the ground that the structural problems have not been sufficiently touched upon. However, this criticism is unfounded. In the period of reappraisal in which our Organisation finds itself, our first task is to reach agreement on future programmes. Only when this has been achieved will it be time for decisions with regard to instrumentalities.

Concerning the major I.L.O. programme areas as developed in Chapter II of the Director-General's Report, we are happy to support wholeheartedly the Director-General's proposals for action under the heading of human resources and economic development. In our view the activities envisaged for improving the quality of manpower and creating productive employment should be considered as having the highest priority in all the work of our Organisation.

Different questions regarding human resources development were discussed in detail by the Governing Body Working Party on the programme and structure of the I.L.O. It is a pleasure for me to say that the Scandinavian employers are in full agreement with the Working Party's conclusions.

In pursuing its human resources development programme, as in all its other activities, the I.L.O. should give the highest priority to the needs of the developing countries. Many delegates to this Conference who are familiar with the problems of those countries have expressed the view that the I.L.O. should concentrate on projects for the creation of productive employment, conducive to economic and social development. The Scandinavian employers agree with those statements. It is felt that I.L.O. activities in the fields of vocational training, management development and employment promotion can be extremely useful.

In the introduction to his Report the Director-General states his intention to deal only with general questions on which there already appears to be a clear consensus of opinion in the Conference. Having this in mind one is a little surprised when taking cognisance of the Director-General's proposals under the heading of the development of social institutions. The economic conditions as well as the social climate vary so widely, not only as between different parts of the world but also within the regions themselves, that the I.L.O. would have difficulties in reaching general conclusions. Furthermore, questions relating to the formulation of incomes policies have been taken up by competent organisations within the different regions. The activities of these organisations in the area under discussion would seem sufficient for the foreseeable future.

In the field of living and working conditions we feel that the highest priority should be given to the protection of basic human rights, whereby special emphasis would be laid on measures to combat discrimination in employment.

Before leaving the programmes of our Organisation I would recall the proposal made during this debate according to which the I.L.O. should embark on a wide programme of industrialisation. Sometimes we also hear the suggestion that the I.L.O. should take an active interest in questions relating to international trade. We do not underestimate the importance of these questions, which are certainly of vital relevance to the welfare of mankind. But in these fields, too, there is a need to consider the distribution of responsibilities as between the international organisations, and the I.L.O. should not embark on activities already taken up by other organisations.

I would now like to comment on a few structural questions that have been touched upon by previous speakers. First of all, it has been noted that increased responsibilities and authority should be given to this Conference at the expense of the Governing Body. The four Scandinavian employers' confederations, bearing the overwhelming workload of the Conference in mind, are rather of the opinion that effective management of this huge Organisation requires a strong Governing Body, in the future as in the past.

We are pleased to see, in the Report of the Director-General, that the Office is being re-organised in such a way that the I.L.O. will be able to concentrate on essential activities and to reduce and eliminate progressively those which are less important.

A viewpoint that has been expressed by many delegates from developing countries is that the activities of the International Labour Office should be further decentralised. We think that this important point should be scrutinised thoroughly by the Governing Body Working Party, when it takes up the structural problems. At present it is sufficient just to make the general observation that administrative decentralisation should not be carried out in such a way as to threaten the universal character of the I.L.O. On central policy matters there should still be guidance from Headquarters in Geneva.

Finally, I would like to make a few comments on the ways and means of implementing the I.L.O. programme. Since the special problems of the developing countries should always receive first-hand attention within the I.L.O., technical assistance activities should have the highest priority. Besides this form of action, there also seems to be fairly general agreement that, within its sphere of competence, the I.L.O. should be active in the field of research, international exchange of experience, inter alia, at meetings of experts, and public information.

However, the four Scandinavian employers' confederations definitely disagree with the Director-General when he says in his Report that practically all speakers dealing with the standard-setting functions of the I.L.O. at the 1963 and 1964 Sessions of the Conference were agreed that international instruments were the backbone of the Organisation and that their elaboration would continue to play an essential part. The Employers have stated their thinking in this respect very clearly. The debate at this year's session of the Conference shows that the Employers' opinion is shared by representatives from other quarters. As one example out of many I will mention the statement of the Government delegate from India, Mr. Bheekhabhai, who said that, to the developing countries, adoption of international standards is naturally not of such urgent concern as assistance in the promotion of economic development, and indicated that the assistance afforded by I.L.O. standards can at best be marginal.

There are apparently widely conflicting views on the standard-setting activities of the I.L.O. The four Scandinavian employers' confederations hope sincerely that the unsolved difficulties relating thereto, as well as the remaining questions with regard to the future of our great Organisation, will find solutions that command a wide measure of agreement.

We trust that the Governing Body, at the request of the party on the programme and structure of the I.L.O. will provide constructive guidance in this respect, having special regard to the many problems of the developing countries.

Interpretation from Portuguese: Mr. LOPES SUSSEKIND (Government delegate, Brazil)—I should like first of all to transmit the congratulations of my Government to you, Sir, on your election to the presidency of the Conference.

At the 48th Session of the International Labour Conference I transmitted the view of the Brazilian Government that the profound economic and technological changes and the emergence of new States obliged the I.L.O. to re-examine its methods of work if it were to remain active and up-to-date in the search for its permanent objectives of social justice. Commenting on the Director-General's Report, I said that President Castelo Branco, who was elected by the National Congress after the democratic revolution of 31 March 1964, has also started reforms of the country's structure, systems and methods of action with a view to the economic recovery of the country and the effective application of standards of labour protection and social security.

Today, 12 months later, I return to this rostrum to applaud the reconstruction already effected, but regard the central organs of the I.L.O. and the efforts of the Governing Body and the Director-General for reformulation and extension of the regional activities of the Organisation on the lines set out in the resolution adopted by the Conference on 9 July 1964.

Commenting on the present Report of the Director-General, I may, as representative of the Brazilian Government, refer to the perfect agreement between his views and the directives which govern the reforms now under way in my country, reforms which, unlike previous demagogic pronouncements or revolutionary attempts, are being carried out in accordance with constitutional and democratic processes.

In the chapter on human resources and economic development, the Report stresses that plans regarding human resources must be closely related to plans for economic development. In fact, the juridical standards giving effect to the principles of social justice tend to become a dead letter if the particular economic situation in the country, instead of promoting economic development, becomes stagnant or suffers from increasing inflation. Development depends basically on the conditions of health, education and vocational training and on the juridical and administrative institutions which give the worker sufficient protection in employment and social security.
Therefore, social justice cannot be achieved without economic development, nor can economic development be achieved without social justice.

The Brazilian demographic explosion—the annual rate of increase exceeds 3 per cent.—has made the population of my country exceptionally young. Of the 82 million inhabitants, 52.86 per cent. are under 20 years of age. This circumstance increases the responsibility of our Government and of the economically active population in approaching and handling the problems of economic development and social well-being. Nevertheless, Brazil has made comforting progress in regard to the matters dealt with in this Part of the Report.

As regards education and health, it would be impossible in this short speech to enumerate all the plans and achievements of the federal Government regarding the raising of the educational and health standards of the people of Brazil. However, I should refer in this regard to the following. The intensive programme for the training of labour instituted by our Ministry of Education and Culture is in course of being carried out. Secondly, in the Ministry of Labour, by Act of 11 December 1964, we have established a National Employment and Wage Department which, apart from its other functions concerning cost of living, wages, manpower and employment, has to formulate a government policy for vocational training, making allowance for conditions on the employment market and the prospects of economic and social development, all with due regard for the powers of the Ministry of Education in all matters coming within its competence.

Thirdly, vocational training, provided by state schools and courses run by employers' organisations or apprenticeship in the undertaking supervised by the employers' organisations and by the Ministry of Labour, is making considerable progress.

Fourthly, we have medical care services under the social welfare scheme which have been considerably expanded and which spent in 1964, 112,000 million cruzeiros, the amount spent in the previous year having been 54,000 million, while 250,000 million cruzeiros has been earmarked under this heading in the budget for 1965.

The social welfare scheme has 23 hospitals of its own, with another five nearing completion, 564 outpatient departments and 1,473 private hospitals under contract to the social welfare scheme. We have 15,690 doctors who, in 1964, attended to 21.5 million cases—58,900 a day—and carried out 215,000 surgical operations—589 a day.

I should mention in this connection the Land Statute Act, No. 4504 of 30 November 1964, which covers the rights and obligations concerning rural real estate in order to carry out agrarian reform and create institutions which will put this reform and our agrarian policy into effect. As the Conference is now dealing with this important subject, I should like, as Minister of State of Brazil, to repeat what I have said last year in the plenary—namely that "The new Government will establish agrarian reform, of which much has been said for merely subversive purposes". This is now being done in a democratic and non-violent manner in accordance with the juridical system set out in the statute I have mentioned. President Castelo Branco said in this respect: "Since it took office the present Government has spared no effort to promote the growth of agriculture. At the legislative level the great achievement of the Government in this field has been the promulgation of the Land Statute—an agrarian reform elaborated on strictly technical lines which was approved in a serene atmosphere, without the agitation which surrounded this step in the pre-revolutionary period. Its main tool of action will be the rural land tax—a progressive and graduated tax which will punish severely non-productive latifundia and provide rewards for good husbandry. In addition, the tool of expropriation may be used, now authorised by law against financial compensation, in areas of greatest population pressure and greatest social tension."

In the chapter on the development of social institutions the Director-General of the I.L.O. stresses the desirability of the organised social groups concerned participating actively in the institutions responsible for labour relations and the preparation of economic and social development plans, and refers to various objectives, which I may say deserve the full support of my Government. In many cases these aims are closely correlated to conditions of work and life, which are covered in the following chapter.

In Brazil all these objectives are being respected. In fact, representatives appointed by the trade union and employers' organisations have for a long time now been participating in accordance with legal provisions in labour courts of all instances; in the superior council of the governing body of the National Department of Social Welfare; in the administrative governing bodies and fiscal bodies of the various social security institutions and other bodies lower down the scale of hierarchy. This practice has been maintained and extended through the revolutionary movement of 31 March 1964.

I should like to point in this connection to the active participation of representatives of employers' and workers' organisations in the following bodies: in the planning board, whose secretary-general is the Minister of Economic Planning and Co-ordination; in the advisory board for salaries and employment, which is a body coming under the Department of Wages and Employment; in the trade union committees collaborating with the labour inspectorate as instituted by the Labour Inspection Regulations approved on 15 March of this year.

Just as important as the Acts creating these various bodies, is the desire of the present Government to associate the various interests concerned in the preparation of the draft legislation to be sent to the National Congress—as, inter alia, was the case with the proposed legislation for the reform of social welfare and collective labour agreements. As regards the latter, in addition to the stimulus given to collective bargaining, provision is made for the creation, through collective agreements, of joint arbitration and conciliation committees at the level of the undertaking.

As regards the authentically representative character and the independence of trade union organisations, the present Government has... been doing a good deal of revising and cleaning up and is only now beginning to be understood by the free and democratic nations. Many trade unions were bound to the Government through the Trade Union Social Fund, which ceased to exist last December. Many trade union leaders obeyed orders from government authorities, political parties or factions and even foreign groups. The present Government freed the trade union organisations from this relationship of subordination, restoring to them the independence which is a sine qua non in the defence of their interests in their respective categories. From 1 April 1964 to 31 May 1965, 1,040 trade union elections took place without any government, political party or economic influence whatsoever.

If it is true that man lives on memories of the past and hopes for the future, it is also true that human happiness is to a large extent conditioned by the idea of security with regard to the future. Therefore the present Government has given top priority to the administrative reconstruction of our welfare institutions so as to broaden the services provided by those institutions and eventually to work out legislation reformulating social welfare and extending it to cover rural and domestic workers. This reconstruction and reform has taken place and the legislation in question has already been worked out. Today social welfare covers about 6 million insured persons in addition to their dependants, which means a total of 20 million beneficiaries. With the projected reforms, its scope will be extended to the whole of the active population of the country, with all the benefits and services which make up a true system of social security.

The time limit we must observe as delegates here prevents my analysing in the light of experience in Brazil other statements and suggestions made by the Director-General concerning the measures which affect economic development and social security. However, I should not like to close my statement without referring to the importance my Government's policy places on occupational safety and health and labour statistics. It was in this spirit that it promoted the creation of the National Department of Occupational Safety and Health with services, sections or branches in all the states, and set up the Data Processing Centre of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare, which is equipped with electronic computers.

It is with very great satisfaction that I tell you that this morning I delivered to the Director-General of the I.L.O. in the name of my Government the instruments of ratification of 11 international labour Conventions. This fact further strengthens the bonds between Brazil and the great work undertaken by this Organisation, and at the same time proves the decision and determination of the President of the Republic and the National Congress to apply fully all the standards adopted by this Conference.

Therefore I feel it is my duty to express my concern when I observe that every year this assembly is increasingly taking up political subjects which are quite outside its competence, to the obvious detriment of the study of the questions within its field of competence.

The I.L.O. is a legal entity in international law and, like all legal entities, it has an explicit field of competence. Article 1 of the Constitution indicates very clearly that it was founded to achieve the objectives set out in the Pre-amble to the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

The agreement signed between the I.L.O. and the United Nations stipulates that this Organisation is recognised as a specialised agency of the United Nations dealing with matters falling within its own field of competence which, as a legal corollary, excludes the possibility of this assembly dealing with questions falling within the jurisdiction of other international bodies already recognised by the United Nations.

The I.L.O. survived the Second World War principally because it was a technical body which can dedicate its action to the great task of making universal labour laws and to social welfare. For this very reason I am convinced that the echoes of the lessons of its past will still resound in the conscience of those who, like the Government of Brazil, desire this Organisation to continue to be a most powerful instrument for achieving social justice for all nations and for all men.

Interpretation from German: Mr. ERDMANN (Employers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—In the discussion of the Director-General's Report many speakers have referred to the diversity of conditions and problems as between the developing countries and the industrial States. There is no doubt at all about this diversity. It stems from continuing differences in economic situations. I consider it to be one of the greatest tasks, and perhaps the most important task, of the remaining decades of the twentieth century to work in fair and frank co-operation between developing countries and industrial States for the removal of these differences in conditions. The German employers will continue to do their best to contribute to this great task.

Despite all differences in initial situations, industrial States and developing countries have a common task to develop the economic strength of their countries further, and so to improve the social position and conditions of work of employed persons. At the same time, a constructive path must be found in order to develop co-operation between workers and employers. Necessary though it is for the International Labour Organisation to develop programmes of this kind which have regard to the different circumstances, one must remember also this community of interest which I believe is an essential basis for the world-wide activity of the I.L.O. The tripartite structure of the I.L.O. makes it particularly fitted for these tasks.

If we deal in the I.L.O. with problems which relate in the widest sense to relations between governments, workers and employers, unquestionably a programme for the development of social institutions is extremely important for the future activity of the I.L.O. These social institutions cannot be seen independently of the economic and social structures of the particular countries. The German employers believe in private enterprise based on recognition of ownership and competition and in which the entrepreneur is conscious of his social responsibility. We are convinced that this system is specially able not only to satisfy the material needs of men and women, but also to provide the basis for free and satisfactory organisation of society. We are strengthened in this conviction by the development in our own country in which this form of economic organisation, which we call the social market economy, has not only led to a very high standard of living and full employment, but also permits a large measure of social peace.

Certainly not all countries in the world have the preconditions for such an organisation of the economy, and state participation in the economy is initially necessary on a wide scale. Such an organisation of the economy, however, should not be confused with a system like the communist one, in which the activity of entrepreneurs is prohibited on principle, and which has the hope that this activity will disappear altogether. Every country, of course, must have the right to determine its own social and economic organisation. However, no one should underestimate the consequences of the decision for the individual and for the country in the fields of economic, social and other policies. We are daily and painfully reminded of this truth in our divided country, and we hope particularly that this Organisation will be sympathetic to our plea for self-determination for the 18 million of our compatriots behind the Iron Curtain.

I will now come to the Director-General's Report itself. I am glad that the Director-General should consider the maintenance and growth of employers' and workers' associations as the first objective of the programme for the development of social institutions. I mentioned, in my speech last year, how decisive the existence of both the partners is for the development of an organisation based on the conciliation of mutual interests in the social field. I am therefore glad to find this objective mentioned again in the Director-General's proposals.

I should like to refer particularly to his statement that, although one must recognise the great differences between conditions in the different countries, the International Labour Organisation cannot compromise on principles. The Director-General goes on to say that there must be a frank dialogue between the State and different organised social groups, a dialogue inspired by mutual understanding, by mutual respect for each other's autonomy and freedom of action, and by a determination to reach agreement.

I believe that the achievement of this objective is one of the outstanding tasks in the future activity of the I.L.O. The German employers approve the existence of trade unions which perform their functions independently of the other partner and free from state intervention, and so represent the economic interests of their members. These trade unions require free employers' organisations for independent decisions on wages and conditions of employment. The I.L.O. should support the development of such organisations effectively in their programmes.

We insist that the State should allow for responsible activity by our organisations of workers and employers. Responsibility for the general welfare, however, can be exercised only by the constitutional bodies of the State. However much the employers' and workers' organisations in their own fields of activity are aware of the overriding needs of the community, nevertheless they cannot have a formal share in the responsibility of the organs of Government. Here we have the borderline between the tasks of the State on the one hand and those of the private organisations on the other hand. Hence, when proposals have been made in this Organisation and at this Conference to a different effect, that is that the trade unions and the employers' organisations should share in all economic decisions at all levels, I must oppose this position. The development would lead to confusion of responsibility, and this would not be acceptable as regards the functioning of the State, or the relationship between management and labour, or between both of them and the State.

In view of the proposals in different contexts with a view to working towards economic democratisation, the limits on collaboration between the three parties should be clarified. We believe in collaboration with the workers in the undertaking and we believe in co-operation with the trade unions at the higher level, but the management of an undertaking is not like the administration of a State and it cannot be democratised. Nor can the respective responsibilities of private employers and state interests at the higher level be confused.

I believe it is essential that the International Labour Organisation should also recognise and observe these limits in the application of its own programme. I am not unaware of the fact that in certain States where the government freely intervenes in economic affairs business circles are justifiably anxious to be consulted.

When we speak of the development of social institutions, we must not forget one very important fact. It is not enough to develop institutions. Much more decisive is the spirit in which people make these institutions work in practice. There are countries where there are few institutions and where, because of the general conviction and an atmosphere of good will, there is social peace and social progress. The I.L.O. should promote the possibility of stimulating this spirit of co-operation. I believe that it is the Industrial Committees more than any other body or institution of the I.L.O. that can make a valuable contribution in this field.

The determination to co-operate cannot be created by law. It can only be strengthened through determination, through promotion of free discussion and through development of the conviction that the right to have different opinions is an important criterion of a free society, but that the reconciliation of conflicting interests is also a no less important element and objective in this society.

Mr. BASFORD (Government adviser, Canada)—First, Mr. President, on behalf of Canada, I want to join with other delegations in congratulating you on your election to the office of President. I want also to associate myself with other delegations in welcoming to resources field. As a member of the Commonwealth, Canada is particularly and especially pleased to see its new Commonwealth partners joining with us in the councils of the world. At the outset I must express the very real regret of our Minister of Labour, the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, at being unable to attend this year's session of the Conference. He addressed the 48th Session and had hoped to address the session again this year. Unfortunately his parliamentary responsibilities at home have prevented this. I know, however, Mr. President, that he joins with me in my congratulations to you and would want me to extend on his behalf the greetings of the Government of Canada to the delegates to the 49th Session.

We are pleased that our Deputy Minister of Labour, Mr. George Haythorne, has been able to serve the I.L.O. as Chairman of the Governing Body. As a founding Member, Canada is proud that he should serve this Organisation with the enthusiasm and dedication that is characteristic of him. He has served in the same way that Canada has served the I.L.O. in the past, and, I assure you, will continue to do so in the future.

We in Canada are both impressed and encouraged by the "new look" of the I.L.O. Much of this is due to the work of the Director-General and his staff. It is essential for this, as for any other organisation, to examine periodically its basic objectives and the way these are expressed through current policies and programmes. In today's rapidly changing world, we must not be afraid to think along new lines. New programmes can encourage us to be more creative and productive in our tasks.

One evidence of new vitality, I am pleased to learn, is the recent decision of the Governing Body authorising the Director-General and his staff. It is essential for this, as for any other organisation, to examine periodically its basic objectives and the way these are expressed through current policies and programmes. In today's rapidly changing world, we must not be afraid to think along new lines. New programmes can encourage us to be more creative and productive in our tasks.

As these initial statements by the Chairman of the Governing Body indicate—statements which have been supported by many delegations—our Conference is devoted to the important and specialised work of the I.L.O., to the relevant and vital issues arising out of the Director-General's Report and to the comprehensive agenda before us.

In the course of the plenary debate there has been some tendency by some member delegations to stray from the important matters immediately before us, to introduce matters which, while vitally important in themselves, are not relevant to the agenda items or to the solution of the problems facing the Conference or the I.L.O. and which, when once raised, inevitably lead to replies. It is the view of my Government that the introduction of highly controversial and extraneous political issues, unrelated to I.L.O. efforts, programmes or competence, serve only to divert us from the important work before us. Surely there are better and other forums for the consideration of major political issues. The United Nations General Assembly and Security Council are designed specifically for this purpose. Surely the work of the specialised agencies such as the I.L.O. is hampered and endangered by the developing and pursuing active manpower policies.

As people vitally concerned with this whole problem, we must realise and clearly understand that economic growth can best be advanced by a working force which, on the one hand, is fully qualified and, on the other hand, benefits from safe and agreeable working conditions as well as from a fair and equitable return for its labour.

In this last connection, I am happy to report and, as a member of the Canadian House of Commons, personally pleased, that since our Minister last spoke to you we in Canada have enacted a Canada Labour Standards Act which provides a 40-hour work-week with a maximum of eight hours overtime at time-and-a-half, basic minimum hourly wages, eight statutory holidays per year and two weeks paid vacation. We have drawn heavily on collective bargaining experience in Canada and other countries in developing what in fact is a comprehensive labour standards code.

We are also proud that we have recently enacted the Canada Pension Plan, a national contributory portable pension plan under which all workers and their employers shall jointly contribute to a pension fund and shall receive a pension based on their average lifetime earnings sufficient to allow them to retire in dignity and security. We regard this as a most progressive piece of social legislation and we acknowledge the helpfulness of the experience and advice of other nations and of the I.L.O. itself in working out this important programme. My task in participating in the plenary debate is made easier by the fact that Mr. Haythorne has already presented the broad outlines of the work facing the Conference in his initial statement made on 2 June and in the further statement which he made as Chairman of the Working Party on programmes and structure on 4 June. These statements serve to bring home the many practical tasks which the I.L.O. faces in a changing world.

As these initial statements by the Chairman of the Governing Body indicate—statements which have been supported by many delegations—our Conference is devoted to the important and specialised work of the I.L.O., to the relevant and vital issues arising out of the Director-General's Report and to the comprehensive agenda before us.

In the course of the plenary debate there has been some tendency by some member delegations to stray from the important matters immediately before us, to introduce matters which, while vitally important in themselves, are not relevant to the agenda items or to the solution of the problems facing the Conference or the I.L.O. and which, when once raised, inevitably lead to replies. It is the view of my Government that the introduction of highly controversial and extraneous political issues, unrelated to I.L.O. efforts, programmes or competence, serve only to divert us from the important work before us. Surely there are better and other forums for the consideration of major political issues. The United Nations General Assembly and Security Council are designed specifically for this purpose. Surely the work of the specialised agencies such as the I.L.O. is hampered and endangered by the importance in most of these countries, it is all about 3 million Canadians in membership. programmes of immediate and practical benefit to fishermen. This is an example of government assistance and encouragement to co-operative development.

Another industry in Canada where co-operatives are making an important contribution is fisheries. There are over 90 fisheries co-operatives in Canada, located in eight of our ten provinces, which carried on a total business in 1963 of almost $24 million. Through the Federal Department of Fisheries, grants are made to four universities located in maritime areas for the development of extension training programmes of immediate and practical benefit to fishermen. This is an example of government assistance and encouragement to co-operative development.

Side by side with these associations are some 4,500 Caisses populaires or credit unions, counting about 3 million Canadians in membership. About 70 per cent. of these are linked with other types of co-operatives through membership in provincial central credit unions or co-operative credit societies. If anything is typical of the Canadian co-operative movement it is its wide variety. We have consumer co-operatives, housing co-operatives and electric co-operatives, as well as co-operatives for oil refining, chemical and fertiliser production, and abattoirs based on co-operative principles. At the present time the long-established grain co-operatives in our Western Provinces are developing new activities and assuming a multi-purposes character by the growth of "horizontal integration". Thus, a large grain marketing co-operative now has a livestock division, a vegetable oil plant, a flour mill, a publishing business and an insurance agency. A federation of farm supply co-operatives has developed a grain division, a poultry processing plant, an insurance company and a subsidiary organisation to provide housing for elderly people. It is not surprising then to learn that one in every seven Canadians is a member of a co-operative.

The federal Government has helped to develop production and marketing co-operatives for several groups of Eskimos in the north of Canada. This innovation has been, in some instances, responsible for saving a northern area from destitution. The programme began in 1959 and, by 1964, 24 co-operatives were operating in the north. Although from a financial viewpoint they are much less important than the larger co-operatives of southern Canada, they have proved to be valuable institutions to their members, allowing the Eskimos to retain control over their own activities, thus strengthening their traditional independence and personal pride. There are also many important examples which could be given of assistance which provincial governments in Canada have given to co-operatives.

The progress which the co-operative movement has made in Canada, however, reflects mainly on its members and its leaders. It is essentially a movement beginning at the grass roots among groups of people, with only limited government participation. This ensures a democratic approach and is, I think you will agree, a good precedent to follow. One of the basic co-operative tenets is self-help. State assistance, if not very carefully controlled and administered, can easily undermine this foundation and infringe upon the autonomy of the movement. The State can, however, provide technical training and provide advisory assistance, especially in the early stages.

As a supplement, or even alternative, to state aid, the proposal made at the 1961 F.A.O. Conference to provide assistance through the facilities of a world co-operative bank is, I think, a sound one and worthy of further serious consideration. Through an organisation of this type many of the special needs of co-operatives in developing countries could be met. Loans made under favourable conditions could assist in strengthening the agricultural economy generally and help to increase food production.

These are basic problems which many countries face in developing their primary resources and which must be solved if there is to be a sound economic and social structure. It is this challenge, the challenge to increase the worth of a people or a nation, that the co-operative movement in Canada and across the world must meet. I hope that our Canadian experience, both in the past and at the present time, will provide encouragement and provide some useful lessons to other countries.

In closing, let me once again express my deep interest in the work of the Conference, not only as regards co-operatives, but in many other fields of concern to people all around the world; and permit me to express also my sincere hope that the mutual exchange of views among Government, Workers' and Employers' delegates in this world forum will lead to lasting achievements in all member countries of the International Labour Organisation.

Mr. MISHIRO (Employers' delegate, Japan) —It gives me great pleasure to be able to congratulate the President on his election at the outset of what happens to be my tenth speech on the annual Report of the Director-General. As to the problems in this year's Report, I have referred in my last two speeches to the points to which I attach importance. However, I wish to make a few supplementary remarks about them, with reference to this latest Report and some of the speeches made in the course of this session of the Conference.

First of all, I should like to express my agreement with the Director-General in his conclusion reached in Chapter I of his Report that a substantial measure of agreement existed among delegates on the choice of the three major I.L.O. programme areas, namely: first, human resources development; secondly, labour relations, trade union development and the growth of sound social institutions; and thirdly, conditions of life and work. I do not think it is necessary for me to elaborate further upon each of these points. But if I may say something about them, I should like to give priority to the first one. This problem of course needs fundamental research. However, as part of the programme of the I.L.O., it must also be studied from the standpoint of technical assistance to the developing countries. It is often said that some technical assistance experts desparched by international agencies have little knowledge of the actual situation in the receiving countries, which sometimes complain about the practical benefit of the assistance they receive. Any vocational and technical training should be organised and put into practice in such a way as to suit the requirements of industrial development, in order not to create underemployment or unemployment of trained workers. In this connection I would point out that workers' educational training should not put too much financial burden on the shoulders of industry, because the successful development of human resources depends very much on the sound growth of industries.

With reference to the development of human resources there is another point which should be borne in mind by the I.L.O. Any technical assistance for the development of human resources must first depend upon the fundamental principle that heaven helps only those who help themselves.

Now I should like to turn to Chapter III of the Report, on international labour standards. Many previous speakers have paid special tribute to the conciseness of the Director-General's Report. I associate myself with them on it as a whole, but I should mention that I am not convinced by the paragraph which states: "Accordingly, in the light of these new basic agreements and particularly in view of the remarkable consensus of opinion expressed at the Conference on the continuing need for new international labour standards, the Conference may feel that a further exchange of views on this subject is not necessary." In my last two speeches in 1963 and 1964 I emphasised the necessity for the I.L.O. to change from a standard-setting body to a service organisation, and even that, in a way, a moratorium should be imposed in the years ahead on standard-setting because of the change in the world situation and in the composition of the I.L.O., which accentuates the atmosphere of irresponsibility, hypocrisy, vanity and even demagogic behaviour in the discussion of international instruments, and also because of the stockpile of so many international instruments to be digested by so many new developing countries. It may be noted that there were several speakers who made remarks similar to mine last year. Those speakers may have been small in number, but this was because the Employers' delegates had arranged beforehand to avoid overlapping amongst themselves, in order to cover as many different subjects as possible. Therefore, I can assure delegates that practically all the members of the free Employers' group were in favour of my proposal.

Of course I admit that there may have been some delegates at the Conference who may have hesitated to support us, because if we restrict standard-setting in the Conference and reduce the duration and frequency of sessions of the Conference, all delegates will naturally find less opportunity to come to Geneva at the expense of their governments. But they must know how expensive the Conference is. Furthermore, I must comment on another remark in the Report, as follows: "... the I.L.O.'s operational activities could be maintained and intensified without detriment to the Conference's work in the field of international standards and, in fact, it has always been recognised that the activities in these two major fields can gain much through a co-ordinated approach." If resources were unlimited, we would, of course, be able to do everything that everyone wanted at the same time. But because our resources are limited, as everybody knows, we must choose between these two major fields of the I.L.O.'s activities. I would again like to emphasise, therefore, the necessity of cutting down upon the frequency and duration of sessions of the Conference by reducing standard-setting, simplifying the proceedings—by means, for example, of more concise speeches by the delegates—and transferring the resources thus saved to other operational activities.

As to the question of decentralisation of the I.L.O.'s activities which I mentioned in my previous speeches, I have no objection to the proposal to strengthen or expand regional conferences so that a better exchange of views on labour problems and technical assistance, based upon the conditions peculiar to each region, may be made possible. With reference to the proposal made by some other speakers, however, to transfer the job of standard-setting from the General Conference to the regional conferences, I have doubts as to its practicability, from my experience at three Asian regional conferences and one Asian maritime conference. One of the reasons is that attendance by delegates from within the region was not satisfactory in comparison with attendance by delegates from outside the region, with the result that the proceedings of the conferences were led mainly by people who were more experienced in such international meetings but who were not from the region itself. In these circumstances it makes little sense to entrust the regional conferences with the task of standard-setting. The second reason is that it is not desirable to have labour standards differing from region to region.
In my speech at the last session of the Conference I emphasised the necessity of establishing a special committee to carry out the revision of the existing instruments in such a way as to make them applicable to a large majority of the member States. This was because most of the existing instruments have so far achieved very little in the way of ratifications or application mainly owing to their high standards applicable only to advanced countries. My proposal was then that this committee should be composed of experts or tripartite members coming from developing countries, instead of those from developed countries who might be inclined to alter the instruments concerned in the light of their own high standards. I am glad that, as is mentioned in Chapter III of the Director-General’s Report, the question of establishing such a committee was referred by the Director-General to the Governing Body and approved by it at its session in March this year, and the committee will probably be set up at the 1966 Session of the Conference. I am hoping that this special committee will be composed along the lines that I have suggested.

Experts or delegates from the advanced countries would, of course, participate in the activities of this committee but only in the sense of catalysts and without voting rights. In this connection I must frankly confess, however, that the proposal that I have just referred to is appropriate only on condition that the delegates from developing countries are determined to deal with this problem with a strong sense of responsibility and full consciousness of the actual situation in their own countries. Standard-setting is not simply a diplomatic or social function.

Now I would like to refer to a remark by the Workers’ delegate of Czechoslovakia. That delegate said: “I should like to stress the ever-growing need to revise the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). These Conventions do not contain any provisions for protecting workers against attacks and manoeuvres on the part of the capitalist employers.”

It seems to me very curious that a delegate from a communist country where there is no freedom of association should have stressed the necessity for strengthening Convention No. 87.

In this connection delegates may be aware that a few years ago, when the Governing Body requested the Czechoslovak Government to allow the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association to make an independent on-the-spot investigation, the said Government refused the request. I would like to add that this attitude of the Czechoslovak Government is in sharp contrast to that of my Government towards a similar request. I hope that the time will come when the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association will be received even by the communist countries and will be able to celebrate the successful fulfilment of its responsibilities without any hindrance.

As the Minister of Labour of Japan announced in his speech on 15 June, Convention No. 87 has been ratified by the Japanese Diet. I am sure all of the delegates have also learned of this through the press release which was issued by the Office on 14 June regarding the ceremony at which the instrument of ratification was deposited with the Director-General by the Japanese Ambassador. Availing myself of this opportunity, I would like to give you some supplementary information without which some of the paragraphs in the press release may mislead you. One of them contains part of the Director-General’s speech at the ceremony. He said: “I believe that this ratification will also be of far-reaching significance in the history of industrial relations in Japan.”

These two remarks, I am afraid, will give you an impression that freedom of association was not enjoyed by all of the Japanese trade unions until the Convention was ratified. But this is not the case, because the principle of freedom of association is guaranteed by the Japanese Constitution and also by the trade union laws which were promulgated some 20 years ago so far as employers and workers in private industry are concerned. That is one of the reasons why private employers and workers in Japan were not involved in the complaint lodged by some trade unions of the public sectors against the Japanese Government and in the discussions that took place with the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association either in Geneva or Tokyo. But as far as workers of the public sector, namely employees of the Government and the three public corporations, are concerned, freedom of association had been slightly restricted by special legislation in the public interest. It is only in respect of workers and employers in the public sector that labour relations will be influenced by the ratification of Convention No. 87 and a change in the relevant laws. The employers and workers in the private sector, which constitutes the great majority of the industry, will not be influenced, since they have been and still are enjoying freedom of association.

In these circumstances the Japanese employers have maintained a neutral position towards the activities of both the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association and the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission. Some employers, however, as supporters of our Government, were very much interested in the matter and have raised questions or made comments upon the competence or activity of those bodies. Some of the questions are difficult ones for me to answer, and seem to need some official clarification not only for Japan but in the interests of all other member States as well as of the I.L.O. itself. But, since the report of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association has not yet been presented to the Governing Body, I think it is premature for us to discuss those questions in detail at this Conference. I would like simply to pay a warm tribute to the strenuous efforts made for the settlement of this case by the bodies and personnel concerned.

Interpretation from German: Mr. Clausen (Government delegate, Federal Republic of Germany)—Mr. President, may I first of all, in the name of my delegation, congratulate you on your election to the high duty of directing this Conference. We hope that you will bring it to a satisfactory conclusion. I should also like to greet the new member States.

I will now turn to the Director-General's Report, which largely deals with problems of the developing countries. It is only if we, too, concern ourselves with the problems of these countries and help them to construct a social organisation which corresponds to their conditions that there can be a balanced social relationship between member States of the Organisation. The discussion so far, however, justifies the fear that we fail to recognise what spiritual forces are on the move now. We do not perhaps understand that it is not only a question of social and economic problems. Of course, we, in the I.L.O. must deal above all with social problems, but these are only part of the problems in the new countries which seek new forms of expression.

We should, therefore, think more about the contribution which the African States can make here if we are not to run the risk that the one side will regard itself as the receiving end and the other side as mere providers. That cannot lead to the aim of peaceful integration of these States in the present-day world for which we all hope.

One of the most distinguished living Africans, Léopold Sedar Senghor, President and Prime Minister of Senegal, recently reminded us that the cultures of Africa are very old and merely different from those of European States. President Senghor praises the contribution of the African ethnologist and philosopher Leo Frobenius who has explored the pre-history of the African Continent and explained the special characteristics of African culture to Europeans. President Senghor referred to a statement by Frobenius that in the future a culture cannot play a leading part in the pre-history of the African Continent and by means of it the Government intends to give good and appropriate vocational training. We have such a programme, and by means of it the Government has enabled all workers who have completed vocational training and done well in the same occupation for two years to train for higher levels of employment with better wages and more responsibility. During this continued training, the cost of the worker's and his family's maintenance, as well as the cost of the training, is paid from public funds. This programme has been extremely successful.

We also have an Efficiency Promotion Act which aims at enabling each worker in the light of his aptitudes to reach a maximum of economic success in his job. This is intended also for women workers who, after a long interruption when their main task was to look after their families and bring up their children, return to occupational life. In this connection I should like to object to an allegation made by several speakers here stating, as if it were an accepted fact, that there is unemployment in the countries which they describe as capitalist. I must insist that my country be excepted from the scope of this summary opinion. Although we too started at zero, not only have we had full employment for the last ten years but overemployment, and we are glad that over a million, and in 1964 to DM3,000 million. These amounts are far greater than the contributions of those who have sought to tell the Conference that they are the only ones who truly support the new African States. In the last year, all the Western countries together paid $62,000 million in development assistance, whereas the East bloc States paid in the same period only $2,000 million. I say this not to boast on behalf of the West or my own country, but to establish a true relationship between words and facts. It seems to me it is a tradition to urge promotion of the developing countries and to reject the budget of the I.L.O.

The Director-General said in his Report that industrial countries and developing countries must strive equally to give workers as good a vocational training as possible so that they can meet the practical requirements of changing conditions. Although in our country we have many and various kinds of occupations in which the workers are trained, it is significant that 75 per cent. of all apprentices are trained in only 11 occupations. This trend gives them such a broad basis that later they can do all sorts of different jobs and always have good opportunities for finding a new job even when conditions are changing.

We are glad, therefore, that in the long term the I.L.O. intends to give good and appropriate vocational training a high priority in its programme. One should stress in this connection that manual labour has its value and its dignity. It is not what a man does but how he does it which determines the level of his personality. One should therefore oppose the view that manual workers are socially degraded; nor is it at all true that operatives only work with their hands.

We know from our experience that in an industrial society based on division of labour, where the value of the worker is determined by his performance, one-time vocational training is not sufficient. We must seek further vocational training. We have such a programme, and by means of it the Government has enabled all workers who have completed vocational training and done well in the same occupation for two years to train for higher levels of employment with better wages and more responsibility. During this continued training, the cost of the worker's and his family's maintenance, as well as the cost of the training, is paid from public funds. This programme has been extremely successful.
million workers from other countries have entered our country where they work under the same conditions as the German workers. Statistics on the number of employed persons seem to me—I may be wrong, and I am always prepared to learn—to show clearly that in many countries which describe themselves as socialist there may be no statistical unemploy ment but there is evidence of underemployment. That means that the same performance can only be reached with many more workers than elsewhere. It would be a good thing if the I.L.O. were to clarify this situation and put the statistics on the same footing so that the positions in the employment markets in all countries can be properly evaluated.

It is often assumed that more manpower can only be brought on to the employment market and all reserves can only be fully used if there is over-all economic planning. The Director-General also speaks of this. Perhaps it is true of countries which have centrally directed economies, but we think that maximum economic efficiency can only be reached if the under taking has the right of disposal over private property and the worker can choose his occupation and his job and freely negotiate the conditions on which he will work. In this way the worker receives much more personal freedom than if a centrally directed economic bureaucracy tells him where he has to work and on what conditions. Therefore, I really do not understand—and I must urge previous speakers not to be resentful—why they should pontificate here to the effect that the so-called socialist form of economy—which, incidentally, representatives of socialist, Marxist and Leninist theory and practice are in no way agreed—is superior to other forms. This is a matter of extreme importance, particularly in the I.L.O. This assertion is proved by no facts at all. I am prepared to be converted, but only by facts. What are the facts? From this platform three years ago I said that the yield per unit of area in the collective agriculture of the Soviet Union is no higher than it was in the time of the Czars. Events have since proved this. The statistics on the same footing show that in the Federal Republic of Germany, yields have increased in the last 15 years by 40 per cent. per acre and by 250 per cent. per person employed.

Let me give you another example. In a newspaper of a so-called socialist country, some ten thousand workers from which are employed in our country, and to which German workers annually bring over DM200 million worth of foreign exchange as tourists and holiday makers, I read that the Deutschmark is circulating to the exclusion of the domestic currency, that local authorities finance electrification and replace oil lamps by electric bulbs with emigrant workers' marks, the workers can buy land and build houses with the money they have earned in Germany, they take cars, television sets, refrigerators, radios and cash home to their own country, and they have over DM150 million in German savings banks. This newspaper—I repeat, a newspaper in a socialist country—says that it would be a better thing if the workers could receive as much at home as they do in Germany where the average wage is five or six times as high as it is in their home country.

My last objection is one on which the facts can be checked by anybody. We have been able to see in our country both experiences—the so-called socialist paradise of folly and cruelty by barbed wire and masonry. As long as the migration of workers is not from the Federal Republic of Germany to the socialist countries, as long as the workers—to use Lenin's phrase—vote with their feet against the socialist countries, then facts will continue to speak against them, and they have no right to say from this platform that their system is better than ours.

If they would merely say it is different, then there would be no objection. It would, I believe, make our discussions far more objective in this Conference if, in future, we were not merely to make assertions but also to provide evidence. Otherwise the discussion of the Director-General's Report is a series of disjointed monologues instead of being a lively and genuine exchange of opinion to the advantage of all the workers of the world.

Mr. NASR (Employers' delegate, Lebanon)—May I begin by expressing through you, Sir, to the Director-General, Mr. David Morse, my warmest congratulations for this concise yet comprehensive and clear report.

Of the different activities of the I.L.O., its programmes in the field of human resources ought to be given the highest priority. Among these programmes, those dealing with improving the quality of the labour force and the development of social institutions should in my opinion, receive top priority.

In carrying out its programmes of improving the quality of the labour force, the I.L.O. disposes of two unique bodies—the International Institute for Labour Studies and the International Institute for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training at Turin. Efforts therefore should go to strengthen these two I.L.O. organs and to make the fullest possible use of their programmes and facilities.

These two bodies can and should become, along with I.L.O. Headquarters in Geneva, an international brain centre, where standard programmes are drawn up and applied for vocational guidance, vocational training, management development and the promotion of small industries.

These programmes may include such things as standard up-to-date methods as well as manuals, teaching materials and typical courses that take into account the material, moral and mental conditions of the students and trainees and the peculiarities of the national, political, economic and social conditions under which these activities are promoted.

For the development of social institutions we need, besides the international brain centre, an expert presence at the local level which can apply a basically sound programme with care and understanding.
This expert presence of the I.L.O. can be provided by its regional and subregional offices. The more we have of them, the better.

These offices may be entrusted with all the phases of the execution of I.L.O. programmes. But that should be only the simplest and apparent part of their job. The other part, and the most difficult part, is to make the I.L.O. ideals and objectives present, in living persons, in the different regions.

We in the Lebanon have been hearing and reading about I.L.O. programmes in the field of industrial relations and collective bargaining, but the impact in our country of a visit by an I.L.O. tripartite delegation was incomparably greater though they stayed only a fortnight.

I.L.O. resources are so small and the task of eliminating social evils so enormous that we shall be squandering our efforts to no avail if I.L.O. action is not directed towards the creation, in every country, of institutions, programmes and agencies that serve, because they implement the much-desired technical assistance programmes, because they are near the countries they serve, because they are manned mainly by people from the region and, above all, because they can give an impartial and learned opinion on social questions—for all these reasons they should become the most effective instruments for spreading I.L.O. ideals and objectives in all those parts of the world which are far away from Geneva in distance, outlook and social heritage. In addition, the first-hand information which they gather can serve the brain-centre of the I.L.O. and make it possible to formulate and plan its basic programmes with greater precision.

I am not in a position now to enumerate the various means by which the I.L.O. arms, as I call them, can penetrate the social strata of every benefiting country, but I submit that all methods should be tried. Chiefly, however, I would suggest personal contacts through regular visits to government, employers' and workers' circles. Seminars at the level of industry might be another useful method, or seminars to discuss a selected subject—such as collective bargaining, methods of vocational training, pension schemes, management problems in the small undertaking, etc. By bringing together government officials and employers' and workers' representatives, the meetings sponsored by I.L.O. officials will serve to inform the participants concerning the problems which are the subject of discussion. They will serve to train them in the methods of attacking such problems and, in the meantime, will create a stir in the whole community about the issues concerned.

In conclusion, I should like to assure those of our friends who have been showing some anxiety about the future of the I.L.O. and its universal character that the I.L.O. will become stronger and its universality will be more completely ensured if its work becomes more effective and its programmes are established in accordance with the priorities of need. And if, quantitatively speaking, the poorer countries benefit relatively more from I.L.O. activities, qualitatively speaking, the richer countries benefit enough.

I had intended to end my speech here but I should like to add a few words. In all the history I have studied never has human society been able to achieve unity in any form whatsoever; the prophets failed, the social theorists failed, the generals failed, the politicians failed. I think we have to accept the fact that there are divisions and differences and that we should work together so that these differences may just be an incentive for us to compete and rival one another in the promotion of social justice, the promotion of the development of human society, and try to minimise the chances of those rifts which are increasing everywhere, becoming one day, unfortunately, a nuclear rift into which this poor planet of ours disappears altogether.

I listened with enthusiasm yesterday to the plea made by my dear friend Mr. Wagner. Like him, I thank God for the opportunities He has given me which have enabled me to reach the point where I can speak to this august body. I humbly submit that we should all think of our children so that they may be given a chance to grow up as we have.

I am flattered and honoured that I have been able to speak to this assembly while you, Sir, occupy the Chair and preside so efficiently and with so much dignity and justice over our work.
crime against humanity and a flagrant violation of the fundamental principles which are the basis of the Constitution of the I.L.O., the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Charter of the United Nations. Notwithstanding the discussion on this most important subject at the 1963 Session of the Conference which culminated in the Declaration adopted by the 48th Session, the Government of the Republic of South Africa not only maintains complete independence with regard to that Declaration but openly defies world public opinion by continuing brutally to increase its crimes, and has in fact adopted new legislation and administrative measures to strengthen and maintain the practice of

Last year when we voted in the plenary the Declaration on the policy of apartheid of the Republic of South Africa we said in the name of the Cuban Workers' Union that the I.L.O. must adopt a more energetic attitude and should call on States Members to apply the provisions of resolution No. 1761 of the General Assembly of the United Nations. A year has passed and when we look at the Special Report of the Director-General on the policy of
in South Africa we see with indignation that the situation has become even worse. Therefore we reiterate our plea that the I.L.O. can and must act in accordance with the United Nations resolutions to which I have just referred.

As regards the programme and structure of the Organisation, we have been talking about the necessity for adapting these to a changing world for three years now, but so far no such measures have in fact been put into practice. The Governing Body must be transformed into a fully representative body, as proposed to the Conference in the resolution submitted by Mr. Chajn and Mr. Polyanchikho, the Government delegates of Poland and the Ukraine respectively.

If we analyse the present composition of the Governing Body we see that there is not a single representative of the World Federation of Trade Unions, which groups more than 120 million workers in all the geographical regions of the world. The Governing Body has privileged representation for the unions affiliated to a single organisation; also, no proportional representation is given to the trade unions of Latin America, Africa and Asia, so as to provide equitable participation for all the geographical regions of the world.

For that reason, we feel that measures must be taken straight away so that when a new Governing Body is elected next year this abnormal situation may be corrected. With respect to the agenda of this session of the Conference, we note with satisfaction the inclusion of agrarian reform as the sixth item. This is a subject which we consider of outstanding importance, since the Cuban workers have rich and recent experience in regard to this most important aspect of economic and social development in underdeveloped countries. Cuba has carried out its radical and far-reaching agrarian reform and has eliminated illiteracy. The peasant masses have been freed for ever from the landlords, from the position of being share-croppers or tenant farmers and from the unfair bargains in which the lion's share always went to the landowners and which were typical of the feudal relations that exist in agriculture in many Latin American countries. At present there is no foreign monopoly operating in Cuba or holding a single inch of our land.

The Agrarian Reform Act signed in Sierra Maestra on 17 May 1959 made a radical transformation in Cuban agriculture. Its point of departure was the liquidation of the latifundia in the hands of the Yankee imperialists and South American imperialists—the latter possessed 25 per cent. of the best land in the country. The Act's social objectives were just: it provided, on the one hand, for the State to take over all land which was not directly cultivated by farmers; and, on the other hand it granted the status of ownership to all small and medium-scale farmers who had been working land without being the owners of it. Agrarian reform also had an economic objective—to create the domestic market required for industry—by raising the standard of living of the people in the rural areas.

Six years after the adoption of this energetic measure, the workers of Cuba can show with pride the following result: the total disappearance of unemployment, which previously affected 600,000 persons, as well as of the under-employment which, during the dead season, was the curse of the countryside of Cuba. Indeed, the shortage of manpower is now so great in our rural area that this year more than 50,000 urban volunteer workers have helped to harvest the sugar cane crop, the production of which has reached 6,040,000 tons of sugar and represents an unquestionable success for our people and at the same time a mortal blow to the Yankee imperialists and their lackeys who prophesied disaster for our socialist economy. With respect to illiteracy, Cuban agrarian reform has made it possible to develop simultaneously in the country and the cities, a national mass literacy campaign which is without precedent in the whole Latin American Continent and which has defeated in their most secure strongholds the forces of ignorance and weeded out the roots of backwardness and poverty. Thousands of classrooms have been built throughout the length and breadth of our island. More than 100,000 scholarships at all levels of instruction have been granted by the Revolutionary Government to the children of peasants and workers for their education and training in all fields of activity, in accordance with the economic plans of our country. Medical services and medicine are provided free of charge in the most isolated zones of the countryside. Thousands of houses are being built by workers with corresponding services and the agricultural workers now have full social security protection against the risk of sickness, disability, old age and death on a footing of equality with other workers in industry, commerce and the public services; maternity insurance is also provided for the wives of workers.

In our country women have achieved complete emancipation, and they now have free access to employment in industry and agriculture. There are 27,000 women teachers. But this is very important: in accordance with the sixth item on our agenda we must ensure that the type of agrarian reform we endorse at this Conference is such that its practical application will not leave untouched the base of latifundismo. We ask: To whom must the land belong? Who should have the right of the land? The latifundia holders and foreign companies which exploited the best lands of our continent? The landholders? The exploitors and parasites? To all these questions we answer no, a thousand times no.
The land must belong to the man who works it, and it is on this principle that we have devolved agrarian reform in our country. Now to accomplish everything that I have just mentioned has not been an easy task. As is well known to the delegates, Cuba has had to face on innumerable occasions all types of aggression, from the violation of our air space and our territorial waters to infiltration of C.I.A. agents, who on more than one occasion have carried out acts of sabotage against the Cuban economy and horrifying crimes against our working and peasant masses. There have been armed invasions of the national territory such as the one repulsed at the Bay of Pigs in 1961, which was the first great defeat of Yankee imperialism in America. We have also had to face up to a policy of isolation and to a criminal and illegal economic blockade which it was attempted to impose on our country in order to destroy our social revolution. We have shown in the development and broadening of our international trade, not only for this reason I should like to answer the delegate to come to his other points.

I ask, how is it possible to devote ourselves to the development of human resources, as the Director-General requests in his Report, when there is a Government which assumes the right of dictating standards of living to all other countries? Cuba has developed human resources because our people with their courage and spirit of sacrifice have overcome and will continue to overcome all these obstacles, as has been shown in the development and broadening of our international trade, not only with socialist countries but with almost all the countries of Western Europe and other areas of the world, such as the United Kingdom, France, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, Japan, Morocco, and other countries which would make an intermimable list if I detailed them.

We believe the development of human resources and labour relations, the promotion of the trade union movement and sound social institutions and standards of living and working conditions, to which the Director-General calls attention in his Report, are not possible as long as there are aggressions and assasinations, and trade unions are dissolved by military juntas promoted, supported and directed by Yankee imperialism, as occurred recently in Bolivia.

It is strange that at this Conference no one so far has denounced the critical situation of the Bolivian workers, whose leaders are expelled en masse from the country, and whose workplaces and mines are machine-gunned and bombed by military aviation. At present in this sister Republic there is no vestige left of trade union organisation. We take this opportunity in the name of the Cuban Workers' Union to pay tribute to the heroic fighting trade union movement of Bolivia, to whom we send a message of solidarity, and we urge this Conference to condemn the authors of these monstrous acts.

How is it possible to develop human resources and sound social institutions when we are faced with aggression such as we see in the Congo, and in the criminal bombing of North Viet-Nam, and military intervention in South Viet-Nam? Can you improve the social conditions of life, as the Director-General asks in his Report, at a time when a sister republic of the Caribbean . . .

The PRESIDENT—The honourable delegate has used the word "criminal" in one place, and I had appealed to the delegates not to use unparliamentary language. The second point I would like to bring to his notice is that I have said reference should not be made to theatres of war. South Viet-Nam is a theatre of war. I would therefore ask the delegate to come to his other points.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CARBO-NEIL HERRUTINER—I can understand the concern of the President with regard to peace, but you all understand how difficult it is for me to talk about activities directed towards peace, as the Cuban workers desire, if I do not refer to the guilty parties who provoke war.

How can we do what the Director-General asks in his Report at a time when a sister republic of the Caribbean has to watch in anguish the assassination of more than 2,000 workers in the industrial zone of its capital by foreign troops, the destruction of its institutions, and see an attempt being made to impose governors who are unanimously rejected by the people. It is in order to defend and to struggle for peace that we fulfil our duty of denouncing the aggressors of the Dominican people and condemn the author of all this vandalism, which is none other than the imperialist Government of the United States.

Mr. President, in accordance with the standards laid down, I have 15 minutes given to me for comment on the Director-General's Report. I think I still have a minute left, and only for this reason I should like to answer something said by the representative of the workers of British Guiana. It is a pity he does not give all his energy to working towards the independence of his country, which the Cuban workers have always favoured. I think the millions of dollars which he himself said have been received from the United States reflect his attitude towards our revolution.

The President—We now resume our discussion of the Report of the Director-General.

Mr. KOÇATOPÇU (Employers’ delegate, Turkey)—Although delayed, it being the last day of the debate on the Director-General’s Report, it still gives me great pleasure to convey to you, Mr. President, warmest congratulations, on behalf of the Turkish employers, on your election to this high office and mostly on the magnificent way in which you have carried out this great task. I also take this opportunity to welcome the delegates of Malawi, Malta, Yemen and Zambia.

We are in a period of dynamic change and swift evolution towards an industrial society. In this process of evolution the standard structure of an undeveloped society, in which 80 per cent. of the working force is living by agriculture, 10 per cent. is in industry and the remainder in other services, is changing towards the structure of an industrial society, with only 10 per cent. of the working force in agriculture, another 10 per cent. in industry and the remaining 80 per cent. in various services, including research.

A global picture for all the developing world is too much of an abstraction. It is necessary to enter more fully into a regional, sub-regional and even into an individual country approach in order to be able to present a very clear picture of the diversity of the situations facing developing countries. Various regions or nations are at a different stage of evolution towards an industrial society. Certain parts of the world are developing faster than others.

In the industrialised countries economic growth has provided greater prosperity for growing populations. It is impossible to slow down this dynamic pace of evolution. As for the other parts of the world, society is suffering from the handicap of greater problems to overcome and lack of sufficient momentum in its race towards a more prosperous society. Yet a changing attitude, aimed at a transition from an underdeveloped or stagnant economy to a phase in which economic growth begins to take place, is observed all around the world. Significant political, social and economic changes are taking place. These may be characterised as being a search for freedom for mankind and better living conditions.

Many nations have obtained or defended their independence during the last decades. Freedom and independence become dearest assets and very closely linked to each other. While the world is faced with the contrast of industrialised and underdeveloped regions, the developing countries are faced with the desire for and objective of speedy development in freedom and independence.

Representing the employers of one of the developing countries on the march along the hard road towards economic and social development in freedom, I would like to take the liberty of analysing our contrasting dilemmas and comparing the responsibilities of both parts of the free world, so distinctly separated today.

We are primarily concerned with full employment, not only for the huge number of existing unemployed people, but also for the newcomers to our society through the increase in population, which is greater than that in other parts of the world. This full employment is desired, together with higher productivity, in order to obtain a higher per head income. This great task requires a large part of the national income to be saved in order to secure not only new investments for the provision of new jobs, but also for the education and training of human resources not to mention research.

Another feature is that, despite insufficient savings in the country, either privately or through the state budget, there is a general attitude of reserve towards foreign investments and participation. In this transitory period of speedy economic evolution, it is of the utmost importance to utilise all possible sources of investment, know-how and education, whether they come from the private sector, from state savings or from foreign participation.

Furthermore, along with the freedom of mankind which is so dear to all of us, certain developing countries attempt to set up more rigid economic and political structures in the hope of speeding up economic and social development. It is a fact that dynamic change requires voluntary and mature sacrifices from free individuals and from the various groups of society. The post-war examples of such voluntary sacrifices and self-discipline which engendered miracles in various European countries are very inspiring. But when such sacrifices are required in a rigid political structure, without any choice but to obey, the conflict with freedom of mankind becomes apparent.

Another characteristic feature of the differences between the industrialised and the developing regions of the world is that while, for example, European nations are trying to unite themselves in larger communities, there is still a continuous dissemination of developing areas on the part of newly emerging nations. This could be attributed to the search for freedom and independence in the developing areas, while the industrialised nations are already aware that freedom can only be retained by carrying more responsibilities and that independence can be better ensured through interdependence.

During this session of the Conference, representatives of governments, employers and workers of many developing countries have bitterly criticised most of the industrial nations as being imperialists, colonialists, exploiters and so on. And yet there have been a desire to achieve the same industrial society. They have even urged that those industrially advanced countries should assist the developing areas to attain world-wide social peace. Is not this another contrast which is mainly due to the happenings of the past and the feelings of separation between the two areas? Yet the prospect of the realisation of world-wide social peace and prosperity urges and challenges all of us to share our resources, to respect each other, to defend our freedom by undertaking further responsibility, to ensure our independence through interdependence, co-operation and mutual confidence and, finally, to accept the voluntary sacrifice of our own individual direct interests by giving gradually higher priorities to the interests of our communities, our associations, our country, our region and, above all, of the world. The value to be given to these priorities by the leaders of workers and employers in order to create and maintain a free society is self-evident.

The leaders of the industrialised societies cannot, on the other hand, afford to forget that many countries look to them for guidance. The examples they set and the things they teach will influence the future of large numbers of people. In the techniques of management that they are developing, which will inevitably be followed by many growing economies, the challenge is to ensure that industry, like any other activity, becomes an instrument for the social good. The emphasis on profit is wholly right, and efficiency is the only way to get it. These two objectives of profit and efficiency should be harmonised with social well-being.

The developing countries, when beginning to industrialise, will have to start mainly with labour-intensive light industries. By definition they are low-wage countries. Their productivity is low. Here is the challenge for the industrialised countries to accept willingly the competition of these new producers and to assist them in their development, in individual freedom. One thing is certain: as prospects for the industrialised trade will increase in all sorts of goods and will provide one of the most effective uniting forces between the two parts of the free world.

In this concept of speedy development, together with the freedom of the individual, our great task is to explore human resources. I was very pleased to notice in the Director-General's Report that a great variety of activity and elaborate services are suggested for the use of the developing countries. These services may be different in nature, according to the type, importance and urgency and of the need they have to meet.

I should like to stress at this point the prime importance to be given to the education and formation of intellectual elites, entrepreneurial and managerial resources.

A dynamic change in economic conditions and in human resources, despite the complex problems of full employment, increased productivity, higher per head income and lack of sufficient investment potential, will greatly depend upon the responsibility of managers towards industrial society. The managers must carry the important responsibility of balancing the interests of employers, workers, consumers and the State. Their training, along with the urge for dynamic change, integrity and a sincere belief in creating mutual confidence within this environment, must thus have its deserved place in the activities of the I.L.O.

In conclusion, it could be stressed that the technological and scientific development of industrial society is widening the gap between the two parts of the world. Whilst the moon is being explored, today the great majority of the inhabitants of this world still have not enough food to eat, not enough clothes to wear, and not enough freedom in which to breathe. This picture characterises a world of contrast. These hard facts are setting the greatest challenge to the leaders of both developing and industrialised countries. These leaders include leaders in politics, of employers, of workers and managers; in other words, this is a challenge to all of us. Are we ready for it?

Interpretation from French: Mr. BOULAOUX (Workers' delegate, France)—I should like first of all to thank the Director-General for his mastery contribution to the formulation and application of I.L.O. programmes. I am in entire agreement with the priorities he suggests but would like to stress one essential point—the importance of restating the basic principles to which all I.L.O. activity must have regard.

In previous Reports the Director-General has often recalled these principles and drawn our attention to a risk that we run: their neglect would lead the Organisation to consider efficiency as an end in itself, modestly concealing the means used when these depart from the principles defined in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

It must therefore be clear to all that the principles on which the I.L.O. was founded are not out of date and that no pretext of more rapid economic expansion leading to social progress can be used to give priority to technology, finance or economic machinery if these were such as to restrict liberty and deny the dignity of man.

Of course, without efficient means any theoretical demand for social progress is sentimental and naïve, more like a tranquilliser than an effective lasting remedy for an evil which is incredible at a time when science is taming natural forces and starting the conquest of space and the stars. The temptation to stop short and to relieve our present difficulties by distributing fairly and without discrimination. The evil to which I refer is social injustice, which condemns millions of people to physical and moral misery or oppression. A natural sense of personal and collective responsibility for the most unfortunate men and peoples should not lead us to forget, in our desire to go fast and far, that all means are not acceptable and that if we abolish certain national, class or racial privileges it should not be in order to transfer them to others but so that all natural, material and moral goods may be distributed fairly and without discrimination.

It is easy to understand the temptation of States facing the hard economic and financial pressures involved in the full achievement of their independence. They are tempted, in the search for efficiency, to suspend—in the hope that it will be for a time only—certain rights, particularly those deriving from the I.L.O. Conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining. Step by step we see States setting up, or trying to set up, by constitution, law or regulation a unified trade union movement in the first stage, and, in the second, eliminating the representative organisations and even persecuting and imprisoning the leaders whose only crime is to have believed in the value of international Conventions ratified by their countries and in protection from the I.L.O.

All this is to convey my disquiet at hearing the accredited representatives of some governments calling for the revision of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. I do not mean to ignore the difficulties which these countries have to face, but I believe that the Director-General will assure us that there must be no question of allowing the foundations on which the I.L.O. was built to be shaken. Trade union unity is no doubt desirable but it can only be achieved by the workers themselves, not by their governments. The whole I.L.O. should rise to defend that essential right of the working class—the right of association. It should be possible to preserve trade union freedom by making fuller use of the work performed and the opportunities offered by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. This Committee, stimulated by the Workers' group and its active leader, my friend Mr. Cool, is really effective, as witness the ratification by Japan and Chile of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. No doubt joint international trade union action has been useful, but this success is certainly due to the perseverance of our Committee. Would it not be possible, in the future, to instruct a tripartite delegation of this Committee to undertake certain missions of investigation on the main Conventions, particularly those relating to freedom of association. I think that this method would usefully supplement the work of the experts, to whom, of course, I must pay a tribute.

Our desire to preserve the universal character of the I.L.O. regarding trade union matters, also requires us to struggle with perseverance to eliminate such situations. However, as long as a certain conception of trade union freedom, different from our own, still exists, our concern for the satisfactory operation of the I.L.O. must induce us to seek practical formulas for co-operation without denying any principle. The solution no doubt lies in serious reflection on what tripartism means.

I should like here to remove any misunderstanding: there is no question of infringing tripartism, however slightly, for this is just as essential to the I.L.O. as universality. The trade union movement has given its enthusiastic support to the Organisation for this essential reason. But is it not possible to contemplate some kind of arrangement within the framework of tripartism without affecting the independence of the three groups? I am thinking in particular of subdividing the Employers' group having regard to the structural differences within certain groups of States.

I think it is easy to formulate a programme and not impossible to set up, even if only provisionally, structures acceptable to each party so that each party would feel that it is taking a full part in the common work. However, I think the most difficult and urgent thing is to find ways and means of proceeding on these lines.

One essential function of the I.L.O. has always been its standard-setting activities. But it requires adaptation. In the first place there is the situation of the developing countries, most of which have joined the I.L.O. in recent years. In the second place rapid technical advance has raised problems in industrial and in developing countries, but this does not mean that in all cases the solution must be the same. There are also particular problems to be taken into consideration, such as those affecting non-manual workers, public servants and women workers. The tendency towards economic integration of groups of countries, such as the Common Market in Europe, also raises a new type of problem.

Several possibilities arise in the situation I have briefly analysed. First of all, there is the systematic revision of the Conventions, which seems the simplest operation and which the Governing Body has outlined. However, it cannot solve the whole problem because, although it enables instruments to be cleaned up, it preserves their original vices. I think it is an illusion to believe that one can now adopt Conventions suited for application in all States Members—for all sorts of reasons relating to their political régimes, their economic and social structures, their degree of industrialisation and their traditions and their particular needs. I would therefore suggest a regionalisation of the standard-setting activity of the Organisation.

This idea has been supported at several of our regional conferences, and this year it has been advocated in the General Conference, particularly by Mr. Grandval, the Minister of Labour of my country. But it has not yet been effectively supported, particularly by the Governing Body. The principal criticism is that it will unduly affect the principle of universality and the necessary solidarity between nations. It is also claimed that there are almost as many differences within each geographical region as at the world level.

It is to reply to the above objections, which I do not think are well founded, that I would make the following suggestion. The General Conference should first of all formulate model Conventions of world scope, which would on each subject first determine the points on which there should be legislation, then lay down a few essential principles which would in any case have to be respected, and some basic standards to which there could be no exception, and also provide for a procedure for supervision.

These model Conventions would then be submitted to the regional conferences which would be expected, on the basis provided by the General Conference, to formulate particular Conventions adjusted to the special conditions and needs of the particular region. I would add that the very idea of a region should be re-examined. Although the I.L.O. should not doubt maintain permanent machinery for each of the continents, the regional conferences would not necessarily correspond to the whole I.L.O. membership in the continent concerned. The regions should be conceived rather as groups of States with comparable structures or political, economic and social situations.

To meet another difficulty which may arise with regard to the impossibility of applying certain provisions to a given economic or occupational sector, it should be possible for the Industrial Committees to propose to the Conference, on different points, appendices to the Conventions. Here again a multiplication of committees would be necessary so that groups of States would be able to study jointly the problems which concerned them having regard to their structure or the degree of development in the sector concerned.

In any case, in order to safeguard the authority of the Conference and to ensure that the regionalisation of standard-setting activities would not hold up progress or create any anarchy, it would be necessary to study a procedure enabling the Governing Body to submit to the Conference in an appropriate form the texts of Conventions and appendices, etc. adopted by regional conferences or Industrial Committees for examination by the Conference, which would give them legal value by adding them to the existing model Conventions.

If no reform is made regarding the regionalisation of standard-setting activities, it is evident that co-operative activities will suffer. On the other hand, as we hope, standard-setting activities can be intensified on a reformed basis, these would inspire other activities which are subsidiary, such as helping States to apply the Conventions. In any case, this co-operative work must be conceived in a certain spirit.

The projects regarding co-operation must pass through the governments. However, they should not be decided without the consent of, or at least without consultation with, employers' and workers' organisations.

Furthermore, closer co-ordination should be provided for with the United Nations and its various specialised agencies in order to avoid overlapping and to give projects a greater scope.

However, the tripartite character of the I.L.O. requires the experts to be chosen in the three constituent groups in equal numbers. The argument that a choice should be made only on the basis of competence is only an excuse. In the three groups there are persons able to act as experts in an efficient manner.

Lastly, no scheme should be undertaken with a State which does not ratify and does not respect the main Conventions, that is those relating to human rights. I make these reflections in a constructive spirit, brutally perhaps but with conviction, because the organisation to which I belong, the French Democratic Confederation of Labour, is attached to the I.L.O. and desires that the Organisation should be better able to perform its indispensable task.

'Mr. AMPAH (Workers' adviser, Ghana)—I wish first of all to congratulate you, Sir, on your election to the high office of President of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference, on behalf of the working people of Ghana whom I have the great honour of representing here.

The Conferences of the I.L.O. each year have not only afforded us the opportunity of reviewing the work of this very vital organ of social justice in the world today, but have also served as a stimulus to further action in our determined struggle to eliminate ignorance, squalor, disease and poverty, in order to make this turbulent world of ours a better place for all of us and to use the accumulated knowledge of science and technology to the benefit of mankind.

It was with considerable interest that the Ghana Trades Union Congress received the Director-General's Report in order to analyse and appraise its contents. The whole tenor of the Report, connected with human resources and economic development, is indicative of the growing realisation by the I.L.O. that we have rationally to plan our way ahead. Undoubtedly, in this process, we have to create higher levels of productive employment and improve the quality of our labour force, and at the same time develop various social institutions, which, from our trade union point of view, will, amongst other things, secure satisfactory relations with the Government and employers for our workers.

But whilst various development plans are instituted, we have to ensure that intensification of exploitation of our workers, of our mineral and agricultural resources, which is the interests of the imperialist Powers, does not take place. It is precisely against those countries which attempt to prevent the intensification of exploitation of the African people and thereby ensure their economic emancipation that attacks are continuously directed, and attempts are made to undermine them.

Undoubtedly, since the beginning of the African revolution, the I.L.O. has been made more aware of Africa and has had to take her people into serious consideration. In one respect, for example, greater awareness is reflected in the increasing expenditure on technical co-operation programmes, and it is hoped that the attention being paid to Africa in this respect and in others will not wane but grow. Much more could be done for the developing nations.

If the huge sums of money spent by the developed nations on armaments were to be given instead as aid—without strings attached, of course—to the developing countries, many of our problems would be alleviated. Witness, for example, the utter waste poured out in the form of bombs, etc. in the Viet-Nam war in order to crush people who are struggling to set up their Government in order to solve their problems in their own way.

Africa has many difficulties and problems to overcome, and many of these are implicit in the Director-General's Report. These difficulties and problems are principally not of our own making but are the result of the brutal carve-up by the capitalist Powers of our continent, the subjugation of our people, the indignity heaped upon the African, the outright theft of much of our land, the exploitation of our mineral and agricultural resources and the utilisation of cheap African labour. Those of us who have won independence are now faced with the formidable task of breaking away from the colonial economy by rapidly developing our resources and laying the foundations of an industrialised economy. This will ensure better living conditions for our people and thereby overcome the despicable conditions bequeathed upon us by the imperialist Powers.

As representatives of the workers, we are very conscious of the fact that the working and living conditions of our workers should not be neglected. Far from it; we want to see their continued improvement. But this is a difficult task when our economies are so closely interwoven with the Western world and are geared to production for export of one or two raw materials. To ensure satisfactory living and working conditions it is necessary to overcome the control of our economy by the imperialist Powers, and rapidly move away from a state of mono-culture, and to stop the drain of our wealth out of Africa. In simple terms, we have to get away from being mere hewers of wood and drawers of water.

There is no doubt that the solution to the whole problem of Africa is the establishment of an effective all-African government. This will ensure isolation and defeat of the neo-colonialists. It is precisely because the imperialists recognise African unity as their greatest danger that they are doing everything in their power to prevent it and ensure the continued existence of a balkanised Africa.

African unity is the way to ensure rapid African economic development and an all-round improvement in the living conditions of the African people.

African unity is one of the pre-conditions for the defeat of the imperialist forces in the Congo and the liberation of Africans still suffering under colonial rule. It will be an important factor in our struggle against the fascist Government of the Union of South Africa and its apartheid policy being put where it justly belongs—on the rubbish dump of history.

Fortunately for us workers in Ghana, our Government is a progressive and popular one, and is fully alive to the dangers facing us and Africa. It has taken up the cudgels against the imperialist Powers: hence the vilification and decrying of my country in some sections of the Western press. A country such as mine, because of the stand it has irrevocably taken, expects misrepresentation of facts in order to mislead the unwary. In spite of all our difficulties we have built in Ghana, under the able leadership of Osagyefo Dr. Kwame Nkrumah, a one-party State with socialism as the objective and dedicated to African unity. A seven-year development plan has been launched, which will lay the foundations of our industrialised State. We have paid particular attention to the development of our human resources—for example there is free education from primary school to university, there is a nation-wide workers' educational system, and vocational training schools have been established. We fully realise that we cannot effectively develop our economic resources without, at the same time, developing our human resources.

In the Statute Book there is an Act which satisfactorily governs industrial relations, whilst recently our Parliament adopted a Social Security Act which ensures social security for our workers.

The organisation which I represent regards the changes that have been wrought in the I.L.O.'s administrative machinery in order to reflect the changes that have taken place in the world as of some significance and we will carefully scrutinise their operation to see if they work satisfactorily. The decentralisation that has already been effected to meet the requirements of the three regions may well augur a new era in the history of the I.L.O. but, of course, the proof of the pudding is in the eating! One hopes that this decentralisation will make the I.L.O. more efficient in the sense that the views of the regions will be taken more into account and their problems will be more closely felt.

It is the opinion of my organisation that the work of the I.L.O. in Africa, and the work of Headquarters for that matter, would benefit from the I.L.O.'s co-operating fully with the All-African Trade Union Federation (A.A.T.U.F.). At the second African Regional Conference held in Addis Ababa towards the end of last year, the only organisation that truly represents the African worker, A.A.T.U.F., in spite of the pressure exerted upon the I.L.O., was only able to obtain more regional consultative status. We regard this as grossly insulting to the African trade union movement and this situation should be rectified. As I stated at that Conference: "The All-African Trade Union Federation represents the only effective and popular voice of the masses of the working people of Africa. It is the spokesman for African labour and it should be given its rightful position as the representative body of the trade union movement. It cannot have a substitute. It cannot co-exist with the Internationalist sponsored organisations which only serve to undermine the wishes and aspirations of the African workers... failure to recognise this position is to neglect the most important trade union body in Africa. It is wise to recognise it now rather than to do so later under pressure. from its supporters all over Africa." A.A.T.U.F. must receive the recognition from the I.L.O. that it rightly deserves. It must be given Category "A" consultative status.

Further, on the point of decentralisation, the establishment of a Field Department may very well prove to be a useful step and careful attention will be paid to the contribution it makes in Africa. This applies equally to the step taken to head the regional branches by a regional co-ordinator who will spend a substantial portion of his time in his region at the scene of operations. One hopes this will assist in creating a better understanding by the I.L.O. of Africa's situation and enable it to feel constantly and correctly the throbbing, vibrant pulse of the African revolution. The extent to which Africans are recruited to the regional branches will certainly be watched closely by my organisation and, I am sure, by trade unions in other African countries.

I have, in my address, touched briefly upon many important questions concerning Africa, but I must state quite categorically that, in general, we are dissatisfied with the I.L.O. It is true that decentralisation has occurred and we were entitled to hope it would be in practice during the next few years, but this is no palliative for overcoming or diverting our attention from the basic issues facing the I.L.O. today.

In spite of the fact that the I.L.O. has been in existence for 46 years, there is still discrimination in its machinery and this should be overcome.

The I.L.O. should, and necessarily must, be reformed so that it satisfactorily reflects the world of today.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. FUGARDO SANZ (Workers' delegate, Spain)—I have the honour once more to appear at the International Labour Conference, and first of all I should like to ask you, Mr. President, to accept my congratulations on having been elected to direct our proceedings.

I congratulate the Director-General on the Report which he has submitted to us, which I consider worthy of praise because of the manner in which it handles the great social problems of our time and the wisdom with which it determines the attitude of the I.L.O. regarding its organisation, objectives and means of action.

The objective spirit of the Report is particularly clear when it deals in a realistic manner with social questions and their possible solutions. This objectively may be summarised in the phrase applied by the Report to a particular I.L.O. activity, when it indicates that the I.L.O. has to be not a judge but a guide. Those words, high-minded and prudent, at the same time deserve to be the slogan of the I.L.O., for they reflect an approach which, unfortunately, is not that of certain sectors represented at the Conference. The idea that the I.L.O. has to be the lighthouse which lights the way to social justice, the basis of peace among men, contrasts with the conduct of some in the Conference who think that the I.L.O. is a judge to apply to us a code of trade union organisation which they have invented.

And then there are others who would convert the I.L.O. into a policing apparatus to give effect to their lying designs. Some serve doctrinaire immobile trade unionism anchored to its old forms and ignore many of the new things which have happened in the past 25 years; others, cunning strategists, faithful to certain social and political principles, try to forge alliances when discussing trade union matters in our country, of which they have no real knowledge.

All are guilty of ignorance regarding the situation of other countries, young or old, south or east, where there is no trade union diversity. However much it may hurt the feelings of some people there is no doubt that trade union diversity weakens the power of the unions to defend the working class. Let me remind you on this occasion that the representation of a great Power in the Governing Body, in a letter to the Director-General dated 25 February 1958 which has been published in the Official Bulletin of the I.L.O., states that the establishment of rival organisations weakens the workers' movement.

I know what has been said in this hall and repeated in the Governing Body—namely that trade union unity is an ideal objective for the working class but must be reached voluntarily and not by legislative imperative.

I am not a lawyer; I am only a worker who has been sent to the Conference with thousands of votes from the Spanish workers and with the support also of the Congress of my country, but I ask you all, is a law which has the general support of the working class and reflects a permanent ideal to be condemned because of some more or less theoretical prejudice?

If this were a general judgment it would be wrong because it would lack any logical basis. But if one bears in mind that it is pronounced against only one country, we must resent and reject it absolutely. Some of the delegates seem to lack the power of reflection which would reveal to them the decadence of trade union plurality and the general recognition of that phenomenon. Instead all they do is, as usual, to attack the representatives of the Spanish workers who have honoured me by sending me here.

One previous speaker, giving rein to his political fanaticism and falling in the mutual respect which those attending international meetings owe one another, has insulted and calumniated us in the coarsest language. His insults have hurt as much as words can, but do not affect the system he is trying to attack; the insult is to impute to us the cowardice and servility which would induce us meekly to endure the oppression and criminal acts he alleges, but which exist only in the minds of those who wish for reasons of propaganda to circulate disgusting lies in order to conceal the criminal conditions in which they themselves live. Remember that truth and justice always go together, that injustice gives birth to more injustice and that if you hypocritically close your eyes to the gradual disappearance of trade union diversity, a phenomenon now occurring in many States Members of the I.L.O., while declaring it hateful only when it occurs in my country, you are prejudicing the future of the I.L.O. and converting yourselves into a machine oppressing the free will of the peoples.
Such arbitrary action will only serve to precipitate the crisis in the I.L.O. of which various symptoms have warned us; to these we would like to add the fact that the Conference is being converted into a desert of incomprehension in which we speak in vain, those of us who put first of all the task of improving the conditions of life and work of the proletarist in all countries and declare that the work of the I.L.O. will be damaged if it concentrates on political problems, which, if they exist, should be dealt with by other international agencies.

There is further evidence of the wisdom of the Report in its statement of the principle that the work of the I.L.O. must have regard to the great diversity of national situations. In this connection I should like to make a few observations on what is happening in my country in the field of social policy.

We are accused of having trade unions closely linked to the State. There is certainly a close connection, due to our direct and active participation in the legislative work of many public organs, the free election of very many trade union representatives to Parliament, provincial assemblies, local governments, social security institutions, economic and social development planning boards, banks, nationalised industries, etc.

It is said that our unions are influenced by the Government. Here again we can reply yes, and the unions also have an influence on the Government. We maintain with the relevant Ministries relations which are not always particularly good, so they may know and respect the actions and reactions of the people. Apart from this the co-operation between State and unions in my country extends mainly to particular definite aspects of social policy, where there is mutual assistance in creating employment, fighting unemployment, improving skills, enstraining the advancement of workers, providing accelerated and standard vocational training, improving social security, etc. In this way, thanks largely to the work of our unions, Spain occupies a leading place among European countries for its achievements regarding housing, vocational education, health facilities, etc. We are doing what others do not dare to do, engaging in a social revolution by and for the workers.

It is alleged that we are minority unions. I only need reply that the percentage of workers affiliated to the trade unions in many countries of Western Europe is very much exceeded by the number of our members. Hundreds of thousands of workers animate the life of our unions, either as rank-and-file or holding posts in an extensive network covering the whole territory and all activities, ranging from works committees to the governing bodies of the big national unions.

We have been accused also on the grounds of the political pressure which our trade union organisations have to suffer. I may say that in fact the trade unions of Spain are working in accordance with a political sense resulting from the fact that they have in their midst representatives of the new generation along with many old fighters of all tendencies of the Spanish trade union movement of the past, whose wounds have been healed during long years of social peace and tranquillity in their homes and in whom the flame of new dreams and hopes has been fanned into life on the ashes of a fatherland in ruins—a legacy of those who criticise us today.

We are accused of not appointing democratically the leaders of our trade union organisations. It may be true that the electoral methods which exist do not perhaps incorporate all the electoral tricks which are so current in other democratic organisations, such as voting by show of hands on surprise motions planned in advance, or voting on the basis of a single list of candidates prepared in advance by a political bureau foreign to the trade union movement.

These are some of the characteristics of our trade union movement, which of course has imperfections, as any human activity has, but which also has great hopes for the future.

We are quite unimpressed by the fact that our situation is looked down upon with contempt by our attackers, but it is paradoxical and particularly revealing that these verbal attacks are intensified today, at the moment when, thanks to our efforts, my country's policy is making noteworthy progress in fields so closely connected with the constitutional principles of the I.L.O. The constant increase in effective union representation, governing conditions of work, the abolition of legislation prohibiting the right to strike, and the constitution of councils composed of freely elected employers' and workers' representatives, which are true federations, are highlights of the representative labour system in Spain.

I beg your pardon and apologise if I have gone into too many details in giving this political panorama of the trade union situation in my country.

Now I should like to turn my attention to another equally important question and urge the I.L.O. to give priority consideration to one of the the most important social questions of our time, that of hours of work. Today when the world is so far advanced technically, when there is so much talk of automation, it is an anachronism that a worker should have to work a 40-hour week or more, and it must be overcome. No one is better placed than the I.L.O. to establish the necessary standards which would show the way to meeting the very human and justifiable claims of the workers in this connection. The lack of the necessary quorum when we discussed the question last year was a lamentable experience on which we should reflect and try to find some way of achieving this aim.

Another matter engaging our attention is the change in Spain which has occurred in the emigration of workers.

You all know that the traditional concept of emigration has changed, but perhaps you do not know that the treatment which a migrant worker receives in certain countries does not correspond to that afforded to national workers. In this connection I have the honour to announce that the problem will be considered shortly by the National Council of Workers in Spain, which will union all unions and by its reach to ensure that the I.L.O. analyses and solves this problem equitably and rapidly.

Finally, the respect and consideration inspired in me by the existence of the I.L.O., for whose proper operation we are all responsible, leads me to speak of article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference. The revision of this article is urgent because this year has shown that the maintenance of the present text will leave a loophole through which, at successive sessions of the Conference, attacks may be made against nations and against the unity of thought and action which should govern the work and aims of the Organisation itself. To keep the Standing Orders as they are will convert our Conference into a battlefield where attacks of all sorts fail to conform to the requirements of the world. The I.L.O. can give is the maintenance of its faith—good sense will continue. The best proof the I.L.O. can give is the maintenance of its faithfulness to the principle of universality of the Organisation which must survive all crises, as happened ten years ago in the case of the conflict in the heart of Europe which led to a clash of two great political systems which today are trying to coexist. For my part, when I look at the realities and the peace of my country, I am reminded of an old Spanish proverb: “The dogs bark—that shows we are on the road.”

Let the dogs bark, as far as I am concerned.

Interpretation from French: Mr. GHAYOUR (Employers’ delegate, Iran)—First of all, I should like to congratulate you, Sir, as a citizen of a country which is a close friend of Pakistan, on your election and on the impartial manner in which you preside over our discussions with such authority.

For more than three years now the I.L.O., on the initial impulse of the Employers’ members of the Governing Body, has been giving its attention to its own renovation. This was inevitable, for an Organisation which is world-wide in its extent, passing over national frontiers to bring progress and encouragement to development and to the economic and social advancement of countries, cannot remain static, shut up inside itself, and cannot fail to conform to the requirements of the world today.

For the last two years we have been discussing from this rostrum the objectives and the structure and methods which the I.L.O. must adopt in the future. I shall not repeat what I said in 1963 and 1964, because the two Reports of the Director-General give me relative satisfaction on the points which I have already put forward, and I would like to thank the Director-General for his attention. But since we are requested once again to submit our observations on the programme and structure of the I.L.O., I shall endeavour to make a sincere and fair contribution.

Before we speak of objectives, I think we must speak of basic principles. The I.L.O. is a universal institution, tripartite and specialised in social problems. The universality of the I.L.O. is a matter of fact; it exists, and sometimes in this field it even goes beyond the United Nations. The tripartism of the I.L.O., which is the specific characteristic of our Organisation, is not as real as we think it is. The I.L.O., because of its budget, depends exclusively on the governments. The representatives of employers and workers who attend the meetings of the I.L.O. are put forward by the governments, and their travelling and subsistence expenses are paid by their governments. The I.L.O. often does not even come into contact with the organisations of employers and workers except through the governments. Because of these facts, the preponderance of the governments within this tripartite Organisation is a reality we cannot deny. Moreover, in recent years, other problems, equally serious, have been added to those already facing us, and have given rise to difficulties which have taken up a great deal of time in the meetings, in discussions which led to no concrete results. All these difficulties give food for thought to those delegates truly interested in the work of the I.L.O. Is it possible to have a truly tripartite Organisation, or must we be satisfied with an apparently tripartite Organisation, or, again, must we openly transform it into a governmental organisation like the other specialised agencies of the United Nations? The first and the best-qualified person to consider this question of principle is the Director-General of the I.L.O.

The I.L.O. is a specialised agency for social questions. I can remember the days when a clear distinction was made between social and economic problems, whereas at present we cannot speak of social questions without at the same time, and perhaps even before, looking at these problems from their economic aspect. In any case, for the developing countries economic development is the basis for social progress, and you cannot do it otherwise.

Consequently, we have of necessity to study and find a solution to social and economic questions in a single context. At present there are other agencies of the United Nations dealing with economic problems which have relations with the I.L.O., but these relations, and all the operations of correlation and reciprocal representation and so on, as they exist at present, are not sufficient to give a guarantee that socioeconomic problems, will be studied and considered together in a positive way in the same context. Here I think it would be desirable for relations with the United Nations, particularly the agencies dealing with economic problems, to be revised, and that we consider procedures whereby the economic aspect of the problem will be studied before, or at the same time, as the social aspects.

Another point is that, in the matter of technical co-operation, the I.L.O. depends ten times more on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance of the United Nations and on the Special Fund than it does on its own budget. In the case of these two organs, the I.L.O. is considered as an agent for the execution of projects and is allocated 10 per cent. of the total amount of the credit together with responsibility for execution. The influence which can be exercised by the I.L.O. is insufficient in the stages which precede supervision and re-evaluation of the work after the project has been started.

During execution of the project the team of I.L.O. experts is at the orders of the resident representative of the Technical Assistance Board. In spite of the fact that the appointment of this person must be made with the consent of the I.L.O. and the I.L.O., according to a resolution adopted by the Conference, is required to assure itself of the competence and impartiality of the representatives, nevertheless the I.L.O. never had anything to say about these appointments.

Moreover, in all the procedures which must follow a project, the desirable degree of rapidity is lacking. This is very serious, and something must be done about the procedures which are at present in force.

I come now to the objectives of the I.L.O. Evolution is an instinct which is part of human nature. Development is one means of achieving evolution. In the post-war years economic development is considered as basic to all development. Moreover, it has taken on a much broader meaning than in the past. But economic development is not the end in itself. It is not the final goal. It must be considered as a means of reaching the noblest ends, which will mean a happier life and greater dignity for man.

In spite of this, we must bear in mind that the social objectives must follow economic objectives, and never take precedence over them. Resolution No. 984 of the Economic and Social Council asks the specialised agencies, in the planning of their work, to bear in mind the following points: the development of international trade as a primary instrument of development; industrial development, followed by the development of human resources, the development of agricultural production, and the development of natural resources.

On the basis of this resolution the I.L.O. has set itself the following objectives (a) the development of human resources by means of manpower planning and organisation, employment, training and retraining of supervisory classes, vocational training, vocational counselling, classification of occupations and occupational readaptation; (b) the development of social institutions concerned with labour law and administration, labour relations, participation of workers’ and employers’ organisations in planning political, social and economic developments; workers’ education; rural institutes and community development; agrarian reform and co-operatives; (c) the development of living and working conditions covering general conditions of work, hours of work, weekly rest, holidays, wages, protection of wages, working and living conditions of non-manual workers and rural workers, and so on; discrimination in the field of employment, occupational safety and hygiene, social security and welfare of the workers.

I observe that all these traditional activities of the I.L.O. are grouped in three big departments. There is only one thing I would like to say in connection with workers’ education—it would have been placed in the Resources Department rather than, as at present, in the Social Institutions Development Department.

These objectives are based on resolution No. 984 of the Economic and Social Council, this resolution being in turn based principally on the industrialisation and development of agricultural production, without which economic development would not be viable and social development, of course, would be impossible. Among the objectives which I referred to above, the development of human resources is of the greatest importance because we must appreciate that the gap existing between the developed countries and the developing countries is particularly great in this field.

It is quite correct to say that if all the machinery and equipment existing in the world were to disappear, if science and technique were to remain it would be quite easy to replace them, and it would not take long.

The I.L.O. has great perseverance in its long-standing tradition of international standard-setting. In this connection I should like to make a few comments. The written law, whether a national law or an international Convention, must be positive and creative. A law must grow out of existing needs, and it would be illogical to adopt a law or Convention for probable needs which we think we may have in the future. In a word, a law must be applicable today.

The frontiers of social laws and Labour Codes are not very well defined. In any case they are very fragile, and when we prepare Conventions on labour problems we must give great attention to the existing social situations in the various countries as well as to the differences in the economic régimes of the countries. Laws in general must lend stability and assurance to the factors influencing the development of the country. Labour laws and social laws must not create obstacles or slow down economic development.

The I.L.O., more than any other agency of the United Nations, has prepared international Conventions and Recommendations, and it requires all the member States, whether they are highly advanced or in the very first stages of development, to apply them in the same way. Now this is not possible. Apart from Conventions respecting certain basic principles such as human rights, forced labour and freedom of association and a few others, the rest will have to be revised, or else the whole process of procedure of ratification will have to be made easier and more flexible.

Delegates meeting in this beautiful Palace on the shores of Lake Geneva must know that in the world there are people who prefer to have a key to a storehouse with a little bit more food in it than the backbone of the I.L.O., or the various epithets applied to international labour standards.

I understand by the "structure of the I.L.O." the Conference, the Governing Body, the Industrial Committees and the other organs of the I.L.O. I agree with other speakers that they should have fewer conferences and fewer meetings. I feel the distribution of seats should be revised on solid criteria, having regard to the advances made by developing countries in human capital.

The change in the structure of the I.L.O. was indispensable. It must be made in a rational way: a simple regrouping would not be sufficient. It is to be hoped that the competent I.L.O. services in the field of vocational retraining and advanced training of supervisory staff may do a good job for their own Organisation.

Beside the three departments of the I.L.O., the research and information services could also be very helpful to the developing countries.

If a large department could deal with the development plans implemented in the past or under way or projected for the future, or bring them together to study them and see why they succeeded or why they failed so that all could benefit from the experience of the one or the other to the great benefit to the States Members and the I.L.O. This department could be put in charge of introducing I.L.O. assistance within the framework of development plans of countries.

Decentralisation of the various activities of the I.L.O. would be a very desirable policy, but here we must walk very prudently. There are many systems of decentralisation. I think the combined central and regional system, or one based on co-operation between headquarters and regional institutions would be best for the future activities of the I.L.O.

The staff chosen for these centres, apart from their technical and scientific competence, which would be appropriate to their own task, must have sufficiently profound knowledge and general training and at the same time must be positive and have a very broad and open-minded way of approaching matters, so that they can best serve the regions where they will be working. Moreover, this is true for the experts chosen for the I.L.O. The staff for the regional offices must be chosen very carefully from the point of view of politics and from morals, before being assigned, because afterwards it would be impossible to ask them not to deal with questions of politics or change their outlook or look at problems in a different way, because that which evolves most slowly in man is his moral outlook.

We must have confidence in our Director-General so that he can try to carry out the difficult task which is his. We wish him every success.

In spite of the efforts of the United Nations agencies, every country can make progress only by the efforts of its people. You need the efforts of the whole people for the development of the country.

In Iran, the employers in the private sector are doing all they can to industrialise the country and create suitable and profitable work. The Government intervenes only to encourage us. We depend on our own strength, with the help of God.

Interpretation from Russian : Mr. SHELDOV (Government delegate, Byelorussia)—Today we end the discussion of the Director-General’s Report, in the course of which, as in the past two years, a wide range of problems were raised relating to the programme, structure and activities of the I.L.O. Our delegation, having closely studied the Report of the Director-General and having followed with great attention the discussion at the present session, fully shares the conclusion at which many earlier speakers have arrived that no serious practical steps have been taken towards reorientating the activities of the I.L.O. in those areas on which at earlier sessions there was a substantial degree of agreement. Nor has the Director-General fulfilled his promise “to provide some fresh proposals and fresh ideas on those points which clearly still require some further examination”. Nor have any real results been forthcoming from the Working Party of the Governing Body. The question arises as to the reason for this situation. We believe the reason is that certain circles in the I.L.O. which refuse to recognise the demands of our time ing obstinately to the great benefit to the States Members and the I.L.O. This department could be put in charge of introducing I.L.O. assistance within the framework of development plans of countries.

The Byelorussian delegation considers this situation anomalous, and we believe that it is necessary to take effective steps to ensure a genuine revision of the programme and structure of the I.L.O., bearing in mind both earlier proposals and those made at this year’s Conference.

As regards the three basic programme areas of the I.L.O. which have been suggested by the Director-General, namely development of manpower resources, development of social institutions, and living and working conditions, agreeing with the need to stimulate the work of the I.L.O. in these directions, the Byelorussian delegation considers it of primary importance that the activity of the Organisation in the field of labour relations and the development of social institutions should base itself, as laid down in the Constitution, on the interests of the workers and should serve those purposes except upholding the rights and interests of the workers. Alongside this, I.L.O. action in these fields must stem from the need for immediate and final liquidation of colonialism and all its consequences which hamper the social and economic progress of the countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America.

The I.L.O. must actively struggle against the policy of apartheid of the Republic of South Africa, the rulers of which shamelessly ignore the decisions of the United Nations and the requirements of the Declaration adopted at the 48th Session of the Conference.

It is the duty of this Organisation to condemn racial discrimination, and it must urgently ly demand an end to forced labour imposed by the colonialists in the enslaved territories. Our delegation proclaims its support of the resolution submitted by the Government delegation of the United Arab Republic condemning the Government of Portugal for this policy.

It is necessary to refer also to the abnormal position whereby the Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of Apartheid of the Republic of South Africa does not mention the implementation of the most important provisions of this Declaration by States Members although the Declaration calls upon governments, employers and workers to take every step in order to compel the Government of the Republic of South Africa to re­nounce its apartheid policy. In the next reports of the Director-General on this subject there should be appropriate information on the measures taken or being taken by member States in response to this request of the I.L.O. Conference and also as regards the effect given by member States to the appeal to prevent emigration to South Africa made by the United Nations Special Committee on the Policies of Apartheid of the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

It is very important that the I.L.O., particip­ating in various seminars and conferences in the Western countries, should not allow the prestige of the I.L.O. to be used to cover up the attempts of the colonialists, neo-colonialists and their groupings to enslave the peoples of the newly independent countries or to continue to exploit the natural and human resources of developing countries in the interests of the foreign monopolists. Today, Mr. Clausen at­tempted to compare the scale of assistance provided by socialist States to the developing countries with that provided by the Western countries, but, in quoting, he deliberately forgot to mention that the very same Western coun­tries, according to United Nations information, pump out $20,000 million each year from the developing countries. Thus, they are giving with one hand and taking away with the other.

We consider that in carrying out the I.L.O. programmes, the International Labour Office must make full use of the advanced experience of the socialist countries in the solution of various economic and social problems men­tioned in the Constitution.

I will not speak about the passive attitude of the Office towards appropriate measures in this connection in the socialist countries. I will quote only one example. In August 1964, in the capital of Byelorussia, Minsk, there was a United Nations inter-regional seminar on the social aspects of industrialisation, in which more than 40 representatives of Asian, African and Latin American countries took part. It was also attended by representatives of the Social Affairs Department of the United Nations and the United Nations Centre on Industrial Development, the W.H.O., and all the United Nations regional commissions. The I.L.O., how­ever, refused to participate in this seminar, important from the viewpoint of the activities of the Organisation, and the work of which was highly praised by all participants.

Nor is the situation concerning the rendering of service by the socialist countries in the technical assistance programme satisfactory. From Byelorussia, for instance, during the ten years of our membership in the I.L.O., not one expert has been called to participate in this programme even though the Office assigned 784 experts in 1964. Not a single visiting fellow from the developing countries was sent to Byelorussia, even though the I.L.O. awarded 984 fellowships during the same year. We have not received a single order for equipment. Yet Byelorussia has acquired considerable experience in overcoming economic and social backwardness, in re-establishing the national economy that was almost entirely destroyed by the Hitlerites in the Second World War. To give an illustration, I need only say that our fac­tories now produce in less than eight days as much as the total industrial production of pre-Revolutionary Byelorussia in a whole year. The power plants of Byelorussia supply in less than one hour more electric power than was produced in a whole year before the Revolution. These data show the colossal benefits of the socialist economic system.

We have acquired considerable experience also in training national personnel in solving practically every social problem relating to youth, women, old persons, the redistribution of income, the liquidation of unemployment, etc. We are prepared to share this experience with the developing countries and we are doing a lot in this direction, both on a bilateral basis and also through participation in United Nations and specialised agency programmes.

An important element in the radical improve­ment of the work of the I.L.O. is the problem of the revision of the structure, and the democra­tisation of the methods of work of the Organisa­tion, so as to enhance the role of the General Conference. In this connection we have already made a number of proposals at earlier sessions. Without wishing to repeat itself, the Byelorussian delegation feels that it is necessary to stress once again the need to revise the composition of the Governing Body and of other elective organs of the I.L.O., the legitimate interests of the socialist and developing countries in all three groups being fully respected. In this connection, we entirely support the resolution on this question submitted by the Government delegates of Poland and the Ukraine at this session.

The Office is carrying out certain reorgan­i­sation of its machinery and new responsible posts, departments and services are being set up. All this is supposed to reflect sub­stantial attention to the changing situation and the interests of the various groups of coun­tries. But, unfortunately, we do not find any responsible posts being granted to the citi­zens of socialist or developing countries. If such a policy is to continue, it will be difficult to reckon on a radical improvement in the pro­gramme and structure of the I.L.O., improve­ment of its methods of work or implementa­tion of decisions by the General Conference.

We are convinced that it is the duty and re­sponsibility of the I.L.O. to contribute by its activities to the practical consolidation of peace, peaceful coexistence and co-operation. The I.L.O. must contribute actively to total and complete disarmament and it must strengthen its practical activities in the study of the eco­nomic and social consequences of disarmament. Without stable peace, there cannot be social or economic progress.

With regard to the statement of the Director­General that the I.L.O. is prepared to play its part in the attainment of co-operation between all nations in the maintenance of peace and in the promotion of economic and social advancement for all people, and the promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms, we consider that the I.L.O. has no right to ignore aggression, military adventure, or the cruel oppression of national liberation move­ments. We protest vehemently against the systematic, piratical bombing of the Democratic Republic of South Viet-Nam by American aircraft, the increasing aggression by the United States in South Viet-Nam and the Dominican Republic.

No calumny or insinuation from this platform can save the aggressive neo-colonialist policy of the American ruling circles . . .

The PRESIDENT.—I would remind the speaker that references to theatres of war have been considered to be out of order in this Conference. I would therefore request him to refer to other points.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SHELDOV—This policy has not brought and it will not bring them anything but defeat and shame.

Today we heard the Government delegate of the United States of America, Mr. Weaver, attempt to justify these government policies. We understand what a difficult task faced you, Mr. Weaver, for you spoke about democracy, but perhaps you read today in the New York Herald Tribune an article by Walter Lippmann, headed "Whom We Support". In this article, Lippmann justly points out that in South Viet-Nam, in the Dominican Republic and in many other parts of the world the United States is supporting the most reactionary regimes and forces that enjoy absolutely no popular support. What democracy are you talking about? You cannot speak sincerely about loyalty to the ideals of freedom if the bayonets of your army are prop­ ping up the most reactionary governments of the world. How can you speak in favour of complete freedom throughout Africa if the monopolists of your country are bosom friends of the colonialists in South Africa and Angola and if in the United States itself Negroes have no freedom and the Ku-Klux-Klan terror reigns supreme? How is it possible to speak about peace, to don the toga of a peacemaker if in Viet-Nam and the Dominican Republic United States soldiers, whom nobody invited here, are shedding the blood of peaceful citizens and are demonstrating to the whole world, with the aid of napalm, that an American way of liberty offers no calumny or insinuation from this plat­ form . . .

I am sure that the Working Party of the Governing Body will not fail to study this idea, which was already discussed a few years ago in a committee of the Governing Body, presided over by Mr. Agó, whose function was to seek means of improving the practical methods of working of the Conference.

The same applies, I am sure, to other sug­ gestions made by Mr. Grandval and repeated by other speakers, such as the development of confer­ ences and meetings at the regional level, which seem to me to be quite desirable for the big, non-European regions which have their own problems; and also measures which might no doubt be taken at the Conference to organise on a more rational basis the exchange of views on the Director-General's Report.

I have just listened with very great interest to the speech by Mr. Bouladoux, and I hope that his suggestions will also be the subject of careful examination by the Working Party of the Governing Body.

Having unfortunately had to go to Paris the day before yesterday, at the time of the discussion here on the budget of the Organisa­ tion, when we examined the reports of our committees, I intend to refer to certain statements made on Wednesday which really concern the work of some of these committees. However, I should like now to state that I associate myself entirely with what was said by my colleague, the Chairman of the Workers' group, Mr. Mórí, in reply to the speeches made by the Government delegates of Poland and of the Soviet Union.

Reiterating the complaints of the Employers' members of their delegations, the governments of the communist countries of Eastern Europe this year have criticised almost daily the very great majority of my group, who are accused by them of not treating the Employers' delegates of these countries on an equal footing —and I quote Mr. Goroshkin—by "neglecting their right to hold elective posts".

You all know very well that all delegates to the Conference and their advisers are perfectly entitled to take part in the work of the com­ mittees, that is to say to put in their names to speak and even to vote, either as titular members, provided they are elected by their groups, or as deputies for absent titular members.

As regards the Resolutions Committee, the absence of communist Employers in the list appended to the second report of the Selection Committee is due, first of all, to the fact that not one of them was a candidate for a seat on that Committee and, for the other committees, Employers from those countries figure on the list either as deputy members or as titular practical activities of the Organisation on behalf of developing countries or certain measures which might lighten the work of the Conference.

It is naturally a pleasure for me to support the suggestion made by the Minister of Labour of my country, Mr. Grandval, to find a means of having this expensive meeting—and particularly so to those States Members far from Geneva—meet every two years. The expense is so great that they find it difficult to do what is eminently desirable—that is, to send delega­ tions large enough to enable them to play their part to the full.
members placed on the committee at their request, despite us, by the Appeals Board.

The only fact of which these delegates can complain is that they were not elected as titular members when the Employers' group proceeded to the election by secret ballot, and not one of the delegates has challenged the propriety of the vote, either before or afterwards.

These Employers complain only of the result of these votes, claiming that they were victims of discrimination, as if the fact that they were not elected is a discrimination—as Mr. Goroshkin appears to believe when he says that they had the "right" to be elected.

The truth is that these delegates feel themselves isolated in our group because they are very clearly different from ourselves. Whatever their personal qualities, they are not and cannot be, at least at present, the representatives of organisations of employers independent of their governments. They could be experts, and no doubt they would be very good experts, in many international delegations. They cannot expect from us, who are free to criticise our own governments and to oppose them, that we give them our confidence in this tripartite Conference, when they are closely linked to the political authorities of their countries. I add that these authorities themselves are, moreover, dominated by a political party which we all know and to which the term "monopoly", which they apply so often to us, could well, in its turn, be applied.

You must believe that all that I have said is without bitterness and in full awareness of the qualities of the colleagues I have mentioned.

Let me now do what many speakers have done at the beginning of their speeches, Sir—congratulate you on your election.

As we approach the end of this Conference, we find that too many delegates have spoken of purely political matters, which are better handled in the United Nations, and have made remarks which, since they call for a reply from the countries in question, might open passionate debates which would trouble the atmosphere of this Conference which is supposed to deal with labour problems.

But we have found also, Mr. President, that you have been able to combine freedom of speech with a concern to avoid excessive abuse as far as possible, and, personally, I am grateful to you for it.

Interpretation from French: Mr. TARCICI (Government delegate, Yemen)—Mr. President, I would have liked to be the first to take the floor in order to congratulate you; I am not the last, but I am one of the last on the list of speakers, and therefore I am bound to repeat what has already been said. May I therefore merely endorse all the words of greeting that were addressed to you by the eloquent speakers who came before me on this rostrum, and may I add also that I will join in what will be said after me?

I should like to stress, however, the additional factors that bring our two countries and out two peoples closer together. These factors include not only culture and religion but also the monsoon winds of the Indian Ocean which sweep our shores, thus facilitating our contacts since ancient times.

I should like to congratulate also the Vice-Presidents.

My country is a newcomer to this Organisation. As such, it was warmly welcomed by you, Mr. President, and by our senior brothers and sisters in this Organisation. To you and all those who greeted us I should like to say, on behalf of the people of Yemen, its Government and all its social groups: thank you.

As the first spokesman for the Yemen I will not direct my remarks to the Director-General's Report; not having participated in the drafting of the resolutions which have guided him in his activities, I could hardly do so. Nevertheless, I should like to tell him that I have read his excellent Report and that I have learned much.

First of all, I have been very well informed about the activities of the last year and I dwelt especially on the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance, where I gladly noted the considerable progress. It is also a source of joy for all to know that the I.L.O. has been appointed as executing agency for 49 Special Fund projects.

As regards the problem of human resources, I was glad—indeed relieved—to hear that the Director-General has devoted so much attention to a problem that is of crucial concern to us in the Yemen. As regards the proper utilisation of our manpower resources, we do indeed rely on the co-operation and assistance of the International Labour Office. My Government is glad to read in the Report, the following: "The need to integrate a policy for imparting skills in over-all development planning is equally obvious, since projects in each plan period will have to take into account the availability of manpower in various categories of skills." I will not quote this paragraph to the end, but anyway it shows a real understanding of the problem which we have to face. This understanding makes us hope much from the assistance of this Organisation.

I read with particular interest that part of the Report which says that two pilot projects in the field of rural employment have been started, one in India in 1963 and the other in Nigeria in 1964.

In this connection, I should like to thank the F.A.O. for its assistance in these two pilot projects. I note with satisfaction the assurance that the knowledge acquired in these two countries will be duly noted and used on a broader plane. I am sure my country and the whole region will not fail to benefit from such projects.

As for vocational training, which is yet another source of concern to us—one we share with all the developing countries—it is encouraging to note that the Director-General has devoted so much attention to it. We appreciate the useful co-operation of our Organisation with the Special Fund, which will no doubt facilitate the implementation of our economic projects in this field. It is noteworthy that 31 of the 49 projects being undertaken by the Special Fund relate to vocational training. Is it too much to ask the Director-General that the fiftieth project should relate to the Yemen, or if not that the project on Yemen should come soon afterwards?
I know that Mr. Morse and his immediate assistants are prepared to help us regain some of the lost time, and I should like to take this opportunity to thank them for their warm feelings towards my country and their complete understanding of our problems.

In his Report, the Director-General tells us about the advanced training programmes for supervisory personnel and those relating to increased productivity. I am glad to note that the Special Fund has approved 18 training programmes. Yemen hopes for much assistance from the Special Fund and the expanded programme of the United Nations in this field. In the case of my country, the words "advanced training" can better be translated by the concept of training of supervisory personnel, since the latter are almost completely lacking.

We are glad to learn in this connection that the Turin Centre, the establishment of which was decided in 1963 and adopted in May 1963, will open in the country. This rapid achievement should be greatly appreciated by the Conference. I should like to join those who have thanked the Italian Government for its generous contribution of more than $7 million in order to facilitate the realisation of this project. We also thank them for their additional commitment to finance scholarships which will benefit the developing countries. Thus, Rome is once again extending the rays of its influence for the greater benefit of a new world.

We are glad to hear also that our Organisation is expanding its activities in the field of small industries and cottage industries, and that this assistance is helping new areas of development.

Finally, in the field of conditions of life and work, the problems of social security and those of security and hygiene have been given due attention. We note with satisfaction that handbooks on the medical inspection of worksites and on nursing care are well advanced. The World Health Organisation has participated fully in these activities which fall within its competence.

As a new member of the Executive Board of the W.H.O., I should like to say how much we appreciate the close technical collaboration between the W.H.O. and the I.L.O. in the field of hygiene, social security and labour security.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am not debating the Director-General's Report but wish to tell him of my great respect for the activities which he describes, and I should also like to tell him that, as a new member, I have learned a lot and benefited a lot. I am also convinced that the services of the I.L.O. have learned how to adapt themselves to the needs of the developing countries. I congratulate them warmly on this highly important and commendable adaptation. I too have benefited because I know now how to profit from the previous experience gained by the Office and its services. I know now how I can benefit from the very warm approach of the Director-General as far as close co-operation between Yemen and I.L.O. is concerned. I hope the Director-General, who is such a devoted servant of this Organisation, will not be too apprehensive as regards my future requests for technical assistance. I promise they will all be realistic and well motivated.

Interpretation from French: Mr. PONGAULT (Representative of the African Trade Union Confederation)—In the name of the African Trade Union Confederation and on my own behalf, I should like to thank you, Mr. President, for having made it possible for me to speak here, and I am very glad thus to be able to associate myself with the speakers who have preceded me at this rostrum in congratulating you on your brilliant election to the presidency of this session of the Conference.

This election is, for us, more than a mere symbol; it is a concrete manifestation of the growing role which the developing countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America are playing within the I.L.O.

The evolution which this illustrates also explains the fact that the Governing Body of the I.L.O. has decided to extend to the African Trade Union Confederation regional advisory status, and has invited it to share in the work of this session.

The A.T.U.C. feels called upon to thank the Governing Body for this decision which revolutionises, to a certain extent, the well-established traditions of the Organisation which were characterised by a paralysing legalism, the only effect of which was to deprive the I.L.O. of the concerted, dynamic and valuable contribution of the African trade union movement.

This is an opportunity for the A.T.U.C. to stress once again the fact that the trade union movement intends to build up is not and will not be an instrument of demagogy and sterile agitation at the service of any imported ideological quarrels. It is aware of the important fact which has been played and will be played by the workers in the struggle for total liberation of the continent from colonial domination and all forms of imperialism.

Thus, intending to remain the true and faithful expression of the profound and legitimate aspirations of the immense majority of African workers, we could not enrol in the service of one imperialism with the pretext of combating another imperialism. That is why, at the Constituent Conference in January 1962 at Dakar, we rejected the capitalist system, which is a new and oppressive and exploiting colonialism, and communism because it is totalitarian and, as such, is contrary to the will of freedom which has raised and is still raising the masses of the African peoples against colonial domination.

On the basis of that position, the A.T.U.C. has worked out a programme of action, with the guiding principles of which are: African unity as an effective means towards the liberation and emancipation of the African peoples; democratic planning and economic democracy guaranteeing the independent participation of the trade union movement in the conception, preparation and application of the objectives of economic and social development; the co-ordination and harmonisation of economic development plans and social legislation with a view to promoting the prosperity of the whole continent and to raising the standard of living by concerted action.

Thus, while working for a broader consultative status, we are seeking closer collaboration with the I.L.O. This is because we are convinced that the action of the I.L.O. coincides with the principles and aims of the A.T.U.C. as we have just outlined them and because we are convinced that the I.L.O. can help our countries to achieve those objectives.

We have the firm hope that the Governing Body, taking into account the special aspects of the organisation and action of the trade union movement in Africa, will examine realistically the problems thus raised, all of this within the framework of what might be called the reorganisation and rejuvenation of the structures and activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Basically, it is this last subject which constituted the centre of interest of the 47th and 48th Sessions of the Conference and also dominates this session. For three years now, in fact, the Director-General of the I.L.O. has been asking the Conference for its opinions and advice on the way to go for the sequence of this phenomenon is the creation of a new field of social tension—no longer that of a new field of social tension in the world—the social tension which opposes them to the industrialised countries, most of which were the unexpected beneficiaries of the Treaty of Versailles (Part XIII) assigned to the I.L.O. practically only standard-setting, essentially juridical, tasks, with a view to improving working conditions of wage earners, protecting their human dignity and ensuring their economic and social promotion. However, since that time, the I.L.O. has had its membership increased by the people's democracies with totally planned economies, where social tension placed the workers in opposition to a wealthy class.

The Treaty of Versailles (Part XIII) assigned to the I.L.O. practically only standard-setting, essentially juridical, tasks, with a view to improving working conditions of wage earners, protecting their human dignity and ensuring their economic and social promotion. However, since that time, the I.L.O. has had its membership increased by the people's democracies with totally planned economies, where social tension placed the workers in opposition to a wealthy class.

The I.L.O. must devote most of its resources and give first place in its programme of activities to research and the achievement of a balance between the have and have-not countries. Structures will also have to be amended in the light of this new requirement. That is why we continue to urge that wider representation of these countries, particularly the African countries, should be ensured constitutionally at the level of the upper echelons of the I.L.O., as well as at the levels of the various administrative and technical departments, a greater number of African officials should be engaged; that the number of branch offices should be increased and that when they are set up attention should be given to the need of serving the different zones; that a regional office should be installed in Africa to assume responsibility for co-ordinating the activities of these branch offices, under the responsibility of the central departments; that the responsibility of the central departments; that African officials should be associated in the direction and in the staffing of these branch offices and the regional office.

In the field of practical activities, the Reports of the Director-General and the discussions at the 47th, 48th and 49th Sessions of the Conference and at the regional conferences held in Lagos and Addis Ababa stressed the immensity and diversity of the needs, the multiplicity and the complexity of the problems which have arisen. The United Nations Conference on Trade and Development in 1964 also showed the extreme seriousness of the situation in our countries, particularly in the rural sector.

It is therefore urgent that the I.L.O. should prepare, on the basis of practical field investigations made in co-operation with the governments and employers' and workers' organisations, a serious study on the conditions of work and life of wage earners, the employment level, the comparative state of social legislation, and the living standards of the peasants as compared with the fluctuations of world market prices for raw materials.

This last part of the study will I think unquestionably bring out the need to continue the work begun at Geneva by the Conference on Trade and Development and will show the urgent need for finding solutions to the problems of marketing and the prices of raw materials. It will stress the need for international social justice leading to proper remuneration for all producers so that they may have a normal life for themselves and their families.

The Governing Body of the I.L.O. should place on the agenda of a future session of the Conference the examination of the conclusions of this study so that agreement may be reached on priorities for the future action of the I.L.O. in Africa in the field of its specific activities as well as in the more general field of technical assistance.

The I.L.O. can and must play a very important part in Africa, but all the States which make up this Organisation must agree to fling themselves into the great battle of the century—the complete decolonisation of Africa—without which it is pointless to speak of social justice and peace. It is deplorable that, faced with the problem of decolonisation, the I.L.O., forgetting the Declaration of Philadelphia, the United Nations Charter and the United Nations resolution on decolonisation, shelters behind the outdated terms of the Treaty of Versailles.

How can the I.L.O. justify the confidence which Africans would like to place in it when within the Organisation, through practices and procedures which are definitely opportunist and partisan, a cover continues to be supplied for Portuguese colonialism; when it recognises that, in order to maintain its colonial system in Angola, Mozambique, Bissao Guinea and the Cape Verde Islands, Portugal is massacring African patriots, carrying out arbitrary arrests and imprisonment, composing forced labour and following a policy of racial discrimination closely resembling apartheid; but while recognising these barbaric acts, the I.L.O. refuses to condemn Portugal and to exclude it from the family of those who wish to build true social justice on the basis of respect for the dignity of peoples and of mankind?

Why do we not adopt as regards Portugal the same solemn sanction of exclusion and isolation which has been adopted in respect of the Republic of South Africa, since both practice a common doctrine of the total denial of human rights—a doctrine at once philosophical, religious, economic and social, based on a different valuation of men according to their race and continent?

In this particular case we cannot be answered by arguments based on the independence of States because it is not an act of interference in the so-called domestic affairs of a State to prevent the maintenance or propagation of a doctrine capable of undermining the very foundations of international life since it applies in practice the antithesis of the principles which bring us together.

On the answer to these questions will depend the success of the I.L.O. in Africa.

The President—The discussion of the Director-General’s Report is now closed. Two hundred and one speakers have taken part in this discussion. I should like to avail myself of this opportunity to thank all the speakers for the consideration they have shown to me. To those delegates who feel that subjects not relevant to the Director-General’s Report have been introduced into this discussion I would say, please forgive and forget, and utilise the remaining working days to take decisions which will enhance the prestige and reputation of the I.L.O. in the comity of nations.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON WOMEN WORKERS : SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from Spanish : The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—We now come to the report of the Committee on Women Workers. I would ask Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, Chairman of the Committee, and Miss Jedidi, Reporter, to be good enough to come to the platform. Miss Jedidi will submit the report.

Interpretation from French : Miss JEDIDI (Government adviser, Tunisia ; Reporter of the Committee on Women Workers)—I should like to start by stressing that I feel it is a great honour for my country and for myself that I was chosen as Reporter of the Committee on Women Workers and that I have the opportunity of submitting for your approval the report of the Committee, the text of which has been circulated to delegates.

The employment of women, which has been taking on a constantly growing importance in the industrialised countries as well as in the developing countries, has been the subject of particular attention by the I.L.O. in the last few years. At the 48th Session the International Labour Conference included on its agenda the item of women workers in a changing world, and in addition adopted Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, upon which we have had a second discussion this year and also four resolutions.

At the Second African Regional Conference, which was held in Addis Ababa in November and December 1964, women’s work was one of the items on the agenda and two resolutions were adopted in this connection: one on the employment and conditions of work of women in African countries, and the other on I.L.O. action to advance the economic and social status of women in African countries.

Earlier, as you know, the Conference adopted a number of instruments concerning various aspects of women’s work, in particular maternity protection, and prohibition or regulation of the employment of women in dangerous or unhealthy work. Moreover, a number of instruments concerning non-discrimination in employment and occupation stipulate that sex may not be a cause for discrimination as concerns either wages or any aspects of employment and vocational training policies.

The Committee adopted this year, as a basis for its discussions, the proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, which appears in Report V (2).

May I stress that the discussions in the Committee were carried out in an atmosphere of great cordiality; all the members showed the keenest interest in the questions. At no time did we have the impression that any differences in viewpoint which may have appeared in the Committee constituted any true divergence as far as the principles were concerned.

We had about ten sittings for constructive examination of about 40 amendments which had been proposed. Often the identity of viewpoints on problems, and the spirit of collaboration which inspired the three groups, led to the combination or withdrawal of amendments.

Before I go on to present the report itself, I should like to lay stress on the decisive role played by Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, the Chairman of our Committee, who presided over our discussions most competently, with great grace and deep understanding.

We also feel that we owe the success of our work to the understanding and the spirit of collaboration of our two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Anderson, Employers' adviser, Australia, and Mrs. Weber, Workers' adviser, Austria.

I should like to congratulate the I.L.O. on the excellent preparatory work which it has done. As spokesman for all the members of the Committee, I should like to thank most warmly Mrs. Johnstone, representative of the Secretary-General and all her colleagues, whose efforts to meet the needs of our work contributed to a very large extent to the success of our work.

I should also like to thank the members of the Drafting Committee for their collaboration. I should certainly not like to forget the active and skilled participation, understanding and collaboration of all members of the Committee.

I now have the honour and pleasure of submitting to the Conference the report of the Committee on Women Workers for adoption.

During the general discussion some Government members expressed certain reservations as far as concerns the desirability of adopting an instrument devoted particularly to the employment of women because they feared that special measures in favour of women might in fact harm equal opportunity in the employment market.

However, a number of other speakers felt that it was only normal that special measures should be adopted to facilitate the task of working women with family responsibilities since society expects them to play the triple role of workers, mothers and housewives. Some members stressed the fact that the work of women outside their own homes meets an economic necessity at the national level and makes it possible to raise the standards of living and productivity of the various countries; it was therefore only just that women should be helped to solve the problems which make their broad participation in active economic life difficult; these special measures should not be considered as a privilege but as a right arising out of the social function of motherhood.

As regards the form to be given to the instrument, certain members, while recognising that a Recommendation would have a considerable moral weight, felt that a Convention would be an instrument which would count more and extent more weight in the defence of the rights of working women. The Committee finally decided unanimously in favour of a Recommendation. I think I can state here that the Committee was in favour of the most flexible instrument, best adapted to the present situation, in view of the different conditions and different levels of development of the countries concerned. This instrument, I feel quite certain, could be adopted by all governments.

The general principle underlying the text of the Recommendation was discussed and adopted unanimously. It encourages the pursuit of a suitable policy to make it possible for women with family responsibilities, working outside their own homes, to exercise their right to do so without being exposed to any discrimination, and in accordance with the principles laid down in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, as well as in the other international standards adopted by the International Labour Conference which are of particular concern to women.

The text contains a number of measures and principles concerning, in particular, public information and education, child-care services and facilities, and entry and re-entry into employment. It appeals to the competent authorities to take, in collaboration with the public and private organisations concerned, appropriate measures with a view, in particular, to giving the necessary key attention to the problems of women with family responsibilities in order to enable them to become integrated effectively in the employed population on an equal footing, without detriment to the equi­rium and health of their families.

During the course of the discussion, and consequently in the text, considerable attention was given to entry and re-entry into employment. In particular it is recommended that the competent authorities should take all measures in accordance with the Employment Policy Convention and Recommendation, 1964, with a view to making it possible for women with family responsibilities to become or to remain integrated in the labour force as well as to re-enter the labour force.

The text is supplemented by a resolution concerning the periodic review of the effects of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities. I should like to stress the importance of this resolution, which was most favourably welcomed by the Committee, which in fact adopted it unanimously.

Finally I should like to take this opportunity to express a strong hope that we shall see women participate more and more in the work of the Conference. As a worker, a woman is not only concerned with the special measures protecting working women; the various aspects of employment policy concern women as much as they concern men. Their participation in this field at national level is growing every day in the industrialised countries, as well as in the developing countries, and I have every hope of seeing this participation extend to the international field as well.

By taking up the study of employment of women with family responsibilities, the I.L.O. is extending the action which it has taken in the past with respect to the special protection for working women and unquestionably in the present instrument we have gone beyond the tasks which we have set ourselves in the past. I hope, most sincerely, that our work at this session will contribute to the creation of conditions which will lead to a true integration of women in the working populations of their countries; it is this true integration on an equal footing which is our objective. This objective will be reached when we no longer need to work out special standards for women. It will be reached on the day when economic and social conditions and the evolution of the mentality of the people is such that every citizen will be able to work according to his means and his needs, in accordance with the needs of society.

In conclusion, until we reach that happy state, I should like to express a most sincere hope that the Committee will adopt the texts which we are now proposing to the Conference as a whole.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. GATTI CAPORASO (Government adviser, Italy; Chairman of the Committee on Women Workers)—I have to express my warmest thanks to this Conference for the honour which has been done to my country and to myself in being elected Chairman of the Committee on Women Workers. I do so not for formal reasons, but because of a profound and sincere feeling which the work done in the Committee has only strengthened.

The friendly atmosphere of our sittings, the kindness and co-operation of all members of the Committee, rendered my task less difficult and most agreeable. My gratitude goes therefore to the representatives of the various countries who contributed their experience, their abilities and enthusiasm to the service of this very important cause. I am particularly grateful to the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Anderson and Mrs. Weber, who with great goodwill and success sought positive solutions which could be accepted by most delegates. I thank Miss Jedidi, the author of such an objective report that it was unanimously accepted. I thank the representative of the Secretary-General, Mrs. Johnstone, and her staff for their remarkable preparatory studies and for the assistance which they so generously gave to us all, and particularly to me. It is thanks to these factors that we come to the plenary meeting with a proposed Recommendation, supplemented by a resolution, which were voted unanimously in the Committee and which I hope will be confirmed unanimously today. This document, if approved, will be a really noble, rich and humane page in the history of the I.L.O. It will be added to the vast structure built by the I.L.O. to enable women to make an effective contribution, with all the other workers, to the social and economic development of modern society.

The principles of equal remuneration, the protection of motherhood, and non-discrimination to the progress of which in the world the I.L.O. has contributed so much, will be supplemented by a general, organic and complete policy regarding women with family responsibilities. This policy will finally open the path to real equality and will enable them in the interests of themselves, their families and of society, to organise their life in a harmonious way.

In our days it has been established that work for women no longer constitutes a transitional or secondary factor, solely determined by economic necessity, but is becoming increasingly a permanent interest, a factor in the development of their personality. The statistics published by the International Labour Office last year in its report Women Workers in a Changing World, on the percentage of women workers, wives or mothers, in economic activity in different countries shows that we are faced with an established fact, characteristic of our time, which we cannot ignore. The statistics also show that modern economies are placing an emphasis on the work of women workers, a contribution which should become more and more skilled.

As a result of this understanding, it follows that the public authorities should take on the responsibility of providing women—particularly those who have family responsibilities—with opportunities for effectively exercising their right to work without discrimination and in the full understanding, assistance and sympathy of society as a whole. This is achieved not only by declarations of principle or by laws which theoretically guarantee equality, but in particular by a series of specific measures, that is, by adapting the social organisation to the problems and exigencies peculiar to the personality of women and by assisting the woman worker effectively to become integrated in the working population on an equal footing.

This is what we are called upon to do today, and it marks a new step in the policy of the International Labour organisation, of governments and trade union organisations, in the field of women's work. From this point of view, which is clarified in greater detail in the instrument which we are discussing, it is particularly necessary, I feel, to emphasise the policy of employment, vocational training and social services.

In this respect I am proud to be able to state today that in my country, Italy, the situation is changing in the same direction as that indicated in the Recommendation. Legal obstacles which in the past have limited the opportunities for women workers have finally been overcome, thanks to a series of laws which provide equal rights in the field of labour, whilst vigorous collective negotiations, with the assistance of the Government, have resulted almost in the realisation of equal remuneration for equal work.

It is necessary to add to this rapid sketch the proposal of a new Bill, at the initiative of the Government, intended to modify certain provisions of the Italian Civil Code relating to marriage, in order to ensure the full equality, both legal and moral, of husband and wife, as asserted in the Constitution of the Italian Republic. This will have important repercussions on the conditions of women in her work. But I should like to emphasise another point, viz. as it is a new aspect of public action, that the draft five-year economic plan in Italy, formulated to eliminate by a comprehensive approach the imbalance which still exists, has given decisive priority to the question of the development of public education and vocational training, which as we know is the fundamental prerequisite for the progress of all workers—women workers in particular. Moreover, the
Mr. ANDERSON (Employers’ adviser, Australia; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Women Workers)—First of all, I should like to pay a very warm tribute to the sterling efforts which were accomplished in this Committee by our Chairman, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso and our Reporter, Miss Jedidi, and, of course, by the I.L.O. officials and members of the secretariat, who worked long and hard in preparing our documents and putting down on paper our thoughts, in many cases more clearly than we were able to do ourselves.

Committee reports have often been described as the committee’s memory versus the imagination of the International Labour Office, but in this case the report you have before you is a true reflection of the tripartite discussions and decisions, and I have no hesitation in warmly recommending the Conference to adopt it.

This, I believe, is the first time in the long history of the I.L.O. that the problems of women workers have been discussed by this Conference in their own right. It has been a unique experience for me, but a very pleasant one, and I should like to place on record the appreciation of the Employers’ members of this Committee of the excellent spirit of co-operation and comprehension that prevailed throughout our discussions and by grace of which many points of some difficulty could be ironed out.

As we stated last year when this item first came up for discussion, the Bureau of the Employers’ Technical Section of this Committee believed that the varying circumstances in different countries made it essential—in fact, made it very essential—that any standards adopted should be as flexible as possible. We believed that rigid standards would only defeat the objective of our discussions.

As has been rightly said on a number of occasions throughout the work of this Committee, it is difficult to discriminate in favour of one group of workers without discriminating against another, and special measures passed to protect the interests of particular workers could, unless very reasonable precautions were observed, well redound against them in making their employment more difficult.

That this was recognised by the Committee is shown, we think, by the final results of our labours, and the proposed Recommendation which is now before you reflects, in our view, a very genuine attempt by the Committee to reach agreement on many points which, in the original text, had been the subject of disension.

It has produced a text sufficiently flexible, in our opinion, to meet with general approval, and the Employers, because we believe that the proceedings of the Committee have led to considerable improvements over the text proposed in Report V (2), will accordingly support in the vote the new proposed Recommendation as it is now drafted, together with the resolution calling for a future review of the effects of the Recommendation.

Interpretation from German: Mrs. WEBER (Workers’ adviser, Austria; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Women Workers)—I have the honour, as representative of the Workers in the Committee on Women Workers, to come before the Conference, and I feel that I must, first of all, thank the Reporter for her excellent report: she described the proceedings extremely well.

The work of the Committee, as you have heard from the previous speakers, was extremely successful. This is very largely due to the Chairman, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, who directed our proceedings with tact and patience as well as energy. In the name of the Workers, I should like to thank her warmly for this.

We must also thank the International Labour Office, particularly Mrs. Johnstone and her staff. The Committee had before it a very carefully prepared document which served as a basis for our discussion. This was the product of a long consideration of the problems of women with family responsibilities.

The Conference considered the problems of working mothers as long ago as 1947. A resolution then adopted indicated that greater help should be given to women with dual obligations and that the problem of the employment of women with young children should be thoroughly studied. At the same time, the hope was expressed that this question would be placed on the agenda of a future session of the Conference. It has taken 17 years to give effect to that wish.

Meanwhile, in 1955, in a further resolution this question was again taken up, and the I.L.O. Panel of Consultants on the Problems of Women Workers examined this group of problems several times and put forward proposals for action. Similar interest was shown in various regional conferences of the I.L.O. and in meetings of U.N.E.S.C.O.

The International Labour Organisation is therefore meeting an urgent international need when it deals with this question. It was high time to produce international standards and to promote the development of the necessary social institutions in all countries, and particularly to give an objective to this gradual development.

Report VI (1) submitted to the 1964 Session gives striking instances of the extent to which the employment of women with family responsibilities has increased. More and more countries are recognising that the economic cooperation of women is necessary. The greater the proportion of employed persons in the total population, the greater the national income and the higher the level of well-being. Therefore, society cannot do without the contribution of working children. They are the heart of the world the household can no longer be called a place of production. There is no doubt on these points today, and particularly that working women with family responsibilities need to have their heavy burden lightened. Social action is required to create the conditions which will enable women, for the good of the family and of society, to combine household tasks and employment tasks in a harmonious way. In this way, mothers will be protected from excessive burdens, and children will receive proper care and love.

The proposed Recommendation now before the Conference is based on the idea that women with family responsibilities should be able to enter into employment without being exposed to discrimination. This important principle has been strengthened by a change in wording and by a reference to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention.

In the document now before you, explicit reference is made to the fact that the employment of women with family responsibilities is not really a women's problem in the narrow sense—it is a problem of the whole of society. In the interests of the sound future development of society, at the economic or at the family level, society is obliged to give these problems more attention than in the past. Everything must be done to mobilise public opinion regarding this subject, and to take or promote action with a view to protecting working women with family responsibilities.

In order to put this principle into effect, the Recommendation provides that information should be disseminated in order to promote a favourable climate for women combining different functions. The competent authorities are required, by systematic inquiries, to determine the need for women's employment and also to make arrangements for the due care of children, and their various needs are to be met by constructive planning. If necessary, these welfare services are to be provided without charge. They will be adjusted to a family atmosphere and to health requirements, and will have trained personnel.

Experience shows us that women with infant children, in particular, prefer to give up their employment and to look after their children themselves. This is particularly when they are not sure that the child can be looked after carefully and with love during their absence. In many countries, there is tax relief for women who look after children. This is based on the idea that institutions for small children are expensive to establish and maintain and that care by the mother herself is essential. In line with this idea, the Recommendation provides that mothers should be able to give up their employment for a longer period than the normal maternity leave without losing their jobs, and that the rights resulting from their employment should remain intact in these cases.

In the case of long absence from work, when the woman returns to her job she should be placed on the same footing as those previously dismissed at the initiative of the employer, in accordance with the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1963 (No. 119), and she should be given preference with regard to re-engagement, as also provided for in Recommendation No. 119.

In this year's discussions a paragraph was inserted in which reference is made to last year's Recommendation concerning employment policy. Over and above the provisions of that Recommendation, women with family responsibilities should enjoy special facilities so that those who give up their work and look after their families can re-enter occupational life under satisfactory conditions.

A basic requirement is a good general education. Vocational guidance and training are also very important in the case of girls. The proposed Recommendation states that parents, teachers and young women should be made aware of the importance of training for employment. Women who want to take up their work again should have special guidance and employment services available.

Training and retraining institutions should have regard to technical and economic development, so that women may be able to re-enter employment as fully competent workers. The Recommendation also recommends action so that women workers with family responsibilities can be helped to perform their dual tasks. In this connection, particular stress is laid on the reduction of hours of work, organisation of public transport, lightening of household duties, and arrangements to harmonise hours of work with school hours, shop hours and the hours of nurseries and so on. Domestic aid services should be provided at low cost, in case of need.

The Workers' representatives at this Conference welcome the proposed Recommendation. It shows that the International Labour Organisation is aware of its responsibility to call for help for all groups of employed persons who need help. We regard this as a first step. Others must follow. Therefore we support the proposed Recommendation on the understanding that the questions at issue will have to be reviewed later. We hope that at that time it will be possible to improve the Recommendation and particularly to convert it into a Convention, which is a more binding instrument.

The Declaration of Philadelphia states that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity. The proposed Recommendation endeavours to give effect to this idea and seeks to provide women with family responsibilities with equal conditions in employment.
I would urge the Conference to accept the proposed Recommendation.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—The report is now open for general discussion.

Mrs. GÓMÓRI (Representative of the United Nations) — On behalf of the Section on the Status of Women of the United Nations Secretariat, I should like to express our appreciation for the excellent work done by the I.L.O. in the field of the employment of women with family responsibilities.

The question of women workers with family responsibilities is one in which the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women has long been interested. Resolutions on this subject were adopted by the Commission at its eighth, tenth, 12th and 16th sessions.

At its next session, which will be held early in 1966, the Commission will consider a report to be prepared in co-operation with the I.L.O., the W.H.O. and the International Children's Centre on the most important approaches and facilities in assisting employed mothers in child care, namely home-aid services, visiting nurses, creches and day nurseries for children, and all assistance which may be given to working mothers.

I should also like to inform you that at the recent session of the Commission held in March 1965 in Teheran, members of the Commission greatly welcomed the decision of the I.L.O. to include the item on the employment of women with family responsibilities in the agenda of the 1965 Conference. The Commission discussed the conclusions reached by the International Labour Conference in June 1964 on women workers in a changing world and also considered the text of the proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities. It formally expressed its appreciation to the I.L.O. for its work in a resolution. In the same resolution the Commission noted that the text adopted by the Conference in June 1964 as a basis for further consultation of governments called for the introduction of effective measures and facilities, together with adequate social adaptation, to enable women workers with family responsibilities to fulfil their heavy domestic duties alongside their other work, without prejudice to their opportunities for employment and promotion. It also expressed the hope that the I.L.O. would find it possible to report to the Commission at its next session on the work done by the International Labour Conference on this subject and the results accomplished.

During the debate on this item in the Commission, the hope was expressed that such matters as the right to work and to equal pay for equal work might be defined with greater clarity in the final text of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities. It was felt that, since the real problem in women's employment arose in families with small children, efforts should be concentrated on women with family responsibilities rather than on the question of women's employment in general, bearing in mind that it should be possible for both parents to continue working outside the home without lowering the standards of the care of the children. Members of the Commission expressed the hope that special care would be exercised in the drafting of all international instruments not to place female labour in such a special position on the employment market as to make equality of men and women more difficult to ensure.

As the delegates to the Conference know, the terms of reference of the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women are to promote women's rights in all fields—political, civil, social and educational, as well as economic.

An important item currently under consideration by the Commission is the preparation of a draft declaration on the elimination of discrimination against women, which is being drawn up at the request of the United Nations General Assembly in 1963. A first step in drafting the declaration was to consult governments, the specialised agencies, including of course, the I.L.O., and non-governmental organisations on the principles that might be incorporated in such a draft declaration.

The replies received were taken into consideration at the recent 18th Session of the Commission when it prepared a preliminary draft. This includes an article (article 8) on economic and social rights, in which are set forth the measures considered necessary in order to enable women with family responsibilities to achieve full economic equality and the full enjoyment of the right to work. The preliminary draft of the declaration has now been sent to the members of the Commission for further study and will be taken up again when the Commission next meets in 1966.

The Commission on the Status of Women greatly appreciates the help which the I.L.O. gives it in the field of economic rights and opportunities for women and welcomes the close relationship which has developed over many years of co-operation.

In conclusion, I should like to emphasise that I am convinced that the proposed Recommendation which we are going to adopt today will contribute to the advancement of the status of women all over the world.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. JAKUBOWICZ (Government adviser, Poland)—The dynamic increase in the employment of women in a changing world and their growing participation in the economic, political, social and cultural life of their countries have been outstanding confirmation by the work of this Committee. The high level of our discussions and the sense of responsibility which characterised the statements made by delegates from the various countries—of Africa, Asia, Europe and other continents—have been proof of this. Our discussions have shown how right it was for the I.L.O. to place this item—the problem of the employment of women with family responsibilities—on our agenda. We were able to exchange experiences and to work out together the best solutions to avoid the obstacles which prevent the free exercise of a woman's right to work without any discrimination in the field of employment, wages, training or vocational guidance.

The general atmosphere of friendly collaboration and understanding in which our discussions took place was due first and foremost to our Chairman, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, whom I should like to congratulate most warmly on behalf of the Polish delegation. She presided over our discussions with impartiality, culture, patience and feminine charm. It was thanks to the atmosphere of tranquillity and the common desire to reach successful conclusions that our international instrument was so excellently prepared.

There were four changes in the Recommendation which the Polish delegation considers to be of major importance. First of all, in the General Principle a clear formula was introduced indicating the full right of women to work even though they have family responsibilities. It would appear rather astonishing that it was necessary to have a long discussion on this, yet there are countries in Europe where women are automatically dismissed after marriage or where married women who work are required to pay extra taxes. It has also been noted that women's work should be considered not only in the social and economic context but also in the legal context, which seems to be fully justified.

Secondly, it was most satisfactorily stressed that the competent authorities are responsible for the various child-care services, and so on, with that it is sometimes impossible for women to work after the birth of their children.

Thirdly, thanks to the firm stand taken by the Workers' group, the document contains a sufficiently flexible solution to the problem of the possible extension of maternity leave and re-entry into employment after an interruption in employment owing to important reasons connected with maternity.

It may not be possible, of course, for this right to be introduced into the national legislation of certain countries at this stage, but such legislation was envisaged with a view to making it possible for women to reconcile their duties as mothers and workers in the interests of society as a whole. Fourthly, stress was also laid on the importance of public education in order to create public opinion which would contribute to the training and employment of women. Experience has shown that until prejudices concerning the employment of women are eliminated it will be difficult to combat the tendency which exists to consider women as marginal labour in the employment field.

In our opinion the most important improvement was made by the introduction, in accordance with an amendment proposed by the Austrian Government member, of a Paragraph asking the competent authorities to take into account the Employment Policy Convention and Recommendation, 1964, in order to facilitate the integration of women with family responsibilities into the active population of a country. The employment policy must be co-ordinated with economic and social policy in general and with the planning and programming in those countries where these methods are used. Through this the problem of the occupational activity of women with family responsibilities can be handled in a broader context. It is not necessarily just protection against discrimination which women are claiming but their incorporation into the employment policy and the general economic policy of the country with a view to the better utilisation of human resources. I feel that it is regrettable that this basic tenet was not introduced into the section of the instrument entitled "General Principle". We also feel it to be unfortunate that it was not decided to accept the Austrian proposal to modify the structure of the document by putting Section IV, "Entry and Re-entry into Employment", at the beginning of the Recommendation. We feel that this change would have made the text more logical and much more clear.

It is also to be regretted that it was not decided to adopt a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation, which we feel would have given greater weight and effectiveness to the document.

Nevertheless, the Polish delegation is convinced that in spite of these shortcomings the instrument will contribute most effectively to promoting the employment of women, which is part of the historical development of our modern age. The instrument gives directives and guidelines to the competent authorities, who can set goals to be reached in the future, and may be considered as a basis for claims by trade union organisations and women's organisations.

The objective of our Committee was to establish the right to work for women with family responsibilities. Among the 127 members of the Committee the great majority were women. A number of us are mothers of children, therefore we have family responsibilities. And although there are unquestionably a number of points which separate us there is one which unites us all—that is, the determination to work towards the maintenance of peace.

The principles enunciated in the Recommendation can be achieved only in an atmosphere of peaceful co-operation of all countries. I belong to a country which, during the last world war, lost 22 per cent. of its population. Because of this, as a Pole, I feel that I cannot remain silent as regards our great concern because of the wars we see in other continents, which are a threat to the peace of the world. In the summer of 1939 the atmosphere was rather similar to the atmosphere now, and that was the summer which preceded the Second World War. We should not be forgiven if from this rostrum at the International Labour Conference our voice were not raised against the threat of war while there is yet time, before it is too late. At this 49th Session of the International Labour Conference we are fighting for the right of women to work. We women who give life to our children must fight for the right to live for our children and our near and dear ones.

Miss GREEN (Government adviser, United Kingdom)—I should first of all like to pay a tribute to the Chairman and the Officers of the Committee on the excellent way in which they conducted the Committee's discussions, and also to the Director-General's staff who were attached to the Committee. Their combined efforts enabled the Committee to get through its task speedily and in a co-operative and harmonious atmosphere.

I should also like to congratulate Miss Jedidi on her excellent presentation this morning of the Committee’s report.

The problems of working women with family responsibilities are becoming more important in the United Kingdom, and I know we are not alone in this. In my country, increasing numbers of girls, as well as boys, are prolonging their full-time education and beginning their working lives at a later date. Women are marrying and having their families at an earlier age than they used to do. At the same time, industry is becoming increasingly dependent on the contribution of women workers to our productive effort. There are thus wider opportunities for women with family responsibilities to work outside their homes. If, however, they are to take full advantage of these wider opportunities and make their full contribution to the economy, consideration must be given to the problems which arise because of their dual responsibilities, in their homes and at work.

My Government, therefore, welcomes the attention which has been given by the Conference this year and last to these problems. In its discussions, the Committee on Women Workers has had to find practical solutions to a number of difficult points. For example, at last year’s session of the Conference, the United Kingdom adviser expressed doubts, which were shared by other delegates, about the proposals then before the Conference for giving priority on re-engagement to women returning to work after extended maternity leave. In our discussions this year, we have been able to find a solution which takes account both of the claims of these and other workers.

My Government welcomes the flexibility which has been introduced into the Recommendation as a whole. Conditions, the scope of existing services, the additional resources needed to deal with the problem of facilitating the access to employment of women workers with family responsibilities, vary from country to country. Detailed measures to implement the provisions of the proposed Recommendation must be framed in the light of what is practicable and possible in particular national and local contexts.

In the United Kingdom we have very extensive public health and welfare services. This involves heavy demands upon available resources, qualified staff, buildings, and equipment, and for this reason, as I stated in the Committee, my Government cannot at present hold out the prospect of any widespread extension of existing public facilities for child care outside the home. We shall, of course, do our best within the limits imposed by competing demands for the available resources.

We can, nevertheless, readily accept the general principles of this Recommendation. It highlights problems which deserve our attention, and outlines aims to which we can subscribe. Therefore, I have pleasure in supporting the adoption of this report, and at the appropriate time will be supporting the adoption of the proposed Recommendation and the resolution.

Mrs. SEWERIN (Government delegate, Norway)—The fact that the proposed instrument was adopted unanimously by the Committee is, in my opinion, of great value. The expression of certain reservations in the Committee is not surprising, if we remember that this matter has been dealt with by a tripartite committee consisting of representatives from all parts of the world. If we further consider that the view of women’s role in the community differs widely even within individual countries, and often among our closest associates, it is all the more remarkable that our Committee reached a unanimous conclusion. At the same time as expressing my gratitude to the Reporter, Miss Jedidi, for her report, and for the way in which she presented it, I want to pay tribute to our Chairman, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, and to the Vice-Chairmen, Mrs. Weber and Mr. Anderson, for the excellent work they have done.

What has impressed me during my participation in the Committee is that the consensus of opinion was reached in spite of all regional and cultural differences and of differences in economic development. Our discussions in the Committee have given us a deeper understanding of the differences, but they have also, and this is more important, demonstrated what we have in common.

Many nations today are on the threshold of becoming industrialised societies, and the industrially more advanced countries are also in a continuous process of change.

If in this connection I may mention the experience of my own country, Norway, which today may be classified as an industrialised country, it was the generation of our grandparents which had to face the problems of industrialisation, problems which today give rise to so much concern in many countries. It was that generation which left the land to go into factories, when not only the husbands, but also the wives and even the children had to work long hours to earn a livelihood. Since then many women with family responsibilities have worked outside their homes. Neither traditions nor moral standards prevented them from leaving their homes when want and poverty forced them to do so, and their motivation for doing so was their love for and their sense of responsibility to their children.

Members from developing countries with large-scale unemployment have raised the question whether it would not be more appropriate for women to stay at home, leaving available jobs to men. We also were up against the same problem during the period of great unemployment following the economic crisis in the 1930s.

We even discussed the question of prohibiting the employment of married women, but bitter experience has taught us that such a course would be no solution because all working men and women are contributing to national prosperity, and women do want to play an active part in developing their countries and in society as a whole.

The policy of developing employment opportunities, both for men and women, is essential. In this connection I should like to emphasise that an important part of such a policy must be to provide for better education.

I want to stress what has been expressed in paragraph 8 of the Committee's report, that it is necessary to make an effort to arrive at a fairer distribution of family responsibilities and child care between the father and the mother.

In conclusion, I want to associate myself with what the Norwegian Minister of Social Affairs said in his speech to this session of the Conference: "In countries at all stages of development there seems to be a need for greater effort to develop the human resources represented by the female half of the population. Thus women should be given greater opportunities to take part in national development."

I also want to underline what has been said in the Director-General's Report about women workers, i.e. that one of the greatest needs is to redefine their role and status in the world of work, in realistic relation to the changing pattern of employment opportunities of all workers, and that it is necessary to redefine the role and status of women workers in a changing world.

I hope that member States will accept the proposed Recommendation. It points out roads that may be followed. Even if nobody can look into the future, I venture to prophesy that this is not the last time that problems of working women will be dealt with by the International Labour Conference.

Mrs. KEYSERLING (Government adviser, United States)—It is an honour to speak in support of the report of the Committee on Women Workers, the proposed Recommendation and resolution. It is understandable that these texts were unanimously adopted by the Committee, for the Recommendation is based on exceedingly competent preparatory work by the Office, on extensive discussion at meetings of our Committee at the 48th Session, of further analysis by member States, and now on most constructive consideration in our Committee meetings last week. We owe a special debt of gratitude to the Chairman of the Committee, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, whose leadership and skill were especially conducive to thoughtful and harmonious deliberation. We are grateful, too, for the excellent work of our Reporter, Miss Jedidi, and to our competent Vice-Chairmen.

One of the developments in recent years of which we can be most proud is the progress which has been made by women so widely throughout the world in every aspect of national life. While there has been a very great increase in the participation of women in gainful employment in most countries—about a third of the world's labour force is now comprised of women—there is much still to be done to assure the fuller utilisation of skills of women who are economically active, and to assure that women who are both in the labour force and have family responsibilities are not excessively burdened by their dual role, or subject to discrimination, or handicapped by inadequate labour standards. As we work towards these ends, we promote the realisation of the rights and dignity which are the birthright of all workers.

The adoption of the Recommendation before you would contribute significantly to the fulfilment of these objectives. It calls upon us to be cognizant of the problems of women with family responsibilities, to ascertain the magnitude of unmet needs and to take action to meet them.

Particularly must we be sure that adequate education, counselling, vocational training and placement are available to girls as they enter the labour force, as well as to women who re-enter the labour force after a period of absence. Adequate child-care services and facilities should be provided, household tasks should be lightened. Other essential needs should be met if the working mother is effectively to be integrated into the labour market without detriment to the welfare of her family.

We are challenged, too, to adopt new attitudes, new policies, to rise to new situations. Implicit in the reaffirmation of women's right to work and necessary to give it meaning is the commitment to redefine the role and status of women workers in a changing world.

In conclusion, I want to associate myself with what has been expressed in the words of President Lyndon Johnson: "We can waste no talent, we can frustrate no creative power, we can neglect no skill in our search for an open and just and challenging society. There is no place for discrimination of any kind, there must be places for all who can think and create and act."

One subject of great importance to many millions of working women was not included in the Committee's report, although it was discussed at some length both this year and last. This is the matter of part-time employment of women with family responsibilities, which is of growing importance in many parts of the world. While believing, of course, that we must bend every effort to assure full-time work to all people who need and wish it, we should recognise that part-time employment does make possible the utilisation of the training and skills of those who are unable to combine full-time work with family responsibilities. In some countries over one-fourth or more of all women elect to work on a part-time basis, and this is largely in the sub-professions and professions rather than in industry. I should add. It is essential not only to these part-time workers that their wage rates and conditions of employment are not inferior to those of full-time workers, but also to ensure that part-time work does not compete unfairly with full-time employment.

While these principles were widely accepted in the Committee on Women Workers, the decision was reached to recommend a comprehensive analysis of part-time employment as it relates to both men and women, rather than to deal with it in the Committee report. May I urge that this matter be systematically studied, as was agreed upon in a resolution.
adopted last year, and be placed on the agenda of can early session of the Conference.

I urge too the adoption of the resolution presented by the Committee on Women Workers calling for periodic review of the issues before the Committee. I fully express the hope that within the next few years we can meet again to consider the effect of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, and also broaden the discussion to examine means by which we can speedily root out remaining employment inequalities which still are barriers to the realisation of women's aspirations—to consider the change of problems of women workers in a changing world.

I urge you to approve the Committee report, the proposed Recommendation and resolution. They are milestones along the road to women's employment progress which the I.L.O. has done so much to build. To the extent that we can enlarge the contribution of women, both to their families and to their economies, we enhance the quality of life of all our societies.

*Interpretation from French: Mrs. TROIS-GROS (Workers' adviser, France)—As a representative of French women workers, I can only give my full approval to the text of the proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities submitted by the Committee on Women Workers.

As has been stated at this rostrum already, this text is the result of work spanning two years which was particularly intensive at this session of the Conference; the regular and constructive participation of all the members of the Committee—the majority were women—leads me to say that, as far as they were concerned, absenteism, which is so much emphasised, is indeed a legend.

The fact that the text of the proposed Recommendation is now before you has been voted unanimously within the tripartite Committee shows that its contents are objective and that the essential elements mentioned therein will be beneficial to all the women workers of the member countries of the I.L.O. Moreover, the recognition of the right of all to work implies granting to all women who wish it the possibility of exercising this right without discrimination whatsoever, and this is happening at a time when women workers are recognised as being of vital importance to the economy.

The various elements of the Recommendation, which are adequate to ensure that such needs as collective services, domestic appliances, crèches, etc., are met, will provide women workers, particularly those with family responsibilities, with practical solutions, and with assistance available to all and fully compatible with the notion of dignity and freedom of persons and families.

It was, however, regrettable to note in the course of the work of the Committee, that all the rights relating to maternity have not yet met with sufficient understanding and comprehension. In this connection additional guarantees should be given to women workers as regards the carrying out of their work and re-entry into employment. Society is not yet fully conscious of the responsibilities it must assume as regards maternity, which remains the most essential social function.

If maternity will always call for protection and specific rights, women who work do not claim more privileges because they know too well what it involves.

Any new form of protection, any special conditions in the course of work, are not only prejudicial to them personally but, what is more serious, are a threat to women workers as a whole.

Concerted campaigns for part-time work, set in motion for differing reasons which are often, moreover, far removed from family and social interests, have been proving extremely dangerous for women workers because of the emphasis they place upon the relief aspect of such work without providing a solution to the real problem involved.

Women workers therefore refuse to accept sentimental half-measures which would retard the possibilities of improving the working conditions of women workers who wish to have more free time and who aim at the rationalisation of work in the interests of their own health and welfare and of the well-being of the family as a whole. Thus, the rejection of the insertion in the text of the Recommendation of the question of part-time work, by 1,815 votes to 283, will increase women workers' trust in the I.L.O., while being in the interests of all workers. It is, indeed, to the credit of the objectivity of the tripartite Committee that, starting from the thesis that this type of employment is not confined to women in all countries, it decided that it should be examined in a different and broader context.

However, it is the duty of the I.L.O., and in keeping with its mission, to put on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the Conference, as has been requested ever since 1959, the problem of the vocational training of women and girls. This question is of prime importance at a time when the role of women is being discussed in all countries, when their integration on an equal footing is constantly being challenged, when the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), has not been sufficiently widely ratified, or when its application is being put off in countries that have ratified it, when technological developments and new occupational opportunities require greater skills acquired through proper vocational training and retraining accessible to all women.

This is no time for concern with the interests of particular categories of workers. The urgent problem is the need for discussion and formulation of a specific Convention on vocational training for women and girls.

The International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training at Turin, under the auspices of the I.L.O., is to undertake many counselling and advanced training courses. To what extent will women be included in them? I appeal to governments and trade unions which should be concerned with this question, and I would also like to ask the I.L.O.: When the directors of centres—both men and women—discuss counselling and vocational training for women and girls, what will be the doctrine of the Turin Centre if the I.L.O. does not prepare, in the course... of a forthcoming session of the Conference, an international instrument in which—and apart from all the difficulties encountered more and more by women—specific questions, new opportunities and developments regarding skills have been studied and emphasised?

Having read with a good deal of interest the measures taken by the Director-General concerning the structure of the I.L.O., I learnt that the co-ordination of questions relating to women's work was being maintained and that, in view of the terms of reference, the co-ordinating body was to review periodically, in co-operation with the interested organic units, the different aspects of the programmes and activities of the I.L.O. in this field.

In order to do this, it is essential that the preliminary evaluation work be done from the ground up, starting with the women workers.

My organisation, the French Democratic Confederation of Labour, has continued, ever since 1956, to insist for the creation of a tripartite committee on women's work; such a committee is necessary, and it should hold regular meetings, like the Industrial Committees. It is inconceivable that financial considerations should continue to prevent the introduction of the methods sought to deal with the problems of women workers. A meeting of experts at six-year or even greater intervals cannot take the place of such a committee at a time when, in all countries, the progress and employment of women are ever more obvious realities.

Despite this defect, which worries the women workers of my country, the adoption of the Recommendation will show that this session of the Conference has achieved something for them, and it is to be hoped that the instrument will not remain a dead letter.

As far as I am concerned, in the work of the Committee, in which women with family responsibilities have been the object of some solicitude, I would have liked to see—apart from their family responsibilities, which should on the whole be shared with the men—more attention being given to the need for women to have more free time as human beings, for their culture, for the expression of their personalities and to enable them to participate in the economic, social, trade union and political life of their countries.

The world cannot continue to be thought of and led by one-half of humanity alone. Thus, in the fields which are of interest to the International Labour Organisation, we hope that there will be a greater participation of women in all conferences, and we shall not despair of seeing the I.L.O. consider one day that the participation of women in the Governing Body of the I.L.O. is indispensable.

Miss ROYCE (Government adviser, Canada) —I should first like to associate myself with other women who have paid tribute to the competence of our Chairman, our Reporter and to our two Vice-Chairmen. There was in our whole Committee an attitude of co-operation and sincere effort to produce a useful Recommendation, which we hope will be adopted by the Conference.

An impressive increase in the economic activity of Canadian women in recent years makes an international labour Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities particularly relevant to our situation.

We are grateful to the Office for the comprehensive report that opened up the subject of women's work in a changing world and for the initiative of the I.L.O. in proposing the adoption of a Recommendation on this hitherto almost wholly neglected aspect of women's employment.

The text submitted to the Conference in plenary sitting today will, we believe, provide a useful guide for policies and services that will facilitate the constructive development and utilisation of woman-power in the member countries of the International Labour Organisation.

Since occupational competence is the key to effective participation in the labour force, we attach most importance to those provisions of the instrument that underline the need for appropriate counselling, education and training for women who are entering or re-entering the employment market in middle life, and the importance of a realistic approach to the vocational future of the girls still in school. We welcome the emphasis on public information and education, based upon reliable research into essential aspects of women's employment. This type of work is a major preoccupation of the Women's Bureau of our Federal Department of Labour.

With respect to the development of child-care services and facilities, we should greatly have preferred a wording of the text that would have given the competent authorities freedom to choose themselves between the organising of appropriate services, and the alternative of facilitating and encouraging their establishment. We have however a more significant—from our point of view—reservation with respect to the proposed Recommendation, resulting from the omission of any reference to part-time work. The recent increase in the employment of women in Canada, as in a number of other industrialised countries, has been accompanied by an exceptional increase in the number of part-time workers. This we find not surprising, since schedules of hours enable women with family responsibilities, who would be unavailable for full-time work, to enter the labour force.

We fully realise that the subject of part-time work presents special problems from the point of view both of employers and workers and that at the present time it may be relevant to the employment situation in most or even perhaps all of the developing countries. Moreover, we recognise that part-time employment may be of interest to other workers besides those under consideration in this instrument—for instance, older people, students and handicapped persons. Nevertheless, since experience has proven that it may hold particular advantages in relation to the employment of women with family responsibilities, it is with some reluctance that we bow to the majority decision of the Committee on Women Workers that reference to the subject should be omitted from this instrument.

Our chief concern is that since the phenomenon exists and tends to increase, recognition should be given to the need to ensure that the terms and conditions of part-time employment be such as to safeguard the position of both full-time and part-time workers.

We have noted with satisfaction, however, that the whole subject of part-time employment will receive further consideration, in line with the resolution adopted by the Conference last year. Also, we hope that the review of the effects of the Recommendation ten years hence may help to clarify aspects of this question, as of others that have particular relevance to working women with family responsibilities.

Because of the dynamic nature of the development of women's work in a continually changing world, we support wholeheartedly the proposal for periodic review of the effects of the Recommendation, which we hope may be endorsed in this session of the Conference.

Mrs. EKENDAL (Workers' adviser, Sweden)—We are in the midst of the United Nations Development Decade. We have not yet reached, by far, the goals set for this Decade, but one of the most encouraging features of our time seems to me to be that, in most countries, the decisive role of women in economic and social development has been recognised.

The international instrument that we are now about to adopt is one proof of this fact. This Recommendation has given many governments and many labour market organisations an opportunity to go into the actual situation of women, to analyse the difficulties and deficiencies in the present system, and to try and establish priorities and goals for future development.

The Swedish trade union organisation which I represent here has tried, in all modesty, to give high priority to the work of improving the status and opportunities of women. We strive for a society where men and women will have the same freedom of choice between work and family responsibilities. We believe that responsibility for the children and the family is, in general, the same for the man as for the woman. We also believe in and work for a society where women workers will be able to get the same jobs and the same conditions as men.

Of course, this is rather an ideal situation, which we have not yet reached, even in countries like Sweden, where for many years we have been pursuing a full-employment policy, which is certainly the only basis for improving the workers' situation. Without such a policy, implemented by vigorous measures for training, retraining and mobilising the whole labour force, it will be difficult for societies to establish equality between men and women.

It goes without saying that we are very much aware of the fact that many other countries, especially the developing ones, have quite a different situation, both economically, socially and culturally. The instrument now before the Conference is therefore rightly flexible and will permit countries at different stages of development to adjust themselves gradually.

We believe generally in that approach, and we are also very much in support of the idea that the industrialised countries should assist developing areas on a much larger scale, not least in the fields of education and training of women.

What I have just said also leads us to support strongly the resolution which was presented by the Scandinavian Governments in the Committee, namely that the I.L.O. should keep under constant review the status of the Recommendation and general developments, in matters concerning the working life of women. For us this resolution means that the International Labour Organisation will devote an ever-increasing part of its work to the problems which, at present, women workers in particular face but which, in the long run, must become problems for society as a whole.

Interpretation from Russian: Mrs. SMIRNOVA (Government adviser, U.S.S.R.)—Permit me to add my voice to the voices of all those who have expressed gratitude and satisfaction regarding the work done by our Chairman, Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, and our Reporter, Mrs. Jedidi. I should also like to express my gratitude to Mrs. Johnstone and all those who have worked in the unit of which she is the chief.

We were very pleased to meet here representatives of various countries and to discuss the very important problems which are of concern to working women in the society of today.

We think it most timely for the I.L.O. to work out a new international instrument directed towards the protection of the rights of working women. As rightly pointed out in the Director-General's Report, and as has already been pointed out by previous speakers, the present moment is characterised by the growth and speeding up of the process of introducing women into the economy.

If at the beginning of the century the proportion of women in production did not exceed 20 per cent., as an average, in many countries today women make up more than a third, and in the socialist countries 40 to 50 per cent., of the labour force. This is a progressive development, but it must be recognised that the introduction of women into employment gives rise to problems which have not been solved in many countries and are even perhaps becoming more acute.

New difficulties are arising connected with increasing exploitation and discrimination against women on the employment market. The position of the woman worker is harder in the sense that, coming to the factory or the office, she continues to do all her work at home and for the upbringing of her children.

Problems of women's employment give rise to new aspects, and the I.L.O. has quite correctly understood these special problems by bringing to the attention of governments, trade unions and other organisations the need for studying these problems and seeking ways and means of solving them.

Members of the Conference have before them a proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities. As you have been able to see from the draft, a number of problems are handled which concern not only women themselves but the whole of society. The proposed Recommendation deals with the need to create conditions in which women can fully enjoy their hard-won rights, particularly the right to employment. This is a positive factor.

For workers in general, and for working women in particular, the right to employment is most important, for it means the right to guaranteed work and to protection by the State and by society against unemployment; and it is correct that the proposed Recommendation should emphasise the need for action to establish child-care facilities, extended maternity leave in case of need, and aid in the household.

There is no doubt that these provisions will be warmly welcomed by working women. However, we think the Recommendation would be more significant if, in the General Principle, this international instrument were to include a provision calling on governments not only to guarantee by legislation the right to work but also to give effect to this in practice.

In the discussions on the Recommendation, we stressed this side of the question several times. We referred to the need for including in the future orientation of the I.L.O. provisions which would extend the content of the right to work so that it would comprise the right to engagement, to equal pay for equal work, and to protection against unemployment and wrongful dismissal at the initiative of the employer. The Committee had every opportunity to include such a provision at all stages of its work. I am sorry it has not been included because the Director-General's Report states that the future orientation of the I.L.O. must have regard to the need for a practical solution of the problems of women and particularly of working women.

The previous Conventions regarding working women have by no means been ratified by all countries. For instance, the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952, has only been ratified by eight countries, and the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951, has been ratified by only 45 Members. In the Committee it was pointed out that, despite the proclamation by the I.L.O. of the principle of equal pay for equal work, in fact the material position of working women is becoming worse. In a number of countries women have less skilled work and are exploited even more than the male workers. In those countries women have very much less chance of receiving general and technical training, and even these limited opportunities are frequently reduced to nothing, since working women have to bear a very heavy burden. Apart from working a 40 to 48-hour week, she still has all her household chores to do and must take care of the children. The network of nurseries is not sufficiently developed, and thus the problem of implementing women's right to work has not yet been solved.

We considered, therefore, that a solution must be found for this problem that would give the new instrument greater force. That is why we insisted that a Convention was needed, in order to provide the most effective instrument.

From our experience in the U.S.S.R. in solving the problems arising in the field of women's work, we know that much effort and many resources must be devoted to making women's theoretical equality a true factual equality, and to ensuring for women full participation in the life of the community. In our country, women account for nearly 50 per cent. of the labour force. The public system in our country is such as to stimulate the interest of women in participating in social production. It creates conditions where there is no unemployment, and all those who wish to work have the right and the real possibility of getting a job.

Secondly, our State has given women every opportunity of receiving an education, including higher education, and they are able to hold the highest grades. Women farmers have graduated from agricultural institutes, women doctors have graduated from medical schools, women work alongside men as engineers, supervisors and heads of enterprises and of educational institutions, etc. Women account for 38 per cent. of our engineers, 86 per cent. of health workers, 70 per cent. of teachers and 44 per cent. of scientists and research workers.

I should like to emphasise once more that the solution of the problems which are before this Conference will require great efforts not only on the part of women workers, but also on the part of the whole of society. The work of the Committee on Women Workers at this 49th Session has shown that the I.L.O. must tackle such problems bearing in mind the special conditions of each and every country. It is necessary to continue thorough investigations into the position of women workers and to take stronger measures to eradicate discrimination against women in the labour field. From the experience of the work of the Committee on Women Workers at the 48th and 49th Sessions, it has become clear that it is necessary to draw on the international trade unions, women's organisations and social organisations as much as possible in the work of the I.L.O., and to conduct with them on an equal footing the broadest possible consultations on the problem of women's work. It is necessary to study and reflect the opinions expressed by international social organisations in this respect.

We think that the meetings of the I.L.O. Panel of Consultants on the Problems of Women Workers are a good beginning, and it would be useful for the International Labour Organisation to follow up this work in order to raise the level of research work in this field and the content of international instruments. We must recognise that international legislation reflected in the Conventions already adopted does not always correspond to the requirements and problems of women workers at the present stage. Some of the Conventions adopted in the past contain serious omissions and are outdated. Many branches of employment are not covered by the Conventions in spite of the fact that it is precisely in those areas where urgent measures are necessary.

It is important to study questions concerning the influence of technical progress, of mechanisation and automation, on conditions of production, employment, skill and vocational training of women workers; the appearance of new occupational diseases and means of protection in occupations where many women work; law and practice in the dismissal of married women; and conditions of work and social security for women workers, particularly in agriculture and on plantations. Thus an international instrument in the form of a Recom-
The Conference.

The Soviet Government delegation fully support this Recommendation, even though we continue to believe that it would be better if the Committee, following two years' work at the Conference, had been able to submit for your attention not a Recommendation but a Convention.

I would like to express my support for the point made by the representative of the United States who spoke before me and who proposed that we meet in a few years and hear progress reports on the results of the work achieved concerning the proposals contained in the Recommendation. However, I would like to go even a bit further. I would like to say from this rostrum that it is important not only to review the situation after a few years but that, starting with this year, very decisive steps should be taken in order to apply the provisions which are embodied in the proposed Recommendation now before us.

The women workers and others from the International Labour Organisation further efforts in the defence of their rights. They expect the I.L.O. to raise this problem in a broader context on a basis of the deep social and economic changes occurring in the different countries of the world.

Mrs. NELSON-COLE (Government adviser, Nigeria)—I wish to say, first, how proud and honoured I feel to stand before you today to plead the cause of women. I am appealing to you on behalf of African women to vote in favour of this Recommendation. You will, I know, agree with me when I say that it is wrong to deny fellow human beings their rights. The female labour force in the world is steadily growing. That is fact, not fiction; it can no more be stayed than holding back the tides. Men are the ones who can show that they appreciate this by their votes.

Twenty-one years ago a wonderful Scots-woman said to me on the steps of Glasgow University, "Norma, you have been born into a world that has fought for and won women's emancipation"—she had been in prison for her views—but do not take everything for granted. If you see a door left open, help to close it. If you see a door that is shut, open it."

I have never forgotten this and that is why I am standing here before you today trying to open a door, asking you, the men, to put a wrong right.

I would like to say that I am a wife, mother, and a gainfully employed person and I do believe that man is the head of the house. However, I also believe that woman is the heart and that the one cannot function without the other. I am sure you accept this and that giving woman the rights she asks for does not mean she will suddenly turn into an Amazon warrior preparing to go to war. Instead it means that it is acknowledged that she is an integral part of a world labour force receiving her just reward with dignity.

This instrument is flexible and takes into account the diversity of national conditions arising from difference in culture and level of economic development. It can therefore be accepted and implemented easily by all the countries represented here, that is over 100. We are only asking these countries to pursue an appropriate policy with a view to enabling women to work outside their homes without discrimination and to enable women to fulfil the various responsibilities in the home and at work harmoniously.

Once again, I am appealing to all the men here to vote in favour of the proposed Recommendation.

Mrs. JONSSON (Government adviser, Sweden)—In many countries there has been, in recent years, a trend towards making increased use of women workers. In spite of this, even highly industrialised countries with a shortage of manpower report unemployment or under-employment among women. Equal treatment of the two sexes as regards employment is still purely theoretical in most countries. The possibilities for women to work outside their homes are also highly limited by traditional thinking. This traditional point of view can be found among the employers and their representatives, but also to a great extent among the women themselves. Traditional patterns cannot be changed from one day to another. Such changes will take time and must be based on facts and on practical arrangements. The work done in the preparation of the instrument we are now debating has to a certain extent provided us with such facts and suggestions for practical arrangements.

Maybe I am not alone in noticing that the review of the questionnaire from the I.L.O. has compelled authorities and organisations in our countries to take decisions which otherwise would have been postponed.

Another reason for the underemployment of women workers is the lack of positive measures in the field of family policy. The measures proposed in the Recommendation with regard to the child-care services and facilities will certainly be a great help to many countries. In the Committee I have stated that the general attitude in Sweden is that women workers shall not hold a special position on the employment market, either in connection with working conditions or employment possibilities, and that it is preferable not to give them special privileges of any kind. According to our opinion, such privileges would endanger rather than promote rapid development towards real equality of men and women on the employment market. On the other hand, we have been convinced during the discussion in the Committee that special provisions may be necessary in many countries during a transitional period, owing to their tradition and their economic situation. That is why we have not opposed the special provisions, but we notice with satisfaction the unanimous acceptance by the Committee of the resolution concerning periodic review of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, proposed by the Nordic countries.

With regard to the wording of the title of the Recommendation—the Employment (Women with Family Responsibilities) Recommendation, 1965—I notice that the words "Women with Family Responsibilities" have been put... in parentheses. We should like to look upon the view that as long as women are regarded primarily as mothers and brought up as if motherhood were their main task, while men are regarded primarily as breadwinners, we cannot expect women to display the same ambition as men to learn a profession or trade. Nor can we expect that they will be placed on an equal footing men by men on the labour equality in the employment market presupposes equality within the family. We must try to get rid of the traditional view that women only are responsible for the personal care of the family, whereas men only are responsible for the economy of the family. Shorter working days for all workers will give the fathers increased possibilities of sharing the family responsibilities.

When we express our satisfaction with the proposed Recommendation we do so in the hope that the results of the Recommendation will be examined and that the Recommendation will be revised not later than 1975 in accordance with the proposed resolution " to redefine the role and status of women in the world of work in realistic relation to the changing pattern of employment opportunities for all workers ".

It is a difficult task to get unanimous support for an instrument. However, it is even more difficult to apply in practice the provisions set out in the instrument. It would be of great help, therefore, if the I.L.O. would provide member States with information regarding the practical arrangements which have been undertaken in member countries with a view to enabling women to become integrated in the labour force.

Mrs. ASUNI (Employers' adviser, Nigeria)—
This session and last year's session of the Conference have rightly focused attention on the employment of women with family responsbilities—a problem which is by no means new, but one which today is more universal in all its facets than ever before. As a women employer one plays a dual role as a woman and as an employer and one is in a position where it is necessary to co-ordinate one's various sympathies. It is against this background that I would like at this stage to express on behalf of the women Employers of the Employers' Technical Section our deep appreciation of the understanding and cooperation shown by our male colleagues during our deliberations.

We have before us a proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities which, when adopted, will have a far-reaching influence on decisions regarding the employment of women.
This will apply to countries in different stages of development, not only to countries with highly developed and stable economies but equally to our developing countries which are facing innumerable economic problems. In the latter especially it would be a dangerous procedure to create a privileged class of workers as this would adversely affect access to employment. There are many ways of helping women with family responsibilities to enable them to take their place within the labour force. The proposed Recommendation covers this fully in the sections dealing with the question of education and vocational training, child-care services and other provisions.

The Recommendation states very clearly its area of responsibility in a well-defined but flexible manner. It is a document of understanding and a compromise in the best sense of the word employed by World Employment and Government representatives with very different views and values. It is a document which to some of us may fall short of expectations but which happily is adaptable to any stage of economic development and therefore can be of universal application.

It gives me great pleasure to recommend this instrument for the unanimous support of this assembly.

Interpretation from French: Mrs. RADIC-
CANIN (Government adviser, Yugoslavia)—
Although in the form of a Recommendation, the instrument now before the Conference is nevertheless a big step forward both from the point of view of the conditions of working women with family responsibilities and in connection with the place and role of women in society. No one can deny today that the personal and social position of a woman is above all a function of the socially useful work which she does outside the narrow circle of her individual household. Such activity is, in accordance with the present trend of society, guided towards intensifying production and raising the standard of life on the basis of increased productivity. The result is that women's work is fully justified and that one cannot treat it as an expression of the economic need and low standard of life of families with small incomes. On the contrary, it is an objective economic necessity of society.

In the developed countries the policy of intensifying production favours women already in employment, but provided there is balanced development of productive and distributive activities, it also provides new possibilities for the employment of women and for freeing them from their family and household work. In the developing countries, where human resources are part of the fundamental wealth, adequate employment of women can only have a positive effect on the achievement of the development objectives of those countries, as pointed out by the African Regional Conference in 1964.

It was with particular satisfaction that we saw the inclusion in the text of the proposed Recommendation of Section IV, and particularly Paragraph 7, in which it is made clear that the problem of the employment of women with family responsibilities must be solved within the framework of the employment policy of each country and in accordance with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, to enable women to become or to remain integrated in the labour force as well as to re-enter it. We have a positive attitude also as regards the other action for which provision is made in this proposed Recommendation. We regard it as indispensable both from a profoundly humanitarian point of view and from the point of view of the interests of society as a whole.

The report of the Committee contains other opinions and proposals regarding hours of work, and particularly the special privilege of shorter hours for women with family responsibilities. I should like to express some of our ideas on this subject. First of all, we like the reference to reduction of hours of work. Considering this question from an economic point of view in relation to the increase in productivity, and from the social point of view as a way of enabling the workers to participate in the fruit of their labour and as a new possibility for their more complete integration into social life, we are convinced that the question of reduction of hours of work of all workers can be solved only in the framework of general efforts made in this regard in relation to economic conditions.

As regards the shorter working day, we consider that this question has two aspects: on the one hand the protection afforded by society to certain categories of workers such as the disabled, women with very young children, and so on, and on the other hand the objective needs and opportunities for such work in certain occupations and sectors of the economy, according to the organisation and nature of the work in question.

In Yugoslavia shorter working hours are allowed for workers who are disabled as a result of employment injury and for mothers of children under 3 years old, who have the same rights regarding labour relations as full-time workers. Their income is the same as that which they would receive if they worked full time. Furthermore, it is generally possible to work shorter hours in economic sectors and occupations where the nature of the work and the objective needs permit. Decisions to this effect are taken freely by the labour collectivities themselves and are expressed in their general regulations. Persons availing themselves of these possibilities enjoy in the labour collectivities the same rights as other workers, and, if they perform two part-time jobs, enjoy the same rights in respect of their employment relationships as other persons.

We consider, however, that this is a most complex question, and we have no intention of proposing the inclusion of our regulations in international labour standards. We think, nevertheless, that, having regard to the existence of a large number of different forms of part-time work, it would be wise for the I.L.O. to pay particular attention to this problem. It should present the experience obtained hitherto in the most appropriate form and help the member States in the solution of this problem.

I should like to stress that the position of working women clearly cannot be considered separately from the position of workers in general, and the specific problems of working women which result from their functions as wives and mothers cannot be solved without due development of the social redistribution of labour, the improvement of general conditions and standard of life of the workers, and the strengthening of their social role.

The efforts of the authorities and social services in Yugoslavia are directed along these lines, and we should stress that particular efforts are being made by the social services with a view to ensuring proportional participation of women in the management and self-management bodies which directly plan the economic and social programmes of the undertakings, and the allocation and distribution of their income.

We consider that the Recommendation opens the path to further re-examination of the subject with a view to continuous social adaptation, as is expressly stated in the Preamble. There is no doubt that our Organisation should attend to the application of this Recommendation and to the effects of its application in the various countries, as is stressed in the resolution presented by the Nordic countries, which was adopted by the Committee and which we fully support. We consider, however, that it would be just as useful and indeed indispensable, for the questions relating to women's work to be included in I.L.O. programmes, particularly in the field of human resources and conditions of work.

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG MINERS¹:
SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from Spanish : The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—Our business for this afternoon opens with the examination of the first report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.

I would ask the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Tokunboh, and the Reporter, Mr. Pelzl, to come to the rostrum. I call upon Mr. Pelzl to submit the report.

Interpretation from German : Mr. PELZL (Government adviser, Austria; Reporter of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners) — I have the duty and the honour to place before the Conference the reports of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners. This is the fourth item on the agenda of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference.

I have been asked to submit the individual reports one by one, with a view to separate discussion, so I shall now submit the first report only. It covers two instruments, a Convention and a Recommendation, both dealing with the minimum age for admission to underground work in mines. The text has been circulated to delegates.

The whole question of the employment of young persons underground in mines was already on the agenda at the last session of the Conference. The Conclusions reached at that time have in the meantime been sent to governments of member States for approval. On the basis of the discussions and positions taken by governments the Office has worked out proposed texts which our Committee accepted as a basis for the second discussion at this present session.

It was clear from the start that this would be one of the most difficult questions on the agenda of the session this year. Although the objective—that is, maximum protection for young persons working in mines—was fully recognised on all sides, the problem could not be viewed only from the medical standpoint. Due consideration had also to be given to questions of general safety in mining, the need for thorough training of future miners, psychological problems and problems of mining technique. The fact that we were nevertheless able to complete our extensive work in good time is an indication of the thorough and expert work done in the Committee. It would, however, not have been possible to do the job had not our Chairman, Mr. Tokunboh, directed the sittings with great understanding and skill, which carried us over many difficulties to a satisfactory conclusion. Our first thanks are due to him, but our gratitude should also go to the I.L.O. for its careful and comprehensive preparation of the texts. Mr. Evans, the representative of the Secretary-General on the Committee, gave us valuable advice on difficult legal matters, and we are grateful to him and to his staff for the assistance they have given to us.

I must also mention the extremely good and sensible co-operation in the Committee and in the various groups. I believe that this is due to some extent to an old mining tradition. Mining is one of the oldest industries in the world and the men who engage in it, whether employers, underground workers or others, have always carried their own particular stamp. It was early understood that the terrible forces of nature underground could only be met effectively if employers, supervisors and workers all stood side by side in the battle. Safety was therefore one of the chief considerations in mines, centuries before the attention it now so rightly receives was given to it in other industries. We have records of safety regulations in mining which go back nearly 500 years, to the days when in the Tyrol more than 30,000 miners were employed in the silver mines at Schwaz. This tradition of giving priority to safety in mining certainly played its part in the discussions at this session of the Conference.

I should now like to turn to some individual points arising in the discussion.

First of all, the Workers urged that the instrument should apply not only to conventional mining but also to persons employed underground in stone quarries. It was rightly pointed out that underground work of the latter kind, that is in stone quarries, presents similar dangers to those which arise in mining. The proposal was accepted by the other two groups and led to an amendment of the text of all the documents before the Committee.

There was a similar understanding for a request by the Employers that the dangers of work underground should not be unnecessarily stressed in the preambles so as not to frighten young people away from the mining occupation before they even entered it. This also led to an amendment of the texts. However, the dangers of underground mining were in no way neglected during the proceedings. The news of the serious mining disasters which shook the world at the very beginning of our proceedings was the clearest possible evidence of the existence of such dangers, despite the present advanced stage of mining techniques.

The proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines is based on the principle that young persons shall not be employed underground below a certain specific age, and in no case under 16 years. The supplementary Recommendation provides that the age should be gradually raised in the light of the particular possibilities, with 18 years as the goal. After he has passed the minimum age, the young person is to be employed underground only for training purposes and with special safety arrangements. In order to avoid hardship for young persons who may complete their training under present conditions before they reach the intended higher age limit for admission, provision is made for the possibility of exceptions, but, of course, not without the special safety arrangements. With the gradual raising of the minimum age this problem will probably lose its significance in a short time.

The Committee adopted its first report unanimously. The two instruments with which it deals were adopted by a large majority and without any contrary vote. The Conference may conclude that its Committee was convinced of the need to protect young persons in mining. Underground work has always made a serious mining disasters which shook the world at the very beginning of our proceedings was the clearest possible evidence of the existence of such dangers, despite the present advanced stage of mining techniques.

Mr. Tokunboh. If our work has been successful, we owe it in large part to him. Our appreciation also goes to Mr. Jones, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, to the Reporters of our Committee, Mr. Polzl, and to Mr. Evans and his staff.

Last year, the majority of the Employers abstained on the Conclusions which the Committee arrived at regarding the minimum age of admission to employment in underground work in mines. I am glad to inform you today that that same majority will vote in favour of the proposed Convention and Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground. It was a minority supported by the Workers' group which maintained that the proposed age of 15 for admission would not be uniform for all the States of the Union.

The instruments before us are far from perfect. A greater degree of flexibility which would have permitted a transition period for those countries where the school-leaving age is still fixed at 15 would certainly have ensured more ratifications. Nevertheless, in the light of the developments which will occur in this field in the coming years the majority of the Employers can accept the minimum age being fixed at 16.

Last year, we expressed certain doubts concerning the desirability of an international instrument laying down different standards for different countries. In other words, the obligation will not be uniform for all the States ratifying the Convention. We further pointed out that to leave it for each country to raise the minimum age at the time of ratification represented a procedure likely to create confusion whenever an attempt was made to determine what the actual international standard was in this regard. The majority of the Committee did not see fit to modify its attitude in this matter, but we still think it was wrong. Our support for this proposed Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention must not be interpreted as acceptance of this new procedure, and we shall ask the Governing Body of the I.L.O. to examine this problem, which is sure to arise in connection with other international instruments.

As Employers, we are glad to note that the Committee as a whole realised that it no longer made sense to stress the dangers to life and health inherent in underground work in mines. Of course, that work does have certain features all its own, but this does not mean that the progress accomplished in this field should be ignored. We think that the conclusions are couched in a positive spirit which is more in keeping with today's conditions.

The Committee was also able to resolve a considerable difficulty facing employers. Last year's text specified that employers should keep registers which would be available to government inspectors and to workers' representatives. We opposed this text because it called in question the integrity of the inspection service, the operation of which, we considered, should not be supervised by workers' representatives. This difficulty conditioned our attitude towards the draft Convention as a whole. A compromise has now been achieved which fully satisfies all three groups, and we wish to express our satisfaction on this account.

Thus, the great majority of us will be able to support the draft Convention, and the same goes for the draft Recommendation. Last year we pointed out that the Conclusions which the Committee had arrived at lacked realism, and again a reasonable compromise has been achieved. As a result, young people under 18 who have completed their apprenticeship or any other systematic course of vocational training will be able, under the conditions to be prescribed by the competent authority covering place of work, permitted occupations, regular medical examinations and safety measures, to be employed underground for other purposes.

We also believe the provision concerning consultation of the most representative organisations of employers and workers to be of considerable importance. A greater degree of flexibility which would have permitted a differentiation of the obligations concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground, in countries where the school-leaving age is still fixed at 15 would certainly have ensured more ratifications. It now provides for these organisations to be consulted not only in the determination of general principles but also prior to the adoption of any regulations aimed at giving effect to the proposed Recommendation.

The majority of the Employers will therefore vote in favour of the Recommendation supplementary to the Convention.

We believe that both these instruments will contribute towards protecting young workers employed underground.

The realism and flexibility which characterises them, and the clarifications concerning them which are contained in the report, will facilitate their observance in countries where the standards are lower than those which these instruments lay down.

Mr. JONES (Workers' adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners) — On behalf of the Workers' group, I want to ask for the unanimous endorsement by this Conference of this report, embracing as it does two proposed instruments: a Convention and a Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines.

May I say that 55 years ago I was called to work underground at the age of 14. In the intervening years we have made very little progress towards raising the age of admission of young people to work underground. It is almost three decades since we got the Convention which provided for admission to employment of this description at 15 years of age. It is right and proper, therefore, that we should take early steps to ensure that the minimum age is raised to 16 years in accordance with the terms of the proposed Convention.

I should like to say that I have never been in a Committee where I felt that we were making such good progress. Sometimes the Workers' group were able to get the support of both Governments and Employers, and very often we were sufficiently successful in getting support, even when the Employers were in opposition, to obtain substantial majorities. But the atmosphere and attitude in the Committee took a remarkable and romantic turn under the chairmanship of Mr. Tokunboh.

I have seen conciliation at work when collective bargaining has been taking place over a long process of time. I have seen conciliation effectively taking place in this Committee which has enabled us to secure the sort of support for these two instruments that the Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Employers' side, Mr. Després, has made reference to. We had the position where the Workers... were saying that there must be tripartite examination of records of these young people after they had been engaged; that we must know something about the date at which they had started employment underground. The Employers argued that there could be no searching of records. The matter was put to a vote. We won by a two-to-one majority and the thing was settled, but the opposition of the Employers remained. It was at this stage that we had the remarkable spectacle of the Chairman of the Committee saying that we could not have this rent in the garment that we were seeking to weave. We not only wanted a Convention and a Recommendation accepted by this 49th Session; we wanted governments and nations to ratify these instruments. In consequence of the intervention of Mr. Tokunboh we reached agreement whereby the opposition was removed and as a result, I think the workers are in as good a position at the mine as they would have been had they obtained the original text that was sought.

It would be fitting, therefore, at this particular stage, for me to pay my tribute on behalf of the Workers' group, as Mr. Després has paid his tribute, to the very, very excellent and high-minded handling of the work of the Committee by the Chairman. This work of conciliation was going on all the time. There were other occasions when there had to be conciliation and, generally speaking, a very hard-working, efficient Chairman displayed the virtue of the patience of Job, and we are grateful. We would also like to pay our tribute to the staff of the Office for their excellent help. We are grateful to Mr. Pelzi for the way in which he interested himself in the work of the Committee not only so as to get the best possible results from the work of the Committee but also so as to present in the clearest way the sort of decisions that we had reached. I think we have been very well served in these particular fields.

The terms of the proposed Recommendation provide for the age to be speedily raised where young men are in the mines under the age of 16. It also makes provision for the progressive raising of the age to 18 years. The years between 16 and 18 are to be spent in apprenticeship and systematic vocational training under approved conditions, with the highest degree of medical and safety supervision. Where training has been completed it is agreed that young persons shall be allowed to work in certain types of employment. The Workers were very concerned about the types of employment young persons should be engaged in underground. We were concerned that these young people should not work where there were hazards to safety and health. We also realised that we must be careful not to put them in jobs of responsibility that might affect the safety of others. This was a difficult matter about which to set out details, but I am very happy to say that we were able to deal with this question of the jobs concerned.

Finally, after a long discussion, we secured a text indicating that the minimum age laid down for any of the jobs we were considering must be sufficiently high to enable safety and health to be safeguarded and the well-being of everybody else employed underground in the vicinity of these young people to be maintained, and in no case must it be under 16.

I shall come to this rostrum again in connection with the presentation of our other reports. For the moment I want to claim that the proposed Convention and Recommendation are two excellent instruments worthy of the support of the whole Conference, instruments which I believe future generations of young miners are going to bless the I.L.O. for producing. I support them.
be sufficient to leave this change of the minimum age according to the national circumstances in the hands of each member State according to subparagraph (1) of Paragraph 3 of the proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, which suggests that the minimum age should be progressively raised, with a view to attaining a minimum age of 18 years.

Secondly, it is to be noted that the proposed Convention will create practical difficulties of application even in advanced countries, and perhaps even more in the developing countries, unless the school-leaving age is raised above 15 years, which I believe is common in the majority of the developed nations. I have considerable doubts as to how many member States could really ratify the proposed Convention and honestly apply it without fear of recruitment and training difficulties because there exists a gap of at least one to three years between the school-leaving age and the age of employment of young persons in underground work in mines.

Thirdly, I am in principle against the adoption of any new Convention, at least for the time being, as I declared from this rostrum in my speech on the Director-General's Report. With these reasons in mind and taking into consideration also the importance and the seriousness of the problem at issue, I am going, not to vote against, but simply to abstain from voting on this proposed Convention and, furthermore, to vote in favour of the proposed Recommendation.

Mr. DRAPER (Government adviser, United Kingdom)—The United Kingdom Government supports the adoption of this proposed Convention and Recommendation. We also support the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines and the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, which this Conference will be considering later today. In our view they would provide a valuable addition to the international labour standards adopted by this Organisation for the protection of young workers.

I should make it clear, however, that my Government will not be able in the immediate future to implement Article 2 of the proposed Convention, which lays down a minimum age of not less than 16 for underground work in mines. At present work underground under this age is allowed in the United Kingdom, but only for training purposes and under proper supervision. However, our practice will be brought into conformity with this requirement of the Convention when our minimum school-leaving age is raised to 16. As this is the objective towards which we are working, this point need not affect our attitude to the Convention as a whole.

The United Kingdom Government delegation has pleasure in supporting the adoption of this provision, at the appropriate time, will support the adoption of these instruments.

In closing, may I add my tribute to the tireless efforts of our Chairman, Mr. Tokunbo, in guiding us so ably through our work and in enabling all three groups to reach agreement on practically every point. To our Reporter, Mr. Pelzl, the Drafting Committee, our secretaries, Mr. Evans, and all his staff—not forgetting the interpreters, without whom we would all have been lost—go our grateful thanks for the great part they played in helping us to reach a successful conclusion.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. POIDA (Workers' adviser, Ukraine)—The Conference now has before it the first report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners. This report and the statements we have heard so far show the work that has been done in drawing up international instruments regulating the employment of young persons carrying out work which may endanger their health. The inclusion of this subject on the agenda of the Conference is, I think, a positive step. The adoption of the texts of the Convention and Recommendation prepared by the Committee will certainly help to increase the attention paid by governments and public organisations to protecting the health of young workers and safeguarding their normal physical development.

At the same time, in our view, the proposed Convention and Recommendation would have been even more valuable if the final text had included a number of provisions which were proposed, and which were very actively discussed in the course of the Committee's work. I should have to draw the attention of delegates in particular to Article 2, paragraph 3, of the proposed Convention, which states that the minimum age shall in no case be less than 16 years. Nobody objected to this provision, although in a number of countries, including the Ukrainian S.S.R., the proposed standard has long since been exceeded; but anybody who knows the work that is done in mines knows that the degree of complexity varies in underground work, and that conditions vary from one place to another.

Shot firing, for example, is very complicated and responsible work; an unskilled person may threaten not only his own safety but that of others besides. In this connection it was proposed to add a provision to the effect that no person aged under 18 should be admitted to particularly dangerous or unhealthy occupations to be determined by national legislation.

Unfortunately, this concrete and very valuable provision was not adopted, although it is obvious that no employer or manager of a mine would allow a 16-year-old youth to perform shot-firing operations, because he would not want the undertaking to be subject to the risk of accident.

In the discussion of the proposed Recommendation this provision was not corrected either. In Paragraph 4 it is stated that persons aged under 18 should be employed or work underground in mines only for purposes of vocational training provided and under conditions relating to the places of work and occupations permitted, subject to proper supervision.

Consequently, employment of young persons for purposes other than vocational training is only allowed from 18 years upwards. At the same time, Paragraph 5 also sets the minimum age at 18 years in particularly dangerous and harmful jobs and conditions.

Thus, no guarantee is really provided for young persons working in particularly dangerous or harmful jobs as compared with those employed underground under normal conditions. The Committee did not accept the proposal that the draft Recommendation should raise the minimum age for particularly harmful or dangerous occupations to at least 20 years, although many members were strongly in favour of so doing.

I do not intend to analyse in greater detail the strong and the weak points of the instruments submitted to the plenary Conference. The desire to be objective prompted me to refer to these particularly important questions, a proper solution of which would in our view have made these instruments even more complete, and valuable, in view of the importance of their protecting these young people working underground in mines. In view of the fact that as a whole the work of the Committee improved the original texts from the point of view of protecting young miners, and that these instruments will certainly be useful in many respects, the Workers' delegation of the Ukraine will vote in favour of adopting these instruments. We shall also support the proposed Convention concerning medical examination and the Recommendation concerning conditions of employment.

Finally, I would like to express the hope that the first steps by the I.L.O. in working out international standards for protecting the rights, health and work of young workers will be a good basis for further action in applying them in practice.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I have no more speakers on my list and the discussion of this first report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners is closed. If I understood correctly, the report was adopted unanimously by the Committee and I should like to ask if there are any objections to its adoption by the Conference. If there are no objections, may I take it the report is adopted?

PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING THE MINIMUM AGE FOR ADMISSION TO EMPLOYMENT UNDERGROUND IN MINES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG MINERS:

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—We now turn to the proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines. The Preamble is before us for consideration.

I shall consider Paragraphs 1 to 7 as adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—We will now take the proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines. First, the Preamble. If there are no objections, I shall consider it adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I shall now put the proposed Convention, Article by Article. If there are no objections, I shall consider them adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—Now we turn to the proposed Convention as a whole. If there are no objections, I shall consider the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation will be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for preparation of the final text with a view to the final record vote.

SECOND REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG MINERS:

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—Now we... come to the second report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners. I ask the Reporter, Mr. Pelzl, to submit the report.

Mr. MITCHELL (Employers' adviser, United Kingdom) — On behalf of the Employers' group, I should like to explain the attitude of the Employers towards the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines. I must say at the outset that most of the Employers would have preferred a Recommendation to a Convention. We were very happy to start this year, and this year again we had to stress why we felt that a Recommendation would have been more appropriate.

There were two particular factors which influenced the Employers' group in taking this view. One is that industrial medicine is a comparatively new branch of medicine; it is an evolving branch of medicine, it is a branch in which new discoveries are being made, and new techniques and new methods of looking after the health of workers in their working environment are constantly taking place. We felt, therefore, that it was unfortunate and that it was a wrong approach to try at such an early stage to consolidate in detail in a Convention precisely how the doctors working in mines, looking after the health of young workers in the mines, should carry out their medical supervision.

The other reason why we felt that a Recommendation would have been preferable to a Convention is that the working environment is being more closely controlled as a result of developments in dust control. For example, the dangers of pneumoconiosis are becoming less. Therefore the working environment is not fixed; that too is being changed for the better.

For these reasons we would have preferred a Recommendation but, in the interests of getting on with the job and having regard to the views of our Government and our Worker colleagues, we agreed to get down to the task of trying to formulate an international instrument in the form of a Convention which would not embody too much rigidity and the dangers that we feared might result from such rigidity.

I am happy, on behalf of the Employers' group, to say that we feel that the group as a whole succeeded in doing this. I must pay very great tribute to our Chairman, Mr. Tokunboh, who was really responsible for bringing the different elements together and for enabling the vote in the end to be very nearly unanimous; with nobody against it and only a few persons abstaining.

I should like to pay tribute to Mr. Pelzl, our Reporter, to Mr. Evans and the Office staff, without whose very special efforts we should not have been able to reach this agreement, and I must pay tribute particularly, I think, to my very old friend and colleague, Mr. Jones, who led the Workers. I can reiterate what he said: that the spirit in this Committee was really admirable, and we have ended up with a proposed Convention. I think I can say that we have unexpectedly ended up with a proposed Convention because it is a much better result than some of us expected when we started our work. It is a Convention which most Employers can vote in favour of. Some Employers... will abstain; they will abstain because of the point of principle that I mentioned at the outset, i.e. because they feel that this is not an appropriate type of instrument. But apart from those abstentions on principle, most Employers will be able to give this Convention their support and will be able to vote for it. I hope that governments too will very quickly ratify it. I am sure that our Chairman must really be very proud that in getting this very great measure of support for a document which did not have much support before its notable achievements in the field of conciliation.

Mr. JONES (Workers’ adviser, United Kingdom; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners)—I suppose I ought to apologise to the President for wearing the carpet out between that seat there and this rostrum, but it is my responsibility to do this job that I am doing and, having regard to the success of the work that we have achieved in this Committee, I am deriving a great deal of pleasure from it.

First, let me thank the group in the Committee of whom I thought increasingly 12 months ago that there was little hope of their achieving the great maturity that they have developed, particularly during the course of the activities over the past 18 or 20 odd months. I thank them first of all for withdrawing the amendment which sought to make this proposed Convention that we are considering now a Recommendation. It would have been a terrible mistake had they pursued that amendment; they were gracious and sensible and I applaud and congratulate them on their action.

The Employers would have liked to have hung their hat, for the principle of this Convention, upon the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946. That Convention makes provision for medical examination to the age of 18. Substantially, the Committee was in favour of bringing the examination up to the age of 21, and if delegates will look at the original of this text they will note that in Article 2 the provision was for an initial examination and thereafter for an annual medical examination up to the age of 21. There was a good deal of heat generated and there was a good deal of argument about this matter; in this connection the Government group substantially supported the Workers’ group. We reached a position where the Workers had won the day. But again, we had great help from their Chairman in trying to bridge this gap a second time and, in consequence, without weakening the Article at all, we put a second paragraph in addition to paragraph 1 of Article 2, which made it possible, in any country where the employers’ representatives and the workers’ representatives agreed—having taken into account all the medical advice available to them—that there was no necessity for the examination, for it to be set aside under those circumstances.

So, whilst this Article has been amended with provision for an outlet, the workers’ representatives in any country, if they disagree with the employers’ representatives, can demand that there be a medical examination. With this proposal from the Chairman, enabling such a situation to be secured, we should have been extremely foolish to have remained at variance with the employers, and I am very glad indeed that Article 2 now has the unanimous support of the Committee.

We had anxious discussions on the question of X-ray examinations of young entrants during the first four or five years of their period in the mines. Finally, it was agreed that where a young person went into a mine he would have an X-ray examination in association with the first medical examination and on every other occasion if, in the opinion of the medical representative, there ought to be an X-ray examination. In this way we believe that we have been able to build up a Convention for medical examination which ought to safeguard the well-being of young persons on entering the coal-mining profession. This is a hard and hazardous industry; it is becoming increasingly difficult to recruit young persons into the industry. This proposed Convention seeks to help and to maintain their health and their physical well-being, and on behalf of the Workers’ group I support it.

Interpretation from Spanish: The President (Mr. Sánchez Madariaga)—As I have no other speakers on my list, the discussion is closed. If there are no objections, I take it that the report is adopted.

Proposed Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners:

Adoption

Interpretation from Spanish: The President (Mr. Sánchez Madariaga)—We proceed to the text of the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines.

First, I will put the Preamble. As there are no objections, I take it that the Preamble is adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The President (Mr. Sánchez Madariaga)—I will now put the proposed Convention, Article by Article. If there are no objections, I shall consider them as adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The President (Mr. Sánchez Madariaga)—A vote by show of hands has been requested on Article 4. Is there a seconder to this motion? I see that it is seconded. Therefore, we shall vote by show of hands.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. Article 4 is adopted by 230 votes in favour, none against, with 11 abstentions.)

come to Article 5 of the proposed Convention. As there are no objections, I take it that Article 5 is adopted.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—Now we take the proposed Convention as a whole.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. The proposed Convention as a whole is adopted by 250 votes in favour, none against, with 11 abstentions.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, the proposed Convention will now be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for preparation of the final text, with a view to the final record vote.

THIRD REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG MINERS:

SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—We now come to the third report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners. I again ask Mr. Pelzl, Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from German: Mr. PELZL (Government adviser, Austria; Reporter of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners)—May I now submit to the Conference the third report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.

This relates to a proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines and a resolution concerning the employment of young persons on surface work in mines and quarries, which the Committee worked out and adopted at the close of its proceedings. The texts have been circulated to delegates.

The main sections of the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines are Section III, "Health, Safety and Welfare," Section IV, "Weekly Rest and Annual Holidays with Pay," and Section V, "Training."

It also contains provisions on methods of implementation and consultation of the most representative employers’ and workers’ organisations.

In the discussion of this Recommendation considerable difficulty was caused by the different stages of development of social legislation in the various countries, so that in some cases it was not possible to find common ground in the Committee as had been done on the instruments regarding which I have already reported.

In accordance with an amendment proposed by the Workers, the recommended length of the annual paid holiday, which was to have been 18 days (that is three working weeks) according to the original text, was increased to 24 days (four working weeks).

However, the Committee did not endorse another Workers’ proposal to extend the weekly rest period for young workers from 36 to 48 hours. The main objection to this was that the 48-hour rest period implied establishment of the five-day week, which has not yet been introduced in many countries.

In accordance with the proposal of several Government delegates the text was adjusted to express more clearly that greater attention should be given to the prevention or elimination of dangerous influences underground and to care for health. Other alterations in the text dealt with safety clothing and equipment, which must be provided free of charge by the employer on the engagement of the worker, and must be replaced after normal wear and tear. I refer members of the Conference to the text of the report for particulars of the discussion on these matters in which, as in other respects, the belief that young workers must have sufficient protection in their hard work underground was expressed on all sides of the Committee.

The text of the proposed Recommendation contains the most important provisions regarding the conditions of employment of young workers underground. The Committee adopted it in its present form by 1,085 votes in favour, none against, with 600 abstentions.

The resolution finally refers to the dangers for all young workers of surface work in mines and quarries, and asks that this question be studied and placed on the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

I request the Conference to adopt the third report of our Committee and the instruments to which it relates.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—The report is open for discussion.

Interpretation from German: Mr. GOEBEL (Employers’ adviser, Federal Republic of Germany)—On behalf of the free Employers, I should like to say a few words about Section IV of the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, dealing with weekly rest and annual holidays with pay.

Unfortunately, we do not agree with all the provisions included in this part. We greatly admire the skill and friendliness of the Chairman of the Committee, and due credit has already been paid to him. Nevertheless, for this particular part, we did not succeed in finding a text that was satisfactory to all parties including the Employers. Our doubts arise mainly, if not entirely, on paragraphs 8 and 11 of Section IV, which cannot be accepted by the majority of my colleagues. Since last year, a change has been made in this part which gives rise to numerous difficulties in many countries. Many of my colleagues consider that they have grounds for opposing the text not only because it would raise difficulties in their own countries but because too strict provisions would constitute an obstacle to the universal acceptance and application of the Recommendation.

Most of the free Employers will abstain on this point, but they appreciate the friendly spirit which was always evident in the Committee’s discussions. Everybody made a genuine effort to reach agreement, and I should... just like to confine myself to saying that we, as a majority, were not in favour of this point.

If Mr. Jones speaks after me for a third time, I would beg him to be lenient and to try to understand our attitude. It would be a pity if a shadow were to be cast across the excellent relationships that have existed between the Workers and the Employers in our Committee meetings. I have a great respect for Mr. Jones and I would be upset if such a shadow were to be cast.

Interpretation from French: Mr. DESPRÉS (Employers' adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners)—In the Committee, the overwhelming majority of the Employers' members opposed the Committee's competence to adopt a resolution dealing with a matter which did not fall within the scope of a Conference agenda item, that is to say the employment of young persons in underground work in mines of all kinds. The resolution now before us refers to the employment of young persons on surface work in mines and quarries, and not underground work.

When it was consulted on the point the Office stated that the Committee could submit to the Conference resolutions relating only to the matters referred to it. But it was largely left to the discretion of the Committee itself to decide what came within its purview. A majority considered there was a close link between the subject of this resolution and the terms of reference of the Committee in view of the relationship between the employment of young people in mines above ground and underground.

At the time of voting, the majority of the Employers' members said that they would abstain because the Committee was not competent to express a view on this question which was not on the Conference agenda. After consultation the majority of Employers' members have decided to vote against the resolution which, they consider, does not fall within the competence of the Committee and should not be adopted by the Conference in its present form. This resolution should have been submitted to the Resolutions Committee for discussion within the time limits provided under Standing Orders. We shall therefore vote against the resolution, for the reasons I have indicated.

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I have no further remarks on my list and accordingly I consider the discussion closed on this item.

If there are no objections, I consider the Preamble adopted.

(The Preamble is adopted.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I will now put the proposed Recommendation, section by section. If there are no objections, I shall consider them as adopted.

(Sections I to III are adopted seriatim.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—It has been intimated that there are objections to Section IV, Weekly Rest and Annual Holidays with Pay, and we will therefore vote on this section by show of hands.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. Section IV is adopted by 199 votes, in favour, 6 against, with 47 abstentions.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I now put Sections V and VI. If there are no objections, I shall consider them as adopted.

(Sections V and VI are adopted.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—We shall now take the proposed Recommendation as a whole.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. The proposed Recommendation as a whole is adopted by 209 votes in favour, none against, with 46 abstentions.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—In accordance with article 40, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders, the text will now be referred to the Drafting Committee of the Conference for preparation of the final text with a view to the final record vote.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PERSONS ON SURFACE WORK IN MINES AND QUARRIES, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG MINERS:

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—I will now put the resolution concerning the employment of young persons on surface work in mines and quarries. The vote will be by show of hands.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. The resolution is adopted by 212 votes in favour, 33 against, with 15 abstentions.)

Interpretation from Spanish: The PRESIDENT (Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA)—Having completed this agenda item, I wish to express our gratitude to the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee and also to the members of the I.L.O. secretariat and all those who contributed to the happy outcome of this important task.

1 See Appendix VI, p. 637 and Appendix XII, p. 697.
The PRESIDENT—Before I take up the agenda of the morning session, I should like to thank Mr. Sánchez Madariaga for presiding over the plenary meeting yesterday. I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to express my sincere appreciation of the assistance which my colleagues, Mr. Gurinovich, Mr. Andriantsitohaina and Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, the Vice-Presidents of the Conference, have given in the discharge of my own duties and in conducting their duties so ably in their respective turns.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON CO-OPERATIVES

The PRESIDENT—The first item on the agenda is the report of the Committee on Co-operatives.

I invite the Chairman, Mr. Wahid, and the Reporter of the Committee, Mr. Mathsson, to come to the rostrum.

Mr. Mathsson will submit the report.

Mr. MATHSSON (Government adviser, Sweden; Reporter of the Committee on Co-operatives) —I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Committee on Co-operatives, which has been circulated to delegates. In doing so, I wish to comment briefly upon the work done by our Committee.

The co-operative movement has long been of interest to the International Labour Organisation. In fact, the Organisation has included co-operation among its various activities ever since the early twenties. I need only recall to the memory of delegates the name of Albert Thomas, known and respected to co-operators all over the world.

For the first time, however, co-operation has been included this year on the agenda of the International Labour Conference. This step has been welcomed by co-operative movements everywhere, as a reflection of the importance of co-operative action, particularly as regards the efforts to establish a more equitable social and economic order in the developing countries.

The role which the co-operatives can play, and to a considerable extent already play, in the developing countries is almost universally recognised. The co-operative movement is increasingly being accepted as one of the important tools in the efforts to achieve economic and social development. This recognition has been evident throughout the work of our Committee, which has been characterised by a remarkable degree of unanimity. All the parties represented have been in complete agreement as to the constructive role to be played by co-operatives in a number of different fields of economic activity.

The exchange of views that took place in the Committee was consequently far more concerned with methods and approaches than with the whys and wherefores of co-operation. It is an indication of the spirit within the Committee that, in spite of the fact that we had some 90 amendments to the proposed text to consider, voting was necessary on two occasions only. The fact that there is already in the developing countries a great deal of practical experience of the co-operative movement naturally helped to establish this constructive atmosphere. Practical knowledge of co-operation, of co-operative problems and of the avenues to their solution, contributed significantly to the expeditious manner in which the Committee's work was executed.

Allow me to outline a few of the areas discussed by the Committee and included in the Proposed Conclusions now submitted for the consideration of this Conference.

Broadly speaking, the Committee discussed the essential features which should find expression in a conscious policy to encourage the further growth of the co-operative movement in developing countries. The Committee thus discussed the question of legislation in the field of co-operation, the problems of education and training, the subject of administrative aid, supervision and financial aid to co-operatives, and the field of and the opportunities for further international collaboration to promote co-operatives.

In this connection the Committee arrived at several important conclusions. I wish to mention in particular the strong reaffirmation by the Committee of the fact that co-operatives can play their role in the community only where their fundamental characteristics—that is, voluntariness, independence and democratic management and administration with the active participation of the members of the co-operative societies—are upheld.

Furthermore, and as a result of this, the
The Committee firmly agrees that outside aid to co-operatives must be so conceived as neither to jeopardise their autonomy and independence nor to accord them an unfairly privileged position in comparison with other forms of enterprise. On the other hand, the Committee emphasised that there should be no unfair restrictions which would tend to diminish the potential contributions which co-operatives could make to economic and social progress.

In our view we have tried to establish a basis for the further discussions on the subject which will take place between now and next year's Conference. We have, I am convinced, arrived at agreement on the contents. What remains, I feel sure, are minor differences of detail. It is my considered opinion that if the Conference adopts our resolution to place on the agenda for next year's session of the International Labour Conference the subject of co-operatives with a view to adopting a Recommendation, the results from this first series of deliberations will provide useful material for that second session.

My task here would not be complete if I did not extend, on my own behalf and on behalf of the entire Committee, our thanks to our distinguished Chairman, Mr. Wahid, for his skilful and impartial guidance of our work. I wish to thank the two Vice-Chairmen of our Committee, Mr. Kane of the Workers' group and Mr. Rifaat of the Employers' group, for their untiring efforts and for their constructive contributions to the work of the Committee.

To my colleagues in the Drafting Committee I extend my sincere gratitude and, on behalf of the Committee as a whole, I extend our thanks to the Secretariat for their tireless work, as well as to the authors of the original text, which has served so well as the basis for our deliberations. I should like to mention in that connection that the Committee has been fortunate in having the advice and guidance of one of the authors of the original text, Mr. Colombain, and the Committee, through me, wishes to thank him most sincerely for his help.

I now submit this report to the Conference for adoption.

The PRESIDENT—The report is now before the Conference for general discussion.

Interpretation from French: Mr. WAHID (Government delegate, Lebanon; Chairman of the Committee on Co-operatives)—Now that our work is concluded, it is important, I feel, to emphasise the atmosphere which has characterised our discussions. The nature of the subject itself created this atmosphere. In speaking of co-operation, it was natural for us to implement this principle in our work, and this spirit of co-operation was set by the two Vice-Chairmen of the Committee, Mr. Kane and Mr. Rifaat, who set the example that the Committee has been fortunate in having the advice and guidance of one of the authors of the original text, Mr. Colombain, and the Committee, through me, wishes to thank him most sincerely for his help.

I now submit this report to the Conference for adoption.

The work of the Committee was made much simpler, and the outcome more fruitful, by the useful documents prepared by the Secretariat, whose members have shown untiring efforts throughout our deliberations. Mr. Orizet and his collaborators are to be congratulated on the excellent job which they have performed, and I am privileged to acknowledge this publicly.

Mr. RIFAAT (Employers' delegate, United Arab Republic; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Co-operatives)—On behalf of the Employers' members, I have great pleasure in warmly recommending for adoption by the Conference the unanimous report of the Committee on Co-operatives.

Mr. Mathsson, our gifted Reporter, has made my task extremely light by his able introductory covering the substance of the report. In making my recommendation on behalf of the Employers, I crave your indulgence, in allowing me to pay well-earned tributes to those who, by word, thought or deed, have contributed to the success which the Committee has achieved. Understandably, I can name but a few, and I am afraid the rest must remain anonymous. The truth of the matter is that the report before you is more the result of team work and discipline than of an individual contribution.

The Chairman of the Committee has briefly and yet eloquently described the atmosphere which prevailed. The setting was excellent and the climate was really favourable, and confidence and trust permeated all our deliberations. Firstly, there was the happy choice of Mr. Wahid as Chairman. He provided us with leadership which was pleasant, wise, patient, and yet very fair and understanding. From the very start he captured our affection as well as our confidence.

Also, Mr. Kane, the Workers' Vice-Chairman, was a tower of strength in the Committee. His eloquence was only matched by his clear perception of the principles. He had a quiet manner and also understanding. Although he sat opposite to me, I often felt as if we were sitting side by side. When I was invited to state the views of the Employers first, he would say that he endorsed those views on behalf of the Workers; equally often, I found it my pleasant task to reciprocate the sentiment and say that Mr. Kane had anticipated the views of the Employers. The result is, as you can see, a meaningful document, well balanced and clear.

Of course, I had with me on the Employers' benches the perfect team. Our group discussions were always frank but to the point on many of the important issues which we had to discuss, and before long we would reach complete agreement. It was really a privilege and a pleasure for me to be a member of this team.

The work of the Committee was made much simpler, and the outcome more fruitful, by the excellent documents prepared by the Secretariat, whose members have shown untiring efforts throughout our deliberations. Mr. Orizet and his collaborators are to be congratulated on the excellent job which they have performed, and I am privileged to acknowledge this publicly.
No wonder the most obvious feature of the work of our Committee was the quiet and dignified manner in which the debate was conducted. The Reporter has already told you, as an indication of the prevailing atmosphere, that out of 90 amendments only two were voted upon. Speaking of amendments tempts me to mention that the Workers and Employers submitted a joint amendment on a matter of basic importance, and yet they were ready to listen to and accept a subamendment to improve the text—and that subamendment came from the Government benches.

However, it happened that in a number of instances, after discussion, we would decide to leave the matter in the hands of a Drafting Committee. At one time I began to doubt the wisdom of this course. I feared that we might throttle the proposed Drafting Committee, but then I did not reckon with our gifted Reporter, Mr. Mathsson, the Government member for Sweden. His patience and skill in the Drafting Committee steered us clear of troubled waters. Here, also, we had the benefit of a team of experts headed by the Legal Adviser, Mr. Wolf and Miss Morgenstern. They were most helpful as well as patient with us.

I trust I have not given you a false impression of the Committee's work by painting an unusually bright, cordial and relaxed atmosphere. Cordiality and relaxed attitudes are not compatible with serious and penetrating thoughts and examination of principles and details. Far from it. The report will speak for itself. Although it is a report on a first discussion, it is comprehensive and unambiguous. I should like to draw your attention to one or two points which embody basic principles, the observance of which will prevent unnecessary and costly experiments or other avoidable errors. I would refer you in particular to paragraphs 12 and 16.

In paragraph 12, which I would like you to read carefully, there is a fair summary of the Employers' attitude, which I need not repeat, and their understanding of the two principles of co-operation to which the Reporter had drawn attention and which the Committee had endorsed.

Although the title of the report indicates the particular emphasis which it gives to developing countries, we were happy and indeed grateful for the participation of many representatives of the developed countries, with long-established experience in co-operatives. We have been able to draw on their experience and knowledge and I think the report owes as much to them as to the members representing developing countries.

There has been certain concern about matters with which the report dealt. There was some doubt about the privileged position of co-operatives in direct competition with private business, but those who still feel concerned about it should consult Points 10 (1), 12, 13 (a), 21, 22 and 23 of the Proposed Conclusions. There was also concern that too great and general tax concessions or financial aid will result in loss of revenue to the State and in consequence affect the treatment of other enterprises. But here I must be taken in conjunction with the limitation on financial aid to the preliminary stages, until the co-operatives are in a position to stand on their own feet.

I would like to reiterate the recommendation on behalf of the Employers' members for the unanimous adoption of this excellent report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. KANE (Workers' delegate, Mauritania; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Co-operatives)—I find myself in a rather embarrassing situation. I had intended to make a speech in great detail. In the light of what I have just heard it seems that my speech is hardly necessary. What I had to say in this speech has already been said so brilliantly by Mr. Mathsson and Mr. Wahid and Mr. Rifaa that after a certain moment of hesitation I decided I would not give a speech at all. But I also listened to the advice of a good friend who said that there is nothing so dangerous as holding back a speech. Therefore I find myself in a position where I think I shall have to adopt a compromise and keep my speech for a better occasion where I will not give the impression of simply repeating what others have said for my own welfare, I think I should tell you a little about what I had intended to say. I will give a few extracts from the speech I would have given you.

First of all, in the name of the Workers' group, I should like to thank most sincerely all those who collaborated with us in this Committee over a period of two weeks. Today we have brought before you this instrument in the form of Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation. We owe a great deal to the members of this Committee, and to Mr. Wahid, who was an excellent Chairman and had all the necessary qualities. He is, first of all, a competent man in his own field. He has faith in his work and from what we were able to observe ourselves he is, as a Lebanese, a man who is well placed to understand the different positions, to reconcile opposing points of view, so as to work out a position of synthesis which would meet the main points of concern which had originally been put forward.

We also owe a great deal to Mr. Mathsson, who, as a member of the Committee, was able to make us benefit from his very long and full experience, but also as Reporter he has been able to sum up all our decisions in a report which received the unanimous support of the Committee. I would also like to add that we owe a great deal to the Secretariat as a whole, particularly Mr. Orizet, and the very good preliminary report by Mr. Colombain gave a very sound framework to our whole discussion. I should also like to thank Mr. Rifaa and Mr. Nielan, Employers' member, United States for their open-minded attitude in the discussion of such a delicate subject. We owe a great deal to the Employers' group in connection with the success that we have achieved and in connection with the report which we are submitting to you today.

The question which we had on our agenda was perhaps conducive to such an atmosphere. Our terms of reference were to help develop co-operation in the developing countries. We were perhaps affected by the magic of this word so that we ourselves co-operated sometimes in situations which were very difficult and complex. A moment ago it was said—and I think this sums up very well the discussions in our meetings—that on 90 amendments we had only two votes altogether. There was one rather extraordinary moment when a very important amendment—now reproduced as Point 13 (a) of the Proposed Conclusions—was submitted by the Employers' group and the Workers' group together. I think this is a very clear example of the spirit of co-operation and unanimity which prevailed in our Committee.

The subject we discussed is not a new one for the I.L.O., since it arose for the first time in 1920 and then again in 1921. Discussion of this subject was subsequently continued in sessions of the International Labour Conference and regional conferences. The International Labour Organisation adopted a very firm position in favour of co-operation and since 1920 has shown an extraordinary spirit of perseverance, thus indicating that it thinks today—that is, that co-operation is a phenomenon of major importance in the international and social fields.

Today co-operation has gained ground and is gradually becoming a universal economic system in the developing countries as well as in the developed countries; in the countries with diversified socialist systems as well as those with various forms of capitalism. In all these countries the co-operative movement has found its place and has been integrated harmoniously into the existing system.

For co-operation—and this our Committee understood very clearly—is not merely an economic problem. It is true that it is an economic problem, a way of approaching economic problems; but it is more than that, it is better than that; it is faith in mankind, faith in the solidarity of human beings. And the message that this instrument conveys to everybody today that is, that co-operation is a phenomenon of major importance in the international and social fields.

Today co-operation has gained ground and is gradually becoming a universal economic system in the developing countries as well as in the developed countries; in the countries with diversified socialist systems as well as those with various forms of capitalism. In all these countries the co-operative movement has found its place and has been integrated harmoniously into the existing system.

That was more or less the heart of the speech I wanted to make. However, I should like to stress very rapidly some of the points to which the Committee gave particular attention and which the Workers' group considers to be of especial importance.

I should like to call attention first of all to Point 1 in Section I concerning the form of the instrument. The Workers' group thought that, even if it only referred to general principles, would include the essential elements and would provide a stronger instrument which would give greater impetus to the rapid development of the co-operative system. We thought that, to be quite logical, since these points were recognised unanimously, it would undoubtedly be more desirable to adopt not only a Recommendation but also a Convention because a Convention, even if it only referred to general principles, would include the essential elements and would provide a stronger instrument which would give greater impetus to the rapid development of the co-operative system.

Perhaps at the outset there was a certain prejudice, certain preconceived ideas, as to the form of the instrument, because the Governing Body itself had decided that the instrument should be in the form of a Recommendation, and it is quite possible that this was accepted because the other members of the Committee felt it would not be possible to take any other action. However, the Workers' group is not at all embittered by this decision of the Committee. We think that the question is not perhaps quite ripe for decision and we reserve our right, after everybody has reflected on this problem, to come back to this question during the second discussion. We feel that, even if the time is not ripe now for a decision on the form of the instrument, it may become ripe in the future.

The Workers' group therefore proposed a resolution, which you will find in paragraph 107 of the report, which requests the Governing Body of the I.L.O. to examine the possibility of putting on the agenda of a forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference the question of the role of co-operatives in economic and social development with a view to the adoption of a Convention. Such a Convention would not only help the developing countries but would also be of universal use, for that is the role of a Convention.

The paragraph which might be taken from the Workers' side refers to the scope of the instrument. In this instrument a certain number of types of co-operatives are listed, but it was made very clear in the Committee that the list here is not to be considered as exhaustive, and that any other kind of co-operative organisation could very well be included.

We were very satisfied with the wording of Section III as now before you, because it stresses the various reasons for the development of co-operative societies, an economic reason at the outset, which rapidly widens and takes on all its full meaning in the social, economic, and cultural context. After all, the goal of co-operation, just as of the whole economy, is basically the promotion of the welfare of human beings.

We were also satisfied with a number of other points, but I shall not go into many details. There is only one other aspect to which I would like to refer briefly, and that is aid to co-operatives, as covered by Section IV, Part C of the text. Here aid to co-operatives is contemplated in its various aspects. One of the basic aspects is the financial one. Reference is made to a whole series of possible types of aid which could be given, together or separately depending on the circumstances ; among these types of aid there is aid in the form of loans, tax exemptions or grants. Where reference is made to administrative aid, however, this is closely connected with the last section, concerning international collaboration. Such aid can be either bilateral or multilateral. These are extremely important points, and the instrument as submitted to you is perhaps not perfect. Human acts can never be perfect, and in any case we cannot expect to reach perfection in the first discussion.

The Workers' group has given its unanimous approval to this instrument, but we also feel that in order that it may have its full effect in future years it should be made more concrete, that is, the importance of practical programmes which will arise out of it should be borne in mind. The aid which the governments and the international organisations will give within the framework of this instrument will have to be borne closely in mind ; although it is good to prepare texts as excellent as this one, you also have to think of the practical aspect. In this field, we representatives of workers in the developing countries are looking to the developed countries for a great deal of help. We are also looking to our own International Co-operative Alliance, to the competent organs of the I.L.O. in this and other co-operative matters.

It has been a pleasure for me, as Director of the International Co-operative Alliance, to participate throughout the Conference in the capacity of consultant and I am grateful for the courtesies which have been extended to me by both delegates and the staff of the I.L.O.

Interpretation from French : Mr. MALLET-TANI (Employers' adviser, Italy)—In the report of the Committee on Co-operatives, paragraph 84, concerning Point 23 of the Proposed Conclusions, might lead one to believe that the amendment submitted by the Employers and subsequently withdrawn sought to do away with the institution of co-operative banks, which is one of the most vital activities of the financial structure.

Now I should like to give a correct interpretation of what happened, making it quite clear that this amendment of the Employers was in full agreement with the text submitted by the Office concerning the use of a central co-operative bank for all financial support co-operative undertakings. Should these banks not exist, however, instead of turning to another central co-operative organisation, the exact nature of which is not known, the amendment proposed that straight away we should use the existing ordinary banks, in preference the official public banks.

I repeat that this amendment was withdrawn, but I feel it is very desirable that in the final record you include the explanation which I have just given.

May I add a few more words: at a time when the Conference is dealing with the role of co-operatives in developed countries, it would seem to me timely, as an Italian adviser and particularly as President of a co-operative association, to stress with great satisfaction the thoroughness with which the Government, Employers' and Workers' representatives discussed and thrashed out the different subjects in the report at present submitted to this Conference.

This effort was all the more praiseworthy in that it overcame the traditional division into two categories and the co-operative movement was confirmed in the social role which it has to play. We should be particularly glad of the fact that co-operation has not been considered as a marginal phenomenon, as an instrumental function, but rather as a determining factor in a whole process of transformation—one which is indispensable in the developing countries.

The result obtained in the Geneva discussions and the text which is the outcome of these discussions will unquestionably receive the approval of co-operatives throughout the world, and this approval will be all the more significant in that the leaders of co-operative societies were not very numerous in the various delegations which were sent to the Conference.

I should like to thank particularly two of these gentlemen: Mr. Mathsson, Reporter of the Committee on Co-operatives, and Mr. Pedersen, Reporter of the Committee on Agrarian Reform, one section of whose report incidentally—and I may say inevitably—belongs to the field of co-operation.

Co-operation as a whole appears as a tertium quid, as a third path, to be followed in the economic perspectives of the new nations.

Co-operative undertakings, even if they are properly supported and even if they are promoted by governments, must endeavour to progress as much as possible independently and responsibly, so as to gain access to the various markets. This is necessary to defend the interests of the consumers and to guarantee a just remuneration for the associated producers.

We must never lose sight of the fact that co-operative societies seek no profit for themselves but exist in order to serve their members, in direct proportion to the members' cooperation with the productive work of the co-operative.

We must not forget, either, that co-operation requires an atmosphere of spontaneity and free choice, based on a profound conviction. This is true not only for co-operators but also for the atmosphere in which they must work.

We are convinced that the indispensable solution of certain economic problems will help create this atmosphere in the various developing countries, particularly if the governments, employers and the workers show a spirit of collaboration in their own countries as strong as the spirit which they showed at this Conference.

When I look to the future, the hope that I express, in a spirit of real solidarity and as a representative of co-operative undertakings—the hope I express to all the countries concerned—is that they may continue to benefit ever more fully from all the possibilities offered them for accelerating their development through a system of co-operative activity. Such activity is particularly fruitful since it is in this field that the human factor seems to predominate over all other elements in the economic and social structure.

The President—As you will observe from the programme, we now have to take a final record vote on the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities.

The President—The result of the vote is as follows: 346 votes in favour, none against, with no abstentions. The Recommendation is therefore adopted unanimously.

Reply of the Director-General Following the Discussion of His Report

The President—I now give the floor to a speaker who does not need any introduction to this august audience: the Director-General of the I.L.O., Mr. David Morse, Secretary-General of the Conference.

The Secretary-General—This has been a very heavy Conference, with a lot of hard work and difficult discussions and negotiations. Many people have said that it has been a quiet Conference. It is for each one of you to judge how quiet it has been, but later in my reply I should like to comment on that point.

We have had rather a record in some respects. There are over 1,100 delegates and advisers participating in this Conference. One hundred and four States are in attendance. The President of the Central African Republic did us the honour of addressing our Conference. We have had 68 Ministers and Secretaries of State who have participated in our work. We have four new States Members—Malawi, Malta, Yemen and Zambia—which means that we now have a membership of 114 States, and we are fast closing our cycle of complete universality. To these new States I once again express my welcome and appreciation at their entrance into our Organisation, thus giving us the opportunity to strengthen our efforts for international co-operation.

There have been over 200 speeches on my Report, which makes it rather difficult for me to answer as completely as I would like to.

Many attending the Conference have come for the first time. In view of this I shall try to place what I have to say this morning within the context of our Organisation's developments, developments of the immediate past, so that we can more readily discern our path for the future. So I shall deal primarily with substantive matters.

You will recall that I submitted my first Report on the programme and structure of the I.L.O. to the Conference two years ago. Why did I do this? I did this because there had been certain controversy in the Conference about the I.L.O.'s structure and its future, and it seemed to me that the issues then raised could best be resolved in the light of a fresh definition of the I.L.O.'s goals and of the methods for attaining these goals in the present world situation. I felt that it was urgent, necessary, for our membership to take a new, hard look at the position of our Organisation in the changing world of today. I felt also that in certain respects the I.L.O. needed stronger support to undertake the world-wide mission that had been entrusted to it; that its programmes and methods of action should be made to correspond more intimately—more closely, if you will—to the major social needs of the modern world; and that certain adjustments were necessary if the I.L.O. was to remain in the front, in the vanguard of social progress.

So I asked the Conference to engage in a frank and open debate on the I.L.O.'s programme and structure as a whole. When I did this I fully recognised and realised that there was serious danger of opinions being so divergent that it would be impossible to reach a sufficiently clear and broadly acceptable set of conclusions for the future development of our Organisation.

But happily my apprehensions proved to be groundless, at least in respect of certain key areas of decision. At the end of last year's session of the Conference, those of you who were here will recall, it had become clear that all of the I.L.O.'s constituents were prepared to approach the many issues that had been laid before them in a spirit which transcended the many, and often deep, differences which divided them, which still remain to be solved. It was the spirit of co-operation that prevailed at last year's session of the Conference that encouraged me to submit the Report which has been before you at this session.

My main aim this year was to seek to tie down agreement on those questions where I considered agreement possible, in the hope that the impetus gained by the attainment of such agreement would assist us in reaching appropriate conclusions with respect to the other more controversial matters of programme and structure which still remain to be solved.

This, thus far, has been accomplished.

What is needed now is a genuine attempt by all the Organisation in reconciling the different points of view that have been put forward on the more controversial issues; and the Conference itself has set in motion machinery by which this process of consensus-seeking can be continued.

Let us take a look at that. As a result of the resolution unanimously adopted last year by the Conference, the Governing Body has set up a Working Party to consider the different proposals and points of view which have been stated, and I have submitted to it an analysis of the debate at the last two sessions of the Conference, together with a list of all the proposals made. I have further invited governments and employers' and workers' organisations in all member States to express their views on these proposals, and summaries of the replies subsequently received have been submitted to the Working Party. Thus, the Working Party is fully aware of the different views that are held on the questions that remain unsolved; and it is through this Working Party, through this machinery, and the Governing Body, that the process of seeking agreement must be continued. The Conference itself, of course, will be associated in this process as the reports of the Working Party and the Governing Body continue to be submitted to it at its future sessions.

The Working Party, now that it has completed its consideration in depth of the major programme of human resources, will in the same way devote its attention to the two remaining major programme areas, namely the development of social institutions, and conditions of work and life. This selective emphasis in a limited number of broad areas of action on which the I.L.O. should focus its attention will, I am certain, have some very significant and far-reaching implications concerning the nature of our action in the years to come. I would, however, like, if I may for a moment, to raise two points which seem to me particularly important in this regard.

The first is that to agree on the objectives of our programmes is not the same thing as to be in a position to put all these programmes into practical effect at once. The resources which are at the disposal of our Organisation and of its member States are rather limited in relation to what are very ambitious objectives on a national and world-wide scale. The fact that our resources are limited makes it all the more urgent that we should have a set of clearly defined priorities, which would help us to adjust our priorities, programmes and methods of action in order to meet new and emerging situations which call for action. In this way, and only in this way, can the I.L.O. draw up a total programme of activities which will produce the maximum effect with the greatest efficiency. In the contemporary world, where so much is said about so many things, where there are so many problems remaining despite the statements—problems of human misery, poverty and degradation crying out for solution—the I.L.O. will be judged by its action and not by its words. It will be judged by the practical contribution that it makes to the total effort to relieve human suffering wherever such suffering exists. This is our challenge for the future as it has been for the past.

I think that we have already come some way towards determining what our approach to priorities within each programme should be.
The discussions at this session as well as at previous sessions of the Conference have enabled me to draw some general conclusions as to the areas where principal emphases need to be placed at this stage; and the process of more detailed programme formulation and adjustment will be greatly facilitated by the new structure and the new programme cycle. Special efforts have been made in the Office. One of my current preoccupations is to find a suitable means of associating the Governing Body and the Conference with these procedures. It seems to me that perhaps one of the most effective ways of achieving this objective will be to present budget proposals in such a way as to relate financial data to the programme proposed for implementation, so that the budget is expressed in terms of the expected output of the I.L.O. instead of solely in terms of the input of staff services and equipment. I emphasise this point because I am most anxious that programme planning should result in the most effective possible allocation of our resources in those areas where they are most needed.

The second point I wished to raise was made by Mr. Grandval, the French Minister of Labour, when he said during our debate that by concentrating our activities on a limited number of specific objectives, it should be possible to improve arrangements for collaboration between the I.L.O. and other organisations in the United Nations family. Several other speakers expressed their concern over the lack of co-ordination, or over what they saw as outright competition, between international organisations. I am sure that now that we have achieved a clear formulation of the objectives and scope of I.L.O. action, we shall be able to eliminate the unclear demarcations of competence which have occasionally characterised our relations with other organisations in the United Nations family. At the same time, however, the clarification of our objectives places upon us the responsibility of ensuring that we do not stray beyond the limits that we have ourselves set to our competence. In other words, it seems to me that we must be even more conscious of our place, our role, in the United Nations system. Our fields of competence, as now defined as a result of this process of discussion, are the development and full utilisation of human resources; the development of institutions through which all sections of the working population can fully participate in and benefit from the economic growth of their countries; and the prevention and improvement of the working and living conditions of all workers. We must concentrate our efforts on the attainment of our objectives in these fields; and only if we do this can we expect other organisations to respect and recognise the I.L.O.'s primary responsibility in these fields within the total effort of the United Nations family.

The I.L.O. has an additional responsibility as a member of the United Nations family: it can and should cooperate with other organisations in projects and programmes in which it has an interest, to which it has a contribution to make but in which other organisations have the primary responsibility. I should like to mention a few examples of such activities because it is an important pattern for us to understand and, if possible, accept.

The first that I would mention relates to disarmament. This subject has been prominent in the general debate in our Conference this year and it has been among the topics under discussion in the Resolutions Committee. I entirely agree with those speakers who say that the I.L.O. is fully concerned by all measures to achieve a lasting peace through disarmament. No organisation has, in my view, a greater or a more positive interest in peace than has the International Labour Organisation. Nothing could make a greater contribution to the attainment of the I.L.O.'s objectives than the conclusion of a disarmament agreement, which is a fundamental condition, a basic condition, of lasting peace, and I believe that the I.L.O. should do everything possible to facilitate the conclusion of such an agreement.

The I.L.O., of course, has no competence with respect to the political aspects of disarmament, which as everyone here knows, are for the appropriate organs of the United Nations, but it should be able to facilitate progress towards disarmament by helping, along with other agencies, to determine the precise economic and social implications of disarmament. That is why I fully supported the decision of the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination, consisting of the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the executive heads of the specialised agencies, to set up an inter-agency committee to prepare and co-ordinate the working programmes of the different agencies in this field; and I can only reiterate my determination as authorised by the decisions of our Governing Body to continue to associate the I.L.O. fully in this undertaking and in this challenge. We have participated in the first two meetings of this inter-agency committee; we have assisted in drawing up a framework for the development of studies and research on this question which will be submitted to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations at its session in Geneva next month; and we shall make every effort to ensure that our contribution to this inter-agency programme will lead to a better understanding of the different opportunities and problems which may arise as a result of disarmament.

The I.L.O.'s special interest in this subject is clear: it is concerned that any resources released as a result of disarmament should, as far as possible, be utilised to promote the I.L.O.'s objectives throughout the world; and it wishes to ensure that the transfer of resources from military to civil and social purposes may arise as a result of disarmament. The I.L.O., of course, has no competence in the field of trade and development. This, too, is a problem that has been discussed frequently in the course of the debate on my Report. It is, of course, true that the promotion of international trade is not one of the central responsibilities of the I.L.O. Nevertheless, the I.L.O. has much to say and many very pertinent questions to ask in the specialised bodies which are dealing with questions of international trade. One of our major tasks, as confirmed by this Conference itself, is to assist the developing countries in the creation and maintenance of high levels of productive employment. But, as many delegates have pointed out, our efforts in this direction will be nullified unless there are outlets for the products of developing countries on the world market. At the same time, the I.L.O. is concerned that increased exports of manufactures from developing countries should not lead to hardship for workers in the industrialised countries. These anticipated difficulties should be met not by protective measures but by help in facilitating adjustments so that individual workers and their families find security rather than insecurity in the changes which will come about in their occupational life. Adjustments in economies will be made through the I.L.O. through its action in the three major programme areas which the Industrial Committees could play a useful role, for example, in which our Industrial Commissions are engaged in discussions relating to the ways in which the institutional machinery for industrialisation within the United Nations system can be improved and can be strengthened. The Governing Body discussed this question last November, and urged that the I.L.O. be closely associated with any new international machinery which may be set up to promote industrial development. It is, however, a question which concerns a number of other organisations as well. Delegates will be aware that the United Nations has recently been engaged in an inquiry, and the I.L.O. through its action in the three major programme areas, will help to facilitate these adjustments. Is this an area, for example, in which our Industrial Committees could play a useful role, for the simple reason that we have represented in them those who will be most directly concerned with making the adjustments necessary to expand world trade?

I should like to give a final example, which is that of industrialisation. This is, of course, a subject with which the I.L.O. is intimately concerned, and I have been impressed by the number of references made by delegates during the debate to the need for the I.L.O. to play a more active and constructive part in the whole process of industrialisation. and yet setting goals, targets and principles which should be pursued by all member States. The valuable work, for example, of the Committee on Agrarian Reform and the Committee on Co-operatives at this session of the Conference seems to me to bear out the wisdom of this approach.

With respect to our research activities, again some speakers have expressed reservations on the need for such an activity in the Office. They have suggested that it should be eliminated. I do not share this view. I think that this would be a mistake. Research in the I.L.O. is absolutely essential to the provision of technical support and intelligent guidance to our activities as a whole. Our research must, of course, constantly have this practical aim; but there are, I feel, vital areas where our knowledge is still inadequate, where we must gather information on the practices and experiences of different countries in order to discover useful ideas, to find our way, to establish useful leads, and indeed to break new ground.

I find too that a large number of speakers have referred in this debate to the steps that are now being taken to decentralise the I.L.O.’s activities. As a matter of fact, if you judge by the number of speakers who mentioned this question in the debate, this has become one of the major preoccupations of the Conference this year, so I think I must spend a few moments on this question. Of course, there is nothing surprising in the fact that so much attention is being paid on this question. One of the most significant trends, as we all know, in the world of the 1960s is towards regional groupings. The States in each region have become increasingly interested in finding solutions to common problems, common problems in their regions, and in developing common methods of action in their regions. It is only natural, therefore, that the I.L.O. should be responsive to this trend.

There are, as I see it, three ways in which the I.L.O. can do this.

The first is by decentralising a certain number of the functions of the Office. I have briefly outlined in my Report my thinking on this subject and the action I have taken, or am contemplating, to bring the Office into closer contact with the realities of each region; and several delegates commented favourably on my action in this respect. I have not yet finalised my plans for this decentralisation. What I am aiming at is to enable the I.L.O. to have closer and more permanent contacts, through a regional network of offices, with governments, workers and employers in different member States, so as to know better, and to deal more effectively with, the principal needs and problems of each country and each region; and, further, to make the I.L.O. — what it is, and what it does — better known in each country and in each region. In other words, this new regional structure of the Office will be an essential element for the success of the new procedures for the planning, implementation and control of programmes to which I referred earlier.

The second way in which I believe we can strengthen the I.L.O.’s contact with the regions is to assign new roles and new responsibilities to regional conferences and regional advisory committees. Opinions on this subject appear to be somewhat divided at our Conference. On the one hand there is the view that has emerged that regional conferences and regional advisory committees should have very extensive powers, including the power to direct and control the I.L.O.’s affairs in the regions concerned and, even to adopt regional instruments; on the other hand there are those who believe that these regional bodies should have a purely advisory function which they would exercise through discussion of certain technical questions. My own personal views, which I put to the African Regional Conference in Addis Ababa last December, are that attention in these regional bodies should be concentrated on assessing the priorities for action in each region; on reviewing the activities of the I.L.O. and the programmes and policies of governments in the region in the light of these priorities; and on tracing guidelines and setting targets for future action in the region. I continue to think that this approach would be the most helpful in that it would enable the I.L.O.’s representative regional bodies to be associated more closely in the formulation, evaluation and adjustment of programmes in the light of changing conditions and needs in each region.

Thirdly, the I.L.O. must establish closer working relationships with the many regional bodies and organisations which have come into existence in different parts of the world. There are the regional economic commissions and the regional development institutes of the United Nations. With these the I.L.O. is already working very closely, and our collaboration in the work of these regional bodies is based on the same principles that I have mentioned earlier with regard to the United Nations family as a whole. Then there are the regional organisations which have been set up outside the United Nations system to bring about the economic integration of a number of States in a given region. I am thinking in particular of the European Economic Community, the Organisation of Central American States and the Latin American Free Trade Area. Such organisations have expressed interest in receiving I.L.O. co-operation, since the process of economic integration raises a number of social and labour problems. I believe that we must give positive consideration to any requests of this nature. And there are other regional intergovernmental organisations which are interested in co-operating with the I.L.O. With these organisations too, the I.L.O. is prepared to work closely in the achievement of objectives which we have in common. Several African delegates, for example, spoke in favour of close ties between the I.L.O. and the Organisation of African Unity. I should mention that arrangements have already been put in motion to facilitate close co-operation between the I.L.O. and that organisation, and I eagerly look forward to an era of constructive and profitable collaboration.

It seems clear to me that if the I.L.O. is to maintain its impetus and its authority in the world at large it must get closer to the needs of each region; and this is the established policy of our Organisation. At the same time I have been happy to note that in commenting on this need and this process the Conference has reaffirmed that this should be done in a manner which reinforces our universality and which ensures that we avoid planting seeds of possible regional segregation. In this connection Mr. Abessolo, the Government delegate of Gabon, warned us that regionalisation was first and foremost a means of action and not an end in itself; and Mr. Abebe, the Employers' delegate of Nigeria, urged that decentralisation should not involve an excessive dissipation of our energies and our resources. The Conference may be assured that these warnings will be our guidelines and will be taken to heart.

While on this subject let me mention one further important, indeed essential, function of the I.L.O. about which, I have discovered, very few of our constituents are informed—and it is a function which, it seems to me, must remain universal: I refer to the universal character of our standard-setting activities. I do not believe that responsibility for setting standards should be transferred away from the General Conference to regional conferences. Of course this can be debated, but this is the view which I present: to do this would be to call into question the essential purpose of the I.L.O., the essential mission of the I.L.O., as a universal organisation. International labour standards are the concrete practical expression of the fundamental universal principles for which the I.L.O. stands and has been consecrated. The formulation of these standards as well as the supervision of their application, must, I suggest, be entrusted only to a universal body such as this very Conference itself.

I am not by this, however, suggesting that regional conferences do not have an important key role to play in our standard-setting work; they can and they should periodically review the application and the applicability of international labour standards in the regions concerned. Nor am I suggesting that certain types of regional instruments cannot be fruitfully examined. As a matter of fact a number of regional technical agreements have been drawn up under the auspices of the I.L.O., such as the agreement concerning social security of Rhine boatmen; the agreement on conditions of employment of Rhine boatmen; and the European agreement concerning the work of crews of vehicles engaged in international road transport. Such agreements are practical measures for rationalisation of regional needs and at the same time provide valuable support to the universal standards elaborated by this Conference. We are ready and anxious to co-operate with regional organisations which request our assistance in this respect. A few months ago, for example, the European Social Charter came into effect. This Charter was drawn up by the Council of Europe, with the technical assistance of the International Labour Office. We all must welcome initiatives such as this, and I know that we are prepared to pledge the support and co-operation of the I.L.O. for any similar efforts on the part of other regional organisations any place in the world. I consider that the willingness of regional organisations to devote their own labour standards on the basis of I.L.O. standards is another proof of the continuing vitality, the continuing universality of the principles contained in the international labour Conventions and Recommendations.

As we come to the end of this 49th Session of the International Labour Conference I would like to pause, with your permission, for a moment to pay a special tribute to the Principal Deputy Director-General of the I.L.O., Mr. Jef Eens, who, as you know, has decided to resign after more than 20 years of service with the I.L.O. and will be leaving us at the end of the month. This will be the last occasion in over 17 years of close, intimate collaboration that he and I shall share this platform together.

Mr. Eens has been associated with the I.L.O. since 1938 when he attended the International Labour Conference as first technical adviser to the Belgian Workers' delegation. He was Belgian Workers' delegate to the Special Session of the Conference which was held in New York in 1941, and again attended the historic 26th Session of the Conference which was held in Philadelphia in 1944. It was at this session that he was elected as a Worker member of the Governing Body. After a distinguished career in the Belgian trade union movement and as a government official, Mr. Eens was appointed Assistant Director in November 1944 by the then Director, Mr. Edward Phelan. In 1951 I appointed Mr. Eens as my Deputy Director-General and he served in this capacity until last November, when I designated him as Principal Deputy Director-General.

Jef Eens has served the I.L.O. faithfully during two of the most important decades in the Organisation's history. His contribution to the work of the I.L.O. during this long span of time is appreciated as much by his colleagues in the Office, all of us, as by those delegates at the Conference and members of the Governing Body who have had the opportunity of being associated with him during these years in some of his manifold endeavours.

Jef Eens began his service at a time when the I.L.O. was forging itself into an effective instrument for the promotion of social justice and economic welfare in the post-war world. Since then, he has seen the I.L.O. more than double its membership and expand the scope and size of its activities in response to the new demands and new challenges presented by a rapidly developing and changing world.

Mr. Eens can take pride in having greatly helped all of us, by his energy, enthusiasm, his resourcefulness, and his devotion to the principles for which this great Organisation stands, in making this progress possible. There will be a full opportunity during the Governing Body session which follows this Conference to bid an official farewell to Mr. Eens, but I felt it only correct that the entire Conference, that this 49th Session, would want me on its behalf to thank him, to thank him again, I say, not only for myself but for it, for his public service and devotion, for his sincere devotion to the I.L.O. and to wish him good luck and continued success in the years which lie ahead.

I have tried as best I could to explain in my Report why my Report this year was a short one. I must also confess to the Conference that it has been my intention this year to be brief not only in my Report but, if possible, also in my reply. But you will have seen from the statistics I gave you at the beginning of my reply that they did not facilitate my intention. However, I can assure each delegate who has spoken that his views and points of criticism will be examined by me and fully considered in the further development of our activities and in the preparation of proposals for action by the Governing Body.

But if I may I would like now for one moment to recapitulate. Let us take a look at how much we have achieved of what we set out to do two years ago, and let us see what remains to be done. Three sessions of Conference discussion on the programme and structure of our Organisation have yielded clear agreement on the scope and objectives of the I.L.O.'s major programme areas of action. That is now clear. Governing Body machinery has been established for the consideration and evaluation of all the proposals made at these sessions of the Conference, and this machinery will now attempt to reconcile conflicting views on the remaining outstanding issues. And that is now clear. During the same two years I have undertaken a major internal and administrative reorganisation of the Office in order to make the I.L.O. a more effective instrument in the service of its constituents. And of this everyone is aware. Finally, we are about to decentralise our activities so as to bring the I.L.O. closer to the governments, the employers and the workers for whom and with whom it must work. And this I believe is now fully understood.

As I see it, therefore, our practical task for the future is now clear: we must, in every part of the Organisation, in all our organs, concentrate on putting what we have reached agreement upon into practice. And this will be no mean feat. The machinery has been overhauled, now we must put it to work and ensure that our resources, both human and financial, are utilised with ever-increasing efficiency.

The United Nations system was never more in need of a robust, hard-hitting, efficient I.L.O. than it is at the present time. Because of the serious dissensions which exist amongst the Members of the United Nations, the last General Assembly was not able to complete its work. This casts its shadow over the work of the member organisations in the United Nations family, including the I.L.O. On Friday of this week there will be celebrated in San Francisco the twentieth anniversary of the founding of the United Nations. So it seems to me, as it must to you, that this is the appropriate occasion for us, not only as representatives of governments, of employers and of workers, but also as men and women dedicated to the cause of international cooperation, to do everything that lies within our power to help restore confidence in international order, and in the international organisations which comprise the United Nations family and which together symbolise the aspirations of mankind for a better world—and which the great majority of mankind sees as a concrete commitment by nations of the world to the pursuit of peace.

I had not felt that this Conference would be a Conference of drama or crises but rather a Conference in which we could take a step forward in our continuing efforts to strengthen international co-operation and international understanding in the field of social and labour policy and through these means to strengthen men's efforts to achieve a more peaceful world. But as I come to the close of this Conference, I would be less than honest and less than frank if I did not express some uneasiness. While the level of debate on my Report has been high, there has also been a high level of political tension. I feel that there is in the Organisation a basic problem which still remains to be resolved. That is whether we are to be universal in the full sense of the word. There is outstanding, too, the problem of finding further effective methods for the universal application of I.L.O. principles. We have the issue, too, of the reconciliation of the principles of universality and tripartism. We have still outstanding the question of how and within what pattern to live with these principles. We have not yet learned to live with each other as a tripartite organisation in conditions of confidence and mutual respect.

I mention these points because this year much of this type of problem has been transferred from the Conference hall to a series of informal discussions. Tensions flowing from the political issues in the world and flowing from the difficult international situation have seeped quite heavily into many of our discussions and much of our work; happily not to the point of disruption, but, I believe, to the point of being a danger signal.

I will say no more about this subject now but I venture to express the hope that during the months which lie ahead we in this Organisation should search our hearts and minds and work hard to try to find real solutions to the problems that still divide us; to find methods and procedures for keeping bare, naked political issues out of our Conference; to find ways and means of concentrating more fully and with greater richness on the great industrial and social problems of our time to which we, and we alone, are legitimately called upon to seek solutions. The resolution of some of the political tensions arising in the world outside the framework of the I.L.O. would, of course, undoubtedly help us to achieve a more constructive and effective Organisation; but this, it seems to me, works both ways and anything we can attain here in our Organisation through greater confidence in each other will make easier the climate in which issues are faced in the United Nations, in the world and in other political forums. I hope that we shall not reach a political impasse in the I.L.O. but that we can finally emerge with a broad consensus for the full utilisation of all our resources, both material and intellectual, physical and spiritual, in our great unfinished tasks of helping mankind to find peace, to find dignity and to find happiness in our life.

The PRESIDENT—It is my very pleasant duty to express our deep appreciation of the Director-General's analysis of the speeches made in this hall and of his reply, which was both comprehensive and persuasive.

He has referred to the impending departure of Mr. Rens, and I am sure that, on behalf of delegates here on my own behalf and with Mr. Morse in wishing Mr. Rens a very contented and happy retirement. Sometimes I wonder how a man who is so active will fare in retirement, but I hope he will also be active in retirement in some ways.

The presence of delegates, tripartite deputations from 104 countries of the world, demonstrates the universality of the I.L.O. and the presence of Mr. Morse represents the stability of the I.L.O.; so this is a happy combination of universality and stability.

As the Director-General was making the points in his speech, I was trying to jot down some notes, as I had intended to make some remarks and give a detailed comment on some of the aspects he had raised, but in view of the hour I have decided to give my detailed as well as my short comments together. I shall give my short comment first, and that is, "Thank you, Mr. Morse"; I shall give my detailed comment now: "Thank you very much, Mr. Morse".

The PRESIDENT—We resume the discussion on the report of the Committee on Co-operatives.

Mr. GUNASEKERA (Government adviser, Ceylon)—I trust I shall be forgiven if, by being brief, I commit a breach of what might appear to be an unwritten convention at sessions of this Conference. In asking you to adopt the report of the Committee on Co-operatives I wish to make a few brief observations as a member of the Government group which served on this Committee.

You will notice that we, as Government members, did not speak with one voice on many of the points at issue. You will also notice that, when we did speak as a majority within the group, we were, at one time, against the Employers' group and, at another time, against the Workers' group.

For example, in paragraph 77 of the report you will find that most of us did not support the proposal of the Employers that the financial aid given to co-operatives should be on a basis of equality of treatment as between different sectors of the economy. On the other hand, in paragraph 90 of the report, you will find that we were opposed to the suggestion of the Workers that trade union organisations should be associated with the elaboration and implementation of policy concerning the co-operatives.

But underlying this changeable attitude is the persistent desire on our part to support what we honestly felt was most suitable in each instance. Nevertheless, you will perhaps note that—if you will pardon the parody—it would be true to say of us not that we loved the Employers less but that we loved the Workers more. So much for our attitude.

As regards the report itself, I think it is an outstanding one, because, for the first time, it relates co-operatives to economic development and social progress. I would, in a special way, commend to you paragraphs 101 and 102 of the report because they contain an appeal to interested international agencies for their collaboration with, and for the expansion of technical assistance to, the co-operative movements in developing countries. The appeal is an urgent one, and I am sure that it will not pass unheeded.

Before I conclude, I must join the other speakers in thanking the office-bearers of the Committee and the officials of the I.L.O. who served on it for their excellent report. I have no doubt that the report will be accepted by you.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. ČAPEK (Government adviser, Czechoslovakia)—We were very glad that the I.L.O. decided to place on the agenda of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference such an important question as the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. For this reason, it was with great pleasure that we availed ourselves of this opportunity and took part in the work of the Committee that discussed in detail the various aspects of this important topic.

We may say in all sincerity that we highly appreciate the Conclusions that are proposed by the Committee on Co-operatives, although, in view of the importance of this question, we think that certain points should have been clarified in the document which the majority of the members of the Committee have decided should be adopted as a Recommendation. However, we consider that the Proposed Conclusions may serve as a useful basis for working out the text of a Recommendation, and that governments should be able to submit their amendments or suggestions during the preparation of the documents for the next session.

Allow me to draw your attention to certain important questions which, in our view, should be formulated more specifically or should be emphasised more in the document.

First of all, I should like to refer to definition of the role of co-operatives and the position of co-operatives in the economic and social life of the various countries. We must remember that co-operation is an economic and social association of workers and performs the appropriate functions at the various stages of the development of society. An example of this can be seen in the history of the co-operative movement of the various countries. In view of the difference in the development of various countries, it is difficult to find a definition for co-operatives that would cover all their multifarious activities.

It is rightly stressed in the document that we have to take into account local conditions affecting co-operatives in the developing countries where their importance is particularly emphasised and that in most cases the governments of the developing countries consider co-operatives as a very important element in the economic and social development of the country.

Therefore, the attempted definition of the role of co-operatives in Point 13 (a) carries only one aspect, that is the economic aspect of the role of co-operatives, and no mention is made of the social role of co-operatives, which is just as important for the developing countries and for other countries as well. Point 3 gives a better description of the role of co-operatives, where co-operatives are considered as one of the instruments for economic, social and cultural development, "combining personal interests with those of society. In this way the resources of the community can be harnessed to social development and improvement of the economic, social and cultural level of the workers.

We think further stress should be laid on the popular character of co-operatives, which are developed through the initiative and on behalf of workers, peasants, and professional and handicraft workers. But it is also essential to protect the true character of co-operation and to prevent attempts to mask the idea of co-operation that mask the capitalistic nature of certain undertakings angling for benefits granted to co-operatives at the time of their establishment.

The Proposed Conclusions rightly point out that prospects are very great in the field of co-operation but that there are also limits. Certain countries, including my own, where the co-operative movement has developed considerably, have found by experience that co-operation may indeed further the development of society and help progress, and that it is one instrument for defending the interests of the workers, but that it is outside its scope to deal with all the problems of the development or transformation of society. The idea that co-operatives have unlimited potential does more harm than good to the movement and to its genuine contribution to the construction of society. Since this idea is unrealistic it remains a Utopian concept that cannot be put into practice.

Another thing that worries us is the so-called assistance to co-operative movements by private institutions, as mentioned in the Proposed Conclusions. There is always a danger that such outside assistance from the country concerned or from abroad may be directed not only to co-operatives but also to the pattern of government of developing countries. This question of outside private assistance is something that should be discussed in greater detail in order to preclude any possibility of abuse when such help is given from inside the country or from abroad, or to warn the competent authorities of the possibility of such abuse.

Despite these remarks which we had to make in the course of the discussion in the Committee, and which we thought necessary to repeat here in the plenary session, we regard the work done by the Committee on Co-operatives as having been fruitful, as proved by the results of the Committee's work contained in the Proposed Conclusions. I think these Conclusions can serve as a very good basis for the drafting of a Recommendation, and in years to come, if the majority so desired and thought that this would be for the good of the developing countries, we should not oppose the adoption of a more effective instrument on co-operation.

In conclusion, I should like to add that we were also satisfied with the Conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform referring to the role of co-operatives. We think those Conclusions quite rightly stress the role of co-operation as one of the means to assist in accomplishing the tasks of agrarian reform in the interests of the peasants and agricultural workers. The experience acquired in this connection in Czechoslovakia, with a view to applying the principle of giving the land to those who work it, has demonstrated the importance of producers' and other co-operatives in agriculture.

*Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KHORIN (Government adviser, U.S.S.R.)—The problems connected with the economy of the developing countries are among the most important international issues of the day. Therefore, the inclusion on the agenda of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference of the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries was very desirable.

I should like to refer to the positive and useful work that was carried out by the Office in preparing the preliminary reports and the Proposed Conclusions, the adoption of which was urged by the majority of members of the Committee.

The Office reports describe the very serious economic and social condition of the workers in the developing countries. This was done most objectively.

We particularly understand the hopes of the peoples of the developing countries, since the difficulties which they are undergoing are, in many ways, similar to the difficulties that our country had to overcome in the first years after the new Soviet Republic was established. We were left a burdensome legacy of a backward economy, disease, poverty and illiteracy, but within a very short period we managed to overcome these difficulties and we achieved the economic results which are so well known.

In its development the Soviet Union has passed through various stages, and at each stage an important role has been played by the co-operative movement. We worked out a co-operative plan, the essence of which was that we had to attract the peasants through the co-operatives into building socialism, on the basis of voluntary contribution and persuasion, by introducing the principles of collective, first in marketing and supply and then in production.

The implementation of this plan led to great expansion of agricultural potential and output and improvement in the peasants' standard of living. In the present time, all peasant farms in our country are joined together in production co-operatives. The Second World War put them to a very severe test. Despite the difficult conditions the collective farms succeeded in supplying the country with grain and with other foodstuffs and industry was kept supplied with the necessary raw materials.

In our country a great role is played also by consumer, housing, fishery and other co-operatives. Our experience clearly shows what results can be achieved in favourable circumstances by means of co-operatives. We see what an important role co-operatives may play in economic development and in improving the welfare of the people. In our country, of course, we have our difficulties as well. We have the difficulties of growth; for example, the rapid growth of retail turnover of consumer co-operatives is greater than the expansion of the material base, and there is a shortage of storage facilities.

The Committee on Co-operatives and its Chairman, Mr. Wahid, have done very useful and constructive work over the past 20 days in drawing up a proposed international instrument on the role of co-operatives in the developing countries, the aim of which is to create favourable conditions for the general development of co-operatives and to assist the construction of an independent economy. Today we are discussing the Committee's report and the Proposed Conclusions prepared by the Committee. This document will serve as a basis for the second discussion next year. While giving credit to this document, we consider, nevertheless, that it is necessary to refer in the plenary to substantial shortcomings which we have already mentioned in the Committee. First of all it seems to us that in the Recommendation there should be some reflection of the role of co-operatives in the eradication of the consequences of colonialism, and of the need to do away with the unfair terms of trade that have been practised by the capitalist monopolies vis-à-vis the developing countries. The text also gives undue attention to financial aid provided directly to co-operatives from private sources. The developing countries cannot yet do without this aid, but we think that such aid should be given to co-operatives through the national co-operative bank or, failing that, through a central co-operative organ.

In discussion on Section III on objectives of policy concerning co-operatives, where it is stated that co-operatives should be established as a means of increasing employment by a fuller utilisation of resources, for instance in the implementation of systems of agrarian reform, we proposed that it should be specified that agrarian reform should be effective and democratic in nature. It should be carried out in the interests of the toilers of the land. I dwell on these questions not because I wish to try to impose my opinions on the Committee or on the Conference but simply because I was surprised that the Committee in its majority voted against progressive agrarian reform.

Finally, in the international instrument it would be wise to stress the paramount role of producer co-operatives, as these place the means of production, the basis of every country's economy, on a socialised basis.

In conclusion I should like to emphasise once more that the proposed instrument on co-operatives is of very great interest and is an acceptable basis for further discussion and for a final decision of this important question at the 13th Conference. In common with other delegations we propose that the report of the Committee be approved. Our Government reserves the right at the next Conference to make proposals with a view to improving the text of the international instrument on the role of co-operatives in the developing countries.

Report of the Committee on Co-operatives: Discussion (concl.) and Adoption

The President: We resume now the discussion on the report of the Committee on Co-operatives.

Interpretation from French: Mr. Perović (Government adviser, Yugoslavia)—I associate myself fully with the gratitude expressed by preceding speakers to the Chairman of the Committee on Co-operatives, Mr. Wahid, Government delegate, Lebanon. He directed the work of the Committee with skill and wisdom. My thanks go also to his fellow officers, who ably assisted him in carrying out his duties. I should particularly like to stress that the meetings of the Committee on Co-operatives were characterised by exceptional activity, by a cordial atmosphere which was maintained throughout the proceedings, and above all by the success of the proceedings.

The Yugoslav members of the Committee participated actively in its work. They had two essential objectives: first of all, to contribute to the greatest possible extent in the search for the best possible solutions of the problems relating to the role of co-operatives in the economic and social progress of the developing countries, and secondly to show that co-operatives are regarded in Yugoslavia as an important instrument for the promotion of economic development, the establishment of progressive social relationships, and the raising of living standards. In this way we stressed the importance attached by Yugoslavia to the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries.

The Yugoslav delegation knew how the work of the Committee confirmed this—that the problems of co-operative development in developing countries are complex. Inevitably, therefore, these countries are faced with practical difficulties in promoting co-operatives. However, we are firmly convinced that the developing countries will be able to find solutions to all these problems, and we offer them our best wishes for success.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BIERZA-NEK (Workers' adviser, Poland)—First, I should like to associate myself with the congratulations which have been extended to Mr. Wahid, who was so successfully Chairman of the Committee on Co-operatives, as well as to Mr. Mathsson who objectively and accurately reported on our discussions.

I should like to express my deep-felt satisfaction with all that our Committee did during this session, with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation on co-operatives at the next session. I do this with particular pleasure in view of the fact that Poland is one of those countries where co-operatives have, for many years, played a paramount role in the life of the nation and where co-operative activity is particularly extensive.

The Proposed Conclusions are worthy of the warmest support from our Conference.

I have only two brief observations to make concerning these Conclusions. The first refers to the role of workers' trade union organisations in the development of co-operatives. It is well known that close and systematic collaboration between the unions and the co-operatives is one of the most powerful factors in the development of co-operatives. In many countries the trade unions have taken the initiative in setting up new co-operatives or have given further impetus to existing ones, both in regard to consumer co-operatives and to production or service co-operatives. In fact trade unions and co-operatives are means towards the same end, which is to raise the living standards of the workers.

This sociological fact of the natural alliance between the trade unions and the co-operatives has only been vaguely alluded to in the Conclusions. Although the Workers' group, in its amendment, proposed the insertion of a new Point on collaboration by the trade unions in regard to the formulation and application of policy respecting the creation and development of co-operatives, all that we obtained, in Point 9, as the result of a compromise with the other groups, is one provision according to which the co-operative movement should be encouraged to seek the co-operation of organisations with common objectives. This ambiguous wording was put in to satisfy certain speakers who considered that if trade unions were to play a definite role in the development of co-operatives, there was no reason why other groups, such as employers' organisations, should not enjoy the same right.

The tasks and responsibilities of the trade unions in the field of co-operation certainly cannot be compared with those of the employers' organisations, which obviously have little interest in assisting organisations which represent competition for them. I think it would be wise to reconsider the wording of Point 9 at the next session, in order to find a wording which, while it might be less diplomatic, would be more consistent with social realities.

My second observation concerns scientific research in the field of co-operatives. It is thanks to the initiative of the delegates of the Scandinavian countries that our Committee rightly decided to widen the scope of international collaboration in the field of co-operation by including in Point 34 (4) (g) a clause relating to "the initiatives necessary to promote scientific research into the structure, working methods and problems of co-operative movements in developing countries". I think we should go even further and envisage the possibility of setting up, within the I.L.O., a committee to study problems of co-operation which are of special concern to our Organisation. The tasks and competence of such a committee would be the same as those of the Industrial Committees.

Co-operative problems, as pointed out by a number of delegates, have been included for the first time in the agenda of a session of the International Labour Conference. For the first time in the history of co-operation, co-operative problems are being discussed in this large forum comprising over 100 countries. Many reasons lead us to foresee a growing interest in co-operation on the part of the I.L.O. in the near future, which will last beyond next year, when the second reading of the proposed Recommendation takes place. The Workers' group already at this session presented a proposed Convention and brought up in this way a number of questions of co-operative law and economics, such as the problems of taxing co-operatives and of tax exemptions for co-operatives in various countries. In these circumstances, it would seem useful to stress the importance of research in the field of co-operatives. These problems are extremely complicated for a number of reasons: there are differing traditions and methods in the co-operative movement; there are various fields of co-operative activity; co-operatives are now developing under economic and political systems; and, as the Director of the International Co-operative Alliance so rightly pointed out here, there is no monopoly of wisdom in the field of co-operatives.

Mr. BHEEKHABHAI (Government delegate, India)—I don't want to take up too much of the time of this august assembly because I have already had a chance to make certain general observations at the opening of the discussion of the Committee. On behalf of my delegation I wish to thank the Committee on Co-operatives for its lucid report. True to the spirit of co-operation, the three groups in the Committee have completed the task with a minimum of controversy and a maximum of understanding. The credit for the smooth functioning of the Committee is undoubtedly due to its able leader—the Chairman, Mr. Wahid, Government delegate, Lebanon. I should also like to extend my warmest appreciation to the L.I.O. Secretariat for its valuable contribution to the work of the Committee both before and during the present session of the Conference.

My delegation was happy to be able to participate in the work of the Committee on Co-operatives, and the outcome is, I believe, a worthy conclusion. It is undoubtedly true, as the report recognises, that we in India and the other developing countries have become familiar through the ages with the spirit and philosophy of co-operation and the essential spirit of social democracy implied by it. But the need of the moment is to diversify the activities of the co-operatives and the co-operative movement and bring them into tune with the demands of modern times. The spirit of co-operation should and must permeate all levels and bring lasting benefits to all sections of the people.

Of course, the success of the movement depends entirely on the extent of the voluntary response it evokes from the people, but the role of the governments in galvanising public opinion in favour of co-operatives and in affording assistance to them in all possible ways without jeopardising their independent functioning can hardly be overemphasised.

I am happy to say that my Government has accorded high priority to the development of co-operatives. Normally, every developing country has to formulate promotional plans in accordance with its circumstances and conditions. We realise that political freedom is not enough; in the words of our late Prime Minister, Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, political freedom "had to have a social content; it had to aim at economic freedom." We feel convinced that co-operatives developed along proper lines can contribute in a greater measure towards that freedom and ultimately to social justice.

The report now before us offers guidelines for the promotion of co-operatives. I am glad that, while it gives due attention to the various forms of aid which governments can extend to co-operatives in the financial, legislative and administrative fields, it also emphasises the value of educational publicity. The purposes of co-operatives, their role in uplifting the rural and urban population, need to be widely publicised.

I am also happy that the report makes special mention of the value of international collaboration in the co-operative field. I feel sure that, apart from direct mutual aid between the countries themselves, the I.L.O. and other United Nations agencies will continue to take an active interest in the promotion of cooperation all over the world and especially in the developing countries. Their assistance in this direction, of which we already had a foretaste in the I.L.O., will be invaluable.

On behalf of my delegation, I have pleasure in supporting this report and the Proposed Conclusions. Most of the specific measures suggested in the conclusions are already in operation in my country. We intend to pursue vigorously our efforts to promote and popularise co-operatives in our country as we feel that co-operation can form a real foundation-stone of social and economic democracy.

Mr. FRIETEMA (Government adviser, Netherlands)—Having been invited as an expert on co-operation to assist the Netherlands Government at this meeting, I am grateful to be given an opportunity to make one or two short comments.

The first is that I have been impressed by the intensive collaboration between the three groups of delegates which discussed this very complicated problem during the past fortnight. I am impressed especially by the attitude of Employers. It is a general phenomenon that they are often reluctant concerning the promotion by government of the co-operative type of enterprise. In the main, employers tend to stress that, as a principle, governments should be neutral in this respect. This attitude, this philosophy, came to the surface when the Employers wanted us to accept an amendment stating that if and when aid was given to co-operatives it should be given in such a way as not to violate the principle of equality. After a brief discussion that amendment was withdrawn. I feel happy about this because if it had been accepted the Recommendation envisaged regarding the promotion of co-operatives by governmental action would have lost a great deal of its value.

However—and this is my second and last remark—I am quite aware of the danger which is involved in the text before you. This danger is that too much may be expected. I have been a servant of co-operation all my life, and the co-operative movement in the Netherlands is well developed. Still, in my opinion, co-operation is not a general remedy for all social evils, and its success is subject to conditions which very often do not exist in developing countries.

When I was a student at the Netherlands School of Economics some 40 years ago the great economist Alfred Marshall was then generally admired. He was our great master, our great leader and teacher in the field of theoretical economics. I have to quote him from memory, but I remember that he wrote that co-operation had not done the impossible but that it had rendered, and is rendering, valuable services to mankind.

Let us hope that we here in Geneva have contributed to a social and economic development in which co-operation plays a certain and we hope, important role. If we have succeeded just a little in this, all the expense we have had and all the work we have done are fully justified.

Interpretation from French : Mr. ROLLINGER (Employers' adviser, Luxembourg)—Most of the preceding speakers have stressed the unanimity in the Committee regarding the proposals made to us. I should like to explain my vote, and that of some of my colleagues, and to make a number of statements also regarding what will be done next year with regard to this text.

I should like first of all to stress the great interest and utility of co-operatives as an economic and social instrument. However—and here I agree with the preceding speaker—I think that one should avoid giving the impression that the Recommendation before us is an end in itself, a miraculous panacea, creating dangerous illusions in the minds of those who will be examining such an international instrument. I say this because it is still true that production and services are in the final instance in the hands of human beings, and no legal instrument can suffice to increase productivity.

Therefore I should like to stress, particularly with a view to next year's discussion, we must maintain the unanimity which we achieved this year. I fear that it may be lost if we produce a much more precise instrument next year.
I therefore hope that we shall manage to avoid the danger of making co-operatives not an economic and social instrument, but a political or ideological tool. I think that it was a Czechoslovak speaker who expressed fear that the private aid provided might give rise to abuse. I understand this, but I should like to suggest rather that we avoid allowing such aid—which is so often necessary, particularly in developing countries—to upset the competitive situation;
I am grateful to the Reporter for stressing that we must avoid an abuse of that kind.

I close on this note, namely the hope that we can be as unanimous next year as we were this year in adopting an instrument which is neutral as regards ideology and politics, but is positive when it comes to increasing prosperity in the world.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. CUSIA-NOVICH VALDERAMA (Government delegate, Peru)—I come to this platform to associate myself with the expressions of satisfaction at the inclusion of this question of co-operatives on the agenda of the present session. We are also glad at the way in which the Committee has handled the subject.

I took part in a technical regional meeting on cooparatives in Latin American countries which was held at Santiago, Chile, in December 1963. I had the honour, owing to the generosity of those present, to preside over that meeting.
All those who attended were highly satisfied, not only at the results in themselves, but also at the evidence of the I.L.O.'s concern in holding a special meeting for Latin American countries— to upset the competitive situation;
I am grateful to the Reporter for stressing that we must avoid an abuse of that kind.

Now we are still more pleased because not only has this matter been handled by a regional conference, but it has played an important part in the agenda of the 49th Session of the General Conference.

I shall be brief; I shall not go into any doctrinal aspect of the co-operative question.
I will merely mention two concrete facts. One is the subject itself which was discussed at the meeting, the other is the spirit in which the Committee worked.

The fact that the I.L.O. has been dealing with the co-operative movement under the title "The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries" shows that the I.L.O. understands what the co-operative movement could do.
It is not a question of developing the movement just to occupy somebody's spare time. The subject suggests rather that we must at a certain moment leave other matters aside in order to take action on this subject of such importance for the development of many countries.

The work of the Committee went forward in such a manner it would be unjust to seek to improve it. There was a genuine spirit of cooperation, and I would like to associate myself with the congratulations offered to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Wahid, Mr.
Mathsson, and the whole Drafting Committee.
I should like also to offer thanks to the leaders of the Employers' and Workers' groups on the Committee, Mr. Rifat and Mr. Kane, because if there had not been this co-operative spirit the work would have been more difficult and the results less positive.

We must also publicly associate ourselves with the congratulations and thanks addressed by the Chairman of the Committee to the Secretariat staff, Mr. Orizet, particularly, who worked so hard and well to achieve the results.
I would like to congratulate also the interpreters and messengers and other people who helped the Committee to do its work.

I would like to refer to one other necessary thing: this session having dealt with cooperatives in the way in which it did, the result will be that all our countries will ask for more technical assistance regarding co-operatives.
It is important that the guiding lines offered by the I.L.O. prove satisfactory from that point of view. Our Latin American countries are prepared to help as far as they can, with a view to ensuring that this I.L.O. technical assistance is used as effectively as possible.

Peru has already, foreseeing this, offered Lima as the seat of a co-operative development institute for Latin America, following the 1963 meeting to which I referred at the outset.
I should like once more to congratulate Mr. Wahid and all those who helped him, and the President of the Conference, who must share in the credit.

The PRESIDENT—Since I have no more speakers on this report, I believe that the house is now ready to adopt the report. The discussion has been thorough, detailed and searching, and I hope you are in favour now of adopting this report. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the report is adopted.

(The report is adopted.)

Proposed Conclusions with a View to the Adoption of a Recommendation Concerning the Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries, Submitted by the Committee on Co-operatives^1:

Adoption

The PRESIDENT—We now take the Proposed Conclusions with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation concerning the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. If there are no objections, I shall consider them adopted.

1 See Appendix IX, p. 673.

(The Proposed Conclusions are adopted.)

Resolution concerning the Placing on the Agenda of the Next Ordinary Session of the Conference of the Question of the Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries, Submitted by the Committee on Co-operatives 1:

Adoption

The President—Now we proceed to the resolution concerning the placing on the agenda of the next ordinary session of the Conference of the question of the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. The vote will be by show of hands.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. The resolution is adopted by 200 votes in favour, none against, with no abstentions.)

The President—Before I move on to the report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform, may I express hearty thanks to the Chairman and the Reporter and the members of the Committee for their very valuable, patient work. It is quite obvious from what we have heard today that they have done a good job of work. Thank you very much.

Report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform 2: Submission, Discussion and Adoption

The President—The next item of business is the report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform. Will Mr. Armendares, the Chairman, and Mr. Pedersen, the Reporter, please come to the platform. I would ask Mr. Pedersen to submit the report.

Mr. Pedersen (Government adviser, Denmark; Reporter of the Committee on Agrarian Reform)—I have the honour to submit the report of the Committee on the item on the agenda named agrarian reform, with particular reference to employment and social aspects.

The Committee has been working under the able chairmanship of Mr. Armendares from Argentina, with the full and helpful support of the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Sepúlveda Lata­pia, Employers' delegate, Chile, and Mr. González Navarro, Workers' delegate, Venezuela.

The outcome of the work of the Committee is attached to the report which has been distributed. It is a resolution on the subject and describes the objectives of agrarian reform, with particular respect to social and employment questions. It describes the measures to be taken, among which the training of beneficiaries, other personnel, and the introduction of co-operatives are particularly emphasised; and finally, the resolution contains some proposals as to the action to be taken by the I.L.O. in the future.

The Committee hopes that our resolution will be favourably considered and adopted by the Conference.

I do not intend to go into any detail as to the work of the Committee. I should like to say that it has throughout been carried on in a spirit of energy and co-operation. For further information, I ask you to refer to the report which is before you. I should like very much, however, to emphasise the unanimous view of the Committee as to the importance of agrarian reform in several countries of the world, so as to create an agrarian structure which is favourable to a sound economic development and satisfactory development also in the field of employment and social conditions.

Farming in many parts of the world today is unfortunately closely connected with poor social standards and varying degrees of unemployment and underemployment. It is a matter of experience that, unless the basic structure of agriculture and of the rural community as a whole in such places is greatly changed and improved, then you cannot otherwise do very much. The basic structure must be established in a better way if you are to expect lasting improvements by introducing things like social legislation and other measures intended to improve the social conditions, including employment and working conditions.

Moreover, I wish to emphasise the aspects of international co-operation and division of labour among the various agencies which are interested in the matter. This is essential in order to promote satisfactory agrarian reforms where the need for such is present. The Committee had the privilege of the participation in our work of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations in the person of Mr. Jacoby, and of the United Nations in the person of Mr. Luker. It is a matter of course, on which the Committee was fully agreed, that the International Labour Organisation has an important contribution to make, particularly as regards the employment and social aspects, while fully recognising the primary responsibility of the Food and Agriculture Organisation in the subject as a whole and in the technical aspects of agriculture in particular.

In this respect the resolution prepared by the Committee calls attention to the concerted action of the Committee to the concerted international action programme in the field of agrarian reform. The resolution is, we hope, a significant document in support of this joint effort, but these concerted activities must of course be constantly kept under observation and consideration by all agencies concerned in order to safeguard the future.

May I finally express my country's and my personal gratitude to the Committee on Agrarian Reform of this session of the International Labour Conference for the honour of having been entrusted with the most interesting task of acting as Reporter. I hope you will favourably consider the report and the resolution. If so, all credit goes to the Committee and to the valuable assistance given to our work by the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Anker, and by the other expert staff of the International Labour Office.

With these few words, I have the honour of submitting the report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform.

1 See Appendix IX, p. 676 and Appendix XII, p. 707.
2 See Appendix VIII, p. 650.
The President—The report is now open for general discussion.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. Armendares (Government delegate, Argentina; Chairman of the Committee on Agrarian Reform)—It is with great satisfaction that, as Chairman of the Committee on Agrarian Reform, I submit the report of the Committee to this 49th Session of the International Labour Conference. My satisfaction stems from the happy circumstance that the report was unanimously adopted by the Committee.

Agrarian reform is a polemical question in itself and has obvious political repercussions, but the proposals were endorsed by all the delegates representing various parts of the world and various political ideologies. We are certain that we have produced a text which corresponds to the new objectives that the I.L.O. has set itself and which can serve as a basis for future discussions. If throughout our resolution we can contribute to changing in any way the rural structures of the developing countries and to bringing a little more happiness and prosperity to the rural worker, we shall be fully satisfied with our achievement.

The Reporter has already described the general lines of the proposed text. All that remains for me to do is to add my profound thanks to all the members of the Committee for their spirit of co-operation, which made my task most pleasant. I would particularly like to thank the Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Sepúlveda Latapiat, Employers' member, Chile, and Mr. González Navarro, Workers' member, Venezuela. I would also like to express my gratitude to the representative of the Secretary-General, Mr. Anker, who was an excellent, tireless and loyal collaborator, as well as to his staff.

This morning Mr. Morse reminded the Conference that the supreme objective of the I.L.O. is to alleviate human suffering. We should be glad indeed if the proposed resolution which we are submitting to the Conference can contribute at all to achieving this objective.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. Sepúlveda Latapiat (Employers' delegate, Chile; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on Agrarian Reform)—I should like to start by thanking, in the name of the Employers' members of this Committee, the Chairman, Mr. Armendares, who has just spoken, for his excellent work. We also wish to thank Mr. Anker and the technical staff; also our Reporter and all the members of the Committee, particularly the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. González Navarro, with whom we managed to co-operate in a very fine spirit and with good results.

This spirit of understanding which characterised the work of the Committee is certainly worthy of mention at this time. It does not mean that the Employers are all in agreement with all the measures referred to in the report which we are now discussing. There are reservations to be made on certain points—in particular with regard to paragraphs 1, 7 and 8. However, what I wish to point out now is that we are considering a resolution tending to lay down the general lines of a policy to be followed by the I.L.O. within its field of competence, and it is in this general sense that we accept the resolution and in which we call attention to its importance.

Agrarian reform, as has already been said, is one of the most difficult questions which can be discussed. Its social and political repercussions give rise to tension where it is undertaken, and even violence has not infrequently accompanied it. It is very important and encouraging that at an international conference like this the possibility of an understanding regarding agrarian reform should have been demonstrated. A number of factors have enabled us to achieve the result which is now reflected in the report before the Conference: there was the spirit of understanding of the speakers; there was technical efficiency and advice from the I.L.O.; but, above all, there was real agreement on fundamental aspects of the reform. First of all, the Committee was convinced that agrarian reform is a requirement of today. This means that those who now have the land take a constructive line and do not simply wish to defend themselves. That was the position taken by the Employers' group, and I am honoured to say here that all my efforts as spokesman of most of the Employers were aimed towards faithfully interpreting this feeling of most of the Employers.

Agrarian reform generally gives rise to contradictions between its social and economic objectives. The farm workers among our peoples require social progress, but our countries as a whole have urgent economic development needs, to which agriculture must contribute. How is one to harmonise the objectives of social progress, which are of interest to agricultural workers, with the objectives of economic development which are of interest to the whole population? That is one of the most acutely difficult points in any process of agrarian reform.

At this Conference, however, we have achieved advances which represent useful experiments that can be tried out in actual national conditions. The first thing is to have clear objectives, and in the Committee there was sufficient clarification, as reflected in the report and draft resolution.

Through agrarian reform we have to seek both economic and social development; the improvement of agricultural production and the raising of standards of life must be objectives, neither of which should exclude the other. The dignity of those who live in the country and the obtaining of more food for the towns are both necessary objectives.

We did not meet at this Conference to create abstract formulas, nor was our attitude in the Committee based on negative reactions. The resolution sets out our faith that agrarian reform will be achieved not as a process destructive to existing production systems, but as a form of progress in which the good which now exists will be preserved and stimulated, so that efforts may be dedicated to correcting what may be defective. We must never aim at doing anything which is not a positive advance.

Each nation will have to examine the circumstances prevailing there. It was very satisfactory to the Employers to secure the inclusion of a special reference to the effect that the manner in which the existing methods of land tenure sufficiently protect the workers and promote rational cultivation must be considered.

Thus, on the part of the Employers, we take a very responsible attitude. I said in the Committee and I repeat now that we believe that the entrepreneur has two fundamental responsibilities: he has to do his social duty faithfully towards the workers, and he has a responsibility as the whole of society to use the land properly, because it is in short supply in many countries. The social function of the land must include both these aspects.

If the employer duly complies with these two obligations, then he can ask that he be respected within the agrarian reform, which he faces with a positive spirit; a clear discrimination should be made between the good and the bad agricultural employer, with a view to supporting the former and to taking energetic action against the latter.

It is also made clear in our discussion that the workers' organisations have an important role to play in agrarian reform, and the Employers fully recognise this fact. The action of the trade unions must be aimed in two directions, as set out in the document. First of all, they must defend their own group interests; secondly, they must make their necessary contribution to general development objectives.

Employers are against the selfishness of employers and we are glad to see that the Workers are against trade union selfishness and are disposed to recognise that in order to achieve economic development at a general level they must act responsibly, for on that will depend the policy of the trade unions towards the undertaking, so that incomes will not be redistributed at the expense of the aggregate national income, for this is already low on a per head basis; mere redistribution of income will not suffice to solve the workers' problems.

Another of the important aspects of our discussion in the Committee is the conviction that low standards of life in rural areas do not depend only on the land tenure system or even exclusively on other agrarian structures. Land tenure questions are a necessary part of any agrarian reform, but it cannot be expected that changes in this matter will bring economic and social improvement if technical improvements, credit, co-operative organisations and so on, are not included. Agrarian reform programmes must be placed in the context of the national economy. One cannot expect agrarian reform to bring economic and social improvement if defective price structures prevail which keep the standard of living down, if marketing is parasitic, or if governments systematically neglect the rural sectors in assigning public funds for housing, education or health.

We have not proposed any definite formula for solving marketing or other problems such as I have mentioned, but we have pointed out that these problems must be faced together because one cannot conceive that agrarian problem depends exclusively on farmers or can be resolved only at the rural level. Agrarian reform should not be held up because marketing is deficient, nor should we refrain from parceling out land which is poorly worked because credit is short; but we would be deceiving people if we were offering them something as impossible as agrarian reform restricted to merely redistributing the land, and which does not require the other sectors of the economy to correct systems outside agriculture which hamper development in agriculture.

All these are substantial aspects on which we reached agreement in the Committee. At future sessions of the Conference we shall have to deal with successive instruments to be drawn up in order to handle special aspects of agrarian reform within the competence of the I.L.O.

I am certain that if we act with the same objectivity as on this occasion, useful agreements will be reached in future sessions of the Conference also, and we shall thus enable the I.L.O. to make a valuable contribution to the implementation of agrarian reforms capable of promoting economic and social development in our countries.

It is for these reasons that I should like to express the support of the Employers in the Committee for this report, and I ask the Conference to accept it and the resolution.

Mr. LUKER (Representative of the United Nations)—Thank you for allowing me to say a word or two on behalf of the Secretary-General of the United Nations.

Agrarian reform is a subject so wide and so complex that, as has frequently been mentioned in the Committee's report, and as has just been stressed again by Mr. Pedersen, co-ordination between the various international organisations concerned is quite essential. This is true negatively to avoid duplication and positively to ensure collaboration. It is indeed a very good example of the type of collaboration that was mentioned by Mr. Morse in his speech this morning.

Because of this, the Secretary-General is appreciative of the opportunities given, through his representatives, to participate in the I.L.O. discussions on agrarian reform, first at the Governing Body, then at the Technical Advisory Group, and now at this session of the Conference.

It so happens that the debate in your Committee coincided with the publication of the United Nations report, Progress in Land Reform, a document prepared jointly by the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organisation, and the International Labour Organisation. This is the fourth report of its kind and is issued in response to a General Assembly resolution that reflects the importance given to land reform by asking that comprehensive surveys should be made at three-yearly intervals. This fourth report on progress in land reform will be considered by the Economic and Social Council at its session in Geneva next month.

Our future collaboration will therefore be facilitated by being placed in the context of detailed and recent discussion of the subject both in the International Labour Conference and in the Economic and Social Council.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. KIREV (Government adviser, Bulgaria)—The work of our Committee lasted for more than two weeks. The subject is a very important one for the future of the exploited majority of peasants—that is, the question of agrarian reform. It must be said that our work was done in a business-like manner. We had a detailed report which was competently prepared by the Technical Advisory Group on Agrarian Reform. Then a favourable atmosphere was created in the Committee itself and its Working Party.

A great deal of help was given to all of us by Mr. Anker, the representative of the Director-General. Mr. Armendares conducted the discussions very skilfully. Thanks to the efforts of the officers and the Secretariat the Committee's work ran very smoothly.

During the discussions there was a calm atmosphere in which we had a detailed debate on this very important issue. There were varying—even contradictory—opinions, but, nevertheless, there was an atmosphere of tolerance and cordiality.

Almost all delegates recognised that the question of agrarian reform is very urgent and a matter of economic and political necessity.

There was a great divergence of views concerning the form of an international instrument on agrarian reform and when it should be adopted and implemented. It was gratifying that we adopted a resolution on agrarian reform, but we regret that the work of our Committee did not lead to a stronger instrument—that is, a Convention. Many delegates spoke in favour of adopting a Convention and of putting the subject on the agenda of the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference.

There were also many different views in the Committee as to what should be done about large private estates. Everybody agreed that agrarian reform was necessary, but, as soon as discussion turned on the need for rapid action and the fate of the large estates, disagreement began, and the Employers in particular questioned what was perfectly obvious. It often happens that where class interests are involved the interested classes try to dispute the most obvious truths. Some delegates cunningly attempted to defend large private estates and suggested they should be maintained while agrarian reform is carried out.

Depending on whether the large private estates are maintained, seriously reduced or liquidated the area of land to be covered by agrarian reform and then handed over to the peasants who work it will be greater or less. The starting point of agrarian reform, as of the peasants' struggle for the land, is the fact that large estates are in the hands of a few private persons, it abolished private ownership of large estates; owing to the particular agrarian structure in our country in the past, under which there were no large estates, agrarian reform also affected the kulak class; agrarian reform was carried out in the interests of peasants having little or no land, and an essential provision was that they were given their land free of charge; agrarian reform transferred part of the expropriated lands to the landless peasants, while the rest was transferred to the State; agrarian reform helped the establishment of producer co-operatives and state farms.

Thus the 1946 agrarian reform helped to bring about a radical solution of the agrarian question for the benefit of the labouring peasants in our country. The organisation of farms in the co-operative organisation led to a final radical solution of the agrarian question with the same purpose.

Mr. LAMARTINE YATES (Representative of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations)—On behalf of the Food and Agriculture Organisation, I should like to say how much we welcome the interest shown at this session of the International Labour Conference in the subject of agrarian reform, which, as experience in many parts of the world shows, is something that has to be undertaken before agricultural development can move forwards satisfactorily.

The Conference will be interested to learn that the F.A.O., as the agency having primary responsibility in this field, will convene in June 1966 in Rome a World Conference on Agrarian Reform at which governments will be invited to evaluate the situation in their respective countries. By focusing attention on this problem, and on the need for more energetic reform programmes, we can hasten the removal of archaic tenure systems, which today represent a major barrier to the achievement of rural prosperity.

The F.A.O. particularly appreciates the report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform which is now before this session of the Conference. It is gratifying to find so much attention to positive measures which will further the aims we all have in view. The F.A.O. specially welcomes the resolution which the Committee has submitted to this session of the Conference for adoption and which, as we understand it, calls for I.L.O. action to be extended and intensified in respect of the social and employment aspects of a wide range of items which are essential elements in the battle for land reform.

It is certain that the active support of this Conference, coupled with the special meeting scheduled for next year, will mean that significant progress in agrarian reform figures on the agenda of the 39th Session of the Economic and Social Council which convenes here in a few days' time. On that occasion an opportunity will be provided, at Council level, all the activities of the United Nations family in this field and to support the initiatives taken at this Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. RECALDE (Employers' delegate, Argentina)—I have asked to speak in this plenary sitting as the Employers' delegate from the Argentine in order to explain our attitude towards agrarian reform. I am glad to say how pleased we were to work in the Committee and at the good work done under the Chairman, Mr. Armendares, whose skill enabled us to reach positive results.

As the Technical Advisory Group pointed out, it is difficult to lay down standards of general application on this subject of agrarian reform because regard must be had to differences in the political, economic and social conditions prevailing in each country if one is not to make mistakes and cause irreparable damage.

We employers in developing countries are fully aware of the changes which it is necessary to make in economic and social structures in order that the potential of our countries may be fully exploited and particularly in order to increase the gross national product, to raise the standard of living and to permit the better economic and social training of our people so that they may contribute efficiently, voluntarily, and indeed enthusiastically to building the nation.

Agrarian reform as part of a harmonious programme of economic and social development has become something more than a political expression of claims on behalf of the landless classes. It now includes programmes for the modification of agrarian structures under which the problem of redistributing land must be faced in the light of economics and technology and with a view to achieving social equity. Regard must be had to the effective working of the land by farmers who have the right amount of land for the type of cultivation involved and who have the necessary infrastructure, as well as the technical, credit, health, education and welfare facilities needed for satisfactory production and productivity and to achieve the optimum utilisation of a given area in the light of the social function which properly belongs to the land.

Accordingly farmers must be able to operate in an atmosphere in which agricultural methods and marketing arrangements permit them to reach sufficiently high levels of production and productivity and also to obtain stable and remunerative prices on the national and international markets.

Co-operative organisations, which they could join of their own free will, could be extremely helpful in improving production, providing equipment, obtaining credit and making satisfactory marketing arrangements. We accept the idea of a harmonious conjunction of agricultural and industrial interests, in accordance with the characteristics of each country, and without discrimination against rural workers. We also accept the idea that the problems of production in urban and in rural conditions should be faced jointly because they are two components of the same national unit.

The task of the Working Party appointed to prepare a text for the Committee was hard, but it finally succeeded in producing a balanced expression of the views of the three groups. This achievement shows the great progress which has been made as regards relations between employers and workers, largely due to I.L.O. action. That was evident from the wide measure of agreement between the two groups on important features of agrarian reform, which certainly facilitated the work.

We have, however, to disagree with some statements to the effect that the Employers' group systematically defended the large estates. On the contrary we accepted without discussion the principle of limiting the size of properties, depending on the type of cultivation and with a view to greater efficiency in the use of the land in the interests of the community as a whole.

In indicating our agreement with the general principles of the proposed text, we consider that it should lead to the training of a greater number of efficient entrepreneurs who have a clear understanding of their functions as producers and who are anxious to acquire more technical and cultural knowledge.

We regard the last words of paragraph 4 as encouraging, indeed the phrase in question seems to be a new feature in I.L.O. conclusions. The passage to which I refer implies that recognition and respect are due to farmers who cultivate their land efficiently and with awareness of their social function.

In closing, I repeat our support for the report. Such vague expressions as "subdividing the land" and "giving the land to those who work it" have been heard, but the Committee's report on this point may be summed up as asserting the broader concept that land must be given to those who will achieve the conditions enabling them to work it with a high degree of social efficiency.

Lord COLLISON (Workers' delegate, United Kingdom)—I think that I should explain that I have been asked to come to the rostrum to speak for the Workers' members of the Committee because, unfortunately, Mr. González Navarro, the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee, has had to leave the Conference.

worked well and in good harmony. There was a great deal of understanding between the various parties on it, which enabled us to produce in the end a report which I believe can secure the support of all delegates to this Conference. On our side, we should like to pay a tribute to our Chairman, Mr. Armendares, and also to the representatives of the Office, headed by Mr. Anker. They gave us a great deal of help and, where necessary, advice, and we are grateful to them.

With regard to the subject that we discussed—agrarian reform—the Committee first of all tried to decide what in fact agrarian reform was. There has been in the past some misunderstanding as to what it is. Agrarian reform is not a single thing, it is not simply the transfer of land or the redivision of land, although that is part of it and in some cases a very important part. The main objective of agrarian reform is to create an agricultural structure, in different countries and perhaps by different means, whereby those people working in agriculture as owners of land, farmers, or as peasants owning small pockets of land, or as hired workers, can achieve a proper standard of living and a decent income. That is the first objective of agrarian reform. The second objective, of course, is to ensure that the land is worked efficiently and well. To my mind, these two things together can be summed up by the use of the word “viable” or “viability.” The objective of agrarian reform must be to create a structure of holdings which ensures that each holding, whether large or small, whether worked by a peasant or by a farmer employing labour, is economically viable.

We agreed, in the end, that the definition laid down by the Technical Advisory Group was the correct one, and I think it is worth reading. It says: “Agrarian reform should be considered as denoting comprehensive measures for the improvement of agrarian structure, including changes in land tenure, that is, reforms that, within the framework of broad programmes, tend to give land to those who work it, improve the position of tenants and share-croppers and of hired farm workers, or enlarge the units of cultivation or operation and consolidated holdings. It also includes the establishment or strengthening of essential governmental or other agencies or services relating to agricultural credit, supply, marketing, training and extension and research.”

So you see that agrarian reform involves a number of activities and a number of considerations and that together these things are aimed at doing what I described when I started—creating a structure which will enable those people working on the land to enjoy a good standard of living and enable agriculture to produce the essential commodity, food, efficiently and well so that the starving peoples of the world can be fed.

My second point this afternoon is to make it clear that we all understood that you could not make one common definition as to structure, that what would evolve might be very different in one country as compared with another; very different perhaps in one country with a certain political structure as compared with a country with a different structure. We were not discussing politics, we were discussing a practical programme which, applied in the appropriate way according to the circumstances in each place, could lead to the improvement of the structure of agriculture in the way I have described.

Despite the fact that we recognised that one could not lay down hard and fast rules, as it were, that one could not just draw a blueprint for agrarian structure which could apply to all countries—we know that cannot be done—the Workers’ group was very anxious to produce a document with teeth, and the view was widely expressed in the Workers’ group that the outcome of our discussions should be in the form of a Recommendation. We knew it was explained to us, that this was not possible at this session of the Conference—that is to say, measures had not been taken, governments had not been asked to give their comments on a proposed text, therefore it could not be done. And we knew and had to accept in the knowledge that all that could be done was to produce a resolution, which we did before you. But I want to be quite frank with the Conference and make it clear that the Workers are anxious and desirous, and indeed determined, that matters pertaining to agrarian reform shall be brought before future sessions of the Conference.

Of course, there is not only one thing, there are many issues, as I have explained, which have a bearing on agrarian reform, and these could well lead to the development of one or two Conventions and perhaps one or two Recommendations, and perhaps to a general Recommendation which would be broad enough in its wording to be used in place of the resolution we now have before us. Therefore we pressed for the inclusion of a sentence recommending the Governing Body to place on the agenda of the 51st and following sessions of the International Labour Conference, as a follow-up to the item already included in the agenda of the 49th Session in 1965, the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the I.L.O. after consultation with other United Nations agencies and especially the Food and Agriculture Organisation.

If I may at this point, I want to thank the representative of the Food and Agriculture Organisation who has just spoken for the wise words he said to us.

We know, of course, that we were criticised in the Committee for suggesting that it would be possible for the I.L.O. to go further in this matter. We recognise, too, that in this field other agencies are involved, and indeed vitally involved, and we are anxious, as the Workers’ group, that there should be no overlapping or duplication of effort. We have covered our position and the position of the Conference and the Governing Body by requesting the Governing Body to bring before future sessions items relating to agrarian structure within the competence of the I.L.O. and, where necessary, after consultation, I am sure this puts the matter very clearly, very precisely and very properly. It is the way to go about it.

I would finish by asking you all to give your full support to this resolution. When it gets to the Governing Body we shall have to... consider what further can be done, but let me say with the utmost conviction, as one concerned with agriculture all over the world, that agrarian reform is the most vital and urgent matter which has to be dealt with in all countries, and I do not exclude developed countries in that regard.

I repeat that we must clearly understand that it is not a question of dogma or of politics or of one answer. It is the objective that matters, the objective of giving the workers and those in agriculture a fair standard, the objective of producing food efficiently to feed the world. That objective can be reached in a number of different ways. There is no one way. So long as one understands what the objective is, so long as one understands the conditions within a country and what needs doing within a particular country, then one can, and indeed must, make progress in this direction. So we were grateful to have this item on the agenda. As I said when I started, the Committee worked very well, and I endorse what the Employers' representative said. There was a good understanding. I believe that understanding was there because we spent—and some people thought this was wrong—some considerable time in making clear in discussion among ourselves and bringing out clearly what agrarian reform was. Having got that clear, the rest became easy and you have this report before you.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. CHEKREWUSKHN (Government adviser, U.S.S.R.)—In my short speech I should like with great satisfaction to state that the I.L.O. has before it a very fine objective, namely to include in its programme the study of the vital problem of agrarian reform. The well-being of half the people of the world depends on the solution of this problem. If there are still poverty, hunger, social and economic backwardness and injustice in many countries, this is because they have preserved feudal and semi-feudal structures until the present day, hampering the progress of mankind.

Agrarian reform is a complex measure. Its basis is the expropriation of the big landowners, the latifundists, with the object of handing the land to those who work it. It is quite intelligible that agrarian reform seems somewhat frightening, but God created work for all—as the believers say—and not only for those select few who have grabbed the land and all its wealth for themselves. For all progressive and right-thinking people it has become quite obvious that agrarian reform is indispensable. It consists not only in redistributing the ownership of land; it aims at other objectives, and right-thinking people it has become quite intelligible that agrarian reform seems something more than the solution of the problem of land reform. Sooner or later this problem will be solved everywhere. In the interests of the workers, of course, and for society as a whole, it would be better to solve this problem earlier rather than later.

The procedural obstacles to which I referred are due to the fact that, according to the Constitution and the Standing Orders, any recommendations on agrarian reform cannot be considered in less than two years after this session. This once again shows that the conditions laid down in the Constitution and in the Standing Orders are preventing the I.L.O. from keeping pace with the times. These outmoded provisions must be amended. It is our hope that the Governing Body will bring about an earlier examination of agrarian reform in the I.L.O. so that in the near future it will be possible to work out a stronger instrument—either a Convention or at least a Recommendation.

Having mentioned these hopes, we would like to say that we support the resolution submitted to the Conference.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MACIAN (Workers' adviser, Mexico)—Mr. President, I greet you and I endorse briefly the compliments paid by other members to yourself and other officers, and I would like immediately to proceed to the substance of the debate and ask for approval of the documents before us. Although the agrarian problem differs from one country to another, there is a common denominator. Where there are latifundia there are political cliques, injustice, instability, lack of education and complete absence of social justice for most of the workers.

Most of the world’s population lives in or depends on the rural areas; and this Organisation, which took its impetus from the League of Nations, must deal with the agrarian problem in all parts of the world. It is inconceivable that the latifundia should continue to exist.

I am a Mexican. I have lived through the experience of my own country where there were great estates. There was concentration of the land first of all in the hands of the clergy until 1857, when two-thirds of the country were controlled by it and the rest was in the hands of a privileged few. Subsequently, as the outcome of various political and social issues, there was reconcentration in the hands of a few persons, so that it was necessary to have a violent revolution—the first in the present century. We had 20 years of war as a result, to reach a new concept of ownership, a new concept of land distribution.

My speech on this occasion is to ask you to approve the document so intelligently worked out by the Committee, but please remember also that this matter should be discussed again next year, so that finally we may put an end to the latifundia and social injustice in the world.

The PRESIDENT—As there are no more speakers, the discussion is now closed and I trust that the house is now prepared to adopt this report. If there are no objections, I shall consider the report as adopted.

RESOLUTION ON AGRARIAN REFORM, WITH PARTICULAR REFERENCE TO EMPLOYMENT AND SOCIAL ASPECTS, SUBMITTED BY THE COMMITTEE ON AGRARIAN REFORM:

ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT—I will now put the resolution on agrarian reform, with particular reference to employment and social aspects. If there are no objections, I shall take it that the resolution is adopted.

The PRESIDENT—And now it remains for me to thank cordially the Chairman, the Reporter, and the members of this Committee for the excellent work they have done and for the very good report which they have produced. Thank you very much.

(The Conference adjourned at 6.45 p.m.)

THIRTY-FIRST SITTING

Wednesday, 23 June 1965, 10 a.m.

President: Mr. Raza

FIRST REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE ¹:
SUBMISSION AND DISCUSSION

The PRESIDENT—The first item on the agenda is the first report of the Resolutions Committee. I would ask the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, Mr. Aguilar, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. AGUILAR (Government delegate, Venezuela; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee)—I have the pleasure to submit to the Conference the first report of the Resolutions Committee, the text of which has been circulated.

The Resolutions Committee, which was appointed by the Conference at its first sitting on 2 June, had 123 voting members: 66 Government members, 24 Employers' members and 33 Workers' members.

In accordance with the procedure established in paragraph 5(a) of article 17 of the Standing Orders, the Committee established the order in which the first five resolutions would be examined, which was as follows:

1. Resolution concerning paid educational leave, submitted by Mr. Beermann, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, and Mr. Hernandez, Workers' delegate, Philippines.

2. Resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers, submitted by Mr. Thondaman, Workers' delegate, Ceylon.

4. Resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation, submitted by Mr. Abid Ali, Workers' delegate, India; Mr. Faupl, Workers' delegate, United States; and Mr. Möri, Workers' delegate, Switzerland.

5. Resolution concerning the carrying out by the International Labour Organisation of studies of the social and economic consequences of disarmament, submitted by Mr. Polyanichko, Government delegate, Ukraine.

In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5(b), of the Standing Orders, the Committee appointed a working party composed of three Government members, three Employers' members and three Workers' members, to make recommendations as to the order in which the resolutions which were not included in the first five should be examined.

On the unanimous recommendation of this working party, whose Chairman was Mr. Shkunaev, the Committee decided that the remaining three resolutions to be considered after the first five should be taken in the following order:

6. Resolution condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration, submitted by Mr. Kamel, Government delegate, United Arab Republic.

7. Resolution concerning the protection of the rights of Spanish workers, submitted by Mr. Tabor, Workers' delegate, Yugoslavia.

8. Resolution concerning equitable geographical representation of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation in its Governing Body as well as equitable geographical representation of elective offices at the sessions of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body, submitted by Mr. Chajn, Government delegate, Poland, and Mr. Polyanichko, Government delegate, Ukraine.

The Committee was able to examine only the first six resolutions.

It is a great satisfaction for me to inform the Conference of the fact that the discussions of the Committee took place with the greatest order and with absolute respect, in spite of the intense discussion that took place concerning some of the resolutions.

This high level of the discussions was possible thanks to the valuable co-operation I had from the Vice-Chairmen of the Committee, Mr. Verschueren and Mr. Kaplansky, as well as from all the members. At all times I received the greatest co-operation from Mr. Verschueren and Mr. Kaplansky, and they were of great guidance to me not only on behalf of their groups but on behalf of the whole of the Committee. Both showed that great spirit of conciliation which is characteristic of our Organisation.

I should like to thank, on this occasion, the two Vice-Chairmen, Mr. Verschueren and Mr. Kaplansky, the members of the Committee, the representative of the Secretary-General and all the administrative staff of the I.L.O., interpreters, etc., who co-operated so actively in the work of this Committee.

On behalf of the Committee, I recommend the adoption of the first report of the Resolutions Committee.

The PRESIDENT—The report is now open for general discussion.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VER-SCHUEREN (Employers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—I should be failing in my duty if, first of all, I did not pay a well-deserved tribute, in the name of the other Employers and in my own name, to the person who guided the Committee so well through the obstacles of procedure and of passion which arose in the course of its sometimes difficult work. His vigilant care, his authority, combined with kindness, and his constant impartiality brought His Excellency Ambassador Aguilar warm and exceptionally prolonged applause from all groups and tendencies in the Committee. If one considers the tension and passion of some of the discussion I am sure you will agree with me that we are greatly indebted to him. I would add that we found it particularly agreeable to co-operate with him.

I should also like to welcome the frankness of my relations with the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Kaplansky. I was able to count on this frankness and co-operation because we had already both been Vice-Chairmen of this Committee a number of years ago, and I was glad that my expectations were confirmed.

I should like to repair an omission committed in our haste on Saturday. We must thank all the Secretariat and the interpreters for their kind and devoted help.

The general part of the report which the Conference is now asked to approve states a certain number of things regarding the number of resolutions submitted, their titles and the order of priority which was attributed to them in accordance with the Standing Orders.

These statements call for three comments. First of all, the procedure for determining the order of priority has a certain advantage—it relieves the Committee of a long and boring discussion regarding its order of work. The authors of resolutions which are postponed until the end of the session may be disappointed but they would be wrong to ignore the lessons of two years' experience. The majority of the Committee generally wishes to have first priority given to resolutions dealing with strictly social questions which are likely to contribute something new to the work of the I.L.O. Secondly, the number of resolutions which the Conference can digest is obviously limited, even if the Resolutions Committee, as was the case in recent years, meets very often, indeed sometimes more often than is bearable. Thirdly, the right to submit resolutions seems to be used sometimes for reasons different from that for which it was established. The right to submit resolutions is clearly intended to produce new ideas regarding the operation of the Organisation and the more effective exploration of fields within its competence. It is not, I think, intended to be substituted for or to duplicate other constitutional procedures or measures under the Standing Orders such as those relating to commissions of inquiry, the application of Conventions and Recommendations, or the work of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Because I wish to be brief, I should like to state straight away that I have little in the way of particular comments to make on the four out of the five resolutions which were unanimously adopted, or almost unanimously. I merely wish to ask the Conference to endorse the conclusions of the Committee regarding resolutions Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5, which relate respectively to the conditions of employment of domestic workers; vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons; industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation; and carrying out by the International Labour Organisation of the social and economic consequences of disarmament.

The Committee's report is sufficiently explicit for me not to have to repeat what has been said.

However, I shall have to ask for the floor again when resolution No. 1, concerning paid educational leave, is taken up by the Conference, when I shall explain why the Employers cannot support this resolution.

Mr. KAPLANSKY (Workers' adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—On behalf of the Workers' group, I should like at the outset to pay tribute to the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Aguilar, for the way he conducted our deliberations and the way he guided us through the difficult two weeks during which our Committee was engaged in the consideration of the resolutions submitted in the report before you. I have served under many chairmen in this Organisation in the past, and I can only say—and I say it on behalf of the whole Workers' group—that from the point of view of efficiency, impartiality and fair play Mr. Aguilar does not have to take second place to anyone.

It was also a pleasure to work with Mr. Verschueren, the Employers' Vice-Chairman. We differed on a number of occasions on very important matters which came up before the Committee. However, this spirit of co-operation, and the relationship which has been established in this Organisation over the years, has enabled us to attend to the business of the Committee with despatch and good humour, and to attain good results.

At this point I should like to inform the Workers' members of this Conference that the Workers' group has supported all five resolutions which are before you in the first report of the Resolutions Committee. We met for two weeks, but the issues and problems which we discussed were of such importance to workers all over the world that the results of the two weeks' deliberations commend themselves to the attention and the support not only of the Workers' members of this Conference but of all the delegates.
The first resolution which the Committee dealt with was the question of paid educational leave. This is the first time that the I.L.O. has considered in detail this very important problem. We heard that in a number of countries, including my own, paid educational leave is no longer a novelty, but there are many countries where this concept is still unknown or relatively unknown. It is therefore important that the I.L.O., through this resolution, shed light on whether or not the I.L.O. will in the end benefit millions of workers throughout the world. I very much regret that the Employers' group did not find it possible to support this resolution when it was finally drafted, and in the form in which it is presented to this Conference, but I should like to draw the attention of the Conference to paragraph 14, and I am going to read it because this represents the point of view of the Workers.

The Workers' members ... maintained that the I.L.O. was not justified to initiate the first steps which might lead to the adoption by the I.L.O. of an international instrument concerning this question."

We have tried to avoid any specific discussion of the details of this concept. It is a new concept and it has to be studied. We ask for these studies. We want the I.L.O. to inaugurate these studies, but a detailed consideration of this problem—the question of what it should contain, the definitions, the spelling out of benefits—would be left to another session of the I.L.O. Conference which would consider the adoption of an international instrument. At this Conference we are considering the adoption of this idea in principle, the adoption of the concept, and I would again appeal to the Employers' group and to all delegates present to support this initiative because this resolution inaugurates a new action and new activities. After all, it is the very purpose of the Resolutions Committee, when new ideas and new concepts are born, to determine the future programme of the Organisation.

The second resolution, of importance to a certain class of workers, was the resolution which we are recommending on domestic workers. The I.L.O. has considered this problem on many occasions, but it is some time since the I.L.O. has taken up this question in detail. The time has come for the Organisation to try to consider the adoption of an instrument and to bring together a number of experts from many countries to give aid and comfort to a group of workers who are, as a rule, being exploited, who have no collective voices raised to speak for them and who have not even got an Employers' group to discuss in a collective manner the conditions of their work and employment. I think that in this respect also the Resolutions Committee has performed a very useful function.

The third resolution which the Committee presents to you is the resolution concerning vocational rehabilitation of disabled workers. In this connection too the Resolutions Committee has tried to start a new departure in I.L.O. thinking on this problem. As you know, ten years ago the I.L.O. adopted a Recommendation on this subject, but since then no account has been taken of the experience in member countries as to the applicability of the provisions of this Recommendation. The time has now come, especially since new methods are being applied and introduced daily in different member States, to assess what the member States have learned in this very important field of social endeavour. Could the I.L.O. say something new on the question of the vocational rehabilitation of disabled people? I think in this respect too the Resolutions Committee has performed a very useful act.

The fourth resolution deals with the question of the industrial activities of the Organisation. This is a problem of the utmost importance to workers throughout the world. The experience in different trades and occupations, the confrontation between employers and workers in each industry—as distinct from this confrontation in working conditions as a whole and in general terms—the specific problems of each industry, and the specific consideration of workers and employers in each industry, have become a very important part of the I.L.O. activities in the post-war period. In this resolution the Committee is suggesting to you that the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. should take account of the deep concern of the Conference in the promulgation of this activity, of this function of the Organisation, and that it should present the Governing Body and the Conference with concrete suggestions in this particular field.

What is new and extremely important from our point of view is that we in the Workers' group have raised the question of the position of the civil service. The time has come when the I.L.O. should deal with the problems of employees who work for governments. The relationships between governments as employers and the people who work for governments should be ventilated. In this field of industrial activity there should be the same kind of confrontation as we have in other industries and in other occupations.

The fifth and final resolution which is contained in this report also enjoys the full support of the Workers' group, namely the problem of the role of the International Labour Organisation in the question of the social and economic consequences of disarmament. I am very happy to join with those who have expressed satisfaction in the Committee that this very important subject—this touchy subject in a way—has received the unanimous support of the entire membership of the Resolutions Committee. We take great pleasure on behalf of the Workers' group to suggest that it receives the unanimous support of this Conference.

I think the first report of the Resolutions Committee contains five resolutions which have meaning for the future of this Organisation and for the workers in every part of the world. Unfortunately, I must say that it was not our priority that was finally selected by the Committee. The Workers' group had hoped that two other resolutions would be included in the first procedure, of the Bureau of the Committee. However, we have abided by the majority decision and tried to co-operate in a constructive way in the deliberations. I appeal on behalf of the group to all delegates to give their widest support to the adoption of this first report of the Resolutions Committee.

Final Record Vote on the Convention Concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines

The President—In accordance with our agenda for today we now have to take two final record votes. I will first put the Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines.

The President—The result of the vote is as follows: 331 votes in favour, none against, with 13 abstentions. The Convention is therefore adopted.

Final Record Vote on the Recommendation Concerning Conditions of Employment of Young Persons Underground in Mines

The President—We now proceed to the final record vote on the Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines.

The President—The result of the vote is as follows: 298 votes in favour, none against, with 51 abstentions. The Recommendation is therefore adopted.

First Report of the Resolutions Committee: Discussion (concl.) and Adoption

The President—We now resume our examination of the first report of the Resolutions Committee. The general discussion is terminated and we will now consider the report, paragraph by paragraph. First, I will put paragraphs 1 to 8, which precede the first resolution. If there are no comments on paragraphs 1 to 8, I will take it that they are adopted.

Resolution concerning Paid Educational Leave

The President—We now proceed to consider paragraphs 9 to 23, the part of the report dealing with the resolution concerning paid educational leave.

Mr. Mainwaring (Government delegate, Canada)—Before I begin, I should like to add my voice to those who have paid tribute to the splendid work of the Chairman of the Resolutions Committee, Mr. Aguilar, who won the admiration of us all.

The resolution concerning paid educational leave calls attention to a very real problem—the need of workers to secure further education to help them adjust to technological change. Its purpose is to call attention to the contribution that can be made towards dealing with this problem by paid educational leave.

It would be a pity if on a subject so important the text were not satisfying to Employers as well as to Governments and Workers, since the problem of securing a highly qualified work force is obviously of vital importance to all three groups.

As the Workers are quoted as saying in paragraph 14 of the report: "the resolution was not intended to define or regulate in detail the institution of paid educational leave, but rather to promote this concept in member States of the I.L.O. and to initiate the first steps which might lead to the adoption by the I.L.O. of an international instrument concerning this question."

The following are a few points which are not mentioned specifically in the resolution but which, I believe, are in the spirit of the resolution and implicit in it.

The first point is that paid educational leave is only one of the means of dealing with the problem of improving workers' qualifications, and is not the only means.

The second point is that, although educational leave is not defined in the resolution, it can certainly be assumed that account must be taken of various different types of educational leave, ranging from full time-off with pay while the worker is pursuing a course at an educational institution, to periods of an hour or so during the working day.

The third point is that the responsibility for payment does not necessarily rest with the employer. In certain cases the government may make an important contribution; in some cases the payment may even come from outside the country, as in the case, for example, of fellowships for study abroad.

The fourth point is that the resolution, in its first operative paragraph, talks about taking effective action towards ensuring the access of workers to various types of educational leave. Obviously, however, the access to leave can only be under approved and mutually agreed conditions. I take this to be an illustration of the point made by the Workers in paragraph 14 of the report that the resolution is not intended to define or regulate in detail the institution of paid educational leave.

According to paragraph 18 of the report, the Employers' members of the Committee expressed concern at the adverse economic effects of paid educational leave. Educational leave is intended to have beneficial economic effects for the community as a whole and to do so by enriching human resources. A system of educational leave could hardly be envisaged or tolerated which would have adverse economic effects. This concept is surely fundamental in the resolution, even if not specifically stated.

The fact is that the Resolutions Committee was very large, it was working under pressure and it did not have time to dot all the i's or cross all the t's. The text may have shortcomings but the intent of the resolution is positive and constructive.
We are particularly pleased with paragraph 2 of the resolution, which calls for a study of systems of paid educational leave in member countries. My Government would be happy to co-operate in such a study by providing information on our own experience, and we should be interested to learn of the experience of other countries.

We believe that, in spite of textual weaknesses which cannot be avoided at this stage of our work and which, in any event, are not serious, this resolution should be interpreted in a broad and generous sense, and we would hope that it will have the full support of all members of the Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VER- SCHUÉREN (Employers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee) — In the course of my first statement I said that unfortunately the Employers could not endorse the resolution concerning paid educational leave. It is not because we fail to agree with the main idea—and this is not quite how Mr. Mainwaring put the matter just now—that scientific and technical progress make it necessary for all concerned with production to adapt their initial training in a continuous manner. But the resolution deliberately ignores (at least, explicitly) the variety of ways which can be followed in this respect—such as evening courses—even if, as Mr. Mainwaring has just said, it contains implicit references to them.

We are surprised that there is no reference to the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962, which states in Paragraph 22 that "Supplementary courses should be available to all workers who wish to improve their general, technical or commercial knowledge in order to facilitate their promotion and thus to improve their social and economic standing".

We agree that the access to such additional training or education for vocational purposes implies that a worker should be released for some time from his usual work in certain cases at least, and in such cases it is necessary to consider the means of providing compensation for the loss of work without such compensation necessarily being undertaken by the employer. However, in spite of the improvements that have been made in the text, what makes us continue our opposition to the resolution as it now stands is the fact that it mentions as the only access to such education the form of paid educational leave, and it suggests the creation of a new right in this respect.

In speaking of developing countries—and my own is such a country—allow me to draw the attention of delegates to the fact that in my country, and the Ministry of Labour has a centre dealing with this problem. Mostly, we organise courses and classes on the worksite so that, by devoting a few hours a week to study, workers can bring themselves up to date on technical developments in their branch. I should add that these hours of study are treated as hours of work, and are consequently remunerated as such. For this reason my delegation voted in favour of this resolution in the Committee.

In view of the complicated nature of this problem my delegation is convinced that it should be studied thoroughly, taking into consideration the different possibilities in the various branches of industry, and not forgetting local conditions or the different stages of industrialisation in different countries. A solution which may apply to highly industrialised countries may not apply to developing countries.

In speaking of developing countries—and my own is such a country—allow me to draw the attention of delegates to the fact that appropriate formulas should be sought so as not to impede the economic growth of those countries which, in spite of technical backwardness and unskilled manpower, are still able by sustained efforts to export certain industrial products.

My delegation, whilst in favour of progressive flexible formulas which will reflect local conditions, will vote in favour of the text of the resolution.

Interpretation from German: Mr. BEERMANN (Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany) — I am one of those who submitted the resolution now before the plenary sitting. My colleague, the Philippine Workers' delegate, and I put this resolution forward in view of the discussions which have take place in the Organisation in previous years. We wished to explore new aspects of the work of the Organisation with a view to rendering it more fruitful. On the basis of our experience at home and observation of what is going on elsewhere in the world, we feel that it is particularly necessary now to deal with the question of paid educational leave. Therefore, in the draft resolution we sought merely to express the idea that there should be a decision of principle regarding the need for leave of this kind. We deliberately refrained from going into detail because, as is indicated in the main part of the resolution, we considered that a certain amount of investigation is still necessary in order to determine how paid educational leave should be put into effect in practice. We should be very pleased if more stress were laid on this aspect of the resolution than was placed on it by Mr. Verschueren, and if the Employers understood it better.

Reference has been made to the need for paid educational leave. I was glad that Mr. Verschueren should not have objected to the need for this kind of leave. He himself was obliged to agree that a worker who wishes to have further training or study requires an economic basis for it. He needs the economic basis which will enable him to engage in this strenuous study, and this is what we have tried to stress. I think that there is no need to emphasise that technical development and the new structure of society make it necessary for a worker to acquire more knowledge, either at the technical level or regarding general culture. One cannot separate these two things today. We consider that the worker must have a feeling of security so that in the technical field he can develop his capacities to the full in the light of his general and technical education. From this point of view we think that the resolution is entirely justified.

If you look at the text carefully, you will see that in the present wording all possibilities are left open. In paragraph 1 of the operative part we see that governments of member States, employers' organisations and the trade unions are asked to do something in this field with a view to promoting progress. It is stated also that the measures taken must be adjusted to national practice and that not one way only but all possible ways should be discussed and investigated with a view to leading to practical progress.

What difficulties can the Employers really object to? If we say that there should be collective negotiation and agreement between employers and workers, then the result can only be based on bilateral agreement. So I do not understand why there should be so much reluctance on the Employers' side. I can well understand that a modern employer in the world today must recognise the value of progress of this kind. Naturally, ways and means must be found and are, therefore, left open in this text. Consequently, there is no reason why a worker cannot, without any regulations, pursue further education on his own, in his own time. It has always been the case and will always be so and no trade union can object in any way to that. However, what is required of workers now is so extensive that we cannot fail to take some systematic action. Let me therefore stress, once more, that we do need paid leave for this purpose. The worker and his family have to have economic security before he can be successful. I therefore ask the Conference to vote in favour of this resolution.

The PRESIDENT—Since no one has asked for the floor, I presume that you are now prepared to adopt paragraphs 9 to 22 of this report. If there are no objections, I shall consider them as adopted.

The PRESIDENT—As for paragraph 23, which contains the resolution, there will be a vote by show of hands.

Resolution concerning the Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers

The PRESIDENT—Now we proceed to the part of the report dealing with the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers—that is paragraphs 24 to 30. Since there are no speakers, I presume that the Conference adopts paragraphs 24 to 29. As there are no objections, paragraphs 24 to 29 are adopted.

The PRESIDENT—We now take paragraph 30, which contains the resolution. If there are no objections, I take it that it is adopted.

Resolution concerning Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons

The PRESIDENT—We now go on to the part of the report relating to the resolution concerning vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons, that is paragraphs 31 to 39 inclusive. If there are no speakers, I take it that paragraphs 31 to 38 are adopted.

The PRESIDENT—I now put paragraph 39, containing the resolution. If there are no objections, I take it that paragraph 39 is also adopted.

Resolution concerning the Industrial Activities of the International Labour Organisation

The PRESIDENT—We now come to the part of the report relating to the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation—paragraphs 40 to 70 inclusive.

1 See Appendix III, p. 511 and Appendix XII, p. 693.
2 See Appendix III, p. 512 and Appendix XII, p. 694.
I would like to call the attention of the Conference to paragraphs 56 to 61 of the report on why the Government delegation of the U.S.S.R. unfortunately cannot support the text of the resolution which is now before us. One of the most important aspects—if not the most important aspect—of this resolution relates to the work of Industrial Committees. The Soviet Union participates with great interest in the work of the Committees of which it is a member and in principle we support all the activities of the Industrial Committees. We were prepared to participate constructively in the discussion of ways and means of improving and even expanding the work of these Committees, but any attempt to improve and broaden their activities must aim at overcoming existing shortcomings.

We feel that one of the main shortcomings in the work of the Industrial Committees consists in the fact that the principle of equitable geographical distribution is not observed in the work of the members of the Committees. We had an opportunity to put forward our views on this at length in the Committee, so that I do not consider it necessary to repeat those arguments.

Nevertheless, we are faced with the fact that in the last elections to the Industrial Committees and in the elections held in 1959 and 1954 the principle of fair geographical distribution was not applied—indeed, it was seriously infringed. The Committee on Industrial Committees of the Governing Body examines the requests of countries from certain regions of the world, countries belonging to a specific social system—and you will understand that I am speaking of the Eastern European socialist countries—from a predetermined position based on discrimination. Despite the fact that the principle of fair geographical representation ought to guide the Governing Body in determining the membership of these Committees, this principle is not complied with at all, and there is evidence of this in the fact that the Governing Body has been compelled to take measures to correct the membership, as proposed by the Committee on Industrial Committees. But, of course, such modifications or corrections, which take the form of the addition of a country to the membership, cannot change much and cannot put right the incorrect approach to the determination of the membership of the Industrial Committees.

In this connection we submitted an amendment to the resolution, which was rejected—indeed, in very moderate terms, I must emphasise—that the Director-General should consider and submit to the Governing Body proposals concerning measures to ensure compliance with the principle of equitable geographical representation on the Industrial Committees of the I.L.O. Unfortunately and to my great regret, because of the position of the two non-governmental groups, that amendment was not carried. I say this because in the Government group there was a majority in favour of the amendment.

The defeat of our amendment means that this resolution is deprived of a very essential element—an element that aimed at getting rid of one of the most serious obstacles to the work of this Organisation. Therefore the value of this resolution is weakened because this element is lacking, and the resolution becomes a document without teeth. In the circumstances, we do not consider it possible to vote in favour of this resolution; we feel that it is impossible to vote in favour of a resolution which passes over in silence one of the most important aspects of the work of the Industrial Committees. Therefore we shall have to abstain when the vote is taken.

Mr. KAPLANSKY (Workers' adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—I believe that as spokesman of the Workers' group in the Resolutions Committee I ought to reply to the very moderate remarks—and I am grateful for that—of Mr. Shkunaev on this question of Industrial Committees. The Resolutions Committee itself voted in favour of the resolution by 629 votes in favour, none against, with 36 abstentions, and the whole question was very thoroughly discussed in the Committee.

Mr. Shkunaev bases his argument for abstention on the fact that the resolution contains no reference to the principle of equitable geographical distribution, and he does so in spite of the fact that in the Resolutions Committee it was clearly pointed out that the rules governing the selection of member States for seats on Industrial Committees contain this principle which he wanted to include in this resolution. The majority of the Committee felt that, whilst they agreed in principle with the argument on this principle, it was not necessary, and would be redundant, to include a separate paragraph on this question when the very rules governing the selection of member States for seats on the Industrial Committees already contain this principle.

Mr. Shkunaev referred to the last elections in the Governing Body for seats on Industrial Committees. He told part of the story, but he did not tell the whole story. He tried to make a distinction between the process of election in committee and the fact that the Governing Body itself then decided to add certain seats. Most of us fail to see this distinction between the Governing Body itself and its committees. After all, in the final analysis, it is the Governing Body which takes the final vote on the election of member States to Industrial Committees. It is the very same Governing Body which, after due consideration, added a number of members to those recommended previously by its committee, and it was assumed on the part of all concerned that everybody was satisfied with the elections for seats on the different Industrial Committees.

It is for these reasons—because the rules governing election to seats on Industrial Committees contain the principle of equitable geographical distribution, because of the satisfaction expressed by all members of the Governing Body at the results of the last elections, and also because the very heart and purpose of the resolution is to refer the whole question for consideration to the Working Party on Programme and Structure (on which Mr. Shkunaev's Government is very ably represented)—that the Committee felt it would be redundant... to include a separate reference to the principle of equitable geographical distribution. From a practical point of view it would add absolutely nothing, but it raises the spectre of doubt as to the impartiality of the International Labour Organisation. In these circumstances, under these conditions, in this type of atmosphere, it was the feeling of the overwhelming majority of the Committee that the inclusion of this paragraph was not necessary. I therefore urge all delegates to this Conference to vote in favour of this resolution.

Mr. SEIDMAN (Workers' adviser, United States)—Because of the very able reply which has been given by Mr. Kaplansky, the Chairman of the Workers' group of the Resolutions Committee, to the points made by Mr. Shku-naev, I shall not have to dwell on that question very long. Let me simply say that I fully support what Mr. Kaplansky has said.

If I might add just one thought, it is that in fact the Industrial Committees are broadly representative of the member States of this Organisation as a result of the recent recomposition of the Industrial Committees they are more broadly representative than ever before. Indeed, it seemed to me that the Committee of Industrial Committees of the Governing Body made every effort to include in the membership of these Committees countries where particular industries are just getting under way, and I am very glad that the Committee acted in this fashion, because it seems to me important that we have the broadest possible representation of both industrialised and developing countries in the Industrial Committees.

But it stands to reason that not every country can be in every Industrial Committee, that the importance of the industry is a factor which somehow or other must be taken into account and, as far as workers are concerned, the question of whether or not in a country there will be genuine tripartite representation there will be genuine tripartite representation, so that the Employers and Workers are completely independent of the Governments, is also a factor they will always take into account when the Industrial Com-

I would like to say just a few words about the substance of this resolution, although I know we do not want to take too much time. I do so because I think we are taking a very important step this year in the adoption of this resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation.

The industrial activities of the I.L.O. are part and parcel of the entire programme of the I.L.O. The industrial activities must be considered—and in this resolution they are considered—in the framework of the over-all programme of the I.L.O. You will have noticed that this is a resolution which is not simply confined to the question of the Industrial Committees, important as they are, but is stated in broad terms indicating the role of industrial activities, in the various ways in which they are carried on, in standard-setting, in technical co-operation, in research and investigation in regard to activities and in the Industrial Committees the role of industrial activities is approached in all of these ways in our total I.L.O. programme. Thus in a way this is a resolution which covers all fields of I.L.O. activity.

We in the Workers' group attach particular significance to the Industrial Committees because they provide a means for workers and employers in the industries, who are familiar with the problems of the industries, to look at those problems in a down-to-earth setting; this is a very important contribution which is made by the Industrial Committees. This is why it seems to us that this tripartite institution is one which should be extended and one which should be strengthened, and we hope the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O., to which Mr. Kaplansky referred, will give this question its very earnest consideration.

The Industrial Committees have played a pioneering role—and will continue to do so—in developing the labour standards of this Organisation, and in addition to this pioneering role in the development of standards there exist more than any other institution, can play a particularly important role in watching the application of the standards that we adopt in these sessions of the Conference to specific industries, in specific situations as viewed by the workers and employers and governments who are concerned with those industries.

Finally, this resolution is important because it points to a number of gaps which still exist in our industrial activity in the I.L.O. One has already been referred to, and that is the importance of the public service. This is not a controversial issue. We all know the public service is expanding in countries all over the world, whether we like it or not, and it is very important that the I.L.O. should pay particular attention to the problems of workers in the public service, since they are an ever-growing group; and that this be done in a way which will make it possible for the representatives of management and workers in the public service to come together to discuss those problems.

The resolution also calls particular attention to the problems of small-scale industry and handicrafts. This is a problem particularly in developing countries, but of course these industries also exist, at least to a limited extent, in industrialised countries as well.

The resolution also points to the fact that there are other uncovered industries. I will not try to mention them at the moment, but there are other industries which have not yet been covered by the Industrial Committees, and the problems of the workers in those industries should receive the attention of the I.L.O. on a tripartite basis as soon as possible.

In conclusion, let me say that there are those who have said in the past—and I hope they are not saying it any more at present—that the industrial activities are traditional activities. Yes, they are traditional activities of the I.L.O. The I.L.O. has always been concerned with the problems of workers in industries, but in today's world, as the Director-General has pointed out in saying that his subject next year will be industrialisation, industrial activities are the most dynamic part of our activity, and therefore this resolution is one which looks to the future and not to the past, and I hope it will receive the unanimous approval of all the delegates to this Conference.

Interpretation from French : Mr. VER- SCHUEREN (Employers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)— I have only a few words to add to what has been stated in the report or has just been said by Mr. Kaplansky and Mr. Seldman.

First of all, I must say that we supported with conviction the ideas behind this resolution, aimed at developing I.L.O. activities in the industrial field. This was because we consider that the Industrial Committees have made a valuable contribution to the action of the I.L.O. and because they are a very useful means of making the I.L.O.'s work known.

Thus, as I said, we supported the conclusions of the resolution, although we had, as the report indicates, some reservations regarding particular parts of the resolution, and particularly the preamble.

I would like to add one last word regarding the U.S.S.R. amendment aimed at introducing more forcefully the idea of geographical distribution: I can support almost every word of what Mr. Kaplansky said just now, because the Employers' group entirely shares the views expressed by him. I thought it would be useful for the Conference to know that in this regard the Employers' and Workers' groups are in entire agreement. The report and the result of the vote indicate this, but I considered it useful to say so specifically to the Conference.

The PRESIDENT—Since no other speaker has asked for the floor, I presume the Conference adopts paragraphs 40 to 69. If there are no objections, I take it that paragraphs 40 to 69 are adopted.

The PRESIDENT—On the resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation, which is contained in paragraph 70, there will be a vote by show of hands.

(A vote is taken by show of hands. Paragraph 70 is adopted by 252 votes in favour, none against, with 35 abstentions.)

Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organisation of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament ¹

The PRESIDENT—Now we proceed to the part of the report dealing with the resolution concerning the carrying out by the International Labour Organisation of studies of the social and economic consequences of disarmament—paragraphs 71 to 84. Since there are no speakers, I take it the Conference adopts these paragraphs. If there are no objections, I take it paragraphs 71 to 83 are adopted.

The PRESIDENT—I will now put paragraph 84, which contains the resolution. If there are no objections, I shall consider it as adopted.

The PRESIDENT—This finishes our examination of the first report of the Resolutions Committee and, if there are no objections, I take it that the Conference adopts the report as a whole.

SECOND REPORT OF THE RESOLUTIONS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION, DISCUSSION AND ADOPTION

The PRESIDENT—We now take up the second report of the Resolutions Committee. I would request Mr. Aguilar, Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, to submit the report.

Interpretation from Spanish : Mr. AGUILAR (Government delegate, Venezuela; Chairman and Reporter of the Resolutions Committee)—I have the privilege to submit to the Conference the second report of the Resolutions Committee, which has been distributed to delegates.

This second report of the Resolutions Committee consists of two sections, the first of which refers to the resolution condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration. This is the original title of the resolution as submitted by Mr. Kamel, Government delegate, United Arab Republic, and adopted by the Committee. The second section of the report contains the resolutions not considered by the Committee.

I shall refer separately to the two sections of the report.

In the first section there appears a detailed account of the long discussion concerning this resolution, which was assigned to the sixth place, and I must say in this connection that, despite the controversial nature of the subject-matter and in spite of a certain amount of heat in our discussion, those in favour or against the different positions maintained an attitude of sanity and calm which I should like to point out to the Conference. In spite of sharp exchanges at times in the discussion, I, as Chairman of the Committee, was treated with the greatest respect throughout and all the members of the Committee showed a very high spirit of co-operation. After the long discussion, the Committee adopted the text of the resolution which appears in paragraph 47 of the report.

Now a last word concerning this first section of our report. There was discussion as to whether the title could be changed. After long consideration, having listened to the opinions of many members of the Committee, and after having had advice from the Legal Adviser of the Conference, I gave the ruling recorded in paragraph 25 of the report. The Committee finally adopted the title of the original resolution submitted by Mr. Kamel, as you can see in paragraph 29 of the report.

As regards the second section "Resolutions Not Considered by the Committee", towards the end of the afternoon of Saturday, the last working day of the Committee according to the Standing Orders, it was proposed that the Committee conclude its work. This proposal, which is recorded in paragraph 48 of the report, also contained the idea that resolution No. 7 concerning protection of the rights of Spanish workers should be referred to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association and that the resolution concerning equitable geographical representation of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation in its Governing Body as well as equitable geographical distribution of elective offices at sessions of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body be sent to the Governing Body Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

Concerning these points I must draw the attention of the Conference to the fact that the Government member of Poland, on his own behalf and on behalf of the Government member of Ukraine, as authors of the resolution concerning equitable geographical representation, stated that he could not accept the suggestion to send it to the Working Party and added that he withdrew the resolution that had been submitted to the Committee.

As regards resolution No. 7 the Government member of Italy indicated that the procedure to be followed so that the substance of the resolution could be submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association was for the author to withdraw the resolution in the Resolutions Committee and then to present a complaint to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. In this connection, as paragraph 57 states, the Yugoslav Workers' member, who was the author of the resolution, stated that he was not prepared to withdraw his resolution but he was not opposed to a vote on the motion to adjourn.

Finally, the Committee decided, by a large majority (445 votes in favour), to adjourn. As a consequence, resolution No. 7 concerning the protection of the rights of Spanish workers and resolution No. 8 concerning equitable geographical representation were not discussed.

To conclude this presentation of the report, I must add that according to article 17, paragraph 6, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, if any resolution has not been considered by the Committee by the date on which it terminates its work, the Conference shall not discuss or act upon that resolution.

Resolution Condemning the Government of Portugal on the Grounds of the Forced Labour Policy Practised by the Said Government in Territories under its Administration

The PRESIDENT—The report is submitted to the Conference for discussion. As Mr. Aguilar observed, we will have to consider it in two parts. The first part for discussion is contained in paragraphs 1 to 47; these paragraphs deal with the resolution condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration.

Interpretation from French: Mr. VER-SCHUEEEN (Employers' delegate, Belgium; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—Even though we are not discussing the last part of the report, I should like to state now that I do not intend to speak on the resolution concerning geographical representation or on the resolution concerning the protection of the rights of Spanish workers. The former has been withdrawn, and the Chairman has just told us that the latter, according to the Standing Orders, cannot be discussed at the Conference, and was considered to follow the normal channel, i.e. the filing of a complaint with the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association.

My comments are therefore limited to the only resolution which has to be examined and which concerns the condemnation of forced labour and includes a solemn appeal addressed to the Government of Portugal. In this respect I would like to confirm what the Chairman of the Resolutions Committee stated, and emphasise how, in spite of a tension which was palpable at times, this work was carried out in an orderly fashion, as it should be.

No human being worthy of the name, no one with a heart can fail to shudder when thinking that there are, throughout the world, forms and methods of exploitation of man by man. One has the right to be dismayed, noting that the conditions of inferiority of some are put to profit by those who hold the authority or power—and this for various reasons which have to do sometimes with mere ethnic differences and sometimes with political or ideological considerations.

The I.L.O. has a long-standing tradition of stating standards applicable to the social lives of the peoples. Some of them are more fundamental than others. The abolition of forced labour is one of the foremost, and we must rejoice that the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, has been the one to receive the greatest number of ratifications in the past few years.

Therefore, our duty is to make every effort possible to ensure that these fundamental rules become a universal reality. That is why the Employers' group endorses the condemnation of forced labour and of policies which include the use of forced labour. That is why we also support the operative part of the resolution, paragraph 2, which "Urges that the necessary action be taken to put an end to these practices, which are contrary to the principles of the I.L.O.". However, in this particular case we could not limit ourselves to the mere reaffirmation of a general rule. It was also necessary to consider the accusation that had been made against Portugal and the invitation to condemn it.

In dealing with a specific case and with a request for quasi-judicial intervention, my colleagues felt—as did many other members of the Committee—that the most important thing was to maintain the greatest objectivity. An indication of such concern for objectivity, it must be recognised, was given by the authors and supporters of the resolution in avoiding as far as possible reference to the political background to the problem which was in everybody's mind, but which everyone had agreed either explicitly or implicitly was outside the competence of this Conference. This objectivity had to be safeguarded and maintained to the end, despite the efforts of self-control required; it had to be maintained to the end in order to judge the position on the facts and not on the basis of impressions or emotion.

In the Committee I thought I could ask my African friends whether they would not do the same thing if they were asked to examine a dispute in which they were not emotionally involved, and I quoted a hypothetical example relating to my own country. I asked them whether, if a complaint was made by my compatriots—whether Fleming or Walloon—about alleged discriminations of which one side or the other was a victim, they would not ask for evidence and an inquiry into the facts.

What are the essential elements in this case and what are the facts? The basic facts, as has often been stated in the course of this meeting, on one side and on the other, are established by the 1962 report of the commission of inquiry appointed under article 26 of the Constitution. They are also established—and this is part of the basic documentation that we brought in coming to this Conference—by the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The least that one can say is that these two reports show that very great efforts have been made by the accused country to eliminate all forms of forced labour and that if some vestiges remain—concerning which requests for clarification and information are in fact in process and concerning which recommendations have been formulated, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to conclude—and I would beg delegates to believe that we have striven to consider this matter as objectively as possible—the existence of a deliberate policy of forced labour widely applied by the Portuguese authorities.

This incidentally was the opinion of the Committee—at any rate the majority of it—when it rejected an explicit condemnation, as stated in paragraph 26.

Is the dossier on Portugal closed? It is not. It remains open because the report of the commission of inquiry mentions several recommendations to be applied and the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations calls for certain clarification and additional information which have yet to be supplied.

That is why my colleagues and I have endorsed paragraphs 3 and 4 of the operative part of the resolution which is now in the report and which call upon Portugal urgently to apply the recommendations of the 1962 commission of inquiry, and request the Director-General and the Governing Body to follow up this question.

Despite our reticence due to the dubious nature of the procedure employed, which I have already mentioned in discussing the first report—a general problem of the Resolutions Committee—we decided finally to endorse the new text proposed by the Workers’ group, which reflects the ideas on which I have just commented.

Unfortunately, during the course of the discussion, an amendment was made to the text, where the preamble referred to a resolution, about which some were doubtful, adopted by the United Nations. Unfortunately—and the Chairman of the Committee has just mentioned this—there was a disagreement also on the title, which should logically have been adapted to the amended resolution. For reasons of pride to which one cannot be insensible—and perhaps for other reasons which they do not care to admit—the movers of the initial resolution did not feel able to accept this logic.

In conclusion, the Employers’ group is in agreement with the operative part of the resolution and with the main lines of the preamble. We shall not vote against the resolution, but whilst some of my colleagues will find no difficulty in adopting the whole text, including its title—I can say this now—the majority has expressed reservations in this respect because of the objections relating on the one hand to the too-explicit reference to the United Nations resolution, and on the other hand to the title which is not in conformity with the contents. They will not vote for the resolution, and the logical conclusion, therefore, after this statement, is that the majority will abstain from voting.

Mr. KAPLANSKY (Workers’ adviser, Canada; Vice-Chairman of the Resolutions Committee)—The Workers’ group almost unanimously supported the full text of the resolution which is before the Conference. At this time I take great pleasure in urging all delegates assembled in this conference hall to vote for this resolution, including its title. We in the Workers’ group did not take the initiative in submitting this resolution. As can be seen from the record, it was submitted by the Government delegate of the United Arab Republic, Mr. Kamel.

The argument is always raised, whenever such resolutions are presented, that they have no place in this Organisation. The argument is also raised—and it is a justifiable argument—that no member State can come to this Conference with clean hands and with a clear conscience and say that it alone applies all the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the I.L.O., or that it lives up to all the basic principles of this Organisation. It is, of course, a fact of life that in practically every member State you will find in its practices and its rules and in the way it behaves some divergences between what it professes and what it actually does.

However, this does not mean that when a specific case is presented to this Organisation and when specific charges are made against the behaviour of a certain member State, we can remain indifferent to these charges because of the argument that all member States are guilty of transgression of certain principles of this Organisation. We must deal with charges as they are presented to us. It is for this reason that the Workers’ group found that this resolution is expedient, that it belongs to this body and has to be dealt with by this Organisation.

The second argument that has been raised is that this resolution should make no reference to the United Nations resolution on this subject. We cannot go along with this argument. After all, we are members of the United Nations family of organisations, and if the United Nations has spoken on the question of Portugal, and if it has condemned Portugal because of its attitude, inter alia, on the question of forced labour and because of its action or inaction in this field, then the International Labour Organisation cannot remain indifferent and cannot ignore the resolution adopted by the United Nations. It is for this reason that the Workers' group took the initiative of inserting this paragraph and also of specifying and explaining in part what the United Nations resolution was with respect to forced labour, which is the subject-matter of this resolution.

Thirdly, it has been the traditional attitude of the democratic trade union movements and of the international organisations of workers, which stand for human rights and freedom, to oppose dictatorship at every turn, to oppose colonial rule whatever the circumstances, to stand for freedom of nations and to stand for human dignity. We must say, with much regret and without reference to the people of Portugal as such, to whom we feel bound in fraternal spirit and against whom we have nothing to say, that we feel obliged on every occasion when the issue is raised to speak up in clear terms against colonial oppression, for independence of nations, against forced labour, and for the dignity of man.

It is for this reason that we have taken the initiative in drawing up a resolution, moderate in tone, within the framework of the I.L.O.'s constitutional powers and institutional possibilities, but nevertheless quite firm in its approach to the problems concerned.

We drafted the main body of the resolution which you have before you now. We amended the original resolution in order to bring about a consensus of support—in order that as large a number of people as possible in this Conference (Government, Employers and Workers) could support a constructive resolution on this question. We tried because we wanted to get the largest measure of support and because we realised that the greater the number of delegates voting for this resolution the greater would be its impact.

However, we could not compromise on one thing: we could not compromise on the suggestion that this resolution should have no reference to condemnation.

You have, on many occasions in this Conference, heard appeals for moderation of language. We agree that when we come to this rostrum we should use moderate language and that we should not aggravate situations. We in the Workers' group heeded this appeal. We tried to draft the substitute paragraph in moderate language, but because we did this it does not imply that our text does not contain a condemnation of practices. I must submit to you that our resolution does contain a condemnation in spirit and in fact. It is pointed out that Portugal has not lived up to the recommendations of the I.L.O. Governing Body Commission of Inquiry. Just because the text of the resolution does not use the word "condemn" this does not mean that the whole resolution is not a condemnation of the practices still pursued by Portugal on the question of forced labour.

We did not want the title of the resolution to lose us votes or to cause abstentions, and therefore we were willing to compromise even on the title. When we saw that the African nations, and especially the African workers, with whom we stand together, would not accept the deletion of the word "condemn" we had to support the original title. We make no excuses about it.

We drafted the major part of the text of the resolution which you have before you. We ought to know whether this resolution implies condemnation or not; and it was our feeling that this resolution is, in spirit and in fact, a condemnation of Portugal, and therefore we voted for the original title.

The resolution contains a number of very positive suggestions. It suggests primarily that the I.L.O. Governing Body and the Director-General should keep this matter under review and should put forward new proposals in order to make the Government of Portugal meet its obligations and the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

This resolution also contains a forceful condemnation of the very essence and principle of forced labour. It is, in a way, also a suggestion on how this matter should be solved in Portuguese overseas territories or in territories under Portuguese domination.

It is for these reasons—for the constructive features of this resolution, for the spirit which it expresses, for the feeling of revulsion against the inhuman practices of forced labour, for the tradition for which this Organisation has become known throughout the world, its defence of human rights—that I ask you, on behalf of the Workers' group, to vote for the adoption of the entire resolution.

Mr. KAMEL (Government delegate, United Arab Republic)—There is really little to add after this eloquent speech by Mr. Kaplansky. The resolution which is now before us is an important one. We are face to face with a member State which undermines the fundamental principles of this Organisation, and on the acceptance of these principles it was admitted as a fellow Member. These principles are clearly set out in the Preamble to the Constitution and in the Declaration concerning the aims and purposes of the International Labour Organisation adopted in Philadelphia on 10 May 1944.

The Preamble to the Constitution states that "the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries". Parts I (a) and II (a) of the Declaration of Philadelphia state respectively that "labour is not a commodity" and that "all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity."

There is ample evidence to show, as was clearly explained in the Committee, that by law, administration and practice the Government of Portugal persistently undermines these very principles for which the I.L.O. exists. It regards labour as a commodity, and it practises forced labour in the territories under its administration in Africa. Furthermore, it exports African workers to South Africa, which was condemned by this Organisation for its policy of apartheid.

The United Nations General Assembly noted in resolution 1819 (XVII) of 1962 that the economic life of Angola is to a large extent based on forced labour. This resolution was adopted by a large majority of the member States of the United Nations. In fact, it was adopted by 57 votes in favour, 14 against, with 18 abstentions. If the United Nations General Assembly adopts such a resolution, it is necessary that action be taken by the I.L.O., which is the first organisation to be concerned with this question as it was established for the improvement of working and living conditions of workers and is of the firm conviction that universal peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice. Such action is the duty and responsibility of this General Conference. Indeed, the principal argument advanced by those who opposed an outright expulsion of South Africa was that they insisted on prior action by the United Nations before the I.L.O. took its own action. Here is a clear case where this condition has been fulfilled. There can be no valid argument now against the immediate adoption of this resolution, especially as it was adopted by the Resolutions Committee after a thorough examination and lengthy discussion.

In this connection, I must express to the Workers the most sincere thanks of all Africans for their support in the Resolutions Committee. I most sincerely hope that the decision of the Resolutions Committee last week will be confirmed today by the Conference. We do not wish to chastise a member State for the sake of chastisement, but our aim is first and foremost to dissuade this Member from violating the very principles for which our Organisation stands, thereby enabling it to respond to the call of humanity and human dignity.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SHKUNAEEV (Government adviser, U.S.S.R.)—The Soviet Government delegation fully supports the resolution which is now under consideration, condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration. We support this resolution even though we consider that its terms are somewhat moderate in regard to a situation which deserves a more strongly worded statement.

I do not agree with one of the previous speakers who, to some extent, attempted to cast a shadow on the spirit of co-operation and objectivity which characterised the discussion of this draft in the Resolutions Committee. He said that the spirit of objectivity did not prevail until the end, and that the Committee did not adhere to facts but was swayed by emotions. I should like to say in this connection that there are certain emotions which cannot be distinguished from facts. As I see it, this resolution reflects the feelings and emotions of millions of Africans in almost all African countries, and the feelings of 200 million people are an objective fact. They are not only an objective fact but an objective force which the Resolutions Committee took into consideration. We consider that it did so justly and rightly.

The peoples of Africa know, through long and bitter experience, what they have to face today and what they have had to face for scores of years because of the colonial domination of Africa. They have become most thorough experts in this field, no less competent experts than the Flemings or Walloons in respect of matters concerning their mutual relationship.

What is most important is that these feelings and emotions of the African peoples are not in contradiction to other objective facts; on the contrary, they are based on such facts, and these facts—as Mr. Kaplansky stated from this rostrum—are borne out both in the International Labour Organisation and in the competent organs of the United Nations. Our Conference cannot pass over such facts.

Although the resolution concerns forced labour, and forced labour alone, I should like to point out that this problem cannot in fact be seen outside its general context. Forced labour does not exist in one glass jar and colonialism in another; the problems exist simultaneously in the same territories. In territories where a policy of racial discrimination is applied, the population of those territories is denied one of the most fundamental rights—perhaps the most fundamental—which all people should enjoy, including the people of the territories still under Portuguese domination in Africa: that is to say, the right to self-determination.

The problem of forced labour is very important. We support the resolution which may yield some results in the future, but we are convinced that this problem will not be fully resolved until the peoples of the territories concerned are able to exercise their right to self-determination. Then they will not require much time in order to achieve the aims of the present resolution.

Mr. ABID ALI (Workers' delegate, India)—I would like to associate myself with those speakers who have given their support to the resolution condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration.

As we discuss the resolution here, our hearts go out to our brothers who are waging a relentless battle against colonialism. Every sensible person knows that forced labour destroys human dignity, but it becomes heinous when used, as is being done by the Government of Portugal, to bolster up its own economy at the cost of basic fundamental human rights of people. We condemn forced labour in any shape or form, and this practice by the Government of Portugal in African colonies compels us to express indignation in the strongest possible terms so that pressure of world opinion is brought to bear upon the conscience of those responsible for such a disgusting system.
In spite of all the evidence proving the existence of forced labour in Portuguese colonies in Africa, an attempt has been made to deny it and distort the facts which condemn the Government of Portugal. I have no intention of going into details at this stage of our work but let me say only this. So long as the disgraceful yoke of colonialism has not disappeared from the lands of these unfortunate people, you cannot expect any hope for them. People who are not free and who are compelled to work for the benefit of an oppressive foreign Power are in a perpetual state of forced labour. It is my earnest hope that everyone of us in this hall will take a pledge to work for the restoration, dignity and justice to the people of these colonies. The present resolution represents such a pledge. It is for this reason that I lend my entire and wholehearted support to it. I sincerely hope that this Conference, by endorsing the resolution, will give the lead in finding a solution to this problem, which, after all, does not concern Africa alone. Faced with a human question, we are all very anxious finally to exterminate this disgraceful practice from the face of the earth.

In these fast-changing times of the twentieth century how can this degrading system be tolerated? It is inconsistent with the very objective and existence of the I.L.O. We are a civilised and democratic society and should honour the rules governing it. I wish Portugal would heed the voice of reason and conscience and change its policy so as not to compel this world family to take more drastic steps.

The PRESIDENT—As there are no more speakers, the discussion of paragraphs 1 to 46 of the report is terminated. If there are no objections, I shall consider these paragraphs as adopted.

The PRESIDENT—Now we pass on to the resolution contained in paragraph 47. The vote will be taken by show of hands.

Resolutions Not Considered by the Committee

The PRESIDENT—We will now take paragraphs 48 to 60 inclusive, which relate to resolutions which were not considered by the Committee.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. SHKUNAEV (Government adviser, U.S.S.R.)—Please forgive me for delaying the discussion somewhat but I think these paragraphs are important—extremely important, in fact. I should like to pay tribute to the Chairman of our Committee, Mr. Aguilar, and to congratulate him on his successful efforts in guiding the work of the Committee to a positive conclusion in spite of the differences we might have had over the subject-matter of para-considered most carefully by the Conference when the Standing Orders that are now in force were accepted.

There is one principle that must be considered and that underlies the last intervention, and it is the whole concept of democracy. An objection was raised to the secret ballot but I think it should be understood and considered by the Conference that, although it is true that the resolution that was not discussed had been submitted to the Conference in one form or another for two years, a decision in accordance with the best judgment of the members of the Committee was taken by secret ballot—the most democratic form of manifesting and exercising democracy that the world has been able to evolve—that this resolution should not be placed among the first five. I would only remind the Conference that the change in the Standing Orders was adopted in order to provide an orderly method for the Resolutions Committee to complete its work and to consider those resolutions which, in the view of the Committee, fell clearly within the field of competence and interest of the International Labour Conference.

Although I have no objection to the Working Party’s examining the operation of the rules, I submit that this is the most democratic and fair procedure we have been able to devise in order that the Resolutions Committee may consider, in the order of priority it determines by secret ballot, which are the most important resolutions, and thereby finish its work in time to permit of the kind of orderly consideration of the fruits of its labours that we have been able to have in the past two years since the new Standing Orders have been in force. I think that the procedure that governs the conduct of the Resolutions Committee is a democratic one and I strongly urge that the holding of a secret ballot in order to determine priority for the resolutions which, in the opinion of the Committee, are the most important is the most democratic procedure we could evolve.

The PRESIDENT—As there are no further speakers, I now presume that the Conference adopts paragraphs 48 to 60 of the Report. If there are no objections, I shall regard them as adopted.

The PRESIDENT—If there are no objections, I take it that the Conference adopts the report as a whole.

The PRESIDENT—Now it only remains for me to thank Mr. Aguilar, the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, and all the members of the Committee, for the perseverance and patience with which they have accomplished their task.

I know there are many candidates for the chairmanship of committees of the I.L.O., but there are very few candidates for the chairmanship of the Resolutions Committee. In my experience, this greatness is thrust upon people. I am very glad that Mr. Aguilar, in a spirit of sportsmanship, has accepted this, and done so well.

THIRTY-SECOND SITTING

Wednesday, 23 June 1965, 3.30 p.m.

SIXTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING

The PRESIDENT—The first item of business for this afternoon is the sixth report of the Credentials Committee. I call upon Mr. Zanetti, Chairman of the Credentials Committee, to present the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ZANETTI (Government adviser, Switzerland; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the sixth report of the Credentials Committee, the text of which has been distributed to delegates. This report contains the decisions of the Committee concerning an objection to the nomination of a Workers' adviser of Morocco and an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Viet-Nam. These decisions were taken unanimously, and the Conference is accordingly asked to take note of the report.

The PRESIDENT—As you will observe, the report was unanimously adopted by the Credentials Committee, and the Conference is therefore merely requested to take note of it.

(SEVENTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING)

The PRESIDENT—We now proceed to the seventh report of the Credentials Committee. Mr. Zanetti, the Chairman, will submit the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ZANETTI (Government adviser, Switzerland; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to present to the Conference the seventh report of the Credentials Committee, the text of which has already been distributed to delegates. This report contains the decisions of the Committee with regard to objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of the Malagasy Republic, an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Uruguay, an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Uganda, and objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Spain. These decisions have been taken unanimously by the Committee, and the Conference is accordingly asked to take note of the report.

The PRESIDENT—The report was unanimously adopted by the Credentials Committee, and the Conference is merely requested to take note of it.

(EIGHTH REPORT OF THE CREDENTIALS COMMITTEE: SUBMISSION AND NOTING)

The PRESIDENT—We now pass on to the eighth report of the Credentials Committee. Mr. Zanetti, the Chairman, will submit the report.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ZANETTI (Government adviser, Switzerland; Chairman of the Credentials Committee)—I have the honour to present to the Conference the eighth report of the Credentials Committee, which has been distributed to delegates. This report contains the decisions of the Committee with regard to objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Congo (Brazzaville) and objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Portugal. These decisions have been taken unanimously by the Committee, and the Conference is accordingly asked to take note of the report.

Since this is the Committee's last report I should like, on this occasion, to make a few observations, as suggested to me by the work of the Committee, which you will find in the various reports submitted. First of all, the Committee found on several occasions that, despite the obligation placed upon them by the Constitution, some States did not send to the Conference complete tripartite delegations. It is necessary that parity between the non-government delegates in each delegation should be ensured since, under the Constitution, if a government fails to nominate one of the non-Government delegates whom it is entitled to nominate, the other non-Government delegate... has no right to vote. Moreover, the Committee noted a certain imbalance between the number of advisers accompanying the delegates of the various groups.

In the same connection I should like to remind you that under article 13 of the Constitution each of the Members is required to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of its delegates and their advisers. It may also be useful to recall that objections cannot be usefully examined by the Committee unless they contain sufficiently concrete particulars. Similarly, under article 26, paragraph 4 (d), of the Standing Orders, which governs the work of the Committee, objections dealing with cases which the Conference has already discussed are regarded as being irrelevant or devoid of substance are not receivable. They can be declared receivable only if they allege substantially new facts.

Finally, the Committee was forced to note on several occasions that it could only verify whether delegates and advisers had been appointed in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution. This means that the Credentials Committee, as it has indicated, is in no position to examine objections motivated by arguments alleging violations of freedom of association or discrimination or forced labour or relating to political matters having to do with the political régime of member States. A decision on any of these matters would obviously fall entirely outside the terms of reference of the Committee since it would not be based on the provisions of article 3 of the Constitution, and in particular on paragraph 5 thereof, which provides that member States must designate their non-Government delegates and advisers in agreement with the most representative industrial organisations, if such organisations exist. In this connection the Committee recalled that the Permanent Court of International Justice, in its Advisory Opinion No. 1, indicated that what was asked of governments was that they should try their best to achieve an agreement which might be considered most likely to ensure representation of the workers of the country. So far as the issues of freedom of association, discrimination or forced labour are concerned, the I.L.O. has special procedures and it is for the Conference and for the Governing Body in such cases to take the necessary steps.

Finally, I should like to pay tribute—and I do so with great pleasure—to the two members of the Committee representing the Employers and Workers, Mr. Poulsen and Mr. Bolin, for the manner in which they discharged their duties. They did so with an objectivity and an integrity which were absolute and indeed with admirable courage. Their only concern, and mine as well, was to base their opinions on law before all, knowing that it is on this sound and lasting principle that the I.L.O. is based. It was in this spirit that we were able to reach unanimous decisions in all cases. Dominant in our work was the principle that our Organisation had been built on law and we did not want to ruin it by contempt for the law. The best institution in the world and any structural changes which may be introduced into it are worthless if those for whom they are intended lack strength of character.

I hope that all those who are called upon to work in our Organisation will display this maturity of mind and heart. If this condition is ensured the I.L.O., thanks to its tripartite structure and perhaps better than any other international organisation, will be able to continue to serve its mission in the interests of peace and happiness in the world.

The President—The eighth report of this Committee, as was the case with previous reports, was unanimously adopted by the Committee and the Conference is merely required to take note of it.

The President—I hope all delegates have made note of the points which Mr. Zanetti has made just now in his speech. This Committee has always to deal with controversial matters and therefore it needs a lot of courage and perseverance to deal with the matters which come before it. I would not like to let this occasion pass without expressing my most sincere thanks and those of the entire Conference to the Credentials Committee, its able Chairman, Mr. Zanetti, and his co-workers, Mr. Schade Poulsen and Mr. Bolin, who have accomplished their arduous and thankless task with exemplary objectivity and in full respect for the provisions which govern the operation of the Committee.

Report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations:
Submission, Discussion and Adoption

The President—We will proceed to the next item on our agenda, the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. I would invite Mr. Albano Pacis, Chairman of the Committee, and Mr. Lappalainen, Reporter, to come to the rostrum. Mr. Lappalainen will submit the report.

Mr. Lappalainen (Government delegate, Finland; Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations)—I have the honour to submit to the Conference the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the text of which has been circulated to delegates.

In accordance with its terms of reference the Committee examined the following questions: reports on ratified Conventions supplied by member States; reports on the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories; information on the submission to the competent authorities of Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 31st to 47th Sessions; and reports requested by the Governing Body from non-ratifying States on the Maternity Protection Conventions and Recommendations.

The deliberations of the Committee are largely based upon the work of the Committee of Experts, which this year had to examine nearly 1,300 detailed reports concerning ratified Conventions. As in January 1965 the total number of ratifications passed the 3,000 mark, the third thousand having been reached in less than five years, it is obvious that the workload of the Committee of Experts will continue to increase, as will the work of the Conference Committee. The Committee was very satisfied with the progress as regards ratifications. It noted, however, that many member States had not yet responded to the Committee’s repeated appeals to ratify and apply the fundamental instruments on freedom of association, forced labour and discrimination. As regards freedom of association, the Committee also invited the Director-General to present a report on the work of the Conference Committee. The Committee was very satisfied with the progress as regards ratifications. It noted, however, that many member States had not yet responded to the Committee’s repeated appeals to ratify and apply the fundamental instruments on freedom of association, forced labour and discrimination.

Another point is the need for well-organised inspection services capable of enforcing national and international labour legislation. This year reports on the labour inspection instruments have been requested under article 19 of the Constitution, and the Committee expressed the hope that all the reports due would be forthcoming and would contain as complete information as possible.

When discussing the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories, the Committee wished to stress the importance of the early entry into force of the instrument of amendment of the Constitution, adopted last year, which deals with the application of ratified Conventions in non-metropolitan territories. In its report the Committee calls upon governments to endeavour to ratify or to accept the instrument of amendment as soon as possible.

The Committee also concerned itself with the question of maternity protection, which the Governing Body had requested it to examine under article 19 of the Constitution in 1964. The Committee had before it a very detailed survey and conclusions emerging from it. This survey showed that, notwithstanding the limited number of ratifications of the instruments on maternity protection, considerable progress has been made in this field in recent decades. While this progress was largely due to economic and social development in the various countries, the Maternity Protection Conventions and Recommendations had exercised undoubted influence on national legislation, which has been drawn on the international standards. As a result, the principles enunciated in these instruments are today accepted by almost all the countries covered by the survey.

The survey by the Committee of Experts indicates that there are certain difficulties in the application of these Conventions on maternity protection. The Committee thinks, however, that these difficulties are not such as to call for a revision of the Conventions, particularly as the limited number of ratifications appears not to be due, in most countries, to basic differences between national legislation and the Conventions. The Committee considers that all governments should aim to ratify and apply the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919, and that, whenever possible, they should seek to attain the higher level of protection provided in the revised Convention of 1952 and ratify that instrument.

In spite of certain differences of opinion on some points, the Committee’s work has in my opinion been useful and constructive. But this is only one side of the picture. The Case Records and Conventions and Recommendations. The other is the practical effect of this work. The function of the Committee might be compared to that of a heart generating again and again through-out the membership of the Organisation fresh impulses towards the implementation of its standards, thus serving the ultimate purpose of the I.L.O.’s supervisory work.

The PRESIDENT—The report is before the Conference for general discussion.

Mr. RICHMOND (Employers’ delegate, Kenya; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations—On behalf of the Employers' group I wish to pay tribute to the Chairman of this Committee for the most pleasant and efficient manner in which he controlled the Committee during its deliberations, and also to pay tribute to the Reporter, Mr. Lappalainen, Government delegate, Finland, and to the whole secretariat for its very able and expert assistance.

It gives me very great pleasure indeed to speak from the rostrum and to recommend to the Conference the unanimous adoption of the report before us. In my view, the Report reflects the Committee's recommendation in an objective manner the deliberations and opinions which were put forward and brought to the notice of the Committee. One of the most important functions of the I.L.O. is the annual study by the Committee of Experts and by the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the manner in which member States are conforming to the standards established by successive Sessions of the Conference. I must pay tribute to the most impartial and objective manner in which the Committee of Experts has prepared its report. It has been successful in rising above normal bias to achieve an integrity of performance which Committees of this Conference would do well to emulate.

The experience of the Conference Committee shows that there is a continuing improvement in the understanding of Members' obligations under article 19 of the Constitution to submit to their competent legislative authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference. Submission, however, does not mean automatic ratification but it is obligatory under the Constitution so that the legislative authority may be fully informed. I suggest that there is also a parallel obligation for governments to examine existing legislation and to submit to the competent authority at the same time that ratification is being considered a clear picture of what new legislation and/or other measures must be undertaken if the instruments under consideration are to be applied. Workers' and employers' organisations should also be consulted; ratification should then be decided on the basis of whether or not these measures are acceptable. It seems to me that if this principle were followed in all cases the work of the Committee of Experts and of the Conference Committee would be greatly simplified.

Over the past few years the Committee has spent hours examining the position of the practical application of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1937, particularly in some African countries. Last year it welcomed the setting up of an I.L.O. research programme which would examine on the spot the measures taken in certain developing countries to train young people and to eliminate unemployment.

This problem not only covers existing legislation but also old-established practices, and it is therefore taking some time for recommendations to be made. We regret the delay but a promise has been given by the Office that the report of the research team and its recommendations will be made to the 46th Session of the Conference. Therefore we hope that the Committee will be giving a thorough examination to this very important problem of forced labour.

All Conventions and Recommendations are important instruments, although some are bound to have a greater significance than others. There are none, however, more important than those which seek to establish, maintain and protect the human rights of workers. In this connection, I refer in particular to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948, and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949. I refer also to their application in certain socialist countries.

This is a very difficult and complex problem, and it will be noted that in the report of the Committee of Experts it was emphasised that the concept of freedom of association was entirely different under the socialist system as compared to the capitalist system. These differences are, at the moment, so great as to be incapable of finding any common ground.

Your Committee, therefore, after reviewing the problem that has been considered by the Committee of Experts, particularly because the Committee of Experts did not introduce any new elements, and there seemed little point in having long and acrimonious arguments and discussions when there was no possibility at all of reaching agreement.

I wish, however, to emphasise that this decision must have no bearing on the supply of any relevant reports now or in the future, or on any examination of such reports by the supervisory bodies. On behalf of the Employers' group I should like to state that we are not at all happy at the continued shelving of this important question, and it is likely that next year we will insist on some endeavours being made to obtain a solution to this problem.

As an example of the Committee's desire to concentrate on the more important infringements of the Constitution and of Conventions, the Committee, as the Reporter has already stated, agreed on a criterion to be used in setting up a special list of States which have persistently disregarded basic undertakings or whose governments have failed to reply to the comments and queries of the experts.

I should like to draw the attention of delegates at this Conference to this list and to the names of the States which are mentioned therein. They appear on pages III and IV of the report of the Conference Committee. I should like to ask delegates from these countries to do their utmost, on their return to their own countries, to ensure that next year their names will be withdrawn from the list. I can assure you that use of this special list was treated very seriously by the Committee, and on more than one occasion a vote was necessary before a decision could be reached. Unfortunately, on one particular occasion the debate lasted far too long, and when the vote was taken to apply the special list to a particular State the motion failed through lack of a quorum.

It is surprising that in these days many countries have still not ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947. The Committee of Experts has stressed from time to time the essential importance of the Convention for the practical application of other international labour standards. All States should ensure that they have a well-organised inspection service fully capable of enforcing their own legislation on labour matters. The countries concerned have numerous and supplied with the necessary powers to ensure that the law will be translated into practice. By so doing they will be able to ensure their ability to meet their obligations to the I.L.O.

Training on the spot is a much more valuable method of granting technical assistance, and the Committee therefore welcomed the most valuable report for labour officers in English speaking countries which took place in Kenya last year. The Committee also welcomed a proposal to hold a similar course in Cameroon for senior officers from French-speaking countries this coming year. This type of practical training by the I.L.O. is most helpful for the countries which have recently obtained independence.

Dealing with the countries which have recently obtained independence, it is pleasing to note the part that they have played in this Conference, particularly in leading various Committees and so on. It was therefore with great regret that I noted in my Committee a tendency for some developing countries to claim that they should be granted special treatment in the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations because of the fact that they have only recently become Members of the I.L.O. I should like to assure the Conference that developing countries have no intention at all of evading their obligations under the Constitution of the I.L.O. They have no intention at all of applying for second-class membership, and we are all fully capable of carrying out our obligations, just as capable as those countries that have been Members for some time.

With these comments, I ask you to adopt the report unanimously.

Interpretation from German: Mr. HEISE (Workers' adviser, Federal Republic of Germany)

—in the name of the Workers' group of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, I should like, first of all, to thank all members of the Committee for their co-operation. My particular thanks go to the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Albano Pacis, Government delegate, Philippines, to whose management of the proceedings the satisfactory conclusion of the Committee's work is largely due. I should like also to thank the Reporter, Mr. Lappalainen, Government delegate, Finland, and Mr. Richmond, the Chairman of the Employers' group.

Unfortunately, Mr. Cool, the Chairman of the Workers' group, is not present today, urgent work elsewhere having obliged him to leave the Conference early. I should like to fail to thank him again from this platform, and to say that it is thanks to his experience and ability that we can, in concluding our work this year, say that valuable progress has been made.

The Workers' group agrees that this Committee is the conscience of the International Labour Conference, for what would be the use of discussing and adopting new Conventions and Recommendations if it were not possible each year to check their application at the legislative level and in practice? Therefore, the Workers group sought, this year, not only to ascertain whether member States had complied with their obligations under article 19 of the Constitution, and particularly had brought the international instruments before the competent authorities, but they also urged that member States should comply with their obligations under article 23 of the Constitution to communicate to the representative organisations of employers and workers copies of the information communicated to the Director-General in pursuance of articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution. This enables the employers and workers to take an independent line on these matters. We think it would make the work of the Workers' members of the Committee more efficient if trade unions made use of this constitutionally guaranteed right more frequently than has been the case in the past.

Examination of the situation in the member countries has shown that, as regards the statutory and the practical application of ratified Conventions, the States may be divided into three groups. First, there are some which do not meet their obligations at all, and in whose case no progress has been made despite annual interrogation in our Committee. Some of these ratified Conventions ten, 20 or even more years ago without having adjusted their legislation to the more favourable provisions of the Conventions concerned. Secondly, there are countries which recognise the differences between their legislation and the Conventions they have ratified, and attempt to eliminate these differences by degrees in co-operation with the I.L.O. and the Committee of Experts. The Workers' group was glad to note that about 40 member States have recently met their obligations to adjust their national legislation to comply with Conventions. Thirdly, there are countries which do not admit that there are differences, and which maintain their own interpretation of the Conventions. In some cases, these interpretations differ widely from those given by the Committee of Experts. Unfortunately, at present there seems to be no prospect of a change in the attitude of countries in that group.

The problem of differing interpretation of the Conventions appeared with particular clarity in the discussions we had on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948.

I am obliged to state that similar situations appear to be arising this year in the interpretation of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957. The Workers' group dealt with this question very thoroughly, and proposed to the Committee that it should consider whether questions arising out of interpretation of the principles and ideas contained in the Conventions should not be referred to the International Court of Justice for final decision in accordance with article 37 of the I.L.O. Constitution. This approach found a good deal of support in the Committee.

It is of great importance to the workers that the principles and ideas contained in the Conventions should be interpreted in a clear and uniform manner. It would be in contradiction with the principle of the universality of the I.L.O. which we all support if differing interpretations of such principles as freedom or social justice, and of ideas such as freedom of association or forced labour, were to become persistent.

It has, however, also emerged that many differences between the provisions of Conventions and those of national legislation arise because the member States concerned, despite goodwill, have practical difficulties in meeting their obligations. This applies especially to the countries which have entered the I.L.O. in recent years. The Workers' group has been very agid to note that a seminar for national officials who have to deal with I.L.O. affairs was held in 1964 in Africa, and that a second such seminar is to follow. The Workers' group considers that arrangements of this kind are desirable and would be useful in other continents also. The trade unions should also be made aware of their rights in a similar fashion.

In respect of the application of the Conventions, the Workers' group considers further that the ratification of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947, is a most important matter. It therefore appeals once more to all member States to proceed to this ratification if they have not already done so and also to have regard to the provisions of the Convention.

As in previous years, the Committee had to decide which States should be placed in a special list because of continuing disregard for their obligations. The Workers' group always carefully considered what line should be taken, and only consented to inclusion in the list in cases where absolutely no progress could be registered. In many instances, it was decided to refrain from such action where efforts by the government to improve the situation were visible, and some member States were removed from the list. The Workers' group considers that this procedure has been useful and should be retained in the future with due regard for the criteria accepted by the Committee and described to you by our Reporter, Mr. Lappalainen. As a Government member rightly said in the Committee, the special list is no electric chair but it does have its effect as a sanction, and induces the States concerned to examine their own situation more carefully.

The Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations had before it on this occasion an excellent report by the Committee of Experts on the application of the various instruments relating to maternity protection. The Workers' group was glad to note that in the last few years satisfactory progress has been made in member States regarding application of the principles contained in those instruments. The leave periods before and after confinement amount altogether to not less than 12 weeks in 89 member States, and exceed that figure in many cases. The Workers' group noted during the discussion of the report that it is also necessary to have regard to the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952, which goes further than the Convention, and particularly to its prohibition of night work. Unfortunately, the Committee of Experts could only discover 14 out of 114 member States in which there is such a prohibition in the case of motherhood.

In conclusion I should like to repeat that the Committee devoted this year a great deal of its time to Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 concerning forced labour. The Workers' group noted with concern that despite the ratification of those instruments forms of forced labour are still to be found in some regions. I will only say at this stage that the Workers' group intends in 1966 to make the abolition of forced labour the main subject among those which it will propose for discussion.

This year our Committee dealt very thoroughly with Portugal's attitude towards the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, in the Portuguese territories which it administers. Because the Portuguese Government has repeatedly failed to provide the information on the application of that Convention for which the Committee of Experts had asked, the Workers' group proposed to place Portugal on the special list.

Although an overwhelming majority of the Committee accepted this proposal, it could not be carried because of that all too frequent occurrence—the lack of a quorum. In the name of the Workers' group of our Committee, I should like here also, in the plenary sitting, to express regret that Portugal has not been placed on this special list by reason of its evident infringement of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957.

Interpretation from French: Mr. MORI (Workers' delegate, Switzerland)—I should like to associate myself with the words spoken by my colleague, Mr. Heise, who expressed appreciation to the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and to all members of that important supervisory body for the very useful work which they did and for the report which they are submitting to our Conference.

However, if I have asked to speak, it is with respect to a proposal for an amendment to the report of the Committee, which I tabled on behalf of practically the whole of the Workers' group. This amendment has been circulated and I trust you have it before you. The Workers' group would be extremely grateful to all delegates, whether they be Government delegates or Employers' or Workers' delegates, if they would approve this amendment, which would represent no more than an act of justice.

The decision taken by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations to continue as in the past to draw up a "black list" of the member States which are not complying faithfully with their obligations under the I.L.O. Constitution, not to mention the international labour Conventions which they have freely ratified, should induce all delegates here to vote in favour of that amendment. This list of States which have not complied with their obligations is the subject of paragraph 20 of the report. The amendment proposed by the Workers' group aims at inserting the name of Portugal after that of Nicaragua in the special list.

This morning, we heard a speaker urge objectivity, and I fully agree with Mr. Verschueren. We must try to be objective, however paradoxical this may seem with respect to countries which are accused of violating obligations which they have freely accepted and international labour Conventions which they have ratified and which have to do with international labour Conventions, has not satisfactorily fulfilled its obligation to answer the questions put to it in the Committee, and which were contained earlier in the report of the Committee of Experts.

In some countries they say that no reply is also a reply. I would interpret this failure to answer precise questions put to the Portuguese Government as an admission of guilt. In those conditions it seems to me that it is absolutely indispensable that the Conference should, by a large majority, redress this mistake which has been committed involuntarily, I admit, by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations where a proposal by the Workers' Vice-Chairman that Portugal should be included in this list was accepted by 51 votes in favour, 7 against, with 33 abstentions. This is an impressive majority and it is regrettable that this decision taken by a majority in a perfectly regular way by democratic vote should have been nullified by the absence of a quorum. I therefore beg you all to bear in mind that this is a quite unacceptable situation and to redress this injustice by adding to this list of countries Portugal, which as far as I am concerned should be the first name on the list.

The PRESIDENT—Before I give the floor to the next speaker I should like to recall that Mr. Mori has submitted to the Conference an amendment to paragraph 20, C, to insert "Portugal" after "Nicaragua". This amendment is submitted on behalf of the Workers' group as a whole, so it does not need seconding at this stage; it has already been supported by the entire group. Speakers can now comment on this amendment as well as on the report. I think Mr. Richmond wishes to speak again; he is speaking on the amendment only as he has already commented on the report.

Mr. RICHMOND (Employers' delegate, Kenya; Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations)—To put things in their proper perspective, this amendment, if carried, means that Portugal could be added to the special list under criterion C, which reads as follows: "The Government has failed to reply to observations or requests of the Committee of Experts in respect of ratified Conventions." If this criterion had been applied automatically, more than 20 or 30 States would have been put on the special list, but it was agreed by both the Workers' group and the Employers' group that the special list would be spoiled completely if it were used in too wide a context with, in consequence, far too many countries being put on it. It was therefore agreed by the Officers that the special list would be used as sparingly as possible and only for serious cases, and that, particularly as far as criterion C was concerned, we would try as much as possible to have a State put on the special list if it represented a serious case of refusing to reply to the Committee of Experts' questions.

In the case of Portugal there was a most unfortunate political intervention in the Committee which meant that most of the speakers applied themselves to matters which were not contained in the Committee of Experts' reports. Therefore, during the long debate the position was completely lost sight of, and even though I, as Employers' leader, had questioned the Portuguese Government on its failure to reply to the Committee of Experts, we did not receive support from the Governments or, to be quite fair, the Workers on following up on these particular questions and ascertaining to our satisfaction whether these complaints were so serious as to justify our supporting the placing of that country on the special list. This was obviously the opinion of quite a number of members, and there were therefore quite a number of abstentions.

However, I am grateful to Mr. Mori for putting the position as he did. Since then I also have made very extensive inquiries and I find that some of the questions of the Committee of Experts were put in 1963, others in 1964, and I am now convinced in my own mind that there has been a serious infringement. Therefore, although I am not here to speak on behalf of the whole Employers' group, because we have not had time to discuss this as a group, I would ask the Employers to support the amendment put forward by Mr. Mori, and I would ask those Government delegates who, like myself, were not certain of the position to do likewise.

Since then, three years have elapsed and nothing has changed in that position. With the exception of their Polish colleague and with a reservation from their Yugoslav colleague, the members of the Committee of Experts—who come from countries as different as Argentina, Barbados, Brazil, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, India, Japan, Lebanon, Malagasy Republic, Nigeria, Pakistan, Peru, Sweden, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States—have this year again expressed their opinion, which can be read in Report III (Part IV) of the Committee.

"The Committee regrets that the Government has not answered the requests for fuller information which the Committee has made several times since 1959, either in observations or direct requests, concerning certain legal aspects of the establishment and functioning of workers' organisations arising out of article 126 of the Constitution of the U.S.S.R."

"The Committee has further noted that the Government in its report that no changes have been made in the legislation during the period covered by the report."

Now the case of the U.S.S.R. is not an isolated one. Similar observations were made by the Committee of Experts concerning other countries in Eastern Europe which have likewise ratified the Convention. It should also be recalled that two of these States, namely Czechoslovakia and Hungary, had, like the U.S.S.R., been the subject of complaints from workers' organisations, subsequent to which the Governing Body of the I.L.O. almost unanimously ordered the publication of reports by its Committee on Freedom of Association evidencing the incompatibility of the trade union systems in these countries with our Convention. That is why the general case of the Eastern European countries has been brought up once again this year in the report of our own Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Some of you may be surprised by this assertion, if you remember the statement made here last Wednesday during the budget discussion by one of our colleagues whom I hold in great esteem, Mr. Chajn, the Government delegate from Poland.

If we look at the text of his statement, we see that Mr. Chajn said the following: 'I can assure you that during the 20 years since the end of the war there has not been a single complaint against my Government concerning the application of any Convention ratified by us'.

I must confess that I do not understand this declaration when I refer to the report of the Committee of Experts and I read the following lines concerning the application of this Convention by Poland: "In the absence of any new elements the Committee can only refer to the conclusions reached by it in previous years, namely that the legislation contains a number of provisions, recapitulated by the Committee in 1964, which are, or are liable to be, contrary to the rights and guarantees laid down in the Convention. As it indicated in 1964, the Committee is prepared to consider these problems further when the legislation has been amended or when new information has been provided."

The feeling of disappointment and lassitude which emerges from all the remarks made by our Experts concerning the application—or rather the non-application—of Convention No. 87 in the Eastern European countries, can be found also in the report of our own Committee. I beg you to read paragraph 11 of this report, which will perhaps seem less cryptic to you after the examples I have just cited. The Committee recalls that in the absence of any new elements it resigned itself in 1963 and 1964 to not resuming the discussion of this question, and it adds that it decided to do likewise this year. It was pointed out that the viewpoint of the parties concerned have remained unchanged at the present session.

That, then, is the position concerning one of our most important Conventions, the purport of which was quite clear to us when we adopted it in 1948. Our Governing Body established, on the basis of this Convention, a whole body of jurisprudence covering 400 complaints from labour federations of all tendencies, and the eminent independent personalities making up our Committee of Experts give us every year interpretations that have never been challenged by this Conference.

Now this Convention, thus understood, which has been ratified by all the Eastern European States, is not being applied, for the good reason that in order to do so their trade union laws would have to be upset. Naturally they are entitled to consider their laws as being the best adapted to their situation and needs, but then in all logic they should denounce a Convention which they were imprudent enough to ratify.

If, however, you consider it is better to be tolerant, patient, hopeful, rather than to condemn and make requests for denunciation, I would draw your attention to certain consequences that this entails. Even if we ignore the encouragement thus given to other countries which for less important irregularities are put on our black list, remember, I beg you, all these young countries which lack the seniority of those I have just quoted and have to establish solidly the bases and structures of their States. You have heard some of their leaders state this construction requires, at least for a certain time, special authority for the Governments, which tend to consider the existence of independent and powerful groupings, political, trade unionist or others, as being incompatible with this authority.

It was in thinking of these countries that I said to the Governing Body last March when we were examining the record of the Second African Regional Conference: let us avoid exerting pressure on the government which is, or believes it is, in such a situation; let us not insist that it ratify without further delay a Convention that it will not be able to implement properly, which would subject it to complaints and condemnations. Were we not well advised, after all, to have waited up to the last few days for the ratification by Japan after an exhaustive debate on the difficulties involved?

The Minister of Labour of the United Arab Republic presented to us the other day a suggestion which has the merit of being frank. After affirming that the developing countries absolutely need a unified labour movement, even imposed by law, Mr. Salama added, in his speech: "The measures and standards included in Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 are no longer sufficient to meet the special circumstances and desperate needs of developing countries. I therefore urge that these two Conventions be revised so that they meet the present requirements of developing countries."

This morning Mr. Kamo, Government delegate, United Arab Republic, asserted, while referring to forced labour—with a conviction that I personally share—his loyalty to the lofty principles of our Constitution and of the Declaration of Philadelphia. I may be permitted to express surprise that his Ministry does not express the same loyalty to another great principle of ours which is freedom of association. But I do not wish to engage in polemics on this point.

All I want to say, as forcibly as Mr. Salama, is that in order perhaps to meet the present and transitory needs of certain countries, we must not destroy these Conventions, which really constitute the charter for free organisations throughout the world. Without them the tripartite principle here would collapse.

I sincerely think that there is also a serious danger in maintaining the situation which I described just now, where the example of great industrial Powers necessarily encourages other countries to ratify, for the sake of appearances, a Convention which they have no intention of applying, or at least not for a long time.

I should like to close by asking the following question: do you not think that we should put an end to these miraculous misunderstandings between the Eastern European countries and the other countries for the sake of better general understanding between us? We are constantly being invited to rise above the differences in political, economic and social systems and to collaborate in a spirit of peaceful coexistence. But should we not, in order to speak a common language, first ensure that we view international commitments in the same manner?

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. MAGAÑOS de MELLO (Government delegate, Uruguay)—I put myself down to speak in the name of Uruguay, but I have been glad to note that at least what I intended to say has been said by previous speakers. All preceding speeches, in fact, contain arguments in favour of what I am going to say.

In the name of Uruguay, I should like to make a reservation and express my dissatisfaction regarding the report of the Committee. As far as concerns Uruguay we consider it unjust, erroneous and not in accordance with the facts. We understand perfectly well that there has to be some system in order to follow carefully the application of Conventions by member States which have undertaken, by ratification, to apply them. However, we quite sincerely think that the efficacy and the strength of the body entrusted with supervision of the application of Conventions stems from the seriousness and equity of the recommendations made and the sanctions applied.

We have great affection for the I.L.O. We were among the first Members of the I.L.O. which, if I am not mistaken, is the doyen of all the international agencies today. We also are the I.L.O., and do not merely belong to it; we are therefore greatly concerned with the effectiveness of its work. And I would add to this general observation that we have great respect for the men who lead it at this time, especially the Director-General, Mr. Morse: we know his disinterested concern for the Organisation which concerns us all.

We believe that in this particular aspect of the supervision of the application of Conventions and the manner in which this supervision is carried out, there is a basic error, a defect of origin, which leads to complaints such as that which I now have to make.

There is a lamentable failure to adjust to reality. You establish a procedure which is apparently equitable and general but which takes absolutely no account of the social and historical realities or of the special circumstances of the countries under inquisition by the Committee.

It has occurred to me at times—and I am thinking of a remark made by a previous speaker—that the placing of a country on the famous special list is something like the Minotaur story, in which a number of virgins were selected by lot and sent for sacrifice. Although, of course, the special list is not concerned with virgins, there does seem to have been some casting of lots. I do not wish to criticise or cast aspersions on anyone, but it does appear that the choice is always made from a limited group. The proof of this failure to adjust to historic reality is that all countries, almost without exception, which are accused in this present report, are developing countries.

This is incredible. I do not doubt that the greater wealth, development and power of certain countries enable them to comply better with certain obligations, but I find it hard to believe that there has never been a case of failure or neglect to apply a Convention on the part of a developed country. I am not claiming that there exists deliberate ill will, but rather that the Committee's approach is misguided, which is quite a different matter. For instance, you have the case of Uruguay. I am sure that I know better than you do the defects in the social structure in my country, which perhaps you have not even visited. However, anyone who has followed with any real attention social developments in the world since the First World War will know that Uruguay has made and is making a great effort, so that in many aspects of social legislation it has gone too far, rather than not far enough, along the path of social achievement.

I can assure you—and I do not say this out of any childish patriotism—I can assure you that, if there is a list of 30 countries which deserve sanctions for failure to apply Conventions and for defects in social organisation, then Uruguay certainly should not be put on that list. We have many defects, but not precisely or especially in this field. We have committed no deadly sins as regards the great problems which might arouse public opinion and the International Labour Conference. If not all, then almost all the faults imputed to us come from a peculiarity of our country, of our background, which is of a purely formal nature, namely failure to send information, or to submit reports in time, or to give the exact explanations called for. But these are not fundamental failings, and the paradox can be explained by the fact that Uruguay, while deeply concerned with social legislation, has no satisfactory labour administration. We have not even a ministry of labour at all: the Labour Department is a branch of the Ministry of Industry.

Proposals have been made on many occasions to change this situation, which has existed since 1911, but it is considered that the time is not yet ripe. Social legislation is and has always been part of our daily life and of constant day-to-day concern to us. However, we have not sought to translate this into a satisfactory formal structure. Consequently, we have not been able to reply as we ought.

This year, in the name of Uruguay, I gave this explanation to the Committee and I also enumerated the definite actions of a formal character which had been taken in order to make good this formal defect. As I said a few days ago to my distinguished friend—if I may be permitted to call him that—Mr. Morse: I cannot believe that the experts of the International Labour Organisation do not know exactly what are the virtues and defects of Uruguay in its real practical life and in its labour legislation. Of course, I recognise that we have not complied with our obligations in good time and evidently we have been guilty of an omission and should perhaps be criticised but not sanctioned.

But I believe—and here I return to my original suggestion—that, if the I.L.O.'s recommendations and sanctions are to be as effective as we all wish—because we have undertaken certain obligations with a full adult sense of responsibility and we want the measures in question to be applied—if these recommendations and sanctions are to be really effective, then we must begin by conforming to a standard of respect for the States Members of the Organisation and of the Committee which are called upon to give explanations before the Committee.

It would only have been possible to justify the inclusion of Uruguay in this list if someone had been able to say to me: "You're lying. Uruguay has not taken the action which you allege. It has failed to submit Conventions adopted since the 37th Session of the Conference to Parliament for ratification. You have not got working parties on the subject which are starting to function satisfactorily; you have not got a permanent representative in Geneva; you have not made progress in the social field, and of course you have not got a permanent representative in the Labour Department of the Ministry of Industry, which you yourself call the Ministry of Labour."

You don't have in Geneva an official who is a specialist in these questions, precisely for the purpose of rectifying this omission—if this were the case you could also say that I was lying and it would be perfectly justified to include Uruguay in the list.

But when a country says: "We have done this and we promise next year to do that, because we have failed to do so ", I do not think that you can include in the relevant report such truculent language as " regrettable result ", " deplorable ", and " very grave ". Let us not be under any illusions. The effectiveness of a legal system depends on the importance attached to it, even by those who infringe it. If we do not respect the law, it becomes useless unless we are afraid to use force, and in that case it is force which makes itself felt and not the law. It's the last straw which breaks the camel's back, and this applies to certain omissions which we witnessed in the Committee and which were recognised by certain members, and to a certain case in which absolution was given and had subsequently to be corrected by an amendment. I hope that my remarks will be understood as being only intended to testify to our profound desire to see the Organisation operate effectively, for we insist on honouring our commitments, freely entered into.

How is it possible to say that there are more than 30 countries which should be the subject of sanctions but that it was considered opportune to sanction only some of them? On that basis one could release 50 convicts from prison and make only ten or 12 persons pay for the sins of all men, claiming that this would be more effective.

I do not think that this is the right procedure to follow. Moreover, I do not think that acting in this unfair way against a State will make it fulfil its obligations more rapidly. I truly believe that it will produce the opposite result. A stimulus should be chosen according to the character of the person to whom it is to be applied; it should be adjusted to the social, historical and political circumstances of the country which it is claimed ought to be sanctioned.

This is why we cannot accept the report, and I say this with regret—we do not really feel ourselves affected by a sanction which we think we do not deserve. We feel that we do not deserve it for it is not, in our opinion, reasonable or considered as it should be. We do not think that it is possible to say that sanctions should be applied to countries which have not made progress in the social field, and to sanction Uruguay. To do so is to disregard the situation in Uruguay. Its difficulties in the economic field are the result, to a great extent, of the imbalance existing between economic and social progress. There has been too much social progress in relation to the economic situation. This has not applied equally to all countries (not only to Uruguay but throughout the Latin American continent) because we are passing through a serious crisis. This crisis is due to various factors of a universal nature, including reversal of the terms of trade, the fall in prices of raw materials, demographic growth, etc.—factors which apply to the serious crisis affecting all the Latin American countries.

However, social progress has not stopped, and this is most important. We have not wished to stop social progress, and then adjectives are applied to my country which seem to me to be uncalled for.

Uruguay, which considers that this system should be completely revised in order to adjust it to reality, as it should be if it is to be effective. I do not wish to conclude without expressing my gratitude to Ambassador Albano Paes for his courtesy. I believe that for him also it was a disagreeable task to preside over this inquisitorial Committee, and he was very pleasant to us.

Interpretation from Russian: Mr. OBUKHO-VICH (Workers' delegate, Byelorussia)—In the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations now under discussion, ideas and proposals can be found which in our view can lead to a fuller adaptation of the I.L.O. to the real conditions of this changing world.

Paragraph 4 is worthy of particular attention, where the Committee invites the Director-General to present a report on the legislation and the factual situation concerning trade unions as well as on the measures which might ensure universal application of the international labour Conventions on trade union rights.

We would like to stress the great significance of trade unions in present-day society and in the progress of the developing countries. But the labour movement is a force without which no social progress can be achieved nor any improvement in the working and living conditions of the people. Nevertheless, every year the Committee observes that in a number of dependent countries such as Aden, the Conventions on freedom of association are not being implemented. The United Nations Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples has not been put into practice. Many countries, even economically developed countries, have not ratified the Conventions on freedom of association. For this reason, the Workers' group of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations expressed its concern about the trade union situation in certain countries; including non-metropolitan territories and other dependent countries. The time has come to study carefully the position of the trade unions and to work out on this basis conditions that will ensure universal effective implementation of the Conventions on freedom of association.

In our view, such study should relate primarily to the non-metropolitan and dependent countries—particularly to Angola, Mozambique and so-called Portuguese Guinea. This would be helping the peoples of the colonies which are fighting for their immediate liberation.

The preparation of a report on this subject would continue the earlier practice in the I.L.O. of studying the trade union situation in different countries, but such study should not be the only way in which a real and effective means of supervision is established.

Over a number of years we have been saying that the present system of supervision by the I.L.O. with a view to ensuring protection of the rights of workers and other trade unions is frequently not effective. We have proved the need to reorganise and democratise the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. We have proposed the drafting of effective standing orders for the Committee of Experts. I believe that further efforts should be made to establish a system of supervision which would really protect the rights of workers and their trade unions.

This reorganisation is necessary for a number of reasons, and particularly in view of the steady increase in the number of ratifications and the need to allow for the true social and economic situation in each country, in view of the formal character of the existing system of supervision. The system should provide for supervision of the way in which each member State applies not only ratified Conventions, but also the basic principles set forth in the Preamble to our Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia, and Conference resolutions.

Mr. Waline spoke today as a defender of trade union rights, and he claimed that the socialist countries are not respecting I.L.O. Convention No. 87. He mentioned that he has been referring to this for three years. In that case he must know that the remarks of the Committee of Experts are based not on the contents of our legislation but on a misinterpretation that distorts the contents of our laws and the facts. This misinterpretation is due to a tendentious attitude towards the socialist countries. Such an attitude is facilitated by the fact that there is no proper system of the I.L.O. to ensure that there are no standing orders to define the terms of reference of the Committee or its composition. The Committee does not in fact study the concrete economic and social conditions in the various countries. As can be seen, these shortcomings in the system of supervision are being utilised by certain delegates for purposes which are alien to the tasks of the I.L.O.

In the discussion on the report of the Government of Portugal on application of Conventions Nos. 105 and 111, convincing proof was given of the use of forced labour by Portugal in Angola, Mozambique and other dependent territories. Unfortunately, despite the unanimous condemnation of Portugal by all who spoke, the Committee was unable—owing to the absence of a quorum—to take a decision on the inclusion of Portugal in the special list. This injustice should be rectified, and I support the amendment moved by Mr. Mórí on behalf of the Workers' group which challenges the use of forced labour by Portugal. World opinion and the principles of the I.L.O. demand that we should condemn the use of forced labour by Portugal.

Interpretation from French: Mr. BOULA-DOUX (Workers' delegate, France)—First, I should like to congratulate and to thank the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, which has done extremely interesting and useful work, the effectiveness of which is not open to doubt. We have had proof of this on several occasions and this year we were particularly pleased to note that the problem of Japan, which exercised us for so long, had finally been satisfactorily resolved. During the few remarks that I have to make, I should like to point out that there is something in our procedure which strikes me as being disquieting, indeed, alarming. I refer to the lack of system of supervision, and that the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and the Committee on Freedom of Association on the one hand and our Credentials Committee on the other hand.

Last year, a Conference resolution called for the insertion in the Constitution of a certain number of principles relating to freedom of association. Everyone here is convinced that the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), constitutes, as has been pointed out, one of the foundations of our Organisation, the very basis, in fact, of tripartism.

However, the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations finds that certain countries do not abide by these essential principles, to be precise those that the resolution adopted last year would have included in the Constitution itself. These principles are not applied either because the Convention has not been ratified—and that, of course, is the most comfortable position for a government to find itself in—or because the Convention is being neglected or applied only partially—which calls for the persistent and vigilant intervention of our Committee—or even because the Convention is being persistently and deliberately violated.

I am once again deeply concerned at the fact that, in such a situation, there is practically no valid sanction that can be directed against a government which places itself in such a position.

You have heard the extremely apposite observations made by the Chairman of the Credentials Committee. He told us that that Committee was bound by certain rules assigning to it clearly defined functions to which it had to confine itself, but that it was not competent to pronounce judgments of value on the objections submitted to it.

And if you look at the eighth report of the Credentials Committee relating to the objection lodged against the Government of the Congo (Brazzaville), you will see that it was by a law that that Government did away with freedom of association, that, simply by a stroke of the pen, it removed the most representative organisation and replaced it with an organisation of its own making. The Chairman of the Credentials Committee did not say so in so many words, but it was quite obvious that he was clearing his conscience in telling us that, although he was bound by the rules of the Committee, he considered that the decision which the Committee had taken was basically unjust in the sense that there had, in fact, been a calculated, persistent, deliberate infringement of an essential international labour Convention.

Therefore, I wonder whether it might not be possible to try to establish some sort of link between the highly judicious and useful work of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Credentials Committee. Of course, this would involve a number of far-reaching changes in our Standing Orders, but I think that, if we wish to deal with problems as serious as to which I have just drawn attention in connection with the Congo (Brazzaville), to problems as serious as those which faced in the past when, for example, we examined the question of apartheid, it is clear that, at a given stage, the overriding of the basic principles of the I.L.O. should result perhaps not in exclusion but at least in a temporary suspension of those States which in this way do not respect the essential bases of our Organisation.

To conclude, I fully support the amendment proposed earlier by Mr. Mori, the precise purpose of which is to create a close link between the established principles of the I.L.O. and the work of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

Mr. SEIDMAN (Workers’ adviser, United States)—I should like to direct particular attention to paragraph 4 of the report of the Committee because I think that it constitutes a forward step which could have great meaning for our Organisation, and particularly for the workers and the trade unions.

Paragraph 4 of the Committee’s report “invites the Director-General to present a report on the legislation and the factual situation concerning trade unions in non-co-operative States) and all non-metropolitan territories and other dependent territories, as well as on the measures which might ensure the application in these countries and territories of the international labour Conventions on trade union rights”. As we all know, those are the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

A moment ago, the Workers’ delegate of Byelorussia spoke criticising that part of the report of the Committee of Experts which related to the question of the application of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 in the communist countries of Eastern Europe and in Cuba. This is not the first time that I have taken this rostrum to refer to this aspect of the report of the Committee of Experts. In past years, I have read the plain words which the Experts have written in their reports and which are subject to no misinterpretation, making it clear that both the law and the practice in those countries do not conform to the Conventions in question. Year after year the Experts have had to say that, in asking for simple information, they have been denied what they have requested, and what they have obviously been entitled to.

I would hope that this new request by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations will be taken very seriously by those countries which, up until now, have been denying the Committee of Experts the essential information which is needed to determine whether, in fact, these Conventions are being applied in those countries. I would hope that those countries, as well as all other countries, would give every possible co-operation to the Director-General so that he can bring before us next year a complete report, and so that we can note the situation throughout the world without discrimination between countries as to the situation with regard to freedom of association and the right to organise.

While I am here, I want to say that I, too, strongly support, and hope all delegates will vote for, the amendment which is now before you. It would indeed be anomalous, to say the least, if, after adopting the resolution which we adopted this morning, and in full knowledge of the fact that Portugal has not provided information with respect to the very subject of the fact that Portugal has not provided in the special list. The criterion is: C. The Government has failed to reply to observations or requests of the Committee of Experts in respect of ratified Conventions." This is not true. Portugal has replied. Read the report of the Committee of Experts and the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. You will see from Appendix I to the latter report why it is wished to include Portugal in the special list. It is because it did not reply to the questions put to it by the Committee in connection with paragraphs 738, 741, 744, 749 and 754 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry which examined the complaint of Ghana against Portugal. But if you read Appendix I to the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations you will find that paragraph 738 of the Commission of Inquiry's report stated: "It was to be noted that the Diamond Company operated in the district of Lunda. The recruits' contracts imposed on the employer the obligation of transporting the workers to their workplaces. Inspections were made. As the Experts noted in regard to paragraph 754, the inspection services had been developed considerably in Angola." I think that those are definite replies.

Look now at paragraph 741 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry; it says: "The necessary instructions had been given to satisfy the Experts' wish concerning the sending of the texts indicated. Moreover, working conditions in the ports and the railways had greatly improved. The question was being considered by a working party. The most important railway in Angola was the Benguela Railway, one of the two greatest in Africa, which the Commission of Inquiry had exonerated entirely from the accusation of forced labour, while emphasising the exceptional economic importance of this railway." Surely that is a reply; what more is asked for?

Look now at paragraph 744 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry; it says: "The rules of operation of the Independent Board of Roads had not yet been issued; they were examined by the Provincial Legislative Council of Angola. On publication they would be communicated. The I.L.O. was already aware of the Organic Law of the Board of Roads." I wonder whether Mr. Mori has the power to oblige the Swiss Government to take legislative action more quickly than it wishes.

Now look at paragraph 749: therefore it says: "As already stated, several inspections had been made on the Cassequel Company. Wages had increased by 10 per cent. since last year. The number of workers recruited (in the technical sense of the term) had substantially diminished. The question would continually be pursued and more detailed information would be supplied in the next report. It was difficult for the Government to collect a great deal of information in the short period between receipt of the Experts' report and the Conference." That reply is reasonable enough, is it not? But it is for you to judge.

What about paragraph 754? It states:

Interpretation from French: Mr. FERNANDES (Government delegate, Portugal)—We have before us the following documents: the report of the Committee and the amendment proposed by Mr. Mori. I have no comments to make regarding the Committee's report. As for the second document, namely Mr. Mori's amendment, I would like to stress that Mr. Mori has been in Angola and he could have told us what he saw there, but he has not done so. I would like to make some comments in this connection. This latter document appears quite innocent and inoffensive. It would appear that it is merely a question of correcting a minor error in the text of the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations and of adding Portugal to a list which includes other countries. However, the document is neither innocent nor inoffensive in intent. On the contrary, it is an attempt to strike a new blow at Portugal in this Conference, as you have heard from what was said by the United States Workers' delegate. This is a complete abandonment by the authors of this initiative of the principles guiding the provision of information by the I.L.O. and, in addition, it constitutes a violation of the Constitution of the Organisation, which some persons apparently wish to destroy at all costs.

Some events which occurred during the Conference have truly surprised us very much for I think that, without being really aware of the fact, we are being led from small to great infringements of the Constitution at the will of a passing and heterogeneous majority, for political reasons unrelated to the purposes of this technical Organisation.

What happened on Saturday in the Resolutions Committee during the discussion of the title of the sixth resolution, and what happened after the meeting yesterday morning of the Workers' group on the subject of the possible inclusion of Portugal in the special list, shows that we are faced with a very general loss of purpose. I would fail to be truthful towards myself and you, and I would fail in respect towards you, if I did not say as clearly as I can what I have just said.

Now, what further measure against Portugal is envisaged by this rather elementary procedure? Merely to include it in a list established by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of States which are alleged not to have provided the information requested under article 22 of the Constitution. As you have heard, these States were selected by chance. The attempt was already made in the Committee, but it failed there. Fortunately, we have before us the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, and we may consult it to see whether Portugal is in the wrong. It is the report which has been prepared by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. What does it say? First of all it indicates the criterion under which it is desired to include Portugal in the special list. The criterion is: C. The Government has failed to reply to observations or requests of the Committee of Experts in respect of ratified Conventions." This is not true. Portugal has replied. Read the report of the Committee of Experts and the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. You will see from Appendix I to the latter report why it is wished to include Portugal in the special list. It is because it did not reply to the questions put to it by the Committee in connection with paragraphs 738, 741, 744, 749 and 754 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry which examined the complaint of Ghana against Portugal. But if you read Appendix I to the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations you will find that paragraph 738 of the Commission of Inquiry's report stated: "It was to be noted that the Diamond Company operated in the district of Lunda. The recruits' contracts imposed on the employer the obligation of transporting the workers to their workplaces. Inspections were made. As the Experts noted in regard to paragraph 754, the inspection services had been developed considerably in Angola." I think that those are definite replies.

Look now at paragraph 741 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry; it says: "The necessary instructions had been given to satisfy the Experts' wish concerning the sending of the texts indicated. Moreover, working conditions in the ports and the railways had greatly improved. The question was being considered by a working party. The most important railway in Angola was the Benguela Railway, one of the two greatest in Africa, which the Commission of Inquiry had exonerated entirely from the accusation of forced labour, while emphasizing the exceptional economic importance of this railway." Surely that is a reply; what more is asked for?

Look now at paragraph 744 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry; it says: "The rules of operation of the Independent Board of Roads had not yet been issued; they were examined by the Provincial Legislative Council of Angola. On publication they would be communicated. The I.L.O. was already aware of the Organic Law of the Board of Roads." I wonder whether Mr. Mori has the power to oblige the Swiss Government to take legislative action more quickly than it wishes.

Now look at paragraph 749: therefore it says: "As already stated, several inspections had been made on the Cassequel Company. Wages had increased by 10 per cent. since last year. The number of workers recruited (in the technical sense of the term) had substantially diminished. The question would continually be pursued and more detailed information would be supplied in the next report. It was difficult for the Government to collect a great deal of information in the short period between receipt of the Experts' report and the Conference." That reply is reasonable enough, is it not? But it is for you to judge.

The expansion of the inspectorate had already been noted by the Experts. With respect to recruitment in Mozambique for the Rand mines, the Commission of Inquiry had stated that it was based on the economic attraction of employment and on the fact that it conferred on those so employed an element of social status, and that there was no element of compulsion under Portuguese jurisdiction and no element of fraud in such recruitment.

I have already informed the Resolutions Committee that all workers going to South Africa postwar or post-1964 as a result of an agreement duly approved by the Government of Portugal, that their conditions are duly supervised by the Portuguese labour inspection authorities in South Africa and that they are covered by the agreements concluded between Portugal and South Africa on 13 October 1964 and 3 May 1965.

I can assure you that these agreements are as good as those which we have in Europe. I have the texts and you may consult them if you wish.

Those were the only observations made and that was the reason why it was desired to put Portugal on the special list.

Having regard to what has been quoted, these attempts to force the inclusion of Portugal in the special list, which is in any case drawn up in a discriminatory and arbitrary manner, have no foundation. I am convinced that the Conference will not accept this unjust proposal. If the States which are parties to the same Conventions as Portugal consider that my country does not apply in a satisfactory manner a given Convention, they need only ask for an inquiry under article 26 of the Constitution. If the occupational organisations of workers or employers consider that Portugal has not satisfactorily applied a Convention ratified by it, they need only complain to the I.L.O. under articles 24 and 25 of the Constitution. To act otherwise is to act unconstitutionally, and all States represented have undertaken to respect the Constitution.

For our part, we firmly oppose infringements of the Constitution, either by a majority or by a minority. The last-minute attempt to put Portugal on the special list means that today the aim is to dictate truth in the I.L.O. by means of votes. Truth would no longer exist as an objective reality in the I.L.O. and it would seem that it would only exist as the result of a vote. Poor truth! The truth exists or does not exist. We cannot create it or destroy it by a vote, particularly when the voting is motivated by one set of political reasons opposed to another set of political reasons each of which is as valid or, if you will, as invalid as the other.

I take this opportunity to explain our position regarding the resolution adopted by the Conference against Portugal. I shall not repeat all the arguments which we submitted to the Resolutions Committee in order to show how inappropriate such a resolution would be. I must, nevertheless, stress its unconstitutional character. The Conference has just taken a very grave decision bearing in mind the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the Preamble and the title of the resolution. Indeed the title does not in the least correspond to the contents of the resolution, and this has very serious consequences. It proves that one can vote anything, even when it runs counter to the truth and to logic. In our opinion the text of the resolution as approved, and in particular the first two operative paragraphs, restate the condemnation of forced labour everywhere and of all practices involving the use of forced labour. We are against forced labour, and are obliged to abolish it. The last two operative paragraphs of the resolution, rendered by the Governor-General of Portugal to give effect without delay to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry which examined the complaint submitted by Ghana. And the Director-General and the Governing Body are requested to keep the matter under review and to take any appropriate measures to ensure that these recommendations are or shall be implemented and to report to the Conference at an early session.

It is clear that neither the Commission of Inquiry nor the Conference has condemned Portugal. Moreover, neither one of them had the right to make any kind of condemnation. By adopting the title in question an attempt was made to show that Portugal had been condemned by the Conference, which happily is not the case.

I must tell you frankly what our position is regarding this resolution. According to us, the draft resolution should have been declared unacceptable, having regard to the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry on the subject of the complaint by Ghana; these conclusions cannot be discussed by the Conference because they were accepted not only by the Governing Body of the I.L.O. in June 1962 but also by the two parties to the complaint, Ghana and Portugal. As you can see by referring to pages 15 and 14 of the English text of the minutes of the 151st Session of the Governing Body which was held from 6 to 9 March 1962, if there were observations to be made regarding the effect to be given by Portugal to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, the only possible correct and logical procedure would be to have recourse to article 33 of the Constitution and nothing more. Furthermore, the only recommendations which the Commission of Inquiry made were those which I have mentioned. They were accepted and followed.

Since we are disposed to accept a new Commission of Inquiry, provided that it may also conduct an inquiry in the territories of one or more of the countries attacking us, it seems very strange that we are to be condemned without an inquiry, and for political reasons that have nothing to do with forced labour.

One of the most evident proofs of the unconstitutional character of the resolution is that for the adoption of a resolution, however insignificant it may be, two-thirds of the votes of the Conference are required under paragraph 2 of article 19 of the Constitution. Some people now wish to impose on us some other procedure in order to adopt a very important resolution, which goes as far as to claim to condemn a State, and to do so on the basis of a mere majority vote. This is absurd. Permit me to draw your attention to this problem.

See Appendix V, p. 594.
We therefore consider that the text is unconstitutional and we make every reservation with regard to it.

I wish this statement to be included in the record of the Conference.

The PRESIDENT—Mr. Möri has asked for the floor. As the mover of the resolution, Mr. Möri has the right to speak twice. I therefore give him the floor.

Interpretation from French: Mr. Möri (Workers' delegate, Switzerland)—Personally I am troubled not only by lies but even more by impertinence and impudence. I think the delegate of Portugal has just demonstrated to us that it is better to stay in a room than to leave it in protest, since this enables one to answer arguments rather than ignore them.

I should like first of all to settle one detail—the detail concerning my ability to influence the Government in Switzerland. I hope that nobody in this assembly would compare the poor situation of a trade union official in the overseas provinces with that of a Swiss trade unionist who certainly has a little more freedom of movement and the possibility of carrying out his work. But that is not the subject under discussion.

Nor is the subject under discussion in this Conference the impression I may have got from the workers and the Portuguese are hospitable people. There are certainly no grounds for complaint as regards the welcome extended to participants in that meeting of the African Consultative Committee—although this is not the point at issue. I am not going to try to drag in other irrelevancies by saying that my chauffeur was a member of the secret police, as indeed were all those who drove cars for the I.L.O. officials. That again is not the point. My chauffeur was a charming man, and I have absolutely nothing to say about him, particularly as he told me quite frankly who he was.

I would add that once I was taking a walk in Luanda alone, looking for a drink, and a fine young man came up to me in the street and asked me why I was alone and if I had been abandoned by my chauffeur. I told him that I had not, that it was I who had dismissed him, since I wanted to have a drink on my own. But that is not the point either.

I shall not call into question the quotations taken from the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, but I should like to call the attention of the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen of the Committee to the fact that it is they who are being accused in the statement of the Portuguese Government delegate.

I will read you a passage which justifies the proposal to include Portugal in this famous list. In the report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations there is a statement by the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee which I should like to quote: "Certain very pertinent questions asked by the Committee of Experts with regard to Convention No. 105 had received no reply. It was to be hoped that the Government would supply complete and detailed information. For example, information had not been given on the development of the inspectorate in Mozambique, which seemed to be little developed since there were only six inspectors for the whole country." And he continued: "With respect to Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had indicated that the possibilities for education and training for Africans were less than for non-Africans in Angola and Mozambique. The Government should supply detailed statistics in its report."

I am not the one who is saying all this; I have just quoted from a statement made by the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. As regards the Workers' Vice-Chairman, who unfortunately had to leave early, he said this: "It was logical for the Experts to be satisfied on receiving information from governments and it always took note thereof with interest. It was also certain that many parts of the observations by the Experts had been passed over in silence by the Government representative, as for example in the case of the references by the Experts to paragraphs 738, 741, 744, 749 and 754. All these referred to essential information which the Government had not supplied, neither had it been supplied by the Government representative to this Committee. In the absence of such important information, and since the Government had limited itself to giving information only on points of detail, the case of Portugal should be included in the special list, point C." It is most regrettable to have to make a statement merely for the sake of objectivity, and which is not even properly appreciated, just to put Portugal where it really belongs in this list. I do not want to engage in polemics; I just want to show that reading carefully selected passages proves absolutely nothing. I am sure no one here has any doubt concerning the situation which really exists in Angola and Mozambique, and I would go so far as to say in Portugal itself, so far as human rights and respect of freedom of association are concerned.

For all these reasons, I invite the delegates to vote in favour of the proposal which is before the Conference.

The PRESIDENT—Since there are no further speakers I propose to take a vote on the amendment submitted by Mr. Möri on behalf of the Workers' group to insert in paragraph 20, C, the word "Portugal" after the word "Nicaragua".

The PRESIDENT—I will now put the report, as a whole, as amended, to the Con-
In this connection it becomes clear how wise was the proposal by the Afro-Asian countries two years ago to create a working party of the Conference based on equitable representation of all States Members for the preparation of proposals for the revision of the programme and structure of the I.L.O. In all probability, the best thing would be to come back to this proposal if there is a genuine wish, as the Director-General said in his Report to the 47th Session of the International Labour Conference, "to swing outwards from accustomed courses into a new and larger orbit of action". Such an approach would definitely speed a solution of the problems connected with the programme and structure of the I.L.O., and would increase the role of the most important body of our Organisation, the General Conference. Without enhancing the role of the Conference, and its active annual participation in the formulation of the Organisation's policy and supervision of its activities, it will hardly be possible to carry out the proposals made at the last three sessions. Only the Conference, primarily when discussing the Director-General's Report and the resolutions submitted to it, is fully equipped to study and solve the problems of the I.L.O. and, on the basis of the basic task laid down by the Constitution, to fight for universal and lasting peace, which, as the Constitution states, can be established only if it is based upon social justice.

The present session is taking place at a time when the international situation has become more complicated. In several regions of the world, war is being waged against peoples who are fighting for their independence and for the development of their countries in the interests of their own peoples, and not in the interests of foreigners, who wish to rule and grow rich.

We have not yet achieved the full and final liquidation of colonialism and its consequences. The I.L.O. still has a great deal to do to protect the newly independent countries against exploitation of their natural and human resources by foreign monopolies, and we hope that the Director-General, in his Report to be devoted to problems of industrialisation, will submit concrete proposals in this connection.

The I.L.O., as has been shown by the present session of the Conference, cannot and is not entitled to remain aloof from these problems, since it is not a purely technical organisation but a body which has to deal with social and economic issues, taking into account all the multifarious aspects of the political situation. The I.L.O. must ensure that our decisions help to maintain and strengthen peace and to uphold the principle of peaceful coexistence between countries with different social structures, and to work for the social and economic progress of all nations. Nobody must forget this, Mr. President. We must all be guided by these considerations to which all the work of the I.L.O. should be subordinated, including its standard-setting, research and operational activities.

At the present time it is very important to develop and not to cut down on the standard-setting activities of the I.L.O. The unanimous adoption by the Conference of the new instruments on the employment of women with family responsibilities and on the employment of young persons in underground work in mines of all kinds shows that all the groups and countries represented in the I.L.O. desire, not to reduce, but to develop the standard-setting activities of the Organisation, and this, in its turn, leads to the question of the need to think out new subjects for international instruments and to review obsolete Conventions and Recommendations. In this connection it is essential always to remember what the main tasks of the I.L.O. are, as well as the needs of newly independent countries.

In carrying out operational activities, the main emphasis should be laid on increasing the effectiveness of technical assistance programmes, on the choice of priority projects rapidly yielding tangible results, and on strict economy with respect to administrative and other unproductive expenditure. We hope that these considerations will guide the Office when it reviews the operational activities of the I.L.O. We hope it will not forget that most countries will find it difficult to agree with any organisation that does not change basic situations or that leads to an increase in non-productive expenditure.

I would like to greet the new member States of Yemen, Zambia, Malta and Malawi. The ranks of the I.L.O. are constantly growing, but we must point out that it is not yet a genuinely universal organisation, neither as to composition nor as to the position of certain groups and countries within it. We must regret the fact that at the 49th Session the legitimate interests of the socialist countries were infringed. These countries did not fill a single elective post in any of the committees of the Conference, and the principle of autonomy was used in the Workers' group in order to prevent the socialist countries from being represented among the officers; in the Employers' group the delegates of the Western countries isolated themselves from the socialist managers, who represent an economic sector accounting for 38 per cent. of the world's industrial output. Let us hope that next year this situation will be rectified. This would clearly be demonstrated by the unanimous election of a representative of one of the socialist countries as President of the 50th Session of the International Labour Conference. It would be of great value for the activities of the Organisation and its future successful operation if the next session of the Conference elected a Governing Body most fully representing all regions of the world in all three groups.

Mr. President, in closing, I would like to wish the Director-General and all States Members every success in conducting the work of the I.L.O. in such a manner as to ensure that our Organisation is in the vanguard of the forces fighting for peace and social and economic progress.

I must tell you, Mr. Raza, that we admired your intelligence, your tact and your great skill in leading the debates at this Conference, and I should like to wish you good health and every success in your manifold activities.

In conclusion, allow me to thank all of you for the confidence you placed in me and the honour you did my country, the Byelorussian S.S.R., in electing me as Vice-President of the Conference.

Interpretation from French: Mr. ANDRIAN-TSITOHAINA (Employers' delegate, Malagasy Republic; Vice-President of the Conference)—In the reply to the debate on his Report, the Director-General of the International Labour Office reminded us that this session of the Conference was attended by 1,100 delegates and advisers representing 104 States. These figures, better than a long speech, illustrate the vitality and universality of the I.L.O. but above all, as I see it, bear witness to the efforts and spirit of understanding of Members of the Organisation in drawing up the new instruments needed for the establishment of more social justice in the world.

Admittedly we are still a long way from having solved all the problems. The Director-General, in referring to the acute tension which ran through our debates, and to the problems arising out of universality and tripartism, did not conceal all the difficulties which can face us in the future.

I share the Director-General's concern, but the fact that we were able this year again to reach many positive conclusions shows that the Members of the Organisation, in spite of the variety of groups and the diversity of their political systems, are willing to debate and to have fruitful exchanges when it is a matter of fighting poverty and improving the lot of mankind. The clear programme presented by the Director-General, moreover, justifies the highest hopes. Until now the Organisation, confronted with the vast and new problem of underdevelopment, seemed to be moving somewhat hesitantly, and we then had the feeling that this Organisation in which we had placed such high hopes was unable to face up to a changing world. That fear is now dispelled. The decentralisation of services, the increasingly close co-operation between the I.L.O. and other specialised agencies, the research undertaken on international trade and industrialisation meet our desires and our deepest preoccupations.
This 49th Session therefore truly marks a turning point in the life of our Organisation, and I am particularly glad that throughout our debate, in spite of the large number of participants, the tone has throughout remained dignified and the level very high. We owe this success to all participants but we owe it above all to the courteous authority and smiling firmness of our President, to whom I am Workers' to offer my most sincere thanks and warmest congratulations.

My thanks and congratulations go also to the Director-General and through him to all the staff of the International Labour Office. Their competence and devotion have enabled the work of the Conference to proceed most smoothly.

In concluding, I wish to express my deep gratitude to all those who elected me to this high office of Vice-President. I deeply appreciate this token of confidence which is an honour to me and to my country.

Interpretation from Spanish: Mr. SÁNCHEZ MADARIAGA (Workers' delegate, Mexico; Vice-President of the Conference)—I think it is my duty, first of all, to thank the Workers' group for the high honour which they did me in putting forward my name for nomination as Vice-President of the Conference.

Next, I should like to express my satisfaction that the Workers' group should have given a very significant demonstration of solidarity with our brothers of the African countries when it warmly and enthusiastically supported the resolution put forward by the Government delegate of the United Arab Republic condemning forced labour in Portugal.

I should like also to express my satisfaction because international instruments have been adopted which make it possible to guarantee better possibilities of employment on the one hand for women with family responsibilities and on the other hand for young persons employed underground in mines. I think we should be satisfied also that important resolutions have been adopted which will enable the competent organs of the I.L.O. to concern themselves with the problems set out in the resolutions, particularly on relations in undertakings, domestic employment and the matters with which the other resolutions deal, most of which were submitted by members of the Workers' group.

Our Conference has no doubt done things which will have a positive effect on the future programme of the Organisation. Not only has it adopted the international instruments I have mentioned; it has also dealt in first discussion with the important matters for the Organisation represented by co-operatives and agrarian reform. On this latter point I should like to underline what was said by my colleague from Mexico, Mr. Macin, when he said yesterday that if we really want to secure genuine agrarian reform we must put an end to feudal conditions subsisting in many parts where there is a concentration of land ownership in a few hands, a thing entirely contrary to all the intentions of social justice.

I think that one should also stress that from the Workers' point of view this Conference has constantly heard a restatement of anti-colonialist principles, principles opposed to racial discrimination, principles opposed to forced labour wherever it may be, for wherever it does happen it is a shame to mankind. I think that these very important aspects of the work of the 49th Session of the Conference justify the observation that what it has done is a step forward towards the objectives of the International Labour Organisation.

In closing, I should like to congratulate Mr. Raza, who has directed the Conference with tact and with a determination to respect freedom of speech, one of the principles on which our Organisation is based, one of the principles which we must all accept.

I should also like to congratulate the Director-General and all the staff of the Conference on the very fine effort made to ensure efficient handling of the heavy workload represented by the proceedings of such a Conference as this, for more countries than ever have attended. I also wish to associate myself with previous speakers in welcoming the representatives of all the countries which have attended.

Representing the Workers, I may say that we have to regret the coming departure of an old trade unionist, Mr. Reus, who is leaving his high post in the Office in a short time. I say frankly that we would have wished him to remain for a good many years yet. This has not been possible. He is leaving the Office, and I take this opportunity of saying that we in the Workers' group recognise his achievements and his effective co-operation, side by side with Mr. Morse and the other members of the Directorate and staff and that we wish him great success in his future life and work.

I take this opportunity to thank all those who have been so kind to me at this session and I wish them also the happiest possible return to their homes and success in their work in their own countries.

The SECRETARY-GENERAL—It remains for me as Secretary-General of the Conference to say a few words in this closing meeting. I should like first of all to thank the members of the Secretariat of this Conference, the members of the staff of the International Labour Office, for the work that they have done on this occasion. I do not know whether everyone appreciates the nights and days of work that are put in during the course of this Conference by the staff. This is done not only as part of their job, but it is done with pleasure and with complete dedication. I was very grateful to the Vice-Presidents for their expressions of appreciation to them.

I should also like to express my thanks to the Chairmen, the Reporters and to the Secretaries of the various Committees of this Conference for the work that they have done and for the success of their conclusions; also for the fact that they have extended to the Secretariat during the entire period of this session.

At the same time, I would add my appreciation of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference for their co-operation, their courtesy and for all that they have done to assist us all in bringing these proceedings to a successful conclusion.

Finally, I think all of us realise that a Conference of this magnitude year after year demands very close teamwork and co-operation as between all the officers, secretaries, staff and the Secretary-General of the Conference. It is a co-ordinated performance of a highly complicated nature which does succeed because of the manner in which we work together as a team, but none of this would be possible unless it were properly orchestrated, and on this occasion may I congratulate the President on his orchestration. He has brought us through many difficulties to a final successful conclusion. No one knows better than I do, as Secretary-General of this Conference, the difficulties that he was confronted with at the beginning of the Conference and on other occasions during its course. I congratulate him on the statesman-like conclusions with which he met the difficulties which confronted him.

On behalf of this entire Conference, and in accordance with our great tradition, I now offer Mr. Raza his gavel, properly inscribed, "To S. Hashim Raza, President, International Labour Conference, 49th Session, Geneva 1965". We would ask him to take this with him and place it amongst his fondest souvenirs, with the expressions of goodwill, appreciation and love of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference.

The President—Before I declare the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference closed, it is my pleasant duty to rise to say a few words to my colleagues whose co-operation, tolerance, good sense, devotion to duty and loyalty to the principles on which this Organisation is founded have brought to a successful end the deliberations of this great assembly.

I am deeply appreciative of the kind words that have been spoken about me by my three partners, the Vice-Presidents of the Conference, Mr. Gurinovich, Mr. Andriantsitohaina and Mr. Sánchez Madariaga, and by the Secretary-General of the Conference. These words have been spoken with a kindness which overwhelms me completely, and since I shall not be present when good friends like them will presumably make obituary references to my demise in due course, I feel gratified at hearing them. I accept these generous words with much humility. Although I did not have to use the gavel, a replica of which has been given to me by Mr. David Morse, Secretary-General of the Conference, I shall keep it as one of my most prized souvenirs.

In many ways this has been a significant Conference. It has been the largest so far held and, thanks to the addition of delegates from four new member States—Malawi, Malta, Yemen and Zambia, the number of delegates and advisers this year was 1,061. Sixty-eight very busy Ministers or Secretaries of State attended this Conference, which denotes its growing importance and prestige. In addition, on 12 June, we had the pleasure of listening to H.E. David Dacko, President of the Central African Republic.

The task of this year's Conference was not an easy one. The Conference was held at a time when daily conflicts were reported from different parts of the globe. When such incidents occur in any part of the world, it is difficult to avoid references to them in any international gathering; although the responsibility for finding solutions to the pressing problems rests on the General Assembly and the Security Council of the United Nations. My appeal to fellow delegates to avoid discussion of the theatres of war in this Conference was based on the conviction that the wise men of the world will find a satisfactory solution of these problems, and that we should do full justice to those matters which appeared on our heavy agenda and which are meant to promote the cause of social justice and economic security. I must express my deep appreciation and thanks to the delegates for their response to my appeal and for the self-restraint shown by so many.

The Conference, this year, had an unusually heavy agenda before it, and it is therefore a matter of deep satisfaction for me, and of gratification for all of us, that the Conference has been able to dispose of its heavy agenda a day before it was scheduled to close. At a time when our Organisation is nearing the fiftieth year of its existence, it is in the fitness of things that the programme and structure of the I.L.O. should receive a thorough examination by the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference. Vast changes have occurred during this period. The old order has changed, is changing steadily, and is giving place to new and dynamic forces in world society.

To meet the challenge of the times—with the emergence of so many new nations which have taken their rightful place in this assembly, and whose strivings for social and economic development have the sympathy of all the member States—it is appropriate that the Organisation should readapt its structure and programmes to meet present and future needs, to renew its efforts with new purpose and drive and, by adapting itself to the needs of the times, give a refreshing look to the Organisation and its programmes. The Director-General, with his unprecedented experience of the work of the I.L.O. and his ability, has presented an imaginative Report to the Conference, outlining a programme of work for the I.L.O. for the coming years. This Report was supplemented by the reports of the Governing Body Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. It should be a matter of great satisfaction for all of us to know that in these matters, despite some divergent views, a large measure of unanimity exists. The broad aim of the I.L.O. has been defined as the improvement of employment and working and living conditions throughout the world. To attain this objective the major programme areas of the Organisation have been defined as (a) human resources development; (b) labour relations and the growth of sound social institutions; and (c) improvement of conditions of life and work.

This programme will not be limited to the work of the I.L.O. in the field of international labour standards but will also include well-balanced technical assistance activities all over the world. The elimination of unemployment, which constitutes a major cause of social and economic backwardness and misery, especially in the developing countries, is a challenging task facing the world, and is a field in which the I.L.O., with its wealth of experience, can render valuable assistance and give hope to millions of unemployed throughout the world.

The Special Report of the Director-General on the Application of the Declaration concerning the Policy of "Apartheid" of the Republic of South Africa provided the Conference with an opportunity of reviewing measures to combat this enormous social evil, which threatens peaceful development in many parts of the world, and of condemning once again the reactionary and inhuman policy of apartheid pursued by the Government of South Africa. The Charter of the United Nations reaffirms the equality of man without any distinction of colour, race, religion or sex, and the I.L.O. has once more reaffirmed its faith in these principles. Distinction in human society cannot, obviously, be based on the colour of a person's skin. It can only be conferred on the basis of the qualities of head and heart which one possesses and the service which one is able to render to one's fellow beings. Apartheid and, for that matter, discrimination of any kind have no place in this twentieth century.

In addition to the technical items concerning the employment of young persons and women with family responsibilities, the Conference, this year, has also had occasion to examine, for the first time, items on agrarian reform and the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. These are matters of vital importance for many countries. I trust that our discussions on agrarian reforms, in which the representatives of the United Nations and the F.A.O. took part, will be of use to the United Nations, whose General Assembly reviews the problems of land reform at intervals of three years; to the Economic and Social Council, which is meeting next month in Geneva, and to the F.A.O., which is to convene a world conference on agricultural reform in June 1966.

I do not know what impressions of this Conference you are carrying home, but, for me, fellow delegates, this has been a memorable Conference. By electing me as your President you have put me under a debt of gratitude which I can never repay. And now I ask of you a further favour. Please visit my home and my country—Pakistan—and give me a chance to receive you and show you round. I assure you that there are many things worth seeing in Pakistan.

I offer my grateful thanks to the Officers of the Conference, the Officers of the groups and the Chairmen, Reporters and members of the Committees of the Conference who contributed largely to the smooth passage of all the agenda before us. I offer my sincere thanks to the Secretary-General, the Principal Deputy Secretary-General, the Deputy and Assistant Secretaries-General, the Technical Adviser, the Legal Adviser, the Special Advisers to the Secretary-General, the Clerk of the Conference, the Assistant to the President and the Secretary to the President, and to all those who worked ceaselessly and unostentatiously to make this Conference a success—the interpreters, the secretaries, the typists and the attendants.

I now declare closed the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference.

APPENDIX I

Reports of the Selection Committee

(1) First Report.\(^1\)

Election of the Officers of the Committee.

The Selection Committee has elected the following Officers:

Chairman: Mr. Menon (Government Member, India).

Employers' Vice-Chairman: Mr. Bergenström (Sweden).

Workers' Vice-Chairman: Lord Collison (United Kingdom).

Setting Up of Conference Committees.

The Selection Committee recommends that the Conference should appoint the following committees:

- Resolutions Committee.
- Finance Committee of Government Representatives.
- Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.
- Committee on Employment of Young Miners.
- Committee on Women Workers.
- Committee on Agrarian Reform.
- Committee on Co-operatives.

Discussion of the Director-General's Report.

The Selection Committee recommends that the discussion of the Director-General's Report should open on Friday, 4 June 1965.

In order to ensure the smooth working of the Conference the Selection Committee recommends that delegates who wish to take part in the discussion of the Director-General's Report should hand in their names to the Clerk of the Conference without delay. It also recommends that they should make every effort to be on hand and ready to speak at the sitting at which they are to be called upon. Speakers will be informed in advance by the Clerk of the Conference of the sitting and the time at which the President is likely to call upon them to speak.

The Selection Committee proposes that the list of speakers should be closed on Wednesday, 9 June, at noon, it being understood that it will be for the President to decide whether any member of the Conference should be authorised to speak if he has not put his name down or has already spoken.

The Selection Committee, bearing in mind the suggestion to this effect made by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office at its 130th Session (November 1955), proposes that the Conference should appeal to speakers in the discussion of the Director-General's Report to concentrate their remarks as far as possible on the Director-General's Report and on the activities of the International Labour Organisation.

Suggestions concerning Facilities for More Negotiation.

At its 145th Session (May 1960) the Governing Body adopted the report of the Committee to Consider the Improvement of the Practical Methods of Working of the International Labour Conference, which contains, among other things, the following passage:

... The Committee suggests that in order to facilitate more continuous negotiation in committees between the several groups, representatives of each group should meet with the Chairman and Reporter of the Committee, and with the representative of the Secretary-General, when this is desirable, to ensure that the leaders of each group know fully the minds of their colleagues in the other groups; it should be regarded as normal to have such meetings after each group has explored each of the major issues which arise but before it has committed itself to a definite attitude. The proposed meetings would have no formal powers or authority, their function would be to afford opportunities for a fuller understanding of differences of view before definite attitudes have crystallised.

The Selection Committee of the 44th Session transmitted this suggestion to the Conference, which approved it on 3 June 1960. The President of the Conference then took the initiative in convening a meeting of chairmen of committees at which he drew attention to the contribution which regular consultation among the officers of each committee could make in securing the widest measure of agreement in the committees.

Reviewing the working of this arrangement, at its meeting in March 1961, the Committee to Consider the Improvement of the Practical Methods of Working of the International Labour Conference welcomed this initiative and trusted that future Presidents of the Conference would make a regular practice of convening similar meetings of chairmen of committees; it suggested that it would be useful if the Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen of committees were convened to future meetings.

of this type. This was done in 1962, 1963 and 1964.

The Selection Committee draws the attention of the Conference and its committees once again to the suggestion reproduced above.

Suggestions regarding the Conference Quorum.

Determination of the Quorum at the Beginning of the Session.

At its 160th and 161st Sessions (November 1964 and March 1965) the Governing Body expressed itself in favour of the adoption of practical measures to improve the application of the Standing Orders on the quorum at the International Labour Conference within the existing constitutional framework.

One aspect of the operation of the quorum which, in the view of the Governing Body, is susceptible of immediate improvement is that of the basis on which the quorum is initially determined at the beginning of the Conference. Under article 20, paragraph 1 (2) of the Standing Orders of the Conference, it rests with the Credentials Committee to determine this quorum after the submission of the brief report submitted by the Chairman of the Governing Body on the eve of the opening sitting (which report merely fixes a provisional quorum). At the present time, therefore, the quorum is determined by the Credentials Committee on the number of valid credentials received. There is, however, no doubt that a certain number of delegates for whom such credentials are received do not in fact come to Geneva or do so very late. If the quorum were fixed on the basis of the registration forms issued to delegates, this would ensure that the level of the quorum from the outset of the session reflected the composition of the Conference realistically. Such a practice could be adopted without a change in the existing Standing Orders.

The Governing Body accordingly decided to recommend to the Selection Committee of the Conference the adoption of the practice of fixing the quorum on the basis of the registration forms issued to delegates.

The Timing of Decisions in Plenary Sittings Requiring a Series of Votes.

At its 151st Session the Governing Body decided to draw the attention of the Selection Committee of the Conference at the beginning of the session to the importance of making appropriate arrangements, in determining the programme of work of the Conference, of matters which will require the holding of votes to come before the Conference at the earliest possible moment.

It further considered that the attention of delegates should be drawn to the fact that acceptance of appointment as delegates implies an obligation to be available in Geneva for the work of the Conference, personally or through an adviser authorised to act as substitute, throughout the Conference. The Governing Body noted that important votes, i.e. the final votes on the adoption of international labour Conventions and/or Recommendations, frequently take place on the last day of the Conference and that, as it is essential that delegates or their duly authorised substitutes should be present when such votes are taken, they should accordingly make arrangements to be available until the very end of the Conference.

Calculation of the Quorum in the Course of the Session.

On the same occasion the Governing Body considered that every effort should be made to ensure an accurate calculation of the quorum at all times, in particular by drawing the attention of delegates who intend to leave the Conference before its termination to the importance of giving advance formal notice of their departure to the Secretariat in writing or of ensuring that an adviser has been duly authorised by a notice addressed to the President of the Conference to act in their place after their departure.

The Governing Body accordingly requested the Selection Committee of the Conference to call the attention of delegates, and in particular of the groups, to this matter so as to ensure that members of delegations are fully aware of the importance of giving advance notice of their departure or of ensuring that an adviser has been duly authorised to act as substitute, during their absence or after their departure. A standard form for giving such notice has been prepared and it is available from the Clerk of the Conference or the Information Desk.

At its 160th and 161st Sessions the Governing Body felt that there may still be room for improvement in the manner in which account is taken of the departure of delegates. Under article 20, paragraph 1 (3), of the Standing Orders of the Conference, any delegate who finally leaves the Conference before its termination and who gives formal notice of his departure to the Secretariat is no longer taken into account for the calculation of the quorum. As a result of repeated reminders to delegates, there has been an increase in the last few years in the number of delegates who, on leaving, have done so. It might, however, be possible to ensure an even more accurate relationship between the quorum and the persons present at the Conference for its last sittings if, in certain circumstances, and within clear limits, certain other persons were able to draw attention to the departure of delegates. In particular, it might be possible for one Government delegate of a country to inform the Secretariat of the departure of another Government delegate of that country, while the secretaries of the Employers' and Workers' groups might be associated with the responsibility for ensuring that the quorum reflects the composition of the Conference by being authorised to notify the Conference of the final departure of members of the group without authorising advisers to act in their place. It was further envisaged that the Office might itself get into touch with the group secretariats in order to make the necessary arrangements. The Governing Body considers that the necessary substitutions could be put into practice immediately at the Conference on a provisional basis, under a liberal interpretation of the terms of the Standing Orders; the Standing Orders could subsequently be amended in the light of experience.

The Governing Body accordingly decided to recommend to the Selection Committee of the Conference that the suggestions made in the previous paragraph should be put into practice on a provisional basis.
The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to adopt the suggestions reproduced above.

Participation of Non-Governmental International Organisations in the Work of the Conference.
The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to invite the following non-governmental international organisations to be represented at the Conference by observers, in accordance with the provisions of article 2 (3) (f) of the Standing Orders of the Conference:
- International Federation of Christian Trade Unions of Salaried Employees, Technicians, Managerial Staff and Commercial Travellers.
- International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees.
- International Metalworkers' Federation.

Participation of Non-Governmental International Organisations in the Work of Certain Committees.
In accordance with article 18 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the practice of the Conference in previous years, the Selection Committee recommends to the Conference that the representatives of the following organisations be added as technical experts without power to vote to the Committees stated:
- Committee on Employment of Young Miners.
  - International Confederation of Executive Staffs.
  - International Young Christian Workers.
  - Miners' International Federation.
  - Women's International League for Peace and Freedom.
  - World O.R.T. Union.
- Committee on Agrarian Reform.
  - International Association for Social Progress.
  - International Confederation of Executive Staffs.
  - International Confederation of Senior Officials.
  - International Young Christian Workers.
  - Pan-American Confederation of Commercial Travellers.
  - World O.R.T. Union.
- Committee on Co-operatives.
  - International Association of Crafts and Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises.
  - International Association for Social Progress.
  - International Confederation of Executive Staffs.
  - International Confederation of Senior Officials.
  - International Council of Commerce Employers.
  - International Federation of Commercial, Clerical and Technical Employees.
  - International Metalworkers' Federation.
  - International Young Christian Workers.
  - Pan-American Confederation of Commercial Travellers.
  - Women's International League for Peace and Freedom.
  - World Young Women's Christian Association.

Appointment of the Drafting Committee of the Conference.
The Selection Committee recommends that, in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 1 of article 6 of the Standing Orders, the Drafting Committee of the Conference be composed as follows:
- The President of the Conference;
- The Secretary-General of the Conference;
- Mr. Jenks, Deputy Secretary-General of the Conference;
- Mr. Wolf, Legal Adviser of the Conference;
- Mr. Valticos, Chief of the International Labour Standards Department of the International Labour Office.

The Selection Committee thinks it desirable to remind the Conference that the special drafting committees appointed by committees under the Standing Orders and consisting of one Government delegate, one Employers' delegate, and one Workers' delegate, together with the Reporter or Reporters of the committee and the legal advisers of the Conference, form part of the Drafting Committee of the Conference when proposals submitted to the Conference by the committee concerned are under consideration.

Appointment of Members of the Appeals Board Panel.

On 8 June 1959 the Conference adopted proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of committees by the Conference. Pursuant to section III, paragraph 5(a) of these proposals, the Governing Body is required to recommend, on the basis of nominations by the Director-General, a panel of five persons of internationally recognised independence and impartiality for appointment by the Conference and from which an Appeals Board of three persons is to be selected prior to each session of the Conference.

On 6 June 1963 the Conference appointed as a member of the panel, for a term of three years, Mr. H. H. Koch (Denmark) to succeed the late Mr. A. Emil F. Sandström (Sweden). On 18 June 1964 the Conference appointed as members of the panel, for a further term of three years, the four other persons who were members of the previous panel, that is to say, Mr. René Cassin (France), Mr. M. K. Vellodi (India), Sir Hector Hetherington, G.B.E. (United Kingdom) and Mr. C. Parra-Pérez (Venezuela). The two last-mentioned members having since died, the panel now consists of only three members.

At its 161st Session the Governing Body decided to recommend that the Conference, to fill the vacancies thus created, should appoint the following persons as members of the panel for a term of three years, i.e. until June 1968:

Sir Harold Emmerson, G.C.B., K.C.V.O. (United Kingdom), Former Chief Industrial Commissioner of the Ministry of Labour, former Under-Secretary of the Ministry of Home Security, former Deputy Secretary and Director-General of Manpower, and former Permanent Secretary of the Ministry of Works and Ministry of Labour and National Service.

Mr. Julio Augusto Barboza-Carneiro (Brazilian), Ambassador of Brazil (retired); former Brazilian Minister or Ambassador to Greece, Egypt, Paraguay, Chile, Japan, etc. etc.; Acting Chief, Political and Cultural Department of Ministry of Foreign Affairs, 1946; Chief of the Brazilian Permanent Delegation in Geneva 1955-56; Chief of the Brazilian Delegation to G.A.T.T., 1958-59; Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, 1953-59; Brazilian Government Delegate to the International Labour Conference, 1922-24; 1955-64.

The mandate of Mr. H. H. Koch having begun on 6 June 1963 and therefore expiring prior to the 50th Session of the Conference in June 1966, the Governing Body decided at its 161st Session to recommend that the International Labour Conference should reappoint Mr. Hans Henrik Koch (Denmark) as a member of the panel for a further term of three years, i.e. until June 1969.

The Selection Committee transmits these recommendations of the Governing Body to the Conference for approval.

The Employers' members asked that it should be placed on record that they took no part in this decision.

Transmittal of Certain Conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform to the Committee on Co-operatives.

The Committee on Agrarian Reform has in the course of its discussions reached certain conclusions concerning the role of co-operatives in connection with agrarian reform. The Selection Committee recommends the Conference to transmit points 23 and 46 to 62 of the draft Conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform to the Committee on Co-operatives, on the understanding that the latter Committee would not be expected to have any substantive discussion of them at this stage.

APPENDIX II

Credentials

The Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office has the honour to present the customary report on the credentials of delegates and advisers as prescribed by article 26 of the Standing Orders of the International Labour Conference.

The composition of each delegation and the method of appointment of delegates and advisers to the sessions of the International Labour Conference are governed by paragraphs 8 and 9 of article 3 of the Constitution; these paragraphs are as follows:

8. The names of the delegates and their advisers will be communicated to the International Labour Office by the government of each of the Members.

9. The credentials of delegates and their advisers shall be subject to scrutiny by the Conference, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present, refuse to admit any delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this article.

Thus, it is for the governments to communicate to the International Labour Office the nominations made. The Conference decides, especially in the case of dispute, whether delegates and advisers have been nominated in accordance with article 3 of the Constitution.

In order to facilitate the verification of credentials the International Labour Conference has included certain provisions in article 26 of its Standing Orders; this article is as follows:

1. The credentials of delegates and their advisers shall be deposited with the International Labour Office at least 15 days before the date fixed for the opening of the session of the Conference.

2. A brief report upon these credentials, drawn up by the Chairman of the Governing Body, shall, with the credentials, be open to inspection by the delegates on the day before the opening of the session of the Conference and shall be published as an appendix to the record of the first sitting.

3. The Credentials Committee appointed by the Conference in pursuance of article 5 of the Standing Orders of the Conference shall consider any objection concerning the nomination of any delegate or adviser which may have been lodged with the Secretary-General.

4. An objection shall not be receivable in the following cases:
(a) if the objection is not lodged with the Secretary-General within 72 hours from 10 o'clock a.m. of the date of the publication in the Provisional Record of the name and function of the person to whose nomination objection is taken: Provided that the above time limit may be extended by the Credentials Committee in the case of objections to the nomination of a delegate or adviser from a distant country;
(b) if the authors of the objection remain anonymous;
(c) if the author of the objection is serving as adviser to the delegate to whose nomination objection is taken;
(d) if the objection is based upon facts or allegations which the Conference, by a debate and a decision referring to identical facts or allegations, has already discussed and recognised to be irrelevant or devoid of substance.

5. The procedure for the determination of whether an objection is receivable shall be as follows:
(a) the Credentials Committee shall consider in respect of each objection whether on any of the grounds set forth in paragraph 4 the objection is irreceivable;
(b) if the Committee reaches a unanimous conclusion concerning the receivability of the objection its decision shall be final;
(c) if the Credentials Committee does not reach a unanimous conclusion concerning the receivability of the objection it shall refer the matter to the Conference, which shall, on being furnished with a record of the Committee's discussions and with a report setting forth the opinion of the majority and minority of its members, decide without further discussion whether the objection is receivable.

6. In every case in which the objection is not declared irreceivable the Credentials Committee shall consider whether the objection is well founded and shall as a matter of urgency submit a report thereon to the Conference.

7. If the Credentials Committee or any member thereof submits a report advising that the Conference should refuse to admit any delegate or adviser, the President shall submit this proposal to the Conference for decision, and the Conference, if it deems that the delegate or adviser has not been nominated in conformity with the requirements of the Constitution, may, in accordance with paragraph 9 of article 3 thereof, refuse by two-thirds of the votes cast by the delegates present to admit the delegate or adviser. Delegates who are in favour of refusing to admit the delegate or adviser shall vote "Yes"; delegates who are opposed to refusing to admit the delegate or adviser shall vote "No".

8. Pending final decision of the question of his admission, any delegate or adviser to whose nomination objection has been taken shall have the same rights as other delegates and advisers.

The following is the text of article 5 of the Standing Orders referred to above:

1. The Conference shall, on the nomination of the Selection Committee, appoint a Credentials Committee consisting of one Government delegate, one Employers' delegate and one Workers' delegate.

2. The Credentials Committee shall examine the credentials of delegates and their advisers, and any objection relating thereto, in accordance with the provisions of section B of Part II.

1 Article 26 cited above constitutes Section B of Part II of the Standing Orders of the Conference. (Note appended to the original text.)
Appendix II: Credentials

The present report is submitted in compliance with the provisions quoted above. The attached list was closed on Tuesday, 1 June 1965, at 10 a.m. in order that it might be available for inspection by the members of the delegations on the day before the opening of the Conference.

It should be pointed out, as has been done in previous years, that the provisions of article 26 of the Standing Orders are especially intended to facilitate the work of verifying the credentials. They do not have the binding character of the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation.

Any credentials sent in after the signature of the present report will be communicated to the Conference by the Secretary-General and will be referred by the Conference to the Credentials Committee. This Committee will examine them together with any objections received by the Officers of the Conference within the time limits laid down in paragraphs 4 and 5 of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

The present report serves for fixing provisionally the quorum necessary to give validity to the votes taken. The last paragraph of article 17 of the Constitution provides that—

The voting is void unless the total number of votes cast is equal to half the number of the delegates attending the Conference.

And article 20, paragraph 1 (2), of the Standing Orders of the Conference adds—

This number shall be provisionally fixed after the presentation of the brief report referred to in paragraph 2 of the rules of procedure concerning credentials set forth in article 26. It shall then be determined by the Credentials Committee.

The following table, based on the files containing the names of the delegates and advisers and the credentials with which they have been provided or the official communications transmitted to the International Labour Office, shows the numerical composition of the Conference.

The following observations may be made as regards the nominations of the delegates and advisers. Up to date 94 States have notified the nominations of the members of their delegations.

Total: 186 323 92 144 90 179 communicated credentials (official instruments) or official letters to the International Labour Office; others have forwarded official telegrams.

Although nomination by official letter or telegram is not in accordance with customary diplomatic procedure the Conference has always considered this method of nomination as satisfactory.

It may be pointed out that two countries have so far nominated Government delegates only, and two countries have so far nominated only one Government delegate.

Two countries have so far nominated an Employers' but not a Workers' delegate.

The Conference and the Credentials Committee have emphasised on previous occasions that article 3 of the Constitution lays an obligation on each government to send a complete delegation to the Conference.

It should be noted that, in the letters or telegrams communicating their nominations, various governments have mentioned the employers' and workers' organisations which they have consulted and with which they have come to an agreement in appointing Employers' and Workers' delegates in accordance with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the Organisation.

Composition of the Conference, and Quorum.

At present the Conference is composed of 186 Government delegates, 92 Employers' delegates and 90 Workers' delegates—a total of 368 delegates.

There are in addition 323 Government advisers, 144 Employers' advisers and 179 Workers' advisers—a total of 646 advisers.

In the letters communicating the nominations some persons have been nominated both as substitute delegates and as advisers. For the purpose of the above total they have been included among the advisers.

The total number of delegates and advisers who have been nominated in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution of the Organisation to take part in the work of the Conference is 1,014.

Since two countries have nominated an Employers' but no Workers' delegate, two non-government delegates are left out of account in the calculation of the quorum.

In conformity with article 17 of the Constitution of the Organisation and with article 29 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the necessary quorum to give a vote validity will provisionally be 183.

Observers.

Following invitation from the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, tripartite observer delegations have been appointed by Barbados, British Guiana and Mauritius. The total number of observers present at the Conference is 11.

Representatives of the United Nations, Specialised Agencies, and Other Official International Organisations.

In accordance with paragraph 1 of article II—relating to reciprocal representation—of the Agreement between the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation, which came into force on 14 December 1946, representatives of the United Nations are attending the Conference.

Up to date the following official international organisations have also accepted the invitation to attend the Conference, which was addressed to them in accordance with the decisions taken by the Governing Body:

Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations.
International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.
World Health Organisation.
General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.
Council of Europe.
European Economic Community.
Intergovernmental Committee for European Migration.
League of Arab States.

Representatives of Non-Governmental International Organisations with Which Consultative Relationships Have Been Established.

International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.
International Co-operative Alliance.
International Federation of Agricultural Producers.
International Federation of Christian Trade Unions.
International Organisation of Employers.
World Federation of Trade Unions.

Representatives of Non-Governmental International Organisations Which Have Been Invited by the Governing Body to Be Represented at the Conference.

(2) First Report of the Credentials Committee.

1. The Credentials Committee of the 49th Session of the Conference is composed of Mr. Bernardo Zanetti, substitute Government delegate, Switzerland, Chairman; Mr. P. Schade Poulsen, substitute Employers' delegate, Denmark; and Mr. Bertil Bolin, Workers' delegate, Sweden.

Composition of the Conference.

2. Since the brief report made by the Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, a number of modifications have occurred in the composition of the Conference.

3. The number of member States of the International Labour Organisation represented at the Conference is at present 103.

Accredited Delegates and Advisers.

4. The total number of accredited delegates is 401, comprising 203 Government delegates, 100 Employers' delegates and 98 Workers' delegates.

5. There are 720 accredited advisers, comprising 361 Government advisers, 161 Employers' advisers and 198 Workers' advisers.

6. The total number of accredited delegates and advisers is 1,121.

Registered Delegates and Advisers.

7. Since the present session of the Conference has decided to adopt the new practice of fixing the quorum on the basis of the registration forms issued to delegates, the Committee considers it desirable to advise the Conference on the situation concerning the registration of delegates.

8. At this time the number of registered delegates is 381, comprising 189 Government delegates, 96 Employers' delegates and 96 Workers' delegates.

9. In addition, the number of registered advisers is 631, comprising 316 Government advisers, 134 Employers' advisers and 181 Workers' advisers.

Quorum.

10. The Committee considers that when an accredited delegate is not registered at the Conference but one of his advisers is accredited as substitute delegate and is registered, this substitute delegate should be counted in fixing the quorum.

11. Consequently, in addition to the registered Government delegates and registered Employers' and Workers' delegates, account should be taken of six Government substitute delegates and one Employers' substitute delegate in fixing the quorum.

12. Two States have designated an Employers' delegate but no Workers' delegate. Therefore, these two Employers' delegates are not taken into consideration in fixing the quorum.

13. At the present time the quorum required to give a vote validity is 193.

14. The Committee notes that if the quorum had been calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates, it would have reached the figure of 200. The difference between the quorum calculated on the basis of the number of registered delegates and that calculated on the basis of the number of accredited delegates is due to the fact that some accredited delegates have not yet registered. The Committee urgently appeals to delegates present at the Conference to register so that the quorum will be as exact as possible and that their presence can be taken into account in its calculation.

Incomplete Delegations.

15. The Committee notes that a certain number of delegations are incomplete, some of these consisting of no non-governmental delegates while all and some of one non-governmental delegate. It wishes to affirm once again the necessity for governments to comply with the requirements of article 3 of the Constitution that a complete tripartite delegation be sent to the Conference.

16. The Committee also notes that there is some imbalance between the number of advisers to the delegates of each group. It once again draws the attention of governments to the fact that it would be desirable to take greater account, when delegations are designated, of the proportions in the composition of the Conference envisaged by paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 3 of the Constitution.

Representatives of the United Nations, Specialised Agencies and Other Official International Organisations.

17. In addition to the organisations listed in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, the following official international organisations have accepted the invitation to attend the Conference which was addressed to them:

Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees; Organisation of American States.

Representatives of Non-Governmental International Organisations.

18. In addition to the organisations listed in the brief report of the Chairman of the Governing Body, the following organisations have accepted the invitation to attend the Conference which was addressed to them:

International Association of Crafts and Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises.

19. The Committee has before it several objections to the credentials of certain delegates and advisers. It is examining these and will not fail to submit, as soon as possible, reports relating thereto.

Objections to the Nomination of the Chinese Delegation.

1. The Committee had before it objections to the nomination of the Chinese delegation submitted by the delegations of Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Rumania, Ukraine and the U.S.S.R.

2. The objections are based on the assertion that only the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, and not the Government of the Republic of China, is legally competent to appoint the delegation.

3. Similar objections have been presented to all sessions of the Conference since 1950. On each occasion the Credentials Committee has noted that the General Assembly of the United Nations has recommended that the position it adopts on conflicting claims to represent a State should be taken into account by the specialised agencies. Consequently, the Committee has always taken the view that the I.L.O. should so far as possible take the same position as the United Nations.

4. As in prior years the representatives of the Government of the Republic of China continue to be seated in the General Assembly, and no decision has so far been taken on the proposal for their exclusion. Under these circumstances the Credentials Committee finds that the situation remains the same as at the last session of the Conference and, as on that occasion, it therefore finds that it cannot accept the objections.

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Israel.

5. The Credentials Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Israel, submitted by the National Labour Federation in Eretz-Israel.

6. The objection is based on the assertion that the General Federation of Labour, to which the Workers' delegate of Israel belongs, is not an independent trade union but the tool of a political party. The objection also claims that the General Federation of Labour has no right to represent the workers of Israel inasmuch as it is itself the largest employer in the country. Finally, the objection asserts that the Workers' delegate of Israel has not been chosen in agreement with the organisations which are the most representative of workers.

7. The Committee notes that the arguments put forward by the objecting organisation are essentially the same as those contained in the objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Israel in 1964. This objection was rejected by the Committee and the Conference took note of this decision.

8. On the basis of the information supplied by the objecting organisation, the situation has not changed since last year.

9. Accordingly, the Committee unanimously decides that the objection is irreceivable under article 26, paragraph 4 (d), of the Standing Orders.

Communication concerning the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of France.

10. The Credentials Committee had before it a letter dated 25 May 1965 sent by the General Confederation of Labour (C.G.T.) which concerned the nomination of the Workers' delegate of France. The C.G.T. requests the Credentials Committee to take note of the recent decision of the French Government henceforth to nominate the Workers' delegate by rotation between the French Democratic Confederation of Labour (C.F.D.T.), the General Confederation of Labour—Force ouvrière (C.G.T.-F.O.) and the General Confederation of Labour (C.G.T.).

11. The C.G.T. moreover requests that it be recalled to the Government that in the absence of a general agreement among the trade union organisations in respect of the present session of the Conference, "the rotation rule should normally have been put into effect with the designation of the C.G.T."

12. At the same time the Committee had before it a letter dated 2 June 1965 from the Minister of Labour of France confirming that the French Government, under the system of rotation between the three most representative workers' organisations, decided to accord the position of French Workers' delegate at the present session of the Conference to the C.F.D.T. (C.F.T.C.).

13. The Credentials Committee, taking note of this decision, appreciates the result of the efforts undertaken by the French Government which, moreover, were in conformity with the views often expressed by the Committee in recent years.

14. As regards the opinion of the C.G.T. that the rotation rule henceforth applicable should have been put into effect as from this session of the Conference with the nomination of a Workers' delegate affiliated to the C.G.T., the Committee notes that this is a matter of judgment to be decided upon by the French Government and not by the Credentials Committee.

15. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

1 See Second Part, p. 215.

The present session of the Conference, composed as follows: Dr. Estrella Sahadala, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Constitutional Government, and announcing the nomination of a delegation of the Dominican Republic to the Conference received a telegram from Santo Domingo, signed by Dr. Jottin Cury, Minister of Foreign Affairs, informing him of the formation in the Dominican Republic of a “Government of National Reconstruction”, and enclosing a copy of a telegram on the subject addressed to the “Permanent Delegation” on 11 May 1965 by Mr. Horacio Vicioso Soto, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

On 3 June 1965 the Secretary-General received a Note Verbale from the “Permanent Delegation of the Dominican Republic to the International Organisations in Geneva”, informing him of the formation in the Dominican Republic of a “Government of National Reconstruction”, and enclosing a copy of a telegram on the subject addressed to the “Permanent Delegation” on 11 May 1965 by Mr. Horacio Vicioso Soto, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

On 4 June 1965 the “Permanent Delegation” further informed the Secretary-General that the “Government of National Reconstruction” was, owing to recent events, unable to send representatives to the Conference at the present time, but that that “Government”, legally represented by the “Permanent Delegation”, reserved its position in case of the arrival of another delegation.

On 8 June 1965 the Secretary-General received a telegram from Santo Domingo, signed by Mr. Horacio Vicioso Soto, “Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs”, and informing him that Mr. Manuel Sosa Vassallo and Mr. Salvador Paradas, respectively Ambassador and Honorary Councillor of the Permanent Delegation to the I.L.O., had been appointed Government delegates to the 49th Session of the Conference.

On 9 June 1965 several communications were received from Dr. Claudio Carrón, including a letter to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee, emphasising that only his “delegation” lawfully represented the Dominican Republic at the Conference. At the same time a telegram was received from the “Ambassador of the Dominican Republic to Washington and to the Organisation of American States”, reiterating that only Dr. Sosa Vassallo and any person nominated through him were the representatives of the Dominican Republic at the Conference.

Three of the persons appointed by the “Constitutional Government”, namely Mr. Carrón, Dr. Alburquerque and Mr. Morales, are in Geneva, as well as the two persons appointed by the “Government of National Reconstruction”, Mr. Sosa Vassallo and Mr. Paradas.

Neither the “Constitutional Government” nor the “Government of National Reconstruction” has so far been recognised by any State as the Government of the Dominican Republic.

The question of the capacity of either of these contending authorities to accredit representatives in the name of the Dominican Republic arose recently in the United Nations in the following circumstances:

(a) On 5 May 1965 the Secretary-General of the United Nations received a telegram signed by Dr. Jottin Cury, “Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Dominican Re-

Communications concerning the Workers’ Delegate of Libya.

Two telegrams concerning the Workers’ delegate of Libya were before the Committee. One was sent by Mr. E. Ghadamsi and the other by Mr. Rajab Neman, GSUFU in Cyrenaica. It seems probable, although verification is not possible, that the former name is that of Mr. El-Gudamsi, Workers’ adviser of Libya at the present session of the Conference, and the latter Mr. Rajab Annahum, the letters standing for the Federation of Libyan Trade Unions in Cyrenaica.

The texts of both communications are essentially similar in stating that the Workers’ delegate of Libya does not represent Libyan workers and calling for an I.L.O. investigation.

Neither of the communications, in the view of the Committee, raises an objection to the credentials of the Workers’ delegate of Libya and, moreover, the information contained in the communications is insufficient to support a possible objection.

In addition, if the first telegram has indeed been sent by Mr. El-Gudamsi, it must be pointed out that, being accredited as Workers’ adviser of Libya, any possible objection on his part to the credentials of the Workers’ delegate of Libya would be irre receivable under article 26, paragraph 4, of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

7. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

(5) Fourth Report of the Credentials Committee

Representation of the Dominican Republic.

1. On 2 June 1965 the Secretary-General of the Conference received a telegram from Santo Domingo, signed by Dr. Jottin Cury, “Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Constitutional Government”, and announcing the nomination of a “delegation of the Dominican Republic” to the present session of the Conference, composed as follows: Dr. Estrella Sahadala, Deputy Minister of Labour”, and Dr. Claudio Carrón, “Government delegates”; Dr. Rafael Alburquerque, “Government adviser”; Mr. Manuel Fernández Mármol, “Employers’ delegate”; and Mr. Próspero Morales, “Workers’ delegate”.

public", informing him that the "Constitutional Government" had appointed Mr. Rubén Brache as Permanent Representative ad interim of the Dominican Republic to the United Nations. On 10 May the Secretary-General received a telegram from the "Government of National Reconstruction" confirming Ambassador Guarao Velázquez—who already occupied the post of Permanent Representative—in his functions. On the same date the Secretary-General received a letter from Mr. Guarao Velázquez informing him of the composition of the "Government of National Reconstruction". Several other communications were received between 10 and 13 May. One communication from the "Constitutional Government" indicated that Dr. de Soto was replaced by Mr. Rubén Brache as Permanent Representative of the Dominican Republic to the United Nations. Both Mr. Rubén Brache and Mr. Guarao Velázquez were instructed by their respective authorities to represent the Dominican Republic before the Security Council on the occasion of the examination by the Council of the situation in the Dominican Republic.

(b) Following the receipt of these various documents, the Secretary-General submitted a report to the Security Council (document S/6353) "concerning the credentials of representatives of the Dominican Republic". After setting out the facts, the Secretary-General came to the following conclusions:

8. From the statements which were made in the Security Council and the communications received from the United Nations, it is apparent that the situation in that country is still unclear as to which of the contending authorities constitutes the government of the country. Furthermore, no information is available as to which of the contending authorities is regarded as the government by a majority of States Members of the United Nations.

9. In the light of the circumstances mentioned above, the Secretary-General feels that at this stage he does not have sufficient information to formulate, in pursuance of rule 15 of the provisional rules 1 of procedure of the Security Council, any opinion as to the adequacy of the credentials which have been submitted.

(c) At its sitting of 14 May 1965, presided over by the representative of Malaysia and attended by representatives of Bolivia, China, France, Ivory Coast, Jordan, Netherlands, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom, United States and Uruguay, the Security Council took note, without objection, of the report of the Secretary-General.

(d) There has been no other decision on this subject of the United Nations since that date modifying the situation.

9. The Credentials Committee notes that this is the first time in the history of the I.L.O. that "delegations" have been appointed by bodies which are not recognised by any State Member of the Organisation as the government of the country which they claim to represent.

10. The Committee further considers it appropriate to recall—

1 Rule 15 provides that the credentials of representatives on the Security Council shall be examined by the Secretary-General who shall submit a report to the Security Council for approval. (Note appended to original text.)

(a) the terms of the resolution adopted on 14 December 1950 by the General Assembly of the United Nations and recommending that, whenever more than one authority claims to be the government entitled to represent a State, the attitude adopted by the General Assembly concerning any such question should be taken into account in other organs of the United Nations and in the specialised agencies; and

(b) the decision of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office of 10 March 1951 to draw the attention of the International Labour Conference to that resolution in order that the Conference take into account the position adopted by the United Nations.

11. In the light of the considerations and facts set out above, and in particular in the light of the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations, cited in paragraph 8 above, which the Security Council decided, without objection, to take note of, the Credentials Committee does not consider it possible to diverge from the conclusion of the Secretary-General that he was not able at this stage to formulate any opinion as to the adequacy of the credentials which had been submitted. The Committee thus considers that it is not at present able to conclude that either the "Constitutional Government" or the "Government of National Reconstruction" is competent validly to communicate the composition of a delegation to the International Labour Conference in accordance with article 3, paragraph 8, of the Constitution. Consequently, it is the view of the Committee that the Dominican Republic cannot at this stage be considered as being represented at this session of the Conference and that therefore the above-mentioned communications do not call for any action.

(6) Fifth Report of the Credentials Committee, 1

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Somalia.

1. The Committee had before it a telegram and letter from the Somali Workers' Confederation containing an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Somalia. The Committee had also before it a letter from the General Secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in which that organisation expressed its support of the objection raised by the Somali Workers' Confederation.

2. The objection is based on the claim that the objections organisation represents the majority of trade unions in Somalia whereas the delegate nominated by the Government does not represent Somali workers and was merely a tool of the Government. Moreover, it was alleged that the Government had cancelled the nomination of a representative of the objecting organisation.

3. The Committee heard the Government delegates of Somalia who explained that there exist four central trade union organisations in Somalia, all of which are independent of the Government. The Workers' delegate is Secretary-General of the General Confederation of Workers and the Workers' adviser is President of the African Confederation of Workers of Somalia. They further explained that the trade union situation in their country was at present unstable and that the Government did not at this time know the number of members represented by any of the central trade union organisations in Somalia, nor their relative strength. The Government consequently convened all four organisations in an effort to have these four organisations agree among themselves on a representation. Upon failure of agreement in this regard, the four organisations nevertheless agreed, according to the Government representatives, that the selection of the Workers' representatives be effected by drawing lots. In this manner two representatives were selected, one of whom was a member of the objecting organisation. When the Government thereafter decided that it could finance the participation of only one Workers' representative at the Conference, the delegate to whose credentials objection is raised was nominated after a second drawing of lots. The other organisations were given the possibility of sending an adviser to the Conference at their own expense. Taking advantage of this possibility, the African Confederation of Workers of Somalia sent an adviser to the Conference at its own expense.

4. While the Committee appreciates that there may be difficulties, in a case such as this, in knowing the exact membership of central trade union organisations, it cannot but express its great surprise at the inability of a Government to give an indication regarding the relative strength of the organisations existing in the country. Moreover the Committee feels constrained to recall that under paragraph 2 (a) of article 13 of the I.L.O. Constitution, member States are required to pay the travelling and subsistence expenses not only for delegates but also for advisers included in their delegation to the Conference.

Communication concerning the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Panama.

7. The Credentials Committee had before it a communication dated 1 June 1965, and despatched on 2 June, from the Federation of Workers of the Republic of Panama.

8. It is not clear what interpretation should be placed on this communication since it seems to relate to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Panama to the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference, without, however, expressly requesting the invalidation of the credentials of the delegate in question but rather an I.L.O. investigation of the trade union situation in the Republic of Panama.

9. Irrespective of the above, the communication from the Federation of Workers of the Republic of Panama was only received by the Secretary-General of the Conference on 9 June 1965, i.e. after the expiry of the time limit of 72 hours laid down in article 26, paragraph 4 (a), of the Standing Orders (the name of the Workers' delegate of Panama appeared in Addendum No. 2 to the Provisional List of Delegations and Secretariat, published on 3 June 1965).

10. The Credentials Committee can therefore only conclude that this communication, in so far as it might constitute an objection, is irreceivable in accordance with the above-mentioned provision of the Standing Orders.

11. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

(7) Sixth Report of the Credentials Committee.¹

Objection to the Nomination of a Workers' Adviser of Morocco.

1. The Committee had before it an objection from the Moroccan Federation of Labour (U.M.T.) concerning the nomination of Mr. Smires, one of the two Workers' advisers of Morocco. This adviser belongs not to the U.M.T. but to the Moroccan General Federation of Labour (U.G.T.M.).

2. The objection, contained in a telegram from the U.M.T., was supplemented by a letter from Mr. ben Seddik, Workers' delegate of Morocco and himself Secretary-General of the U.M.T.

3. In addition, the Committee heard first Mr. ben Seddik and then Mr. Gourja, Government adviser and substitute delegate of Morocco, who were good enough to afford certain clarifications.

4. In substance, according to Mr. ben Seddik, the U.G.T.M. has only an extremely small number of active members and therefore no representative character. It engages in no social or trade union activities in Morocco and is only an artificial creation of the Government aimed at competing with the U.M.T. At the last proportional representation elections of staff delegates of undertakings in Morocco the U.G.T.M. obtained practically no posts. Finally, Mr. Smires, who was not nominated with the agreement of the U.M.T., is in no way qualified to represent the workers of Morocco; moreover, he exercises no trade union functions.

5. Mr. Gourja explained to the Committee the circumstances in which the Workers' delegation of Morocco to the 49th Session of the Conference was nominated. He indicated that only the U.M.T. and the U.G.T.M. were at this time sufficiently representative to be considered in designating the delegation to the Conference.

6. In fact, at the staff delegate elections of 1964 (to the extent that the results are available) the U.M.T. obtained 63.1 per cent. of the total votes cast (as opposed to 56.3 per cent. in 1963) and 76.5 per cent. of the votes of unionised workers (the same percentage as in 1963); the U.G.T.M. obtained 16.8 per cent. of the total votes cast (as opposed to 13.6 per cent. in 1963) and 20.4 per cent. of the votes of unionised workers (as opposed to 18.4 per cent. in 1963).

7. In these circumstances the Moroccan Government convened representatives of the U.M.T. and the U.G.T.M. with a view to determining the composition of the Workers' delegation of Morocco to the 49th Session of the Conference. The Government attempted in vain to arrive at an agreement between the two organisations. Considering that the I.L.O. Constitution calls for consultation of the organisations which can be considered as the most representative and not only of the numerically largest organisation, with a view to nominating Workers' representatives, and relying in this regard on Advisory Opinion No. 1 of the Permanent Court of International Justice (which deals particularly with countries where there is trade union plurality), the Moroccan Government finally decided to grant the position of delegate and one of the two advisers' position to candidates of the U.M.T. and the second adviser position to one of the candidates of the U.G.T.M.

8. Finally, Mr. Gourja informed the Committee that Mr. Smires is at present Deputy Secretary-General of the central executive of the U.G.T.M.

9. The Credentials Committee, having before it this diverse information, notes that the assertions of Mr. ben Seddik and the allegation that the U.G.T.M. is neither representative nor a true trade union organisation are at variance with the explanations of the representative of the Moroccan Government. Thus the Committee is not able to conclude that the Government has not respected the provisions of the I.L.O. Constitution as regards the nomination of a Workers' adviser and it decides therefore not to accept the objection.

Objection to the Nomination of the Government Delegates and the Workers' Delegate of Viet-Nam.

10. The delegation of Viet-Nam at the 49th Session of the Conference is composed as follows: Mr. Phan-Trong-Nhiêm and Mr. Nguyễn-Thoai, Government delegates; Mr. Nguyễn-Vân-Lân, Employers' delegate; Mr. Bùi-Khắc-Chiên and Mrs. Nguyễn-Thi-Hai, Employers' advisers; Mr. Quyên-Trần-Hưu, Workers' delegate; and Mr. Trần-Quốc-Bưu, Workers' adviser.

11. By a letter dated 4 June 1965 the Workers' delegates of the U.S.S.R., Congo (Brazzaville) and Cuba lodged a joint objection against the credentials of Mr. Phan-Trong-Nhiêm and Mr. Nguyễn-Thoai, Government delegates of Viet-Nam, and those of Mr. Quyên-Trần-Hưu, Workers' delegate of that country, and demanded the invalidation of the credentials in question.

12. The objectors submit essentially that recent military and political events have changed the situation in South Viet-Nam, that consequently the authorities which nominated the Government and Workers' delegates in question are at present without power and hence no longer entitled validly to make such nominations, and that the Federation of Trade Unions for the Liberation of the Workers of South Viet-Nam alone—and not the Vietnamese Confederation of Labour, to which Mr. Quyên-Trần-Hưu belongs—is representative of the workers of Viet-Nam.

13. Viet-Nam is not a Member of the United Nations and the question of the representation of Viet-Nam thus has not arisen in that Organisation. The Committee recalls that since the admission of Viet-Nam to the I.L.O. in 1950, the credentials of the delegates have been established by the Government of the Republic of Viet-Nam. It notes that the objectors—whose objection is aimed less at the nomination of the Vietnamese representatives at the present session of the Conference than at the present situation in Viet-Nam—have not shown that the events to which they refer have changed the legal situation of the Government of the Republic of Viet-Nam nor that the delegates at the Conference do not represent that country. The Credentials Committee is of the opinion that nothing in the Constitution of the Organisation would permit it, in these circumstances, to reject credentials established by the same authority as in the preceding years.

14. In so far as the credentials of the Workers' delegate of Viet-Nam are concerned, the only remaining question before the Committee is to determine whether this delegate has been designated in conformity with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution, that is to say, whether he has been designated in agreement with the industrial organisations which are most representative of the workers of the country. The Committee can only find that the objection contains no proof that the Vietnamese Confederation of Labour, to which the delegate in question belongs, does not possess the representative character required by the Constitution.

15. Under these circumstances the Committee reaches the conclusion that the objection in its entirety must be set aside.

_(8) Seventh Report of the Credentials Committee._

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of the Malagasy Republic.

1. The Committee had before it a letter, dated 4 June 1965 and mailed on 9 June, from the Federation of Petroleum Workers, the Tolon'ny Mpiasan'ny Lalamby Malagasy (Railway Workers), the National Federation of Civil Servants, the Malagasy Federation of Free Trade Unions—F.O., and the Union of Autonomous Trade Unions of Madagascar.

2. This communication was received by the Secretary-General of the Conference on 14 June 1965.

3. As the name of the Workers' delegate of the Malagasy Republic appeared in Addendum No. 3 to the Provisional List of Delegations and Secretariat, published on 4 June 1965, the objection arrived after the expiry of the time limit of 72 hours laid down in paragraph 4 (a) of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

4. The Credentials Committee therefore finds that the objection is irreceivable under the above-mentioned provision of the Standing Orders.

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Morocco and One of His Advisers.

5. The Committee had before it a letter from the Moroccan General Federation of Labour (U.G.T.M.), dated 14 June 1965 and handed over on the same day in Geneva to the Chairman of the Credentials Committee. This letter contained an objection to the credentials of Mr. ben Seddik, Workers' delegate, and Mr. Kenfaoui, Workers' adviser of Morocco.

6. The Committee points out that the names of the Workers' delegate and adviser in question appeared for the first time in Addendum No. 2 to the Provisional List of Delegations and Secretariat, published on 3 June 1965. The objection thus arrived after the expiry of the time limit of 72 hours laid down in paragraph 4 (a) of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

7. The Credentials Committee therefore finds that the objection is irreceivable under the above-mentioned provision of the Standing Orders.

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Uruguay.

8. The Committee had before it a letter dated 2 June 1965 from the National Convention of Uruguayan Workers.

9. This communication was anonymously deposited with the secretariat of the Credentials Committee on 14 June 1965.

10. As the name of the Workers' delegate in question appeared for the first time in the Provisional List of Delegations and Secretariat, published on 2 June 1965, the objection arrived after the expiry of the time limit of 72 hours, laid down in paragraph 4 (a) of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

11. The Credentials Committee therefore finds that the objection is irreceivable under the above-mentioned provision of the Standing Orders.

Objection to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegate of Uganda.

12. The Credentials Committee had before it an objection to the nomination of the Workers' delegate of Uganda lodged by the Uganda Trade Union Congress.

13. In essence, the objecting organisation alleges that the nomination of the Workers' delegate, the Secretary-General of the Federation of Uganda Trade Unions (F.U.T.U.), was improper under paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution. It is asserted that this delegate was not chosen in agreement with the Uganda Trades Union Congress (U.T.U.C.) which is the most representative workers' organisation in Uganda, nor was the U.T.U.C. consulted before such designation was made.

14. The objecting organisation submitted certain statistics to show that an overwhelming majority of the unionised workers of Uganda belonged to trade unions affiliated with the U.T.U.C. rather than to the F.U.T.U. or to non-affiliated unions. The objecting organisation further supports its allegations by stating that at previous sessions of the Conference the Workers' observers and delegates of Uganda had been drawn from the U.T.U.C.; that it was the U.T.U.C. which had signed, on behalf of all Uganda workers, the national Industrial Relations Charter which was drafted with the support of the Government, and that the U.T.U.C. had been recognised by the Government in connection with participation in various consultative bodies at the national level. In a general manner, the objection asserts that the F.U.T.U. is not representative of the workers of Uganda.

15. The Committee heard Mr. Owor and Mr. Nyagahima of the Government delegation of Uganda.

16. In essence the Government representatives asserted that while in the past the U.T.U.C. had enjoyed the support of the greatest number of workers in Uganda, the situation had changed recently. A good number of unions previously affiliated with the U.T.U.C., and cited in the objection as still being so affiliated, had transferred their allegiance to the F.U.T.U., with the result that the latter organisation was undoubtedly the majority central trade union organisation, although the U.T.U.C. still enjoyed a considerable degree of support. The Government representatives affirmed that the U.T.U.C. was not consulted as regards the composition of the Workers' delegation to the present session of the Conference nor was it offered the possibility of putting forward a candidate for either a delegate or adviser position. Because the situation was so clear as regards the majority status of the F.U.T.U., and further because the U.T.U.C. allegedly had evinced no interest in the work of the I.L.O. (not having replied to the Government's solicitation of comments from it in connection with items on the agenda of this session of the Conference), the Government decided, in its discretion, to consult only the F.U.T.U. in nominating the Workers' delegation.

17. The Committee then heard Mr. Luande, President of the U.T.U.C., who signed the objection on behalf of that organisation. He reaffirmed the allegations set out in the objection, and particularly the statistics purporting to show the majority support of the U.T.U.C. by the workers of Uganda. He knew of no recent disaffiliation of unions from the U.T.U.C. Furthermore, the U.T.U.C. had not received for comments any documents from the Government concerning the Conference agenda.

18. It is clear from the record before the Committee that there is a wide variance between the allegations of the objecting organisation and those of the Government representatives, particularly as regards the relative strength of the U.T.U.C. and the F.U.T.U. It is equally clear that regardless of whether it is the numerically stronger or weaker organisation, the U.T.U.C. continues to command sufficient support of the workers of Uganda to be considered a representative workers' organisation in that country. It is also undisputed that the agreement of the U.T.U.C. was not sought nor was it consulted in the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Uganda.

19. Paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution provides:

5. The Members undertake to nominate non-Government delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organisations, if such organisations exist, which are most representative of employers or workpeople, as the case may be, in their respective countries.

20. Certainly, agreement cannot always be reached. But genuine consultations undertaken in good faith are essential. In Advisory Opinion No. 1 of the Permanent Court of International Justice—which relates particularly to countries where there are several representative organisations—it is stated, in particular with regard to the obligation laid down in paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution, that:

The engagement . . . is not a mere moral obligation. It is a part of the Treaty and constitutes an obligation by which the parties to the Treaty are bound to one another. The obligation is, that the persons nominated should have been chosen in agreement with the organisations most representative of employers or workpeople, as the case may be. There is no definition of the word "representative" in the Treaty. The most representative organisations for this purpose are, of course, those organisations which best represent the employers and the workers respectively. What these organisations are, is a question to be decided in the particular case, having regard to the circumstances in each particular country at the time when the choice falls to be made. Numbers are not the only test of the representative character of the organisations, but they are an important factor; other things being equal, the most numerous will be the most representative. The article therefore throws upon the Government of the State the duty of deciding, on the data at its disposal, what organisations are, in point of fact, the most representative. . . .

The only object of the intervention of industrial organisations, in connection with the selection of delegates and technical advisers, is to ensure, as far as possible, that the Governments should nominate persons whose opinions are in harmony with the opinions of employers and workers respectively. If, therefore, in a particular country there exist several industrial organisations representing the working classes, the Government must take all of them into consideration when it is proceeding to the nomination of the Workers' delegate and his technical advisers. Only by acting this way can the Government succeed in choosing persons who, having regard to the particular circumstances, will be able to represent at the Conference the views of the working classes concerned. . . .

The aim of each Government must, of course, be an agreement with all the most representative organisations of employers and workers, as the case may be; that, however, is only an ideal which is extremely difficult to attain. . . .

What is required of the Government is that they should do their best to effect an agreement, which, in the circumstances, may be regarded by the Government as the purpose of ensuring the representation of the workers of the country.

21. In the view of the Credentials Committee the U.T.U.C. belongs to the category of organisations with which agreement should have been sought. No attempt to reach such an agreement was made and, indeed, the Government did not even consult that organisation.

22. The Committee can only conclude that the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Uganda was made in a manner which departs from the principles reflected above. Even if, as the Government contends, the F.U.T.U. represented the majority of the workers, this would not justify the fact that the U.T.U.C. was not consulted prior to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Uganda.

23. There may, of course, have been a misunderstanding as to the real meaning of the Constitutional provision relating to the appointment of non-Government delegates.

24. Taking all these factors into account, as well as the fact that the relative strength of the two organisations concerned is not clearly established the Credentials Committee does not consider that it can invalidate the credentials of the Workers' delegate concerned.

25. However, the Credentials Committee feels bound to appeal very strongly to governments to conform strictly to the letter and spirit of Constitutional provisions when appointing non-government delegates. Arbitrary choice of a delegate by a government, without any effort at genuine consultation to reach an agreement with the most representative organisations, may constitute an abuse which, if it is not remedied, could lead to a situation which would be dangerous for the entire Organisation, since the real interests of employers and workers would be in danger of being seriously affected.

Objections to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegation of Spain.

26. Objections to the nomination of the entire Workers' delegation of Spain were received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions in a single joint communication, and from the World Federation of Trade Unions.

27. The objections allege that the designation was not made in conformity with paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution since the Workers' delegate and advisers were drawn from an organisation which is not representative of workers but rather an instrument of the State, free and representative trade unions having been repressed in Spain. Moreover allusion is made to a number of cases during the last year of repression of legitimate trade union activities and of criminal prosecution of certain workers' leaders, which have allegedly taken place.

28. Analogous objections have been lodged against the nomination of Spanish Workers' delegations to the Conference on several occasions in the past. The first objection was made at the 1956 Session of the Conference at which time the Workers' member of the Credentials Committee recommended invalidation of the credentials in question. After discussion in plenary session, this recommendation was rejected by the Conference by 48 votes in favour, 124 against, with 59 abstentions. At subsequent sessions of the Conference, in 1958, 1961, 1962, 1963 and 1964, the Credentials Committee, having before it similar objections, found them irreceivable under the terms of paragraph 4 (d) of article 26 of the Standing Orders which provides that an objection shall not be receivable if it "is based upon facts or allegations which the Conference, by a debate and decision referring to identical facts or allegations, has already discussed and recognised to be irrelevant or devoid of substance". It is to be noted, however, that in so doing the Committee, on each of these subsequent occasions, was careful to note that it was in no way basing its decision on a finding that the Workers' delegation of Spain was designated by the Government in accordance with the basic principles of the International Labour Organisation.

29. The Committee finds that the objections this year have not demonstrated that substantial new facts have arisen and thus further finds that the situation is essentially the same as it was in 1956 and in subsequent years.

30. The Committee therefore concludes that the objections are once again irreceivable under paragraph 4 (d) of article 26 of the Standing Orders. Nevertheless the Committee wishes once again to let the Conference know the extent to which it remains concerned at the trade union situation existing in Spain. At the same time certain information given to this session of the Conference by the Minister of Labour of Spain seems to indicate possible changes in the present situation. The Committee would sincerely hope that these changes will soon materialise and lead to results which are in conformity with the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

31. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

(9) Eighth Report of the Credentials Committee.

Objections to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegation of Congo (Brazzaville).

1. The Committee had before it an objection lodged by the African Trade Union Confederation (A.T.U.C.) against the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Congo (Brazzaville). The Committee further received a joint letter from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions in which these organisations support the objection lodged by the A.T.U.C.

2. The objectors claim that the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville), Mr. Diallo, Secretary-General of the Congolese Trade Union Confederation (C.S.C.), and his adviser were nominated in violation of article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. In their view, the nomination of the delegate and adviser in question was not made in agreement with the most representative workers' organisation existing in Congo (Brazzaville).

3. The objectors recall that Law No. 40/64 of 17 December 1964 established the Congolese Trade Union Confederation (C.S.C.), following a decision taken by a Merger Congress held in 1964, in which participated the African General Confederation of Labour, the Congolese Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the Congolese Civil Servants and Government Employees, the Federation of Independent Institutions and the Federation of Postal Workers. The same Law decreed the dissolution of all other central trade union organisations in the country. However, the objectors maintain that the African Confederation of Believing Workers (C.A.T.C.), and not the C.S.C., remains the most representative workers' organisation in Congo (Brazzaville). In fact the C.A.T.C. "has kept its identity and legal personality as it has withdrawn from the Merger Committee" which had prepared the Merger Congress. They submit that this Law contravenes not only the Constitution of Congo (Brazzaville) but also the Freedom of Association and Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 57), which Congo (Brazzaville) has ratified. They therefore consider that at the facts have not been dissolved by an illegal law and as it remains the most representative trade union organisation, it should have been consulted, in accordance with article 3, paragraph 5, of the Constitution, in connection with the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Congo (Brazzaville). In support of this argument, the objectors adduce further the fact that the elections of staff delegates of undertakings, which were scheduled to be held in November-December 1964—after the Merger Congress—could not be held because the workers, instead of supporting the lists of the C.S.C., presented lists sponsored by the C.A.T.C. in all undertakings, even those where no C.A.T.C. list had previously been presented.

4. The Minister of Labour and Social Welfare of Congo (Brazzaville) was good enough to give certain oral information to the Committee and to submit at the same time a written statement in reply to the objection. In this written statement the Minister indicates in particular the following:

... The Congolese people sees in the unity of the working masses an essential factor in the phase of the consolidation of its political independence and of the building of the national economy;... This preoccupation is again reflected in the statutes of the National Movement of the Revolution, in the elaboration of which Mr. Gilbert Pongault, Vice-President of the African Trade Union Confederation, the organisation which signed the objection analysed above, and a large C.A.T.C. delegation participated actively... these statutes provide for, among other parallel bodies of the Party, a single central trade union organisation called the Congo Trade Union Confederation...

... Law No. 40/64 of 17 December 1964 is the embodiment in form, the appropriate legal form, of this will of the people;... the law of 17 December 1964 expressly decrees the dissolution of all central trade union organisations other than the Congo Trade Union Confederation...

5. The Minister's written statement then affirms that the A.T.U.C. cannot question the constitutionality of this Law since:

... Under the terms of the Constitution adopted by the Congolese people on 8 December 1963 (article 30, paragraph 2), the President of the Republic alone is competent to request, before promulgation, the review by the Supreme Court of the constitutionality of laws voted by the National Assembly;... the President of the Republic of Congo (Brazzaville) duly promulgated Law No. 40/64 which, moreover, received the required publication and duly entered into force several months before the present session of the International Labour Conference.

It then indicates that the A.T.U.C.:

... cannot either speak of violation of international labour Convention No. 87, as the working class, an integral part of the Congolese people, has, through the constitutional machinery of representative democracy, rejected trade union plurality;... it is absolutely wrong to believe that only trade union plurality guarantees the principle of freedom of association; that the thesis of the violation of this principle could have been admitted if the Congolese workers' movement had been unified by an administrative decision; this was not the case, since the decision took the form of a law, the sovereign expression of the free will of the nation.

6. The Minister of Labour concluded his written statement on this point by indicating that:

... the above-mentioned law must be considered in the light of the foregoing as a valid legal act; that it has deprived the C.A.T.C. and the other central workers' organisations, apart from the Congolese Trade Union Confederation, of their legal personality; that consequently, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation being the only workers' organisation legally recognised in the Republic of the Congo, the designation of the C.A.T.C. delegate and adviser from this organisation could only be made and had only to be made in agreement with that organisation and only that organisation.

7. As regards the election of staff delegates in undertakings, the information provided by the Minister of Labour indicates that such elections were not prevented by the attitude of the Congolese workers but rather they had been deferred until the publication of a text on the institution of staff delegates, a text taking into account the provision of the new Labour Code (Law No. 10/64 of 25 June 1964) and the new legal situation created by Law No. 40/64 concerning the establishment of a single central trade union organisation... The written statement of the Minister explained that this text had been published in May 1965 and that the elections would take place on 23 June 1965.

8. Finally, in his written statement, the Minister renewed the invitation that had already been twice extended to the Committee on Freedom of Association to visit the Congo (Brazzaville) to inquire on the spot into the trade union situation in the country.

9. The Committee also heard the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville) to whose credentials the objection was raised. He explained the circumstances in which the decision to establish a single trade union organisation had been taken in Congo (Brazzaville). He stated to the Committee that the C.A.T.C. had been invited to participate in the November 1964 Merger Congress but that for reasons of which he was not aware but which he thought were due to the fear of that organisation of being in the minority, the C.A.T.C. had finally refused to participate. He affirmed that all the C.A.T.C. leaders, except one who had been arrested exclusively for national security reasons, were free and that some of them were to be reintegrated into the trade union movement. Finally, the delegate stated that out of some 57,000 wage earners in the private sector and 12,000 public servants, 10,000 workers had recently bought membership cards in the C.S.C.

10. The Committee next heard the representatives of the African Trade Union Confederation (A.T.U.C.). These representatives reaffirmed the information contained in the objection. Moreover, they explained that the C.A.T.C. had always sought unified trade union action in Congo (Brazzaville). The C.A.T.C., however, considered that trade unions should remain independent of the government, employers and political parties since they had to defend the interests of a well-defined segment of the population. These representatives indicated that the C.A.T.C. had decided at its own Congress to withdraw from the Merger Committee and not to participate in the November 1964 Merger Congress because it considered that it was not in the interest of the workers to support a unified trade union system, the role of which would be to become a section of the single national party and which would thus merely reflect the decisions of the party vis-à-vis the workers. In addition, these representatives reaffirmed that all of the C.A.T.C. leaders had either been arrested or placed in a situation where they were no longer able to exercise any trade union activity, or even murdered. They also explained that the party in power had recruited unemployed persons and formed them in armed bands in order to sack the buildings belonging to the trade unions of believing workers.

11. After recalling their stand in regard to Law No. 40/64, the representatives of the A.T.U.C. stated that in their opinion there was no doubt that the C.A.T.C. was the most representative workers' organisation in Congo (Brazzaville). This was demonstrated by the fact that in the past at least 50 per cent. of the total of some 340,000 workers in the private sector of Congo (Brazzaville) were affiliated or this organisation and also by the fact that the Government had recently requested to resume negotiations with the C.A.T.C.

12. Having before it this information, the Credentials Committee is of the opinion that the essential point upon which its decision depends is whether Law No. 40/64 of 17 December 1964 is illegal as the objectors claim. It must therefore accept the existence of this law. The Committee can consequently only find that under the terms of this law there is at present only one legally existing trade union organisation, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation, legally existing in Congo (Brazzaville), and all the other central trade union organisations—including the C.A.T.C.—have been dissolved. The C.A.T.C. has so far been the most representative workers' organisation of Congo (Brazzaville), and it is on this basis that the Workers' delegates of this country at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference were chosen among the members of this organisation. Had the Law of 17 December 1964 not been adopted, it is possible that the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville) would have had to be nominated in the same manner as in previous years. But in the circumstances described above—however regrettable the adoption of this law may seem to the members of the Credentials Committee—the Committee can only find that the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville) and his adviser were nominated in consultation with the only legally existing trade union organisation.

13. It may be questioned in the first place, as suggested by the objecting organisations, whether this law is in conformity with the Constitution of Congo (Brazzaville). However the Credentials Committee cannot judge the constitutionality of national laws, this being a question of internal law.

14. In the second place it may be questioned, as also suggested by the objecting organisations, whether the Law of 17 December 1964 is compatible with the international obligations of Congo (Brazzaville) deriving from its membership of the I.L.O. and particularly with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which was ratified by this country on 10 November 1960, i.e. four years before the promulgation of the above-mentioned law. The members of the Committee cannot but think that there is a contradiction between the Law of 17 December 1964 and the obligations deriving from the Convention, but it is not for the Committee, within its terms of reference, to undertake a legal examination of a question concerning the compatibility between national legislation and an international labour Convention. Apart from any possibility of redress existing at the national level, the I.L.O. has special procedures for the examination of questions concerning the relationship between national legislation and international labour Conventions and these questions must be dealt with in good and due form. It is for the Conference or the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to take the required steps in this connection.

15. In these circumstances the Credentials Committee cannot, within its terms of reference, presume that the Law of 17 December 1964 is illegal as the objectors claim. It must therefore accept the existence of this law. The Committee can consequently only find that under the terms of this law there is at present only one trade union organisation, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation, legally existing in Congo (Brazzaville), and all the other central trade union organisations—including the C.A.T.C.—have been dissolved. The C.A.T.C. has so far been the most representative workers' organisation of Congo (Brazzaville), and it is on this basis that the Workers' delegates of this country at previous sessions of the International Labour Conference were chosen among the members of this organisation. Had the Law of 17 December 1964 not been adopted, it is possible that the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville) would have had to be nominated in the same manner as in previous years. But in the circumstances described above—however regrettable the adoption of this law may seem to the members of the Credentials Committee—the Committee can only find that the Workers' delegate of Congo (Brazzaville) and his adviser were nominated in consultation with the only legally existing trade union organisation.

16. The Credentials Committee—despite all the concern it feels at the facts described above—cannot therefore, within the strict framework of its terms of reference, reach the conclusion that the Government of Congo (Brazzaville) has violated paragraph 5 of article 3 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

17. The members of the Committee unanimously wish to affirm categorically that their decision is dictated only by the obligation incumbent upon them to apply strictly the rules governing the terms of reference of the Committee. As regards the aspects of the problem which fall outside their competence, and particularly those arising out of the adoption of the Law of 17 December 1964, the members of the Committee note that such aspects are at present being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, which has before it complaints against the Government of Congo (Brazzaville). The members of the Committee express the hope that this examination will lead to concrete proposals regarding the legal situation in Congo (Brazzaville) in the near future.

18. At the same time, the members of the Committee, also unanimously, wish to let the Conference know the extent to which they remain preoccupied by the trade union situation resulting in Congo (Brazzaville) from the adoption of the Law of 17 December 1964, which has abolished in law a major trade union organisation against its own will.

Objections to the Nomination of the Workers' Delegation of Portugal.

19. The Credentials Committee had before it two objections to the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Portugal to the present session of the Conference, one submitted jointly by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions and the other submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions.

20. In substance the objections assert that the delegation could not have been designated in conformity with the I.L.O. Constitution for the following reasons:

(a) representative workers' organisations cannot exist in Portugal since the trade unions in that country are, in fact and in law, government dominated and controlled institutions;

(b) African workers in the Portuguese overseas provinces are denied fundamental trade union rights;

(c) the Portuguese Government continues to take repressive action against strikes and other forms of collective action on the part of workers.

21. Further, the objection of the World Federation of Trade Unions alleges that since the last session of the Conference there has been an aggravation of repressive action taken against workers seeking to assert their rights. For its part the objection of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions asserts that investigations by the I.L.O. and the United Nations prove that the objection is well founded. These two objecting organisations refer particularly to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association communicated to the Portuguese Government in June 1963, and the latter's reply of 25 January 1964 stating that the Government would not fail to take these conclusions into account in the revision of its labour legislation. In this regard it is asserted that despite these assurances freedom of association is not respected by the Portuguese Government.

22. Analogous objections were made to the nomination of the Portuguese Workers' delegation each year since 1961. In that year the Credentials Committee decided that in view of the limited time and means at its disposal, it could not investigate such important and extensive questions of fact as were involved. In its opinion questions of this kind should rather be examined and decided by means of the machinery existing in the I.L.O. for the purpose, such as the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association. Consequently the Committee concluded that it could not recommend invalidation of the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Portugal.

23. In 1962 the Credentials Committee, after having found that the arguments put forward by the objectors were identical to those of the previous year, again noted that the questions of fact raised by the objections fell rather within the competence of the I.L.O. freedom of association machinery. The Committee arrived at the conclusion that it could not recommend invalidation of the credentials of the Workers' delegation of Portugal.

24. In 1963 the Committee found that the objection was irreceivable under paragraph 4 (d) of article 26 of the Standing Orders of the Conference because it was “based upon facts or allegations which the Conference, by a debate and decision referring to identical facts or allegations, has already discussed and recognised to be irrelevant or devoid of substance”. However, at the same time, the Committee stated that it wished to make clear that its decision did not in any way involve a finding on the allegations made in the objection in relation to the status of trade unions in Portugal.

25. In 1964 the Committee similarly found the objections irreceivable under paragraph 4 (d) of article 26 of the Standing Orders while, at the same time, stating that its decision was dictated solely by the obligation laid on the Committee to apply strictly the rules concerning its terms of reference.

26. The Committee, this year, does not find that any substantial new facts have been advanced in support of the objections. From a legal point of view, the alleged aggravation of repressive action cannot be considered as a fact which could substantially change the situation as it existed at the time of the last session of the Conference.

27. As regards the question of freedom of association, upon which the objections are to a large extent based, the Committee can only note that this question is still before the Committee on Freedom of Association which in its 74th Report (February 1964) noted the above-mentioned reply of 28 January 1964 of the Government of Portugal and recommended the Governing Body to request the Government to be good enough to keep it informed of any developments in the situation. Although it appears that no such developments have been notified to the Governing Body or its Committee on Freedom of Association, the Credentials Committee is not in a position to find that any possible lack of action in this regard on the part of the Portuguese Government would juridically constitute a new fact, particularly since the entire matter is still in the hands of the Committee on Freedom of Association.

28. Since, in the view of the Credentials Committee, no substantial new facts have been adduced in the objections submitted this year, the Committee cannot depart from its position on this issue in 1963 and 1964. Thus, in strict observance of its mandate, it can only find the objections irreceivable under paragraph 4 (d) of article 26 of the Standing Orders. In so doing, however, the Committee feels obliged to express its deep concern regarding the present trade union situation in Portugal, and more particularly in Angola and Mozambique. The Committee considers that the objections concerning the Workers' delegation of Portugal, which it has had before it year after year are based on important considerations relating to freedom of association and to political questions which, the Committee must recall, are beyond its own competence and are being, and have been for a long time, closely examined by those bodies which are seized of it.

29. The Credentials Committee submits the present report to the Conference in order that the Conference may take note of it.

APPENDIX III

Resolutions

(1) Resolutions Submitted in Accordance with Article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING PAID EDUCATIONAL LEAVE, SUBMITTED BY MR. BEERMANN, WORKERS' DELEGATE, FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY, AND MR. HERNANDEZ, WORKERS' DELEGATE, PHILIPPINES

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the development of modern society, which is largely conditioned by scientific and technological progress, calls for an education which can no longer be provided solely through general schooling or vocational training of the conventional type, so that contemporary man requires continuing education up to a mature age,

Noting that modern working life both in industrialised and in developing countries calls increasingly for higher and new skills which workers can acquire only through further general education and vocational training,

Noting that such education enables workers in the developing countries to participate more effectively in the task of economic and social development of their countries and constitutes a positive contribution to the implementation of economic and social development plans,

Noting that workers more especially, who are dependent on their wage or salary, must either sacrifice free time intended for recreation or renounce the possibility of continuing their education, and that it is therefore in their interest that new forms of further education be developed and encouraged;

1. Calls on the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation as well as on the employers' organisations and trade unions to ensure, both by statutory means and through collective agreements, that, in addition to the holidays with pay intended for recreation purposes, workers are entitled to adequate paid educational leave in order to give them the opportunity and incentive to acquire the further education which they need to carry out their duties at the workplace and assume their responsibilities in public life.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to compile information on existing legislative and collective agreement provisions relating to paid educational leave in the States Members of the International Labour Organisation.

3. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake surveys with a view to the adoption by the International Labour Conference of a Recommendation concerning paid educational leave.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE INDUSTRIAL ACTIVITIES OF THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION, SUBMITTED BY MR. ABID ALI, WORKERS' DELEGATE, INDIA; MR. FAUPL, WORKERS' DELEGATE, UNITED STATES; AND MR. MÖR, WORKERS' DELEGATE, SWITZERLAND

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice and industrial democracy,

Considering that social justice both at national and international levels cannot be achieved without closely associating workers' and employers' organisations with all stages of policy and decision-making dealing with social and economic development,

Considering that at the international level the International Labour Organisation provides the only forum within the framework of the United Nations family in which representatives of governments and employers' and workers' organisations can meet on an equal footing,

Considering that on the basis of its structure and in accordance with the aims and purposes as formulated in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia the International Labour Organisation is the United Nations agency best equipped for promoting social progress throughout the world,

Considering in particular that the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field, their results and the experience gained have proved to be of basic value for the over-all activities of the Organisation and very often indispensable for its activities in the field of technical co-operation and standard-setting,

Considering the great contribution which the Industrial Committees and analogous bodies have made to the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field,
Considering that the particular social problems of a number of industries and sectors of employment as well as of the public services have not yet been adequately covered by I.L.O. action,

Considering that tripartite and joint meetings dealing with social problems common to groups of industries or sectors of employment could supplement in a useful way the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field,

Considering that technical research work based on continuous observation and analysis of developments in industries and in the public sector carried out for each major industry by specialists of the International Labour Office is necessary to service adequately the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering the need for expanding and intensifying the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field as a basis for an expansion of the over-all activities of the Organisation in the field of technical co-operation and standard-setting;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General—

(1) in the context of the reorganisation of the International Labour Office, to strengthen the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field;

(2) to intensify and expand the activities of the Industrial Committees and analogous bodies of the International Labour Organisation, including coverage of industries or sectors of employment which have not yet been dealt with by the Organisation;

(3) to consider in particular the early establishment of a joint committee for the public service;

(4) to consider the convening of tripartite and joint meetings to deal with social problems common to groups of industries or sectors of employment;

(5) to strengthen those sections of the International Labour Office which service the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation, in particular by entrusting technical research work to specialists appointed for each major industry and sector of employment whose responsibility it should be to follow developments in these industries and sectors on a permanent basis.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT OF DOMESTIC WORKERS, SUBMITTED BY MR. THONDAMAN, WORKERS’ DELEGATE, CEYLON

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that in a number of member countries, both developed and less developed, domestic workers in many cases are either not protected at all or only insufficiently by legislation or other provisions concerning their working and living conditions,

Considering the urgent need to provide for domestic workers in all member countries the basic elements of protection which would assure to them a minimum standard of living, compatible with the self-respect and human dignity which are essential to social justice,

Considering that in many member countries a considerable lack of experience exists in establishing minimum standards of working conditions in domestic employment,

Considering that as early as 1936 an I.L.O. committee dealing with holidays with pay adopted a resolution calling upon the Governing Body to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the conditions of employment of domestic workers,

Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the Thirty-first (1948) Session of the International Labour Conference requesting the Governing Body to consider the advisability of placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the status and employment of domestic workers,

Considering the conclusions of the Meeting of Experts on the Status and Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers which was held from 2 to 6 July 1951, in accordance with a decision of the Governing Body adopted at its 112th (Geneva, June 1950) and 113th (Brussels, November 1950) Sessions,

Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the Second African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Addis Ababa, 30 November to 11 December 1964) inviting the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake studies and research on the problems of domestic workers with a view to improvement of their living and working conditions;

1. Urges member States to make all possible efforts to promote the introduction of protective measures for domestic workers.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General—

(a) to intensify studies and research on the problems of domestic workers;

(b) to consider the possibility, on the basis of these studies and research, of placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of conditions of employment of domestic workers with a view to the adoption of an international instrument.

RESOLUTION CONCERNING VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION OF DISABLED PERSONS, SUBMITTED BY MR. RADAY, GOVERNMENT DELEGATE, ISRAEL

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the provisions of the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955,

Considering the progress in mechanisation and automation since the adoption of the above Recommendation,

Reaffirming the importance of the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons;
Requests the International Labour Office to collect information on the measures and techniques employed by member countries in training disabled persons for employment in the new forms of activity which are consequent upon the progress in mechanisation and automation.

Resolution Condemning the Government of Portugal on the Grounds of the Forced Labour Policy Practised by the Said Government in Territories under its Administration, Submitted by Mr. Kamel, Government Delegate, United Arab Republic

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Whereas the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice and that the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries,

Whereas the International Labour Conference has adopted the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957,

Whereas the Government of Portugal has ratified those Conventions but, nevertheless, has failed to give effect to them in territories under its administration, as has been proved by the United Nations and International Labour Organisation "Ad Hoc" Committee on Forced Labour in 1953 and the Committee appointed by the Governing Body in 1962 in accordance with article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation,

Whereas the United Nations General Assembly has noted in its resolution 1819 (XVII) of 1962 that in the territory of Angola, as in other Portuguese colonies, the indigenous population is denied all fundamental rights and freedoms, that racial discrimination is in fact widely practised and that the economic life of Angola is to a large extent based on forced labour;

1. Condemns the forced labour policy practised by Portugal in the territories under its administration.

2. Calls upon the Government of Portugal to abandon the policy of forced labour practised in territories under its administration.

Resolution Concerning Equitable Geographical Representation of All States Members of the International Labour Organisation in Its Governing Body as Well as Equitable Geographical Distribution of Elective Offices at Sessions of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body, Submitted by Mr. Chajn, Government Delegate, Poland, and Mr. Polyanichko, Government Delegate, Ukraine

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that in the course of the last 20 years the membership of the International Labour Organisation has undergone basic changes,

Considering that in particular the number of States Members has increased from 41 States represented in Philadelphia in 1944 to 113 in 1965,

Considering that the number of States Members from Asia has increased within that period about fivefold and that of States Members from Africa more than tenfold,

Considering that the international character of the Organisation and respect for the sovereignty and equality of States Members make it necessary to ensure to all equal participation in the work of all organs of the Organisation and in the taking of decisions at all levels of its organisational structure,

Considering that that course has already been taken by other international organisations and in particular by the United Nations which has adopted constitutional measures to increase the membership of its organs,

Considering that any delay in this respect would jeopardise the regular functioning of the International Labour Organisation;

Decides:

1. To adopt as a basis for ensuring equitable geographical distribution of offices in all organs and bodies of the International Labour Organisation the following pattern of distribution between the various regions of the world:

   (1) Africa and the Arab States, (2) Asia, (3) Latin America, (4) Eastern Europe, (5) Western Europe and other States.

2. To observe the following pattern of distribution of offices in elections to the Governing Body:

   (1) in the Government group—

      (a) four representatives from Asia;
      (b) eight representatives from Africa and the Arab States;
      (c) four representatives from Latin America;
      (d) three representatives from Eastern Europe;
      (e) five representatives from Western Europe and other States;

   (2) in the Workers' group and the Employers' group—

      (a) two representatives from Asia;
      (b) four representatives from Africa and the Arab States;
      (c) two representatives from Latin America;
      (d) two representatives from Eastern Europe;
      (e) two representatives from Western Europe and other States.

3. To observe the principle of geographical rotation in the election of the President of the Conference and the Chairman of the Governing Body.
4. To ensure in the elections of the Vice-Presidents of the Conference and Chairmen of the Conference Committees:

- two seats to representatives from Asia;
- three seats to representatives from Africa and the Arab States;
- two seats each to the representatives of Latin America and of Eastern Europe;
- three seats to representatives from Western Europe and other States.

5. In the event of the setting up of additional Conference Committees, to assign the offices of chairmen to representatives of the African, Arab and Latin American States.

Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organisation of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament Submitted by Mr. Polyanichko, Government Delegate, Ukraine

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Convinced that economic and social progress is closely bound up with the preservation and consolidation of peace,

Recognising the immense importance of disarmament for the preservation of peace and the achievement of more rapid progress in the economic and social fields for the benefit of mankind,

Fully sharing the hope expressed by the General Assembly and by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development that the governments of all States will intensify their efforts to achieve an agreement on general and complete disarmament under effective international control,

Considering that studies of the economic and social aspects of disarmament, which might serve as a basis for the formulation of principles and methods for determining a policy of economic and social reconstruction, are of primary importance for the improvement of the situation of workers and that this places an even greater responsibility on the International Labour Organisation in this field,

Taking account of the information provided by the Director-General concerning the progress of international studies and activities aimed at securing a fuller knowledge of the social and economic consequences of disarmament,

Having regard to the agreement reached in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination concerning the preparation of concerted programmes of work and the co-ordination of all studies of the economic and social consequences of disarmament carried out by the United Nations, the specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and the establishment for that purpose of the Inter-Agency Committee,

Welcoming the statement made by the Director-General concerning the intention of the International Labour Organisation to provide the fullest possible co-operation in the implementation of that agreement,

Taking account of the fact that the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, in its resolution 1026 (XXXVII) of 11 August 1964, deemed it necessary that the activities of the United Nations system of organisations, including the regional economic commissions, the specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, relating to the economic and social consequences of disarmament as called for by resolutions of the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council and the policy-making bodies of the specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, should be continued and accelerated as far as possible,

Taking account of the report on the economic and social consequences of disarmament (document E/3898 of 3 July 1964) submitted by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the 37th Session of the Economic and Social Council;

1. Instructs the Director-General to prepare and submit to the Inter-Agency Committee, for inclusion in the concerted programme of studies of the economic and social consequences of disarmament, a proposal for the carrying out by the International Labour Office of such studies on that subject as are directly within the field of competence of the International Labour Organisation.

2. Requests the Director-General to keep the General Conference and the Governing Body informed of the activities of the Inter-Agency Committee.

Resolution concerning the Protection of the Rights of Spanish Workers Submitted by Mr. Tabor, Workers' Delegate, Yugoslavia

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that the International Labour Organisation is responsible for protecting the rights of workers throughout the world and for supervising the fulfilment of commitments arising out of the international standards adopted in the fields of freedom of association and protection of trade union rights,

Bearing in mind that 1965 has been proclaimed by the United Nations as the International Co-operation Year, with the warm support of the International Labour Organisation in its capacity as a specialised agency of the United Nations,

Aware that Spanish workers are deprived of their most elementary rights, such as the right of association and the right to strike, and that each attempt by the workers to secure those rights is brutally repressed by the police, by means of arrests and by indicting workers before special military courts and sentencing them to many years' imprisonment or death,

Considering that the Spanish Government pays no heed to the views expressed by the International Labour Organisation with respect to freedom of association, including the numerous recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office,

Bearing in mind that efforts are being made in Spain to break by torture, threat of death, murders, and prison or death sentences, the resistance of democratic trade unionists who are fighting for the rights of the workers,

Having regard to the numerous complaints and appeals addressed to the International Labour Organisation by national and international trade union organisations of all tendencies with respect to the above-mentioned facts, which are in flagrant contradiction with the principles laid down in the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation and the Declaration of Philadelphia;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to call upon the present Spanish Government—

(1) to recognise and guarantee freedom of association, particularly trade union freedom;

(2) to grant Spanish workers the right to strike and to abolish discrimination in respect of hiring against those workers who are fighting for trade union rights;

(3) to recognise the right of free expression and, in the first place, the freedom of the trade union press;

(4) to allow Spanish workers to be represented by their true representatives in the International Labour Organisation;

(5) to declare a complete amnesty and free all prisoners arrested during the struggle for trade union rights.

(2) First Report of the Resolutions Committee.1

1. The Resolutions Committee, appointed by the Conference at its first sitting on 2 June 1965, was composed of a total of 123 voting members: 66 Government members, 24 Employers’ members and 33 Workers’ members.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

Chairman and Reporter: Mr. Aguilar, Government member, Venezuela.

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Verschueren, Employers’ member, Belgium, and Mr. Kaplansky, Workers’ member, Canada.

3. The Committee had before it eight resolutions submitted in accordance with article 17 of the Standing Orders of the Conference.2 These resolutions were moved by their authors and the Committee determined the order in which the first five should be considered by it in accordance with the procedure established in article 17, paragraph 5 (a), of the Standing Orders of the Conference.

4. The first five resolutions thus selected were the following:

2. Resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers, submitted by Mr. Thondaman, Workers’ delegate, Ceylon.

4. Resolution concerning the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation, submitted by Mr. Abid Ali, Workers’ delegate, India; Mr. Faupl, Workers’ delegate, United States; and Mr. Möri, Workers’ delegate, Switzerland.

5. Resolution concerning the carrying out by the International Labour Organisation of studies of the social and economic consequences of disarmament, submitted by Mr. Polyanichko, Government delegate, Ukraine.

6. In accordance with article 17, paragraph 5 (b), of the Standing Orders, the Committee appointed a Working Party to make recommendations as to the order in which the resolutions which were not included in the first five should be examined.

6. The Working Party was composed of the Government members from Canada (Mr. Mainwaring), Tunisia (Mr. Btri) and the U.S.S.R. (Mr. Shkunaev), the Employers’ members from Finland (Mr. Mildh), the United Kingdom (Mr. Miller) and the Lebanon (Mr. Nasr), and the Workers’ members from France (Mr. Bouladoux), Tunisia (Mr. ben Ezzeddine) and Cyprus (Mr. Zivanas).

7. The Working Party, which was chaired by Mr. Shkunaev, recommended unanimously, and the Committee agreed, that the remaining three resolutions to be considered after the first five should be taken in the following order:

6. Resolution condemning the Government of Portugal on the grounds of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government in territories under its administration, submitted by Mr. Kamel, Government delegate, United Arab Republic.

7. Resolution concerning the protection of the rights of Spanish workers, submitted by Mr. Tabor, Workers’ delegate, Yugoslavia.

8. Resolution concerning equitable geographical representation of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation in its Governing Body as well as equitable geographical representation of elective offices at sessions of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body, submitted by Mr. Chajn, Government delegate, Poland, and Mr. Polyanichko, Government delegate, Ukraine.

8. The texts of the resolutions, as amended by the Committee in the course of the discussion, were submitted for a final revision to a Drafting Committee.

Resolution concerning Paid Educational Leave

9. The original text of this resolution was submitted by Mr. Beermann, Workers' delegate, Federal Republic of Germany, and Mr. Hernandez, Workers' delegate, Philippines.

10. The Workers' members, in supporting this resolution, pointed out that the increasing role played by the workers in the economic and social life of their countries made it imperative that they should have the possibility of continuing their general education up to a mature age. Furthermore, the rapid technological changes occurring in modern society required a continuous adaptation of the workers to new methods of production and made necessary the widening of their occupational skills.

11. The Workers' members maintained, therefore, that the granting of paid educational leave, as distinct from holidays with pay, would go a long way towards affording the possibility of further education and vocational training for those workers who depended for their livelihood solely on their wages or salaries.

12. Several Government members supported the idea which was behind the resolution and some of them recalled to the Committee the arrangements already existing in their countries as regards paid educational leave.

13. The Employers' members recognised the increased educational needs of the workers, but expressed concern as regards the angle from which the proposed resolution approached the subject. They argued that the requirements of civic education mentioned in the resolution were and should be met by the entire community and that employers should not bear the cost. They pointed out that there were methods, other than paid educational leave, by which workers could be afforded an opportunity of continuing their education.

14. The Workers' members, on the other hand, maintained that the resolution was not intended to define or regulate in detail the institution of paid educational leave, but rather to promote this concept in member States of the I.L.O. and to initiate the first steps which might lead to the adoption by the I.L.O. of an international instrument concerning this question.

15. In the course of the discussion of the proposed resolution paragraph by paragraph, the second and third paragraphs of the preamble were combined on the basis of an amendment submitted by the Employers' members and subamended by the Canadian Workers' member, on behalf of the Workers' members.

16. The change thus introduced in the preamble, directed towards achieving more logical and clear drafting, did not involve a change in the substance of the original text.

17. On the suggestion of the Workers' members, the Committee agreed to note in the preamble that some countries had already made progress towards providing paid educational leave.

18. As regards the operative paragraph 1, some Employers' members reiterated their concern at the adverse economic effects that paid educational leave, in the sense suggested by the text under consideration, might have, especially on small undertakings in the developing countries, and they pointed out again that there were other methods, besides paid educational leave, to ensure that workers could enjoy a further education.

19. Consequently, the Employers' members moved an amendment to operative paragraph 1 which, without mentioning paid educational leave, called upon the governments of all States Members to consider the desirability of any measures that could give the workers the opportunity of bringing their skills into line with occupational requirements. The Government member for the United States remarked in this connection that his Government would find it difficult to achieve the aims of the resolution by means of legislation. The Employers' members' amendment was put to the vote and was not adopted.

20. A compromise text was ultimately adopted on the basis of an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Sweden and the United Kingdom and subamended by the Canadian Workers' member. The text of operative paragraph 1, as modified, was adopted without a formal vote, but the Employers' members wished to have their abstention placed on record.

21. The Committee agreed unanimously to amend operative paragraph 2 in order to recall that there existed other means, beyond paid educational leave, to achieve the desired aims of workers' further education.

22. The Committee also agreed unanimously to substitute for the word "Recommendation" in operative paragraph 3, the words "an international instrument".

23. By 396 votes in favour, 264 against, with 4 abstentions, the Committee adopted the revised text of this resolution and submits it to the Conference for approval:

"Resolution concerning Paid Educational Leave"

"The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,"

"Noting that such education enables workers in the developing countries to participate more effectively in the task of economic and social development of their countries and constitutes a positive contribution to the implementation of economic and social development plans,"

"Noting that some countries have already made progress towards providing a measure of paid educational leave for workers,"
“Noting that workers who are dependent on their wage or salary, to the extent that they do not yet benefit from paid educational leave, must either sacrifice free time intended for recreation or forgo the possibility of continuing their education, and that it is therefore in their interest that new forms of further education be developed and encouraged;

“1. Calls on the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation as well as on the employers’ organisations and trade unions to take effective action by statutory means, through collective agreements or any other means, according to national practice, towards ensuring the access of workers to various types of paid educational leave, as distinct from holidays with pay for recreational purposes, in order to give them the opportunity and incentive to acquire the further education and training which they need to carry out their duties at the workplace and assume their responsibilities as members of the community.

“2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to compile information concerning legislative and collective agreement provisions and other arrangements relating to paid educational leave, existing in the States Members of the International Labour Organisation, as well as the methods employed in such States to ensure to workers who benefit from educational leave compensation for wages or salary lost.

“3. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake surveys in the light of the above-mentioned studies with a view to the adoption by the International Labour Conference of an international instrument concerning paid educational leave.”

Resolution Concerning Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers

24. The original text of this resolution was submitted by Mr. Thondaman, Workers’ delegate, Ceylon. Its purpose was to intensify the research work of the Office as regards the conditions of employment of domestic workers, with a view to including this question in the agenda of an early session of the Conference. This was welcomed by Government, Employers’ and Workers’ members of the Committee.

25. In the course of the general discussion it was observed that domestic workers were in an especially weak position because they were highly dispersed, and because, in view of the absence of employers’ organisations, it was not normally possible to regulate their conditions of employment through collective agreements.

26. Some members of the Committee pointed out that legislation had been passed in their countries with a view to protecting domestic workers. It was generally admitted, however, that in most countries, and in particular in developing countries, the conditions of employment of domestic workers were in need of improvement.

27. It was recalled that the I.L.O. had convened, in 1951, a Committee of Experts which had considered such questions as the contract of employment, the conditions of work, social security and training of domestic workers and had recommended that the I.L.O. take further action in this field with a view to the adoption of international regulations.

28. Mention was also made of the resolution adopted by the Second African Regional Conference of the I.L.O., inviting the I.L.O. to undertake studies and research on the problems of domestic workers, with a view to improvement of their living and working conditions.

29. In the course of the consideration of this resolution paragraph by paragraph, the preamble was adopted without change, and the following amendments to the operative paragraphs were all adopted unanimously: (i) in operative paragraph 1 the Committee wished to indicate that the protective measures that member States were being urged to promote should include hours of work and other conditions of employment as well as training and should be in accordance with I.L.O. standards (amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States and subamended by the Canadian Workers’ member); (ii) in operative paragraph 2 (a) the Committee wished to indicate that the studies and research to be undertaken by the Office should cover domestic workers in both rural and urban areas, paying special attention to women workers (amendment submitted by the Government member of Spain); (iii) the Committee agreed on a new paragraph 2 (b) inviting the Governing Body to request member States to make available to the Office a comprehensive study on the legal provisions pertaining to domestic workers in their respective countries (amendment submitted by the Government member of Spain); (iv) the Committee agreed on a new paragraph 2 (c) inviting the Governing Body to consider convening a second meeting of experts to examine, inter alia, the possibility of drafting a model contract or code of guiding principles for the protection of domestic workers (amendment submitted by the Workers’ members); (v) as a consequence of these changes, the original paragraph 2 (b) with minor drafting amendments became paragraph 2 (d) of the text as adopted.

30. The Committee unanimously adopted the revised text of this resolution and submits it to the Conference for approval:

“Resolution concerning the Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers

“The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

“Considering that in a number of member countries, both developed and developing, domestic workers in many cases are either not protected at all or only insufficiently by legislation or other provisions concerning their working and living conditions,

“Considering the urgent need to provide for domestic workers in all member countries the basic elements of protection which would assure to them a minimum standard of living, compatible with the self-respect and human dignity which are essential to social justice, “Considering that in many member countries a considerable lack of experience exists in establishing minimum standards of working conditions in domestic employment,

"Considering that as early as 1936 an International Labour Organisation committee dealing with holidays with pay adopted a resolution calling upon the Governing Body to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference, the question of the conditions of employment of domestic workers,

"Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the 31st (1948) Session of the International Labour Conference requesting the Governing Body to consider the advisability of placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the status and employment of domestic workers,

"Considering the conclusions of the Meeting of Experts on the Status and Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers which was held from 2 to 6 July 1951, in accordance with the decisions of the Governing Body adopted at its 112th (Geneva, June 1950) and 113th (Brussels, November 1950) Sessions,

"Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the Second African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Addis Ababa, 30 November to 11 December 1964) inviting the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake studies and research on the problems of domestic workers with a view to improvement of their living and working conditions;

"1. Urges member States to make all practicable efforts to promote the introduction of protective measures for domestic workers, such as hours of work and other conditions of employment, as well as the training of such workers in accordance with International Labour Organisation standards.

"2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

(a) to request the Director-General to intensify studies and research on the problems of domestic workers in both rural and urban areas, directing particular consideration to the problems of women workers;

(b) to request the member States to make available to the Office a comprehensive report on the legal provisions pertaining to domestic workers in their respective countries;

(c) to consider convening a second meeting of experts including, among others, participants from employers' and workers' organisations, to examine, inter alia, the possibility of drafting a model contract or a code of guiding principles for the protection of the working and living conditions of domestic workers;

(d) to consider, on the basis of the above studies and research, placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference, the question of conditions of employment of domestic workers with a view to the adoption of an international instrument."

31. In introducing his resolution, Mr. Raday, Government member, Israel, pointed to the passage of ten years since the I.L.O. had adopted its Recommendation on this subject, and the subsequent rapid development in techniques of training disabled and physically handicapped workers coupled with technological advances which had opened new vistas for the utilisation of such workers. This in turn meant that the collection and dissemination of the experiences of member States in training and employing these workers was both timely and important.

32. The Workers' members announced their unanimous approval of the resolution and their deep interest in adding and accepting amendments which would strengthen the intention and principles of the original draft text. They were primarily interested in providing adequate machinery for the dissemination of generally applicable practical experience and suggested that the existing Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations could be employed in the first instance to this end.

33. The Employers' members also indicated their agreement with the purposes of the resolution. They believed that this was an activity ideally suited to the I.L.O.—the collection and dissemination among member States of information of vital interest and of a constructive nature.

34. Each of the Government members who spoke indicated his full approval of the intentions of the resolution. They indicated the scope and nature of the experience within their countries concerning the rehabilitation and employment of disabled workers. Almost all agreed that the rapid advance of automation had given rise to many new places in industry which were appropriate to the employment of the handicapped and disabled.

35. An amendment requesting the addition of a new preambular paragraph was submitted by the Workers' members. Based on many of the comments of Government members during the general discussion concerning their countries' experiences, the effect of this amendment was to point out that progress in mechanisation and automation should influence the methods and techniques of training disabled persons. This amendment was adopted unanimously.

36. The Workers' members stated that it was clearly time to collect and collate information on the degree to which member States had implemented the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955. Such an inquiry would be the logical starting point for the action recommended by the resolution. To this end, the Workers' members moved an amendment to the resolution adding an additional operative paragraph which, in substance, invited the Governing Body to request member States to furnish reports to the Director-General on law and practice in regard to the 1955 Recommendation, to request the Director-General to convene a tripartite meeting of experts to study the problems of training and rehabilitating disabled workers in the light of recent developments, and to request the Director-General to collect and disseminate information on the methods and techniques of such training employed by member States.

37. As general agreement was voiced that the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations was a proper body to collect the experience of the member States which had implemented the Recommendation, the Employers' members moved a subamendment to the effect that it should be made clear that the inquiry on the law and practice in member States be the responsibility of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The same subamendment added to the subparagraph requesting the Director-General to convene a meeting of experts a direction that such a meeting should be convened in the light of the inquiry undertaken to collect information on law and practice. The amendment, as subamended, was adopted.

38. The Committee agreed that, in accordance with the definition contained in the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, the term 'disabled person' means an individual whose prospects of securing and retaining suitable employment are substantially reduced as a result of physical or mental impairment.

39. The Committee adopted unanimously the following revised text of the resolution which it submits to the Conference for approval:

"Resolution concerning Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the provisions of the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955,

Reaffirming the importance of the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons,

Considering the progress in mechanisation and automation since the adoption of the above Recommendation,

Considering that this progress should affect the methods and techniques of training disabled persons;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to—

(a) request member States to furnish reports to the Director-General on their law and practice in regard to the matter dealt with in the Recommendation with a view to consideration of the matter by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations;

(b) request the Director-General of the International Labour Office to collect and disseminate information on the measures and techniques employed by member States in the rehabilitation and training of disabled persons for new forms of employment;

(c) request the Director-General, in the light of the above, to consider at an appropriate moment the convening of a meeting of experts, including, among others, persons from workers' and employers' organisations, in order to study the problem in the light of new developments."

Resolution concerning the Industrial Activities of the International Labour Organisation

40. The original text of this resolution was submitted by Mr. Abid Ali, Mr. Faupl and Mr. Möri, Workers' delegates of India, the United States and Switzerland respectively. According to its authors, the resolution was directed at strengthening the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field which had lagged behind, and granting the requisite attention to industries such as the public services, which had been neglected owing to lack of resources. An opportunity to exchange views between representatives of workers and employers, particularly in the Industrial Committees, and a strengthening of the appropriate departments of the International Labour Office should be conducive to that purpose, and should hence provide a stimulus for all the activities undertaken by the Organisation in this field.

41. In the course of the general discussion, a certain number of Government members stressed the importance they attached to I.L.O. activities in the industrial field in the broad sense, of which Industrial Committees were only one element. The adoption of a resolution on the subject should lead not so much to a mere extension of existing practice as to a critical examination of the problem with a view to clearing the way for new solutions and giving such activities their proper place within a broad and coherent framework. They thought it particularly desirable to lay emphasis on the possibility of future changes and to exclude detailed proposals, so as not to tie the hands of the Governing Body and of those of its organs which, like the Committee on Industrial Committees and the Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O., had undertaken and should pursue an examination of all aspects of the subject, whether they had been discussed by the Conference or not, and should recommend a solution only after careful study of the requirements of the situation.

42. While agreeing that I.L.O. activities in the industrial field were of interest and recognizing the importance of the role which Industrial Committees could play, a few Government members criticised certain aspects of current practice and the tone of the resolution. To their mind, the I.L.O. was in no position to pride itself on playing an exclusive role with regard to social progress and to ignore the action taken by the United Nations and by other specialised agencies, particularly at a time when the I.L.O. should be showing a greater willingness to adjust to the requirements of rapid industrial development, especially in developing countries. Another shortcoming of Industrial Committees was connected with their membership, in which all regions of the world and all economic and social systems did not have an equal share.

43. The Government member of Iran suggested that, in the light of the already quite considerable progress made in the review of the Industrial Committees, the International Labour Office might consider carrying out, as
44. The Employers’ members also emphasised the importance they attached to I.L.O. activities in the industrial field, and noted that the Industrial Committees had played a useful role, in particular in promoting co-operation between employers’ and workers’ organisations of the industrial sectors concerned and an exchange of views on industrial social problems at an international level. They underlined, moreover, the necessity of introducing greater flexibility into the industrial activities of the I.L.O., improving the advisability of dealing with the problems of the public service, which were distinct from those of industry. The question was also asked whether there should be any mention of particular sectors such as the public service or small-scale industries, the importance of which was, however, recognised by the Committee as a whole.

45. Besides these remarks on questions of principle, members of the Committee discussed certain particular points mentioned in the resolution. For example, certain objections were made, in particular by the Government members of Afghanistan, Iran and the United States, condemning the advisability of dealing with the problems of the public service, which were distinct from those of industry. The question was also asked whether there should be any mention of particular sectors such as the public service or small-scale industries, the importance of which was, however, recognised by the Committee as a whole.

46. Although the importance of regional activities was not underrated, there was no unanimity on the nature and forms of such activities. There was also some criticism of the effectiveness of bipartite meetings, but it appeared to the Committee that this arrangement might be preferable in certain particular fields, and should not be excluded in general without more extensive consideration.

47. The Workers’ members strongly urged the necessity of attaching prime importance to the welfare of the workers, and laid much stress on the fact that I.L.O. activities in the industrial field were the keystone of the action undertaken by the Organisation to that end. By providing an opportunity for direct confrontation of the views of workers and employers on the practical problems peculiar to each industry and for informing developing countries, which would be faced with the same problems tomorrow, of the current problems of industrialised countries, Industrial Committees were playing a key role. These Committees did not deserve the criticism they had received. Their effectiveness had suffered chiefly from budgetary limitations. Labour-management relations in the public service could not be neglected at a time when the State was becoming a steadily bigger employer, not immune from the problems facing industrial employers. Many industries had common problems, such as vocational training and safety and health, and technological change was breaking down the dividing-lines between traditional industries. To carry out the task which the Workers’ members proposed for the I.L.O., it would be essential to strengthen the appropriate department of the International Labour Office.

48. In the course of the detailed examination of the text of the resolution, the second to fifth paragraphs of the preamble were criticised, in particular by the Government member of the U.S.S.R., on the ground that they were ambiguous, contained unjustified assertions on the role of the I.L.O., and included a complaisant display of principles which were contradicted by the method followed in applying them. However, most of the members took the view that, while amendments might be desirable, there could be no question of overlooking the general philosophy of I.L.O. action which was reflected in these paragraphs. In view of the manifest opposition of a majority of members, the Government member of the U.S.S.R. withdrew his proposal to delete the paragraphs in question, and these paragraphs were then discussed in turn.

49. In the course of this discussion the Committee rejected an amendment submitted by the Employers’ members with a view to substituting for the second and third paragraphs of the preamble a more general text concerning the role of employers and workers in ensuring social peace and economic and social development. On the other hand, the reference to industrial democracy in the second paragraph was deleted by the authors of the resolution because the concept was open to contradictory interpretations.

50. Similarly, it was agreed not to indicate in the third paragraph at what stage workers and employers should be associated with decisions concerning social and economic development, in order to avoid drawing a dividing-line between consultations which would, it was hoped, be extensive, and the prerogatives of the executive and legislative branches of government to which no challenge was intended.

51. In connection with the fourth paragraph, a difference of opinion on the degree of equality prevailing between the groups and within the classes settled by ratified conventions was expressed. The words in question the exact terms used in this connection in the Declaration of Philadelphia. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Iran with a view to deleting any reference to the public services from the eighth paragraph of the preamble, and as well from the operative parts of the resolution, was rejected after an exchange of views.

52. In connection with the fifth paragraph of the preamble, certain members pointed out that the original text attributed to the I.L.O. a pre-eminence which it did not have over the United Nations and the other specialised agencies in the social field. On the other hand, the majority of the Committee laid stress on the special responsibilities of the Organisation, particularly in view of its tripartite structure which was mentioned in the preceding paragraph of the resolution. The original wording was therefore retained. The Government members of Byelorussia, Bulgaria, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Ukraine, U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia asked that their opposition to this paragraph should be recorded.

53. Passing on to the ninth paragraph of the preamble, which called for the convening of meetings to deal with problems common to groups of industries or sectors of employment, the Workers’ members proposed, in order to facilitate agreement within the Committee, to substitute for the original text a new text providing that particular industrial problems might arise and require I.L.O. action in certain regions of the world. In making this proposal, however, the Workers' members stated that they did not intend to abandon the idea contained in the original text, and reserved the right to take action in the future. The substitute proposed by the Workers' members was adopted by the Committee without opposition.

54. The Employers' members proposed the addition of a paragraph which would have emphasised the need to take a very flexible approach towards the development of I.L.O. activities in the industrial field. While certain Government members lent their support to this view and stated that such flexibility would imply that the existing practice would not merely be pursued on a greater scale without further review, the Workers' members considered that the proposed text was both vague and useless, and that advantage could be taken of it to dispute once more the desirability of activities of undoubted value. The insertion proposed by the Employers' members was not adopted for lack of a quorum.

55. The Committee agreed to render the tenth paragraph of the preamble more flexible in order to emphasise the need for a permanent effort on the part of the International Labour Office with regard to research and the dissemination of information, while defining the field of inquiry which should not be limitless, and leaving a greater freedom in the choice of the methods to be used to attain that objective. Similarly, the Committee agreed to amend the eleventh paragraph of the preamble so as to lay stress on enhancing the effectiveness of I.L.O. activities in the industrial field rather than on their development and expansion, it being understood that such an enhancement could include development and expansion. The Workers' members asked that their opposition to this amendment should be put on record, though they did not insist on a vote.

56. Before concluding its consideration of the preamble, the Committee began to discuss a proposal of the Government member of the U.S.S.R. to introduce an additional paragraph, with corresponding provisions in the operative part, for the purpose of arranging for consideration to be given to measures to ensure equitable geographical representation of States Members of the I.L.O. on the Industrial Committees and similar bodies. The supporters of this proposal considered that States in certain regions, or States with planned economies, were largely excluded by the working of the present system from participation in the work of the Industrial Committees.

57. In reply to the argument that the membership of the Committees was determined through a democratic elective procedure, they stated that the results of that procedure were not in conformity with the principle of geographical representation. It had in any case been necessary for the Governing Body to make corrective action and decide to add one seat to each Industrial Committee in order to make way for one unsuccessful candidate for membership of each, although this had been of little comfort to the many ultimately unsuccessful candidates.

58. In reply it was pointed out by certain Government, Employers' and Workers' members that the principle of geographical representation was recognised and applied; that one-third of the members of Industrial Committees were appointed on the basis of the importance of their respective industries, irrespective of their economic and social system; and that owing to the limited number of seats on Committees there would always be unsuccessful candidates—quite apart from the necessity of making room for the new member States—whereas it would be even more arbitrary to restrict a choice made through free elections.

59. The Government member of the United States also pointed out that there could be no question of reducing the autonomy of employers and workers in determining the composition of their respective groups.

60. In addition, it was pointed out that the measures taken by the Governing Body demonstrated its willingness to ensure a certain equilibrium in the composition of Committees in accordance with the principle it had adopted and in a manner which had at the time received an approval which was now apparently no longer valid.

61. The proposal of the Government member of the U.S.S.R. with regard to the preamble and the corresponding passage of the operative part was rejected by 80 votes in favour, 478 against, with 12 abstentions.

62. The Committee then began its consideration of the operative part of the resolution; this process was facilitated by the decisions already taken on questions of principle in the course of the discussion of the preamble. The discussion on the operative part was based on a form of words submitted by the Workers' members.

63. The introductory portion of the preamble laid stress on the need to consider I.L.O. activities in the industrial field within the general context of the structure and programme of the Organisation. While the first paragraph of the operative part emphasised the importance which members of the Committee were unanimous in attaching to activities in the industrial field, certain members warmly supported the cause of agriculture, which played such an important role in the less industrialised countries. While considering that agriculture should not be mentioned in the resolution, the Committee made a point of stating in its report that the expansion of activities in the industrial field should in no way detract from the attention which the I.L.O. should pay to agriculture.

64. The second paragraph of the operative part of the resolution gave rise merely to an exchange of views with the aim of improving the drafting, and in particular of not prejudicing a very far-reaching review of methods that could improve the effectiveness of activities in the industrial field.
516 Appendix III: Resolutions

65. The same concern marked the Committee's discussion, in connection with the third paragraph, of the contribution of activities in the industrial field to the over-all work of the I.L.O. The value of this contribution—particularly as a clearing-house for information—was strongly emphasised, but it was deemed advisable to put on record the general view that without prejudicing the particular forms it could take, which deserved careful consideration, the regionalisation of I.L.O. activities in the industrial field deserved special study, for example with a view to ensuring an adequate response to the needs peculiar to regions in course of development.

66. In relation to the fourth paragraph of the text proposed by the Workers' members for the operative part of the resolution, the principle of the extension of I.L.O. activities to the public sector was not specifically questioned; however, it was agreed that it would be left to the Governing Body and its Working Party on the programme and structure of the Organisation to consider the advisability of the establishment of a bipartite committee for the public service.

67. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. expressed his opposition to the holding of bipartite meetings, the results of which had been disappointing, and insisted on the principle of tripartite meetings, with exceptions only in special cases such as that of the public service. He asked to have put on record his opposition to the text adopted by the Committee on this point.

68. The Committee then examined the proposal of the Government member of Venezuela to insert after the fourth paragraph of the operative part of the resolution a new paragraph providing for consideration of the possibility of setting up an advisory committee on small-scale industries and handicrafts owing to the importance of this sector for developing countries, in terms both of its economic role and of the number of workers employed. This importance was received very willing recognition, but it was agreed to render the text more flexible by extending the range of the measures that could help deal with the problems of these industries. In this connection it was pointed out by the Employers' members that small-scale industries belonged to widely differing sectors of industry and that it would accordingly be desirable to examine the problems of each small-scale industry in the committees already set up for the main industries. Such consideration could be supplemented at a later stage by a meeting for small-scale industries alone, with a view to the consideration of problems common to them all and not peculiar to particular industries. There being no objection, the amendment was adopted.

69. In connection with the fifth paragraph, which had become the sixth as a result of the insertion of the above-mentioned new paragraph, certain members, including the Government member of Iran, expressed reservations concerning the advisability of mentioning the additional requirements of the Office for staffing the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field. The Committee nevertheless agreed to adopt the text proposed by the Workers' members emphasising the need to have sufficient staff to perform all the tasks proposed in the resolution.

70. By 629 votes in favour, none against, with 36 abstentions, the Committee adopted the following revised text of the proposed resolution, which it submits to the Conference for approval:

"Resolution concerning the Industrial Activities of the International Labour Organisation"

"The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

"Considering that lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice,

"Considering that social justice both at national and international levels cannot be achieved without closely associating workers' and employers' organisations with policy and decision-making dealing with social and economic development,

"Considering that at the international level the International Labour Organisation provides the only forum within the framework of the United Nations family through representatives of workers and employers enjoy equal status with those of governments,

"Considering that on the basis of its structure and in accordance with the aims and purposes as formulated in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia the International Labour Organisation is the United Nations agency best equipped for promoting social progress throughout the world,

"Considering that the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field, their results and the experience gained have proved to be of basic value for the over-all activities of the Organisation and very often indispensable for its activities in the field of technical co-operation and standard-setting,

"Considering the great contribution which the Industrial Committees and analogous bodies have made to the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field,

"Considering that the particular social problems of a number of industries and sectors of employment as well as of the public services have not yet been adequately covered by International Labour Organisation action,

"Considering that particular industrial problems may arise and require International Labour Organisation action in certain regions of the world, both developing and industrialised,

"Considering that it is necessary for the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation that the International Labour Office should at all times strive to be abreast of developments in the industrial field, including the public service, and of research into industrial matters, and disseminate the information so obtained, and also initiate such additional studies as may be necessary,

"Considering the need of making the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field more effective;

"Invites the Governing Body, when reviewing the programme and structure of the International Labour Organisation, to request, as
The Programme and Structure of the Organisation, problems of small-scale industry and handicrafts, particularly in developing countries; other appropriate means to examine the tripartite advisory committee and/or utilising national Labour Organisation, for example in the field of standard-setting and technical cooperation, as well as in specific regions of the world; the most appropriate ways and means through which the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation could best contribute to the successful implementation of the over-all programme of the International Labour Organisation, for example in the field of standard-setting and technical cooperation, as well as in specific regions of the world; the convening of tripartite and/or bipartite meetings, as appropriate, both for the private and public sectors to review the situation in the light of the needs and social and economic problems of industries and branches of occupation which have not yet been dealt with by the International Labour Organisation, and to consider the desirability of establishing a joint committee to deal with the problems of the public service; the possibility of setting up a tripartite advisory committee and/or utilising other appropriate means to examine the problems of small-scale industry and handicrafts, particularly in developing countries; ensure that sufficient staff is allocated to keep under continuing study and disseminate information concerning social problems arising out of economic and other developments in the major industries and sectors of employment, in order that the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation may be carried out effectively.

Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organisation of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament

In presenting the resolution, Mr. Makhinny (Government member, Ukraine) recalled the various steps that had been taken to ensure that the economic and social consequences of disarmament would be the subject of studies by the specialised and other agencies of the United Nations. The special role to be fulfilled in this respect by the I.L.O. was pointed out, particularly in view of the study recently proposed in the report submitted by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the 37th Session of the Economic and Social Council.

In the general discussion, the resolution received the warm support of all the members of the Committee who spoke. The Government members sympathised with the motives and aims of the resolution and many emphasised that, among all the organisations of the United Nations family, the I.L.O. had a special and important role to play, notwithstanding the main responsibility in matters of disarmament which appertained to the United Nations itself.

The Government member of the United Kingdom suggested that the original text could be improved by the inclusion of a reference to the work already undertaken by the I.L.O. in studying the economic and social consequences of disarmament and commending the Secretary-General for this work. The Government members of Canada, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States associated themselves fully with the Government member of the United Kingdom and submitted jointly with him an amendment to that effect.

The Government member of the U.S.S.R. warmly supported the resolution and, without moving any formal amendment, suggested that consideration could usefully be given to the setting up of a special panel of experts to participate in an immediate preliminary study of the social and economic consequences of disarmament as a guide for the Director-General.

The Workers' members announced their full support for the resolution and pointed out that the trade union movement had long insisted that consideration should be given without delay to the social and economic changes which would follow upon disarmament.

The Employers' members agreed that studies of the kind envisaged in the resolution should be undertaken, and, in support of the amendment, the Workers' members, associated themselves with the previous requests that some mention of previous I.L.O. activity in this regard be included in the text.

In the paragraph-by-paragraph discussion of the resolution, the Committee first decided, in accordance with an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, to make the third paragraph of the preamble follow more closely the wording of General Assembly resolution 1837 on which it was largely based.

The fifth paragraph of the preamble was modified on the basis of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members and another submitted by the Government members of Canada, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, so as to reflect the Committee's feelings that studies of the economic and social consequences of disarmament could be of primary importance and that the International Labour Organisation had a particular responsibility in this field. In addition a separate amendment submitted by the Government member of the United States substituted the words "welfare of workers" for "situation of workers".

Two amendments were incorporated in the sixth paragraph of the preamble: the first, moved by the Government members of Canada, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, referring to the collaboration in the field of; and on the economic and social consequences of disarmament between the Economic Commission for Europe of the United Nations and the I.L.O., and the second, submitted by the Workers' members, calling for a specific mention of decisions which had already been taken by the I.L.O. in this field.

80. The original wording of the ninth paragraph of the preamble was simplified, without altering the sense, by eliminating some of the detailed references to the United Nations and related agencies, and to resolutions they had adopted.

81. The revision of the operative paragraphs resulted from an amendment submitted by the Government members of Canada, Sweden, the United Kingdom and the United States, taken together with an amendment submitted by the Workers' members. The new text calls upon the Director-General to continue to work closely in this field with the Inter-Agency Committee, to prepare for the information of the Governing Body a report on work already done by the I.L.O. and to keep the Conference and the Governing Body informed of all developments.

82. The Government members of the United States and the Ukraine both made reference to the fact that the various amendments had all been adopted without objection and both observed that a constructive atmosphere and spirit of co-operation had characterised all the work done by the Committee on this resolution.

83. The Workers' and the Employers' members joined in commending the co-operative spirit which had contributed to a final text of the resolution which could command the unanimous approval of the Conference. They congratulated all concerned for arriving at a useful resolution in a very important field.

84. The resolution as amended was unanimously adopted and the Committee submits it to the Conference for approval:

"Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organization of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament"

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

"Convinced that economic and social progress is closely bound up with the preservation and consolidation of peace,

"Recognising the immense importance of an agreement on disarmament for the preservation of peace and the achievement of more rapid progress in the economic and social fields for the benefit of mankind,

"Fully sharing the hope expressed by the General Assembly in its resolution 1908 (XVIII) and by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development that the governments of all States will intensify their efforts to achieve an agreement on general and complete disarmament under effective international control, in accordance with the Joint Statement of Agreed Principles for disarmament negotiations, and to achieve agreement on measures which could serve to reduce international tension, lessen the possibility of war and facilitate agreement on general and complete disarmament,

"Considering that studies of the economic and social aspects of disarmament, which might serve as a basis for the formulation of principles and methods for determining a policy of economic and social reconversion, could be of primary importance for the improvement of the welfare of workers and that this places a particular responsibility on the International Labour Organisation in this field,

"Taking account of the information provided by the Director-General concerning the progress of international studies, including studies undertaken by the International Labour Office for and in collaboration with the Economic Commission for Europe, as well as activities aimed at securing a fuller knowledge of the social and economic consequences of disarmament, and the decisions which have already been taken by the International Labour Organisation concerning this problem,

"Having regard to the agreement reached in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination concerning the preparation of concerted programmes of work and the co-ordination of all studies on the economic and social consequences of disarmament carried out by the United Nations, the specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and the establishment for that purpose of the Inter-Agency Committee,

"Welcoming the statement made by the Director-General concerning the intention of the International Labour Organisation to provide the fullest possible co-operation in the implementation of that agreement,

"Taking account of the fact that the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, in its Resolution 1026 (XXXVII) of 11 August 1964, recommended that the activities of the United Nations family of organisations relating to the economic and social consequences of disarmament should be continued and accelerated as far as possible,

"Taking account of the report on the economic and social consequences of disarmament (document E/3898 of 3 July 1964 and its addenda) submitted by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the 37th Session of the Economic and Social Council,

"Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General—

"(1) to continue to work closely with the Inter-Agency Committee with a view to the inclusion in the concerted programme of studies on the economic and social consequences of disarmament of such proposals as may in his judgment be appropriate for studies on that subject and which are directly within the field of competence of the International Labour Organisation;

"(2) to prepare for the information of the Governing Body a report on the work already done by the International Labour Organisation in the field of the economic and social consequences of disarmament;

"(3) to keep the General Conference and the Governing Body informed of the work of the International Labour Office in this field and of the activities of the Inter-Agency Committee."

Chairman and Reporter.
National Labour Conventions prohibiting forced labour was only one of the manifestations of the Body in accordance with article 26 of the I.L.O. International Labour Organisation Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953, the Constitution of Portugal itself provided for and protected the institution of forced labour. The principal aim of the resolution was to ensure that these practices would cease.

2. During the course of the general discussion, a number of members of the Committee expressed their support for the original resolution. These members felt that sufficient evidence to support a condemnation of the practice of forced labour in the Portuguese territories had been provided in the Joint United Nations-International Labour Organisation Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953, the various resolutions adopted by organs of the United Nations and the report of the commission of inquiry appointed by the Governing Body in accordance with article 26 of the I.L.O. Constitution to investigate a complaint submitted by Ghana against the Portuguese territories. It was therefore the duty of the I.L.O. to recognise that these Conventions were being violated consistently by this one member State, and to condemn such violations.

3. A number of other members, including the Employers' members, while wholeheartedly agreeing that forced labour should be condemned wherever it still existed, felt that a specific condemnation addressed to one member State alone would not be proper as long as forced labour existed elsewhere as well. Furthermore, there was in existence within the I.L.O. constitutionally provided machinery of a judicial nature to deal with any complaint arising out of an allegation of non-compliance with a ratified Convention. Such machinery had been used in 1962 to investigate an identical set of charges made against Portugal and the report which had resulted from this inquiry did not seem to justify a formal condemnation. This report should be taken as the starting point and basic document in the resolution. It was suggested that it would be useful to ascertain the actual scope and extent of the implementation of the recommendations in the 1962 report, particularly in the light of the reports submitted to the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, as well as investigating what new recommendations seemed necessary at this time.

4. The Workers' members were fully in sympathy with the aims of the resolution, as was attested by their consistent support for any action leading to the eradication not only of forced labour but of colonialism, wherever they existed. A majority of the Workers preferred to use the existing I.L.O. machinery as a means of remedying what was considered to be an unacceptable situation within the Portuguese territories. To this end a majority of the Workers' members supported an amendment submitted by the Workers' member of Mexico incorporating what they understood to be the most constructive elements of all the ideas expressed in the general discussion.

5. Some members, both Government and Workers', felt that the resolution should seek to accomplish more than was sought in its original form. Not only was the forced labour policy of Portugal an evil within the territories under its actual administration, but as the policy of supplying forced labour to the Republic of South Africa was still in existence, it was felt that Portugal was thus contributing to the sustenance of the economy of South Africa and therefore supporting the policy of apartheid against which the I.L.O. had only last year taken such a firm stand. It was suggested that an alternative approach could quite possibly lead to the systematic expulsion of a member State with which a majority of Members did not agree at any particular time.

6. With respect to the various suggestions seeking to limit or eliminate the participation of Portugal in the activities of the I.L.O. the Government member of the United States submitted that this was a dangerous and destructive approach to the problem. He pointed out that the adoption once again of such an approach could quite possibly lead to the systematic expulsion of a member State with which a majority of Members did not agree at any particular time.

7. The Government member of Portugal submitted that the charges levelled against his Government in the resolution and in the general discussion were identical to those contained in the complaint filed by Ghana against Portugal in 1961. Those allegations had resulted in a commission of inquiry appointed under article 26 of the I.L.O. Constitution, composed of three independent and renowned international jurists who, after full hearings, including a visit to the Portuguese territories, had produced a report supported not only by the Governing Body but also by both Ghana and Portugal. The conclusions of this report illustrated that there was no discernible official policy of forced labour in the Portuguese territories. With reference to the isolated instances of forced labour which had been mentioned by the Commission, recent changes in Portuguese legislation (on 24 June 1964) relating to the organic administration of Overseas Portugal had, in response to the recommendations in the report, eliminated most of the forced labour, reformed the compulsory cultivation of cotton no longer existed. The previous treaties with the Republic of South Africa concerning the position in that country of workers coming from Mozambique were no longer in force and new agreements, fully protecting all the rights of such workers, had recently been negotiated. It was only necessary to read the reports of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations to discover the extent to which Portugal had complied with all requests concerning the existence of forced labour in any of its territories. Portugal wished to eliminate any last vestige of forced labour which might be found in its territories and invited the help of the I.L.O. in doing so, if such help were given through the established constitutional channels employing the existing machinery for judicial control. It was in that spirit that Portugal, a year ago, had offered its full co-operation to the I.L.O. and requested to eliminate any last vestige of forced labour in any of its territories. Portugal wished to give any last vestige of forced labour which might be found in its territories and invited the help of the I.L.O. in doing so, if such help were given through the established constitutional channels employing the existing machinery for judicial control. It was in that spirit that Portugal, a year ago, had offered its full co-operation to the I.L.O. and requested a second commission of inquiry be sent to the Portuguese territories in order to investigate the existence of any racial discrimination in the labour policies within the territories. Although the Government had guaranteed that this Commission would be allowed unhindered access to all parts of all territories, the same countries which had joined behind the resolution to condemn Portugal had fought against the appointment of the new Commission.

8. In the paragraph-by-paragraph consideration of the text it was decided to consider as a basis for discussion an amendment to the original text which was submitted by the Workers' amendment. This amendment was adopted, by 496 votes in favour, 76 against, with 49 abstentions, the first three preambular paragraphs without change from the original text. In the paragraph-by-paragraph consideration of the text it was decided to consider as a basis for discussion an amendment to the original text which was submitted by the Workers' amendment. This amendment was adopted, by 496 votes in favour, 76 against, with 49 abstentions, the first three preambular paragraphs without change from the original text.

9. This comprehensive amendment accepted without change the first three preambular paragraphs of the original text of the resolution. Accordingly, the Committee adopted, by 496 votes in favour, 76 against, with 49 abstentions, the first three preambular paragraphs without change from the original text.

10. In place of the original fourth preambular paragraph which stated that Portugal had failed to give effect in its territories to the Forcement Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957, the Committee adopted, by 488 votes in favour, 128 against, with 34 abstentions, the proposal in the Workers' amendment. This amendment stated that Portugal had ratified the two Conventions, pointed to the Joint United Nations- I.L.O. Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953 and the report of the Commission of Inquiry in 1962, and referred to the recommendations in these reports which set forth measures which should be taken by the Government of Portugal to give full effect to the provisions of these Conventions.

11. With respect to the fifth preambular paragraph of the original text, the comprehensive amendment submitted by the Workers had proposed that the paragraph should simply take note of United Nations General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) of 1962 without mentioning, as had the original text, the scope of the contents of that resolution. Several Government and Workers' members expressed their deep concern at the removal of all mention of the substance of this resolution; other members, both Government and Employers', submitted that as the resolution of the General Assembly had dealt with forced labour it would be improper to include in the resolution before the Committee references which exceeded its competence.

12. In response to this discussion the Workers' Vice-Chairman moved a subamendment to the text of the Workers' comprehensive amendment which would add in this preambular paragraph a reference to that portion of General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) which had affirmed, inter alia, that the economic life of Angola is to a large extent based on forced labour. This subamendment was warmly supported by the Government member of Mali on behalf of the African Government members as making for a more complete and comprehensible final text. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. associated himself with this support of the subamendment.

13. The Government members of Canada, France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the United States announced that, while they were not in favour of any reference to resolution 1819 (XVII), they could support the final text if no reference were made to the substance of the resolution. Therefore, if the subamendment were to be adopted, each speaker reserved the position of his Government on the measure of support which they could give to the resolution as a whole. The Government members of Canada, France, the United Kingdom and the United States explained that each Government had opposed the resolution in the General Assembly and they did not wish it to be inferred that the position of their Governments on the substance and propriety of resolution 1819 (XVII) had changed.

14. A record vote on the subamendment to the amendment to the fifth preambular paragraph, submitted by the Workers' members, resulted in the subamendment's adoption by 405 votes in favour, 300 against, with 47 abstentions. The amendment itself was adopted by 319 votes in favour, 180 against, with 76 abstentions.

15. In view of the adoption of the entire preambular text as submitted in the Workers' comprehensive amendment, it was considered that the amendment moved by the Workers' members of Algeria, Dahomey, Ghana, Guinea, Mali and Morocco, which suggested that the reference in the fourth preambular paragraph of the original text to territories under the administration of Portugal be changed to territories under the domination of Portugal, was no longer applicable to the text as adopted.

16. In turning to the paragraph-by-paragraph consideration of the operative paragraphs it was decided to continue to use the comprehensive amendment of the Workers as a basis for the discussion. Operative paragraph 1 of the amendment set forth a reaffirmation of the I.L.O.’s condemnation of forced labour and all practices involving the use of forced labour. The Government member of Ghana moved a subamendment which proposed to add to that statement words which would apply that condemnation to “the territories under Portuguese domination.” The Workers objected to this subamendment to their amendment on the ground that their entire comprehensive proposal had been based on interior consistency which started with a general principle condemning all forced labour and proceeded to a specific request to Portugal based on the previously established general principle. The subamendment was rejected by 199 votes in favour, 461 against, with 28 abstentions. The Committee then adopted operative paragraph 1, as contained in the comprehensive amendment submitted by the Workers, by 541 votes in favour, 132 against, with 15 abstentions.

17. A subamendment to operative paragraph 2 of the comprehensive amendment, urging that action be taken to put an end to practices of forced labour which were contrary to the principles of the I.L.O., was moved by the Government member of Algeria. This subamendment proposed adding in the paragraph a specific reference to “territories under Portuguese domination.” The Workers’ member of Mexico, who had submitted one of the amendments on which the Workers’ comprehensive amendment was based, opposed the subamendment, stating that operative paragraph 2 under discussion had been taken in full from the suggested text for operative paragraph 3 of the amendment submitted by the Workers’ members of Algeria, Dahomey, Ghana, Guinea, Mali and Morocco. The subamendment was rejected by 136 votes in favour, 521 against, with 35 abstentions. The amendment was adopted by 564 votes in favour, 128 against, with 4 abstentions.

18. Several subamendments were moved to operative paragraph 3 of the comprehensive amendment. The Government member of Mali suggested that the text would be improved if the Government of Portugal were requested, rather than called upon, to give effect without delay to the recommendations of the 1962 Commission of Inquiry of the Governing Body, particularly in so far as they related to forced labour practices and the sequels of forced labour. The Workers’ members acceded to this request.

19. The Government member of Ghana moved a subamendment to the text of operative paragraph 3 suggesting that it should incorporate the text of operative paragraph 2 of the amendment submitted by the Workers’ members of Algeria, Dahomey, Ghana, Guinea, Mali and Morocco, which called upon the Government of Portugal to refrain from participating in I.L.O. meetings or activities, and to which it was suggested should be added the words “until such time as Portugal abandons its practices of forced labour.” This subamendment was supported by the Government member of Algeria. The Government member of the United Kingdom opposed the subamendment on two grounds: that Portugal had, as a Member of the I.L.O., a constitutional right to participate in the activities of the Organisation and that as long as Portugal was permitted to participate it remained subject to the constructive influences of such membership and public opinion. The subamendment was rejected by 126 votes in favour, 482 against, with 30 abstentions. The amendment containing operative paragraph 3 was adopted without vote.

20. The author of the original text then moved that the original operative paragraph 1 of the resolution he submitted, condemning the forced labour policy practised by Portugal, be put to a vote, notwithstanding the fact that the Committee had already adopted operative paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the comprehensive amendment submitted by the Workers. The Committee rejected operative paragraph 1 of the original text of the resolution by 160 votes in favour, 466 against, with 20 abstentions. The Workers’ Vice-Chairman stated that he did not participate in the vote because he considered that the decision taken by the Committee on the comprehensive amendment eliminated the need to vote on operative paragraph 1 of the original text.

21. Operative paragraph 4 of the comprehensive amendment requested the Director-General and the Governing Body to keep the matter referred to in operative paragraph 3 under review and to take any appropriate measures to ensure that the recommendations mentioned were or should be implemented and to report to it at an early session. Paragraph 4 was adopted without a vote. The adoption of operative paragraph 4 completed the text of the resolution.

22. At that point the Government member of Australia requested an opinion of the Chair whether, in the light of the fact that in the speaker’s opinion the title of the original resolution no longer was applicable to the text as adopted, consideration of a more appropriate title could be undertaken by the Committee. This position was taken also by the Government members of France, Italy, Panama, the United States and Uruguay, and by the Employers’ members. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. opposed a change of title on the ground that such a change would be an amendment not submitted before the deadline and thus not receivable by the Committee. This position was supported by the Government members of Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Ghana, Guinea, Mali and the United Arab Republic, and by the Workers’ Vice-Chairman on behalf of the Workers.

23. In reply to a question concerning past practice in the matter the representative of the Secretary-General stated that titles of resolutions and even Conventions and Recommendations had been modified by Conference Committees to bring them into conformity with decisions of substance taken by Committees; whether or not a Committee wished to change a title was a matter of its own discretion. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. challenged this so far as the Resolu-
24. The Legal Adviser, on the request of the Chairman, explained the procedure for amending titles. In general, a title should not say something different from the text. It was accordingly sometimes necessary to make a consequential modification in the title of a text which had been substantially amended. There were precedents for such consequential modifications in the work of the Resolutions Committee. It was for the Committee to decide whether such a modification was appropriate in a specific case.

25. The Chairman, after hearing the views of the members of the Committee and the opinion of the Legal Adviser of the Conference, ruled that the original title of the resolution could be modified by the Committee, although amendments to this effect had not been submitted before the expiration of the time limit. In making this ruling the Chairman took into account the following arguments. No provision of the Standing Orders stated that the title of a resolution formed part of the resolution itself, nor did the Standing Orders provide that the title was not part of the resolution. Hence no provision of the Standing Orders explicitly covered the situation. In the absence of such provisions, logic dictated that the title should correspond to the substance of the resolution. It followed that whenever the Committee adopted a text the substance of which differed from its title, consequential modifications could be made in the title. The precedents adduced in the course of the discussion did not contradict this interpretation. In some cases amendments had been resorted to; in other cases, the Committee had unanimously decided to modify a title. In any case, there were no precedents which exactly fitted the situation. Logic and common sense indicated that, in this particular instance, the title should be modified to accord with the substance of the resolution adopted by the Committee. It had rejected by a large majority operative paragraph 1 of the original text. Were the Committee to be consistent, the title should now be modified to correspond to the text it had approved. Finally, the Chairman suggested that the Committee might reproduce, as the title of the resolution, the very wording of operative paragraph 3. Should this suggestion be accepted, the title would be: "resolution requesting the Government of Portugal to give effect without delay to certain recommendations made with respect to forced labour practices."

26. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stated that the Workers' members opposed the amendment to change the title of the resolution. They felt that the resolution was a condemnation of Portugal for its policy of forced labour in territories under its administration and they strongly opposed any attempt to change the title so as to make it appear that no condemnation was intended by the Committee. However he suggested that the title could be changed to "resolution concerning the condemnation of the Government of Portugal on the ground of the forced labour policy practised by the said Government under its administration", on condition that such a change was supported by all African members of the Committee. As this did not prove to be the case, the suggestion was withdrawn.

27. The Employers' Vice-Chairman moved that the title be changed so as to reflect that the resolution condemned forced labour wherever it existed and requested the Government of Portugal to give effect without delay to certain recommendations made with respect to forced labour practices. He therefore suggested the following title: "resolution reaffirming the condemnation of forced labour and making an appeal to the Government of Portugal." A number of African Government members in the Committee opposed any amendment to the title; in so far as a general condemnation of forced labour was followed by specific reference to certain practices in Portuguese territories the African members felt that the resolution was in fact a condemnation of Portugal and that fact ought to be reflected in the title.

28. The amendment to the title submitted by the Employers' Vice-Chairman was rejected by 282 votes in favour, 332 against, with 27 abstentions.

29. The Committee then adopted the original title of the resolution by 486 votes in favour, 296 against, with 40 abstentions.

30. The final text of the resolution was adopted by the Committee by 377 votes in favour, 46 against, with 271 abstentions.

31. Following the vote, the Government member of Portugal made a statement in which he said that the decision taken by the Committee to adopt the resolution with the fifth and sixth preambular paragraphs and with the wholly misleading title was a serious one that would have to be submitted to the Conference for final determination. Neither the Commission of Inquiry nor this Resolutions Committee had condemned Portugal and therefore the title was in error. With regard to the position of his Government to the resolution the Government member of Portugal stated that it ought to be possible to avoid the title as inexpedient in so far as the conclusions, findings and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry had been accepted in 1962 not only by the Governing Body, but also specifically by both Portugal and the complainant, Ghana. All of the recommendations of the Commission had been fulfilled by the Government of Portugal, as was reported in the report of the Committee on the Application... of Conventions and Recommendations to the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference. The Government of Portugal remained ready to accept a new Commission on the condition that such Commission should also be permitted to visit the territory of any one of Portugal's accusers. The Government of Portugal considered the text of the resolution as unconstitutional and reserved its position on it in future.

32. In explaining the vote of his Government against the resolution, the Government member of the United Kingdom stated that, while the specific reference to General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) gave him some difficulty, he had agreed with, and had been prepared to accept, the final text. The sole reason for not doing so was the decision of the Committee to retain a title that contradicted the body of the text as evidenced by the rejection by the Committee of operative paragraph 1 of the original draft. He agreed that the I.L.O. should be concerned with forced labour wherever it existed; Portugal should implement all recommendations made to it by the I.L.O. in connection with forced labour.

33. The Government member of Australia associated himself with all the remarks made by the Government member of the United Kingdom. He had hoped that a broad consensus would be achieved on the resolution. He had been prepared to accept the final text in spite of the reference therein to General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII). However, the debate on the title had been revealing and the vote thereon which had adopted, no matter how incongruously, a title in contradiction to the express words of the text had made it clear that what was sought by many members was not a constructive consensus but a political decision. His Government condemned forced labour, but in the circumstances could not accept so inappropriate a title, therefore he had been compelled to vote against the resolution.

34. The Government member of New Zealand, explaining his abstention, stated that he had come to the Committee hoping that he would have been able to vote for a final text in a form finally adopted by the Committee. He had been prepared to accept, although with difficulty, the reference to the General Assembly resolution, but to his regret he could not vote for the resolution, solely because of the spirit behind the title and the lack of logic in accepting the title.

35. The Government member of France stated that he had come prepared to accept a resolution condemning forced labour; however, in the course of discussion he had pointed out the condition which determined his support. In the adoption of the reference to General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) and the inappropriate title, those conditions had not been met. His abstention had not been based on any opposition to the substance of the resolution.

36. The Government member of the United States associated himself fully with the remarks made by the Government members of Australia, New Zealand, France and the United Kingdom. He, too, had come hoping to be able to support a resolution aimed at abolishing all forced labour wherever it existed. The Committee had done that, and he had accepted everything, except the reference to the General Assembly resolution. However, when the Committee had adopted a title mentioning condemnation of Portugal, he had not been able to support the resolution.

37. The Government member of Italy associated himself with those speakers who had immediately preceded him. It was with deep regret that he had been unable to accept the resolution. The reference to General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII), and particularly the reproduction in the text of a part thereof which was not in agreement with the results of an I.L.O. Commission of Inquiry, had been difficult to accept, but he had been prepared to do so if a satisfactory title to the text as adopted could have been found. The failure to change the title in which the resolution was expressed, exactly with the content of the resolution as amended was serious in itself and in the precedent which it set. These considerations had impelled his abstention although he was still in full agreement with the four operative paragraphs of the resolution.

38. The Government member of Canada, explaining his abstention, stated that he had come with hopes that a text commanding wide support would be adopted, as had been the case. He would have been able to vote for the resolution if the Employers’ amendment to the title had been accepted. He associated himself fully with the remarks made by the Government member of the United Kingdom.

39. The Government member of Norway, speaking on behalf of the Government members of Denmark and Sweden as well, explained the abstentions of those Governments and his own. They had voted for every paragraph of the resolution except the one which referred to the General Assembly resolution. However, the one ground upon which the inability to accept the resolution was based was the adoption of a title condemning Portugal. It might be that under certain very special circumstances an international organisation could condemn a country, but none of those conditions had been met in this case.

40. The Government member of Belgium, in explanation of his abstention, associated himself with the juridical arguments of the Government member of Italy. He very much feared that passions had overcome logic for accepted principles. Forced labour existed, unhappily, in many parts of the world and the resolution had condemned its existence anywhere. The retention of the original title had removed the force behind this general principle.

41. The Government member of Uruguay, speaking on behalf of the Latin American countries in the Committee, stated that they all opposed colonialism and forced labour, wherever they existed. They had found themselves able to support the text of the resolution as it had been modified. The failure to change the title had induced those countries to abstain, although they still agreed with the substance of the resolution.

42. The Employers had been prepared to support the text of the comprehensive amendment submitted by the Workers. However, certain modifications, specifically the reference to General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) as well as the lack of logic concerning the title, had caused the great majority of the Employers to abstain.

43. The Government member of Byelorussia stated that his Government had always held the belief that it could support the resolution in the form in which it had been originally presented. He was pleased with the fact that the African members of the Committee felt able to support the resolution, and he announced himself in favour of the title to the resolution as finally adopted.

44. The Workers' Vice-Chairman welcomed the adoption of the resolution, although he regretted the number of abstentions. The Workers' members had sought the widest measure of support for the resolution, and to this end had also considered a modification of the title. However, while he felt that they had obtained the support of the African Workers' members for the substance of the resolution, whose positive features met with general support, this had not been the case in respect of the change in the title. The Workers' members had therefore decided to support the resolution with its original title, especially since they were convinced that the text of the resolution reflected a definite condemnation of forced labour practices on the part of the Portuguese authorities.

45. The author of the resolution, the Government member of the United Arab Republic, expressed his pleasure at the support which the resolution had received. This support was not a political demonstration but a sincere attempt to combat forced labour.

46. The Government member of Mali, on behalf of all the African members of the Committee, expressed his gratitude for the support which the resolution had received. He explained that the condemnation was not directed against a country but against the particular policies of a country; it was, however, in the resolution difficult to dissociate the two. The adoption of the resolution had been a victory for both the Committee and the I.L.O. It would be a positive, constructive and strengthening act.

47. The final text of the resolution as adopted, which the Committee submits to the Conference for approval, is as follows:

"Resolution Condemning the Government of Portugal on the Grounds of the Forced Labour Policy Practised by the Said Government in Territories under Its Administration"

"The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,"

"Whereas the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice and that the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries,"

"Whereas the Government of Portugal has ratified these Conventions,"

"Whereas the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953 and the Commission appointed by the Governing Body in 1961 in accordance with article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation have, after finding that these Conventions are not fully applied, made recommendations concerning the measures which should be taken by the Government of Portugal to give full effect to the provisions of these Conventions,"

"Noting the United Nations General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) of 1962, which has affirmed, inter alia, that the economic life of Angola is to a large extent based on forced labour,"

"1. Reaffirms its condemnation of forced labour and all practices involving the use of forced labour."

"2. Urges that the necessary action be taken to put an end to these practices, which are contrary to the principles of the International Labour Organisation."

"3. Requests the Government of Portugal to give effect without delay to the recommendations of the 1962 Commission of Inquiry of the Governing Body, particularly in so far as they relate to forced labour practices and the sequels of forced labour."

"4. Requests the Director-General and the Governing Body to keep the matter under review and to take any appropriate measures to ensure that these recommendations are or shall be implemented and to report to it at an early session.”

RESOLUTIONS NOT CONSIDERED BY THE COMMITTEE

48. Immediately following the adoption by the Committee of the final texts of the six resolutions considered by it and the adoption of its first report, the Workers' member of Tunisia moved that the Committee terminate its discussions at that stage as it clearly appeared that insufficient time remained to devote to the remaining two resolutions if they were to be considered as fully as their importance demanded. He suggested that it might be possible for the resolution concerning the protection of the rights of Spanish workers to be referred to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association and the resolution concerning equitable geographical representation of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation in its Governing Body as well as equitable geographical distribution of elective offices at sessions of the International Labour Conference and the Governing Body to be referred to the Governing Body Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O.

49. The Government member of Poland, also on behalf of the Government member of the Ukraine, as authors of the latter resolution, could not accept the suggestion to send it to the Working Party and announced the withdrawal of the resolution they had jointly moved from consideration by the Committee.

50. The Government member of Spain stated that he had permitted the author of the resolution directed against his country to present it to the Committee without objection or interruption. He did not support the motion to end the debate. He requested the right to have the resolution considered in the time which remained, and at least the opportunity to make a short statement on the subject.

51. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. pointed out that, while a motion calling for the suspension of discussions by the Committee was proper according to the Standing Orders, he felt that if any statement on the substance of the remaining resolution was permitted, that would amount to an opening of the general discussion and all other speakers wishing to be heard would have to be given the opportunity to speak.

52. The Government member of Uruguay stated that it would be less than fair, after a resolution had been circulated and presented to the Committee, for consideration of it to be suspended before the country which was the subject of the resolution was given the opportunity to defend itself. The Government member of Panama supported this position.

53. The Workers’ member of France did not support the motion to suspend the discussion but pointed out that if this were done no speech on the substance of the remaining resolution could be admitted.

54. The Government member of Spain, in reply to the U.S.S.R. Government member and to the French Workers’ member, stated that he did not claim to be the only speaker on the resolution and would welcome a debate.

55. The Employers’ Vice-Chairman supported the motion to adjourn. He directed the Committee’s attention to article 17 (6) of the Standing Orders, which stated that any resolution not considered by the Committee by the date on which it terminates its work shall not be discussed or acted upon by the Conference.

56. The Government member of Italy suggested that the procedure to enable the Committee on Freedom of Association to consider the substance of the resolution was—(i) its withdrawal by the author from the Resolutions Committee, and (ii) the introduction of a complaint on the same matter in the Committee on Freedom of Association. If the resolution was withdrawn, then obviously the Resolutions Committee could not discuss it.

57. The Yugoslav Workers’ member indicated that he was not prepared to withdraw his resolution but was not opposed to a vote on the motion to adjourn.

58. The Committee voted in favour of adjournment by 445 votes in favour, 75 against, with 144 abstentions.

59. The Government member of Spain directed the Committee’s attention to article 64 of the Standing Orders which stated that before a motion for closure was put to a vote the Chairman should read out the names of those persons who had already signified their wish to speak and those persons would still have the right to speak after the closure had been voted. He reminded the Chairman that he had requested the right to speak on the resolution several days previously. The Chairman ruled that article 64 was not applicable, as consideration of the remaining resolution had never been started.

60. In accordance with article 17 (6) of the Standing Orders the remaining resolution, not having been considered by the Committee by the date on which it terminated its work, shall not be discussed or acted upon by the Conference.

Chairman and Reporter.
APPENDIX IV

Second Item on the Agenda: Financial and Budgetary Questions

(I) Further Proposals Submitted by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to the 49th Session of the Conference.

1. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office decided at its 162nd Session (May 1965) to submit to the Conference certain proposals on financial and administrative matters supplementing those made at its 161st Session (February-March 1965) which have been submitted to the Conference in Report II: Financial and Administrative Questions.

II. Resolution Concerning the Contributions Payable to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund in 1966

4. The following is an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session:

The Committee took note of the report of the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund on the work of its 60th Session, held in Geneva on 11 March 1965, and of the report of the Consulting Actuary on the statutory actuarial valuation of the Fund as at 31 December 1964.

The Committee recommends that the Governing Body submit to the Conference the following draft resolution concerning the contributions payable to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund for 1966, which the Board submits in accordance with article 7 of the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation:

Decides that the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the Pensions Fund for 1966 under article 7, paragraph (a), of the Staff Pensions Regulations shall be 14 per cent. of the pensionable emoluments of the members of the Fund;

Decides that, for the year 1966, the officials mentioned in article 4, paragraph (a) (ii), of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Regulations shall continue to pay an additional 1 per cent. of their pensionable emoluments (making a total of 7 1/2 per cent.) and those mentioned in article 4, paragraph (a) (iii), an additional 1/2 per cent. (making a total of 5 1/2 per cent.) if their pensionable emoluments exceed the equivalent of Swiss francs 6,500 per annum, and an additional 1/2 per cent. (making a total of 5 1/2 per cent.) if their emoluments are the equivalent of Swiss francs 6,500 or less;

Resolves that, in continuation of the arrangement approved in previous years, the whole budgetary vote for 1966 in respect of the contribution of the Organisation to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund should be paid to the Fund.

5. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore submits to the Conference the above resolution for adoption.

III. Resolution Concerning Appointments to the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund and to the I.L.O. Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund)

6. The following is an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session:

The Committee proposes to the Governing Body that it recommend to the International Labour Conference at its next session the adoption of the following draft resolution:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation;

Reappoints to the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund for a period of three years until 8 October 1968, and to the I.L.O. Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund) for a period of three years until 10 July 1968 the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely:

Members:
Mr. H. S. Kirkaldy (United Kingdom), former Professor of Industrial Relations in the University of Cambridge; former substitute member of the Governing Body;
Mr. P. Juul-Christensen (Denmark), Director, International Relations Department of the Ministries of Labour and Social Affairs;
Mr. André Heilbrunner (France), Counsellor of State.

Substitute Members:
Mr. Charles R. McCord (Canada), Director of Annuities, Department of Labour;
Mr. Ernst Kaiser (Switzerland), Actuarial Adviser, Swiss Federal Office of Social Insurance.

The Committee noted that a proposal to fill a vacancy for a substitute member of the Board and Committee would be submitted by the Director-General at a later date.

7. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore submits to the Conference the above resolution for adoption.
IV. RESOLUTION CONCERNING AMENDMENTS TO THE REGULATIONS OF THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSIONS FUND

8. The following is an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session:

The Committee recalled that at the 160th Session of the Governing Body (November 1964) it had been informed of proposals for two major improvements in the benefits of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund which the Joint Board of that Fund had decided to recommend for adoption by the United Nations General Assembly at its 12th Session of the Joint Board of the latter Fund at its 162nd Session of the Governing Body (February-March 1965). At the 161st Session of the Governing Body (February-March 1965) the Committee had been informed that the first recommendation, which provided that base pensionable remuneration should be determined by reference to gross salary and that past service should be treated as if it had been pensionable at all times on gross salary, had been adopted by the General Assembly on 10 February 1965 with effect from 1 March 1965. Consideration of the second recommendation, which provided for an increase in pensions according to a graduated "Pension Adjustment Index", had been deferred by the General Assembly.

The Committee further recalled that, in adopting the new level of base pensionable remuneration for United Nations staff in service on 1 March 1965, the General Assembly had recommended that, in the interest of maintaining the common system of salaries, allowances and conditions of service, the other member organisations of the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund should take appropriate action to ensure that the pensionable remuneration of their staff should be brought into conformity with that of the United Nations staff as from the same date. Accordingly, on the recommendation of the Financial and Administrative Committee and pending proposals for the appropriate amendments to the Staff Regulations, the Governing Body had at its 161st Session (February-March 1965) decided that for I.L.O. staff who were affiliated to the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund or the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund and whose base pensionable remuneration under the Staff Regulations was at the "half-gross" level, their base pensionable remuneration should be increased, as from 1 March 1965, to the full-gross level.

In anticipation of the measures which had now been adopted by the General Assembly and in view of the related issues which arose for the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, the Director-General had informed the Committee at the Governing Body that he had proposed to appoint Mr. H. S. Kirkaldy (United Kingdom) as special adviser to study and report to him on any related issues which arose for the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund or the I.L.O. after 31 March 1961.

The Committee noted that, in order to give effect to the proposals if they were approved by the Governing Body, a number of amendments would need to be made to the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, and that these amendments, if approved by the Governing Body, would be submitted to the International Labour Conference at its forthcoming session for adoption in accordance with article 31 of the Pensions Fund Regulations.

The Committee recommended to the Governing Body that it approve the proposals put forward above.

The Committee noted that, after full consideration of the issues involved and of the reasoning set out in Mr. Kirkaldy's report, the Director-General had come to the conclusion that adoption of the recommendations summarised in the foregoing paragraph would provide a solution which would be both fair and reasonable and also consistent with the policy hitherto followed by the Governing Body.

The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that it approve the proposals put forward above.

The Committee noted that, in order to give effect to the proposals if they were approved by the Governing Body, a number of amendments would need to be made to the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, and that these amendments, if approved by the Governing Body, would be submitted to the International Labour Conference at its forthcoming session for adoption in accordance with article 31 of the Pensions Fund Regulations.

The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that it approve the proposals put forward above.

The Committee noted that, in order to give effect to the proposals if they were approved by the Governing Body, a number of amendments would need to be made to the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, and that these amendments, if approved by the Governing Body, would be submitted to the International Labour Conference at its forthcoming session for adoption in accordance with article 31 of the Pensions Fund Regulations.

APPENDIX VI

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE REGULATIONS OF THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSIONS FUND

Article 7

The International Labour Organisation shall contribute to the Pensions Fund:

(a) unchanged;

(b) on 1 July 1961 and thereafter annually on 1 January, through 1 January 1974, the sum necessary to provide for the amortisation over a period of 14 years.
of the amount by which the actuarial reserve of the Pensions Fund requires to be increased to meet the obligations under these Regulations as amended with effect from 1 March 1965; and, annually from 1 January 1967 through 1 January 1974, the additional sums necessary to provide for the amortization over a period of eight years of the amount by which the actuarial reserve requires to be increased to meet the obligations under these Regulations as amended with effect from 1 March 1965.

Article 9

(1) With effect from [1 April 1961] 1 March 1965 the retiring pension of an official whose contract of employment expired prior to 1 April 1965 shall not in any case exceed 50,000 Swiss francs or the equivalent of that amount in the currency of the pension at the effective date of its award.

Article 12bis

3. [In the case of an official who is subject to the I.L.O. Staff Regulations and whose contract of employment expires after 31 March 1961 and prior to 31 March 1964, the amount by reference to which a retiring pension, an invalidity pension or a pension upon death becomes payable, that pension shall be calculated as if any elements of the official's pensionable remuneration which prior to 1 March 1965 had been determined on the basis of the half-gross level of remuneration in accordance with article 3.1.1 of the Staff Regulations or in accordance with conditions of service fixed by the Director-General under article 0.2 (c) of the Staff Regulations, had been determined by reference to the gross level of remuneration.

Article 32

7. Subject to paragraph (1) or article 9, the amounts of retiring, invalidity and widows' pensions in payment on 1 March 1965 in respect of former officials whose contracts of employment expired prior to 1 April 1961, other than former officials of Branch Offices of the International Labour Office, shall be increased uniformly by 12 per cent. with effect from 1 March 1965.

8. Pensions in payment on 1 March 1965 in respect of former officials whose contracts of employment expired after 31 March 1961 shall be recalculated as if any elements of the official's pensionable remuneration which had been determined on the basis of the half-gross level of remuneration in accordance with article 3.1.1 of the Staff Regulations or in accordance with conditions of service fixed by the Director-General under article 0.2 (c) of the Staff Regulations, had been determined by reference to the gross level of remuneration; and the recalculated amounts of these pensions shall be payable with effect from 1 March 1965.

9. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore recommends to the Conference that it adopt the proposed amendments to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund Regulations set out above.

V. Resolution Concerning the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the Former Permanent Court of International Justice

10. The following is an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session:

The Committee recalled that the I.L.O. was responsible for administering the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the former Permanent Court of International Justice, and that the assets and liabilities of this Fund had been transferred to the I.L.O. on the liquidation of the League of Nations, with effect from 1 April 1947; the terms of transfer had been accepted by the International Labour Conference at its 29th Session (September-October 1946).

It was noted that at the effective date of transfer (1 April 1947) there had been 11 pensioners and three potential claimants for pensions, and that the current commitments of the Fund were now limited to the pensions of two ex-judges and one widow. By decision of the International Labour Conference at its 45th Session (June 1968) the eight pensions then remaining in payment had been increased by 10 per cent., this increase being parallel to that granted in respect of pensions payable from the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund; in similar circumstances, a 15 per cent. increase was decided by the International Labour Conference at its 45th Session (June 1968) in respect of the four pensions then remaining in payment.

Having submitted to the Committee at its present session proposals for the increase of the pensions from the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund which were in payment on 1 March 1965 (see document G.B.162/F.A./D.21/15), the Director-General felt that he should submit parallel proposals for comparison in respect of the pensions payable from the Judges' Pensions Fund. As on previous occasions he had kept in mind that the I.L.O. was merely a trustee for the Fund and had no legal obligations to the beneficiaries other than to execute the terms under which the Organisation had accepted the transfer of the Fund from the League of Nations. On the other hand it seemed that pensions to formerly holding judicial posts should not be left out of consideration when increases in pensions of former international civil servants were being proposed.

After consideration of all the facts the Director-General concluded that he should propose that the three remaining pensions payable from the Judges' Pensions Fund should be increased by 12 per cent. with effect from 1 March 1965, this increase being parallel to that which he was proposing in respect of pensions payable from the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund which were similarly based on pre-war conditions.

The Committee noted that if the pensions were increased as proposed, it was estimated that the funds available would be sufficient to meet obligations until 31 December 1977, on the assumption that all three pensioners would survive till that date, when their average age would be 92 years. In the current circumstances of the Fund it was not possible to make a normal actuarial valuation, and whilst it was possible that the future mortality experience of the Fund might prove to make the accumulated assets insufficient to meet outstanding commitments, the risk did not appear sufficiently substantial to call for the making of special payments into the Fund at the present stage. It accordingly appeared sufficient that the Director-General should submit further proposals in the event that the accumulated assets of the Fund might prove to be insufficient to cover the payment of all outstanding pensions.

The Committee recommends that the Governing Body submit to the Conference the following draft resolution concerning the amendments to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund Regulations:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation:

Decides that, with effect from 1 March 1965, the pensions payable by the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the former Permanent Court of International Justice shall be increased by 12 per cent.;

Decides that the increase in annuities of Dutch florins 5,960 per annum shall be financed from the accumulated assets of the Fund; it being understood that in the event of the accumulated assets falling short of being sufficient to cover the payment of all outstanding pensions the Director-General would submit proposals for consideration.

11. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore submits to the Conference the above resolution for adoption.

VI. Resolution Concerning Appointments to the I.L.O. Administrative Tribunal

12. The following is an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session:

The Committee recalled that article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation provided that the Tribunal should consist of three judges and three deputy judges who should be of different nationalities and who should be appointed for a period of three years by the Conference of the International Labour Organisation. Two posts of deputy judges of the Tribunal as at present composed were vacant and the Governing Body had decided at its 160th Session (Geneva, November 1964) that one of those posts should be filled and offered to Mr. Justice Thurgood Marshall (United States).

It was noted that in order to fill the second post of deputy judge, which fell vacant on the death of Mr. Stavropoulos (Greece), it was suggested that Mr. A. T. Markose (India) should be appointed to this post.

It was further proposed that the term of office of Mr. Maxime Letourneur (France), which expires on 24 June 1965, be extended for a further period of three years.

The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that it submit the following resolution to the International Labour Conference at its 49th Session:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation
In accordance with article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal;
Appoints Mr. Thurgood Marshall (United States) and Mr. A. T. Markose (India) as deputy judges of the Administrative Tribunal for a period of three years; and Extends the term of office of Mr. Maxime Letourneur (France) as judge of the Tribunal for a further period of three years.

This resolution shall take effect immediately.

13. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore submits to the Conference the above resolution for adoption.

VII. EXPENDITURE BUDGET FOR 1966

14. At its 162nd Session (May 1965) the Governing Body, in adopting the second report of its Financial and Administrative Committee, decided that an amount of $111,412, representing the anticipated provision of additional funds to be received from the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance Special Account, be added to the draft gross income budget and that the amount be added to the draft gross expenditure budget for 1966. This decision was taken following a recommendation made by the Financial and Administrative Committee after consideration of two questions involving possible adjustments to the draft 1966 budget. The following is a relevant extract from the second report of the Financial and Administrative Committee:

OTHER QUESTIONS

The Committee dealt with two other questions, both of which involved possible adjustments to the draft 1966 budget being submitted to the Conference for approval. These concern (a) the anticipated provision of additional funds for the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and (b) a proposal to make budgetary provision in 1966 for the I.L.O. share of the costs of a projected E.P.T.A.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Inter-Governmental Conference on the Status of Teachers.

The Committee decided to discuss those two questions together.

Anticipated Provision of Additional Funds to Technical Assistance Committee of the Economic and Social Council to Provide for Overhead Costs Related to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance

The following paragraphs contain a summary of the information and proposals put before the Committee by the Director-General in this regard.

At the 161st Session of the Governing Body (February-March 1965) the Committee had taken note of the recommendation by the United Nations Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions in the following terms: "(that) reimbursement of overhead costs by E.P.T.A. be, for 1965, at the rate of 13 per cent. of the project estimated cost, subject to the following particular circumstances: . . . . The Director-General had now received from the Secretariat of the Technical Assistance Committee the revised lump-sum amounts that were expected to be made available to the I.L.O. if the Technical Assistance Committee would agree to the following: . . . . The revised estimates were now expected to be $111,412 higher than the present estimates.

The purpose of these increased allocations was, in the terms of the Advisory Committee's recommendation, to enable them (the agencies) to expedite and improve their services to the extra-budgetary activities . . . . In the case of the I.L.O., lack of sufficient resources to meet overhead costs had been having increasingly serious effects. The areas in which additional support for E.P.T.A. activities was most urgent were:

(a) Improved field structure (especially in Africa). One consequence of economy measures applied to the Director-General's draft 1966 budget would have been to leave the I.L.O. field structure in Africa much weaker than was desirable. The T.A.B. 15-year review of E.P.T.A. laid emphasis on closer supervision of the implementation of the programme and more systematic and accurate evaluation of its results and on exploration of new varieties of assistance suited to the special needs and conditions of particular countries. Even with the increased credit already provided in the draft 1966 budget, it would have been difficult to implement these requirements systematically throughout Africa. It was therefore suggested that part of the additional money to be received from the Special Account be used to meet the cost of appointing two professional officials in Africa. (Total estimated cost, including salaries and all related expenses, $22,500.)

(b) Increased assistance to governments in the determination of requirements for aid under the E.P.T.A. Experience had shown that some strengthening of the technical services should be provided with a view to increasing the assistance given to requesting governments in connection with the determination of requirements for aid under the E.P.T.A. (Estimated cost, $10,000, representing approximately 18 man-months of Professional staff services.)

(c) Overcoming delays in final reports. Delays in preparation of reports on E.P.T.A. projects continued to be a serious shortcoming in I.L.O. performance under E.P.T.A. The effect of successful missions was sometimes nullified by these delays. While revision of the draft texts submitted by the project experts required the services of experienced officials of technical departments, it was considered that staff provision in the Field Department for a Final Reports Officer would assist in holding delays to a minimum. In addition, a provision would be allocated to certain technical units in accordance with need, in order to obtain short-term assistance or the services of external collaborators when necessary to complete drafting and editing of particular reports. (Total estimated cost, including salaries and all related expenses, $20,000.)

(d) Clerical support of these additional activities in the Field Department and the central services as a whole (estimated cost $35,912 including salary and all related costs, accommodation, etc.)

(e) Finally, it had already become clear that the provision under item 11 of the draft 1966 budget was likely to be insufficient to permit the programme of missions to be covered by the regional coordinators and other head office and field personnel for adequate implementation and planning of the programme. It was therefore proposed to add $16,000 with a view to providing for additional missions.

The Director-General considered that the most appropriate and practical way of enabling the I.L.O. to make... use of the extra money for the purposes for which it had been provided would be to add the total amount of $111,412, to the estimate under item 30 of the draft 1966 income budget without there having apparently been any prior agreement with the relevant sub-items of the draft expenditure budget.

Proposed Budgetary Provision in 1966 for I.L.O.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Inter-Governmental Conference on the Status of Teachers

The following paragraphs summarise the contents of a paper on this subject which was before the Committee. At its 157th (November 1963) and 158th (February 1964) Sessions the Governing Body had approved the long-term programme of integrated joint action between the I.L.O. and U.N.E.S.C.O. aimed at the adoption of an international instrument on problems affecting the teaching profession. It was noted that the proposed budget for 1966, approved by the Governing Body at its 161st Session (February-March 1965), included under sub-item 3.84 provision of $14,000 to cover the I.L.O.'s half share of the cost of a joint I.L.O.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Meeting of Experts on the Status of Teachers, scheduled to take place at the I.L.O., Geneva, from 17 to 29 January 1966, to prepare a draft instrument concerning the status of teachers which, together with the report of the experts, would be submitted to an ad hoc Inter-Governmental Conference, to be sponsored by both I.L.O. and U.N.E.S.C.O. Following negotiations between the Director-General of the two Organizations, it was now considered that the most suitable date for such a conference would be in the latter part of 1966.

It was proposed that the ad hoc Inter-Governmental Conference be held at U.N.E.S.C.O. headquarters in Paris, the cost of participation by the national delegations being met by the Governments concerned. The total cost of holding the Conference had been estimated at $30,000, to cover such items as temporary staff, printing, travel of I.L.O. members of secretariat and other miscellaneous expenses, of which the I.L.O.'s share would amount to $15,000. Provision to cover U.N.E.S.C.O.'s share of the expenses involved had been included in the U.N.E.S.C.O. budget for the biennium 1965-1966.

15. The discussion of these questions by the Financial and Administrative Committee is summarised in its second report to the Governing Body (document G.B.162/9/32) from which the above extract is taken. The following further extract from that report relates to the conclusion of the discussion and the decision then taken by the Committee:

Following a recess, Lord Collison restated his view that the additional E.P.T.A. allocation should properly be used for the purpose expressly stated in the Advisory Committee’s recommendation. However, in order to facilitate agreement within the Committee, he thought that, provided it was accepted that the Director-General would retain some measure of flexibility in the use of these funds and that there might be some reallocation within the different sections of the support activities at a later date, it could be agreed that an amount of $15,000 could be set aside to provide for the joint I.L.O.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Conference, the amounts specified under (a), (b), (d) and (e) above, totalling $91,412, should be made available for E.P.T.A. support activities and that the remaining balance of $5,000 could be added to the provision for unforeseen expenditure in the draft 1966 budget.

The United States, Indian and Australian Government members indicated their acceptance of this proposal. Mr. Bergenström, while signifying his agreement with Lord Collison’s suggestions, nevertheless expressed his surprise that provision for a joint I.L.O.-U.N.E.S.C.O. Conference had been made in the U.N.E.S.C.O. biennium budget without there having apparently been any prior agreement with the I.L.O. on the timing of the Conference. The Committee recommends to the Governing Body that the amount of $111,412 be added to the draft gross income budget for 1966 and that the same amount be added to the draft gross expenditure budget for 1966, on the basis of the breakdown by sub-item contained in Appendix II.

It was noted that adoption of the above recommendation would have the effect of increasing the draft gross expenditure and income budgets by the same amount of $111,412, i.e. from $20,023,000 to $21,034,412. However, the net expenditure and income budgets, as contained in the draft resolution for submission to the Conference (Report II: Financial and Budgetary Questions, page 4, paragraph 29) would remain unchanged at $20,337,871 and accordingly the total assessment on member States for 1966 would also remain unchanged.

16. The Governing Body adopted this report on 29 May 1965 and therefore recommends to the Conference that the amount of $111,412 be added to the draft gross income budget for 1966 and that the same amount be added to the appropriate items of the draft gross expenditure budget for 1966.

17. As a consequence of the above change the gross expenditure budget for 1966 now recommended by the Governing Body amounts to $21,034,412. However, the net expenditure and income budgets, as contained in the draft resolution for submission to the Conference (Report II: Financial and Budgetary Questions, page 4, paragraph 29) remain unchanged at $20,337,871.

18. A summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1966, as thus revised by the Governing Body on 29 May 1965 is reproduced below.

VIII. Income Budget for 1966

19. At the 162nd Session of the Governing Body (May 1965) the Allocations Committee submitted proposals to the Governing Body for recommendation to the Conference concerning the assessment of the contributions of a number of new member States of the I.L.O. These proposals are contained in the first report of the Allocations Committee to the 162nd Session of the Governing Body, the text of which is as follows:

1. The Allocations Committee of the Governing Body met on 27 May 1965 under the chairmanship of Mr. A. Tzankov (Bulgaria).

Assessment of the Contributions of New Member States of the International Labour Organisation

2. The Committee noted that the undermentioned States became Members of the International Labour Organisation on the dates indicated below:
   - Zambia: 2 December 1964
   - Malta: 4 January 1965
   - Malawi: 29 March 1965
   - Yemen: 20 May 1965

3. In giving consideration to the percentage assessments to be fixed in respect of the contributions of the above States, the Committee recalled that the general policy of the Allocations Committee in recent years had been to bring the I.L.O. scale of contributions into line with the United Nations scale as and when possible. In conformity with this policy, the recent practice of the Committee in assessing the contributions of new member States had been to align their I.L.O. percentage with the percentage of their contribution to the United Nations budget for the year in which they joined the I.L.O. except that in cases where the United Nations assessment had been lower than 0.12 per cent. (the minimum rate in the I.L.O. scale) the contributions of the States concerned had been assessed at 0.12 per cent. of the I.L.O. budget.

4. It was noted that each of the new Members was also a member of the United Nations and that the contribution of Yemen to the United Nations budget for 1964 had been at the minimum rate in the United Nations scale of 0.04 per cent. It was also noted that on the previous I.L.O. Committee on Contributions had recommended the same rate in respect of Yemen's contribution to the United Nations budget for 1965. In accordance with the Committee's past practice an appropriate assessment was made for negotiation with the Government of Yemen therefore appeared to be at the minimum rate in the I.L.O. scale of 0.12 per cent. of the budget.

5. The United Nations Committee on Contributions had not yet provided a draft scale of assessments to be fixed for the contributions to the United Nations budget of Zambia, Malta and Malawi respectively. However, on the basis of the most recently available economic data concerning each of these States compared with similar data relating to various other member States of the I.L.O., it had been estimated that an appropriate assessment of the contributions of Zambia, Malta and Malawi respectively to the budget of the I.L.O. would be at the minimum rate of 0.12 per cent.

6. The Committee decides—
   (a) to authorise its Chairman to consult with representatives of the Governments of Zambia, Malta, Malawi and Yemen, respectively on the question of an assessment of the contribution of each of them at the minimum rate 0.12 per cent. of the budget of the I.L.O.; and
   (b) with a view to avoiding the need to hold a further meeting or meetings of the Committee for the purpose of dealing with this particular question during the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference, to include assessments of 0.15 per cent. each for Zambia, Malta, Malawi and Yemen in the draft scale of assessments for 1966 that it had under consideration, and to instruct its Chairman to inform the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference of the agreement of the representatives of each of the above-mentioned Members respectively to the proposed assessments of their contributions, on the understanding that, if the representatives of the Governments of any of these Members should not agree to the proposed assessment of their State's contribution, the Chairman should report back to the Committee.

Scale of Contributions to the Budget for the Financial Year 1966

7. In considering the draft scale of contributions to the budget for 1966, the Committee noted that it would be necessary to adjust the 1965 scale to take into account on the one hand the withdrawal from the Organisation of the Republic of South Africa, and on the other hand, the assessment of the contributions of the four States which had joined the Organisation since the adoption of the 1965 scale by the Conference.

8. In view of the fact that South Africa would cease to be a Member of the Organisation on 11 March 1966, the Committee considered it appropriate to assess South Africa's contribution for 1966 on the basis of its 1965 assessment, reduced proportionately to take into account the fact that it was no longer a Member of the Organisation. In accordance with the Committee’s past practice an assessment of 0.12 per cent. of the I.L.O. budget would be restricted to 70 days (1 January to 11 March 1966). On this basis, the Committee included in the draft scale of contributions for 1966 an assessment of South Africa's contribution at 0.15 x 70 = 0.105 per cent. of the budget.

9. The Committee noted that the difference between 0.70 per cent. and 0.105 per cent., i.e. 0.60 per cent., would, of course, have to be spread amongst the remaining membership of the Organisation.

10. In this connection, the Committee recalled that for a number of years past it had modified the I.L.O. scale of contributions when necessary to take into account increases in membership of the Organisation by the application of the following criteria:
   (a) States previously assessed at the minimum to receive no relief;
   (b) the State assessed at the maximum to receive no relief;
   (c) States assessed at or below their United Nations assessment to receive no relief; and
   (d) the aggregate assessment of new member States to be divided among the remaining member States (i.e. those at present assessed at or below their United Nations assessment) in proportion to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment exceeds their United Nations assessment, the previous I.L.O. assessment of these States being reduced accordingly.

11. These criteria had been applied in pursuance of the principle consistently upheld by the Committee and by the Governing Body that the I.L.O. scale of contributions should be brought more into line with the United Nations scale at every subsequent triennial assessment, subject to the retention of the present maximum and minimum rates of contribution in the I.L.O. scale. In furtherance of this principle, the paper before the Committee contained a suggestion that the Committee might wish to distribute the difference between South Africa's 1965 and 1966 assessments, i.e. 0.61 per cent., among the remaining member States, in accordance with the following criteria, which were the converse of those used when amending the scale to take account of the inclusion of the assessments of new member States:
   (a) States at present assessed at the minimum, except where their individual I.L.O. assessment is not to be increased;
   (b) the State assessed at the maximum not to be increased;
   (c) States assessed at or below their United Nations assessment not to be increased; and
   (d) the total percentage withdrawn from the scale of contributions to be distributed among the remaining member States (i.e. those at present assessed at or below their United Nations assessment) in proportion to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment falls short of their individual United Nations assessment, the previous I.L.O. assessments of these States being increased accordingly.

12. The Committee also had before it a draft scale of assessments for 1966 based on the 1965 scale, modified in the first instance in accordance with the above criteria.
13. In the second place, the draft scale before the Committee was based on the 1965 scale modified to take into account the increased membership of the Organisation in accordance with the established criteria set out in paragraph 10 above. This scale included assessments of the contributions of the new member States of Zambia, Malta, Malawi, and Yemen at the rate of 0.12 per cent. of the budget of the I.L.O. in each case.

14. The U.S.S.R. Government member said that the document before the Committee had been distributed only about one week previously, so that his Government had not had time to formulate its definitive attitude in the matter. He therefore proposed that the Committee should not attempt to reach a conclusion at its present meeting with regard to the draft scale of contributions for 1966 to be recommended for adoption by the Governing Body and the Conference.

15. The suggestion before the Committee was that the relief assessment of the contributions of the new member States be distributed in accordance with the established criteria, while the percentage withdrawn from the scale of contributions as a result of the withdrawal from the Organisation of South Africa would be allocated in accordance with an entirely new set of criteria. While he appreciated that the new criteria were based on the same arithmetical principles as the established criteria, their application resulted in a directly opposite effect in that they added to the burden of some member States, whereas the established criteria alleviated the burden on a number of member States. This represented an important innovation and one which merited very careful consideration by the Committee and in particular by the Governments of the member States affected, of which his own Government was one.

16. In fact, application of the suggested criteria would mean that the U.S.S.R. would be called upon to pay at a rate of 0.23 per cent. higher than its present assessment. Moreover, of the total additional charge of 0.61 per cent., almost half, or 0.30 per cent., would be borne by socialist countries.

17. Although he did not doubt that the suggested criteria had been proposed by the Director-General in a purely objective manner, based solely on the arithmetical principle of bringing the I.L.O. scale as far as possible into line with the United Nations scale, nevertheless the practical effect of applying the criteria would have political consequences in that a very substantial proportion of the additional burden would fall on the socialist countries.

18. He expressed the hope that the Committee would be able to find an alternative formula which would not result in any individual member State feeling that it had been unduly penalised financially as a result of action that had been taken by the membership of the Organisation as a whole.

19. With this end in view, the U.S.S.R. Government member put forward the alternative proposal of the Committee as an alternative suggestion, the effect of which would be to apply the following method of adjustment of the I.L.O. scale of contributions:

1. Under normal circumstances, the established criteria for distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new member States shall continue to be applied.

2. In years when the I.L.O. scale has to be adjusted to take into account the effect of the withdrawal of a member State or States, the amount of the relief, if any, arising from the assessment of new Member States, in the first instance, be offset against the percentage to be withdrawn from the scale.

3. If the difference resulting from the above represents a net amount of relief then the existing criteria for distribution of relief shall be applied to such net amount.

4. If at the time of submission of the budget for the year in question to the Conference the total percentage of the assessment of new Members is insufficient to offset the percentage withdrawn from the scale as the result of the withdrawal of a member State or States, so that the difference represents an additional charge on existing member States, such difference shall be allocated as follows:

(a) States at present assessed at the minimum, except where this is lower than their United Nations assessment, not to be increased;
(b) the State assessed at the maximum not to be increased;
(c) States assessed at or above their United Nations assessment not to be increased; and
(d) the additional charge to be distributed temporarily among the remaining member States (i.e. those assessed lower than their United Nations assessment) pro rata to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment falls short of their individual United Nations assessment, the previous I.L.O. assessments of these States being increased accordingly.

5. The assessments temporarily increased as a result of the application of the above formula shall subsequently be brought back to their previous levels by distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions for the next following year or years in which such relief shall arise.

6. Once the assessments temporarily increased in accordance with the formula set out in paragraph 4 above have been brought back to their original percentage levels by distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new Member States, any further such relief shall be applied in accordance with the existing criteria, as follows:

(a) States previously assessed at the minimum to receive no relief;
(b) the State assessed at the maximum to receive no relief;
(c) States assessed at or below their United Nations assessment to receive no relief; and
(d) the aggregate assessment of new Member States to be divided among the remaining member States (i.e. those assessed higher than their United Nations assessment) pro rata to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment exceeds their United Nations assessment, the previous I.L.O. assessments of these States being reduced accordingly.

20. The U.S.S.R. Government member appreciated that the other members of the Committee would wish to have time to consider the implications of this alternative suggestion. Accordingly he suggested that the Committee should not attempt to reach a final decision at its present meeting.

21. The French Government member said that he well understood the principles that had guided the Director-General in submitting to the Committee the draft scale of contributions for 1966 that was before it. This scale had been devised strictly in accordance with the principle that had long since been established by the Committee, the Governing Body and the Conference that the I.L.O. scale should move progressively towards the United Nations scale of contributions at every suitable opportunity.

22. However, he felt that the Committee was fully aware of the fact that complete uniformity between the United Nations and the I.L.O. scales could never be reached until such time as the Member assessed at the highest rate could accept an alignment of this rate with the rate of its United Nations assessment. This Member, the United States, was at present assessed at 31.91 per cent. in the United Nations scale and 25 per cent. in the I.L.O. scale. To bring into accord both scales would mean that many years to bring the I.L.O. scale more into line with the United Nations scale, and although successive United States Governments had expressed their good will in the matter, the United States Government had not so far found it possible to accept an increase in the rate of its present assessment of 25 per cent. of the highest.

23. Another fundamental difference existed between the United Nations and the I.L.O. scales, namely that the minimum assessment in the United Nations scale was 0.04 per cent., whereas the minimum in the I.L.O. scale was 0.12 per cent.

24. This situation had existed for many years, probably since the end of the Second World War. Although within the practical limits imposed on it the Committee had done its best to bring the I.L.O. scale more into line with the United Nations scale on occasions when new member States had joined the I.L.O., the resulting adjustments in the assessments of the remaining member States had not given complete satisfaction in all cases.

25. There were still many States whose contributions were assessed at a much higher rate in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale. On the other hand, the I.L.O. assessments of a number of Members were considerably lower than their United Nations assessments. The assessments of some Members clearly no longer reflected their capacity to pay as a result of their increased prosperity.

26. He felt that the Committee should give very careful consideration as to how these anomalies could be corrected in the I.L.O. scale of contributions. He agreed with the U.S.S.R. Government member that the Committee should not attempt to reach a decision at this stage. The members of the Committee should have an opportunity of studying in detail the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government member and of reflecting on the problem as a whole.

27. The United States Government member concurred in the suggestions to adjourn further consideration of the draft scale of contributions for 1966 but expressed the hope that the Committee would be able to re-convene at an early date, after the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government member had been circulated. He could understand the concern of those governments which had not had an opportunity to study the Director-General's proposals as carefully as they would have liked.

28. While he was prepared to consider alternative suggestions such as had been put forward, this should not be interpreted as meaning that he felt that the Director-General's proposals were based on any considerations other than purely financial ones. He had carefully examined the paper before the Committee, and after calculation had concluded that the draft scale before the Committee resulted simply from the arithmetical application of the principles hitherto established and maintained by the Committee.

29. The Chairman concluded that the Committee as a whole would wish to have further time to consider the problem following the circulation of the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member.

30. The Committee agreed to adjourn consideration of this question in order to give its members time for further reflection and consultation with their governments.

31. Announced to this report as Annex I is a list of I.L.O. member States whose contributions are at present assessed at a lower percentage in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale (with the exception of the State assessed at the maximum rate). Annex I also indicates the effect of applying the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member on the individual assessments of the member States concerned, the resulting 1966 assessment being contained in the last column of the table.

32. Annex II to this report indicates in the last column the full draft scale of assessments for 1966 that would result from the application of the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member, set alongside the United Nations scale for 1965 as recommended by the United Nations Committee on Contributions and the I.L.O. scale for 1965 as adopted by the Conference at its 48th Session in June 1964.

Procedure for the Possible Continuation of the Work of the Allocations Committee during the Conference

33. It was recalled that in some years circumstances had necessitated the holding of meetings of the Committee during the annual session of the International Labour Conference. At its present session the Committee had adjourned consideration of the draft scale of contributions for 1966 as recorded in paragraph 30 above. It is also possible, in certain circumstances referred to in paragraph 6 above, that the Chairman of the Committee might be required to report back to the Committee following his consultation with representatives of the new member States, which would necessitate the holding of a further meeting or meetings of the Committee during the Conference.

34. Accordingly, the Committee recommends to the Governing Body that it be authorised to continue its work after the meetings of the Governing Body on 29 May 1965 and to submit its reports direct to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives of the Conference.
20. The Governing Body adopted the above report on 29 May 1965. Accordingly, the proposed assessments of the new member States will become effective upon certification by the Chairman of the Allocations Committee that the representatives of the governments of each of the new member States are in agreement with the proposed percentage assessment of the contributions to the budget of the I.L.O. of their respective countries.

21. The Allocations Committee adjourned its consideration of the draft scale of contributions for 1966, as recorded in paragraph 30 of its report. The Governing Body authorised the Allocations Committee to continue its work after the meetings of the Governing Body on 29 May 1965 and to submit its reports direct to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives of the Conference. The Allocations Committee's report on its further consideration of the draft scale of contributions for 1966 will therefore be submitted to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at a later date.

1 The figures in the last column are included in this table in pursuance of article 13, paragraph 4, of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, the text of which is as follows:

A Member of the Organisation which is in arrears in the payment of its financial contribution to the Organisation shall have no vote in the Conference, in the Governing Body, in any committee, or in the elections of members of the Governing Body, if the amount of its arrears equals or exceeds the amount of the contributions due from it for the preceding two full years: Provided that the Conference may by a two-thirds majority of the votes cast by delegates present permit such a Member to vote if it is satisfied that the failure to pay is due to conditions beyond the control of the Member.

Bolivia: Contributions due for the period ending 31 December 1957 ($35,057,57) payable in eight equal annual instalments of $4,382,20, commencing in 1959, in accordance with the arrangement approved by the International Labour Conference at its 40th Session (1957). The instalments for 1959-62 have been paid.

China: Contributions due for the period ending 31 December 1953 ($883,871.80) payable by annual instalments of $30,000, in accordance with the arrangement approved by the International Labour Conference at its 47th Session (1954). The annual instalments for 1954-65, amounting to $250,000, have been paid. In addition, an amount of $280,408 has been received.

Paraguay: The International Labour Conference decided at its 45th Session (1961) that the arrears of contributions due from Paraguay in respect of the International Labour Organisation and other League of Nations organisations for the period prior to 1959, amounting to $140,038, shall be cancelled, such cancellation to become effective on the payment by Paraguay of all its arrears of contributions due in respect of the more recent periods since 5 September 1959, the date when Paraguay rejoined the Organisation.
(3) First Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.1

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives met on 4, 8, 9, 10 and 11 June 1965 with Mr. Tesemma (Ethiopia) as Chairman and Reporter and Mr. Hill (Australia) as Vice-Chairman.

I. AUDITED ACCOUNTS FOR 1964

2. The Committee had before it the audited accounts for the 46th financial period (1964) and the reports thereon by Mr. Uno Brunsøk, auditor. The Committee noted that the Governing Body, on the recommendation of its Financial and Administrative Committee, had taken note of the auditor's reports and recommended that the Conference adopt the audited accounts for 1964.

3. The representative of Ukraine expressed his view that the information contained in the audited accounts was presented in such a way that it was difficult for members of the Committee to ascertain from the document exactly how the Organisation's funds were being spent and whether such funds were being put to the best possible use. Under the present system of auditing the external auditor was not required to examine whether the organisation's funds were used effectively. The control of the use made of the organisation's funds would be much more efficacious if carried out by a group of auditors which would be appointed by the Conference each year. Such a group should be drawn from the countries which bore the brunt of the organisation's expenses and from the countries receiving technical assistance under the budget. The critical examination of such a group would be especially useful in evaluating the use made of the funds devoted to the technical assistance activities of the Office.

4. The Committee recommends, under article 26 of the Financial Regulations, that the Conference should adopt the audited accounts for 1964.

II. RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE CONTRIBUTIONS PAYABLE TO THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSIONS FUND IN 19662

5. The Committee had before it a resolution submitted by the Governing Body on the recommendation of the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, under article 7 of the Regulations of the Staff Pensions Fund, concerning the contributions payable to the Fund in 1966. The Committee recommends the adoption by the Conference of this resolution, which is in the following terms:

Decides that the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the Staff Pensions Fund for 1966 under article 7, paragraph (a), of the Staff Pensions Regulations shall be 14 per cent. of the pensionable emoluments of the members of the Fund;

Decides that, for the year 1966, the officials mentioned in article 4, paragraph (a) (ii), of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Regulations shall continue to pay an additional 1 per cent. of their pensionable emoluments (making a total of 7½ per cent.) and those mentioned in article 4, paragraph (a) (ii), an additional ½ per cent. (making a total of 5½ per cent.) if their pensionable emoluments exceed the equivalent of Swiss francs 6,500 per annum, and an additional ½ per cent. (making a total of 5½ per cent.) if their emoluments are the equivalent of Swiss francs 6,500 or less;

Resolves that, in continuation of the arrangement approved in previous years, the whole budgetary vote for 1966 in respect of the contribution of the Organisation to the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund should be paid to the Fund.

III. RESOLUTION CONCERNING APPOINTMENTS TO THE ADMINISTRATIVE BOARD OF THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSIONS FUND AND TO THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSION COMMITTEE (UNITED NATIONS JOINT STAFF PENSION FUND)1

6. The Committee noted that the Governing Body at its 162nd Session (May-June 1965) had decided to submit to the Conference a draft resolution concerning the reappointment of three members and two substitute members of the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pension Committee and of the I.L.O. Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund). The Governing Body had noted at its 162nd Session that a proposal to fill a vacancy for a substitute member of the Board and Committee would be submitted by the Director-General at a later date.

7. In respect of this vacancy, the Director-General, in agreement with the Officers of the Governing Body, submitted the name of Mr. Bengt Hamdahl (Sweden).

8. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the following resolution:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—

Appoints to the Administrative Board of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund for a period of three years until 8 October 1968, and to the I.L.O. Staff Pension Committee (United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund) for a period of three years until 10 July 1968 the following members and substitute members of these bodies, namely—

Members.
Mr. H. J. Kirkaldy (United Kingdom), former Professor of Industrial Relations, University of Cambridge; former substitute member of the Governing Body.
Mr. P. Juhl-Christensen (Denmark), Director, International Relations Department of the Ministries of Labour and Social Affairs.
Mr. André Heilbronner (France), Counsellor of State.

Substitute Members.
Mr. Charles R. McCord (Canada), Director of Annuitie, Department of Labour.
Mr. Ernst Kaiser (Switzerland), Actuarial Adviser, Swiss Federal Office of Social Insurance.
Mr. Bengt Hamdahl (Sweden), Director of Labor Affairs, Ministry of Social Affairs.

IV. RESOLUTION CONCERNING AMENDMENTS TO THE REGULATIONS OF THE I.L.O. STAFF PENSIONS FUND3

9. The Committee had before it an extract from the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee submitted to the Governing Body at its 162nd Session, containing a summary of a number of proposals concerning the level of pensionable remuneration and of pensions in payment under the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund. These proposals had been designed as parallel measures to those already in effect for the participants in the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund following decisions taken by the United Nations General Assembly. The Governing Body had adopted the proposals at its 162nd Session.

1 See Appendix XII, p. 708.
2 See Appendix XII, p. 709.

10. The extract before the Committee also contained a series of proposed amendments to the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund, which were necessary in order to give effect to the Governing Body's adoption of the proposals referred to in the preceding paragraph. The Governing Body at its 162nd Session had recommended the adoption by the Conference of the amendments concerned, which appear as Appendix VI to the first report of the Financial and Administrative Committee.1

11. The Committee recommends that the Conference adopt the following resolution:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—
Decides to amend the Regulations of the I.L.O. Staff Pensions Fund in accordance with the texts which appear on pages II and III of the Provisional Record, No. 5.

V. RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE PENSIONS FUND OF THE JUDGES OF THE FORMER PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE2

12. The Committee had before it a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning the pensions in payment under the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the former Permanent Court of International Justice. The Committee recommends the adoption by the Conference of this resolution, which is in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—
Decides that, with effect from 1 March 1965, the pensions payable by the Pensions Fund of the Judges of the former Permanent Court of International Justice shall be increased by 12 per cent.;
Decides that the increase in annuities of Dutch florins 5,960 per annum shall be financed from the accumulated assets of the Fund; it being understood that in the event of the accumulated assets later proving insufficient to cover the payment of all outstanding pensions the Director-General would submit proposals for consideration.

VI. RESOLUTION CONCERNING APPOINTMENTS TO THE I.L.O. ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNAL3

13. The Committee had before it a resolution submitted by the Governing Body concerning appointments to the Administrative Tribunal of the International Labour Organisation. The Committee recommends the adoption by the Conference of this resolution, which is in the following terms:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—
In accordance with article III of the Statute of the Administrative Tribunal;

1 See item 1 of this Appendix, p. 527.
2 See Appendix XII, p. 709.
3 See Appendix XII, p. 710.

VII. EXPENDITURE BUDGET FOR 1966

14. The Committee had before it (a) Report II: Financial and Budgetary Questions, containing the budget estimates for 1966 as originally proposed by the Governing Body; and (b) the revised budgetary estimates submitted by the Governing Body.1

15. The Director-General made a statement introducing the budgetary estimates for 1966. This was followed by statements by members of a tripartite delegation from the Governing Body who attended the meeting in accordance with the Financial Regulations.

16. The Director-General first informed the Committee that, following the urgent appeal for prompt payment of contributions made by the Conference in 1964, a number of member States had taken special administrative action which had enabled them to pay, in some cases all, and in others a part, of their 1965 contributions during the first quarter of the year.

On the other hand, 52 Members had so far made no payment whatsoever against their current contributions. The present margin of income over expenditure was not great and it was clear that any unexpected delay in the payment of contributions still outstanding would again lead to withdrawals from the Working Capital Fund in the second half of the year.

17. The regular net expenditure budget proposed by the Governing Body for 1966 amounted to $20,337,871, an increase of the order of 8.8 per cent. over the 1965 budget. This figure represented a compromise on the Director-General's original proposals, which had been discussed in detail by the Financial and Administrative Committee. The present figure had been accepted unanimously by both the Financial and Administrative Committee and the Governing Body. At its most recent session the Governing Body had decided to adjust certain provisions in the proposed budget as it appeared in Report II, to take account of an anticipated provision of additional funds designed to cover overhead costs related to projects carried out by the I.L.O. under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance. The larger part of the additional funds would be devoted to technical assistance and to improving the field structure. The increase in expenditure would be counter-balanced by the anticipated additional receipts, so that the total assessment on member States for 1966 would remain unchanged at the figure of $20,337,871.

18. The presentation of the budget had not differed from last year. However, the programme-planning system, which had now been introduced as part of the reorganisation of the Office, would in the future ensure that financial data were associated with each programme proposed for implementation. This would facilitate the evaluation and selection of programmes and their examination by the legislative bodies of the Organisation with full regard for the related financial implications. The new programme-planning machinery, which was one of the most important developments reflected in the proposed budget for 1966, would come into full operation in 1966 and would enable the I.L.O. to adapt its action to changing needs in the light of available resources and to evaluate the results of its action. The key element in the system was a Programme Committee, of which he was Chairman, and the principal function of which was to select, for submission in the form of budget proposals, programmes of the highest priority from among those suggested by responsible chiefs in the Office on the basis of prior policy directives. Provision had been made in the budget for 1966 for the number of new posts and regradings to ensure the full and efficient operation of the planning system.

1 See item 1 of this Appendix, p. 531.

19. The second important factor reflected in the proposed budget for 1966 was the reorganisation of the field structure. A new Field Department had been established which would be responsible for managing all field activities on an organisation-wide basis, decentralised as far as was consistent with the need for supervision and guidance from headquarters. Since the creation of a complete new field structure, including a system of external offices, would take some time, a special allocation of temporary assistance funds had been included in the proposed budget rather than a provision for new permanent posts in 1966. It was intended that at a later stage this special allocation should be replaced by specific posts.

20. A third major factor reflected in the budget was the continuing importance attached to technical assistance activities financed from the regular funds of the Organisation. These activities were designed to complement work under the extra-budgetary programmes of technical assistance, had provided for substantially increased resources on this account in 1966, amounting in all to rather more than $1,900,000.

21. Apart from provision for regrading a number of posts to meet requirements resulting from the reorganisation, and the inclusion of one additional D.2 post for this purpose, the budget included provision for 19 Professional and 19 General Service category posts to reinforce sectors of the Office to which priority was being given following the reorganisation and in line with the new programme-planning arrangements. These new posts would involve an increase of only about 3.5 per cent. in the permanent staff establishment.

22. Following recommendations by a Working Party set up by the Financial and Administrative Committee in November 1964, the Governing Body had decided that the International Vocational Training and Research Centre (C.I.R.F.) account should be discontinued and that C.I.R.F.'s functions should be assumed by the I.L.O.; this decision was reflected in the proposed budget for 1966. The Governing Body had also decided, on the Working Party's recommendation, that the extra-budgetary accounts of the International Occupational Safety and Health Information Centre (C.I.S.); and the Inter-American Vocational Training Research and Information Centre (CINTERFOR) should be maintained, subject to review at an early date. The remaining extra-budgetary accounts would be examined by the Working Party in November.

23. Provision for a direct cash payment of $500,000 into the Working Capital Fund had originally been included in the budget proposals for 1966 in line with the provision made in the 1965 budget and in order to bring the Fund up to a level more commensurate with that of the regular budget. However, in reaching a compromise on the budget that was acceptable to all members of the Governing Body, this provision had been reduced to $100,000. The reduction had been accepted in the light of the establishment of a Working Party with the task of trying to determine an appropriate level for the Fund in relation to the level of the budget in future years. It was hoped that the Working Party's conclusions would be reached in time for them to be taken into account when the 1967 budget proposals were prepared.

24. With regard to the long-term accommodation needs of the Office the Director-General informed the Committee that the Swiss authorities, who had established a Property Foundation for International Organisations, had proposed to make available, for the construction of new I.L.O. premises, a site called "Le Grand Morillon," adjoining the site on which the World Health Organisation was putting up its new headquarters building. On the basis of the particular advantage of permitting the implementation of activities of special interest in the promotion of I.L.O. objectives which did not always receive top priority under the United Nations technical assistance programmes. The Governing Body, which had consistently supported a well-planned expansion of the regular budget technical assistance activities, had provided for substantially increased resources on this account in 1966, amounting in all to rather more than $1,900,000.

25. Referring to the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin, the Director-General confirmed that the material arrangements, for which the Italian authorities had assumed responsibility without charge to the I.L.O., had reached an advanced state of preparation and that the final fitting out with movable equipment was in hand. Meanwhile, the team responsible for training questions had selected homogeneous groups of trainees for the first two training sessions, the technical preparatory work having been financed from credits made available under the Italian trust fund.

26. On the financial side, the budget originally fixed by the Governing Body for the first four years of operation had amounted to $6,100,000. However, as it seemed that contributions likely to be pledged prior to the opening of the Centre would probably fall short of this amount by some $500,000 and in view of the advanced state of the material arrangements coupled with the very considerable disadvantages of postponing the opening beyond the end of 1965, a new four-year budget had been drawn up on the basis of confirmed contributions, providing for a somewhat more gradual start and a more limited number of trainee groups of trainees for the first two training sessions. This new provisional budget, which had been approved by the Governing Body, amounted to approximately $5,553,000.

27. It was expected that the Convention and the other necessary instruments would be ratified very shortly by the competent authorities in Italy and that immediately afterwards the first instalment of the Italian contribution, amounting to $717,000, would be made available. The second instalment would be paid in January 1966. The Governing Body had therefore authorised the Director-General to begin operations and to open the Centre as soon as the conditions which it had laid down had been met. It was hoped that this would mean that the Centre could be opened in October.

28. Cash contributions for the first four years of the Centre's operation had now been announced by well over 30 member States of the I.L.O. and equipment valued at approximately $900,000 had been promised or delivered. The Director-General hoped that these examples of generosity would encourage and persuade governments which were still hesitating to participate in the undertaking. Further contributions from Members were essential to ensure the development of the Centre's activities in the years to come.

29. The Director-General concluded by recalling that the net budget of expenditure submitted by the Governing Body for 1966 amounted to $20,337,871. He believed this budget to be well geared to present needs while providing a sound basis for future development and therefore asked that the Committee send the budget forward to the Conference with its full support.

30. Mr. Heron (United Kingdom), who spoke on behalf of the Chairman of the Governing Body, said that the document before the Committee containing the proposed expenditure budget for 1966 represented the results of long and detailed discussions in the Financial and Administrative Committee at the 161st Session of the Governing Body (March 1965). The proposed gross expenditure budget amounted to over $21 million, representing an increase of almost 9 per cent. over the 1965 budget. During the careful and critical examination of the Director-General's original budget proposals by the Financial and Administrative Committee many different views had been expressed on the budget; it was thanks largely to the patience and skill of the Director-General that agreement had been reached on the proposals now before the Finance Committee.

31. It had been generally accepted that the I.L.O.'s activities should be expanded and that this would inevitably lead to some increase in expeditiousness. Views differed, however, as to the appropriate rate of expansion. Some governments had argued that the rate of increase in the budget should be related to the rate of economic growth in the world, while others had thought that the limiting factor should be the capacity of the Organisation's staff and administrative resources to absorb additional tasks. These differences of view had been brought out particularly in the discussion of the Fls. 1.5 million loan designed to finance technical assistance. Some governments had felt that to try to expand this work too rapidly would not be conducive to efficiency and would weaken its impact.

32. With regard to staffing arrangements many governments had urged the Director-General to continue his efforts to streamline the administrative procedures of the Office and to seek economies through more effective deployment of staff. General welcome had been afforded to the Director-General's proposals for improved programme planning and control of the Organisation's activities, and for better co-ordination of field activities.

33. It had been generally agreed that the Working Capital Fund should be large enough to cover the day-to-day requirements of the Office during those periods of the year when income from contributions lagged behind current expenditure. The Director-General had been led to make a substantial cut in his original proposal for adding to the Fund. It was hoped that the Working Party which had been established to consider what should be an appropriate level for the Fund in relation to the Organisation's expenditure would find a satisfactory and permanent solution to this difficult problem.

34. A point of particular importance was the expectation of the Governing Body that the reorganisation of the Office and the introduction of improved arrangements for programme control to be followed by an improved method of budget presentation, would facilitate more informed and constructive consideration of the budget in future years. The budget proposals now before the Finance Committee were not entirely satisfactory in all respects to all the governments which had taken part in the discussions of the Financial and Administrative Committee. The fact that they had been unanimously adopted by that Committee and by the Governing Body showed that they were nevertheless regarded as a reasonable compromise, reached in a spirit of responsible co-operation and goodwill. He felt that the Finance Committee of Government Representatives might well uphold that view, and accordingly hoped that the Committee would adopt the expenditure budget for 1966 as submitted.
35. Mr. Bergenström, who spoke on behalf of the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that the 1966 budget proposals had been unanimously accepted by the Governing Body, including all the Employers' members, in a spirit of compromise.
In the Employers' view the programme of meetings provided for in the 1966 budget was overloaded. For some years past the Employers had asked for a revised budget presentation which would clearly bring out the relation between staff costs and the work programmes undertaken by the staff. This was not the case under the existing presentation, as a result of which it was impossible to establish priorities between different fields of activity and thereby increase credits for work of the highest importance and reduce or eliminate low-priority work. The Employers therefore hoped that future years budgets would be elaborated on a programme basis.
This view had been supported by many Government members, and the Employers were happy to note the Director-General's plans in this respect. They hoped for concrete results in the 1967 budget proposals. Further consideration should also be given to the idea of long-term planning of the Organisation's activities, and notably to the idea of a two-year budget.
36. The rate of increase in the budget in recent years had been very high, quite out of proportion to the increase in the gross national product of most member States. The Employers hoped that it would be possible in future years to keep the rate of increase down to a more reasonable figure. While this applied to the budget as a whole, the Employers felt that it should not apply to the credits for technical assistance to developing countries;
this aid now had such a high priority that it should constitute the major part of the I.L.O.'s work.
37. Lord Collison, who spoke on behalf of the Workers' Vice-Chairman of the Governing Body, said that the Workers' group in the Governing Body had finally been able to accept the budget proposals now before the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, but only after rather long and sometimes bitter exchanges of views and various compromises.
The Workers hoped that the new programmeplanning machinery would help the Financial and Administrative Committee to examine future budgets on a more realistic basis than at present. The existing procedure had many aspects had enabled the Workers to accept the substantial cut that had been made in the Director-General's original proposal for injecting new money into the Working Capital Fund in 1966.
39. The I.L.O. and all the specialised agencies should try to meet the needs of the so-called developing countries as far as possible. In this context the world was not split into developing and developed countries, as all countries were in a constant state of development, and needs for I.L.O. assistance abounded everywhere.
The Workers hoped that in future the I.L.O. would be able to assess the real needs and then provide the necessary assistance. They could not accept the view that the rate of increase in the I.L.O. budget should be tied to the rate of increase in the gross national products of its member States. The acceptance of such a view would tie the I.L.O.'s activities to their present level and might even reduce this level because of the unavoidable incidence of rising costs.
40. The Workers were very concerned at the situation with regard to the I.L.O. premises.
They hoped and expected that the Swiss authorities would improve on their present offer for the I.L.O.'s existing buildings in exchange for a new site. Geneva undoubtedly benefited considerably from the presence of the international organisations, and the authorities should take this factor into account as well as the replacement value of the present I.L.O.
building.
41. The Workers had been pleased to agree with the Director-General's proposal to open the Turin Centre. They greatly appreciated the generosity of the Italian Government for all it had done to make the Centre possible and thanked all those governments which had already contributed to the financing of the Centre. In this connection, the Workers had compared the launching of the Turin Centre with that of the International Institute for Labour Studies, which had been received enthusiastically by the Governing Body and the Conference, but whose activities had now become a heavy charge on the regular budget. The Workers could not accept any suggestion that a similar state of affairs might eventually result in regard to the financing of the Turin Centre. The responsibility for contributing voluntarily to the Turin Centre lay clearly with the governments of all member States. In saying this, he emphasised that the Workers were fully conscious of the fact that it was the governments that provided the finance for the activities of the I.L.O. Nevertheless, in view of the unique tripartite nature of the Organisation, it was important that the Workers' voice be heard on financial matters. Indeed, the I.L.O. had been established in the first place to improve the working and living conditions of workers throughout the world. It was only normal, therefore, that the workers should play a full part in endeavouring to secure the necessary funds for the financing of the I.L.O.'s work.

General Discussion of the Budget Proposals

42. The representative of Argentina said that his Government was highly appreciative of the work carried out by the I.L.O. and took great interest in it; it should be expanded as far as possible, especially the technical assistance to developing countries, whose interests the Director-General was bound to take into account. It was inevitable that an increase in activities should lead to increased costs, not only in the I.L.O. but in the United Nations and all the specialised agencies. His Government felt that the very substantial cost of maintaining all of these international organisations should be borne principally by the highly developed and industrialised countries, and that these countries in particular should be prepared to contribute generously to the activities of the various organisations and support their budgets.

43. At present the allocation of expenses among member States in the I.L.O. rested on an unsatisfactory basis. The I.L.O. scale of contributions did not take sufficient account of the demands of equity and of the relative capacity to pay of the different member States. Many countries were over-assessed in the I.L.O. scale, and it was necessary that this scale be replaced in the future by a more equitable system of allocation. The Argentine Government considered that the work of the I.L.O. should be expanded, especially where it benefited developing countries. However, if the scale of contributions were not placed on a more equitable basis soon, then Argentina and many other countries would have difficulty in giving their continuing support to the budget of the Organisation.

44. The representative of Senegal said that the budget estimates were clearly set out and well explained in the document before the Committee. The 1966 budget reflected a number of new developments, one of which was the building of the revised field structures of the Organisation, which stemmed from the requests of developing countries that the work of the Organisation should be decentralised in order to enable it better to evaluate and try to meet the needs of the developing countries.

45. He had noted in recent years that there had been very little strengthening in the staff of the technical branches of the Office, whereas the staff of the administrative and financial services had increased substantially. A better distribution of staff was necessary between technical and administrative services and between I.L.O. Headquarters and the external offices.

46. The late payment of contributions by member States handicapped the financing of the I.L.O.'s activities and the planning of its work programmes. Of the 52 member States which had so far made no payment against their 1965 contributions, many were developing countries, particularly African countries. The Director-General ought to contact these governments with a view to discovering the reasons why they were late in paying their contributions. The fact was that the contributions assessed on member States had been increasing rapidly in recent years. For example, the contributions payable in 1966 were approximately 80 per cent. higher than those for 1960. While the developing countries were prepared to meet their financial obligations to the Organisation with the best will in the world, they expected the Office to do everything possible to keep its expenses to a minimum consistent with the efficient fulfilment of the tasks entrusted to it. The financial policy of most African governments was characterised by austerity; it would therefore be desirable for the difficult financial situation of these countries to be taken into account in determining the level of the I.L.O.'s budget.

47. The opening of the Turin Centre was of the greatest possible importance to Senegal, and he was happy to see that it was planned to open the Centre in October. Nevertheless, he had gained the impression that the publicity put out concerning the role of the Centre had not been sufficiently understood so far by member States. Many advanced technical and vocational training institutes had been established in the developing countries, particularly in Africa. The Director-General should examine the nature and functions of these institutes with a view to ensuring that the Turin Centre would complement their work and not compete with them.

48. The Government of Senegal would continue to give its full support to the I.L.O., while hoping that its work would have an increasing impact on conditions of work and life in the developing countries.

49. The representative of Brazil expressed his agreement with the views of the two previous speakers concerning the role of the I.L.O. with regard to the developing countries. His Government was conscious of the fact that expanding activities necessarily led to certain increases in expenditure, but was concerned at the rapid rate of increase in the level of the I.L.O.'s budget. He had hoped that the adoption of the recommendations of McKinsey and Co. would lead to substantial savings. Yet almost every item in the 1966 budget showed... an increase over the corresponding 1965 credit. There was thus little evidence of the streamlining in the administrative procedures of the I.L.O. which should have resulted from the adoption of the McKinsey recommendations.

50. His Government was also greatly concerned at the inequities in the present scale of contributions to the I.L.O. budget. He understood that no significant change in apportioning the expenses among member States was being proposed for 1966. This was a disquieting situation, in the light of which he would abstain in the vote on the expenditure budget of the Organisation for 1966.

51. The representative of India indicated the full support of his Government for the 1966 expenditure budget before the Committee.

52. The representative of Syria pointed out that the 1966 budget proposals were more than $1,500,000 greater than the 1965 budget. It was admitted on principle that the budget should increase, provided that the overwhelming part of such increase should be devoted to operational activities. However, these activities at present accounted for only about 14 per cent. of the total budget, whereas staff and administrative costs were equivalent to more than 64 per cent. of the budget. Moreover, the budget did not provide for an adequate expansion in the regional activities of the Organisation. Insufficient funds were earmarked for regional conferences, advisory committees and other work of a regional character. In spite of the increased estimates for branch offices and national correspondents the funds under this item to be spent in the developing countries were actually at a lower level than in 1965. Finally, it was his Government’s opinion that the highly industrialised countries should bear a greater share in the expenses of the Organisation.

53. The representative of the U.S.S.R. emphasised his Government’s view that the rate of increase in the I.L.O. budget should be closely related to the rate of increase in the national incomes of member States. He could not accept the view that the increase in the I.L.O. budget should be determined exclusively by what were called the growing demands. The acceptance of such a view would result in a completely unacceptable rate of increase in the budget. It was essential to gear the increase in the budget to the growth in national incomes. The acceptance of this principle would mean that the budget would increase by about 4 or 5 per cent. per annum. The proposed budget for 1966 was about 9 per cent. above that for 1965.

54. Although during the 161st Session of the Governing Body the Director-General had made efforts to limit the increase to less than his original proposals, even greater efforts should have been made, especially because a major part of the increased cost in 1966 related to expenditure on staff and administration. In fact, of the total increase of approximately $1,700,000, about $1,200,000 represented increased administrative and staff costs, whereas the credits for financing the operational activities of the Office had risen by only about $400,000. This proportion was unacceptable by any criteria. The Office should therefore seek to rationalise its working methods and reduce the low-priority activities at present being financed through the budget. The McKinsey recommendations had served as a basis for the reorganisation of the Office, but only as regards staff increases; those recommendations which might be expected to cut operating expenditures did not appear to have been taken into account in the 1966 budget.

55. Year by year the level of the I.L.O. budget proceeded in one direction only, namely upwards. The most recent decision of the Governing Body relating to the additional funds that it was anticipated would be received in 1966 from the United Nations Technical Assistance Board to offset the overhead costs of implementing the I.L.O.’s technical assistance programmes under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance illustrated the exclusively upward movement in the budget. The greater part of the additional funds to be made available would be devoted to staff and administrative costs, etc., whereas the anticipated increase in the regular budget for 1966 already contained a substantial credit for meeting the E.P.T.A. overheads, in addition to the funds received from U.N.T.A.B. for this purpose.

56. The U.S.S.R. Government recognised the difficulties inherent in fixing appropriate salary scales for international civil servants but considered that some of the recent increases in these salaries had not been justified. Yet priority was given in the budget to further salary increases. The salaries paid by the I.L.O. to its Professional staff were already higher than those paid by, for example, the Swiss Government to its own civil servants of equivalent grades. Still more considerable was the disparity between the salary rates prevailing in developing countries and the salaries paid to the I.L.O. officials on mission in those countries. This state of affairs was not likely to produce a favourable psychological effect in developing countries, nor was it likely to contribute to the prestige of the I.L.O. The Director-General should reflect on this question in preparing his future budget estimates.

57. Participation in the work of any organisation presupposed the acceptance of certain obligations and the acquisition of certain rights. The U.S.S.R. had always paid its contributions to the budget of the I.L.O. with great regularity even though it was not in full accord with some of the financial practices of the Organisation. On the other hand, the socialist countries generally were discriminated against in the work of the I.L.O. especially their Employers’ and Workers’ representatives. He wondered how the I.L.O. could expect Members who were denied their elementary rights to fulfil their financial obligations normally. As the I.L.O. denied the socialist countries’ Workers’ and Employers’ representatives their legitimate rights to participate in the work of the Organisation, his Government would abstain in the vote on the 1966 expenditure budget.

58. The representative of Sierra Leone expressed the view that the expansion in the activities of the I.L.O. necessarily led to increased costs. Member governments should therefore be prepared to meet the resulting increases in their contributions. It was evident that additional staff would be required to maintain the expansion in the work of the Organisation. He felt that the level of the 1966 expenditure budget did not reflect any inefficiency in the working of the Office. He also felt that the staff of the I.L.O. was deserving of an adequate level of remuneration. His Government strongly supported the adoption of the proposed budget for 1966 before the Committee.

59. The representative of Uruguay said that her Government took great interest in the work of the I.L.O. and had consistently supported the development of its activities. It felt that the expansion in the Organisation’s field activities was certain to benefit the institutions and economic structures of all member States, especially of the developing countries. It was logical that these countries, which benefited greatly from the I.L.O.’s work, should support increases in the budget in so far as they were devoted to technical assistance. A reasonable rate of increase in the level of the I.L.O.’s budget could therefore be accepted. However, in recent years the increases had been excessive, especially at a time when many countries were passing through a very difficult stage in the establishment and development of institutions in their own countries. The increase in national income per head was very low in many countries, whereas anxiety to fulfill their financial obligations as best they could. However, the continually rising budgets of the United Nations and all the specialised agencies called for considerable sacrifices from these countries through their national budgets, especially as the contributions to the international organisations had to be paid in United States dollars. If the present rate of increase in the level of the I.L.O.’s budget did not fall sharply, it would eventually become impossible for these countries to give their continuing support to the I.L.O. The Uruguayan Government would support the 1966 budget in the hope that the future programme-planning system would enable a brake to be applied to the rate of increase in the budgets of future years. Future increases should be related principally to increased operational activities rather than to administrative costs. Finally, the Office should consider the situation of the developing countries in regard to the scale of contributions to the budget.

60. The representative of Yugoslavia expressed his Government’s serious concern at the increase in the 1966 budget over that of the previous year. Such a rate of increase could not be continued for very long without the risk being run of harming the financial situation of the Organisation. It was essential to justify increases in the budget in terms of increased activities. Moreover, many governments faced serious difficulties in paying their contributions; future years' budget increases should therefore be brought into line with increases in national incomes. In the 1966 budget practically every item had been increased. Although the need for an expansion of the I.L.O.’s work was fully recognised, due regard should be had to establishing priorities and thereby taking action where the needs were greatest, especially the needs of the developing countries. Their needs pointed to the desirability of decentralising the work of the I.L.O. The reorganisation of the Office ought to result in decreased costs, especially staff costs. The staff should be recruited on a more equitable geographical basis than hitherto. A certain amount of concern had been expressed at the travel costs provided for in the I.L.O. budget, and this question should be examined carefully by the Office. Although his Government had a number of reservations concerning various items it was nevertheless prepared to vote in favour of the 1966 budget.

61. The representative of Australia said that his Government would give its full support to the 1966 budget. In the Financial and Administrative Committee his Government had been one of the most active in undertaking a careful and critical examination of the 1966 budget proposals and had expressed reservations with regard to certain items. At the present meeting, he had taken particular note of the emphasis laid by the Employers’ and Workers’ members of the Governing Body delegation on the fact that it had been possible to reach agreement only after laborious negotiation and many compromises on all sides. In view of the satisfactory compromise that had been reached, his Government was now happy to support this budget.

62. The representative of Ukraine said that the budget proposals before the Committee represented a compromise which had not given full satisfaction to all governments, including his own. In the past few years there had been a very large increase in the level of the I.L.O.’s budget, which had risen from about $10 million in 1960 to a proposed $21 million for 1966. He supported increases in the activities of the Organisation, especially in its operational programmes. These increases, however, could not alone justify the present rate of increase in the budget. The funds to be devoted to operational activities under the 1966 budget amounted to less than $2 million. The greatest increase in expenditure had occurred in the administrative costs of running the Organisation.

63. At present the Office undertook no long-term programme planning, which made it almost impossible to forecast the level of future budgets. Although the 1966 budget was less than 10 per cent. greater than that for the previous year, even this rate of increase was unjustified. His Government’s view was that the optimum rate of increase in the budget was about 4 or 5 per cent. each year. He felt that the estimates for 1966 could well be reduced to reflect such a rate of increase by cutting staff costs, which represented approximately two-thirds of the total budget. The reorganisation of the Office had been aimed at a more flexible utilisation of existing staff resources. This did not appear to have been reflected in the 1966 budget proposals. The report of McKinsey and Co. had contained an excellent appraisal of the inflexibility of the staff structure, under which it was virtually impossible to transfer staff resources within the Office to meet changing needs and priorities. Each new activity that the Office undertook tended to lead to the creation of new divisions or branches, which thereafter became self-perpetuating.

64. The recruitment of well-qualified specialists, having regard to the need for equitable geographical distribution of staff, if combined with a more flexible organisational structure, should permit an over-all reduction in the level of the permanent staff establishment. Further savings could also be achieved by cutting out unjustifiable increases in salary scales. Cuts could also be made in the estimates relating to the upkeep of the premises, the Working Capital Fund and the contributions to extra-budgetary activities without impairing the efficiency of the work of the Office.

65. It was clear that at the present time the I.L.O. should undertake long-term planning of its programme of activities and of the financing thereof. Planning of this nature would provide the means of exercising an effective control of the progress made in implementing approved work programmes. His Government's attitude when the budget was put to a vote would be influenced by the fact that the proposed budget for 1966 did not take sufficient account of the comments made by the representative of his Government on the Governing Body.

66. The representative of Trinidad and Tobago expressed his appreciation of the very clear and comprehensive explanations of the budget estimates contained in the document before the Committee. His Government would warmly support the adoption of the 1966 budget. Most of the developing countries were continually calling on the I.L.O. to provide them with more technical assistance. An adequate expansion of the activities of the Office could not be achieved without a reasonable increase in expenditure, and his Government considered that the increase reflected in the 1966 budget proposals was fully justified. With regard to the staffing situation, he was certainly in no position to judge whether there was any element of redundancy in the I.L.O. staff. He felt that this was essentially a matter for the Director-General to judge and, in the light of the Director-General's acknowledged competence, he was confident that no such redundancy existed. All member States should have confidence in the Organisation and place their trust in the Director-General's ability to manage the affairs of the Office in the best interests of the Organisation and of all its Members.

67. The representative of Norway indicated that in the Governing Body he was one of the members who had supported the Director-General's original budget estimates for 1966. A high percentage of the increases in the budget was unavoidable as a result of rising costs. Unfortunately these inescapable increases meant that less money could be made available for financing a further expansion in the Organisation's operational activities. Having in mind the need to help the developing countries, the Norwegian Government was anxious to see that the I.L.O. received all the funds that were necessary to finance an adequate degree of expansion in its work, particularly the technical assistance activities. Although his Government had stated in the Financial and Administrative Committee that the cuts made in the Director-General's 1966 budget proposals had gone too far, he had been willing to accept the compromise reached in the Governing Body and was now able to recommend most warmly that the Committee adopt the estimates now before it.

68. The representative of New Zealand said that he had been impressed by the statements made by the Governing Body delegation to the Committee. His Government had hoped that some degree of stability could be achieved in the budgets of this and other international organisations, and that in the case of the I.L.O. the new structure and programme-planning machinery of the Office would make this possible without hindering the development of the Organisation's activities. The payment of contributions to the budget was becoming increasingly difficult for the smaller countries, some of which were facing problems in regard to their balance of payments. His Government fully approved the increased credits for operational activities, but felt that there was scope for savings in other items of the budget, especially in the provisions for the financing of Industrial Committee meetings. Such meetings were now of less importance than they had been in the past, and the funds earmarked for their financing could well be diverted to higher-priority activities. His Government also had reservations concerning the credit for the preparation of the Encyclopaedia of Occupational Health and Safety. It would, however, give its full support to the proposed budget for 1966 as a whole.

69. The representative of Uganda said that the Committee's discussion had illustrated that financial and budgetary questions were always controversial. While the rate of increase in the I.L.O.'s budget had been criticised as being extravagant the calls on its services in the technical assistance field were constantly increasing. In the light of the need for further expansion in the activities of the Organisation, rising costs inevitably meant that the level of funds sufficient to enable the I.L.O. to fulfil its task successfully a few years ago was completely inadequate today. The I.L.O. must continue to grow, and the powerful, highly industrialised countries should be prepared to support this growth in financial terms. The Organisation's technical assistance activities were extremely useful, and should be expanded further. At the same time, the developing countries were doing everything possible within their limited resources to help themselves, and the technical assistance functions of the I.L.O. and other United Nations agencies was an essential supplement. In these circumstances, it would be tragic if the I.L.O.'s budget were to remain static; this would defeat the fundamental objectives of the Organisation. He had no doubt that the Director-General would take heed of the criticisms that had been levelled at the present staff structure of the I.L.O. As for the level of the salaries paid to staff, he was of the opinion that the present salaries represented a fair return for the extremely high standard of the work and ability of the staff. He appealed to the representatives of the governments which had expressed their unwillingness to support the 1966 budget to reconsider their attitude in the light of these considerations.

70. The representative of Poland said that his Government's views on the budget had already been expressed in detail during the debate in the Financial and Administrative Committee. These views were critical in many respects. While he endorsed the Director-General's policy for a gradual expansion in the activities of the I.L.O., especially its operational activities, he shared the concern of most members of the Committee at the excessively high rate of increase in the level of the budget compared with the growth in the national incomes of member countries. Long-range programme planning would help to achieve a reasonable rate of increase in the budget of about 5 or 6 per cent.

71. The 9 per cent. increase in the 1966 budget over that of the previous year was much closer to the rate he considered reasonable than the increase in the budgets of the past five or six years. His Government hoped that this would mark the beginning of a trend in the right direction, but still felt that further savings could be achieved without cutting or hampering the activities of the Organisation. A better utilisation, inter alia through redeployment, of existing staff resources should have made it possible for the staff establishment in 1966 to be kept at the 1965 level. There was also room for savings in the items to cover general office expenses and capital expenditure on land and buildings. His Government maintained its view that there was no need to increase the Working Capital Fund through contributions from member States in 1966.

72. The Director-General had emphasised that although this was certainly a compromise budget, it was also a budget of advance. On financial grounds his Government had been prepared to accept this budget, but financial questions could not be considered in isolation from the question of the fundamental rights of member States to have the opportunities to participate in the work of the I.L.O. on an equal and equitable basis. Poland had always scrupulously discharged its obligation to pay its contributions to the budget. On the other hand socialist countries, including Poland, were discriminated against in the work of the Organisation, especially as regards the participation of their Employers' and Workers' representatives; this was totally unacceptable. The situation was also far from satisfactory as regards governmental participation in the work of the Organisation. For example, Poland had been denied the right to participate fully in the work of Industrial Committees. Discrimination was also evident as regards the recruitment of the staff, and in the distribution of elective seats at the Conference and in the other bodies of the Organisation. The representative of his Government in the Resolutions Committee had given figures illustrating the degree of discrimination against the socialist countries in presenting his related resolution to that Committee. This situation and particularly the developments at the beginning of the present session of the Conference concerning distribution of elective seats, compelled his Government to change its position in regard to the 1966 budget. Thus the Polish delegation would have to abstain in the vote on the 1966 budget.

73. The representative of Byelorussia said that the rapid increase in the level of the budget had given concern to almost all members of the Committee. Acute dissatisfaction had been felt by the majority of the governments at the Director-General's original budget proposals for 1966, which had embodied an increase of the order of 14 per cent. over the 1965 budget. As a result of the examination by the Financial and Administrative Committee the increase was now just under 9 per cent., which also was not a small figure when compared with the average growth of national incomes. He felt that the existing procedure for examining the budget proposals was unsatisfactory and regretted that the Director-General had not heeded the comments that his Government had made last year on this subject.

74. There was room for savings in many items of the 1966 budget. The Director-General had said that the budget reflected the new structure of the Office and the new obligations and tasks of the I.L.O. However, the explanations of the budget estimates failed to illustrate this. The greatest increase was related to administrative costs. The budgets of none of the other specialised agencies revealed such an unfavourable balance between administrative costs and the funds devoted to operational activities as did the budget of the I.L.O.

75. The estimates for meeting the cost of the Conference had increased by $47,000 in the past two years. This increase had not been justified and the credit for this item could undoubtedly be reduced. The estimate of $75,000 for external collaboration was unwarranted. If such collaboration should prove to be necessary, it should be covered under the items for unforeseen expenditure. It was also necessary to cut the administrative costs involved in managing the I.L.O.'s technical assistance programmes financed from Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance funds. A recent report of the United Nations Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions had indicated that there was room for savings on this account.

76. The level of the I.L.O.'s Working Capital Fund was at present equivalent to about 20 per cent. of the annual budget. This percentage was much higher than the corresponding figure in the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation and the World Health Organisation. Yet a further $100,000 would be paid into the Fund by assessment on member States through the 1966 budget. This was entirely unwarranted, especially as miscellaneous income would henceforth be paid each year directly into the Working Capital Fund. This procedure would ensure for the future a further rise in the level of the Working Capital Fund relative to the level of the I.L.O.'s budget.
77. About $1 million of the increase in the 1966 budget was related to staff costs, following a similar level of increase in the 1965 budget under the same item. In view of the fact that the increase in the number of posts provided for in the 1966 budget was only 3 1/2 per cent., it was evident that the bulk of the increase in this item stemmed from rises in salaries. His Government was unable to agree to such a sharp increase in this respect and felt that the estimate for this item should be maintained at the level of the corresponding 1965 credit. If this had been done, his Government could have supported the budget proposals for 1966.

78. Byelorussia regularly paid its financial contributions to the budget of the Organisation. Accordingly it expected that no discrimination would be levied against its Workers' and Employers' representatives. In this connection, he hoped that the real interests of the Organisation as a whole would eventually gain the upper hand through the ending of such discrimination.

79. The representative of Japan indicated his Government's satisfaction at the unanimous agreement on the budget proposals that had been reached in the Governing Body. His Government was prepared to give its full support to the proposed budget for 1966.

80. The representative of France said that as a result of the compromise budget that had emerged following the budget debate in the Financial and Administrative Committee, his Government was in a position to vote in favour of the proposed budget now before the Committee. France attached considerable importance to the work of the I.L.O. in the field of technical co-operation and assistance to the developing countries. This work justified the financial sacrifice that the highly industrialised countries were called upon to make through their contributions to the budget of the I.L.O. It was in the interest of the Organisation and of the furtherance of its work that such countries should adopt a strict and rigorous attitude to the budget estimates. His Government's adoption of such a line did not mean that it sought to reduce the activities of the Organisation; it felt rather that the Office should be able to increase its programme of activities through rationalisation of its work methods and better use of its present staff resources without unduly increasing its expenditure. The increases in the staff establishment in recent years had alarmed the French Government. Increases in the number of staff did not necessarily lead to a corresponding increase in the effectiveness of the work of the Organisation. It was essential that the growth of the annual budget should be kept within reasonable limits; increases of 5 or 6 per cent. each year would correspond more closely with the economic growth of the major contributors to the budget and would provide for the further development of the Organisation's work, especially in the important field of technical assistance. He hoped that the Director-General would take full account of these comments in preparing his 1967 budget estimates.

81. The representative of China thanked the Director-General for his clear presentation of the 1966 budget proposals and expressed his Government's approval of the policy of gradually increasing the Organisation's activities. The increase in the level of the 1966 budget had been at a significantly lower rate than in the preceding year; this indicated that the Director-General had made a real effort to keep the rate of increase in the budget within reasonable limits, as requested by the member States. His Government had been pleased to note the increases provided in 1966 for operational activities, but felt it important that the Office should ensure a fully effective utilisation of the financial resources available for these activities. His Government had been particularly pleased to note that the 1966 budget would provide for the first time for a meeting of the Asian Advisory Committee in an Asian country, and it would give its full support to the 1966 budget.

82. The representative of Nigeria said that the consensus of the Committee appeared to be that the level of the budget was increasing too rapidly. Serious consideration should be given to regulating the rate of increase in the future. The expenditure on staff salaries was extremely high in relation to the funds provided under other items of the budget. He felt that there was room for savings under a number of items, including that for temporary staff assistance. He had noted that the provision under this heading had been increased because the Director-General had not so far been able to determine with any degree of certainty the future staff requirements of the new field structure. It was always dangerous to provide for the recruitment of temporary staff; the real need in this connection was for a careful and thorough assessment of the workload involved in embarking on new activities, such as the development of the future field structure of the Organisation. A proper assessment of work requirements should eliminate the need for temporary staff assistance. Finally, the Director-General should give greater consideration to the desirability of recruiting more staff from the African countries.

83. The representative of Czechoslovakia said that the 1966 budget provided for a more reasonable rate of increase than that of the previous year, which itself, as he had pointed out to the Committee a year ago, had not been in keeping with the recommendations made by the United Nations for a stabilisation in the budgets of the specialised agencies. In view of this fact, his Government would have given its support to the 1966 budget had it not been for the marked discrimination against the socialist countries, and especially against their Employers' and Workers' representatives at the present Conference. The facts concerning this discrimination had been described by several previous speakers and it was therefore unnecessary to repeat them. Because of this discrimination, his Government could not vote in favour of the budget. Moreover, it reserved the right to harden its attitude to the budget even further if the discrimination were to continue.

84. The representative of the Malagasy Republic expressed his Government's concern at the rate of increase in the level of the budget in recent years. This increase had meant that his Government's contribution in terms of cash had risen by 80 per cent since 1962. This rate of increase had given rise to financial difficulties in the developing countries, including the Malagasy Republic. The increases in the estimates for meetings, staff and related costs and travel on official business together absorbed more than 80 per cent of the total increase in the budget over that for 1963. The expenditure under these headings was of little direct benefit to the member States. Moreover, the increase in the provision for operational activities was small compared with the rise in staff costs. In the light of the need for further planning of the work of the Organisation, serious consideration should be given to the many suggestions that had been put forward in favour of holding the Conference once every two years and of adopting a two-year budget for the I.L.O. in the future. With regard to the plans for building new and enlarged premises for the I.L.O. in Geneva, his Government felt that the future decentralisation of the work of the Organisation, which was essential, could be expected to lead to a corresponding reduction in staff and accommodation needs at Headquarters.

85. The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany indicated that, having regard to the thorough examination of the budget that had taken place in the Financial and Administrative Committee and the revised estimates that had emerged therefrom, his Government would give its full support to the 1966 budget.

86. The representative of Algeria associated himself with the concern that had been expressed over the 1966 budget proposals by the representative of Byelorussia. However, his Government was confident that the Director-General would carefully heed the comments made in the Committee when preparing his future budget estimates. He was therefore in a position to support the adoption of the 1966 budget.

87. The representative of the United States indicated that his Government had played a full part in the Governing Body in developing the budget proposals for 1966 now before the Committee. His Government believed that these proposals represented a sound budget and was prepared to give its full support to them.

88. The representative of Cameroon recalled that the African member States had played a leading part in advocating a decentralisation of the work of the I.L.O. The intended decentralisation should enable the Office to grapple more effectively in future with the problems facing the developing countries. As the first steps were now being taken to develop the field structure of the Organisation, it was normal to expect increases in the budget in reflection of this development. The greater part of the increase in the 1966 budget was, however, devoted to Headquarters staff costs. It would be preferable to reorientate these increases to a strengthening of the staff of the Organisation's regional offices. He shared the anxiety of the representative of the Malagasy Republic at the proposals to erect a costly new Headquarters building in Geneva at the very time when a major decentralisation of the work and structure of the Organisation was beginning. He hoped that this decentralisation would be really effective and that the regional offices to be established would soon be given the power to take major decisions concerning the work of the I.L.O. in their respective regions.

89. The Committee then adopted each of the budget items Nos. 1 to 26 in the amounts corresponding to those listed in the extreme right-hand column of the summary of the proposed expenditure budget for 1966.1

90. The Committee then adopted the total gross expenditure budget (Parts I-III) amounting to $21,034,412, subject to the abstentions and reservations indicated by the representatives of certain governments as recorded individually above. It also adopted, subject to the same abstentions and reservations, the total net expenditure budget, which, after deduction of the estimated miscellaneous income of $696,541, amounts to $20,337,871.

(4) Second Report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives. 2

1. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives held further meetings on 12 and 14 June 1965.

I. INCOME BUDGET FOR 1966

2. The Committee had before it (a) the first report of the Allocations Committee as adopted by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session on 29 May 1965, 3 and (b) the second report of the Allocations Committee, 4 which had been submitted direct to the Finance Committee of Government Representatives under an authorisation given by the Governing Body at its 162nd Session.

3. The Committee noted that the Chairman of the Allocations Committee had consulted representatives of the Governments of Zambia, Malta, Malawi and Yemen respectively, and that the representatives of the Governments of each of these States had signified that they were in agreement with the proposed percentage assessment (0.12 per cent. in each case) of the contributions to the budget of the I.L.O. of their respective countries.

Appendix IV: Financial and Budgetary Questions

4. At the end of the second report of the Allocations Committee 1 was a draft scale of contributions to the budget for 1966, based on the 1965 scale as approved by the Conference, varied to take into account on the one hand the withdrawal from the Organisation of the Republic of South Africa and on the other hand the assessment of the contributions of the four States, referred to in the preceding paragraph, which had joined the Organisation since the adoption of the 1965 scale by the Conference.

5. Mr. Tzankov (Bulgaria), the Chairman of the Allocations Committee, introducing its second report, recalled that for many years past the I.L.O. scale of contributions had been modified annually to take into account the inclusion in the scale of the assessments of new member States in accordance with criteria long established by the Allocations Committee and endorsed by the Governing Body and the Conference. In considering the 1966 scale the Allocations Committee had faced an entirely new situation caused by the withdrawal of South Africa from the Organisation. In the special situation thus created the Allocations Committee had been faced with a difficult and complex problem and after much discussion had adopted an ad hoc solution in formulating its recommendation as to the structure of the 1966 scale of contributions.

6. The conclusion of the Committee on the 1966 scale, though it by no means satisfied all members, had nevertheless been accepted by all. It constituted a delicate balance of agreement. He hoped that the members of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives, even those who might feel that the proposals of the Allocations Committee embodied certain disadvantages or should be reviewed or revised in future, would show the same spirit of co-operation as had been manifest in the Allocations Committee and would accordingly accept its recommendations.

7. Paragraphs 49 to 59 of the second report of the Allocations Committee recorded a discussion which had taken place concerning the possibility of undertaking a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions. In the light of the many different points of view expressed on this matter the Allocations Committee had decided to consider it further at its next meeting. In the meantime the Chairman of the Allocations Committee asked the Finance Committee of Government Representatives to accept unanimously the Allocations Committee's recommendation concerning the 1966 scale of contributions.

8. In the course of the ensuing discussion many speakers thanked the Chairman of the Allocations Committee for his clear and objective presentation of the difficulties and complexities of the problem that it had faced in reaching its conclusions on the 1966 scale of contributions.

9. The representative of Brazil recalled the views that his Government had expressed at the 48th Session of the Conference with regard to the 1965 scale of contributions. At that time, his Government had emphasised the need for greater harmony between the I.L.O. and the United Nations scales of contributions, in conformity with the principle adopted by the Governing Body that the I.L.O. scale should be brought as far as possible into line with the United Nations scale.

10. The draft scale for 1966 now before the Committee failed to reflect any real progress towards the implementation of this principle. Almost all of the unsatisfactory features of the 1965 scale were maintained in that proposed for 1966. His Government was at a loss to understand why so little progress had been made in furthering the implementation of the accepted principle. The draft 1966 scale contained, besides the 60 contributions assessed at the minimum rate, a further 36 assessments that were at higher percentages in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale.

11. The Brazilian Government could not condone the disparities between the two scales in the light of the fact that the United Nations scale was the result of long and careful study by an expert body. The I.L.O. had explicitly acknowledged the merit of the work of this expert body by regarding the United Nations scale as the ultimate objective towards which the I.L.O. scale should move. The United Nations Committee on Contributions used objective data on the economic conditions of contributing States with a view to determining the relative capacity to pay of each State. That Committee had recently undertaken the complex task of devising a method to establish a reasonable degree of comparability between the statistics for the national incomes of countries using the national accounts system and those using the material product system. The special financial and economic problems of the developing countries had also been the subject of a close scrutiny by the United Nations Committee, in the scale it had recommended embodied the outcome of its deliberations on this important question.

12. The representative of Brazil wondered whether the I.L.O. draft scale were half as much concerned with accuracy and equity as the United Nations scale. The assessment recommended by the Allocations Committee for Brazil's contribution to the 1966 budget amounted to 1.32 per cent.; yet in the United Nations scale Brazil's assessment was at 0.95 per cent. This meant that, on the basis of the 1966 budget as recommended for adoption by the Conference, Brazil would have to contribute approximately $75,000 more to the I.L.O. budget than it would if its contribution were assessed at the same rate as in the United Nations scale. Members of the Committee would, therefore, understand the anxiety of the Brazilian Government and many other governments in a similar situation, especially in the light of the rapid increase in the level of I.L.O.'s budget in recent years. He would accordingly be compelled to vote against the approval of the draft scale of contributions for 1966.

13. It appeared from the report of the Allocations Committee that some governments held the view that steps to bring the I.L.O. scale closer to the United Nations scale should be taken only when new States joined the Organisation. His Government firmly rejected such an approach as it gave little hope of achieving any real progress towards aligning the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations. A positive effort should therefore be made without further delay to re-apportion the assessments of the contributions of the I.L.O.'s member States, independently of the opportunities created by the admission of new Members.

14. A number of governments in past years had indicated their conviction that the I.L.O. scale did not reflect the capacity to pay of member States. Several governments, particularly among the developing countries, had felt for some time that they were being over-taxed. It was in the interests of the Organisation that these feelings and convictions be duly taken into account. The Brazilian delegation believed that if the Organisation took much longer to do so it would appear that only polite but ineffectual lip service was being paid to the general policy of bringing the I.L.O. scale closer to the United Nations scale.

15. His Government was aware of the difficulties that had faced the Allocations Committee in developing a scale for 1966, which from the point of view of the scale itself were only of minor importance, since the admission of four new members had offset in a large part the problem created by the withdrawal of South Africa from the Organisation. At the same time, his delegation had been gratified to note that suggestions had been made in the Allocations Committee in favour of a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale. There was strong merit in these suggestions, and a thorough study of the position by the Office would be of great assistance towards the implementation of the policy of aligning the I.L.O. scale with the United Nations scale.

16. He wished formally to propose on behalf of the Brazilian Government that the Committee recommend to the Conference that it request the Governing Body to explore all possible ways leading to substantial progress towards bringing the 1967 I.L.O. scale of assessments into closer conformity with the United Nations scale for the same year.

17. In submitting this formal proposal his Government was fully aware that total uniformity between the two scales might be a long way off, because of a number of fundamental peculiarities of the I.L.O. scale, such as its maximum and minimum rates of contribution. These peculiarities should not discourage the Committee in its efforts. The time might come when the United States Government would be prepared to accept an increase in its rate of assessment; representatives of the United States had often expressed their goodwill on the matter in the past. Moreover, in the proposed study of the problem the Governing Body, the Allocations Committee and the Office might find it useful to bear in mind not only the temporary nature of the 1966 scale, as stressed throughout the report of the Allocations Committee, but also that, even if the assessments of the two largest contributors were left aside, the difference between the I.L.O. and United Nations assessments of the remaining States assessed at lower rates in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale was of the order of 8 per cent.

18. In conclusion he urged the Committee to give careful attention to his Government's proposal in the certainty that its adoption would lend more realism and more fairness to the income budget of the I.L.O. The adoption of this proposal would also allay to some extent the legitimate concern at present felt by several member States over the financial burden that they were unduly shouldering, and would thereby add to the strength of the Organisation itself.

19. The representative of Uruguay said that the arguments put forward by the representative of Brazil in favour of a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions were fully convincing. He could see no reason why the I.L.O. scale should not be brought as fully as possible into line with that of the United Nations at the earliest possible moment. Equity and justice demanded such an alignment of the two scales; in particular, the developing countries and other countries which were lagging behind the highly industrialised countries in economic progress should not be called upon to pay at higher rates than in the United Nations scale. He recalled that in 1963 his Government had put forward many of the arguments now presented by the representative of Brazil. He had great pleasure in seconding the formal proposal made by the representative of Brazil.

20. The representative of Chile also expressed his support of this proposal, which was based on international social justice. The proposal took full account of the needs and preoccupations of the developing countries; and a major revision of the I.L.O. scale to establish it on a more equitable basis was essential for the future development of the Organisation.

21. The representative of Senegal drew attention to the financial difficulties of the developing countries, especially the African countries. These States were very much pre-occupied with trying to develop their own economies, and their limited financial resources had necessarily to be devoted as far as possible to seeking ways of increasing national production. The I.L.O. and other international organisations should take into account as soon as possible both the needs and the financial difficulties of the developing countries. However, fixing a scale of contributions was a purely technical problem; the expenses of the Organisation should be shared amongst the member States in accordance with their relative capacity to pay.

22. A more important factor bearing on the problem of contributions of member States was the level of the Organisation's budget and the nature of its component parts. All items that were not essential for the efficient functioning of the Organisation should be eliminated. There was at the present time a great disparity between the salaries of international officials and those of national civil servants, especially those of the developing countries. Because of this disparity the intellectual elite of these developing countries tended to seek employment with the international organisations, whereas they would be better engaged in participating directly in the development of their countries' national economies. Because the developing countries tended to lose their best brains to the international organisations, they also overvalued their diplomatic assistance from the very same organisations in their struggle for economic and social advancement. The Organisation should therefore give serious consideration to the question of the level of salaries paid to its staff and to the desirability of changing the classical methods still being employed in developing the annual budget.

23. The representative of the United Kingdom said that the scale of contributions for 1966 that had resulted from the Allocations Committee's conclusions reflected a number of interrelated elements of compromise. He wished to maintain the reservations made by his Government in the Allocations Committee on the solution adopted for 1966 because of some of the elements of this compromise. The essence of the solution was the setting off of the relief arising from the assessments of the contributions of the new member States against the additional burden caused by the withdrawal of South Africa from the Organisation. This element of the compromise was acceptable to his Government. The illogical element was that which provided for further relief that would arise from the assessments of new member States in succeeding years to be used in the first place to restore to their former levels the assessments increased in the 1966 scale. This represented a complete reversal of the accepted principle that the I.L.O. scale should move closer towards the United Nations scale at every possible opportunity. However, as the scale recommended by the Allocations Committee was to be operative for 1966 only, he would not formally oppose its adoption.

24. As for the long-term problem, his Government held the view that the I.L.O. scale of contributions should move progressively towards the United Nations scale. Because the United Kingdom's contribution was assessed at a much higher rate in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations, his Government could legitimately hope to derive a small measure of financial benefit from a comprehensive revision of the I.L.O. scale. His Government recognised the extraordinarily complex nature of the whole problem, which would require a full examination of all its aspects. He felt that this examination should be left to the Allocations Committee, which was the body competent to deal with the question. He could see serious disadvantages in the representative of Brazil's formal proposal that the Conference be requested to instruct the Governing Body to undertake a major revision of the scale of contributions with a view to reaching a conclusion on the matter in 1967, as this would tie the hands of the Allocations Committee.

25. The representative of Spain expressed his support of the representatives of Brazil's proposal. An alignment of the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations was desirable in the interests of equity. The United Nations scale took account of the fact that the developing countries were striving as best they could to develop their own economies. There were many disparities between the I.L.O. and the United Nations scales. For example, the contribution of Spain was assessed at a higher percentage of the I.L.O. scale. This difference between its I.L.O. and United Nations assessments meant that for 1966 Spain would pay approximately $60,000 more to the I.L.O. than it would if the assessments were equal. This problem had to be considered in the light of the fact that the expanding work of the I.L.O. inevitably led to increases in the budget from year to year and hence in the contributions of member States. It should also be borne in mind that some governments contributing to the I.L.O.'s budget were debarred from participating in much of the work of the Organisation in a systematic way, doubtless from political motives which were totally alien to and incompatible with the spirit of international co-operation that should inspire the work of the I.L.O. This discrimination was particularly evident in relation to participation in the work of Industrial Committees and other bodies. His Government was also concerned because some of the funds placed at the I.L.O.'s disposal were not used effectively in furthering the Organisation's objectives. This applied to much of the I.L.O.'s documentation, which served to promote political campaigns. His Government was disinclined to make financial sacrifices for this purpose. Finally his Government was disposed in principle to approve the 1966 scale of contributions, but would be obliged to adopt a less favourable attitude in future towards the budget of the Organisation if such discriminatory practices were to persist.

26. The representative of India said that the second report of the Allocations Committee reflected the difficult and complex task that had been resolved in a spirit of compromise by the members of that Committee. He wished to maintain his Government's reservations concerning the temporary nature of the increases in the assessments of member States reflected in the 1966 scale. In his view the relief that would arise from the entry of further States into the Organisation should not be used to restore these increased assessments to their former levels.

27. He supported the idea behind the proposal of the representative of Brazil that the Governing Body should explore all possible means to effect an equalisation between the I.L.O. and the United Nations scales. As was reflected in its second report, the Allocations Committee intended to take up this question again at an early session of the Governing Body. He hoped that a satisfactory solution would soon be reached. In this connection it was evident that the movement of the I.L.O. scale towards that of the United Nations could not be effected only by distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new member States. The opportunities thus afforded would
28. The representative of the U.S.S.R. said that, of the two problems that had faced the Allocations Committee, the long-term problem of the future structure of the I.L.O. scale was the more important and was fraught with the more delicate and complex issues. The short-term problem of the 1966 scale had been resolved in the Allocations Committee as a result of a compromise, and his Government maintained the reservations that it had expressed in the Allocations Committee regarding this compromise solution.

29. He had noted the arguments put forward by the representative of Brazil in making his proposal. He shared the anxiety that had been expressed concerning the continuing increases in the amounts of Members' contributions. The problem was of particular importance to the developing countries, whose financial resources were limited, and to those countries whose currencies were not convertible into the hard currency to which contributions to the I.L.O. budget had to be paid. In the case of his country, for instance, the figures of national income growth had little to do with the resources of foreign currency from which the money for paying contributions to the I.L.O. budget had to be drawn. He wondered, however, whether the real problem was only that of adjusting the scale of contributions. On entering the Organisation, each member State had accepted a certain percentage assessment for its contribution to the budget. The assessments of the contributions of many member States had been progressively reduced since they had joined the Organisation as a result of the influx of new Members. Brazil's contribution, for example, fell into this category. The assessments of other States had not changed since they joined the Organisation. These States had not therefore benefited financially from the assessments on newly joining Members. The real difficulty facing member States was the fact that their contributions, payable in United States dollars, were increasing in amount year by year as a result of the growth in the budget. Here was the heart of the problem, as had been stated by the representative of Senegal. The small increases in the assessments of some Members in the 1966 scale had given rise to considerable difficulty. The U.S.S.R. Government viewed with concern the possibility of a major review of the I.L.O. scale if such a review were to be based on a purely arithmetical comparison with the United Nations scale. The socialist countries in particular, many of which had not benefited in the I.L.O. scale from the influx of new Members, would be called upon to bear an even heavier burden in future years. While his Government had accepted with reservations the 1966 scale as a purely temporary ad hoc solution, it felt that any further revision of the scale would not solve the fact of the major revision would introduce an important and very controversial element into the I.L.O.'s budgetary practice, namely an increase in the percentage assessments of certain Members, while the criteria applied so far in adjusting the I.L.O. scale from year to year had resulted only in lightening the burden on some member States.

30. The representative of the Federal Republic of Germany said that his Government was prepared to support the 1966 scale of contributions. He felt that the United Kingdom representative had clearly pointed out the disadvantages that would result in an acceptance of the formula proposed by the representative of Brazil, and he supported the United Kingdom representative's views in this matter. He had also followed with great interest the arguments put forward by the representative of the U.S.S.R. and shared his views to a great extent.

31. The representative of France indicated that the discussion had led to the emergence of two major conclusions. The first was that the 1966 scale was acceptable as a temporary measure and that its adoption would be without prejudice to future adjustments in the scale. The second conclusion generally accepted was that the forward a clear need to examine how the I.L.O. scale should be revised in the future.

32. He agreed that the scale alone was not the only factor involved in the long-term problem; another major factor was the increase in the United States budget. Strict budgeting was essential if the I.L.O. were to develop its future activities satisfactorily. The expenses of the Organisation should be shared as equitably as possible between the member States. For the past 20 years the accepted criteria had been that the I.L.O. scale should move progressively towards the United Nations scale as far as possible at every suitable opportunity. Complete alignment of the two scales had not been found practicable so far because of the fundamental differences between the maximum and minimum rates of contribution in the two scales and because, while some Members paid at higher rates in the I.L.O., others paid at higher rates in the United Nations. He felt that if the two States assessed at the highest rates, the United States and the U.S.S.R., could accept an increase in their rates to bring them more into line with their United Nations assessments, the remainder of the problem would be easily solved. He recognised that the United States made voluntary contributions to the Organisation's activities financed under the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and the Special Fund at a much higher rate than that of its assessed contribution to the regular budget. He also recognised the difficulties facing the U.S.S.R. in having to pay its contributions in United States dollars. The problem was therefore not easy to solve. Any increase in the two highest rates of contribution must necessarily be preceded by long and close negotiations with the governments concerned in order to seek their agreement. This question was not new; it had been examined over a period of years by the Allocations Committee, and despite the good will of the United States Government in the matter no action had been taken because the percentage contribution that it was able to pay could not be increased without the formal approval of the United States Congress.

33. Aside from the maximum and minimum rates, however, it should be possible to examine whether the present assessments of member States were equitable. These assessments had in most cases been fixed many years ago, since when a number of States in particular had enjoyed growing prosperity, while others had lagged behind. The former category of States should be prepared to accept increases in their rates of assessment.

34. The Governing Body should therefore be asked to explore the possibilities of revising the I.L.O. scale, as had been proposed by the representative of Brazil. This problem concerned all the organisations in the United Nations family, and would require full co-ordination with the other organisations and with governments. While he appreciated that the intensive studies and negotiations that would be involved would take time, the work should nevertheless proceed as quickly as possible in order to arrive at an equitable scale of contributions for the I.L.O. in accordance with the established principle that this scale should be aligned with that of the United Nations as far as possible.

35. The representative of Argentina said that all members of the Committee must by now have appreciated the concern felt at the disparities between the United Nations and the I.L.O. scales of contributions. A mere glance at the two scales was sufficient to bring out the differences in the assessments of a very large number of States. Most of the Latin American countries were assessed at higher rates in the I.L.O. than in the United Nations. A number of Latin American countries were also assessed at higher rates than some of the highly industrialised Western European countries. Again, some Latin American countries were assessed at higher rates than a number of the highly developed socialist countries. This situation was unjustifiable and should be rectified as soon as possible. The efforts made so far by the Allocations Committee to align the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations had been slight and had shown little result. After examining various alternative scales, the Allocations Committee had just recommended the adoption of a draft scale for 1966 which did not satisfy the Argentine Government. The Allocations Committee had not taken account of the injustices in the present scale. The process of alignment with the United Nations scale should be speeded up, and to this end he felt that acceptance of the proposal of the representative of Brazil could bring rapid and satisfactory results.

36. The representative of New Zealand said that his Government would naturally welcome an alignment of the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations, as New Zealand was at present assessed at a higher rate in the I.L.O. scale. However, having witnessed almost identical debates over the past 18 years, he felt that there was little real prospect of achieving full alignment of the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations. He was also of the opinion that there would be little use in recommending that the Conference instruct the Governing Body to take action which would be merely a reaffirmation of the principles which it already accepted and applied as far as possible. As regards the 1966 scale he shared the reservations of the United Kingdom representative concerning the temporary nature of the increases in the assessments that would result from the adoption of the Allocations Committee's recommendations.

37. The representative of India felt that the Finance Committee of Government Representatives as a whole was agreed that the continuing increase in the level of the budget was a major element in the problem of determining the scale of contributions, especially for countries that had difficulty in earning hard currency. There also appeared to be unanimity of opinion that the I.L.O. had reached a stage when it must grapple as effectively as possible with the acknowledged disparities between the I.L.O. and United Nations scales of contribution. However, in the light of the diversity of opinion on the various elements of the problem that had emerged from the discussion, as well as the intensity with which these opinions had been expressed, he felt that it would be premature to ask the present session of the Conference to issue at such short notice formal instructions to the Governing Body to undertake a major revision of the I.L.O. scale of contributions. It was desirable to give the Allocations Committee time for the intensive background studies necessary for proper consideration of the various aspects of the problem by the Allocations Committee, and time for governments to consult on the matter.

38. The representative of Algeria pointed out that the total assessments of the African member States were together much higher than the same States' United Nations assessments. Twenty-seven of the African States were assessed at 0.12 per cent. in the I.L.O. scale, which was three times their United Nations assessment. There was clearly an injustice here, as the United Nations scale was established and revised from time to time on the basis of national income and relative capacity to pay. The United Nations scale also took account of the progressive widening of the gap in economic progress and prosperity that lay between the so-called developing countries and those that were already highly industrialised. The proposed revision of the I.L.O. scale should also take into account the incidence of the progressive growth in the budget on the cash contributions of member States. The revision should also take account of the need to adjust the maximum and minimum rates of contribution in the I.L.O. scale. For these reasons, he warmly supported the proposal of the representative of Brazil.

39. The representative of the United States said that his Government was prepared to support the 1966 scale of contributions recommended by the Allocations Committee, while recognising that this scale should be valid for 1966 only.

40. The concern expressed by many governments over the present disparities between the I.L.O. and the United Nations scales and over the difficulties inherent in trying to achieve an alignment between the two scales had been very much in the minds of the members of the Allocations Committee. He had been particularly impressed by the opinion of the United Kingdom representative that it was necessary to approach the long-range problem without tying the hands of either the Allocations Committee or the Governing Body by recommending that the Conference issue specific instructions to the Governing Body to undertake a major revision of the I.L.O. scale in time for the conclusions thereon to be reflected in the 1967 scale. Many complex factors would have to be taken into account in studying the problem; it was not merely an arithmetical question, and sufficient time should be available for the numerous consultations that would have to take place before full agreement could be reached. In the present circumstances, and for reasons that were recorded in the second report of the Allocations Committee, it would be extremely difficult for his Government to associate itself with the concrete proposal put forward by the representative of Brazil. He urged that the Finance Committee of Government Representatives take note of the expressed intention of the Allocations Committee to give further consideration to the possibility of undertaking a major review of the I.L.O. scale, thus leaving the Allocations Committee entirely free in the matter.

41. The representative of Brazil said that the discussion in the Committee had illustrated that the reasons behind his proposal were well founded. In his view the adoption of this proposal would not tie the hands of the Allocations Committee, which would be free to examine every aspect of the problem of revising the I.L.O. scale and to explore all the various possibilities with a view to reaching an equitable conclusion. The proposal merely reflected the long-accepted principle that the United Nations scale of contributions was the most equitable scale that had been devised and that this scale should consequently be used as a yardstick for the I.L.O. scale. If nothing were done about the matter now, there was a serious risk that the very same problem would recur at next year’s Conference.

42. The representative of France said that although different shades of opinion over details were held by different members of the Committee there was no fundamental conflict as to the desirability of undertaking a major review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions. In essence the proposal of the representative of Brazil corresponded very closely with the intention expressed by the Allocations Committee to give further consideration to the whole question at the November session of the Governing Body. He suggested that a formula acceptable to all members of the Committee would be to record the proposal of the representative of Brazil in the Committee’s report, as well as taking note of the expressed intention of the Allocations Committee.

43. The representative of Australia said that his Government, while not wishing to contribute to the I.L.O. budget at a higher rate than was necessary or equitable, was fully conscious of the fact that some member States found their contributions particularly onerous. He favored the proposal of the representative of France as being the best way to satisfy the different governments’ wishes at the present stage, as it took account of all the complexities of the problem to be solved. In the light of these very complexities he was disinclined to take precipitate action on the matter, and his Government would have great difficulty in accepting the view that the Committee should put forward a formal recommendation to the Conference to give specific instructions to the Governing Body concerning the 1967 scale.

44. The representative of Ukraine indicated that his Government was one of those being called upon to support an increased assessment in the 1966 scale of contributions recommended by the Allocations Committee. That Committee had experienced considerable difficulty in reaching its delicately balanced compromise solution on an ad hoc basis for 1966. Wide divergences of opinion were also evidently held by different members of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives; he shared the view of those members who had urged that no precipitate action be taken at the present stage. Any long-range study of the I.L.O. scale should take account of the effect on the contributions of member States of the continuing growth in the level of the budget. This factor was particularly important to the socialist countries, many of which were assessed at high rates of contribution although they were denied the right to participate fully in the work of the I.L.O. He felt that the best course to take would be for the Committee to endorse the text of the last paragraph of the second report of the Allocations Committee, which represented a compromise that should be acceptable to all members of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

45. In the light of the differing views held by various members, the Committee decided to adjourn in order to allow time for consultations to be undertaken with a view to reaching a conclusion that could be accepted by all members.

46. On reconvening, the Committee had before it a proposal submitted by the representative of France to insert in the report a text consisting of three paragraphs designed to reflect the Committee’s wishes concerning the future action to be taken in regard to the possible consideration of a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions.

47. Several speakers paid tribute to the efforts made by the representative of France with a view to reaching a formula that would be unanimously acceptable to the Committee.

48. Mr. Tzankov, representative of Bulgaria and Chairman of the Allocations Committee, speaking in the latter capacity, favoured leaving the Allocations Committee entirely free to explore and examine all aspects of the problem. In his view, the text proposed by the representative of France appeared to tie the hands of the Allocations Committee by setting in advance a specific objective towards which it should seek to move. Accordingly he suggested that the Committee reproduce the text of its last paragraph and thereby leaving the Allocations Committee entirely free to examine all the elements of the problem while taking account of all the different views that had been expressed concerning it in the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

49. The representative of Brazil indicated that in the consultations which had taken place his Government had shown its willingness to reach a formula that would be capable of unanimous acceptance in the Committee. The proposed text put forward by the representative of France did not give entire satisfaction to the Brazilian Government, which firmly believed that any delay in making substantial progress in bringing the I.L.O. scale more into line with the United Nations scale in order to produce a scale as equitable as possible to all Members would be detrimental to the whole Organisation. Nevertheless, in the light of his trust that the formula proposed by the representative of France would ensure that serious studies of the problem would be undertaken, and subject to unanimous agreement being reached in the Committee on this formula, he was prepared, in a spirit of compromise, to withdraw his own proposal recorded in paragraph 16 above in favour of the proposal of the representative of France.

50. Several speakers expressed their appreciation of the constructive spirit displayed by the representative of Brazil.

51. A number of speakers felt that acceptance of the proposal of the representative of France would not tie the hands of the Allocations Committee in any way; neither would such acceptance prejudice any solution that might emerge from the Allocations Committee's future examination of the problem. These members agreed that sufficient time should be allowed for the necessary study and preparation of the background information that the Allocations Committee would require. The Allocations Committee would be free to set the guidelines for the studies that it would recommend to be undertaken by the Office. At the same time the Allocations Committee would be expected to take account of all the different views that had been expressed in the Finance Committee of Government Representatives at its present session. The United States and U.S.S.R. members pointed out that their acceptance of the proposal of the representative of France would in no way commit their Governments to change their respective policies in regard to the rate of their contributions to the I.L.O. budget. It was on this understanding that they were able to accept the proposal. Another member felt that all were agreed on the need for a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale and that the ultimate objective of such a review should be for this scale to approach the United Nations scale as far as possible.

52. Other members of the Committee supported the view expressed by the Chairman of the Allocations Committee that the formula proposed by the representative of France would, in fact, tie the hands of the Allocations Committee to the purely arithmetical objective of aligning the I.L.O. scale with that of the United Nations without taking account of other factors bearing on the problem. For example, such limitation in the objective would fail to take account of the unique tripartite character and structure of the I.L.O. This unique structure meant that the United Nations scale of contributions did not necessarily constitute a yardstick with which the I.L.O. scale should be compared.

53. The representative of France indicated that it had not been his intention, nor that of the various members he had consulted, that the formula he had proposed should in any way tie the hands of the Allocations Committee. Its acceptance would constitute a request that the Allocations Committee study the problem in all its aspects having regard to all the viewpoints that had been expressed and to the need for study, consultation and negotiation with governments and other international organisations. The proposed formula did not even ask that the Allocations Committee reach a solution in one year's time; it merely requested that the Finance Committee of Government Representatives be informed next year of the progress made in tackling the problem.

54. Following this discussion the Committee held a further recess in order to allow for new consultations with a view to reaching agreement on a text to be included in its report.

55. After the recess the Committee agreed, subject to the reservations of the representatives of the U.S.S.R. and Uruguay as recorded below to include in its report the text of paragraphs 56 to 58 which follow.

56. The Committee took note of the statements made in support of the proposal of Brazil that the Governing Body explore all possible ways leading to substantial progress towards bringing the 1967 I.L.O. scale of contributions into closer conformity with the United Nations scale for the same year. The Committee also took note of differing points of view expressed by other speakers.

57. The Committee also noted that the Allocations Committee had decided to request the Governing Body, at its meeting following the Conference, to convene the Allocations Committee on the occasion of its 163rd Session of the Governing Body (November 1965), to consider whether the Allocations Committee wished the Office to undertake background work that would be required as a preliminary to any major review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions.

58. The Finance Committee of Government Representatives recommends that the Allocations Committee should meet in November 1965 to consider studies and background work that would be required with respect to achieving early and substantial progress towards improving the I.L.O. scale, particularly towards bringing the I.L.O. scale of contributions into closer conformity with the United Nations scale. It further expects to be informed of progress made in this respect at the 50th Session of the Conference.

59. The representative of the U.S.S.R. expressed a reservation in respect of paragraph 58. He would have preferred to have inserted in place of the words "with respect to" the words "in order to explore the possibility of".
60. The representative of Uruguay expressed a reservation concerning the last sentence of paragraph 56 above, which he felt was unnecessary as it added nothing to the value of the text.

61. The Committee then adopted, subject to the opposition of the representative of Brazil, the scale of contributions for 1966 as recommended by the Allocations Committee and appended to this report.

62. The first report of the Finance Committee of Government Representatives records in paragraph 90 the Committee's adoption of the gross and net expenditure budgets for 1966, subject to the abstentions and reservations indicated by the representatives of certain governments as recorded individually in the Committee's first report.

63. Subject to the same abstentions and reservations and to the opposition of the representative of Brazil to the scale of contributions for 1966, the Committee then adopted the resolution set forth below for submission to the Conference for the adoption of the budget for the 48th financial period (1966): and for the allocation of expenses among member States for 1966:

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—

In virtue of the Financial Regulations, passes for the 48th financial period, ending 31 December 1966, the net budget of expenditure of the International Labour Organisation amounting to $20,337,871 and the net budget of income amounting to $20,337,871 and resolves that the budget of income from member States shall be allocated among them in accordance with the scale of contributions recommended by the Finance Committee of Government Representatives.

64. A table showing the expenditure and income budgets for 1966 follows this report. A statement showing the scale of contributions for 1966 and the gross and net contributions due from each member State in 1966 as recommended by the Committee for the approval of the Conference will be found immediately after the table. A summary of the items contained in the proposed expenditure budget is contained in the further proposals submitted by the Governing Body.1

ANNEX

SECOND REPORT OF THE ALLOCATIONS COMMITTEE

1. The Allocations Committee, which had met on 27 May 1965, held further meetings on 1, 7 and 8 June 1965 under the chairmanship of Mr. A. Tzankov (Bulgaria).

Scale of Contributions to the Budget for the Financial Year 1966

2. The Committee gave further consideration to the question of the scale of contributions to the budget for 1966 that it had to recommend for adoption by the Director-General at the Committee's meeting on 27 May 1965, and the alternative suggestion that had been put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member, together with the scale that would result from the application of the latter proposal.

3. The French Government member said that he had given very careful consideration to the suggestion that had been advanced by the U.S.S.R. Government member at the Committee's meeting on 27 May, and to the scale of contributions that would result from applying this suggestion. The U.S.S.R. suggestion appeared to rest on the supposition that further States would join the I.L.O. in future years. However, he felt some doubt as to whether very many more States could possibly join the I.L.O. in the coming years, as there were very few non-metropolitan territories left in the world which could be expected to become independent nations.

4. In most regions of the world the economic situation of individual countries were constantly changing and had been doing so for some years past. The aim of the Allocations Committee in the past had been to bring the I.L.O. scale of contributions more into line with the United Nations scale at every suitable opportunity. The Committee had moved towards this objective each year by applying the established criteria to the I.L.O. scale when new Members joined the Organisation. As very few further Members could be expected, he felt that the time had perhaps been reached when the I.L.O. scale should be as equitable as possible for all its Members whose individual capacity to pay, such a comprehensive review would entail a thorough and exhaustive examination of the I.L.O. scale at every suitable opportunity. The Committee should accept the draft scale of contributions that had been put forward by the Director-General and that for the 1966 scale the Committee should undertake to make such a comprehensive review when it was not be completed in time for the conclusions to be drawn therefrom to be applied in the 1966 scale.

5. Accordingly, he suggested that such a review be undertaken by the Director-General and that for the 1966 scale the Committee should accept the draft scale of contributions that had been put forward by the Director-General, and which was based on the principles hitherto maintained by the Committee.

6. The U.S.S.R. Government member agreed that the problem was complex and that it required very careful consideration. He asked whether it was the understanding of the Director-General that the scale he had originally proposed to the Committee would come into force if by March 1966 South Africa had not fulfilled the financial obligations arising out of its membership of the Organisation under the terms of article 1, paragraph 5, of the Constitution of the Organisation.

7. The representative of the Director-General indicated that if the Conference were to adopt the scale put forward by the Director-General this scale would apply to the budget for 1966 whether or not South Africa had fulfilled its financial obligations towards the Organisation. However, this did not imply acceptance of any non-payment by South Africa, contributions which would continue to be shown in the books of the Organisation as being due from South Africa. At this stage, the Director-General could only assume that South Africa would fulfill its term of agreement with the Organisation. If it did not, the obligations would remain valid and the Director-General would continue to request South Africa to pay the amounts which it owed.

8. The U.S.S.R. Government member felt that it could not fulfill the financial obligations arising out of its past membership of the Organisation. Failure to do so would involve a violation of article 1, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. Thus, if South Africa had not paid its outstanding debts by 11 March 1966 this raised the question as to whether South Africa should be considered as having withdrawn from the Organisation or whether it should be regarded as having been expelled therefrom as a result of its having violated the Constitution. In either case, the formal legal conditions governing withdrawal would not have been respected.

9. His Government would not wish to advocate that South Africa be considered as continuing in its membership of the Organisation through not having fulfilled the financial obligations of membership in terms of article 1, paragraph 5, of the Constitution. On the other hand, he felt that it was incumbent upon the Committee to work out a financial procedure in relation to the I.L.O. scale of contributions which would be applicable in every case of withdrawal of a member State from the Organisation. The Committee should examine to what extent the consequences of the withdrawal of any member State would affect the contributions of the remaining membership in terms of the principles that had hitherto governed the adjustment of the I.L.O. scale of contributions as a whole. The application of these principles had not so far led to any member State's assessment being increased from one year to the next. The application of the well-known principle of not increasing the scale was taking place, the principle of not increasing any other member State's contribution on a permanent basis being observed. The application of the principle of not increasing contributions temporarily increased as a result of the withdrawal of a member State from the Organisation. The committee should examine to what extent the consequences of the withdrawal of any member State would affect the contributions of the remaining membership in terms of the principles that had hitherto governed the adjustment of the I.L.O. scale of contributions as a whole. The application of these principles had not so far led to any member State's assessment being increased from one year to the next. The committee should examine to what extent the consequences of the withdrawal of any member State would affect the contributions of the remaining membership in terms of the principles that had hitherto governed the adjustment of the I.L.O. scale of contributions as a whole. The application of these principles had not so far led to any member State's assessment being increased from one year to the next.

10. Another fundamental difference between the two organisations concerned the representation of member States of each a group. In the I.L.O. there was a definite discrimination against the socialist countries as regards their participation in the work of the Organisation; this applied particularly to the Employer and Worker representatives of these countries. In the United Nations there was no such discrimination.

11. These two examples illustrated the fact that the whole problem of devising an appropriate scale of contributions for the I.L.O. was extremely complex.

12. Finally, he asked why there appeared to be a taboo on increasing the rate of assessment of the contributions of the Member paying at the highest rate in the I.L.O. scale. This Member was the United States, whose contribution was assessed at 25 per cent. of the I.L.O. budget but at a roughly higher rate in the United States scale.

13. The Canadian Government member agreed that the adjustment of the I.L.O. scale of contributions on a long-term basis presented complex problems which would require very careful study over a period of time. He felt that the Committee's immediate task was, therefore, to reach agreement on the scale of contributions for 1966 on an ad hoc basis without prejudice to a comprehensive review of the scale such as had been suggested by the French Government member. The proposal put forward by the Director-General contained many ideas, but there were undoubtedly other ways of adjusting the scale for 1966 which might reasonably be considered. He would be prepared to put forward an alternative suggestion after having had the benefit of the views of other members of the Committee.

14. The United States Government member agreed that the problem before the Committee could develop into a major issue; this might complicate the work of the forthcoming session of the International Labour Conference. Accordingly, he also believed that the Committee should attempt, at the present stage, to reach a temporary position which would be applicable for 1966 only.

15. The Chairman suggested that further study might be given to the long-range problem by the Committee at a later session with a view to reaching unanimous agreement on a scale or basis of scale. The U.S.S.R. Government member felt that it was necessary to seek immediate solution between the Director-General's proposal and the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government member. To this end, he suggested that the Committee should accept the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member as recorded in paragraph 19 of the Committee's first report, with the exception of paragraphs 5 and 6 thereof. He recalled that paragraph 5 of the suggestion provided that the assessments temporarily increased as a result of the application of the first part of the U.S.S.R. Government member's suggestion should subsequently be brought back to their previous levels. He suggested that the assessments arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions for the next following year or years in which such relief should arise. The United States Government member indicated that his Government was seeking to apply the principle of not increasing contributions temporarily increased in the I.L.O. scale on a basis which would be equitable for all such States.

16. The Committee's present task should, however, be limited to agreeing on a scale of contributions to be valid only for 1966.

17. The Canadian Government member said that, in the light of the Committee's discussion so far, he felt that it was necessary to seek immediate solution between the Director-General's proposal and the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government member. To this end, he suggested that the Committee should accept the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member as recorded in paragraph 19 of the Committee's first report, with the exception of paragraphs 5 and 6 thereof. He recalled that paragraph 5 of the suggestion provided that the assessments temporarily increased as a result of the application of the first part of the U.S.S.R. Government member's suggestion should subsequently be brought back to their previous levels. He suggested that the assessments arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions for the next following year or years in which such relief would, therefore, be given to the long-range problem by the Committee at a later session with a view to reaching unanimous agreement on a scale or basis of scale. The U.S.S.R. Government member felt that it was necessary to seek immediate solution between the Director-General's proposal and the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government member. To this end, he suggested that the Committee should accept the suggestion put forward by the U.S.S.R. Government member as recorded in paragraph 19 of the Committee's first report, with the exception of paragraphs 5 and 6 thereof. He recalled that paragraph 5 of the suggestion provided that the assessments temporarily increased as a result of the application of the first part of the U.S.S.R. Government member's suggestion should subsequently be brought back to their previous levels. He suggested that the assessments arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions for the next following year or years in which such relief should arise. The United States Government member indicated that his Government was seeking to apply the principle of not increasing contributions temporarily increased in the I.L.O. scale on a basis which would be equitable for all such States.

18. The U.S.S.R. Government member recalled that the suggestion of the United States Government member's proposal his Government was seeking to apply the principle of not increasing contributions temporarily increased in the I.L.O. scale on a basis which would be equitable for all such States.

19. The United States Government member pointed out that this change in the suggestion of the U.S.S.R. Government was fundamental in that it departed from one of the basic principles accepted by the Committee, the Governing Body and the Conference in past years. This principle was that the maximum and minimum rates of contributions from the I.L.O. scale should not be changed. He indicated that the United States Government would find it impossible to agree to an assessment of its own contribution at a rate higher than 25 per cent. of the maximum rate in the I.L.O. scale, i.e. the United States.

20. The U.S.S.R. Government member drew attention to the fact that his proposal entailed a temporary increase only in the assessment of those Member States at present assessed at less than 25 per cent. of their contributions in the United Nations scale. In putting forward this proposal his Government was seeking to apply the principle of not increasing contributions temporarily increased in the I.L.O. scale on a basis which would be equitable for all such States.

21. The United States Government member indicated that he could not agree to a temporary increase in the rate of assessment of his Government's contribution. If this rate were to be increased, he would not be in a position to vote in favour of the 1966 draft budget.

22. The Canadian Government member indicated that he could not accept the U.S.S.R. proposal that the increase of member States for 1966 should be a temporary one, to be cancelled in subsequent years, when further relief would become available from the assessments of new Members.

23. The U.S.S.R. Government member emphasised that a particular merit of his proposal was that it involved a temporary increase only in the assessment of some member States. The Canadian Government member's proposed amendment would introduce an element of permanency in the increase concerned.

24. So far the application by the Committee of its established criteria long accepted by the Governing Body and the Conference. Thus the United States contributed much more than any other member State, being called upon to accept an increase in the assessment of its contribution. If this fundamental principle were now to be changed, the change should apply to all States whose I.L.O. assessments were lower than the United Nations assessments. He contended that his Government's proposal to make the 1966 increases temporary in nature would not violate on a permanent basis the hitherto established criteria under which no State had had its assessment increased. On the other hand, the Director-General's proposal, originally made by the Committee, would uphold this principle. Mutual concessions would have to be made, and the U.S.S.R. Government was prepared to accept a temporary increase in its assessment of the United States Government. That had been/likewise. He would be forced to vote against any of the proposals so far put forward, other than that of his Government, and would accordingly have to reserve the position of his Government with regard to its attitude to the budget for 1966.

25. The Canadian Government member pointed out that for many years past a number of member States had been assessed at higher rates in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale. That was opposed to the U.S.S.R. Government's proposal because it would deny those States the relief which they could legitimately expect in future years as a result of the admission of new member States, particularly as another member State's withdrawal from the I.L.O. would probably become effective during 1967.

26. The United States Government member recalled that the present I.L.O. scale and the principles on which it was based had been developed a number of years ago after full and careful consideration by the Allocations Committee, the Governing Body and the Conference. It was within the power of the Committee, the Director-General, and the Conference to increase and minimum rates of contribution efforts would be made to bring the I.L.O. scale closer to the United Nations scale, provided that the Governments concerned had been affected by afforded relief to those States assessed at higher rates in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale when such relief had arisen as a result of increases in the membership of the Organisation.

27. In the present situation there were practicalities to be considered. The Congress of the United States had established a policy with regard to its contribution to the budget of the I.L.O. which was based on principles and criteria long accepted by the Governing Body and the Conference of the I.L.O. and the United States Government member was obliged to adhere to that policy. There was no possibility of a change in that policy being considered for the increase in the United States contribution to be applied in the 1966 scale.

28. He reminded the Committee that, whereas the United States Government's contribution to the regular budget was assessed at 25 per cent. that the same Government was major source of income to the I.L.O. on a voluntary basis to the extent of 40 per cent. of the total contributions of member States. These contributions were made as funds available to the Organisation through the United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance and the Special Fund. Thus the United States contributed much more than 25 per cent. of the total funds available each year to the I.L.O. His Government was fully aware of the needs of the I.L.O. for adequate finance and was not unwilling to do its part to help the Organisation in its work. However, his Government was at present unable to depart from the established principle that the maximum rate of contribution in the I.L.O. scale should remain unchanged. Any increase in this rate would force his Government to vote against the budget for 1966 as a whole because the Conference resolution concerning the adoption of the budget each year was a single action in that it covered both the expenditure and income budgets in a single resolution.

29. The Director-General's proposal was consistent with the principle that the I.L.O. scale should move as far as possible towards the United Nations scale on every suitable occasion, subject to the retention of the present maximum and minimum rates of contribution. The suggestions of both the U.S.S.R. and Canadian Governments did not conform fully with this principle. Until this year, a part of the established principle had resulted in the granting of relief to those member States as a result of the admission of new Members. It was now necessary to apply the same principle in taking account of a further withdrawal of a member State from the Organisation. The Director-General's proposal was that which applied the existing principles to the furthest possible extent. On the other hand, in view of the practical problems involved, he felt that the Canadian Government would probably be the most acceptable for 1966 on an ad hoc basis.

30. The French Government member felt that in the light of the discussion that had taken place the best course for the Committee to take would be to accept the Director-General's proposals for the 1966 scale and request the Director-General to make a thorough study of the long-term problem, and to undertake a comprehensive review of the I.L.O. scale at its leisure. The principle on which the Committee had based its work in the past had been that all member States should contribute to the organisation in accordance with their relative capacities to pay. As the United Nations scale was based on this principle, the continued application of the existing principles to the I.L.O. scale, and adjusting the I.L.O. scale would appear to remain valid. The same problem had to be faced by other specialised agencies. Thus, the suggested full-scale revision of the I.L.O. scale of contributions would require only an exhaustive study in the I.L.O. but also full consultation with the United Nations and the other specialised agencies. In the case of the time the Canadian Government's proposal could not be completed by that study, he felt that the only possibility of reaching unanimity in the Committee on the 1966 scale was to accept the Director-General's proposal for this year.

31. Summing up, the Chairman felt that the realistic approach in the present situation would be to take the Canadian Government member's proposal as the basis for further discussion of the 1966 scale of contributions. This proposal consisted of two parts, one being the setting off the additional charge of 0.01 per cent. resulting from the withdrawal of South Africa against the relief of 0.48 per cent. arising from the assessments of the contributions of new member States, leaving a net reduction to 0.13 per cent. to be allocated amongst those member States at present assessed at a lower rate in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale. The United States contribution to the I.L.O. scale did not conform fully with this principle. Until the present I.L.O. scale and the principles on which it was established had been developed a number of years ago after full and careful consideration by the Allocations Committee, the Governing Body and the Conference. It was within the power of the Committee, the Director-General, and the Conference to increase and minimum rates of contribution efforts would be made to bring the I.L.O. scale closer to the United Nations scale, provided that the Governments concerned had been affected by afforded relief to those States assessed at higher rates in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale when such relief had arisen as a result of increases in the membership of the Organisation.

32. The Canadian Government member pointed out that, although his proposal consisted of two parts, these parts were closely interrelated and interdependent. If the Committee were to attempt to reach agreement on one part it should be on the understanding that this agreement was condition upon acceptance of the proposal as a whole.

33. The Committee then adjourned further consideration of the draft scale of contributions for 1966.

34. After the recess, the Chairman summed up the Committee's consideration of the draft 1966 scale of contributions and expressed the view that the Committee appeared to be agreed that the basis of the Canadian Government member's proposal, namely that the amount of the relief arising from the assessment of new member States (0.48 per cent.) should be set off against the additional burden of the withdrawal of South Africa. It remained for the Committee to decide on how the net additional charge of 0.13 per cent. should be spread amongst the membership of the Organisation. The Canadian Government member's proposal in this regard was that the net charge of 0.13 per cent should be allocated as follows:
Appendix IV : Financial and Budgetary Questions

(a) States at present assessed at the minimum, except where this is lower than their United Nations assessment, not to be increased;

(b) the State assessed at the maximum not to be increased;

(c) States assessed at or above their United Nations assessment not to be increased;

(d) the additional charge to be distributed among the remaining member States (i.e. those assessed at lower than their United Nations assessment) pro rata to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment falls short of their individual United Nations assessments as previously I.L.O. assessments of these States being increased accordingly.

35. The U.S.S.R. Government member reiterated the view he had expressed at the Committee’s meeting of 1 June, namely that his Government could accept the first part of the Canadian Government member’s proposal, but had reservations regarding the second part. In particular, his Government wished that the increase in the assessments of member States’ contributions that would result from the application of the second part of the proposal should be temporary. Secondly, his Government held the view that the additional charge should be spread amongst the Members whose I.L.O. assessments were lower than their United Nations assessments, including the State assessed at the maximum rate. If the increases that were proposed increases were only temporary in nature, he felt that the State assessed at the maximum should be able to accept such a temporary increase alone with the other States affected.

36. If the increases in assessments that would result from the adoption of the Canadian Government member’s proposal were to be permanent, there would be a tendency in future years for the same States’ contributions to be further increased. This was an entirely new element for the Allocations Committee to consider, as so far the application of the principles adopted by the Committee had led only to reductions in assessments. Finally, his Government believed that the principle that it had not yet reached the Committee to proceed to a major review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions.

37. He asked whether the Canadian Government member intended that his proposal as a whole should be operative only for the 1966 scale of contributions.

38. The Canadian Government member indicated that his proposal had been put forward solely with a view to finding a solution for the 1966 scale. This solution would be entirely without prejudice to the Committee’s consideration of the scales for the budgets of future years. He felt that the Committee as a whole realised that there was a need for establishing a permanent set of criteria which would deal adequately with the adjustments of the I.L.O. scale to take into account the distribution of percentage assessments withdrawn from the scale as a result of the withdrawal of member States from the Organisation.

39. The Chairman suggested that the Committee should accept the Canadian Government member’s proposal, amended so that it would be clear that the increases in assessments resulting therefrom were temporary in nature. He also suggested that temporarily increased should subsequently be brought back to their previous levels by distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions for the next following year or years in which such relief should arise.

40. The Canadian Government member said that although he would be reluctant to accept a change in his proposal, he would be prepared to consider doing so if this would allow the Committee to reach an unanimous agreement. He would therefore like to hear the views of other members of the Committee on this matter.

41. The Indian Government member felt that general agreement had now been reached on the Canadian Government member’s proposal, and on the temporary nature of the increases that would result from its application. He also could agree to this, but wished to emphasize that he could not take the burden of the United Nations scale as compared with the increases resulting from the acceptance of the proposal as a whole.

42. The Peruvian Government representative expressed his support of the proposals of the Canadian Government member. This support was given in a spirit of compromise as was clear from the documents before the Committee that very many States were assessed at higher percentage rates in the I.L.O. scale than in the United Nations scale. He emphasised the fact that the United Nations scale was established and revised from time to time with the greatest of care by a committee of experts which inquired into the relative capacity to pay of all the member States which were members of the United Nations. It was therefore most desirable that the I.L.O. scale should be brought as far as possible into line with the United Nations scale. For various practical reasons such as alignment could not be achieved in the immediate future. Nevertheless, the present structure of the I.L.O. scale was most unsatisfactory and it was incumbent on the Committee at some stage to undertake a comprehensive examination of the I.L.O. scale with a view to bringing it more fully into line with the United Nations scale.

43. The Committee then decided, subject to the reservations noted in the following four paragraphs, to adopt a scale of contributions for 1966 by adjusting the 1965 scale as follows:

1. The amount of the relief arising from the assessment of new member States (0.48 per cent.) to be set off against the additional burden of 0.61 per cent. resulting from the withdrawal of South Africa.

2. The net additional burden of 0.13 per cent. to be allocated as follows:

(a) States at present assessed at the minimum, except where this is lower than their United Nations assessment, not to be increased;

(b) the State assessed at the maximum not to be increased;

(c) States assessed at or above their United Nations assessment not to be increased;

(d) the additional charge to be distributed temporarily among the remaining member States (i.e. those assessed at lower than their United Nations assessments) pro rata to the amounts by which their individual I.L.O. assessment falls short of their individual United Nations assessment, the previous I.L.O. assessments of these States being increased accordingly.

3. The assessments temporarily increased1 as a result of the application of the above formula shall subsequently be brought back to their previous levels by distributing the relief arising from the assessment of new Members in the scale of contributions from the next following year or years in which such relief shall arise.

It was noted that any assessment of a new member State joining later in 1965 or before the adoption of a scale for 1967 would thus be reflected in a reduction in 1967 of the assessments temporarily increased in 1966.

44. The U.S.S.R. Government member said that, while he objected in principle to point 2 (b) in the preceding paragraph, namely that the State assessed at the maximum would not be increased, in a spirit of compromise he would not raise a formal objection to this point but wished to record his Government’s reservations thereon.

45. The Indian Government member expressed his Government’s reservations as to the temporary nature of the increases resulting from the acceptance of the proposal as a whole.

46. The Canadian Government member said that he could accept the decision that the increases in assessments resulting from the adoption of the formula set out in paragraph 43 above would be temporary in nature, while emphasizing that this formula should apply to the 1966 scale only. It should not be adopted by the Committee on a continuing basis in future years. Referring to the emphasis that had been placed by some members of the Committee on the unusual nature of the situation facing it, he felt the situation should not be considered ab-

1 I.e. those of China, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Poland, Ukraine and U.S.S.R. (Not appended to the original text.)
The tripartite character of the I.L.O. and the question of full tripartite representation in its various organs should also be taken into account in considering the scale of contributions. These factors meant that it was not possible to compare the I.L.O. scale of contributions with that of the United Nations on a purely arithmetical basis.

53. The United States Government member said that he would not wish to upset the solution that had been deliberately worked out at the Conference. He therefore hoped that the scale might be taken into account in the broader problem of a possible major review of the scale in the future. However, as some members of the Committee had expressed views regarding the scale, it was hoped that the scale might be taken into account in the future should it be difficult for the United States Government to agree with such a proposal. Neither he nor his Government were in a position at the present time to associate themselves with the proposal that there should be a basic and radical revision of the I.L.O. scale in the immediate future. This was because of the inability of the United States Government to agree at the present time to any increase in the percentage assessment of its contribution to the budget, which was at the maximum rate of 25 per cent. Accordingly, he would have to oppose any decision that the Committee might take to undertake a major revision of the I.L.O. scale at the present time.

54. The French Government member reiterated his view that the Committee was agreed that the I.L.O. scale should move as far as possible towards the United Nations scale. At present there were many differences between the two scales. There were also various means of bringing the I.L.O. scale closer to the United Nations scale. The most radical approach would be to disregard the present rates of contributions, and instead adopt a system in which the minimum rates in the I.L.O. scale were equal to the United Nations scale. However, as to disregard this would give rise to a number of political and financial difficulties, he felt that the Committee should ask the Office to prepare a number of possible solutions, which would leave the present maximum and minimum rates of contributions unchanged. The matter should be left entirely open at this stage of the Conference so that the Committee could consider the possible solutions in more detail at a later session.

55. The U.S.S.R. Government member said that he could not accept to leave the maximum percentage assessment unaltered. He was in any major revision of the scale. The State assessed at the maximum, the United States, paid its contribution in its own currency. Other States, including the U.S.S.R., had to pay their contributions in a foreign currency, namely the United States dollar, and were thus in an entirely different position. Payment of their contribution depended on their ability to earn sufficient quantities of United States dollars. As contributions could be paid in national currencies, his Government would agree that national income could be taken as an appropriate basis for determining the rates of assessment of contributions. As contributions were thus in an entirely different position. Payment of their contribution depended on their ability to earn sufficient quantities of United States dollars, his Government was not in agreement with the criteria of the United Nations Committee on contributions in this respect.

56. The French Government member suggested that, if the Office were requested to study the question of a major revision of the I.L.O. scale, it should also prepare information for the benefit of the Committee as to the proportions of the annual budget that were spent in currencies other than the United States dollar and the Swiss franc. With the development of the Office's operational activities in all parts of the world, it was reasonable to assume that a number of States in addition to the United States dollars, would have to pay their contributions in other currencies, for example in the sterling and French franc zones and in Latin America. Information of the kind requested would help the Committee to determine whether a proportion of the annual budget should be paid in national currencies other than the United States dollar and the Swiss franc.

57. The Canadian Government member said that he was not at present in a position to speak on behalf of his Government as to whether a major revision of the I.L.O. scale should be undertaken. Accordingly, he could not accept the idea that the Committee should issue instructions to the effect that at its next meeting it should prepare more material for such a major revision. The Indian Government member associated himself with the views of the Canadian Government member on this subject.

58. The Uruguayan Government member emphasised her view that a major revision of the I.L.O. scale was necessary. She felt that the Office should be requested to undertake a study of the question in the light of the various points of view expressed by the members of the Committee, and that the Office should have entire freedom to undertake its studies to the Committee at a later date. This view was supported by the Peruvian Government representative.

59. After further discussion, in which the United States and Canadian Government members reiterated the fact that at present it was not in a position to take a decision to the effect that the Office should undertake a comprehensive study of the long-term problem of the I.L.O. scale, and in which the French Government member pointed out that the Committee would have to report on this matter to the Governing Body, whereas it was at the present time reporting direct work that would be required as a preliminary to any meeting would be to consider whether or not the Committee wished the Office to undertake the background work that would be required as a preliminary to any major review of the I.L.O. scale of contributions.

APPENDIX V

Third Item on the Agenda: Information and Reports on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Report of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.¹

I. INTRODUCTION

1. In accordance with article 7 of the Standing Orders the Conference set up a Committee to consider and report on item III of its agenda: "Information and Reports on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations". This Committee was composed of 98 members: 56 from the Government group, 14 from the Employers' group and 28 from the Workers' group. There were also 14 Government deputy members, 7 Employers' deputy members and 11 Workers' deputy members, as well as two Government observers. The Committee elected its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. Albano Pacis, Government member, Philippines.
Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Richmond, Employers' member, Kenya; Mr. Cool, Workers' member, Belgium.
Reporter: Mr. Lappalainen, Government member, Finland. The Committee held 16 sittings.

2. In accordance with its terms of reference the Committee examined the following questions: reports on ratified Conventions supplied by Members in pursuance of article 22 of the Constitution; reports on the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories supplied by Members in pursuance of articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution; information on the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 31st to 47th Sessions, supplied in pursuance of article 19 of the Constitution; reports requested by the Governing Body from non-ratifying States on the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3), and the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), and from all member States on the Maternity Protection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 12), and the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95), also supplied in pursuance of article 19 of the Constitution.

II. GENERAL QUESTIONS

3. In the course of its general discussion the Committee noted with satisfaction the progress made during the past 12 months as regards both the ratification and the implementation of I.L.O. Conventions. In January 1965 the total number of ratifications passed the 3,000 mark. It was noted, however, that many member States had not yet responded to the Committee's repeated appeals to ratify and apply the fundamental instruments on freedom of association, forced labour, and discrimination. Most speakers stressed, moreover, that membership in the I.L.O. implied acceptance of the principles of freedom of association as proclaimed in the Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia.

4. In view of the Committee's concern with the application of Conference decisions, the significance of trade union organisations in modern society, and the necessity to safeguard appropriate conditions for the free and independent development of trade unions, the Committee invites the Director-General to present a report on the legislation and the factual situation concerning trade unions in all countries and all non-metropolitan territories and other dependent territories, as well as on the measures which might ensure the application in these countries and territories of the international labour Conventions on trade union rights.

5. The Employers' and the Workers' members, in particular, stressed the progress made by some 40 countries in eliminating divergencies with ratified Conventions, as listed in the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. Such positive measures constituted, in their opinion, tangible proof of the value of the I.L.O.'s machinery of supervision. The U.S.S.R. Government member reiterated his view, however, that this procedure required improvement, especially through the adoption of rules to define the composition and terms of reference of the Committee of Experts. This view was supported by the U.S.S.R. Workers' member.

6. The discussions of the Committee centred, as usual, on the difficulties confronting governments in giving effect to their obligations as regards international labour standards. In analysing these difficulties two types of cases can be discerned. In the majority of cases governments admit that they encounter practical, administrative, political and economic problems in their efforts to eliminate divergencies with ratified Conventions. In certain other cases governments deny the existence of any such divergencies, thus differing with the legal findings of the Committee of Experts.

7. In the first case, which concerns primarily the developing countries, compliance with the obligations under the Constitution and under ratified Conventions can be promoted in a number of ways. The Committee learned first of all, with interest, that a training course for labour officers from English-speaking countries in Africa had been organised for this purpose by the I.L.O. in Kenya in 1964 and that a similar course for French-speaking countries in Africa would be held later this year in Cameroon. The usefulness of such training courses was underlined by a number of speakers, and the Committee hopes that the I.L.O. will be able to carry out its intention of organising similar courses for other regions of the world in the years to come.

8. Many governments referred to other types of assistance they had been receiving from the I.L.O. in their efforts to give effect to Conventions. This takes the form of fellowships, of missions by experts and of direct advice by the International Labour Office in clearing up doubtful points in regard to the bearing of international labour standards. The Office, has, in particular, helped a number of countries in drafting or revising their legislation so as to conform with ratified Conventions. One member mentioned, in this connection, the usefulness of regional co-operation, citing by way of example a joint committee established by the countries of Northern Europe. The Committee also learned with interest that the Central American Labour and Social Welfare Council has set up two regional committees to advise on modifications in the legislation of Central American countries, full account being taken of international labour standards.

9. Research into specific problems of application constitutes another possible approach towards finding practical solutions. Thus a programme on which the I.L.O. is currently engaged aims at determining the relationship between the requirements of economic and social development and the application of the forced labour Conventions. The Committee was informed that this research programme, which deals, inter alia, with the measures taken in certain developing countries to train young people and eliminate underemployment, not only covers legislation but has involved a sizable number of study visits on the spot. The Committee trusts that the results and conclusions emerging from these studies will be available for examination by it next year.

10. In contrast to these cases where practical obstacles in the way of compliance with ratified standards are being gradually overcome, there are the other cases alluded to above, where governments do not admit the existence of discrepancies and disagree with the legal position taken by the Committee of Experts. Even though the discrepancies in question are not always serious ones, there is less hope in such cases for finding a solution. The Workers' members wondered therefore whether problems of this kind might not be submitted for decision to the International Court of Justice under article 37 of the I.L.O. Constitution, which deals with the interpretation of Conventions. Some Government members believed that such a recourse would require careful consideration.

11. The Employers' and Workers' members recalled the decision reached by the Committee in 1963 and 1964 in discussing the application of the freedom of association Conventions by certain countries of Eastern Europe and by Cuba, as regards the concept of freedom of association (see paragraph 26 of the Committee's report in 1963 and paragraph 23 of the report in 1964). The Committee had taken note at that time of the absence of any new elements in the report of the Committee of Experts and decided, since all parties concerned maintained their point of view, not to renew the discussion, not to request additional information, and merely to indicate in the report that the position had remained unchanged. The U.S.S.R. Government member had reiterated his regret that the numerous written and oral explanations of his Government had not been considered satisfactory. He had agreed that the discussions on this question should not be reopened and that this fact should be mentioned in the report. The Committee decided therefore to adopt the same procedure as in 1963 and 1964 and to report to the Conference that the points of view of all concerned had remained unaltered at the present session. The Employers' and the majority of the Workers' members emphasised, however, that this decision should have the aim of ensuring the supply of the relevant reports in future or on their examination by the supervisory bodies.

12. In the course of the general discussion the Employers' and Workers' members referred, as in previous years, to the responsibility of their organisations in examining their governments' reports on ratified Conventions and in commenting on them. Some governments still failed to communicate copies of their reports to the representative organisations, as provided for in article 23 of the I.L.O. Constitution. It was also pointed out that a useful role could be played in this connection by the tripartite labour advisory boards which in some countries had set up subcommittees to deal with international labour standards. There was general agreement that comments by the representative organisations are of great value to the Committee of Experts in assessing the degree of application of Conventions, but that further efforts should be made by the organisations concerned so as to avail themselves of this opportunity to participate in international supervision.

13. With the same aim of effective implementation in mind, several speakers emphasised the need for well-organised inspection services capable of enforcing national and international labour legislation. Reference was made to the reports on the labour inspection instruments which governments have been requested to supply this year under article 19 of the Constitution, and the hope was expressed that all reports thus due would be forthcoming and would contain as complete information as possible.
14. The Workers' members recalled that the reports due under article 19 next year would deal with the equally important question of hours of work. They supported the Committee of Experts' suggestion that these reports should not only indicate the normal hours fixed by legislation or otherwise but should also contain statistical information on the number of hours actually worked, including overtime. Only in this way could a true and concrete picture of the situation be obtained.

15. The Workers' members also referred to the implementation of Conventions through collective agreements. In cases where one or several ratified Conventions were applied these collective agreements the governments concerned must guarantee that the agreements in question give full effect to the Conventions as regards the level of its requirements and as regards the workers covered. If this is not the case, they should take appropriate legislative or other measures so as to give full effect to the Conventions.

16. The Committee had again before it, as in previous years, the tables originally presented by Sir John Forbes Watson showing the position of ratifications and votes cast by Government delegates. These tables form Appendix IV of the present report.

III. SPECIAL PROBLEMS

17. In pursuance of the practice followed for several years past the Committee decided to insert a separate section drawing the attention of the Conference to cases where governments have apparently encountered serious difficulties in discharging certain of their obligations under the I.L.O. Constitution or under Conventions they have ratified. The Committee considers that special problems of this kind should continue to be given the fullest attention in order to contribute to their early solution.

18. The Committee discussed in detail the criteria and procedure to be followed in drawing up a special list of such problems. While admitting the need for rules on this matter, some members stressed the importance of clarity, precision, equity and objectivity.

A government's general attitude was more important than narrow legal considerations. The Employers' and Workers' Vice-Chairmen pointed out that the proposed criteria had been drafted with much care and that there were full procedural safeguards so as to ensure, in every instance, that government representatives can make themselves heard in the Committee before a decision is reached concerning their countries. The purpose of the special list was to help governments towards the better application of Conventions. Experience had in fact shown the concrete results of this list in certain cases, and its continuation was therefore essential.

19. In conclusion, the Committee agreed that all the governments concerned, represented at the Conference, should have an opportunity to state what measures they have taken or intend to take in fulfilment of their obligations, so that the Committee can reach a decision in each specific case on the basis of full and up-to-date information. The procedure adopted for this purpose was as follows:

(a) the government concerned was given every possibility to supply additional information and to participate in the Committee's discussion;

(b) after the discussion of the case, the Committee took its decision, which was recorded in the minutes.

20. In pursuance of this procedure, the Committee decided on the following criteria and on their application to the cases enumerated:

A. None of the reports on ratified Conventions has been supplied for two years: Honduras, Jordan, Lebanon.

B. First reports on ratified Conventions have been overdue for two years: Ecuador: Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2); Sickness Insurance (Industry) Convention, 1927 (No. 24); Guinea: Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105); Honduras: Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78); Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1957 (No. 106); Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108); Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111); Lebanon: Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14); Libya: Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936 (No. 52); Malta: Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3); Workmen's Compensation (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 12); Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17); Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30); Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42); Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935 (No. 45); Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936 (No. 52); Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87); Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100).

C. The Government has failed to reply to observations or requests of the Committee of Experts in respect of ratified Conventions: Ecuador, Guinea, Honduras, Jordan, Libya, Nicaragua, Portugal, Senegal, Uruguay.

D. The Government has failed, despite repeated invitations by the Conference Committee, to take part in the discussion concerning its country: Libya.

E. No progress has been noted in the Government's attitude over the past five years towards the elimination of serious breaches in the application of ratified Conventions: Argentina (several Conventions); Mexico (several Conventions); Pakistan: Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96); Uruguay (several Conventions).

F. None of the reports on unratified Conventions and on Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution has been supplied during the past five years: Panama.

G. No indication is available that any of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted during the 40th to 47th Sessions of the Conference (1957-63) have been submitted to the competent authorities in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution: Ethiopia, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Panama, Thailand.

21. The Committee deems it essential to emphasise at this stage that its discussions with a number of governments have brought to light additional evidence of positive progress, similar to that noted by the Committee of Experts, as referred to in paragraph 5 above. Thus the representatives of three States which had previously figured under point E of the special list (Chile, Colombia, Nicaragua) supplied the Committee with very detailed information on measures recently taken to secure the amendment of their legislation so as to secure full compliance with a number of ratified Conventions. The Committee particularly appreciates such efforts to eliminate divergences, often of long standing.

22. The Committee must point out finally that it has not been in a position to discuss the observations of the Committee of Experts referring the following States which did not attend the present session of the Conference: Albania, Bolivia, Haiti, Iceland, Paraguay.

IV. Reports on Ratified Conventions

23. By the date of adoption of the present report 1,356 detailed reports had been received, i.e. 90.7 per cent. of the reports requested. While this represents the highest percentage reached during the past five years, the Committee must also point out that too many reports still arrive after the meeting of the Committee of Experts, as indicated in the tables appearing in Appendix I (C and D). In referring these reports to the Committee of Experts for examination at its next session the Committee once again appeals to governments to supply all their reports by the date required, i.e. 15 October, so that the Committee of Experts is able to perform its task in good time.

24. The information made available to the present Committee is summarised in Appendix I (A and B), together with the discussions and decisions relating thereto. To the extent to which these discussions indicate the need for further measures of implementation or for additional information, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken and that the governments' future reports will contain all the details required to ascertain compliance with the Conventions concerned.

25. The Committee also expresses the earnest hope that these next reports will reply in full to the observations and requests made by the Committee of Experts and the course of the present session. Failure to respond to these comments effectively prevents the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee from carrying out their mandate, so that the I.L.O.'s efforts to promote the application of its standards might be seriously jeopardised.

V. Application of Conventions in Non-Metropolitan Territories

26. It was recalled that the Conference had last year adopted an instrument of amendment of the Constitution, under which article 35 of the Constitution (dealing with the application of ratified Conventions to non-metropolitan territories) would be deleted and replaced by new provisions in article 19. The Committee noted that this instrument had already been ratified or accepted by a number of member States, but that the number of ratifications and acceptances necessary to bring the instrument of amendment into force had not yet been reached.

27. One member of the Committee observed that the question of the application of Conventions to non-metropolitan territories was still an important one and should be very thoroughly examined. He pointed out that, although the Committee of Experts had noted continuing progress in the extension of ratified Conventions to non-metropolitan territories, its report showed that two-thirds of the declarations made in the previous year concerning the applicability of Conventions to such territories had indicated that a decision was reserved or that the Convention was inapplicable; this situation—as also the over-all number of positive declarations—was most unsatisfactory.

Another member observed that, while it had been unanimously decided at the 48th Session of the Conference to amend the Constitution, so that it was not necessary to reopen the general discussion on article 35, the report of the Committee of Experts supported the view that this article had encouraged the application of Conventions in non-metropolitan territories; it showed that the average number of declarations of application without modification per territory had risen since 1962 from 14 to 20, a figure which compared favourably with that of the ratifications of many member States.

28. A member of the Committee recalled the Declaration adopted by the United Nations some years ago calling for the granting of independence to all colonial countries and peoples; this Declaration had not been fully implemented, and the Committee should endeavour to promote its application and to assist the peoples in these territories in regard not only to working conditions, but also in other fields.
29. A member indicated the importance for the workers in countries which at present were still non-metropolitan territories to be directly represented at the Conference.

30. The information supplied by governments in answer to observations by the Committee of Experts concerning the application of particular Conventions in non-metropolitan territories, and the discussion of such cases by the Committee, are summarised in Appendix II (A and B).

VI. SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

31. The Committee noted with regret again this year that the proportion of member States which had discharged their obligation, under article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution, to submit to the competent authorities the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference remained unsatisfactory. It emphasises once again the importance attaching to the discharge of this obligation, failing which international labour standards are likely, in many cases, to remain a dead letter on the national level.

32. As regards the nature of the competent authorities within the meaning of article 19 of the Constitution it was recalled that these are the authorities which, under the national constitution in each State, are empowered to legislate or take other action to give effect to Conventions or Recommendations. Admittedly, in respect of certain instruments, bodies other than the legislature may be empowered to take the necessary implementing measures. It was pointed out that even in this case it would be desirable to submit the instruments to the legislature for information.

33. As regards the scope of the obligation the Committee emphasises that Conventions and Recommendations must be submitted to the competent authorities in all cases, even if the government does not propose to ratify a Convention or to take measures to give effect to a Recommendation. In doing so, the Committee draws attention to the clear distinction which must be made between the concept of "submission" and that of "ratification".

34. It was also noted with regret that the governments of most member States do not take account in their reports of the indications contained in the memorandum on this subject adopted by the Governing Body at its 140th Session (November 1958). If the information and documents requested by this memorandum are not supplied, it is not possible to assess the manner in which governments discharge their obligations in this field. In this connection attention was drawn to the need for governments, when submitting instruments to the competent authorities, to make proposals or comments on the effect to be given to them, it being understood that governments remained entirely free as to the nature of the proposals which they might make.

35. Mention was made of the problems peculiar to federal States and of the special provisions laid down in this connection in article 19, paragraph 7, of the I.L.O. Constitution. A member of the Committee recalled the wish that a study of this matter be submitted to the Committee.

36. The information supplied to the Committee concerning the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, and the comments made in this regard, will be found in Appendix III to this report.

VII. REPORTS ON UNRATIFIED CONVENTIONS AND ON RECOMMENDATIONS

37. The Committee took note with interest of the general conclusions of the Committee of Experts on the reports supplied under article 19 of the Constitution in respect of four instruments relating to maternity protection, namely the Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3), the Maternity Protection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1921 (No. 12), the Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103), and the Maternity Protection Recommendation, 1952 (No. 95) (Part Three of the Committee of Experts' report). The Experts' study covered the situation in altogether 135 countries (93 States and 42 territories). This year again the study related to instruments which called for special examination not only from the point of view of the effect which has been given to them but also from the point of view of possible revision. As the maternity protection Conventions had not been ratified as widely as might have been expected (by 24 and 8 States respectively), suggestions had been made that they be revised and their provisions made more flexible.

38. The Committee had a general exchange of views on the various aspects of maternity protection. It noted with interest the conclusions emerging from the Committee of Experts' study. Several speakers emphasised the importance of maternity protection for women, for children and more generally for society as a whole.

39. The Committee noted that, notwithstanding the limited number of ratifications of these instruments, considerable progress had been made in this field in recent decades. It observed that, while this progress was largely due to the economic and social development in the various countries, the maternity protection Conventions and Recommendations had exercised an undoubted influence on national legislation, which had drawn on the international standards. The principles enunciated in these instruments are today accepted by almost all the countries covered by the survey.

40. The Committee was impressed by the progress made in regard to the length of the maternity leave. It noted that in 89 countries the duration of the leave was equal to or greater than the 12 weeks laid down in the international standards. Certain members of the Committee stressed the importance for the health of the mother and her child of a sufficiently long period of rest both before and after confinement and felt that the period of 12 weeks should be considered a minimum standard, particularly in the case of women employed in industrial work requiring sustained effort. A Workers' member emphasised the importance of the mother's presence for young children and stated that a woman should, in addition to her maternity leave, be entitled to a special leave with cash benefits until the child reached the age of 1 year.

41. The Committee also noted that, according to the study, women in most of the countries concerned were entitled to cash benefits, varying from 60 to 100 per cent. of the wage in some 30 countries, and to free medical care provided under an insurance scheme or out of public funds. In addition, measures exist in most countries to guarantee women job security during maternity leave and to protect them against discrimination on account of pregnancy or nursing. Women also usually have the right to nursing breaks during working hours, there are special facilities for babies, and various other measures exist for the protection of the health of the mother and child. With regard to the last point, certain members of the Committee emphasised the importance for women and their children of the special protective measures laid down particularly in Section V of Recommendation No. 95. Night work and overtime should be prohibited before and after confinement as well as during the nursing period. Some members expressed the wish that the relevant provisions of Recommendation No. 95, which supplement those of Convention No. 103, be applied in a larger number of countries.

42. The Committee also took note of certain difficulties of application met especially in developing countries which were not yet able to extend the protection to all categories of women workers covered by the Conventions and particularly Convention No. 103. In this connection a Government member of the Committee observed that even in developing countries the application of Convention No. 3 created no major difficulties, but that special problems might arise in respect of the extension of maternity protection to the agricultural sector, in which work took place within a family setting and to which for the time being it was not possible to extend social security schemes. Difficulties appeared also to exist in certain countries as regards the application of the absolute prohibition of dismissal of women workers during their absence on maternity leave; this provision is of considerable importance, since it is aimed at protecting women workers against the material and moral consequences which loss of employment would have for them and their children. It was suggested that the I.L.O. might give further consideration to these problems.

43. The Committee considered that the difficulties of application of these provisions are not such as to call for revision of the Conventions. In the present circumstances, particularly as the limited number of ratifications of these instruments does not appear to be due, in most countries, to basic differences between national legislation and the Conventions. In connection the Committee particularly noted the Committee of Experts' conclusion that national legislation for maternity protection in many cases contains standards equal to or even higher than the international standards.

44. Having regard to these findings, the Workers' members considered that the Committee should recommend the Conference to appeal once more to all countries which had not yet ratified Conventions Nos. 3 and 103 to examine, in the light of the Committee of Experts' conclusions, the possibility of ratifying and fully applying them.

45. The Employers' members considered that Convention No. 103 contained stricter standards, which made its application difficult even in developed countries, and that accordingly emphasis should be placed rather on the ratification of the 1919 Convention which, particularly for developing countries, constituted an objective to be reached as quickly as possible. Certain Government members, however, stressed that no distinction should be made in the field of maternity protection between developed and developing countries, and that the need to protect life and health transcended economic considerations. Problems might exist in developing countries, particularly as regards the introduction of social security schemes, but the ratification and application of these Conventions had not encountered major difficulties in certain developing countries. It was, moreover, pointed out that several African countries had ratified Convention No. 3 and that its application by them appeared not to give rise to any special difficulties. A Workers' member remarked that the fact that a country was developing was no justification for the absence of protective measures whose scope generally did not depend so much on economic development as on the policy as to sharing of costs which it adopted.

46. In the course of the discussion it was pointed out that the non-ratification of Convention No. 103 by certain countries whose legislation contained at least equivalent standards was due to certain minor difficulties which could be overcome, and that it might be hoped that new ratifications would be forthcoming in the near future.

47. In conclusion, the Committee as a whole considered that all governments should aim to ratify and apply the 1919 Convention and that, whenever this was possible, they should seek to attain the higher level of protection provided in the revised Convention of 1952 and ratify this instrument.

48. The submission of the present report completes the task entrusted to the Committee by the Conference. While there may be differences of emphasis as to the methods to be followed in performing this task, the basic purpose is clear; to promote compliance with the I.L.O. Constitution and with ratified Conventions. In its efforts to ascertain and evaluate the measures taken by member States to this effect, the Committee received information from 70 governments. It deeply appreciates the spirit of co-operation thus shown by the countries concerned and in particular the positive action many of them have taken in pursuance of their obligations. These measures represent the surest indication possible that the work of the Committee is bearing fruit.

APPENDIX I

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING REPORTS ON RATIFIED CONVENTIONS (ARTICLE 22 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations and Information concerning Certain Countries

Algeria. A Government representative made the following statement:

Since the country's independence three years ago, the Government had shown special interest in the activities of the I.L.O. This was witnessed by the fact that 42 Conventions had been ratified and that they were strictly applied. The Government had in fact sent its first report on Convention No. 10 and regretted that it had not been received by the I.L.O. This Convention, relating to minimum age in agriculture, was fully applied, partly because of the high school-leaving age and the Government's active policy for promoting schooling—particularly in rural areas—and partly because agricultural undertakings were managed by the workers themselves who ensured that their children were not employed in work for which they were not fit.

As regards the communication of copies of reports to the representative organisations of employers and workers, required under article 23 (2) of the Constitution, this obligation had no doubt been complied with and failure to mention it was probably due to an oversight; the Government would have no reason for not supplying copies of its reports to these organisations.

The Workers' members indicated that the communication of copies of reports to employers' and workers' organisations had been an obligation incumbent upon the Government and compliance therewith was most important for trade unions.

The Employers' members stated that the Government could have sent a copy of the report on Convention No. 10 directly to the I.L.O. or have communicated it to the Committee of Experts.

In addition, a Government representative made the following additional statement:

Owing to the fact that certain reports had been prepared by ministries other than the Ministry of Labour, for example the Ministries of Agriculture, of Industry, etc., which were less familiar with I.L.O. procedures, they had omitted to indicate that copies had been communicated to the employers' and workers' organisations; he believed, however, that this indication had been given in the letter transmitting the reports. The report on Convention No. 10 had been prepared but had not been sent because of an error in transmitting it. After the Ministry of Labour had been re-established, I.L.O. correspondence had continued to be sent to the Ministry of Social Affairs and this had resulted in delays.

Argentina. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Committee of Experts' observations with regard to various Conventions were correct. Unfortunately it was not possible to report the adoption of positive measures. It was to be hoped that this year would be the last when government representatives would have to recognise shortcomings in the application of Conventions. An international affairs committee had been established in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security; it had already prepared certain Bills (Conventions Nos. 8, 22, 27, 33, 73, 81 and 90) and was preparing others (Conventions Nos. 13, 32 and 50) to bring national legislation into conformity with ratified Conventions. On behalf of the Minister of Labour a formal promise was made to the Committee that these Bills would be submitted to Parliament and that everything possible would be done to have them adopted. These Bills would also cover the Conventions on which observations had been made in previous years. Moreover, a committee of three eminent jurists had been established to prepare a draft Labour and Social Security Code which would consolidate existing provisions and take account of the Conventions. As this would take some time, the other committee would proceed with the Bills in order to bring existing legislation into conformity with the Conventions. Argentina had ratified 56 Conventions and the observations concerned only a limited number of points, often on points of detail.

All the reports had been sent but the necessary information had been lacking in some of them. Specific instructions had been given so that the information would be sent in the future.

The Employers' members expressed the hope that the necessary legislative measures would be adopted by next year in accordance with the formal promises which had just been made. The Government had referred to Bills for a long time; for example, ten years in the case of Convention No. 22.

The Workers' members supported the Employers' members' comments. For the past ten years the Government had been promising to bring its legislation into conformity with ratified Conventions, but the necessary measures had not yet been taken.

The Government representative stated that the political and institutional instability of the country over the last nine years had been the reason for failure to meet obligations incumbent upon it to the I.L.O. There had been 13 Ministers of Labour. Since October 1963 there had been a constitutional government and an elected parliament, and the same Minister of Labour had held office since that date. The formal promises which had been made were reaffirmed. The above-mentioned circumstances had delayed the enactment of the various Bills.

The Government took note of the formal promise made by the Government and expressed the hope that the necessary legislative amendments would be adopted by next year.

Belgium. A Government representative made the following statement:

Belgium had submitted 15 reports several months late. The Government was aware of this fact which was due to certain circumstances of an internal nature. Some ministries, due to a lack of personnel, had failed to submit the information requested to the Ministry of Labour in due time. This was an exceptional case and in future all reports would be supplied within the prescribed time limit.

Burma. The Employers' and Workers' members emphasised that Burma had sent in seven of the reports due four months after the prescribed date and had not indicated whether the reports had been communicated to the representative organisations of employers and workers. It was to be hoped that in future Burma would comply with its reporting obligations.

In reply the Government indicated that copies of the reports had in fact been communicated to the organisations concerned.

Cameroon (Eastern Cameroon). The Government communicated the following information:

Through a material error, the reports did not specify the names of the employers' and workers' organisations to which copies had been communicated (namely: Employers' organisations—Union of Trade Associations of Cameroon; The Union of Agricultural Associations of Cameroon; The Cameroon Merchants', Importers' and Exporters' Association; Workers' organisations—Federation of Trade Unions of Cameroon; The Union of Believing Trade Unions of Cameroon).
Colombia. A Government representative made the following statement:

Colombia, like many other countries, had not been able to send certain reports and replies, but they would be sent very soon. In 1955 the Government had submitted to Congress a comprehensive draft Labour Code but difficulties in the legislative procedure had prevented its adoption. Subsequently the Government had decided to present a new, more limited draft. Finally, as the Committee of Experts had noted, a Bill to amend the existing Code had been tabled in November 1964. An extraordinary session of Congress had been called to examine certain urgent Bills, including this Bill to amend the Labour Code. This Bill contained specific provisions for the application of the Conventions. Several observations made by the Experts had noted that Bills were pending to apply. In 1965 a Bill (No. 9) had been submitted with a view to ensuring the application of Conventions Nos. 22 and 23, on seamen. Another Bill (No. 6) of 1965 was designed to bring legislation into harmony with several Conventions. The Government had done everything within its power; the passage of the Bills depended on Congress.

The Workers’ members stated that the Government’s attitude, recognising the existence of the discrepancies and attempting to eliminate them, was commendable. It should also be noted with interest that a special session of Congress had been called, but it was necessary to be assured that the Bills would be adopted by next year. The Government should be able to achieve this result with the help of the Congress. The technical services of the I.L.O. might be consulted on the conformity of the draft legislation with the Conventions ratified by Colombia. If the necessary legislative measures had not been taken next year, the case would again have to be placed on the special list in 1966.

In reply, the Government representative stated that the adoption of the Bills required a two-thirds majority in Congress and sometimes this was difficult to obtain. The Government would do everything within its power, but the application of a Convention did not always depend upon the executive power.

Congo (Leopoldville). The Government communicated the following information:

Copies of the reports were communicated to the Union of the Congo, the Congolese Workers, the Federation of Congolese Workers, the Federation of Congolese Undertakings and the Association of African Middle Classes.

Costa Rica. A Government representative made the following statement:

It was indicated in paragraph 28 of the Committee of Experts’ report that three reports had not been received. The Government regretted this delay, due to administrative reasons. The report on Convention No. 111 had been sent in April 1965 and the first reports on Conventions Nos. 99 and 100 had been received in 1965. The Government had made a serious effort last year to bring its legislation up to date and into conformity with I.L.O. standards and it would endeavour to prevent any delay in the supply of future reports.

The Committee expressed the hope that, in future, reports would be supplied within the prescribed time limits.

Cuba. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Committee of Experts indicated, in paragraph 27 of its report, that the country had failed to supply information on Convention No. 67. This Convention was in fact fully supplied. The Government had particularly heavy reporting obligations since during the past year it had had to send reports on 20 ratified Conventions. The information requested in regard to this Convention would shortly be supplied.

Ecuador. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government of Ecuador was firmly determined to co-operate with the I.L.O. The Organisation was aware of the efforts that had been made by the Government from sending the reports due. The Government was doing everything possible to eliminate the obstacles which had so far prevented it from complying with its obligations; a proof of this was the adoption of certain laws providing for the organisation of competent services and the preparation of a Bill to set up in the Ministry of Labour a service entrusted with relations with the I.L.O. This last measure would permit full compliance with the obligations arising out of the Constitution of the I.L.O. The legislation in question was to be prepared after consultation with the Government. Supervision of the labour legislation and the preparation of statistics required a level of technical specialised organisation which the country was trying to obtain. Necessary measures were being taken to rectify this situation; these included the adoption of the Acts of 2 November 1964, and of 23 March and 5 May 1965. It had not been possible to supply the first reports due because of the absence of a competent service. As regards replies to observations reference should be made to the comments regarding Conventions Nos. 26 and 27.

The Employers’ members stated that the experts’ observations related to a serious failure to comply with a fundamental obligation towards the I.L.O. When a country had ratified a Convention it was under an obligation to apply it. It appeared from the reply of the Government representative that this country had ratified Conventions prematurely.

The Workers’ members regretted that the country had not asked for the help of the technical services of the I.L.O.

The Government representative stated that the Government of Ecuador had asked the I.L.O. for assistance with a view to the setting up, in the Ministry of Labour, of a service dealing with questions relating to Conventions and Recommendations.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in future comply fully with its reporting obligations.

Guatemala. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government was anxious to comply fully with its obligations in regard to ratified Conventions. A department had recently been created in the Ministry of Labour and Social Security which would enable it to meet these obligations. The Committee of Experts had indicated in paragraph 27 of its report that the Government’s reports on Conventions Nos. 79, 89 and 94 had not replied to observations; this would be done in the reports for the period ending 30 June 1965.

The Central American Labour and Social Welfare Council had set up two regional technical committees which were to study the legislation of the Central American countries and advice on modifications in the national legislations; full consideration would be given to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, whether ratified or not, in making any such modifications.

Guinea. A Government representative made the following statement:

It was correct that no reports had been sent, but this was merely a delay and the reports were now ready for despatch to the I.L.O. In the seven years since independence 20 Conventions had been ratified and the ratification of 11 others was being considered. The ratified Conventions were fully applied and in some cases the legislation was even more favourable. For example, forced labour was formally prohibited under section 3 of the Labour Code. As regards the Conventions on minimum age, section 150 of the Code prescribed a minimum age for admission to employment of 14 years in all sectors.

The Employers’ members stated that it was essential for reports to be sent within the prescribed time limits. The Government had failed to send any reports for two years. In addition, the first report due on Convention No. 105 had not been sent for two years. Finally, the Government had not replied to two observations and 12 requests of the Committee of Experts.

The Workers’ members stated that they were glad that measures were being taken to meet the Government’s reporting obligations. However, the Committee of Experts’ report indicated that reports had not been supplied for two years, including the first report on Convention No. 105. Although the Convention was always welcome, it was essential to be able to ascertain by means of reports how far it was applied. The trade unions attached great importance to this matter.

The Government representative stated that it was inconceivable for a country which had gained freedom from colonial domination to fail to ratify and apply fully Convention No. 105.
The Committee was informed at a later sitting that 15 of the 30 reports due from Guinea had just been received.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in future comply fully with its other reporting obligations.

Honduras. A Government representative made the following statement:

The position taken by Malawi on attaining independence, in regard to the four Conventions in question gave rise to difficulties in connection with Convention Nos. 50 and 64. The difficulties in connection with Convention No. 50, Article 18, provision is not made in any positive terms in the relevant ordinance for the medical examination of all recruited workers, because the medical services of Malawi are not sufficiently developed for them to accept this responsibility. Further, it would be necessary in the ordinance to ensure that all necessary measures are to be taken for the acclimatisation and adaptation of recruits to the local conditions and climate.

The fact is that no recruitment, as defined in the ordinance, of Malawi workers is authorised for employment abroad and it is not considered necessary that any acclimatisation or adaptation in the ordinary sense be given to workers recruited from one part of this country to another.

It is intended to submit trial reports on these two Conventions and await the comments of the Committee of Experts. Subject to their comments it is hoped that, in view of the explanations given above, they would accept ratification as being possible within the present legislative provisions.

The Committee was informed at a later sitting that the I.L.O. reports on Conventions Nos. 59 and 64.) The difficulties in connection with Convention, No. 29 and No. 105 are still under study and the Government of the United Kingdom but which the Government had been unable to accept on its behalf by the United Kingdom Government but which the Government had been unable to accept on joining the Organisation. It was not the Government's intention to adopt an inflexible attitude in this matter. It was, however, anxious faithfully to apply ratified Conventions. When examining the Conventions in question the Government had found that the legislation was not fully in line with their provisions. However, further examination following receipt of the Director-General's letter showed that there was no major obstacle to the acceptance of these two Conventions. The Government was now prepared to accept these two Conventions but would reserve the right to submit a conditional to the I.L.O. on its admission to membership of the I.L.O. This decision would be confirmed in writing to the I.L.O. The position in regard to Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 was more difficult. It had been necessary to accept the relevant ordinance for the medical examination of all recruited workers, because the medical services of Malawi are not sufficiently developed for them to accept this responsibility. tions. All four of the Conventions dealing with recruitment of workers, contracts of employment and forced labour, were of capital importance. These Conventions had been declared applicable to the country by the United Kingdom. In the case of Convention No. 29, it could be applied. It was essential to avoid any situation where independence led to a reduction in the social protection of workers. The full application of these Conventions as indicated by the Government, was of capital importance. These Conventions dealing with matters such as forced labour.

The Employers' members made the following statement:

The Employers' members associated themselves with all remarks made by the Workers' members. However, the Committee should also note the sense of responsibility of the Government of Malawi which had carried out a careful examination of the Conventions, so as to ascertain that they were fully implemented, before deciding to accept them. The Government representative had indicated that legislation was not now in conformity with Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 the provisions in question would soon be amended. The Employers' members shared the hope expressed by the Workers' members regarding the early modification of these legislative provisions.

Malaysia. The Government communicated the following information:

Copies of the reports submitted for the state of Sarawak were in fact communicated to the Sub-Committee on Labour Matters of the State Economic Consultative Council. The latter is a tripartite body consisting of representatives of the Government, organised labour and management. Its functions are to deliberate on the economic situation, the economic and labour policies of the Government on labour and social security matters and other specified matters in these fields that may be referred to it. The Sub-Committee on Labour Matters was set up by the State Economic Consultative Council for the express purpose of considering all matters connected with labour. The Sub-Committee too is a tripartite one representing the Government, organised labour and management.

Organised labour is represented by the National Trades Union Congress. Management is represented by the Singapore Employers' Federation, the Singapore Manufacturers' Association and the Joint Chambers of Commerce. In future the names of employers' and workers' organisations will be included in the reports.

In addition, a Government representative made the following statement:

In paragraph 27 of their report the Experts indicated that the Government had not supplied for the state of Sabah, the supplementary information requested on Convention No. 94. They had also indicated that the Government had not communicated reports for the state of Sarawak. The Government regretted these omissions, which were due to administrative difficulties because these two states had become independent only in 1963. The Government would do everything within its power in the future to frequent constitutional obligations within the prescribed time limit.

The Employers' members expressed the hope that in the future the information and reports requested would be supplied within the prescribed time limit.

Mali. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government was anxious to meet all its obligations towards the I.L.O. Reference was made in the Committee of Experts' General Report, paragraph 28, and in the General Observations, to the Government's failure to support the reports due, including certain first reports. In fact these reports had been communicated to the I.L.O. on 20 November 1964, by registered letter No. 1101. On receiving a copy of the Experts' observations the Government informed the I.L.O. by letter dated 30 April 1966, that its reports had already been sent in November 1964. Copies of these reports had been handed in to the I.L.O.

Mexico. A Government representative supplied information as regards various Conventions (see below under Conventions Nos. 8, 32, 42, 62, 63, 87 and 106). He referred in particular to legislative provisions which were more favourable than those of a ratified Convention to the fact that ratified Conventions acquired force of law under the national Constitution and could be invoked by the workers if their provisions were more favourable than those of the national law. Accordingly the Workers' members insisted on the importance of acceptance by Malawi of Conventions Nos. 29 and 105 and hoped that this would soon be agreed to by the Government, as indicated by the Government representative. The governments of all newly independent countries should realise that they must guarantee for the workers at least equal standards of living prior to independence, particularly as regards Conventions dealing with matters such as forced labour.

The Workers' members noted that the Government representative indicated that the national legislation contained provisions which were more favourable than those of several ratified Conventions. It was essential to avoid any situation where the legislation might go further than these texts, but in no case should it be in conflict with ratified Conventions. The report of the Experts mentioned a number of discrepancies and the Government regretted these omissions, which could be rectified after certain minor adjustments into harmony with the Conventions, as the Experts had suggested. The Government representative of Mexico had indicated that the workers might invoke the application of a ratified Convention if its provisions were more favourable than the national legislation. How could the workers be aware of the two texts and compare them?

The Workers' members pointed out that several members of the Committee had tried to obtain answers to specific questions, but that in general the Government questioned the accuracy of the observations made by the Committee of Experts. It was not within the power of the Government to judge the merits of the observations by the Experts, but it had to seek information on the measures proposed to deal with these observations.

The Employers' members noted that there had been no progress in its obligations under a series of ratified Conventions for a number of years.

In reply the Government representative stated that ratified Conventions prevailed over domestic legislation. The Mexican Parliament included representatives of workers from the urban and agricultural sectors. These representatives communicated the Conventions to the organisations of workers concerned. For its part, the Ministry of Labour communicated these instruments to all sectors of the economy.

The Committee regretted that there had been no progress in the elimination of divergences regarding various Conventions and expressed the hope that the necessary measures would be taken at an early date.

Nicaragua. A Government representative made the following statement:

All the reports required had been supplied. In addition to preparing these reports, acting on the instructions of the President, a comprehensive study had been prepared of the labour legislation of Nicaragua and I.L.O. Conventions. However, both had been subject to modifications. As a result of this study the Government had found that it would be possible to ratify a further 36 Conventions on the basis of existing legislation and that 31 other Conventions could be ratified after certain minor adjustments or legislative modifications. As regards the 30 Conventions already ratified by Nicaragua 15 were fully applied and the application of the remaining instruments merely called for minor legislative amendments. With the assistance of an expert from Uruguay the Government had drafted a bill to amend the 1945 Labour Code so as to meet all the comments made by the Committee of Experts in regard to ratified Conventions. The draft Code had been sent to the I.L.O. for examination in September 1966 and the latter had declared that the bill had been incorpo rated in the draft Code. The proposed amendments to the Labour Code would soon be submitted to Congress. It should be noted that the Central American countries were endeavouring to bring their legislation on labour and social security into line and that I.L.O. experts were collaborating in this task, particularly through two regional committees of the I.L.O. on labour and social security. The failure to communicate copies of the Government's reports to the representative employers' and workers' organisations was due to an administrative omission.

The legislation was very developed and went beyond the Conventions in such fields as compensation for overtime and public holidays, annual leave (including provisions for foreigners, etc. As to maritime employment and employment of women and children, changes would be made in the bill already mentioned.
The Employers' members made the following statement:

The Experts had indicated four main problems: (1) the late sending of reports; (2) the absence of information on the communication of reports to employers' and workers' organisations; (3) in respect to a number of Conventions, the necessity for legislative amendments, the absence of information or the absence of any progress; (4) the delay in sending reports. Since the redemission of Nicaragua to the I.L.O. in 1957 to the competent authorities. However, it was the first year that this country actively participated in the work of the Committee to its full advantage. The Committee should do everything possible to meet the Committee of Experts' observations.

In reply the Government representative made the following statement:

Nicaragua was a small country with limited resources. It was doing everything possible to apply I.L.O. standards. The delay in sending reports and the failure to supply information were due to administrative reasons which had prevented the necessary detailed analyses. Nicaragua had been absent from the Organisation from 1938 to 1957, and this necessitated a readjustment. Moreover, the Ministry of Labour had been established only in recent times as an independent body.

The Workers' members made the following statement:

This was a serious case, since Nicaragua had been included for several years on the special list with respect to reports 50 years ago. There had been no reply to 15 of the 18 observations or requests made by the Experts. However, the information supplied by the Government representative permitted some hope for the future.

In reply the Government representative stated that a Bill to amend the Labour Code had been prepared and sent to the I.L.O. in September 1963 for its comments. These comments had only been received recently, and it had been impossible to submit the Bill to Parliament, which met in April each year.

A number of Government members and the Employers' and Workers' members expressed satisfaction at the measures being taken to ensure the application of ratified Conventions.

The Committee noted with interest the efforts mentioned by the Government representative; it expressed the hope that the draft Labour Code would soon be adopted, and that the Government would in future comply fully with its reporting obligations.

Pakistan. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government regretted the delay in sending the reports enumerated in paragraph 21 of the Experts' report and would take steps to ensure that reports were sent in future by the prescribed date.

Panama. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government deeply regretted the fact that the Committee of Experts had found it necessary to address further observations to it. Its failure to comply with its obligations was due to certain inevitable deficiencies. Thus last year the whole country had been stirred by unfortunate events and, in addition, an electoral campaign had been held. The Government had also been actively engaged in negotiations for the revision of the 1913 Convention on the Isthmus. Finally, the country was faced with a serious unemployment setting in and 10 per cent. of the population. All these problems had caused major repercussions, whose effect was widespread in a country so small as Panama. It was hoped that the question of Panama's full membership would be solved, and that, once Panama's undoubted right to sovereignty in this area was recognised, the racial discrimination practised there would be lifted. Panama, as a Ministry of Labour, and with the recent appointment of a permanent representative in Geneva who would ensure close relationship with the I.L.O., the situation would be improved and the Government would be able to comply with its obligations.

The Workers' member of Panama indicated that the Committee had been informed of the many difficulties faced by the Government of Panama. Some improvement could be expected since on 1 May 1965 the President had promised that relations with the I.L.O. would be normalised.

The Workers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had made a general observation drawing attention to the Government's disregard of its obligation to supply reports on ratified Conventions and to the fact that nine first reports had not been supplied. The present Committee understood the difficulties facing the Government, but could not accept the view that these should prevent the supply of reports. The Employers' members stated that the information supplied by the Government member of Panama in regard to the observations made by the experts had not been satisfactory.

In reply the Government representative stated that the Government had no intention of not complying with its obligations. As already indicated, the failure to supply reports was due to the fact that there had been no Ministry of Labour, and this could not be considered as a serious breach of obligations.

Subsequently, the Government representative communicated the following information:

"The Government of Panama has so far ratified I.L.O. Conventions Nos. 3, 12, 17, 30, 42, 45, 52, 81, 87, 100 and 103. The Government is aware that, according to the I.L.O. Constitution, it is required to report in annual reports on the measures taken to apply Conventions. It regrets not having done so in time but, at the same time, gives the assurance that Panama is one of the countries which attaches most importance to these Conventions and their application.

"Unfortunately, because of circumstances entirely beyond its control, it had been unable to send the reports; however, these reports are being prepared, and the Government is confident that, if they do not arrive before the end of the Conference, they will be available very soon."

In addition the Government representative indicated in his communication that the Government of Panama had attached the greatest interest and the greatest importance to the application of the above-mentioned Conventions, as to all treaties which it had ratified, and that accordingly the present communication might be considered as a preliminary report.

The Workers' members stated that the Committee should note with interest that this communication gave ground for hope. The Committee noted with interest the explanations supplied and the communication which had been received from the Government representative. It noted with regret the difficulties experienced by the Government, the Committee expressed the hope that with the setting up of a Ministry of Labour and the appointment of a permanent representative in Geneva, the Government would in future find it possible to discharge fully its obligations under the Constitution of the I.L.O.

Peru. A Government representative made the following statement:

Peru had not been able in the past to fulfil all its obligations concerning the sending of reports because of administrative difficulties. However, 31 reports for the period 1962-64 had recently been sent to the I.L.O.

Portugal. A Government representative made the following statement:

Inquiries were being made concerning the sending of additional information on Convention No. 107. Information had been sent by letter E.C.54 of 3 February 1965 at the same time as that on Convention No. 111.

Romania. A Government representative made the following statement:

The delegate regretted the delay in sending seven of its reports. All 12 reports due, however, had been sent, five in the prescribed time. The preparation of the reports had necessitated consultation with various ministries and secretaries, which explained the delay. In future, every effort would be made to send reports on time.

The Employers' members expressed the hope that, in accordance with the promises made, there would be no cause for comments next year on the sending of reports.
El Salvador. A Government representative made the following statement:

The necessary information had not been sent because of force majeure; recent earthquakes had imposed governmental activities. The Government had decided to fulfil all its obligations to the I.L.O. The Regional Central Authorities had been at present studying the unification of labour and social security legislation, taking Conventions into account, and this had interrupted the action of the Government. The Government would not spare any effort to fulfil its obligations in the near future.

The Workers' members expressed the hope that all the necessary information would be communicated by next year.

In reply the Government representative gave the assurance that El Salvador would fulfill all its obligations next year.

Senegal. A Government representative made the following statement:

Although reports had not been sent, one could be assured that the legislation fully applied the Conventions and was even more favourable. Administrative difficulties had prevented the sending of reports in time. In future all reports would be sent in a satisfactory manner.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would in future comply fully with its reporting obligations.

Sudan. A Government representative made the following statement:

Sudan had been subject to military dictatorship for six years, and the Government's failure to supply reports was the responsibility of this past régime. With the change of government the Labour Department was being reorganised and might become a separate ministry. This should facilitate measures for dealing with matters relating to the I.L.O. It was important to ensure the proper training of labour officers in the I.L.O. reporting procedures, particularly since many such officers had resigned during the régime. It was hoped that in future the Government would be able to comply with its reporting obligations within the prescribed time limits.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would now find it possible to discharge satisfactorily its reporting obligations under article 22 of the Constitution.

Tanzania. A Government representative made the following statement:

Administrative difficulties had existed, particularly following the union of Tanganyika and Zanzibar. The necessary measures would be taken and the Government would communicate, in the information requested. Concerning Convention No. 105 the definition of "forced labour" had given rise to certain discussions, and the Government was seeking "appropriate solutions in co-operation with the I.L.O."

The Employers' members stated that the task of supervision was made impossible when all necessary information was not supplied.

The Government representative stated that complete reports would be supplied by next year.

Trinidad and Tobago. A Government representative made the following statement:

Trinidad and Tobago had achieved independence less than three years ago. As with other developing countries, one of the problems which faced it was a shortage of trained personnel to work with such matters relating to notification and submission in proper time of reports on Conventions. There was also the question of priorities to be given to other programmes which made great demands on the limited staff available. All outstanding reports on ratified Conventions had subsequently been sent to the Office, and additional steps were being taken to ensure that in future all reports would be sent within the proper time. In this regard an increase of staff in the Ministry of Labour had been provided for and a request for help in training officers to deal with the preparation of reports was being made.

U.S.S.R. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Committee of Experts had referred once again to the fact that it had been unable to consult the Labour Codes of the various Republics of the Union. As already indicated by the Government, these Codes would be communicated to the Committee as soon as they had been adopted. In this connection it should be noted that, three years ago, the Government had forwarded the Labour Code of the Turkmen Republic and this fact had never been supplied appropriate and regular information was due to difficulties of administrative organisation. However, in 1961 a tripartite working party responsible for I.L.O. questions had been established and had already achieved some results. Likewise in December 1964 a decree had been adopted to establish the necessary co‐ordination between government services with a view to preparing reports and information to send to the I.L.O. Finally, in April 1964 a permanent mission of Uruguay had been established in Geneva and it would be able to ensure the due transmission of reports and information. From next year the situation with respect to the sending of reports would certainly be satisfactory. The Ministry of Industry and Labour had sent to the I.L.O. the reports on ratified Conventions for 1962-64 as well as several Bills on sickness insurance, work of young persons, road transport, night work of women, maternity protection and employment services. A Decree of 1963 had created in the Ministry a department responsible for compiling labour statistics. The various administrative measures and Bills mentioned illustrated the efforts of Uruguay to fulfil its obligations to the I.L.O. Although information had not been supplied, maternity protection and the protection of women in general were fully ensured in Uruguay in the public sector, in industry and in commerce. This statement was confirmed by the Employers' delegate of Uruguay.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee could not carry out its task if it did not receive the necessary information to fulfils their obligation to send reports and reply to the Experts' observations and requests. Uruguay had not replied to the observations and the requests regarding nine Conventions and had not sent reports on Conventions on which the Committee of Experts had made comments. The various observations of the Experts showed that in a number of cases there had been no progress. The Government had replied to only six of the 23 observations and requests.

The Workers' members stated that for many years there had existed serious discrepancies and that the Government had not eliminated them. It had been necessary to put the case on the special list in 1960, 1961, 1962 and 1964. This year the Experts had noted that no reply had been given concerning the observations on 49 of the Conventions in question (Nos. 1, 27, 30, 43, 62 and 73), some of which dated back to 1957, and they had been obliged to repeat their observations. In the absence of the Experts, the Committee had also been the case for Conventions Nos. 34 and 94. Concerning Convention No. 52, the new decree mentioned by the Government in fact aggravated the discrepancies. The whole situation was disappointing and disturbing. Urgent measures were necessary. The Committee noted that the setting up of a mission in Geneva would enable the Government to improve its communications with the I.L.O. and express the hope that the necessary measures would be taken within the near future.

Venezuela. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government regretted that the reports had not been sent in due time. This delay was due to purely administrative difficulties. Reports on 15 Conventions had been sent to the I.L.O. on 26 May 1965.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 1 : Hours of Work (Industry), 1919.

Czechoslovakia (ratification : 1921). A Government representative made the following statement:

The draft Labour Code was about to be discussed by the National Assembly which had been summoned for this purpose to meet on 15 June 1965. The new Code took account of the provisions of the Conventions and would close the existing divergencies. Its adoption could be expected in the very near future.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Bill for the amendment of the Labour Code would ensure legislative conformity with the Convention. However, many collective agreements already made up for the omissions in the Code.

Peru (ratification : 1945). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Bill had not yet been approved. The committee drafting the Labour Code had been established by law and comprised representatives of political parties, Parliament, the Government and also employers' and workers' organisations. It was hoped that it would complete its work in August this year.

An Employers' member noted that no progress had been made, as the Bill, mentioned in 1964, had not been adopted. It was hoped that the new draft Labour Code would be satisfactory.

The Workers' members recalled that the Convention had been ratified 20 years ago and was not yet fully applied. The Government had made every effort to ensure that the necessary legislation was adopted this year.

In reply, the Government representative pointed out that the work of the drafting committee did not depend exclusively on the executive and that its composition guaranteed compliance with its objectives, as it included representatives of the various sectors concerned.

Spain (ratification : 1929). The Government communicated the following information:

As already indicated, the national legislation and practice fully comply with the provisions of this Convention in all branches and sectors of activities, and that the regulations on conditions of work which are adopted in consultation with representatives from the employers' and workers' organisations, in accordance with the Act of 16 October 1942, and which constitute a genuine statute of labour for each branch of labour activities, do not imply any restriction of the provisions of this Convention.

The Employers' members stated that in view of the delay in the receipt of reports it was impossible to know whether any progress had been made as regards the various points raised by the Experts. Last year the Government representative had stated that the reports would be submitted within the prescribed time limits; this had not been done.

The Committee of Experts had informed that 15 reports had been received too late, and that two reports were missing. The Committee of Experts had made four observations and ten direct requests; the reports received contained replies to these measures and requests.

The Government representative stated that the discussions which had taken place in the Committee would be communicated to the Government so that it could take the necessary measures.

Viet-Nam. The Government communicated the following information:

Owing to certain circumstances of the present political conditions in Viet-Nam, it is physically impossible for the Minister of Labour to supply to the I.L.O. the reports requested within the prescribed dates; he has had to concentrate all his efforts in finding an immediate and urgent solution of the present crucial problems. In spite of these circumstances the necessary instructions have been given to the responsible services to speed up the preparation of these reports with a view to their communication to the I.L.O. at an early date.

It should be noted that even presuming, for the purpose of discussion, that the labour regulations could modify, to the prejudice of the worker, the general legal provisions on maximum hours of work, they would be without effect because of the priority which these provisions have in the application of the standards of the labour contract over those contained in the regulations, except where these latter, which is often the case, lay down conditions more favourable for the worker; all this is derived from section 9 of the Act concerning Contracts of Employment of 26 January 1944. It should also be pointed out that according to section 23 of the Act on the Legal Status of the State Administration of 26 July 1957, no administrative provision shall prejudice the provisions of a superior grade and that, moreover, there is a control of the legality of all administrative provisions, including the Decrees by the Council of Ministers, by means of administrative contentious recourse to the Supreme Court, in accordance with the Act of 27 December 1946.

Furthermore, as it has already been indicated on previous occasions, in the cases where the Committee of Experts had pointed out the existence of some provisions which might not be completely clear, these were amended rapidly, as for example the provisions relating to hours of work in road transport in 1961.

The Government has not abandoned its proposal to adopt a new general legislative labour text, which has not yet been submitted to the Cortes, because it is to constitute not only a mere recapitulation of the existing standards, but is also to include new legal provisions which should be truly progressive and in favour of the workers.

The fact that standards on hours of work, in so far as they are more favourable, are not included in the Act, is not only in the Act of 9 September 1934 but also in the regulations and the collective agreements, cannot and does not mean that there is an infringement of Convention No. 1, but on the contrary that they ensure fuller compliance with it.

In addition, a Government representative made the following statement:

It should be emphasised that when the Committee of Experts had pointed out the existence of some regulations which might not be completely clear, these had been amended rapidly, as for example in 1961 (hours of work in road transport). The draft general text had as its sole purpose to establish a single and clear text, which would also permit the Committee of Experts to satisfy itself as to the situation in the country.

Venezuela (ratification : 1944). A Government representative made the following statement:

Although the legislation had not so far been suitably amended, various collective agreements applying to a large number of workers contained fully satisfactory standards.

Convention No. 3 : Maternity Protection, 1919. Federal Republic of Germany (ratification : 1927). A Government representative made the following statement:

Bills at present before Parliament contained amendments designed to bring the Maternity Protection Act into conformity with the Convention. New provisions for nursing breaks were proposed which fully corresponded to Article 3 (d). It was also provided in the Bill that all women covered by the Maternity Protection Act shall receive maternity benefits in accordance with the provisions of the State Insurance Code. Under a proposal submitted to Parliament the Federal Government would reimburse the sickness insurance funds their expenditure on maternity benefits. As it was very likely that these proposals would be adopted by Parliament, the Government hoped that the existing problems concerning Article 3 (e) and (d) would be settled. In these circumstances it seemed unnecessary at present to comment with respect to the provisions of the Federal Social Assistance Act.

The possibility of amending section 9 of the Maternity Protection Act absolutely and without exceptions the giving of notice to a pregnant woman worker had not yet been raised in Parliament. However, this matter was also likely to be raised.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The possibility that the provisions of the Labour Code would remove the remaining divergences with the Convention was also likely to be raised.

Convention No. 4 : Night Work (Women), 1919.

Afghanistan (ratification : 1939). The Government communicated the following information:

Section 81 C of the text of the draft Labour Law does, in fact, specifically prohibit night work by women. Moreover, this matter is somewhat theoretical as the custom of the country would make it virtually impossible for any industrial undertaking to employ women at night.

Chile (ratification : 1931). A Government representative made the following statement:

The present legislation which prohibited the night work of women applied only to women engaged on manual work. The new Government had, however, appointed a committee which was preparing a general revision of labour and social security legislation. The revised text of the Labour Code would ensure the extension of the prohibition to prevent young persons engaged in night employment and also to domestic workers. The legislation would thus be brought into full and formal conformity with the Convention.

In reply to the question the Government representative indicated that the government majority in Congress would permit the adoption of the revised labour legislation. In practice, the problems of night work hardly arose for non-manual workers. The Employers' members welcomed the steps being taken by the Government. The Employers' members expressed satisfaction at the measures being taken to ensure the full application of the Convention.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The observation made by the Committee of Experts was not entirely justified. Although night work was not specifically prohibited in Nicaragua the labour inspection regulations expressly required inspectors to ensure that neither young persons under 14 years nor women were employed in night work. The proposed amendment of the Labour Code would bring the legislation into formal compliance with the Convention. This measure would not modify the situation since the above-mentioned regulations already ensured a full application of the Convention.

Convention No. 5 : Minimum Age (Industry), 1919.

Denmark (ratification : 1923). A Government representative made the following statement:

It was the Government's intention to ensure the full application of Article 4 of the Convention. Modifications in the occupational safety, health and welfare legislation had been prepared; once these were enacted, regulations would be issued to require the keeping of the registers in question. However, the new legislation was a comprehensive Bill and, although it was hoped that it would soon be enacted, it was not possible to specify exactly when this would be achieved.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

Although no provision was made for registers of young workers, the employment of young persons under 14 years of age was prohibited and numerous provisions existed in the Labour Code to protect young persons. The proposed amendment of the Labour Code would bring legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 6 : Night Work of Young Persons (Industry), 1919.

Hungary (ratification : 1928). A Government representative made the following statement:

Night work for young persons under the age of 16 years was prohibited. As regards young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years night work was limited to the persons employed on night work was very limited, since apprentices did not work at night and there was a long list of occasions prohibited for female workers. In addition, they were subject to medical examination before taking up employment and, in the exceptional cases where night work was permitted, to further examination every two months. If this examination showed that night work might be prejudicial to the persons concerned their employment was prohibited.

Under regulations adopted at the end of 1964 the trade unions' labour inspectors might prohibit the employment of these young persons and impose fines on employers who violated this prohibition. The great majority of young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years were not workers properly so-called because they either followed secondary education courses or were apprentices. Consequently, the differences between practice and the provisions of the Convention were negligible. The reason why the legislation had not yet been brought into full conformity with the Convention was mainly the desire to lay down general standards for the whole economy, and not only for industry. Young persons employed in commerce and agriculture must not feel that they were being made the object of discrimination. The Government was fully aware of the fact that its legislation in this respect was not perfect and the reason for not having modified it as yet was not that it disagreed with the observations made by the Committee of Experts but that it had not yet completed the study which was being undertaken. It would do its utmost to remedy the situation.

The Employers' members urged the Government to hope that conformity between the legislation and the provisions of this Convention, which was ratified in 1926, would be achieved as soon as possible.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). See under Convention No. 4.

Convention No. 7 : Minimum Age (Sea), 1920.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The employment of young persons under 14 years of age on board ship was in general prohibited, but this prohibition did not apply to coastal shipping. The national legislation would be modified in this respect also.

Convention No. 8 : Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck), 1920.

Mexico (ratification : 1937). A Government representative made the following statement:

The discrepancies mentioned by the Experts were of a technical nature and were due to different interpretations of the national legislation. The Experts referred to the Navigation and Maritime Trade Act of 1903, but not to section 40 of this Act which provided a guarantee for payment of unemployment indemnity in case of shipwreck. The Committee of Experts asked the Government to confirm that the insurance to which section 211 of the General Communications Act referred included payment of compensation for unemployment arising out of a shipwreck. The payment of this allowance was ensured by the Federal Labour Act, whose provisions were wider than those of the Convention, since they guaranteed the payment of unemployment benefits in all cases of force majeure, including shipwreck. Moreover, the collective agreements applicable to the Mexican Oil Company, which had the largest ship in the country, as well as collective agreements concluded with the fishermen's co-operatives, contained more favourable provisions than those of the Convention. Furthermore, any breach of contract, as well as the in the Convention, which had become municipal law, by its ratification, by virtue of article 133 of the Constitution. Under section 211 of the Labour Code, the captain of a ship was not allowed to proceed on the voyage if he did not prove that all members of the crew benefited from industrial accident and sickness insurance. In accordance with the Federal Labour Act, the minimum wage amounted to three months' wages and under the collective agreements of the Oil Company to six months, plus cated by the final allowances and benefits. An Employers' member indicated that the statement by the Government representative did not reply to the observations by the Experts in a satisfactory manner. It was not certain whether the national provisions were in conformity with the Convention. The Experts had also requested the Government to amend section 126, paragraph XII, of the Federal Labour Act by removing the conditions attached thereto for the payment of benefit. No information had been supplied by the Government as regards the measures taken to this effect. In its representation made the following statement: Notwithstanding the fact that the amendment of this section would be contrary to the interests of the workers since it laid down more favourable provisions in respect to all cases of force majeure. See also under "General Observations". Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement: The Government agreed with the observations made by the Committee of Experts and the proposed amendment of the Labour Code would bring the legislation into conformity with this Convention. Convention No. 9 : Placing of Seamen, 1929. Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement: There was no specific prohibition in the legislation but in fact there were no employment agencies in the country other than those run by the Government. Convention No. 11 : Right of Association (Agriculture), 1921. Chile (ratification : 1925). The Government communicated the following information: A Bill which completely repeals Book III of the Labour Code of 1921 contemplates substantial reform in the system of trade unionism which has been submitted to the National Congress. The Bill contains uniform standards for trade union organisations of both public and private enterprises. Its result would permit fuller compliance with the Convention. (A copy of the draft Bill has been communicated by the Government.) A Government representative made the following statement: The Government had submitted to Congress proposals for the replacement of Book III of the Labour Code, relating to trade unions, this text, which would improve the position of agricultural workers in this respect, and which had been drafted with the assistance of an I.L.O. expert, was before the Chamber of Deputies. In addition to ensuring the application of Convention No. 11, it would permit the ratification of Conventions Nos. 87 and 98. In its statement before the Chamber of Deputies, the President of the Republic had indicated on 1 May 1965 the Government's intention to ratify Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 and this would imply the repeal of section 6 of the trade union regulations. This would present no difficulties as it involved a measure adopted by the Government. Argentina (ratification : 1936). See under "General Observations". Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement: The proposed amendment of the Labour Code would bring the legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos. 13, 15 and 16. In practice, Convention No. 16 was already applied in virtue of collective agreements. Convention No. 14 : Weekly Rest (Industry), 1921. China (ratification : 1934). The Government communicated the following information: As declared at the time of ratification, this Convention is applicable only to factories which come within the scope of section I of the Factories Act; but, in fact, many workers other than those who work in such factories also enjoy weekly rest. Some factories were found by inspectors to be not strictly enforcing the relevant provisions in the Factories Act and corrective sanctions were taken by the inspectorate. The Government will see to it that such provisions will be faithfully observed and their coverage enlarged. The draft Labour Code mentioned in the observation is being revised by a special committee in the light of comments made by the Committee of Experts. Turkey (ratification : 1946). The Government communicated the following information: The new draft Labour Code extends the scope of the labour law to all industrial and commercial workplaces and to undertakings employing even one worker and, as regards the trade union movement, he could ensure compulsory for workers in towns with less than 10,000 inhabitants. It is hoped that this Bill, which is under consideration by various committees in the National Assembly, will be adopted before next November. Convention No. 15 : Minimum Age (Trimmers and Stokers), 1921. Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). See under Convention No. 13. Convention No. 16 : Medical Examination of Young Persons (Sea), 1921. Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). See under Convention No. 13. Convention No. 17 : Workmen's Compensation (Accidents), 1925. Chile (ratification : 1931). A Government representative made the following statement: Considerable progress had been made in the revision of the legislation relating to safety and industrial safety. A Bill to this effect was now being considered by the Senate and the Health and Safety Committee of the Chamber of Deputies. It provided in particular for compulsory insurance against accidents and occupational hazards, and for a pension in all cases of invalidity. The proposed modification of the legislation had been prepared with the assistance of an I.L.O. expert. In the firm intention of the President and of Parliament to enact the Bill, which had long been desired by the workers.
The Employers' members welcomed the steps being taken by the Government.

The Committee expressed satisfaction at the measures being taken to ensure the full application of the Convention.

Convention No. 20 : Night Work (Bakeries), 1925.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

Last year special regulations had been issued to prohibit night work in bakeries. This would enable Nicaragua to ratify this Convention once again.

Spain (ratification : 1923). The Government communicated the following information:

After the adoption of the Order dated 9 June 1964, which modified section 33 of the Law of 13 January 1925, the Government had noted the Committee of Experts' observations and the possibility of a convention which would be consistent with the Convention. As was reported in 1964 the resolution of 5 July 1961, to which the Committee of Experts has referred, ceased to have effect and a copy of the said new resolution will be appended to next year's report, and is also attached hereto.

Convention No. 22 : Seamen's Articles of Agreement, 1926.

Argentina (ratification : 1950). The Employers' members recalled that the Government had been referring for ten years to a Bill which was to ensure conformity with the Convention.

In reply, a Government representative stated that there had been two successive Bills, in 1959 and 1962, to adapt the legislation to the maritime Conventions, but that their enactment had been delayed. See also under "General Observations".

Federal Republic of Germany (ratification : 1930). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government had noted the Committee of Experts' observations. Consultations with employers' and workers' organisations were continuing. The Government, which still maintained its previously expressed view of the legal position, would immediately on conclusion of these consultations provide information concerning their outcome.

The Workers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany made the following statement:

The relationship between Article 9 of the Convention and section 63 of the Seamen's Act of 1957, it should be noted, could be considered as a basic provision of the Convention since it aims at guaranteeing the seaman's freedom of choice and movement. If the fact that a seaman whose agreement was terminated abroad would not be able to afford the travelling expenses back to the Federal Republic and the prospects of other employment might be too uncertain to consider that the provisions existing in the Federal Republic ensured protection at least equivalent to that required by Article 9. The Committee of Experts might reconsider the matter. The Convention should not be considered as a basic provision of the Convention since in cases in which the Government had taken place; the fact that in certain cases the employers had not participated was due to their failure to nominate representatives. The Committee of Experts had also pointed out that a certain number of countries had modified their legislation, or were taking steps to do so, subject to Article 9. The Committee of Experts had also considered the position of seafarers as regards repatriation expenses and it had noted that, under Convention No. 23 (which had been ratified by 24 States including the Federal Republic of Germany), a seafarer whose agreement was terminated abroad was entitled to be taken back to his own country, or to the port at which he was engaged, or to the port at which the voyage commenced.

The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that the Committee had fully agreed with the views expressed by the Workers' member from the Federal Republic of Germany. The national provisions were more favourable than the terms of Convention No. 9 of the Convention. The question should be reconsidered, particularly in relation to the effect on this problem of Convention No. 23, and to the possible overlapping between Conventions Nos. 22 and 23, both of which had been ratified by the Federal Republic of Germany.

The Government representative stated that the above discussion had shown that the members from the Federal Republic of Germany agreed with the Government's views that the national legislation was more favourable than the terms of Convention No. 22. This Convention might be included amongst those whose revision was to be considered as from next year.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government agreed with the observations made by the Committee of Experts. The proposed amendment of the Labour Code would bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 23 : Repatriation of Seamen, 1926.

Nicaragua (ratification : 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government did not share the general observation made by the Committee of Experts. Chapter 5 of the Labour Code ensured the application of the Convention and the legislation mentioned by the Experts was not relevant. The Government's views on this matter were set out in detail in the volume of Nicaraguan Labour legislation which had been communicated to the I.L.O.

Convention No. 24 : Sickness Insurance (Industry), 1927.

Romania (ratification : 1929). A Government representative made the following statement:

The information requested by the Experts could not be sent because amendments to the legislation were being made. As soon as they were adopted a detailed report would be sent. At present the Convention was applied. All wage earners without distinction were covered by state social insurance which provided benefits in cases of incapacity due to sickness or accident. In 1964 more than 4 million wage earners were protected. The workers of producers' and craftsmen's co-operatives, writers, artists, sculptors, composers, etc., were also protected by their special schemes. Benefits were from 60 to 90 per cent. of fixed rate of pay per cent. of fixed rate of pay irrespective of length of service. For industrial accidents or diseases the rate was 90 per cent. in all cases. Workers had free medical care for themselves and their families. The employers had been fully protected. Payments were made under the direction and supervision of trade unions. Agricultural workers in producers' co-operatives were protected under the regulations of the co-operatives and that agricultural workers employed in state undertakings were covered by state insurance like all other employees.

The Employers' and Workers' members expressed the hope that the new legislation and a complete report would be sent as soon as possible.

Convention No. 26 : Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery, 1928.

Ecuador (ratification : 1954). A Government representative made the following statement:

In more than 200 cases of wage fixing, previous consultation of the Employers' and Workers' representatives had taken place; the fact that in certain cases the employers had not participated was due to their failure to nominate representatives.

The Committee was informed that there seemed to be some relationship between the observations by the Experts concerning the lack of consultation of representatives from employers' and workers' organisations and the absence of representatives from these organisations at this Conference.

In an additional written communication to the Chairman of the Committee of Experts, the Government representative indicated that, in cases in which the Government had fixed wages, it had done so at the request of the workers. and the employers failed to appoint representatives as stated in the preamble of the relevant regulations.

Uruguay (ratification: 1933). The Uruguayuan Workers’ representative made the following statement:

"It was true that there had been an effective application of the standards in Conventions, as the Government representative had stated (see "General Observations", Uruguay). However, certain standards were not respected as for example with respect to the Convention on minimum wage fixing in the case of workers in the cold storage industry in the interior of the country (except for those who worked in the Anglo works as discards at a lower treatment), existed, different wages being fixed for identical jobs for which there were higher wage rates in the capital. The Workers’ representative of Uruguay was transmitting all relevant information to the I.L.O.

A Government representative stated in reply that this question would be brought to the attention of the Government so that it might take any necessary measures.

Convention No. 27: Marking of Weight (Packages Trans­ported by Vessels), 1929.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1934). A Government rep­resentative made the following statement:

"In practice, marking of weight was the responsibility of shippers. Certain collective agreements provided for this. It would be an interesting question, perhaps before the adoption of the general Bill.

Convention No. 28: Protection Against Accidents (Dockers), 1929.

Nicaragua (ratification: 1934). A Government rep­resentative made the following statement:

"The necessary changes would be made. It should be noted that only four countries had ratified this Convention, which was no longer open to ratification.

Convention No. 29: Forced Labour, 1930.

Congo (Leopoldville) (ratification: 1960). A Govern­ment representative made the following statement:

"The particular situation of the Congo and its political, economic and social problems were known to the Committee. After the departure of the United Nations forces foreign aid had been in abundance, a rebellion was drawing principally on delinquent youths who had not been to school. During this period the Government and the Parliament had been unable to function normally. Under the new Government of Mr. Tschombé there had been very real improvement.

The failure to supply reports on Convention No. 29 and replies to the Experts’ requests for several years was due to the special problems. Colonial legislation permitted compulsory portage in certain regions as well as restrictions on the freedom of cultivation and certain cor­munal work. These services had been repugnant to the population and some politicians had based their propa­ganda on promises to abolish them. In demogogic manœuvres these politicians had called on the rural popu­lation to cease all work. The result was that famine existed in several regions. The country had to import maize and rice which it had previously exported. It also had to import cotton in order to avoid work stoppages in the spinning mills and unemployment. The Government had the firm intention of applying the policy defined by the Convention but a period of transition would be necessary. It was certain that there were other methods to arouse the rural masses and make them participate in the country’s economic life without which these were slow and required qualified staff and capital. The country had to find new methods for ensuring the proper functioning of the system of distribution. Free elections had just been held. Parliament would meet at the end of June and the Ministry of Labour would submit a file on this question. It was hoped that Parliament would be able to consider the problems raised by the Convention in the near future. The Government considered that a reexamination of Convention No. 29 would be opportune for the needs of the developing countries where the rural masses lived in a subsistence economy. This indicated no intention to re-establish a form of slavery; the Government had decided to abolish all forms of forced labor within the period of transition was completed.

The Committee took note of the difficulties indicated and expressed the hope that these would soon be over­come.

Liberia (ratification: 1931). The Government commu­nicated the following information:

Paragraph 429 of the report of the Commission appointed under article 26 of the I.L.O. Constitution. A Handbook of Labour Law of the Republic of Liberia has been produced by the Bureau of Labour as the current labour legislation together with brief law sum­maries in layman’s language and the Bureau of Labour’s interpretations of difficult sections. It is expected that later editions of the Handbook will contain the text of the various I.L.O. Conventions.

Paragraph 453. The inspectorate service of the Division of Labour Standards of the Bureau of Labour informs itself of and investigates complaints made by workers through the Bureau before they reach the Labour Practices Review Board.

Paragraphs 454 to 459 and Part IV of the report form adopted by the Governing Body. The inspection figures furnished for the industrial undertakings in the country from the first half of June 1964 included inspections of plantations, etc. Since the major proportion of agricultural output in the country is produced on plantations owned by large international concerns and because the rubber, coffee, etc., undergo processing upon such plantations, the inspections thereof were erroneously included in the industrial undertakings.

A Government representative made the following statement:

"With regard to paragraphs 419 and 420 of the report of the Committee of Inquiry appointed under Article 26, the Bill which was to amend section 1502 of the Labour Practices Law and section 346 of the Penal Law was before the Senate, which was in session, and it was hoped that this Bill would soon be approved. As regards para­graph 421 of the report a second draft of the Bill of Labour Law was being prepared; it would include the text of all Conventions ratified by Liberia. A copy of this new edition would be attached to the Government’s next report. As regards paragraphs 444, 445, 446, negotiations were under way for the modification of the clauses by which the Government undertook to assist certain companies to secure an adequate labour force. Any changes had to be approved by the Legislature and it was hoped to have this done by the time the next report was sent. As regards paragraph 446 steps had been taken to prevent abuses in the employment practices of various concerns, by setting up an employment bureau through which the Government could supervise the recruitment of all labour. As regards paragraph 451, the above-mentioned employment bureau ensured the elimination of any possible abuse in regard to the construction and maintenance of secondary roads and provided for full supervision of the recruitment by the Government.

With regard to points on which the Commission of Inquiry had made specific recommendations. Already in the past the task of the supervisory bodies had been hampered by the repeated failures of Liberia in sending reports. In spite of the formal assurances given by the Government the reports contained to be submitted to the Committee of Inquiry seemed not to have been done.

1. Certain amendments to the legislation should have been adopted in the 1963-64 legislative session.
2. Legislative approval should have been sought in the 1962-63 legislative session to the deletion from the Firestone Concession Agreement of the clause concerning government assistance in securing labour.

3. The similar clause in the concession of the Liberian Mining Company had fully been rescinded and the legislative approval to this alteration sought in the 1963-64 legislative session.

4. All other agreements should have been reviewed with a view to the abrogation of such clauses by the 1963-64 legislative session.

5. A thorough review should have been made of policy and practice concerning the construction and maintenance of secondary roads and public works, with a view to eliminating any remaining abuses. Last year the Government had requested legislative revision as providing sufficient protection and this year it confined itself to mentioning the general activities of the labour inspectorate. In view of past abuses in this work, the special review recommended by the Commission of Inquiry should have been made.

6. The Commission of Inquiry had recommended publication of the Conventions ratified by Liberia with an indication of the effect of their ratification on national legislation. Last year the Government pointed out that the Conventions were to be reproduced in a handbook of labour law. It appeared that this handbook had been published in the text of the Conventions.

The Government's failure to act on the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry was a matter for serious concern. The necessary measures should be taken without delay in important cases.

The Employers' members supported the statements made by the Workers' members and expressed the hope that the question would be given the attention that it deserved and that reports would be sent by the dates requested.

A Workers' member noted that there were numerous discrepancies between the situation in Liberia and the Convention. The Government representative made the following statement:

"The Convention was fully applied. The Experts' observation related only to the sending of legislative texts. These would be sent in the near future."

A Government representative made the following statement:

"Upper Volta (ratification; 1960). A Government representative made the following statement:

Considerable discussion had already taken place in 1962 on these questions. The discrepancies related to the letter to the spirit of the text to which they were applied. The points concerning the utilisation of military and civic service should be examined having regard to developing countries. There should be no objection to teaching young conscripts also to use the hoe or the plough. It was to be hoped that the I.L.O., would review this question; the Convention might be revised. The Government hoped that it would not have to renounce this Convention, the objectives of which it respected. The peoples of countries which had previously struggled against forced labour could not accept it after their independence. Concerning the Decree of 4 December 1950 on prisons, it was a text adopted prior to independence which through inadvertence had not been revised, but which hinged a lot to private persons or undertakings. This text would be amended. Concerning work exacted in case of non-payment of taxes by the form of other measures such as agrarian reform and the development of the co-operative movement; these questions appeared on the agenda of the Conference this year. Above all an employment policy should be worked out; this policy might be based on the instruments adopted last year on this subject. His own country had in the past experienced the unfortunate consequences of forced labour."

A Government member (France) stated that he should avoid the repetition of the mistakes of the past, to be taken before reaching any definite conclusions. It was not clear to what extent the work carried out in Upper Volta under military service might not constitute a system of vocational training.

A Workers' member stated that the question under discussion was not vocational training or the voluntary participation of the population in the improvement of the conditions of life of the citizens, but the compulsory utilisation of the population for civilian work. Convention No. 29 contained a very clear definition of forced labour. While understanding the desire among the African countries to speed up development, it should be emphasised that such work was carried out on a voluntary basis. The Committee of Experts was absolutely right in saying that the work in question in Upper Volta should be organised on a voluntary basis.

A Government member (U.S.S.R.) stated that one should await the results of the social survey undertaken before reaching any definite conclusions. It was not clear to what extent the work carried out in Upper Volta under military service might not constitute a system of vocational training.

to understand the situation. In any case, no publicity ought to be given to this matter because that might be detrimental to the cause of the African countries, instead of helping them.

Convention No. 30 : Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices), 1930.

Convention No. 32 : Protection against Accidents (Dockers) (Revised), 1932.

Argentina (ratification: 1930). See under "General Observations".

China (ratification: 1935). The Government communicated the following information:

The observations made by the Committee of Experts are being carefully studied by the competent authorities. However, the Convention is applicable to dockers by virtue of section 2 of the Regulations governing the protection of dockers against accidents, jointly promulgated by the Ministry of the Interior and the Ministry of Communications on 17 May 1960.

Convention No. 34 : Fee-Charging Employment Agencies, 1933.

Mexico (ratification: 1934). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Committee of Experts referred to certain articles of the Convention which it considered not to be applied. To do away with certain gaps in the national legislation, the Ministry of Labour had requested the Ministry of Shipping to take the necessary measures. The latter Ministry had reported that the text of the Convention had been brought to the notice of the port authorities, as well as the oil company which employed the greatest number of dockers and the labour inspectors in charge of supervising the application of national provisions. In virtue of article 133 of the Federal Constitution all parts of the country are to be set up as a whole employment exchange system. The text of the Convention had been regarded as regards this category of workers. The Government had done everything possible to apply this Convention. It would, however, be glad to receive any proposals to improve the situation.

The Employers' members pointed out that this Convention had been ratified more than 30 years ago and in order to meet the increase in the number of employments given by the Government no measures had been taken to take account of the observations by the Experts. Proposals on means of improving the situation had been made by the Committee. See also under "General Observations".

Convention No. 35 : Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.), 1933.

France (ratification: 1939). The Government communicated the following information:

The Government does not agree with the opinion of the Committee of Experts. It act of 30 June 1956 establishing the National Solidarity Fund and the subsequent texts do not constitute a scheme of compulsory old-age insurance falling within the scope of the Convention. In fact, the separate legislation gives it the character of assistance in supplement of old-age insurance since the National Solidarity Fund covers persons entitled to social aid benefits as well as persons entitled to old-age benefits.

Moreover, under section 25 of the Act of 30 June 1956 the supplementary allowance is due only when a reciprocity agreement has been signed. France has signed many reciprocity agreements giving foreigners residing in France and entitled to basic benefits under the French insurance system. The Government has not signed any difficulty in bringing its legislation into conformity with the existing practice and with the Convention which had been ratified over 25 years ago.

A Government representative stated that the Government considered that the Convention was fully applied. It did not agree with the views of the Experts since the supplementary allowance was a form of assistance and not a social security benefit. In any case the matter was of little practical importance since because of bilateral agreements the majority of foreigners residing in France could in fact receive this allowance.

The Workers' members noted that the question was whether the supplementary payment should be granted to all foreigners or might be limited to those covered by a reciprocity agreement. According to Article 12, paragraph 2 of the Convention foreign insured persons and their dependants were entitled under the same conditions as nationals. France in 1939 and its application had given rise to no observation until 1956, at which date without in any way restricting the earlier legislation additional benefits were granted to old persons.

Convention No. 41 : Night Work (Women) (Revised), 1934.

Hungary (ratification: 1936). A Government representative made the following statement:

It had not yet been possible to bring the legislation into conformity with the provisions of this Convention which was ratified by the previous regime. However, the Labour Code of 1951 prohibited night work for pregnant women and for nursing mothers. The Code also contained several provisions protecting women workers, e.g. section 94 of the Code which provided that women should not be employed on work which might be prejudicial to them due to their physical condition. All women were subject to medical examination before taking up employment and to subsequent periodical examinations; they could also request medical examination in order to be exempted from night work. Moreover, the labor inspectors could prohibit night work for women or for young workers. In some countries, the legislation put the burden of proof upon the worker, this could be considered as an exception, since the legislation puts the burden of proof upon the employer and since the said decision would only be binding if there were five other decisions with the same result. It should be recalled that under article 133 of the Constitution Conventions on ratification acquired force of law and the Government could not invoke the application of a ratified Convention if its provisions were more favourable than the relevant legislation.

Convention No. 50 : Recruiting of Indigenous Workers, 1936.

Congo (Leopoldville) : ratification : 1936. The Government communicated the following information:

This Convention is no longer relevant to the Congo. In practice, Congolese workers present themselves spontaneously at work places. The number of unemployed seeking employment is proof of this spontaneity. In law, recruiting had been regulated by the Royal Order of 19 July 1954. This Order was repealed by the Legislative Decree of 1 February 1961 concerning contracts for the hire of services, which in turn was repealed by the Legislative Decree of 21 February 1965 concerning contracts for the hire of services.

Convention No. 59 : Minimum Age (Industry) (Revised), 1937.

China : ratification : 1940. The Government communicated the following information:

The draft Labour Code is being revised in the light of comments made by the Committee of Experts. Pending its enactment, the Government is considering prohibiting children under the age of 15 from working in the mines, by means of administrative measures in accordance with the Convention.

Luxembourg : ratification : 1958. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Bill which was pending had not yet been adopted but the ratification of Conventions Nos. 59 and 60 gave the Government the force of law and repealed all contrary provisions. The rule providing for a minimum age of 15 years was thus part of the law and no child under that age had been employed in work covered by these Conventions since their ratification. The Government recognised that it was preferable to eliminate all uncertainty in the legislation. The Bill in question was broader in scope than the Conventions and covered all aspects of work of young workers. Employers' and workers' organisations and the Council of State had been requested to give their views, and modifications had been made several times. This explained the delay. The Ministry of Labour would urge Parliament to give priority to this Bill and to adopt it at its next session.

Convention No. 60 : Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment) (Revised), 1937.

Convention No. 62 : Safety Provisions (Building), 1937.

Mexico : ratification : 1941. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government of Mexico appreciated the importance of giving effect to the Convention. The Federal Government had drawn the attention of the constituent states and the federal district to the Convention and requested them to implement it, since ratified Conventions were part of national law. Most states had reported that they intended to adopt regulations in this field, and a supplementary report would be sent subsequently.

The Employers' members recalled that the Convention had been ratified by Mexico 24 years ago. No steps appeared to have been taken yet to put the experts' observations. Thus, in the federal district no progress had been made in implementing Articles 11 to 15 of the Convention and, as regards the constituent states, more than half the Mexican building workers remained without the protection contemplated by the Convention. In reply, the Government representative stated that the situation had been improved by the federal structure of Mexico. There might be cases of discrepancies, but all states had been recommended to bring their legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Convention No. 42 : Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) (Revised), 1934.

Mexico : ratification : 1937. A Government representative made the following statement:

Although some of the observations by the experts were correct, it should be pointed out that as regards occupational diseases, Mexican legislation considered an occupational disease in all cases without conditions, whereas the Convention laid down two conditions. As the mining industry was an important sector of the economy, the Government had been concerned to protect workers against hazards in this industry. The list in section 326 of the Federal Labour Act was not exhaustive but illustrative; all diseases falling under it were considered to have medical knowledge. As regards poisoning by phosphorus, Mexican legislation gave better protection than that provided for by the Convention. It contained a list of processes. With respect to the decision of the Supreme Court, according to which the burden of proof rested with the worker, this could be considered as an exception, since the legislation puts the burden of proof upon the

Cuba (ratification : 1954). A Government representative made the following statement:
The Government was now setting up a statistical service which would meet the requirements of this Convention. Various regulations had already been issued to repeal the former legislation dealing with this matter. Under the proposed new legislation a department of statistics would be set up, which would report to the Planning Board and would publish statistics regularly. The publication of these statistics would be of great value to the Government in establishing and carrying out its programmes and plans.

Mexico (ratification : 1942). A Government representative made the following statement:
The Government had not been able to reply to the request for information concerning the Convention because it referred to statistical information which it was not easy to prepare without co-operation with the employers' and workers' organisations concerned. A circular had been sent to these organisations on this matter and a supplementary report would be supplied to the I.L.O. in the near future.

The information needed to give an exact picture of the situation had to be gathered from employers' and workers' organisations. When these data were received by the Government a full report would be sent to the I.L.O. The preparation of such statistics was a time-consuming task.
The Employers' members noted that no answer had been given to the specific questions raised by the Committee of Experts, and that this Convention had been ratified over 20 years ago.

In reply the Government representative pointed out that it was not correct to claim that the Government had sent no statistics, although perhaps the statistics sent had not been as complete as desirable. As regards the statistics required under Article 5 and Article 10, the information needed to give an exact picture of the situation had to be gathered from employers' and workers' organisations. When these data were received by the Government a full report would be sent to the I.L.O. The preparation of such statistics was a time-consuming task.

The Employers' members noted that no answer had been given to the specific questions raised by the Committee of Experts, and that this Convention had been ratified over 20 years ago.

Convention No. 64 : Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers), 1939.

Zambia (ratification : 1964). The Government communicated the following information:
The new Employment Bill was further delayed during the latter part of last year and circumstances did not permit its presentation to Parliament as was hoped. This was due partly to other urgent legislative work and partly to a decision to include further provisions to benefit workers. However, the Bill will most certainly be introduced to Parliament during the course of this year.

Argentina (ratification : 1955). See under "General Observations".

Convention No. 77 : Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry), 1946.

Italy (ratification : 1952). The Government communicated the following information:
On 9 April 1965 a Bill on the protection of employment of young persons was submitted to Parliament (the Government has communicated a copy of this Bill). This Bill modifies previous legislation (Act No. 653 of 20 April 1954, Act No. 1325 of 29 November 1961, etc.) and is intended to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos. 77, 78, 79 and 90. In the explanatory memorandum appended to the Bill particular emphasis is placed on the standards giving effect to the provisions of the above-mentioned Conventions referred to in the Committee of Experts' observations.

Convention No. 78 : Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations), 1946.

Italy (ratification : 1952). See under Convention No. 77.

Convention No. 79 : Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations), 1946.

Italy (ratification : 1952). See under Convention No. 77.

Argentina (ratification : 1955). A Government representative made the following statement:
The Ministry of Labour and Social Security had established a centre for training medium-grade officers, which had begun to function at the end of last year. Moreover, the general directorate of the labour inspections and the technical inspectorate organised training courses for labour inspectors. It had sent officers to the provinces to assist the provincial services technically. All the documentation required would soon be communicated. Concerning Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, the annual report of the inspection services was being published and it would soon be sent to the I.L.O. in future, such report would be published and communicated regularly.
See also under "General Observations".

Guatemala (ratification : 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:
A Bill had been prepared which provided for the notification of occupational diseases. It was being studied by the Social Security Institute, which had made favourable comments, as well as by the Technical Committee of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, and it would be adopted immediately. As regards Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, instructions had been given to the labour inspection service to prepare a general report for 1964.

Burma (ratification : 1955). A Government representative made the following statement:
The following texts gave effect to this Convention : law defining the fundamental rights and responsibilities of the people's workers ; regulations regarding the establishment of the people's workers' councils ; trade union rules. The first of these texts came into force on 1 May 1964 and by virtue of section 9 thereof the second text had been promulgated later. Steps were now being taken to form workers' councils.
The Employers' members recalled that the observations by the Experts related in particular to the following points : a trade union could not be registered unless its membership included more than half the workers in the undertaking concerned ; an executive member of a political party could not be an official of a trade union ; all officers of a registered trade union had to be workers in the undertaking for which the trade union was formed. The Convention was not fully applied.

In reply, the Government representative stated that the present restrictions on trade union rights would be removed.

Cameroon (Eastern Cameroon) (ratification : 1950). The Government communicated the following information:
The repeal of Ordinance No. 62-OP-24 of 31 March 1962 cannot be envisaged until the Legislative Assembly of Eastern Cameroon (which is the only competent organ to decide on such repeal and has just completed its term) is reconstituted after the general elections of which the principle has just been approved by the Federal Legislative Assembly. The question of repealing the provisions referred to will be taken up in the preparation of the lighten the Legislature in taking a decision. The Committee of Experts will constitute valuable guidance which will not fail to enlighten the Legislature in taking a decision.

Central African Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government was determined to ensure the application of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had taken account of all observations made by the Committee of Experts in its draft Labour Code. In this draft the question of repealing Act No. 60-170 of 12 December 1960 would be considered.

The experts expressed dissatisfaction at the fact that the President of the Central African Republic, in his speech to the Conference, had not referred to the workers in the service of the State only. Obviously these workers could not have the same status as other workers, since their status was subject to restrictions of a public nature.

Cuba (ratification: 1962). The Workers' members stated that, in accordance with the decision taken by the Committee of Experts, they did not wish to discuss further the two concepts regarding this Convention. They would be glad to know, however, whether the Bill relating to the co-existence of several unions in the country was still being considered.

Guatemala (ratification: 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:

As already indicated in 1964 a legislative decree had been adopted in June 1963 to provide for exemption from the prohibition on re-election of trade union leaders, contained in section 222 (a) of the Labour Code. The observances made by the Experts on this point had been communicated to the technical committee of the Ministry of Labour and Social Welfare which would consider the possibility of amending section 222 (a).

The Workers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had, for many years, been drawing attention to a number of legislative provisions which were contrary to the Convention, such as the prohibition on re-election of trade union leaders. The Convention concerning public employment in the Federal Labour and Conciliation Court—which comprised some confusion. However, these provisions related not to the prohibition of re-election of trade union leaders but only in the case of trade unions with a small membership. Thus no real progress had been made. The Committee must urge the Government to ensure full legislative conformity with the Convention at the latest by next year.

Mexico (ratification: 1950). A Government representative made the following statement:

Although apparently the Committee of Experts had made a careful study of the legislation relating to this Convention, there seemed to be some misinterpretation. The Government considered that the provisions relating to the free association and to the prohibition on re-election of trade union leaders, and the provisions on the refusal to authorise or register trade unions, were contrary to the Convention, as regards, for example, the refusal to elect trade union leaders. Thus the Government representative made the following statement:

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be able to present its Bill on time and that it would be in a position to indicate progress next year.

Niger (ratification: 1961). A Government representative made the following statement:

On 11 May 1965 the National Assembly had adopted a law modifying Ordinance No. 59-101 of 4 July 1959, which had empowered the President to dissolve trade unions by decree. In certain cases, however, the prohibition to re-elect trade union leaders, which had existed for some time in regard to the Convention, had now been eliminated.

Pakistan (ratification: 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:

Freedom of association was guaranteed in Pakistan, no difference being made between workers in the public and private sectors, even as regards undertakings run by the Government or by another central authority. In all these sectors workers were free to found trade unions. However, certain technical difficulties existed as regards civil servants. They were free to form trade unions; the only restriction was that they had to organise according to category, and were forbid to join an existing trade union from their own choosing. The competent government service hand had now decided that the legislation should be modified so that this divergence with the Convention could be eliminated.

Philippines (ratification: 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government regretted that it could not report progress in adopting the necessary Bill. Because of the separation of powers, it was very difficult for it to intervene to expedite the work of the Legislature. A new Congress would meet at the beginning of next year. Bills which had not been adopted by then would have to be presented again. The Government hoped that it would be in a position to indicate progress next year.

The Workers' members pointed out that discrepancies had existed for some time in regard to the Convention and that in view of the importance of the question, these divergencies could have been reduced.

The Government representative stated, in reply, that the Government would do everything possible to obtain action by Congress on these points.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would be able to meet its obligations and that the observation would not have to be repeated.

Senegal (ratification: 1960). A Government representative made the following statement:

In the past the dissolution of trade unions by administrative discretion has taken place only in exceptional cases. The law, trade unions could be dissolved only by judicial process. There would be no further cases of dissolution.

The Workers' members stated that the situation was disquieting. The Experts always emphasized that... administrative dissolution, even in special political conditions - to withdraw the Convention. The fact that this possibility existed showed that the legislation was not in conformity with the Convention.

The Employers' representatives in the special consultation of employers' and workers' organisations in regard to certain exceptions; in practice, however, such exceptions were never authorised without the intervention of the workers' organisations. Although the national legislation had not yet been brought into compliance with the Convention, in virtue of the national Constitution the self-executing provisions of the Convention were incorporated in the national legislation. The Ministry of Social Administration fully agreed with the workers that it was desirable to eliminate any discrepancy between the national legislation and the Convention and hoped that by next year this would have been achieved.

The Austrian Workers' member agreed with the Government's statement that exceptions were not authorised until the employers' and workers' organisations concerned had been consulted; however, the legislation, and not only practice, would be in conformity with the terms of the Convention. It was also correct that the self-executing provisions of the Convention had become part of the national legislation but the fact remained that there were no legislative provisions corresponding to certain provisions of the Convention, guaranteeing protection for the workers.

The Employers' members recalled that the Convention had been ratified by Austria 15 years ago; it should have been possible during this period to reach agreement between the various bodies and parties concerned regarding the measures to be taken for its application. No real progress seemed to have been achieved since last year and it was to be hoped that the Government would make every effort to ensure legislative conformity with the Convention without any further delay.

The Committee took note of the information supplied and expressed the hope that the full application of the Convention would be ensured at an early date.

Philippines (ratification : 1953). The Government communicated the following information:

In view of the failure of the Congress to pass the Bill designed to bring the Women and Child Labor Law into conformity with Article 2 of Conventions Nos. 89 and 90 (a period of night rest of at least 11 and 12 consecutive hours for women and young persons respectively), the Government had decided to introduce in the next session of Congress to eliminate the existing discrepancies between the legislation and the Conventions.

The Workers' members recalled that since 1956, the Government had been referring to Bills designed to give full effect to Conventions Nos. 89 and 90, particularly regarding the minimum period of rest at night. The Government's reply showed that once more there would be delay in the elimination of discrepancies. This situation was disturbing and it was essential that progress be made by next year.

The Government representative stated, in reply, that the Government would do everything possible to obtain action by Congress.

Argentina (ratification : 1956). See under "General Observations".

Italy (ratification : 1952). See under Convention No. 77.

Pakistan (ratification : 1951). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Convention was applied in substance, although the legislation had not yet been amended. Democratic parliamentary procedures entailed unavoidable delays. All the organisations concerned had been consulted in order that agreement might be reached on the proposed legislation. The Government was fully agreed in principle that appropriate legislation should be adopted.

The Employers' members noted that for the past ten years the Government had been referring to amending legislation which was to give effect to the Convention. They wished to know whether any real progress had now been achieved.

In reply the Government representative stated that the Bill in question had now passed through all stages of prior consultation and had obtained the agreement of the employers' and workers' organisations and of the Government in its capacity as employer. A unanimous draft would now be submitted to the legislature.

Cuba (ratification: 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:
/.../ of the Convention...

Philippines (ratification: 1953). The Government communicated the following information:

The desire expressed in this Convention regarding labour clauses on public contracts may be considered as having been complied with. The standard legal forms provided for all forms of contracts, including contracts for all public works.

United Arab Republic (ratification: 1960). A Government representative made the following statement:

It seemed that there was a misunderstanding. Law No. 3456 of 1962 expressly provided that the Labour Code was applicable to all workers in public undertakings. A copy of this law had been sent to the I.L.O.

The Workers' members recalled that the Government had indicated as far back as 1957 a wish to work for fixed or specially low wages since they required to work for fixed or specially low wages since they were free to bargain collectively. The Government of East Pakistan, which had been consulted, had indicated that there was no need for legislation prohibiting fee-charging employment agencies and that such a text would burden the statute book to no purpose. The Government of West Pakistan, however, had not yet made a final decision and it seemed to share the views of the East Pakistan Government. Nevertheless, if the I.L.O. bodies insisted on such a measure, the Government was prepared to enact legislation prohibiting fee-charging employment agencies. The Government representative now indicated that no such agencies existed in the country but this statement differed from previous government statements. No progress had been made and the promises made by the Government had not been fulfilled.

In reply the Government representative stated that the contradiction mentioned above was more apparent than real since the Government had found that there were no fee-charging employment agencies and no labour contractors in the sense envisaged by the Convention. However, if the Committee considered it necessary, the Government would adopt legislation.

The Employers' members stated that the Committee emphatically required the adoption of legislative prohibiting fee-charging employment agencies, as the Convention could not otherwise be considered as applied. It was hoped that these measures would be taken without delay before the next session of the Conference.

Philippines (ratification: 1953). The Government communicated the following information:

It is regretted that the Government is not aware of any Bill pending in Congress eliminating the exemption provisions in the Minimum Wages Law (Republic Act No. 602) concerning retail and service enterprises. It is hoped, however, that a Bill will be filed in the next session of Congress.

Article 7, paragraph 2. In the absence of a special law or provision dealing only with works stores and control of prices of commodities sold in said stores and services provided by the employers, Republic Act No. 2610, although a law of general application in so far as control of prices of commodities is concerned, is deemed adequate to cover the above matters.

Article 13, paragraph 2. The requirement of this paragraph is sufficiently met by section 10 (i) of the Minimum Wages Law (Republic Act No. 2610) which provides: "Payment of wages shall be made at or near the place of undertaking, except as otherwise provided by such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Labour may prescribe". Accordingly, where taverns, etc., are not the place of undertakings, payment of wages in those places is prohibited under section 10 (i) of the Law which is the exact import of Article 13, paragraph 2, of the Convention, which states that payment of wages in taverns shall be prohibited except in the case of persons employed therein.

The Workers' members recalled that the Government had indicated as far back as 1957 a wish to work for fixed or specially low wages since they were free to bargain collectively. The Government representative indicated the Committee made the following statement:

The Government stated that the Government would do everything possible to obtain action by Congress.

Convention No. 96: Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Revised), 1949.

Pakistan (ratification: 1952). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government had carried out an inquiry and found that there were no fee-charging employment agencies in the country. The employment offices were run by the Government in both East and West Pakistan and financial provision had been made in the next budget for the expansion of this service. The position in Pakistan as regards labour contractors differed from that in many other countries since, under such contracts, there was no form of compulsory labour, workers were free to leave their employment when they wished and they were not required to work for fixed or specially low wages since they were free to bargain collectively. The Government of East Pakistan, which had been consulted, had indicated that there was no need for legislation prohibiting fee-charging employment agencies and that such a text would burden the statute book to no purpose. The Government of West Pakistan, however, had not yet made a final decision.

The Workers' members stated that the Government had promised to adopt legislation prohibiting fee-charging employment agencies. The Government representative now indicated that no such agencies existed in the country but this statement differed from previous government statements. No progress had been made and the promises made by the Government had not been fulfilled.

In reply the Government representative stated that the contradiction mentioned above was more apparent than real since the Government had found that there were no fee-charging employment agencies and no labour contractors in the sense envisaged by the Convention. It was hoped that these measures would be taken without delay before the next session of the Conference.

Convention No. 97: Migration for Employment (Revised), 1949.

The studies mentioned in 1963 and 1964 have led to the conclusion that the maternity allowance provided for by the French legislation need not be granted to foreigners in France pursuant to Article 4, paragraph 1 (b), of the Convention. This provision covers "social security (that is to say, legal provision in respect of employment injury, maternity, sickness, invalidity, old age, death, unemployment and family responsibilities as well as any other risk which in accordance with the national legislation is covered by a social security scheme)". France previously emphasised the maternity allowance should not be regarded as covered by this enumeration: this allowance does not aim at compensating for family responsibilities, but has an essentially demographic character. The conditions attached to its payment demonstrate clearly that this allowance has the character of a payment on the occasion of birth: "In respect of the first birth, the allowance is granted provided that the mother is not older than 25 years and the birth takes place within two years after marriage. It is not granted in respect of the second birth, if the couple, after the birth, take place within three years after the preceding birth. The allowance is payable in two equal sums, one at the time of birth and the other six months after the birth."
These conditions for entitlement lead the Government to call attention to the definition of "family benefits" given by Article 42 of Convention No. 102. These benefits are to include either periodical payments, or the provision of goods, services, or a combination of these two benefits. It is quite obvious that the maternity allowance provided for by the French legislation does not, by its very nature, correspond to this definition.

The Committee of Experts bases its own position, however, on the consideration that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature. In fact, the financing of the maternity allowance is not merely essential for its purpose, but is also a condition of its implementation. The committee recognizes that benefits financing in the same way as all other benefits of this nature. The Committee of Experts has admitted that this is the basis for the financing of the maternity allowance, provided it was granted in the same way as all other benefits of this nature.

Furthermore, the various bilateral and multilateral agreements concerning social security signed by France as a general rule specify, without reservations, that the principle of equal pay for equal work is to be applied, as a general rule, to the beneficiaries of the maternity allowance, as well as to all other benefits of this nature.

The Committee of Experts bases itself, however, on the principle that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature. Hence, the fact that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature is the basis for the financing of the maternity allowance, provided it was granted in the same way as all other benefits of this nature.

The Government had informed the Committee of Experts that the maternity allowance was granted to all beneficiaries of the maternity allowance, as well as to all other benefits of this nature. The Government had also informed the Committee of Experts that the maternity allowance was granted to all beneficiaries of the maternity allowance, as well as to all other benefits of this nature.

Finally, the Committee of Experts bases itself on the principle that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature. Hence, the fact that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature is the basis for the financing of the maternity allowance, provided it was granted in the same way as all other benefits of this nature.

Moreover, the fact that the maternity allowance is financed through a family allowance scheme in the same way as all other benefits of this nature is the basis for the financing of the maternity allowance, provided it was granted in the same way as all other benefits of this nature.
trade unions were strong and in a position to have appropriate clauses included in collective agreements.

As regards the elimination from collective agreements of variables resulting in a disbenefit to female workers, the Government had taken various measures to persuade the trade unions to apply the equal pay principle.

The problem raised by the Committee of Experts in paragraph 4 of the observation, relating to an objective system of job evaluation, entailed certain difficulties. Canada had, however, suggested a system that proposed to apply the provisions of the Convention but a difference of views existed as regards the question of the application of the Convention. The Committee of Experts had specified three distinct categories of employment, workers employed as a result of trade disputes, and the trade unions agreed with the views expressed by the Committee in this connection. It was hoped that when the Government had examined the text to which the Experts seemed to have adopted because of the nature of the relevant legislation in certain countries. Prior to that time, the German unemployment benefit was not excluded, and the position should be the same in case of unemployment resulting from a strike occurring in another country.

The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany made the following statement: "The employers of the Federal Republic of Germany were glad that the Experts had modified their original view on this matter. He did not agree however with their conclusions regarding the relationship between Article 69 (i) of the Convention and the three distinct categories of persons who might become unemployed as a result of a trade dispute. This constituted a free interpretation of the text which the Experts seemed to have adopted because of its limited nature. The German unemployment insurance scheme financed by both parties should observe an attitude of neutrality in disputes. The unemployment insurance financed by both parties should not be used to finance one party to a trade dispute. The Convention did not imply that a labour dispute was bound to occur in the undertaking itself or in the branch of activity concerned. National legislation, which had limited the field of application of the Convention, had been extended to take account of the purpose of unemployment insurance. The German government was not always easy to determine. Where a strike which took place in another country caused unemployment in the Federal Republic, unemployment benefit was not excluded, and the position should be the same in case of unemployment resulting from a strike in the Federal Republic in a dispute to which the workers concerned were not parties. The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that causality between trade disputes and unemployment was not always easy to determine. Where a strike which took place in another country caused unemployment in the Federal Republic, unemployment benefit was not excluded, and the position should be the same in case of unemployment resulting from a strike in the Federal Republic in a dispute to which the workers concerned were not parties. The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany stated that causality between trade disputes and unemployment was not always easy to determine.

The Government's first impression on reading the Committee's comments showed that the application of a Convention by means of collective agreements could give rise to special difficulties. The Workers' member added that account should be taken of the position of workers not covered by a collective agreement in regard to the equal pay principle, and the issue of special regulations applying to such workers might be necessary.

The Employers' member of the Federal Republic of Germany indicated that it was now a normal practice in the Federal Republic for trade unions to take steps in regard to trade disputes occurring in another country.

of Experts' observations was that the various legal views had come closer together. The Government would welcome it if a thorough examination of the Experts' comments led to acceptance of the Government's view. However, should the divergence of views persist, it might be worth consideration as to whether the matter might not appropriately be submitted to the International Court of Justice or some other arbitration body set up by the Governing Body.

Paragraph 730 and 736 of the Commission of Inquiry's report, to which the I.L.O. had been given and the information requested would be sent as soon as possible.

Paragraph 735. Even before the publication of the Experts' report the official gazette on 19 March 1965 had published Decree No. 46551 which expressly revoked the legislative instrument permitting compulsory recruitment for the Labour and Economic Recovery Corps. A copy of this decree had been sent to the I.L.O.

Paragraph 738. It was to be noted that the Diamond Company operated in the district of Luanda. The recruits' contracts imposed on the employer the obligation of transporting the workers to their workplaces. Inspections were made. As the Experts noted in regard to paragraph 734, the inspection services had been developed considerably in Angola.

Paragraph 741. The necessary instructions had been given to satisfy the Experts' wish concerning the sending of the texts indicated. Moreover, working conditions in the ports and railways had greatly improved. The question was being considered by a working party. The most important railway in Angola was the Benguela Railway, one of the two great railways, which the Commission of Inquiry (paragraph 737 of its report) had exonerated entirely from the accusation of forced labour, while emphasising the exceptional economic importance of this railway.

Paragraph 744. The rules of operation of the Independent Board of Roads had not yet been issued; they were being examined by the Provincial Legislative Council of Angola. On publication they would be communicated. The I.L.O. was already aware of the Organic Law of the Board of Roads.

Paragraph 749. As already stated, several inspections had been made of the Casemoel Company. Wages had increased by 10 per cent. since last year. The number of workers recruited (in the technical sense of the term) had substantially diminished. The question would be discussed at the meeting of the Committee of Experts with regard to Convention No. 105; theExperts would supply complete information. For example, information had not been given on the development of the inspectorate in Mozambique, which seemed to be little developed since there were only six inspectors for the whole country.

With respect to Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had indicated that the possibilities for education and training could not be left without consideration. The text of the Convention was not only afforded in law, but also provided for the opportunities of equal education and training. As a basis for its comments concerning Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had used the statistics supplied by the Government, as well as those appearing in official year books. However, as for example, found, for workers born in the region concerned were employed in certain senior positions in Portuguese Guinea than in Angola and Mozambique. After the latter country had not furnished any detailed indications but the figures showed that 55 per cent. of the officials of the public and municipal services were born in the territory. The Committee of Experts had not been concerned with the possibility of extending the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment provided for in the Convention was not only afforded in law, but also promoted in practice.

Paragraph 754. The expansion of the inspectorate had already been noted by the Experts. With respect to recruitment for the Rand mines, the Commission of Inquiry (paragraph 745) had stated that it was based on the economic attraction of employment and on the fact that it conferred on those so employed an element of social status, and that there was no element of compulsion under Portuguese jurisdiction and no element of fraud in such recruitment.

Paragraph 777. The Government had recognised that she was rightly proud of the absence of any complaint concerning Convention No. 111. The Government, in application of the Convention, sought to promote equality of opportunity and treatment not only in law, but in everyday life. The statistics supplied proved this irrefutably. One wondered why the Committee of Experts had found differences between Angola and Mozambique on the one hand, and Portuguese Guinea on the other. It was not apparent from the existing statistics. Similarly, it was not evident from the statistics that the opportunities for education and training were less for Africans than for non-Africans. The relevant statistical indications could be given to the Committee.

The Committee was informed that the decree mentioned by the Government representative in relation to paragraph 773 of its report of the Commission of Inquiry concerning Convention No. 105 had in fact been received by the I.L.O.; the Experts' question related to the subsidiary provisions issued under it in Angola. As a basis for its comments concerning Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had used the statistics supplied by the Government, as well as those appearing in official year books. However, as for example, found, for workers born in the region concerned were employed in certain senior positions in Portuguese Guinea than in Angola and Mozambique. The Committee of Experts had not been concerned with the possibility of extending the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment provided for in the Convention was not only afforded in law, but also promoted in practice.

The Employers' Vice-Chairman made the following statement:

Paragraph 795. As already stated, several inspections had been made of the Casemoel Company. Wages had increased by 10 per cent. since last year. The number of workers recruited (in the technical sense of the term) had substantially diminished. The question would be discussed at the meeting of the Committee of Experts with regard to Convention No. 105; the Experts would supply complete information. With respect to Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had indicated that the possibilities for education and training could not be left without consideration. The text of the Convention was not only afforded in law, but also provided for the opportunities of equal education and training. As a basis for its comments concerning Convention No. 111, the Committee of Experts had used the statistics supplied by the Government, as well as those appearing in official year books. The Workers' Vice-Chairman read the following statement drawn up by the African Trade Union Confederation:

"In connection with the examination by the Conference Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the state of application of international instruments in various parts of the world, the African Trade Union Confederation wishes to draw the special attention of the Conference to the case of Portugal as regards the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111)."

"Whereas, in this second half of the twentieth century, the history of the world is marked by the struggle of oppressed peoples for national independence and for the complete elimination of colonialism and imperialism and their consequences, as well as of all forms of racial discrimination;"

"Whereas the international community has emphatically condemned all colonial practices, in virtue of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations;"

"Whereas, far from complying with this resolution, Portugal is endeavouring to reinforce its colonial system by accentuating all forms of pressure on the peoples of the African countries still under its domination: massacre of African patriots, arbitrary arrests, practices of forced labour for political and economic reasons, practices of racial discrimination in education, employment and occupation;"

"Whereas the practice of forced labour is covered by Convention No. 106;"
Appendix V : Application of Conventions and Recommendations

- Whereas Article 1 of this Convention provides that each Member of the International Labour Organisation which ratifies this Convention undertakes to suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour (a) as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views contrary to the established political, social or economic system; (b) as a method of mobilising and using labour for purposes of economic development; (c) as a means of labour discipline; (d) as a means of raising funds; (e) as a means of racial, social, national or religious discrimination;

- Noting that all the forms of forced labour dealt with in this Convention are systematically practised in the Portuguese African colonies, where the prisons and concentration camps are overflowing with political detainees, who constitute penal labour;

- In view of the fact that these practices of forced labour have contributed to the result of Portugal's manifest desire to oppose by every means the application of the United Nations resolution on the abolition of colonialism and that they constitute a flagrant violation of human rights as dealt with in the United Nations Charter and as set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and in the Declaration of Philadelphia;

- "In view of the fact that the International Labour Organisation must, within the framework of its competence, ensure the application of the resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations, and in particular the resolution concerning the abolition of colonialism, and the application of the principles stated in the previous paragraph, particularly when the violation of those principles characterised a violation of international instruments such as the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention (No. 105) and the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention (No. 111);

- Constitutional provisions of the International Labour Organisation;

- "The African Trade Union Confederation requests the solemn condemnation of Portugal and the suspension of its powers as Member of the Organisation until it revives its policy in conformity with the basic principles of the I.L.O., principles which every Member undertakes to respect as a condition of its admission."

The Algerian Government member made the following statement:

The Portuguese Government tried to take advantage of these practices of forced labour and discrimination in employment and occupation did exist in the territories administered by Portugal. The Committee of Experts, having taken note of the adoption of certain texts by Portugal, but its observations raised doubts as to their application; it left to the Conference the task of evaluating the situation. The importance of the railways was mentioned but they were principally used to transport prisoners and soldiers. With respect to inspection, it was carried out by inspectors who were in the service of the authorities and the companies. Accord­

- The Committee should not disappoint the hopes of the world. Because of the violation of fundamental rights by Portugal, the presence of the representatives of that country in the debate should not be conducive to the best hopes of the world.

- In the African territories of Portugal Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 were covered by Convention No. 105 occurred in Angola and Mozambique. Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 were ratified six years ago and the situation, far from having improved, in fact had deteriorated. The memorandum of U.N.E.S.C.O. proved this. More than 380,000 persons were affected by forced labour. Portugal should be included in the special list under points C and E, but this did not suffice; it was essential that ratified Conventions, which should have force of law, be fully applied.

In reply to a question by the Workers' members the Committee was informed that the Government of Portugal had received a request for a Commission of Inquiry concerning discrimination in employment and occupation; this request was submitted to the Governing Body in November 1964. The Officers of the Governing Body had recommended the acceptance of the request. The Committee should not disappoint the hopes of the world.

The Yugoslav Government member made the following statement:

The Governing member of Portugal had made a logical statement in referring to the request made by his country concerning the sending of a Commission of Inquiry to that country. The I.L.O. had not yet acted on this request. The information supplied by the African Trade Union Confederation which had been submitted to the Committee showed that the factual situation clearly contradicted all legal agreements used by the Government member of Portugal.

As regards Convention No. 105, the Government member had skillfully used the words of the Experts. It was logical for the Experts to be satisfied on receiving information from governments and it always took note thereof with interest. But it was also certain that many parts of the observations by the Experts had been passed over in silence and had been disregarded. But, for example in the case of the references by the Experts to paragraphs 738, 741, 744, 749 and 754. All these referred to essential information which had been supplied, neither had it been supplied by the Govern­

- The Bulgarian Government member made the following statement:

The Committee had before it the information from the African Trade Union Confederation, transmitted by the Workers' Vice-Chairman, and a memorandum by the All-African Trade Union Federation, both of which were important to the union organisations and to several resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations on this subject. All this proved that in the African territories of Portugal Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 were seriously violated. During the full documentation, the Governor of Portugal persisted in denying the facts, whereas all humanity accused Portugal and the Government of Portugal. The Committee was certainly aware of the true situation in Angola and Mozambique and the case of Portugal should be included in the special list. However, it was to be feared that the government of Portugal would not be convinced by this request and that next year the same situation would recur in the Committee. Therefore the Committee should take a more effective action. They should be informed, in a detailed report, in which the various stories which had been made should be reproduced and it should be recommended to adopt a resolution, within the framework of the I.L.O. Constitutions, and the Standing Orders of the Conference, which could constitute a real contribution to the improvement of the lot of workers in Angola and Mozambique.

The Nigerian Workers' member made the following statement:

The question under discussion was a very serious one. Two fundamental Conventions were flagrantly violated. The information from the African Trade Union Confederation gave a true picture of all the atrocities committed by Portugal in Angola and Mozambique in violation of Conventions Nos. 105 and 111. The Experts were right in saying that the elimination from legislation and administrative practice of any discriminatory element was only one aspect of the action envisaged by Convention No. 111 and that the purpose of the international standards was to promote equity of opportunity and treatment irrespective of employment and occupation, not only before the law but in day-to-day social relationships, and that it was essential that positive action be taken to this effect.

In reply the representative of the Portuguese Government stated:

As regards the accusation made in the memorandum of the All-African Trade Union Federation that hundreds of thousands of Angolans were exported and sold at prices varying from 1,000 to 1,200 escudos to Rhodesia, Nyasaland, the delegation from Malawi could be invited to state whether any Angolan was working in that country. Neither were there any Angolan workers on the railways in South Africa. As regards Angolans who had gone there freely, and the Government of Portugal had established in that country a system of protection for the migrant workers. The suggestion had been made on the special list because the Government had not supplied information on the conditions of employment on the railways. Twenty-six thousand workers were working voluntarily for the Benguela railway; ten years ago there were 1,200 recruited workers, but this had nothing to do with forced labour. The Government had received the report of the Committee on Experts one in the last year and in order to give detailed information on a number of large companies a certain amount of time was required. The Government of Portugal would agree to the visit of a Commission of Inquiry.

In the memorandum by the All-African Trade Union Federation it was stated that during the last 30 years only a single writer had been able to enter Angola. Only last year more than 350 foreign journalists had visited the country. One month ago three journalists from the Soviet Union had been in Mozambique. Decree No. 45859 applied to Angola as well as to Mozambique. As regards paragraph 744 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry mentioned by the Experts, it stated that the Government did not consult the Legislative Council to act; it was not for the Government to adopt the rules of operation of the Independent Board of Roads of Angola.

The Byelorussian Workers' member made the following statement:

The memorandum of the All-African Trade Union Federation and the information from the African Trade Union Confederation contained very serious accusations, for example that forced labour was the basis of the Portuguese economy and affected more than 50 per cent. of the population. They were not declarations by individuals but by very important trade union organisations. The existence of Portuguese colonies in Africa was proved by the evidence of witnesses, the Committee of Experts' observations, the conclusions of the Article 26 Convention (I.L.O. 1951); it was also proved by universally known facts. The Government of Portugal exploited the workers of these colonies in co-operation with other countries; it sent workers to South Africa thus contributing to the policy of apartheid. Workers were forcibly recruited on the basis of laws as well as under confidential provisions not meant for publication which it was difficult to reconcile with constitutional and legislative provisions. Many African delegates had repeated these accusations. He fully supported the Bulgarian Government member's proposal that this Commission should adopt more effective measures than the mere inclusion of Portugal in the special list, by condemning the policy of forced labour and discrimination practiced in Portugal in Africa.

The Algerian Government member made the following statement:

It was not for this Committee to ask for the reasons why the Governing Body had not yet acted on the request by Portugal concerning the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry. Referring to visits by journalists and writers to Angola and Mozambique, he added that the representative of Portugal had not chosen a good example because it was well known how these visits were organised. The incidence of Portugal in Africa required more effective measures than the mere inclusion of Portugal in the special list. The Committee should, however, try to find other means within its power to condemn the policy of the Government of Portugal as regards its African territories. In this respect he supported the proposal by the Bulgarian Government member and the Byelorussian Workers' member.

The Portuguese Employers' member made the following statement:

The proposal to include Portugal on the special list was not based on proper documentation relating to facts. The observations made by the Experts were not comparable, either from the point of view of their importance or their gravity. He had addressed a request to the Director of the Bureau of Information whose inclusion in the special list had not been proposed. The Government of Portugal for its part based itself on the impartial and objective conclusions reached by the Commission of Inquiry established under article 26 of the I.L.O. Constitution. This Commission was composed of independent persons who had travelled all over Angola and Mozambique and had been in touch with the workers of all the major undertakings. The Government of Portugal had accepted the conclusions and recommendations of this Commission which, by virtue of this acceptance, had become res iudicata. This Commission noted in paragraph 743 of its report that it had found no evidence of, or any need for, the removal of forced labour in light industry or commerce in either Angola or Mozambique. As regards the publicly owned railways and ports in Mozambique, the Commission had also noted that they did not employ forced labour and that their conditions of employment and social services were in certain respects exemplary (paragraph 742). The case of Portugal was a classical one of the non-application of the Convention in practice. According to the Experts, the Portuguese Employers' member observed that the Government of Portugal had not supplied information on the conditions of employment on the railways. Twenty-six thousand workers were working voluntarily for the Benguela railway; ten years ago there were 1,200 recruited workers, but this had nothing to do with forced labour. The Government had received the report of the Committee on Experts one in the last year and in order to give detailed information on a number of large companies a certain amount of time was required. The Government of Portugal would agree to the visit of a Commission of Inquiry.

In the memorandum by the All-African Trade Union Federation it was stated that during the last 30 years only a single writer had been able to enter Angola. Only last year more than 350 foreign journalists had visited the country. One month ago three journalists from the Soviet Union had been in Mozambique. Decree No. 45859 applied to Angola as well as to Mozambique. As regards paragraph 744 of the report of the Commission of Inquiry mentioned by the Experts, it stated that the Government did not consult the Legislative Council to act; it was not for the Government to adopt the rules of operation of the Independent Board of Roads of Angola.

The Byelorussian Workers' member made the following statement:

The memorandum of the All-African Trade Union Federation and the information from the African Trade Union Confederation contained very serious accusations, for example that forced labour was the basis of the Portuguese economy and affected more than 50 per cent. of the population. They were not declarations by individuals but by very important trade union organisations. The existence of Portuguese colonies in Africa was proved by the evidence of witnesses, the Committee of Experts' observations, the conclusions of the Article 26 Convention (I.L.O. 1951); it was also proved by universally known facts. The Government of Portugal exploited the workers of these colonies in co-operation with other countries; it sent workers to South Africa thus contributing to the policy of apartheid. Workers were forcibly recruited on the basis of laws as well as under confidential provisions not meant for publication which it was difficult to reconcile with constitutional and legislative provisions. Many African delegates had repeated these accusations. He fully supported the Bulgarian Government member's proposal that this Commission should adopt more effective measures than the mere inclusion of Portugal in the special list, by condemning the policy of forced labour and discrimination practiced in Portugal in Africa.

The Algerian Government member made the following statement:

It was not for this Committee to ask for the reasons why the Governing Body had not yet acted on the pointed out the existence of forced labour in these territories, and it was the duty of the Committee to condemn Portugal.

by the General Assembly of the United Nations stated with regard to forced labour, and the resolution adopted Everyone was aware of the facts which occurred in these territories. If, as the representatives of Portugal claimed, forced labour and discrimination did not exist in the African colonies of this country, why had Government delegates from African countries as well as representatives of other organisations spoken in condemnation of the policy of Portugal in those territories, referring to a number of facts? And why had no representative from any other country risen to defend Portugal in the I.L.O.? This proved that in fact there existed forced labour and discrimination. International opinion condemned Portugal for its policy in this matter. For more than three years this Committee had considered the application of Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 in these territories.
Portugal had not yet been included in the special list because the Committee had adopted a liberal attitude. Not only should Portugal now appear on this list, but there should also be added a particular reference in the report of the Committee to the fact that in Angola and Mozambique, as well as in the other colonies of Portugal, Conventions Nos. 105 and 111 were not applied in practice. Portugal should be called upon to apply these Conventions as soon as possible. As regards the three Russian journalists who had visited these territories, reference should be made to their articles to learn the true situation.

The Workers' Vice-Chairman made the following statement:

The decisions of the Committee should be based on the Standing Orders of the Conference and the criteria of the Committee. On this basis the great majority of the Workers' members proposed to include Portugal on the special list in virtue of point C, since the Committee was not competent to go further. If the members could judge according to their conscience, Portugal should be condemned not only for its non-application of Conventions
Nos. 105 and 111, but also with regard to other Conventions, and in particular those in the field of human rights.

The Liberian Government member stated that there was discrimination and forced labour in Angola and Mozambique, as well as all sorts of oppression. The case of Portugal was a classic case, and the Committee should condemn this country for the policy it practised.

The Government member of Guinea made the following statement:

One should appeal to the conscience of the members of this Committee. The essence of the statement made by the representatives from Portugal was that force was stronger than law. Portugal claimed that all other members of this Committee did not base themselves on facts and appeared to be of the opinion that it was not Portugal that should be condemned, but rather the African countries. The Republic of South Africa had previously taken the same obstinate position, but now it had taken the consequences and withdrawn from the I.L.O. It was to be hoped that Portugal would follow suit. The conscience of the members of this Committee should tell it to condemn one single country. Not one single country had defended Portugal, and the reason was that this simply could not be done. The Article 26 Commission had made a full report on the situation in the Portuguese territories with regard to forced labour, and the resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations stated that the economy of Portugal was based on forced labour.
Everyone was aware of the facts which occurred in these-territories, and it was the duty of the Committee to condemn Portugal.

A representative of the Portuguese Government made the following statement:

It should be kept in mind that this Committee worked in a legal context; it should base itself on the provisions of the Constitution, the Standing Orders and ratified Conventions. The Portuguese Government member of Yugoslavia had stated that 380,000 men did forced labour in the Portuguese territories. This accusation was completely false. The Article 26 Commission's conclusions had been published and accepted by the majority of the comments;
the minority of the comments had been made by the Committee of Experts and the Government was prepared to give full replies to any questions that might be raised. The Government was ready to accept a new Commission of Inquiry, condition that this Commission also inquired into the situation in the countries which accused Portugal.

The Portuguese Workers' member made the following statement:

He represented the workers of Portugal, including the overseas provinces, and could state in a categorical manner that there was no discrimination in the Portuguese territories, nor forced labour in any way. It was easy to accuse, but the best proof, namely the establishment of a Commission of Inquiry, had not yet been accepted. There had been a number of journalists in the Portuguese territories and the Commission of Inquiry had been organised by the Government. A number of other prominent persons, including ambassadors of countries represented in this Committee, had also visited these territories.

The Algerian Government member stated that he did not recognise the right of the Portuguese Workers' member to speak on behalf of the workers of the Portuguese territories.

The proposal by the Workers' Vice-Chairman to include Portugal on the special list was put to a vote. On a vote by a show of hands, the proposal obtained 51 votes to 7, with 33 abstentions. The quorum of 68 votes cast not having been obtained, the vote was not valid (article 66, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders). A record vote was thereafter taken in accordance with article 66, paragraph 2, of the Standing Orders. The proposal received 49 votes to 5, with 35 abstentions. The quorum of 68 votes cast not having been obtained, the vote was not valid (article 66, paragraph 1, of the Standing Orders).

The Workers' Vice-Chairman made the following statement:

The inclusion of Portugal in the special list had not been accepted because a quorum had not been obtained. It should, however, be noted that the great majority of the members of the Committee had voted in favour of this inclusion under point C. This fact should remind the country concerned that a Convention referring to fundamental human rights should be applied.

Convention No. 106: Weekly Rest (Commerce and Offices), 1957.

Ghana (ratification : 1958). The Government communicated the following information:

The proposed regulations which will give effect to the Convention have not yet been adopted, because the Labour Code under which they will be made has not yet been published. While the Government appreciates that, in the absence of the appropriate regulations it has still not been able to give full effect to the Convention, these regulations cannot be published in advance of the passing of the Labour Code by Parliament, and every effort will be made to adopt the regulations when the Labour Code is passed in the next few months, so that a copy can be forwarded with the next report on ratified Conventions to be submitted in October 1965.

Mexico (ratification : 1959). A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government would like the Committee of Experts to make its request for information more specific because, in its view, the Convention was applied by virtue of article 123 (X) of the Constitution, which provided that for every six days of work there should be granted at least one day of rest. This was also provided for under section 78 of the Federal Labour Act.

1 The opening date of the session of the Committee of Experts has, in general, been between the middle of March and the beginning of April. In a number of cases, however, the session has opened on other dates, varying between 29 February in 1932, and 23 July in 1945. * The Conference did not meet in 1940. * First year for which this figure is available. * As a result of a decision by the Governing Body, detailed reports were requested on only certain ratified Conventions.
APPENDIX II

OBSERVATIONS AND INFORMATION CONCERNING THE APPLICATION OF CONVENTIONS IN NON-METROPOLITAN TERRITORIES (ARTICLES 22 AND 35 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

A. General Observations

Denmark

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs had done its utmost to have the reports in respect of the Faroe Islands and Greenland forwarded to the I.L.O. There had, however, been certain practical difficulties. Thus the Government of the Faroe Islands was considering new legislative measures regarding labour inspection which had created difficulties regarding the supply of reports, and the Government authorities in Greenland had experienced difficulties because the entire economic structure of the country was under review. It had been hoped that the missing reports would be received before the end of the Conference and it was regretted that this had not been possible. The authorities in the Faroe Islands and in Greenland were also considering the adoption of legislation relating to Conventions Nos. 5 and 6. A considerable number of Bills were before Parliament so that it had not yet been possible to enact the above-mentioned texts. It was hoped that next year the reports due would be supplied within the prescribed time limits.

Netherlands

The Government communicated the following information:

The Netherlands Antilles reports on Conventions are sent each year to the trade unions and to the Association for Trade and Industry (employers' organisation).

The Government had urgently invited the Government of Surinam to be represented in the delegation of the Netherlands at the Conference, but to its deep regret the Government of Surinam had not been able to nominate a delegate, and consequently there was no representative who might reply to the questions which the Committee might wish to put. This year the Government of Surinam had sent 18 reports on the application of Conventions in force in the territory of Surinam. It was to be hoped that the Government of Surinam would be able to supply all the reports due next year to the Committee of Experts, and that a representative of this country would be present to give, if necessary, further explanations to this Committee. Finally, the Government of the Netherlands regretted that it was unable to reply to questions by this Committee due to the Surinam Government's autonomy in internal affairs.

The Workers' members stated that the Committee should appeal to the Government to find a solution whereby it would be possible in future to secure the sending of reports to the I.L.O. regarding this territory on the application of Conventions and in particular on Convention No. 29, which was a fundamental Convention.

The Netherlands Workers' member stated that the Government of the Netherlands had been in a difficult position since it could not intervene in the domestic affairs of Surinam. The Government could only urge the Government of Surinam to submit the information and reports requested. In spite of several requests to the Government of the Netherlands there had been no response except for the above-mentioned 18 reports. In order to remedy this situation the Netherlands Government had repeatedly proposed that the authorities of this territory should appoint a representative to the Conference, but this had always been refused by the Surinam Government. The Dutch trade unions had also urged the Government to send at least a Workers' delegate, and the Netherlands Government had been quite prepared to support this proposal, provided the trade unions of Surinam requested such representation. However, this had been refused by the Surinam Government for purely political reasons. In this situation it was impossible for the Netherlands to discharge its obligations with regard to Surinam.

B. Observations and Information on the Application of Conventions

Convention No. 5 : Minimum Age (Industry), 1919

Denmark

Faroe Islands. See under "General Observations".

Convention No. 6 : Night Work of Young Persons (Industry), 1919

Denmark

Faroe Islands. See under "General Observations".

Convention No. 33 : Minimum Age (Non-Industrial Employment), 1932

Netherlands

Netherlands Antilles. The Government communicated the following information:

As regards Article 5 of the Convention, section 17, paragraph 1, of the Labour Ordinance of 1952 relates to women and young persons, and not to children. Under section 18 children are not allowed to perform work in paid employment. In the case of women and young persons, certain activities may, by national decree, be prohibited as dangerous. The need for such measures has not yet made itself felt, as undertakings in which dangerous work is performed do not engage female workers or young persons, in accordance with their own regulations. Should it appear that some form of dangerous work is likely to be performed by women or young persons, their employment in this type of work may be prohibited.

Article 6. Street hawking by young persons is not a problem and has never been. In a small community such as the Netherlands Antilles it would never be possible for hawking without a licence—granted by the local police—to escape attention. It is therefore very difficult to promulgate new legislation, the need for which is neither felt nor understood.

Convention No. 50 : Recruiting of Indigenous Workers, 1936

British Guiana. A representative of the Government of British Guiana made the following statement:

The existing legislation already implemented a number of provisions of Conventions Nos. 50 and 64 but no legislation had yet been adopted to give effect to Con-
The Conventions. Following the general elections last year and the formation of a new government, a department had now been set up to deal with Amerindian affairs and discussions would be initiated with the department on this matter. A Labour Advisory Board would be set up to deal, among other things, with the application of Conventions and Recommendations. These new administrative measures would provide a more effective machinery for dealing with questions relating to the I.L.O.

Hong Kong. A Government representative made the following statement:

The Hong Kong Government had indicated that the Contracts for Overseas Employment Bill, which would give legislative effect to the provisions of the Convention, had been enacted in April 1965, and that it would enter into force on 1 October 1966.

Convention No. 88: Minimum Age (Sea) (Revised), 1936
Netherlands

Netherlands Antilles. The Government communicated the following information:

The Bill providing for employment at sea has now been completed but it will be some time before it can be considered by all the advisory bodies. In actual practice there are no difficulties, as ratings are engaged by officials of the Shipping Inspectorate or the Labour Inspectorate, who would never allow a young person under 16 years of age to be engaged for employment at sea.

Convention No. 64: Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers), 1947
United Kingdom

British Guiana. See under Convention No. 50.

Convention No. 81: Labour Inspection, 1947

Netherlands Antilles. The Government communicated the following information:

The modifications, mentioned by the Committee of Experts, which are to be inserted in National Decree of 1958 are now in the final stage of preparation.

Convention No. 86: Contracts of Employment (Indigenous Workers), 1947
United Kingdom

British Guiana. See under Convention No. 50.

Convention No. 87: Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise, 1948

United Kingdom

Aden. A Government representative made the following statement:
A Bill to replace the Industrial Relations (Conciliation and Arbitration) Ordinances, No. 6, 1960, had been prepared after consultation with both sides of industry through the Aden Joint Advisory Council and approved by the competent authorities for final drafting and publication; the new Ordinance would fully implement the Convention.

Convention No. 99: Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture), 1951

France

Overseas Departments. The Government communicated the following information:

The fixing in the overseas departments of minimum wages due to the evolution of the cost of living was set out in the Government's statement on the Programme (Overseas Departments) Act of 31 July 1960. In application of the Act the Government has decided, in order to ensure the protection of the purchasing power of wages, that any measure relating to the increase of minimum wages in the metropolitan territory, which may have occurred due to changes in salary scales, should also be extended to the overseas departments within minimum four months. Minimum wages were therefore fixed for these departments by decree. This was mainly in application of measures taken with regard to the metropolitan territory after consultation with the organisations of employers and workers concerned.

Trade unions and employers' associations were duly represented in the Subcommittees on the Cost of Living and the High Council for Collective Agreements, which were consulted prior to any increase in minimum wages occurring due to changes in salary scales or any other reasons. During the last meeting of the High Council for Collective Agreements, for example, a motion was adopted on the proposal of a workers' trade union calling for an accelerated rate of increase in minimum wages in the overseas departments.

The procedures in force allowed successive and substantial increases in the minimum wages in the overseas departments. Their difference between zone 0 (Parisian region) was considerably reduced. It was 16.6 per cent. in 1951 and reduced to 6 per cent. as of 1 January 1965 for French Guiana, Martinique and Guadeloupe. Thus an effective policy for minimum wages has made it possible to promote substantially the protection of workers in the overseas departments.

The Workers' members stated:

The Government's written reply was satisfactory as regards the statement that any measure relating to the increase of minimum wages in the metropolitan territory was extended to the overseas departments. However, the question of the consultation of employers' and workers' organisations still remained. Minimum wages were fixed in the metropolitan territory after consultation with the organisations concerned, but the employers' and workers' organisations in the overseas departments had no opportunity of expressing their views on the rates applicable there.

In reply the Government representative stated that the metropolitan trade unions represented also the interests of the workers in the overseas departments. Any trade union leader residing in one of these departments who was appointed by his organisation for participation in the consultation, was of course entitled to do so. In reply to a question put by the Workers' members, the Government representative added that he did not know whether in such cases the travelling expenses of the trade union representative would be borne by the Government.

APPENDIX III

SUBMISSION TO THE COMPETENT AUTHORITIES OF THE CONVENTIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS ADOPTED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE (ARTICLE 19 OF THE CONSTITUTION)

Observations and Information

Afghanistan

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 41st Session related to seafarers and were not, therefore, applicable to Afghanistan. The Convention and Recommendation relating to plantations, adopted at the 42nd Session, were being considered by an inter-ministerial committee before being submitted to the Council of Ministers and then to the competent authorities. The Convention and Recommendation regarding discrimination, also adopted at the 42nd Session, had been taken fully into consideration when the national Constitution was being prepared; the Constitution had now been adopted, ensuring full compliance with the Charter of the United Nations, the I.L.O. Constitution, and the Declaration of Human Rights, and it specifically prohibited all forms of discrimination in article 25 and in other relevant provisions. The instruments adopted at the 43rd Session related to maritime fishing and were not, therefore, applicable to Afghanistan. As regards the Conventions and Recommendations adopted at the 46th and 47th Sessions, their submission to the competent authorities had been delayed because of the difficulties involved in having them translated; this matter was, however, being dealt with and they would be submitted to the competent authorities in due course, after consideration at the inter-ministerial level.

Austria

The Government communicated the following information:

The instruments adopted at the 47th Session of the Conference have been submitted to the National Council with a report of the Government. According to this report the legislation on protection of machines is on with a report of the Government. According to this report the legislation on protection of machines is on

Byelorussia

A Government representative made the following statement:

In accordance with article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution, the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet was the competent authority. Conventions and Recommendations were regularly submitted to it, and all information would be sent in the prescribed time to the I.L.O.

China

The Government communicated the following information:

All Recommendations have been submitted to the Legislative Yuan. Convention No. 112 has been ratified. Convention No. 119 is under examination by the Legislative Yuan. Convention No. 109 was submitted by the Executive Yuan to the Legislative Yuan. Conventions Nos. 87, 88, 89, 94, 96, 97, 101, 102, 103 and 106 are under study by the Executive Yuan. Conventions Nos. 96, 91, 92, 104, 110, 120 and 121 are in the process of submission to the Executive Yuan after examination by the agencies concerned.

Colombia

A Government representative stated that the Government had submitted to Congress with a view to their ratification various Conventions (Nos. 29, 30, 62, 98, 99, 101, 104, 106, 111, 116, 118) and the instruments of amendment of 1964.

Congo (Brazzaville)

The Government communicated the following information:

Convention No. 119 having been ratified, the Government considers that the obligation established by article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution has been fulfilled concerning this instrument and Recommendation No. 118, which completes it. Recommendation No. 119 is applied by the Labour Code.

Congo (Leopoldville)

The Government communicated the following information:

The reports on all the instruments in question have just been submitted to the Prime Minister and the President of the Republic. By the end of May the President will not fail to communicate to the Government his position on the application of the Recommendations submitted and to approve the Conventions whose ratification has been proposed to him by the Government. The Government's inability to submit the instruments to the competent authority in the prescribed period was due to the recent situation in the Congo. It is hoped that in the course of the second legislative session which is due to begin at the end of May the functioning of Parliament will permit the period fixed by the I.L.O. Constitution to be respected.

Costa Rica

The Government communicated the following information:

Convention No. 118 and Recommendation No. 117 have been submitted to the Legislative Assembly and Conventions Nos. 101, 110 and 120 have also been submitted with a view to ratification.

Cuba

A Government representative made the following statement:

The ratification of Convention No. 111 had been approved. Convention No. 118 had been submitted to the competent authorities. The other instruments were being considered by a co-ordinating committee on which employers' and workers' organisations, as well as all other services concerned, were represented. They would be submitted to the competent authorities as soon as possible.

The Workers' members pointed out that a large number of instruments adopted since the 33rd Session of the Conference had not yet been submitted to the competent authorities. The Government should supply full information in writing regarding the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The Government representative indicated in reply that Cuba had ratified a total of 65 Conventions, in cluding the recent ratification of Convention No. 111. The above-mentioned co-ordinating committee was now considering a series of Conventions and Recommendations which were to be submitted to the competent authorities. The necessary information would be supplied.

Dehorsney

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government’s failure to ratify more Conventions was due to certain institutional changes which had affected the technical services concerned. Measures would now be taken for the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities. The Workers’ members pointed out that the obligations under article 19 of the Constitution related to the submission of instruments and not to their ratification. The Employers’ members hoped that by next year the Government would have found it possible to submit all the instruments in question to the competent authorities.

Ecuador

A Government representative made the following statement:

Parliamentary procedure did not always permit the approval of Conventions, but they were submitted to this body by the Ministry of Labour.

Ethiopia

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Conventions and Recommendations had not been submitted to Parliament. Under the national Constitution submission of the instruments to the Council of Ministers gave effect to article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution. This submission had taken place. The Workers’ members recalled that information had not been supplied either on the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 40th to 47th Sessions or on the action taken or contemplated regarding these instruments. Furthermore, it had always been understood that the competent authority within the meaning of article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution was the authority which had the power to legislate, and not the Government itself.

In reply, the Government representative stated that under article 86 of the national Constitution the Council of Ministers could also propose legislation. Parliament was competent in certain matters and the Council of Ministers in other matters where powers had been conferred on it by Parliament. Questions concerning I.L.O. Conventions and Recommendations were within the legislative competence of the Council of Ministers. The information requested by the Experts would be supplied by the next session.

A Workers’ member (Byelorussia) stated that the Committee’s discussion should deal with the question of knowing whether submission had actually taken place to the competent authority, and not with the nature of the competent authority. The latter was determined by each country in accordance with the national constitution. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take measures to ensure compliance with its obligations under article 19.

Finland

The Government communicated the following information:

The instruments adopted by the Conference at its 47th Session will also be submitted to Parliament as soon as certain questions of interpretation of Convention No. 118 are clarified by the I.L.O.

France

The Government communicated the following information:

Each year the Government communicates to the Chairman of the Committee for Cultural, Family and Social Affairs of the National Assembly all instruments, without exception, adopted by the International Labour Conference during the preceding session. Moreover, it should be noted that with a view to ensuring greater publicity for the work of the I.L.O., the text of adopted Conventions and Recommendations is published in the Review of the Ministry of Labour. At the same time the Government submits to the competent ministerial departments the texts of Conventions and Recommendations with a view to determining to what extent their application is in conformity with national legislation and to studying the measures which possibly might be taken in this respect. The various ministerial departments have at present concluded their studies on several Conventions. An inter-ministerial working party has been set up to examine the extent to which they may be ratified in the near future.

Greece

The Government communicated the following information:

The Government has now overcome the formerly existing procedural difficulties regarding submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities. The Minister of Labour submitted on 26 May 1965 to the Parliament the instruments adopted at the 47th Session (Convention No. 119 and Recommendations Nos. 118 and 119). Subjoined to these instruments was a declaration by the Minister of Labour relating to an examination in the near future, in co-operation with the occupational organisations concerned, of the possibility of giving effect to the instruments in question as regards the points which are not already covered by the national legislation (the official minutes of the Parliament in which the submission of the said instruments and the Ministerial Declaration appear, have been communicated). This is the first time since the entry into force of the constitutional amendments of 1946 that the Government has been able to fulfil its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution of the I.L.O. The Government hopes that it will be able to proceed in the near future to the submission to Parliament of all other instruments of a general importance which have not hitherto been submitted to the competent authorities and that in the future this obligation will be fulfilled within the time limit provided for by article 19 of the Constitution of the I.L.O.

Guatemala

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government had ratified Convention No. 116. All instruments adopted by the Conference had in fact been submitted to the competent authorities.

Guinea

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government regretted the delay regarding the submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted at the Conference. This was due to administrative difficulties, but an official had been appointed two months ago to deal with all these matters and this would remedy this delay.

The Workers’ members expressed their regret that this important constitutional obligation had not been fulfilled and hoped that the necessary measures would be taken soon.
Italy

The Government communicated the following information:

Convention No. 119 and Recommendations Nos. 118 and 119, adopted at the 47th Session of the Conference, were submitted to the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate on 4 February 1965. The Government has proposed that the Convention be ratified and the two Recommendations accepted.

Jordan

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Government had recently ratified Conventions Nos. 29 and 120. The remaining Conventions and Recommendations had been submitted to the competent authorities but were still being considered by them. As soon as a final decision had been reached in regard to these instruments, this would be communicated to the I.L.O.

The Employers' and Workers' members regretted that Jordan had not yet complied with all its obligations regarding the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities.

Lebanon

A Government representative made the following statement:

A misunderstanding had existed for a number of years between the Government of Lebanon and the Committee as regards exactly what information was requested under article 19. This misunderstanding had been dispelled in 1963 and it was clear that the competent authority in regard to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations was the legislative body or authority. It had been found however that, under the procedure existing in Lebanon, the Government could normally submit to Parliament only papers which called for positive action and could not therefore submit I.L.O. instruments to Parliament unless their ratification was proposed. The Government was however endeavouring to find a solution to this problem but these difficulties had delayed it in complying with its obligations under article 19. It was hoped that it would soon be possible to fulfil the obligations regarding the submission of instruments. In addition to the seven Conventions already ratified by Lebanon, 14 other instruments had been processed for submission to Parliament and for ratification and yet other Conventions were being considered as regards ratification, in spite of the linguistic and other difficulties involved.

The Employers' members stated that they appreciated the difficulties experienced by the Government in complying with its obligations under article 19. The Committee had been concerned not with the nature of the competent authority but with the fact that numerous Conventions and Recommendations had not so far been submitted to this authority.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take steps to ensure compliance at an early date with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution.

Liberia

The Government communicated the following information:

The instruments adopted at the 47th Session of the Conference were submitted to the Department of Commerce and Industry. The small volume of operations of the machines has not necessitated the adoption of provisions in the fields provided for by Convention No. 119 and Recommendation No. 118. When the time comes to make such provisions, account will be taken of Recommendation No. 119. For the time being, the means available to the Labour Office are sufficient to ensure the application of the security measures. Recommendation No. 119 will be taken into consideration in the application of the law in this field.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Government maintained the views already expressed in 1954 regarding the nature of the competent authorities. It deemed that the executive was the competent authority in all cases where no legislative measures were called for.

The Employers' members stated that the opinion of the Government appeared to differ from that of the Committee of Experts as to what was the competent authority within the terms of article 19. The instruments seemed to be submitted to the executive and not to the Legislature.

The Committee noted that the point of view constantly taken by the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee was that Conventions and Recommendations should be submitted to the authorities which had the power to legislate, normally the Parliament. Moreover, the instruments should be submitted in all cases and not only when ratification of a Convention or implementation of a Recommendation was contemplated. These principles were respected in the instruments submitted by the Government in the obligations of submission, which was regularly sent to governments.

The Government representative pointed out that in Liberia, Bills were first placed before the executive which, in turn, submitted them to the Legislature whose decision had to be finally approved by the President. The explanations supplied by the Committee would be examined by the Government and it was hoped that additional information might be furnished in the near future.

The Workers' members expressed the hope that the Government would carefully examine this question and would soon supply satisfactory information.

Mali

A Government representative made the following statement:

A misunderstanding had existed for a number of years between the Government of Mali and the Committee as regards exactly what information was requested under article 19. This misunderstanding had been dispelled in 1963 and it was clear that the competent authority in regard to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations was the Legislative Assembly. It had been found however that, under the procedure existing in Mali, the Government could normally submit to the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate only Bills which called for positive action and could not therefore submit I.L.O. instruments to Parliament unless their ratification was proposed. The Government was however endeavouring to find a solution to this problem but these difficulties had delayed it in complying with its obligations under article 19. It was hoped that it would soon be possible to fulfil the obligations regarding the submission of instruments. In addition to the seven Conventions already ratified by Mali, 14 other instruments had been processed for submission to Parliament and for ratification and yet other Conventions were being considered as regards ratification, in spite of the linguistic and other difficulties involved.

The Employers' members stated that they appreciated the difficulties experienced by the Government in complying with its obligations under article 19. The Committee had been concerned not with the nature of the competent authority but with the fact that numerous Conventions and Recommendations had not so far been submitted to this authority.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take steps to ensure compliance at an early date with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution.

Netherlands

The Government communicated the following information:

The Parliament has approved the ratification of Conventions Nos. 32, 112, 116 and 118. The ratification of Conventions Nos. 14, 24, 25 and 44 will probably be registered before the end of the year. Conventions Nos. 106, 115, 117, 119, 120, 121 and 122 are to be submitted to Parliament before the end of the year. Conventions Nos. 24 and 25 have now passed the Second Chamber of the States General. As regards the Conventions mentioned in the last column of the table on page 172 of the report of the Committee of Experts (except Conventions Nos. 106 and 117 which will be submitted to Parliament before the end of the year) they have been published in the Negatendaalblad (Treaty Series) which is automatically sent to the members of the States General. Since this publication only contains Conventions and treaties a systematic publication of Recommendations is also envisaged. The submission of Recommendations data to the States General has been fixed for the year 1966 on the one hand because priority has been given to the Conventions and on the other hand because the necessary consultations with the employers and workers, the Ministries, the Chambers of Commerce, etc. have not been completed at the end of the year. Moreover the fact must be taken into account that the Kingdom of the Netherlands consists of three parts: the Netherlands, the Netherlands Antilles and Surinam.

However, in view of the progress made as regards submission of Conventions it is hoped that the submission of Recommendations will be more rapid. Appendix V of the Memorandum containing the discussions on the budget for 1969 of the Ministry of Social Affairs and
Appendix V : Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Public Health (Document No. 5700, No. 13), which was communicated to the Committee in 1964, contains a survey of all Conventions adopted by the Conference at its First to 43rd Sessions which have not yet been ratified by the Netherlands. This survey contains the comments made by the Government to the States General on the reasons which have prevented ratification of these Conventions.

Niger

The Government communicated the following information:

The instruments adopted by the Conference at its 45th to 47th Sessions have been submitted to the National Assembly. In its report to the National Assembly, the Government proposed ratification of Conventions Nos. 117 and 119 (the ratification of these instruments has been registered since then). According to the report, it appears that these conventions No. 119 cannot be ratified at present because of the new demands this would make on the economy of the country. The Recommendations adopted at the sessions in question contain provisions which are either superfluous because they are already incorporated in the legislation or cannot yet be applied.

In addition a Government representative stated that the delay in complying with the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities was due to the fact that the Government had not considered this indispensable in regard to instruments which it did not wish to ratify. It had given priority to four Conventions which were ratified in 1964. The delay was also due to the fact that the provisions of many of these Conventions were already applied by national legislation, so that ratification was not urgent. Finally, it should be borne in mind that legislative procedures were slow and often prevented compliance with specified time limits.

Pakistan

A Government representative made the following statement:

The instruments adopted by the Conference had certainly been submitted to the competent authorities. Further information would be supplied in writing on this point.

Panama

A Government representative stated that the failure to comply with obligations was due to recent events and to the existing conditions (see under "General Observations").

The Workers' member of Panama stated that the country was run by an oligarchy which oppressed the workers. As a result Bills proposing the ratification of Conventions, or the adoption of social legislation, had not been dealt with in good faith. However, there had now been some change, and it was hoped that a series of Conventions would be ratified and modifications made in the Labour Code and in the Agrarian Code, which were soon to come into force. It was unfortunate that when Conventions were submitted to the competent authorities, pressure was put on these authorities to prevent ratification. Some improvement could be expected since, on 1 May 1965, the President had promised to submit I.L.O. Conventions to the appropriate authorities, and to proceed with the ratification of some of the Conventions.

The Workers' members pointed out that the Committee of Experts had made an observation noting with great regret that apparent to have been taken to submit to the competent authorities a large number of instruments. The Committee understood the difficulties facing the Government, but could not accept the view that these difficulties could prevent the submission of instruments to the competent authority.

The Employers' members stated that the information supplied by the Government member of Panama had not been satisfactory.

In reply the Government representative stated that the Government had no intention of not complying with its obligations. It had submitted to the competent authorities those Conventions which it intended to ratify, and these ratifications had been duly communicated to the I.L.O.

The Committee, whilst appreciating the difficulties experienced by the Government, expressed the hope that with the proposed setting up of a Ministry of Labour and the appointment of a permanent representative in Geneva, the Government would in future find it possible to discharge fully its obligations under the Constitution of the I.L.O.

Peru

A Government representative made the following statement:

Peru had ratified 59 Conventions. Fifty-eight others, including Conventions Nos. 120, 121 and 122, had been submitted to Parliament.

Poland

The Government communicated the following information:

Conventions Nos. 115 and 116 have been ratified. The Council of State on 19 October 1964 postponed taking a decision on the ratification of Convention No. 108 for an indefinite period. Convention No. 117 as well as Recommendation No. 115 with the appropriate conclusions have been submitted to the Council of State which has not yet taken any decision on these instruments. The Council of Ministers has indicated that Recommendations Nos. 115 and 117 were already applied in Poland (resolutions Nos. 195/64 of 7 July 1964 and 196/65 of 23 March 1965).

Conclusions relating to other Conventions and Recommendations are at present being considered by the Committee on Labour and Wages and the institutions concerned.

In addition, a Government representative made the following statement:

Poland had been a member of the I.L.O. since 1919 without interruption. It had ratified a total of 53 Conventions and was thus amongst the ten countries having ratified most Conventions. It fully applied the Conventions dealing with fundamental rights. All this indicated that the Government was anxious to fulfil its obligations under the I.L.O. Constitution as regards Conventions and Recommendations. The Council of State, which was the competent authority in this respect, was considering a number of new ratifications, and conclusions relating to other instruments were now being considered by the Committee on Labour and Wages and the institutions concerned. The Diet, whose session had closed one month ago, had been codifying texts relating, for example, to the rights of workers, civil procedure, and family and other rights. Thus a chapter relating to labour disputes had been inserted in the Civil Procedure Code and a new law relating to the safety and health of workers had been adopted which codified the provisions on labour inspection. Most of the measures taken at the past parliamentary session were now in force, or would soon enter into force, and further measures affecting other Conventions could be expected shortly. These various factors explained the decision of the Chanceller of the Council of State to postpone its consideration of the Conventions and Recommendations to be ratified until it was in a position to make well-founded proposals regarding ratification.

The Workers' members expressed the hope that the question of the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities would be settled by next year.

Portugal

A Government representative made the following statement:

All the texts had been submitted to the National Assembly. The necessary information had been communicated to the I.L.O. by letters E.C.79/43.34 of 19 June 1964 and No. 46/43.34 of 20 February 1965. This information indicated that the Minister of Foreign Affairs had sent to the President of the National Assembly all the instruments constituting the records of the Conference. The I.L.O. had acknowledged the receipt of this communication.

Rumania

A Government representative made the following statement:

The competent authority was the Council of State. Under article 37 (2) of the National Constitution it was competent to adopt provisions having legal force and to ratify and denounced treaties. This competence met the requirements of article 19 of the I.L.O. Constitution. Detailed information had been supplied since the publication of the Experts' report. Employers' members expressed the hope that detailed information would be communicated regularly in future.

Sudan

A Government representative made the following statement:

The Sudan had been subject to military dictatorship for the past six years and the Government's failure to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities was the responsibility of this past regime. There had been no competent authority in the Sudan, for the purpose of the submission of Conventions and Recommendations, between November 1958 and October 1964. The provisional council to which reference had been made was in existence only for a few months. A Constituent Assembly had now been elected and would meet on 10 June. The instruments adopted by the Conference would be submitted to this Assembly, with the comments of the Labour Department.

The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would now find it possible to discharge satisfactorily its obligation to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference.

Syrian Arab Republic

The Government communicated the following information:

Conventions Nos. 91, 92, 93 and 108 have been submitted to the competent legislative authority, which at present is the Council of the Presidency. Convention No. 119 has been ratified and Recommendations Nos. 118 and 119 have been submitted. The other Conventions and Recommendations will be submitted in the near future.

In addition, a Government representative stated that the Syrian Arab Republic had ratified Conventions Nos. 101, 117, 119 and 120, thus bringing the total ratifications to 35. In addition, Conventions Nos. 90, 91, 92, 93, 97, 99, 102, 103, 104, 108, 109 and 110 had recently been submitted to the legislative authorities. The Government had thus complied with many of its obligations in regard to the submission of instruments to the competent authorities. The delay in regard to the submission of the remaining instruments was due to purely administrative difficulties. It was likely, however, that these texts would soon be submitted, as a special service had been set up which would be responsible for dealing, inter alia, with relations with the I.L.O. It was hoped that in future there would be no delay in complying with obligations under the I.L.O. Constitution.

Thailand

A Government representative made the following statement:

The submission of instruments to the competent authorities was now being contemplated, with the assistance of I.L.O. experts and officials. A national constituent assembly had been set up and was the competent authority for the purpose of article 19. It was hoped that the instruments in question would be submitted to this body in the near future.

The Workers' and Employers' members noted that the instruments adopted since the 57th Session of the Conference had only in substance been submitted to the Council of Ministers; they should, in fact, have been submitted to Parliament. The fact that the Conventions and Recommendations had not been submitted to the proper competent authority constituted a breach of the Constitution.

The Committee expressed the hope that the necessary measures would be taken by next year with regard to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities.

Tunisia

A Government representative made the following statement:

The initiative for proposing new legislation lay with members of Parliament or with the Government. When a Bill was to be tabled by the Government, the matter was first considered by the technical department immi-dently concerned which then consulted any other department interested in the matter. The proposed Bill was then communicated to the Prime Minister's Office which had the sole competence for drafting government Bills. The same procedure was followed in regard to the submission of Conventions and Recommendations. As regards the Conventions adopted at the 46th and 47th Sessions, Convention No. 118 had now been ratified by Parliament; the procedure had been more rapid, as only one technical department was involved. Conventions Nos. 117 and 119 had been submitted to the competent authority, after having been examined by the competent departments concerned, and it was hoped that they would soon be ratified. The procedure took time but it should be noted that Tunisia had now ratified 39 Conventions.

The Workers' members stated that the obligation under article 19 of the Constitution did not arise from the ratification of instruments, but to their submission to the proper competent authorities within the prescribed time limits.

The Government representative stated that the Government appreciated the nature of the obligations under article 19 and it was required to make comments at the time of submission and these could only be made after consultation between the departments concerned and in accordance with the procedure indicated above.

Uganda

The Government communicated the following information:

The instruments adopted at the 47th Session of the Conference have been submitted to the National Assembly in March 1965. As soon as the necessary studies are completed, proposals will be submitted to the National Assembly so that effect could be given to these instruments. Already several provisions of the said instruments have been incorporated in the draft amendments to the labour legislation.

U.S.S.R.

The Workers' members recalled that the Committee of Experts had expressed the hope that the instruments adopted by the Conference would be submitted not only to the Presidium of the Supreme Soviet but also to the Supreme Soviet itself, which was the most representative national legislative body.

A Government representative made the following statement:

As already indicated in previous years, the Government was convinced that the definition of the competent authorities for the purposes of article 19 of the Constitution was a domestic affair for the governments of member States as it depended on the national constitutions. Attention should be drawn in this connection to the report of the Conference Committee in 1962, where it was indicated, in paragraph 39, that the competent authority was the authority which, under the constitution of each State had power to legislate or take other action in order to implement Conventions and Recommendations. This passage constituted a judicious and sound decision which reflected the views both of the Committee and of the Government of the U.S.S.R. There was a contradiction in the present report of the Committee of Experts; in paragraph 44 of the General Report the Committee noted with pleasure that the governments of 34 member States, including the U.S.S.R., had submitted to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 46th Session. Yet in its observation to the U.S.S.R., the Committee raised the question of the nature of the competent authority to which Conference decisions were submitted in this country. There seemed to be no point in pursuing the discussion of this case. The Committee should concern itself, not with the nature of the competent authority to which Conventions and Recommendations were submitted, but with the question of the actual submission to these authorities within the time limits prescribed by the Constitution of the I.L.O. The point that was of paramount importance. Nevertheless, as indicated in paragraph 51 of the Experts' report, only 33 of the 108 States which were members of the Organization at the time had submitted to the competent authorities within the required time limit all the instruments adopted at that session. This was an abnormal situation and the Committee should concentrate on trying to improve this aspect.
A member of the Committee stated that there was no contradiction between paragraph 44 of the Experts’ report and the particular observation concerning submission; in the first case the Experts had noted the indication of the Government that it had submitted the instruments, in the other case, the question concerned the nature of the authority to which they had been submitted.

In reply to a question by a Workers’ member, it was recalled that the Experts and the Committee had come to the following conclusions in the past concerning the nature of the competent authority: article 19 referred to the authority which, under the national constitution, had competence over the matters dealt with by a Convention or Recommendation for the enactment of legislation or other action. From a strictly legal view, article 19 was implemented when the authority to which the instruments were submitted had legislative competence to give them effect. However, the Experts and this Committee had taken the view that in cases where two kinds of legislative authorities existed, one of which was more widely representative than the other, it would be desirable to submit the instruments also to the latter in order that the aim of article 19, which was also to inform public opinion, would be more fully achieved.

The U.S.S.R. Government representative stated that the problem of competent authority could be settled only in the light of the constitution of each country. For example, France, which had been a member of the I.L.O. since its inception, had four times changed its opinion concerning the competent authority, which showed that there could be no uniform criterion. Article 19 only spoke of the authority within whose competence the matter lay with a view to the enactment of legislation or other action. The discussions on the nature of the competent authority of each country should be closed; what was important was that all instruments were submitted in time to the competent authority.

The Workers’ Vice-Chairman stated that in fact the competent authority of each country could only be determined having regard to the constitutional system of that country. It seemed that in the case of the U.S.S.R. and countries where the constitutional system was the same additional discussion would be pointless.

United Arab Republic

A Government representative made the following statement:

The information requested would soon be supplied. The instruments in question had in fact been submitted to the competent authorities. A number of them had been ratified.

Uruguay

A Government representative made the following statement:

Since 1963 all instruments adopted at the 38th to 46th Sessions had been submitted to the competent authorities, with ratification proposals. This information had not been available to the Committee of Experts. The instruments adopted since the 47th Session were being considered and would soon be submitted to Congress.

Fourth Item on the Agenda: The Employment of Young Persons in Underground Work in Mines of All Kinds

(1) Text of the Proposed Convention concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines, Prepared by the International Labour Office.

(2) Text of the Proposed Recommendation concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines, Prepared by the International Labour Office.

(3) Text of the Proposed Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines, Prepared by the International Labour Office.

(5) First Report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.¹

1. The Committee on Employment of Young Miners was set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 3 June 1965 and was originally composed of 78 members (35 Government members, 18 Employers' members and 25 Workers' members).

2. As from the fourth sitting of the Committee on 8 June 1965, two further members were, in accordance with the decision of the Appeals Board², added to the voting strength of the Employers' members of the Committee, thus bringing the total membership of the Committee to 80. In order to ensure equality in voting strength each Government member was given 20 votes, each Employers' member 35 votes and each Workers' member 28 votes, the entire voting strength of each group amounting to 700 votes. The change in the membership of the Committee gave rise to a statement by the Employers' Vice-Chairman of the Committee, who pointed out that the voting members on whose behalf he had spoken up to the decision of the Appeals Board consisted of members freely elected by the Employers' group. The two members added to the voting strength, who had not been elected by their group, could not be regarded as representing the Employers' group. The Employers' spokesman would, therefore, in any further statements made to the Committee, be speaking only on behalf of those members who had accepted the decision of the Employers' group. In reply, the new Employers' members stated that they would participate in the work of the Committee and exercise the right which had been conferred on them. They objected to the discrimination practised by the Employers' members against the employers of their countries.

3. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

   Chairman: Mr. Tokunboh, Government member, Nigeria.

   Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Després, Employers' member, Canada, and Mr. Jones, Workers' member, United Kingdom.

   Reporter: Mr. Pelzl, Government member, Austria.

4. The Committee set up a Drafting Committee consisting of the Reporter, Mr. Schuster (Government member, Luxembourg), Mr. Groten (Employers' member, Netherlands) and Mr. Semaan (Workers' member, Lebanon).

INTRODUCTION

5. The Committee had before it Reports IV (1) and IV (2) which had been prepared by the International Labour Office in connection with the fourth item on the agenda of the Conference, concerning the employment of young persons in underground work in mines of all kinds. The draft texts based on the Proposed Conclusions adopted by the Conference at its 48th Session had received widespread approval by governments. Of the 68 governments whose replies had been received in time for inclusion in Report IV (2), 50 had indicated that they had no objections or observations to put forward or that the proposed texts constituted a satisfactory basis for discussions by the Conference. The observations made by other governments had not led the Office to suggest any substantial changes.

² See Appendix X, p. 690.
6. The Committee had before it a proposed Convention and a proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, a proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines, and a proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines and containing suggestions concerning health, safety and welfare, weekly rest, paid annual holidays, training and consultation. These instruments aimed at applying the principles and Conventions previously adopted by the Conference on the subject in respect of all industrial undertakings to the special conditions of underground work in mines. This involved, in certain cases, the application of higher standards. It was hoped that the proposed Conventions would be drafted in simple terms with a view to securing widespread acceptance, keeping other more detailed provisions for inclusion in the proposed Recommendations.

GENERAL DISCUSSION

7. The spokesman for the Workers' members hoped that it would be possible to arrive at a general agreement on the substance of the proposals before the Committee without having to deal with too many details. The spokesman for the Employers' members agreed that the proposed texts constituted a satisfactory basis for discussions and indicated that the amendments he would submit would be aimed at making the texts more realistic.

8. The Committee agreed to take the texts submitted in Report IV (2) as the basis for discussion.

9. The Government members for Belgium and the Federal Republic of Germany submitted an amendment suggesting that the term "employment or work" underground should be used wherever appropriate. The Belgian Government member drew attention to certain variations in the terms used in different parts of the four instruments and urged that a greater uniformity be secured. The Drafting Committee was entrusted with this task and the amendment was thereupon withdrawn. The Committee decided to submit to the Conference in its first report the outcome of the consideration of the text of the proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, with a supplementary Recommendation.

CONSIDERATION OF THE PROPOSED CONVENTION CONCERNING THE MINIMUM AGE FOR ADMISSION TO EMPLOYMENT UNDERGROUND IN MINES

Preamble

10. The United Kingdom Employers' members regretted that so much emphasis had been placed on the dangers to life and health alleged to be inherent in employment underground in mines. In fact, though certain hazards certainly existed, a great deal had been done to remove them, particularly as the result of improved measures of dust suppression. Emphasis on these dangers in an international text presented a distorted picture of conditions of work in mines and was likely to increase the difficulties of recruitment. The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section had submitted an amendment designed to delete from the Preamble any reference to dangers inherent in underground work and to substitute a reference to the nature of such employment. This amendment was adopted.

11. The Preamble was adopted, subject to a reservation by the spokesman for the Employers' members to the effect that agreement could only be given to the form of the instrument after its content had been determined.

Article 1

12. A number of amendments were submitted with a view to extending the definition of a "mined" and therefore the scope of the instruments in order to ensure that the protection afforded by them would also extend to quarries. The Workers' members and the United States Government member, supported by some other Government members, would have wished to see the proposed measure extended to cover young workers employed in open-cast mines, clay pits, quarries and other surface workings. The representative of the Secretary-General having made it clear that the terms of reference of the Committee were limited to the employment of persons underground, amendments which might have extended to workers above ground were withdrawn, as was also an amendment submitted by the Rumanian Government member designed to extend the scope of the instruments to open-cast mines or quarries from which minerals containing silica were extracted. After considerable discussion the Committee adopted an amendment to the effect that in respect of the employment of persons in underground work the proposed Convention should also apply to quarries. The Workers' members accepted this solution in view of the proposed resolution submitted by the United States Government member to which reference will be made in a subsequent report of the Committee calling for further consideration of the conditions of employment of young persons in open-cast mines, quarries and similar undertakings.

Article 2

13. The Employers' Vice-Chairman pointed out that the effect of this Article was to introduce into a Convention the possibility of different countries meeting the conditions of the Convention by applying different standards. On behalf of the Employers' members for whom he spoke, he wished his reservation on this point to be recorded as it was thought that a new procedure of this kind might, in certain cases, give rise to difficulties of application.

14. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. had submitted an amendment suggesting that, in the case of employment declared by national laws and regulations to be particularly dangerous or harmful to health or performed under conditions in respect of which a similar declaration had been made, the minimum age should be 18 years rather than 16 years. The Workers' members would have supported this amendment were it not for the fact that the question of a higher minimum age for particularly dangerous work was taken up in the proposed complementary Recommendation. In these circumstances the Workers' members thought it inadvisable to amend Article 2 as this might make ratification more difficult to secure. The Employers' Vice-Chairman took the same position with regard to this amendment, which was in consequence withdrawn.

15. The United Kingdom Government member stated that, whilst his Government, in principle, was in favour of fixing a minimum age, it attached even greater importance to adopting measures for the protection of all workers. His Government would agree to the adoption of the proposed Convention but had to make a reservation with regard to the proposed minimum age of 16 years, because for the time being the minimum school-leaving age in the United Kingdom was 15 years. This would, at the time of the adoption of the proposed Convention, result in a gap of one year before admission to underground work in mines, a point which could give rise to difficulty in recruitment.

16. Article 2 was adopted.

Article 3

17. The spokesman for the Employers' members referred in connection with this Article to the reservation made in respect of Article 2 regarding the inadvisability of having various national standards giving effect to the same international instrument.

18. Article 3 was adopted.

Article 4

19. The first three paragraphs, relating to measures designed to ensure that effect is given to the proposed Convention, gave rise to no amendments.

20. The fourth paragraph, which requires employers to keep certain records and to make them available to inspectors and workers' representatives, was the subject of a number of amendments submitted by the Austrian, French and Luxembourg Government members and by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section. The proposal of the Austrian Government member was designed to make it clear that the workers' representatives to whom the records could be made available were those chosen in conformity with national laws or regulations. The amendments of the French and Luxembourg Government members and of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section proposed the removal of any explicit reference to workers' representatives having access to records, but required them to be made available to "persons appointed pursuant to rules laid down by the competent authority". An amendment submitted by the Australian Government member proposed that the records should be made available to inspectors and where appropriate to workers' representatives.

21. The spokesman for the Employers' members contended that it was inappropriate for workers' representatives to be in a position to exercise supervision over the implementation of legislation by employers. To provide that the workers' representatives could duplicate the work of labour inspectors was to cast a reflection on the latter's efficiency. It constituted an infringement of the prerogatives of management. The attitude of many Employers' members towards the proposed Convention as a whole would depend on the decision taken with regard to this matter, which raised an important issue of principle. They could, however, agree that records should be made available to persons appointed in pursuance of rules laid down by the competent authority, recognising that in certain circumstances these would include workers' representatives. The Belgian Government member pointed out that in his country the Government had authority to appoint only officials to secure the enforcement of legislation.

22. The Workers' members considered that it was highly desirable that, only right that workers' representatives should have the records relating to the employment of young persons employed underground made available to them. They were in a better position than inspectors to know the real facts, the more so as the visits of inspectors were necessarily infrequent. They pressed for the maintenance of the text approved by the Conference at its 48th Session, which provided for the records to be made available to workers' representatives.

23. The United States Government member proposed a subamendment to the effect that the records should be made available to inspectors and workers' representatives appointed pursuant to rules laid down by the competent authority. This amendment was opposed by the spokesman for the Employers' members. It was adopted by 1,290 votes in favour, 730 against, with 20 abstentions. The amendment which proposed that the records be made available to persons appointed pursuant to such rules, omitting any reference to workers' representatives, was rejected by 750 votes in favour, 1,130 against, with 180 abstentions. The other amendments were withdrawn.

24. The Government member for the U.S.S.R. submitted an amendment designed to ensure that the date of birth of young persons employed in mines should be duly certified. He stressed the importance of ensuring that young persons below the minimum age of admission did not in fact secure employment underground and referred to the natural tendency of many youths to overstate their age when presenting themselves for work. The Nigerian and several other Government members pointed to the fact that in many countries records of birth were not available; insistence on the production of a birth certificate would either retard ratification of the Convention or prevent some youths from securing employment. The spokesman for the Workers' members reminded the Committee that he had presented a similar amendment at the previous session of the Conference but had agreed to withdraw it on account of the very real difficulties referred to. The Committee finally agreed to state that the date of birth should be duly certified wherever possible.

25. Article 4, as amended, was adopted by 1,250 votes in favour, 615 against, with 55 abstentions.

26. The Chairman, wishing to secure the greatest possible degree of acceptance of the proposed Convention, undertook further negotiations through the Officers of the Committee with a view to securing a version of paragraph 4 of Article 4 which would not meet with opposition from any major part of the members of the Committee. As a result of these discussions he submitted an amendment deleting the reference to workers' representatives appointed pursuant to rules laid down by the competent authority in the main part of the paragraph and adding a further subparagraph to the effect that the employer should make available on request to the workers' representatives lists of the persons employed underground by him who were less than two years older than the specified minimum age for admission to employment, containing their dates of birth and the dates at which they were first engaged.

27. This text was accepted on behalf of the Employers' and Workers' members.

28. The French Government member, however, moved a subamendment to the effect that the workers' representative should be appointed according to rules laid down by the competent authority. He referred to the problems which arose in countries, such as his own, in which miners' delegates or members of works committees were customarily given access to information of this type, which was not, however, usually made available to workers' representatives as such. There were also difficulties in certain countries in which several conflicting trade unions were involved. He was supported in his request by some other Government members.

29. The Chairman explained that in this particular paragraph the obligation was on the employer and not on the competent authority, and that it therefore seemed superfluous to have to define the workers' representatives with whom the employer customarily dealt. The Austrian Government member was prepared to leave the text as it stood if an assurance could be given that the choice of the workers' representatives in question would in fact depend on the practices customary in the various countries, as had been stated at the session of the Committee the previous year. The representative of the Secretary-General expressed the view that, in the absence of any definition of "workers' representatives" in the text, the choice would clearly have to be made in accordance with the practices customary in each country. This, however, was not equivalent to stating that the workers' representatives would be those appointed according to rules laid down by the competent authority, if only because in a great many countries no such rules existed. On this understanding the French Government member withdrew his subamendment.

30. The amendment was corrected to make it clear that the employer would make the lists available at the request of the workers' representatives concerned. The proposal put forward by the Chairman was then adopted.

31. Article 4, as further amended, was adopted without opposition.

Article 5

32. The Australian Government member pointed out that he was fully in favour of consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned in regard to the determination of the minimum age to be laid down and that this was the practice in his country. Nevertheless such consultation was not always possible and he therefore submitted an amendment to the effect that it should take place as far as was practicable. The amendment was not seconded and was therefore not discussed.

33. Article 5 was adopted.

Consideration of the Proposed Recommendation Concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines

Preamble

34. The Preamble was adopted.

Paragraph 1

35. The Committee agreed that the definition of a mine adopted for the purposes of the proposed Convention concerning minimum age should apply also to the proposed Recommendation.

Paragraph 2

36. The Committee accepted an amendment submitted by the Australian Government, slightly subamended, to the effect that the steps to be taken to raise the minimum age for admission to employment underground to 16 years in those countries where it was lower should not necessarily be "immediate" but should be taken "as speedily as possible".

37. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 3

38. The spokesman for the Employers' members submitted an amendment to delete the reference to dangers inherent in employment underground based on the same arguments as those he had submitted in connection with the similar expression of opinion in the Preamble to the Convention. The Workers' members, who had accepted the proposed change in the case of the Preamble referred to, were not prepared to do so in a substantive Paragraph of the Recommendation. The amendment was withdrawn and Paragraph 3 was adopted without change.
Appendix VI: Young Persons (Underground Work in Mines)

39. The Austrian Government member submitted an amendment which aimed at permitting a young worker who either did not wish to undergo apprenticeship or other systematic training, or had completed such training, to be employed underground even if he were under the prescribed age for productive employment. In such cases he would, of course, be protected by the safeguards provided for in clause (b) of Paragraph 4. The Austrian Government member pointed out that young persons could not be compelled to undergo apprenticeship or other systematic training, and that even if they did there might be a gap between the completion of training and attaining the prescribed minimum age. It would be unreasonable to refuse to permit young persons to work underground during this period.

40. Several Government members, including in particular those of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom and the United States, as well as the Workers’ members, were opposed to allowing young persons to be employed underground if they had not received suitable training. The Algerian, Belgian, Luxembourg and United States Government members also expressed the view that the proposal put forward was contrary to the general purpose of the Recommendation, which aimed at setting the minimum age of 18 for productive employment, whilst permitting an exception for training purposes.

41. The proposed amendment was supported by the Employers’ members.

42. The Austrian Government member drew a distinction between the relatively short basic vocational training referred to in Paragraph 13 of the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, and which, he agreed, every youth going down a mine should receive, and the apprenticeship or systematic training referred to in Paragraph 4 of the present proposed Recommendation, which would take substantially longer. The Workers’ members and the United Kingdom Government member were prepared to consider making an exception designed to cover a possible gap between completion of training (which would be longer and more thorough than the type of short basic training referred to by some members), and the prescribed minimum age for productive employment. An amendment on these lines was finally adopted in the form of a proviso permitting an exception to the provisions of Paragraph 4 in the circumstances referred to. The United States Government member wished his reservation as to the advisability of permitting young persons under the prescribed age to be thus employed underground to be recorded.

43. On the strength of the agreement arrived at in respect of the above point, the Employers’ members withdrew an amendment which aimed at deleting the indication of 18 years as the minimum age which should be prescribed by governments for productive employment. An amendment submitted by the Workers’ members was adopted to make it clear that the training for the purposes of which an exception to the minimum age for productive employment could be made was apprenticeship or systematic vocational training. The text submitted by the Office had omitted the word “vocational” in order to meet the suggestion made by the New Zealand Government in its observations on the text submitted to it in 1964 to the effect that students engaged in a course of study towards a university degree should be allowed to work underground even if under the prescribed minimum age in order to secure practical experience in a mine. They might be deemed not to be covered by an exception which referred to “vocational” training. The amendment submitted by the Workers’ members was, however, adopted, the New Zealand Government member expressing his regret that the point his Government had raised had not been met.

44. Paragraph 4, as amended, was adopted.

45. The Workers’ members submitted an amendment to the effect that the minimum age at which workers could be employed underground on work which was harmful to health, or carried out under conditions which were harmful to health or on jobs which might endanger the safety of themselves or others, should be fixed at 21 years rather than 18 years. The Government member for the U.S.S.R. submitted an amendment suggesting that the age should be higher than 18 years and that the aim to be pursued would be to fix this age at 20 years. He considered that it was not logical to recommend that the minimum age for all productive employment should be fixed at 18 years and at the same time to suggest the same age for such specially dangerous work. It was in his view essential to afford increased protection to young workers in such cases.

46. The spokesman for the Employers’ members, and several Government members, stressed the great variety of jobs covered by the higher minimum age with substantial variations in the extent of the potential hazards or degrees of responsibility involved. In some cases 18 years might be suitable; in others, for instance for shotfirers, the age of 20, 21 or even higher might be called for. The Austrian Government member added that if the age were set at too high a level the competent authorities in many countries might be tempted to leave out of these special lists some jobs which could be performed by workers below the higher age thus prescribed just in order to comply with the terms of the Recommendation. This would mean a lessening of the protection intended to be afforded by the regulations. It was also pointed out in this connection that, in virtue of Paragraph 7 of the proposed Recommendation, all such regulations would be adopted only after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

47. After prolonged discussion a text was adopted indicating that the minimum age prescribed for the jobs and conditions in question should be sufficiently high appropriate to each job or condition, and in no case less than 18 years. This text was adopted by 1,586 votes in favour, 182 against, with 115 abstentions.

48. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 6

49. Paragraph 6 was adopted without discussion.

Paragraph 7

50. An amendment was submitted by the Austrian Government member designed to bring the Paragraph relating to the consultation of employers' and workers' organisations in the proposed Recommendation into line with corresponding Articles or Paragraphs in the other proposed instruments before the Committee. He considered that it was not practicable to arrange for consultation in regard to any action, even of an administrative character, taken in pursuance of the terms of the proposed Recommendation. It would be better to limit such consultation to the general policies aimed at implementing its terms. The Workers' members accepted the change thus proposed, but considered that if consultation was to be effective it should take place before such general policies were determined. The Committee concurred with this point of view and added that such consultation should apply not only to general policies of implementation, but also to the adoption of regulations.

51. The Australian Government member considered that consultation, whilst desirable, was not always practicable, and submitted an amendment indicating that consultation should be undertaken "so far as practicable". He subsequently withdrew this amendment, but wished his reservation on this point to be recorded.

52. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted.

Adoption of the Proposed Convention and the Proposed Recommendation Concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines

53. The Committee remitted to its Drafting Committee the texts of the proposed Convention and the proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines. At its ninth sitting on 14 June 1965 it considered the texts submitted to it by the Drafting Committee.

Proposed Convention

54. The Reporter explained that the Drafting Committee had made only minor changes except in regard to two points. The first of these related to Article 1 containing a definition of the scope of the proposed Convention. It was thought preferable not to cast doubt on the fact that the term "mine" included quarries but rather, in view of discussion which had taken place in the Committee, to indicate that the provisions of the proposed Convention concerning employment or work underground in mines should apply also to employment or work underground in quarries.

55. In this connection the representative of the Secretary-General made it clear that this addition did not imply any change in the scope of the term "mine" as used in other instruments adopted by the Conference and in particular the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935, which also applied to quarries.

56. The Reporter indicated that the other matter on which a change of substance had been introduced related to the records which should be kept in accordance with Article 4, paragraph 4, subparagraph (1). It had been provided that the records should indicate the date at which a young person was first engaged. It had been pointed out in the Drafting Committee that if the young person had been first engaged for work above ground, that date was not significant from the point of view of securing enforcement of the provisions of the proposed Convention and that the relevant date was that on which the person first worked underground. The Committee modified this proposal to make it clear that this date should apply to the beginning of employment or work underground and that the records in question could relate only to employment or work in the undertaking keeping these records, even if the young person concerned had previously been employed or worked underground in some other undertaking. A corresponding change was introduced into subparagraph 2 of Article 4, paragraph 4.

57. The Drafting Committee had also sought to make it clear that the Convention should apply either to employment or work underground and had introduced this wording wherever appropriate.

58. In respect of Article 2 the United Kingdom Government member indicated that he would have to abstain. The Japanese Employers' member, referring to the reservation made by the spokesman for the Employers' members on Article 2, indicated that he could not support this Article because it enabled various countries to apply differing standards in giving effect to the same Convention. The Iranian and Norwegian Employers' members made a reservation on the same lines. The Swedish Employers' member indicated that he would abstain on Article 2 owing to the minimum age prescribed.

59. The Committee adopted the text of the proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines by 1,733 votes in favour, none against, with 175 abstentions.

60. The United Kingdom Government member stated that, while he had voted in favour of the proposed Convention, paragraph 3 of Article 2, which set the minimum age at 16 years, presented certain difficulties for the United Kingdom Government at the present time. He indicated that the Government would take measures as soon as practicable based on the principle of Paragraph 2 of the proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines and that it hoped it would be possible for it to ratify the Convention before too many years had elapsed.
Proposed Recommendation

61. Several of the points indicated above relating to the drafting of the proposed Convention were also applicable to the proposed Recommendation.

62. The United States Government member wished it to be recorded that his Government was not in favour of the proviso to Paragraph 4, which made it possible for a young person under the prescribed minimum age to be employed underground for purposes other than training if he had completed his apprenticeship or other systematic vocational training. The Luxembourg Government member made a similar reservation.

63. With regard to Paragraph 7 the Australian Government member asked that his reservation be recorded regarding the practicability of consultation in all circumstances.

64. The Committee adopted the text of the proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines by 1,901 votes in favour, none against, with 35 abstentions.

Future Work of the Committee

65. The Committee proposed to submit further reports concerning its discussions on the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines, and the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines.

Adoption of the Report

66. Some members requested that minor changes be made in the text of the draft of the present report. The changes have, where appropriate, been incorporated in the text reproduced above. The present report was adopted unanimously by the Committee for submission to the Conference.

(6) Text of the Proposed Convention concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.1

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Noting that the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935, prohibits in principle the employment of any female, whatever her age, on underground work in any mine, and

Noting that the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937, which is applicable to mines, provides that children under the age of 15 years shall not be employed or work in any public or private undertaking, or in any branch thereof, and

Noting that the Convention further specifies that, in respect of employment which by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried on, are dangerous to the life, health or morals of the persons employed therein, national laws shall either prescribe or empower an appropriate authority to prescribe a higher age or ages than 15 years for the admission thereto of young persons or adolescents, and

Considering that, in view of the nature of employment underground in mines, international standards establishing a higher age than 15 years for admission to such employment are desirable, and adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965:

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention, the term “mine” means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

2. The provisions of this Convention concerning employment or work underground in mines apply also to employment or work underground in quarries.

Article 2

1. Persons under a specified minimum age shall not be employed or work underground in mines.

2. Each Member which ratifies this Convention shall specify the minimum age in a declaration appended to its ratification.

3. The minimum age shall in no case be less than 16 years.

Article 3

Each Member which has ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a further declaration, that it specifies a minimum age higher than that specified at the time of ratification.

1 See Second Part, p. 394.
Article 4

1. All necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties, shall be taken by the competent authority to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention.

2. Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes either to maintain an appropriate inspection service for the purpose of supervising the application of the Convention, or to satisfy itself that appropriate inspection is carried out.

3. National laws or regulations shall define the persons responsible for compliance with the provisions of this Convention.

4. (1) The employer shall keep, and make available to inspectors, records indicating, in respect of persons who are employed or work underground and who are less than two years older than the specified minimum age—

(a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible; and

(b) the date at which the person was first employed or worked underground in the undertaking.

(2) The employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, lists of the persons who are employed or worked underground and who are less than two years older than the specified minimum age; such lists shall contain the dates of birth of such persons and the dates at which they were first employed or worked underground in the undertaking.

Article 5

The determination of the minimum age to be specified in pursuance of Articles 2 and 3 of this Convention shall be made after consultation with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

(7) Text of the Proposed Recommendation concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines. Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Having adopted the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain further proposals with regard to the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Recommendation, 1965:

1. (1) For the purpose of this Recommendation, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

(2) The provisions of this Recommendation concerning employment or work underground in mines apply also to employment or work underground in quarries.

2. Where the minimum age for admission to employment or work underground in mines is less than 16 years, measures should be taken as speedily as possible to raise it to that level.

3. (1) The minimum age for admission to employment or work underground in mines should be progressively raised, with a view to attaining a minimum age of 18 years.

(2) Each Member should work towards the objective set forth in subparagraph (1) within the limits of its possibilities, taking into account especially the dangers inherent in employment underground in mines, and also the development of educational facilities, including those for the vocational preparation of future miners, the minimum school-leaving age, the minimum age for admission to other industrial occupations and other relevant factors.

4. Persons between the age specified for the purpose of the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965, and a higher age to be laid down in each country and not to be less than 18 years should be employed or work underground in mines only—

(a) for purposes of apprenticeship or other systematic vocational training provided under adequate supervision by competent persons with technical knowledge and practical experience of the work; and

(b) under conditions determined by the competent authority relating to the places of work and occupations permitted and the measures of systematic medical and safety supervision to be applied:

Provided that if a young person to whom this Paragraph applies has completed apprenticeship or other systematic vocational training, he may, under the conditions provided for in clause (b), be employed underground for purposes other than such training.

5. (1) There should be special provision concerning the minimum age for employment or work underground in mines—

(a) on certain specified jobs which are harmful to health;

(b) under certain specified conditions which are harmful to health; and

(c) on certain specified jobs which may endanger the safety of the worker and that of other persons.

(2) The competent authority in each country should determine the jobs and conditions in question and should specify a sufficiently high minimum age, which in no case should be less than 18 years, appropriate to each.

6. (1) Measures should be taken to meet the problems of persons who wish to work in mines but are too young for employment or work underground because the minimum age for admission to such employment or work is higher than the minimum school-leaving age. These measures should be related to or integrated with measures to educate, train and utilise all youth in the country.

(2) The measures to be taken in accordance with subparagraph (1) of this Paragraph might include one or more of the following:
(a) employment in surface work with appropriate training;
(b) vocational training on the surface designed to prepare the persons concerned for their future occupations;
(c) further education and vocational guidance;
(d) raising the minimum school-leaving age.

7. The competent authority in each country should consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Recommendation.

(8) Text of the Convention concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Drafting Committee.

(9) Text of the Recommendation concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Drafting Committee.

(The text submitted by the Drafting Committee was adopted by the Conference without modification. For the authentic text see Appendix XIII, page 726.)

1. The Committee on Employment of Young Miners submitted a first report to the Conference, together with a proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines and a proposed Recommendation.

2. During its eighth to tenth sittings, the Committee examined the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment under-ground in mines, contained in Report IV (2) which had been prepared by the International Labour Office in connection with the fourth item on the agenda of the Conference.

Discussion of the Proposed Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines

Form of the Instrument

3. The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section submitted an amendment aimed at giving the instrument concerning medical examination the form of a Recommendation. It was pointed out that, in view of the continual evolution in the field of industrial medicine and the steady improvement of working conditions in mines, it would be inadvisable to lay down requirements which were too rigid and that it was therefore essential to choose the more flexible form of instrument. After discussion, and in the light of the very strong views expressed by the Workers' members of the Committee, the amendment in question was withdrawn.

4. Another amendment submitted by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section proposed deleting the word "high" from that part of the sixth paragraph of the Preamble which read "... the high health risks inherent in employment underground in mines, ...". The nature of these risks justifying the adoption of an instrument had already been mentioned in the preceding paragraph, and its repetition did not appear necessary. The Preamble, as amended, was adopted.

Article 1

5. As indicated in paragraph 12 of its first report, the Committee had adopted a revised definition of the scope which made it clear that the provisions of this proposed instrument apply to underground work in quarries. This definition also determined the scope of the provisions of the Convention concerning medical examination. Article 1, as thus amended, was adopted.

Article 2

6. This Article, which concerns periodic medical examinations of young workers and extension of this medical supervision until the age of 21 years, met with two kinds of objections. In the first place, the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section submitted an amendment aimed at determining the frequency of these examinations in accordance with rules established by the competent authorities. In addition, the Government member of India offered an amendment lowering the age up to which annual examinations were required from 21 to 18 years. In the course of discussion the second amendment was subamended by the Government member of the United Kingdom so as to take into account the aim of the first amendment. According to the subamendment, the medical examinations would be annual for young workers up to the age of 18 years; between the ages of 18 and 21 years, its frequency would be fixed by the competent authority upon medical advice. A paragraph 2 was, however, subsequently added to this Article (see paragraphs 19 to 25, below).

7. The Employers' members as well as certain Government members pointed out that, in the opinion of certain industrial physicians and in view of the steady improvement of working conditions in mines, the possibility of other methods of medical supervision should be provided for. As the number of medical specialists was already inadequate to cope with the needs in certain regions, rigid requirements in this field would result in a wasteful use of qualified personnel. The Employers' members indicated that while they were not opposed to the provisions of the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946, which required annual medical re-examinations for fitness until the age of 18 years, they felt it unnecessary to extend this requirement until the age of 21 years, in view of other possible methods of medical supervision. Other members of the Committee took the view that, as there would as a rule be no reason to fear a subsequent deterioration in the state of health of young persons who had been given regular check-ups until the age of 18 years, it appeared more appropriate to allow the competent authorities, after having taken medical advice, to lay down the rules regarding the frequency of further medical examinations, in the light of the various factors requiring consideration. Certain Employers' members stated that their position regarding the proposed Convention as a whole would be influenced by the decisions taken on Article 2.

8. The Workers' members and several Government members objected to this relaxation of medical supervision and pointed out that young workers, during the period of physiological adaptation to underground work, were particularly exposed to health risks which had to be detected in time. They declared their vigorous opposition to these amendments. The second amendment, subamended as indicated above, was rejected, following a record vote, by 795 votes in favour, 950 against, with 55 abstentions. After this vote the Employers' members withdrew their amendment and Article 2 of the proposed instrument was adopted without change.

9. A full discussion of Article 3 of the proposed Convention took place as regards compulsory X-ray examinations and their frequency. An amendment submitted by the Government member of India proposed making the examining physician responsible for deciding whether an X-ray film of the lungs was necessary on the occasion of the initial medical examination. On the other hand, opinions were divided as to whether it was necessary to repeat the X-ray examination on the occasion of subsequent medical examinations. Certain members pointed to the fact that X-ray examination presented a risk of exposure to radiation, and that it consequently should be repeated only if considered necessary by the physician. It was also indicated that the risk of pneumoconiosis had become considerably lower, and that it varied from mine to mine. It was therefore more appropriate to allow the examining physician full scope to decide in each case whether an X-ray film was necessary. Other members considered that an X-ray film was essential for bringing to light the first signs of a pulmonary lesion, and that systematic examinations of this kind were therefore necessary in order to safeguard the health of young miners in an effective manner.

10. The members of the Committee were generally of the opinion that an X-ray film of the lungs was necessary on the occasion of the initial medical examination. On the other hand, opinions were divided as to whether it was necessary to repeat the X-ray examination on the occasion of subsequent medical examinations. Certain members pointed to the fact that X-ray examination presented a risk of exposure to radiation, and that it consequently should be repeated only if considered necessary by the physician. It was also indicated that the risk of pneumoconiosis had become considerably lower, and that it varied from mine to mine. It was therefore more appropriate to allow the examining physician full scope to decide in each case whether an X-ray film was necessary. Other members considered that an X-ray film was essential for bringing to light the first signs of a pulmonary lesion, and that systematic examinations of this kind were therefore necessary in order to safeguard the health of young miners in an effective manner.

11. Several subamendments to the text of the amendment submitted by the Government member of the U.S.S.R. were adopted in order to reach a compromise solution. Their aim was to maintain the requirement of a compulsory X-ray examination on the occasion of the initial medical examination, whilst allowing a certain flexibility as regards the frequency of repetition of the X-ray examinations and ensuring such repetition when employment conditions presented high health risks for young workers, or where the medical examination gave rise to a suspicion of lung disease.

12. During the course of the discussion it appeared that most of the Committee members were clearly in favour of allowing for the possibility of X-ray re-examinations, where this was considered necessary by the physician responsible for the medical supervision of young workers. On the other hand, these members wished to avoid establishing rigid rules as regards frequency and preferred to leave the examining physician free to decide in each case. It was also apparent that none of the proposals which had been put forward during the discussion was fully satisfying the various points of view which had been expressed. The spokesman for the Employers' members had expressed the view that the best course would be to return to the text contained in Report IV (2). In the light of the discussion, and with a desire for compromise and in order to ensure the greatest possible degree of agreement among members of the Committee, the Workers' members, following a vigorous pursuit of the most complete diagnostic arrangements, also finally accepted this suggestion, which was unanimously adopted by the Committee.

13. Article 3 was adopted without change.

Article 4

14. As no amendments had been submitted to paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of Article 4, these were adopted without change. Consideration was given to two amendments to paragraph 4, which dealt with the keeping of records and with their contents. One of these amendments, which had been submitted by the Government members of France and Luxembourg specified that these records should be made available to persons appointed pursuant to rules laid down by the competent authority. The other amendment, submitted by the Workers' members, aimed at making the records available to labour inspectors and workers' representatives. The Government member of Belgium pointed out that certificates for fitness for employment might very well be drawn up in different ways, and might, moreover, contain confidential medical information. As a result, these certificates could be revealed to labour inspectors, but not to any other persons. Other members of the Committee, although considering that it would be possible in the majority of cases to make known the information in question without causing prejudice to the worker, were concerned with making sure that this information should not be released without the worker's consent. The Government member of the United Kingdom proposed a subamendment which required the consent of the worker concerned before the information could be released, and the Government member of Belgium suggested that the text should clearly specify that the certificate for fitness for employment should not contain medical information. These two proposals were adopted by the Committee. The Committee also decided that the text of the clause concerning date of birth should be the same as that which had been adopted in the Convention concerning minimum age. Article 4, as thus amended, was adopted.

Article 5

15. Referring to an earlier decision, the Committee decided to modify the text of Article 5, so as to include therein the points contained in Paragraph 7 of the Recommendation concerning minimum age. Article 5, as thus amended, was adopted.

ADOPTION OF THE PROPOSED CONVENTION

16. The Committee remitted to its Drafting Committee the draft text of the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines. At its twelfth sitting on 16 June 1965, it considered the text submitted to it by the Drafting Committee.

17. The Reporter informed the Committee that the Drafting Committee had made only a few minor changes. However, he drew the Committee's attention to paragraphs 4 and 5 of Article 4. In clause (c) of paragraph 4, which concerned the certificate for fitness for employment, the Drafting Committee, pursuant to the instructions given to it by the Committee, had specified that the certificate should not contain medical data. For this reason the certificate for fitness for employment should no longer be treated as a confidential document, and it was consequently felt that the words "and with the consent of the worker concerned" contained in paragraph 5 as adopted by the Committee could be deleted.

18. The Preamble and Article 1 were adopted.

19. As regards Article 2, which dealt with the medical examination for fitness for employment, the United Kingdom Government member indicated that in certain countries medical supervision and protection of the health of young persons were organised in a particularly effective manner, and that in such cases compulsory annual medical examinations were to a large extent superfluous, as adequate medical protection was in any event guaranteed. He proposed maintaining the existing text of Article 2 as a first paragraph, and adding a new paragraph 2 permitting alternative arrangements for medical supervision of young persons aged between 18 and 21 years to be made, where the competent authority was satisfied on medical advice that such arrangements were equivalent to or more effective than those required under the existing text. The new paragraph 2 also purported to require the competent authority to consult and reach agreement with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.

20. The Government members of Algeria, Belgium and Cameroon pointed out that, where the protection of the health of young workers was concerned, it was incumbent upon the competent authorities to take the necessary measures, and they objected to the possibility of their action being made conditional upon the approval of organisations which might have conflicting interests. The Government member of Belgium considered that in rendering the previous text more flexible, a step backward was being taken in the field of industrial medicine.

21. Several Government members gave their opinion that the new paragraph 2 which had been proposed did not substantially weaken the effect of the previous text, but enabled the different countries to adopt measures of implementation, subject to appropriate guarantees, which could be adapted to the local situation.

22. The Employers' members, who had serious reservations regarding the text submitted by the Drafting Committee, signified their approval of the text of Article 2 as thus amended.

23. The Workers' members, however, feared that the addition proposed by the United Kingdom Government member might do damage to the well-established principle of an annual medical examination, and they consequently did not consider themselves to be in a position to accept the text in question.

24. In an endeavour to reach as general an agreement as possible on the text of the Convention as a whole, the Chairman undertook consultations, following which the Workers' members accepted the new proposed text, in the hope of securing unanimous agreement.

25. Article 2, as amended, was adopted.

26. Article 3 was adopted without change.

27. During the discussion of Article 4, the Workers' members supported the proposal made by the Reporter at the start of the dis-

Committee and the statements previously made regarding the continuance of medical re-examinations between the ages of 18 and 21. He contended that the text as adopted was not in accordance with sound practices of industrial medicine and proposed an alternative text. The Committee did not see fit to alter the text it had adopted, and the Government members voiced the opinion that the certificate for fitness for employment required by clause (c) did not appear to be a confidential document, and they therefore declared themselves to be in favour of the proposal made by the Reporter. In a spirit of conciliation, the Employers' members withdrew their reservations. The Government member of France wished it to be made clear that, in the absence of any specific indication on the subject in the text, the choice of the workers' representatives to whom the information would be made available would be made in accordance with national practice.

ADOPTION OF THE REPORT

30. Some members requested that certain changes be made in the text of the present report. These changes have been incorporated in the text reproduced above.

31. With reference to paragraph 2 of Article 2, the Government member of Belgium expressed the view that there was a contradiction between the text as adopted by the Committee and the statements previously made regarding the continuance of medical re-examinations between the ages of 18 and 21. He contended that the text as adopted was not in accordance with sound practices of industrial medicine and proposed an alternative text. The Committee did not see fit to alter the text it had adopted, and the Government members of Belgium and Italy made a reservation in regard to Article 2, paragraph 2.

32. The present report was adopted unanimously by the Committee for submission to the Conference.

(11) Text of the Proposed Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth session on 2 June 1965, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Noting that the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946, which is applicable to mines, provides that children and young persons under 18 years of age shall not be admitted to employment by an industrial undertaking unless they have been found fit for the work on which they are to be employed by a thorough medical examination, that the continued employment of a child or young person under 18 years of age shall be subject to the repetition of a medical examination at intervals of not more than one year, and that national laws or regulations shall make provision concerning additional re-examinations, and

Noting that the Convention further provides that in occupations which involve high health risks medical examination and re-examinations for fitness for employment shall be required until at least the age of 21 years, and that national laws or regulations shall either specify or empower an appropriate authority to specify the occupations or categories of occupations to which this requirement applies, and

Considering that, in view of the health risks inherent in employment underground in mines, international standards requiring medical examination and periodic re-examination for fitness for employment underground in mines until the age of 21 years, and specifying the nature of these examinations, are desirable, and adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965:

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

2. The provisions of this Convention concerning employment or work underground in mines apply also to employment or work underground in quarries.

Article 2

1. A thorough medical examination, and periodic re-examinations at intervals of not more than one year, for fitness for employment shall be required for the employment or work underground in mines of persons under 21 years of age.

2. Alternative arrangements for medical supervision shall however be permitted where the competent authority is satisfied on medical advice that such arrangements are equivalent to or more effective than those required under paragraph 1 for young persons aged between 18 and 21 years, and has consulted and reached agreement with the most representative organisations both of the employers and workers concerned.

Article 3

1. The medical examinations provided for in Article 2—

   (a) shall be carried out under the responsibility and supervision of a qualified physician approved by the competent authority; and

   (b) shall be certified in an appropriate manner.

2. An X-ray film of the lungs shall be required on the occasion of the initial medical examination and, when regarded as medically necessary, on the occasion of subsequent re-examinations.

3. The medical examinations required by this Convention shall not involve the young person, or his parents or guardians, in any expense.

Article 4

1. All necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties, shall be taken by the competent authority to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention.

2. Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes either to maintain an appropriate inspection service for the purpose of supervising the application of this Convention, or to satisfy itself that appropriate inspection is carried out.

3. National laws or regulations shall define the persons responsible for compliance with the provisions of this Convention.

4. The employer shall keep, and make available to inspectors, records containing, in respect of persons under 21 years of age who are employed or work underground—

   (a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible;

   (b) an indication of the nature of their occupation; and

   (c) a certificate which attests fitness for employment but does not contain medical data.

5. The employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, the information mentioned in paragraph 4.

Article 5

The competent authority in each country shall consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Convention.

(12) Text of the Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines, Submitted by the Drafting Committee.

1. The Conference has had before it the first report of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners relating to the proposed Convention and proposed Recommendation concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines and the second report of the Committee relating to the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines. The present report deals with the consideration of the proposed Recommendation concerning conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, and with certain resolutions which were submitted to the Committee.

2. The Committee held a total of 16 sittings.

Consideration of the Proposed Recommendation Concerning Conditions of Employment of Young Persons Underground in Mines

Preamble

3. The Preamble was adopted.

I. Definition

Paragraph 1.

4. The Committee had, in connection with the other instruments submitted to the Conference, added a subparagraph after the definition of a mine to make it clear that the provisions concerning employment or work underground in mines should apply to employment or work underground in quarries. The Committee agreed that a corresponding change should be made in Paragraph 1 of the Recommendation concerning conditions of employment.

II. Methods of Implementation

Paragraph 2.
5. Paragraph 2 was adopted without change.

III. Health, Safety and Welfare

Paragraphs 3 and 4.
6. Paragraphs 3 and 4 were adopted without change.

Paragraph 5.
7. The Committee adopted an amendment to subparagraph (2) submitted by the Government member of the United States which added an additional clause to the measures for the development of a practical safety programme, calling for provisions to ensure correction of hazardous environmental and physical conditions.

8. The text before the Committee indicated that the measures for the development of a practical safety programme should include appropriate means and facilities for training, inspection and accident investigation. The Government member of the Federal Republic of Germany suggested that, "investigation" should be replaced by "prevention" as this was much more important. Other members, including the Government member of Belgium, stressed the importance of accident investigation and pointed out that measures regarding prevention were included in other clauses. The Committee finally agreed that this clause should refer to both accident investigation and prevention.

9. Two amendments were submitted, one by the Workers' members designed to ensure that the supply of protective clothing and equipment would be made at the employer's expense and the other, submitted by the Government member of the U.S.S.R., to ensure that such clothing and equipment should be provided without cost to the young persons, their parents or guardians. The Employers' members agreed that the initial supply of such clothing and equipment should be free of charge but were anxious to include a clause which would afford some protection against excessive claims for replacement arising out of abuses. For that reason they could not accept a sub-amendment by the Workers' members that all replacements should be at the employer's expense. Finally, the Committee accepted a compromise to the effect that replacements after normal wear and tear would be at the employer's expense. The Employers' members wished to make it clear that their only object was to prevent abusive claims for the replacement of such equipment and carelessness in its use, and the Workers' members wished to make it clear that they well understood that the workers concerned should have a responsible attitude regarding the use of the equipment they were given. On the strength of this arrangement, an amendment submitted by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section to the effect that such protective clothing and equipment should be issued only during apprenticeship or systematic training was withdrawn.

10. The last clause of subparagraph (2) of Paragraph 5 referred to other measures for the safety of young persons. The Committee decided to add to this clause a reference to the health of young persons.

11. Paragraph 5, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 6.
12. The Government member of Poland submitted an amendment to the effect that measures should be taken with a view to keeping young persons in employment underground in good health, which aimed in particular at constantly improving the conditions of work of young persons and at the prevention and treatment of occupational diseases in an early stage of their evolution. It was pointed out, however, that the latter part of this amendment had already been covered by the amendments adopted in regard to subparagraph (2) of Paragraph 5 and that various provisions relating to conditions of work were to be discussed in connection with Section IV of the proposed Recommendation. On the strength of these explanations, the amendment was withdrawn.

13. Clause (a) of Paragraph 6 asked that measures should be taken which aimed at making available to young persons such additional food and such feeding facilities as would enable them to ensure a diet suitable for their stage of development. The Government member of Austria pointed out that it was difficult to impose either on the competent authority or on the employer the obligation to make such additional food and feeding facilities available in all cases, as it was primarily the responsibility of the parent or guardian to provide the necessary food. The Government member of Belgium also pointed out that in many countries the standards of nutrition and the customs of the miners were such that no additional food or feeding facilities were necessary. It was recognised, however, that in some other countries the employer or the competent authority had assumed certain obligations in providing foodstuffs available, more especially where the mines were situated in areas remote from towns. In reply to a question by the Government member of the United Kingdom, the representative of the Secretary-General explained that the text which had been adopted by the Committee last year after considerable discussion deliberately refrained from specifying who should be responsible for taking the measures proposed. In some cases this would devolve on the competent authority and in others on the employer, and in some cases responsibility for providing foodstuffs might be shared between them together with, in appropriate cases, other institutions, including private associations.

14. In order to meet the point raised by the Government member of Austria and by others in the course of discussion, the Committee accepted a revised draft which would make it clear that measures should be taken which aimed at ensuring that young persons would have such additional food and feeding facilities made available to them as would enable them to secure a diet suitable to their stage of development. On this basis the Government member of Austria withdrew his amendment. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Belgium, indicating that these facilities need only be provided if circumstances so required, was accepted in principle and referred to the Drafting Committee.

IV. Weekly Rest and Annual Holidays with Pay

Paragraph 7.

15. An amendment was submitted by the Workers' members proposing that the minimum period of the uninterrupted weekly rest for persons under 18 years of age employed underground should be raised from 36 to 48 hours. Their spokesman pointed out that the five-day week was increasingly current and that young persons, particularly those employed underground, needed a longer weekly rest. The Employers' members, on the other hand, pointed out that the five-day week was by no means general and that in many countries it was not yet the practice. The young workers were part of the labour force and should not be prevented from working with their teams and under their normal training supervisor during the Saturday shifts. In a number of countries young workers between 16 and 18 years were not allowed to do shift work, and if their weekly hours were further restricted, it would render the application of the Recommendation difficult.

16. The Government member of Canada proposed a subamendment suggesting that the weekly rest be extended to 48 hours unless other arrangements were made between workers' representatives and the employer. He pointed out that in his country, where the five-day week was widely applied, some collective agreements existed which provided for an exception of this nature. The amendment, as subamended, was rejected by 739 votes in favour, 845 against, with 140 abstentions.

17. An amendment moved by the Government member of Austria providing for a weekly rest period of 43 hours had been previously withdrawn.

18. The original text of Paragraph 7 was adopted without change.

19. The Japanese and Norwegian Employers' members wished their reservation on this decision to be recorded.

Paragraph 8.

20. The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section had moved an amendment to delete Paragraph 8, which aimed at progressively extending the weekly rest period with a view to attaining at least 48 hours. In view of the lack of support, and with a view to facilitating the work of the Committee, this amendment was, however, withdrawn by its sponsors. The Employers' members of Austria, the Federal Republic of Germany, Iran, Japan and Norway expressed their reservations with regard to this Paragraph, which was then adopted without change.

Paragraph 9.

21. The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section had moved an amendment to suggest that the weekly rest period should only include the day of the week established as a day of rest by the traditions or customs of the country or district as far as practicable. Their spokesman pointed out in this connection that in many countries young workers were not allowed to work at night or on shifts and that, as a result, their working time was rather restricted. Owing to the increasing mechanisation of mines, many of them operated every day of the week by rotating shifts. This was particularly the case where metalliferous mines were supplying concentration mills under a system of continuous operation. The amendment did not imply that the young workers would not get a weekly rest but simply that it would not always coincide with the traditional day of rest. The Workers' members objected strongly to this approach and considered that young workers, above all, needed to have their day of rest on the customary weekly rest day in view both of family ties and the fulfilment in some countries of religious obligations. The Workers' Vice-Chairman stressed the importance of taking these factors fully into account and of not letting social conditions be governed by economic considerations. The spokesman for the Employers' members, while emphasising the difficulties which existed in this field, freed young workers on the customary weekly rest day, nevertheless agreed to withdraw the amendment presented by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section. Paragraph 9 was then adopted without change.

Paragraph 10.

22. An amendment was submitted by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section which would provide that the principle that persons under 18 years of age employed underground in mines should not be employed on any work during the weekly rest period might be subject to the exception that apprentices or those undergoing systematic vocational training might be so employed to allow them to gain experience on work carried out only during the weekly rest period. The Government member of the United Kingdom had submitted a similar amendment for inclusion among the possible exceptions to the weekly rest. On behalf of the Employers' members it was explained that it was necessary for young workers in training to be able to take part in maintenance and repair work, which was often undertaken only during the week-ends. This might provide them with the only opportunity of seeing the machinery parts exposed and under repair. This was a necessary part of their training and there was no intention of taking undue advantage of this exception to employ them on productive work. The Government member of the United Kingdom supported these arguments but indicated that his amendment would have the advantage of finding its proper place in the subparagraph which relates to exceptions, while leaving the principle of no work during the week-end intact. The Workers' members recognised that this kind of training was necessary but considered that it could very well be undertaken after 18 years of age, and they feared that the exception might be used as a pretext for getting young persons to work during their weekly rest periods under conditions which might expose them to danger. The Government member of Algeria stressed the fact that under the proposed Recommendation concerning minimum age young workers between 16 and 18 years could be employed underground only for training purposes under conditions determined by the competent authority as regards the places of work and occupations permitted. It was therefore inappropriate to suggest that young persons should be authorised to work under conditions which might well be dangerous. The Government members of Belgium and Austria also considered that training of this type could appropriately take place after the age of 18 and that the exception was unnecessary. In view of the fact that they received little support, the amendments were withdrawn.

23. The Workers' members had submitted an amendment for the deletion of the two subparagraphs which permitted an exception to the weekly rest of young miners under 18 years of age in cases of accident or force majeure under prescribed conditions. The Workers' members recognised that in case of accident, young workers at the mine would, of course, always be willing to help but this would seldom be necessary as there would normally be sufficient adult workers available. It appeared superfluous to provide for an exception of this kind in an international Recommendation. The Employers' members agreed that in the case of force majeure common sense in dealing with the emergency must prevail and that therefore such an exception should not find its place in an instrument of this character. The Government member of Austria, however, thought that it would have been wiser to retain this provision and the United Kingdom Government member also thought that, as young workers might help in the circumstances prescribed, it would be better to provide for this contingency in the proposed Recommendation.

24. The amendment submitted by the Workers' members was adopted and Paragraph 10, as amended, was adopted.

Paragraph 11.

25. The Workers' members and the Government member of the U.S.S.R. submitted an amendment to extend the holiday with pay from 15 working days (corresponding to three working weeks) to 24 working days (corresponding to four working weeks) to 24 working days (corresponding to four working weeks). The Employers' members argued that it was only right for young persons who were working underground to be granted a longer holiday than those who were working above ground. It was also reasonable for young workers who were at a stage of physical development to have longer holidays than adult workers. For these reasons the Workers' members considered that four working weeks' holiday should be granted. The Employers' members could not accept this proposal. They pointed out that the three weeks' holiday contained in the text before the Committee was already longer than that enjoyed by adult workers in many countries, and that the international instrument should set minimum standards and not an unduly high objective which would make it impossible for many countries to accept the Recommendation.

26. The Government member of the United Kingdom moved a subamendment which would leave the proposal for 18 working days unchanged, and add a new subparagraph to the effect that the annual holiday with pay should be progressively extended with a view to attaining at least 24 working days. This proposal was accepted on behalf of the Employers' members and had the support of a number of Government members. On a vote by show of hands, the amendment submitted by the Workers' members for a four weeks' holiday period was rejected by 736 votes in favour, 755 against, with 235 abstentions, but this decision was reversed on a record vote in which the amendment was adopted by 839 votes in favour, 755 against, with 200 abstentions. The subamendment proposed by the Government member of the United Kingdom therefore lapsed.

27. With regard to subparagraph (2) of Paragraph 11, which states that public and customary holidays and interruptions of attendance at work due to sickness should not be included in the annual holiday with pay, the Government member of Australia and the Australian, Canadian, French and Norwegian Employers' members desired their reservation to be recorded.

28. Paragraph 11, as amended, was adopted. Paragraph 12.

29. Paragraph 12, which related to the keeping of records, was adopted with changes corresponding to those which the Committee had accepted in connection with the proposed instrument concerning minimum age. These changes imply that the records should be made available only to inspectors but that the employer should make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, the information concerning the date of birth, the period of physical development to which the information would relate, the number of Government members. On a vote by show of hands, the amendment submitted by the Workers' members reserved their position on the whole of Section IV of the proposed Recommendation which includes the Paragraphs dealing with weekly rest and annual holidays with pay.

Appendix VI: Young Persons (Underground Work in Mines)
Paragraph 13.

31. An amendment was submitted by the Workers' members to delete the word "basic" before "vocational training" because it was felt that the systematic vocational training the young worker should receive for employment underground should be more than just a short course of basic training. The Government members of Austria and Belgium and the Employers' members concurred in this proposed change. The Government member of Belgium, however, pointed out that clause (a) of Paragraph 13 referred to a first stage of training which must be given to all young workers who are taken on, whereas clauses (b) and (c) provided respectively for further technical training and further education. The amendment submitted by the Workers' members was adopted.

32. The Government members of Belgium and the Federal Republic of Germany had submitted an amendment partly designed to improve the drafting and partly to indicate that there should not be an obligation to provide this additional technical training but simply to make available suitable opportunities for such training. This amendment was accepted.

33. The Workers' members submitted an amendment calling for an addition to Paragraph 13 providing that young persons to be employed in mines should receive preparation for their future employment in special training centres under the supervision and direction of instructors having appropriate professional and teaching qualifications. The Employers' members thought that this imposed an expensive additional burden and might run counter to the arrangements for training already indicated in Paragraph 13 as it stood. After some discussion, the Workers' members agreed to withdraw their amendment, bearing in mind the provisions of the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962.

34. Paragraph 13, as amended, was adopted.

VI. Consultation

Paragraph 14.

35. This Paragraph, which relates to the procedures of consultation, was modified on the lines already accepted by the Committee in connection with the Recommendation concerning minimum age and the Convention concerning medical examination. It provides that consultation should take place before determining general policies of implementation and adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of the Recommendation. Paragraph 14, as amended, was adopted.

36. The Government member of Australia reserved his position in regard to this Paragraph because its provisions were in contradiction with certain practices in his country.

Consideration of Resolutions

37. The Committee had before it three resolutions. The first of them, submitted by the Government member of the United States, after pointing out that the Conventions and Recommendations concerning the employment of young persons in underground work in mines did not cover young persons employed in open-cast mines, open quarries and similar operations, invited the Governing Body to have a study made of the conditions of employment of young persons in open-cast mines, open quarries, tunnelling, clay, sand and gravel and similar operations, and to consider the inclusion of this matter on the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

38. The second resolution, also submitted by the Government member of the United States, referred to the work carried out under the auspices of the International Labour Organization regarding safety and working conditions in mines, and invited the Governing Body to have a study made of the question of safe and healthful conditions and practices relevant to all types of mines and mining operations, especially in the light of new machinery and new methods employed, and to consider the inclusion of this subject, or of specific aspects thereof, on the agenda of a future session of the Conference.

39. The third resolution, submitted by the Government member of Belgium, pointed out that the special risks of accident or occupational disease present in underground work in mines and quarries warranted the adoption of the proposed Conventions and Recommendations submitted to the Conference at the present session, and expressed the view that tunnelling was undertaken under similar conditions and involved as numerous and serious risks of accident or disease. The resolution invited the Governing Body to examine the possibility of having appropriate rules, based on the instruments before the Conference at the present session, drawn up to protect young persons employed in tunnelling.

40. The Government member of the United States considered that, because the terms of reference of the Committee extended only to underground work, it had been impossible to deal with safety and working conditions in surface work, and that it was desirable to fill this gap.

41. The Government member of Belgium drew attention to the serious risks of pneumoconioses which could arise in tunnelling work, where working conditions were often similar to those in underground mines. However, tunnelling was an activity not covered by the scope of the instruments before the present session of the Conference.

42. The Chairman first made the suggestion that, if the Committee was prepared to enter into a discussion of these matters, the three resolutions might perhaps be merged into one. This proposal was accepted by the authors of the resolutions concerned, and supported by several members of the Committee.

43. The spokesman for the Employers' members pointed out that, while he was not opposed to the Committee entering into a discussion on the substance of the three resolutions, many of the Employers' members felt that they were not competent to express an opinion with regard to branches of activity other than those covered by the terms of reference of the Committee. Tunnelling, for instance, was a matter which concerned the civil engineering industry rather than the mining industry. Similarly, the Employers' members had come prepared to discuss the conditions of employment of young workers underground in mines, but not the safety of all workers in mines. Several of them would, therefore, have to refrain from taking an active part in the consideration of the substance of the resolutions before the Committee.

44. The Workers' members gave their wholehearted support to the three resolutions. The Government members of Algeria and Cameroon and the Employers' member for Zambia also spoke in favour of them.

45. The Chairman, basing himself on an opinion of the International Labour Office, pointed out that the Committee was competent only to submit to the Conference resolutions related to the item which it was examining, but what might be regarded as being so related was largely a matter for the judgment of the Committee itself.

46. On the strength of this opinion, the Chairman expressed the view that the resolution submitted by the Government member of Belgium regarding tunnelling was rather too remotely related to the item on the agenda of the Conference relating to the employment of young persons in underground work in mines. He suggested that, perhaps, the subject the Government member of Belgium had raised might appropriately be brought up at the Building, Civil Engineering and Public Works Committee of the International Labour Organisation. The Chairman also expressed the view that the resolution concerning minimum standards for safe and healthful working conditions for all persons employed in mines also went rather beyond the preoccupations of the Committee with the employment of young persons in underground work in mines. In this connection he pointed out that the International Labour Office had already carried out very considerable work as regards health and safety in mining, tunnelling and quarrying, through the work of the Office itself, through the Coal Mines Committee, the Tripartite Technical Meeting for Mines Other than Coal Mines and Committees of Experts. This work was still being pursued.

47. The Chairman, therefore, suggested that it might be more appropriate for the two resolutions in question to be withdrawn, and their authors followed his suggestion in order to avoid further debate. It was, however, understood that attention would be drawn to these problems in the present report and the Government member of Belgium expressed the hope that the withdrawal of his resolution would not be prejudicial to the interests of the young persons employed in tunnelling.

48. The resolution concerning the employment of young persons on surface work in mines and quarries, submitted by the Government member of the United States was recognised to be more closely related to the work of the Committee in that there was necessarily some relationship between the conditions of employment of young persons on surface work and in underground work in the same type of undertaking.

49. The Employers' members, however, objected to a statement in the preamble of this resolution implying that the surface operations often involved work which was as hazardous to the safety and health of young persons as work underground in mines.

50. The Committee referred the resolution to a small working party consisting of members of each of the three groups which was entrusted with the preparation of a text which it was hoped would be acceptable to the Committee.

ADOPTION OF THE PROPOSED RECOMMENDATION

51. The Committee remitted to its Drafting Committee the drafts of the proposed Recommendation concerning the conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines. At its 15th sitting, on 18 June 1965, the Committee considered the text submitted to it by the Drafting Committee.

52. The Preamble and Paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 were adopted without discussion.

53. In Paragraph 5, subparagraph (2), the Government member of Belgium proposed that the prevention of hazardous environmental conditions be dealt with in clause (a) rather than have the prevention of accidents included in clause (b). He also proposed a change in the drafting of the French text. The Committee accepted the addition in clause (a) but considered it appropriate to retain a reference to accident prevention in clause (b). The French text was also modified.

54. Paragraph 6 was adopted without change.

55. In regard to the section dealing with weekly rest and annual holidays with pay, the Chairman informed the Committee that he had sought to reach agreement between the parties regarding two important subjects on which the voting had been very close and with the result of which a substantial part of the Committee were not in agreement. These related on the one hand to the minimum period of uninterrupted weekly rest of 36 hours, whereas the Employers' members would have preferred to keep the original proposal of 24 working days, whereas the Employers' members would have preferred to keep the original proposal of 18 working days. Unfortunately, though both the Employers' and Workers' spokesmen had been ready to re-examine the conclusions reached by the Committee, it had not been possible, in spite of the goodwill shown on both sides, to reach an agreement acceptable to all. In the circumstances the Committee would therefore be considering the text as put before it by the Drafting Committee.
56. Paragraphs 7, 8, 9 and 10 were adopted without change.

57. The Australian Employers' member raised a point to which the Reporter had drawn attention in regard to the significance of the provisions of Paragraph 11, subparagraph (2), to the effect that interruptions in attendance at work due to sickness should not be included in the annual holidays with pay. The representative of the Secretary-General explained that this subparagraph had been taken from the Holidays with Pay Convention, 1936, Article 2, paragraph 3 (article 352 of the International Labour Code). The purport of the text was that any period of absence from work due to sickness should not be deducted from the annual holiday with pay. This particular subparagraph did not deal in any way with two related issues which the Australian Employers' and Government members had raised, namely whether or not interruptions from attendance at work due to sickness affected the period of service on which entitlement to annual holidays with pay was based and the question of whether or not a period of sickness arising in the course of a holiday could lead to a corresponding extension of the holiday. These issues had in part been covered by the Holidays with Pay Recommendation, 1954. The Australian Employer's member suggested introducing a text to the effect that interruptions of attendance at work due to sickness occurring outside the period of the annual holiday should not be taken into account in respect of annual holiday with pay. The Committee further did not wish to enter into these considerations and preferred to leave the text as it originally stood.

58. Paragraphs 11, 12, 13 and 14 were adopted without amendment.

59. The proposed Recommendation as a whole was adopted by 1,150 votes in favour, 70 against, with 560 abstentions.

60. The spokesman for the Employers' members made a general reservation in respect of that part of the proposed Recommendation which dealt with weekly rest and annual holidays with pay. They considered that this text was too strict in its terms and too far-reaching and that it was of a nature likely to prejudice the scope of collective bargaining in the various countries. The Employers' members of Canada, the Federal Republic of Germany, Japan, Norway and the United Kingdom added their individual reservations in respect of this part of the proposed Recommendation.

61. The Employers' members for Austria and the Federal Republic of Germany particularly stressed their objection to Paragraph 8 which provided for the progressive extension of the weekly rest period with a view to attaining at least 48 hours. The Government and Employers' members of the United Kingdom and the Swedish Employers' member, referring to Paragraph 10, subparagraph (1), expressed their regret at the fact that no provision had been made to the principle that persons under 18 years of age employed underground in mines should not be employed on any work during the weekly rest period when such work would enable them to secure the benefit of training which could not be arranged outside the weekend. The Government member of the United Kingdom made a reservation to the effect that he thought it had been a mistake not to provide in Paragraph 10 for an exception to the weekly rest period in case of accident or force majeure.

62. With regard to Paragraph 11, subparagraph (1), which related to the length of holidays with pay, specific reservations were formulated by the United Kingdom Government and Employers' members and the Japanese Employers' member. The Australian Government and Employers' members wished their reservations to be recorded regarding the relationship arising out of Paragraph 11, subparagraph (2), between interruptions due to sickness and annual holidays with pay. The French Employers' member made a similar reservation in respect of the relationship between public holidays and annual holidays with pay.

63. The Government member of Algeria expressed his regret that, while the proposed Recommendation was of great help in ensuring the physical welfare of young workers and their protection against accidents, no provision had been included regarding their moral welfare. This was particularly important if it were borne in mind that many of these young persons came straight from their family background into the mining industry.

64. The Workers' Vice-Chairman expressed his satisfaction at the general results achieved by the Committee but regretted that the period of minimum weekly rest provided showed no progress over that which was customary 50 years ago. He also very much regretted that so many Government and Employers' members should have seen fit to make reservations with regard to specific parts of the proposed Recommendation.

ADPTION OF A RESOLUTION CONCERNING THE EMPLOYMENT OF YOUNG PERSONS ON SURFACE WORK IN MINES AND QUARRIES

65. The Committee considered the resolution submitted by the Working Party concerning the employment of young persons on surface work in mines and quarries. The text retained the terms of the resolution submitted by the Government member of the United States, with some slight changes. However, the references to work in tunnelling, clay and sand and gravel pits had been deleted.

66. The Government member of the United States, in submitting the resolution on behalf of the Working Party, said that it had taken into account the observations made during the earlier discussion of the Committee. Personally, he regretted that the substance of the resolution had been weakened.

67. The spokesman for the Workers' members pointed out that the proposed study would be of great benefit to workers in Africa, where their conditions of work had never been the subject of a thorough study. He suggested an amendment in the substantive part of the resolution, deleting the word "young" so that the study should cover all categories of workers in the different types of work mentioned in the resolution. The spokesman for the Employers' members opposed this suggestion. He said that the terms of reference of the Committee did not go beyond young workers. The Nigerian Workers' member considered that the study could be of special benefit to workers in Africa, but that it should cover workers of all ages; it should in particular examine the conditions of work in countries which were in the course of development. The Committee did not, however, wish to alter the text.

68. Before the vote was taken, the spokesman for the Employers' members stated that most of the Employers' members would, by abstaining, express their view that the Committee was not competent to express an opinion on the matters referred to in the resolution.

69. The Government member of the United Kingdom intimated that he would abstain because he did not consider himself to be in a position to give an opinion on a matter which was outside the terms of reference of the Committee.

70. The amendment proposed by the Workers' members received 622 votes in favour, 35 against, with 1,028 abstentions. In the absence of a quorum, the amendment failed of adoption.

71. The text of the resolution was then adopted without change by 1,085 votes in favour, none against, with 600 abstentions.

ADAPTATION OF THE REPORT

72. Some members requested that certain changes be made in the text of the present report. These changes have been incorporated in the text reproduced above.

73. The Government member of the United States pointed out that the proposed Convention concerning the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines and the proposed Convention concerning medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines which had been approved by the Committee dealt with matters which came partly under the jurisdiction of several states of the United States and partly under that of the federal government. For that reason the United States Government would not consider it appropriate to ratify the Conventions but would deal with them in accordance with the provisions of article 18, paragraph 7 (b), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation.

74. At the sixteenth sitting, on 18 June 1965, the Committee unanimously adopted its report for submission to the Conference.

(14) Text of the Proposed Recommendation concerning Conditions of Employment of Young Persons Underground in Mines.¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Noting the terms of existing international labour Conventions and Recommendations, applicable to mines, which contain provisions on the conditions of employment of young persons, and

Considering that additional standards are called for in certain respects, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals regarding the conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Conditions of Employment of Young Persons (Underground Work) Recommendation, 1965.

I. DEFINITION

1. (1) For the purpose of this Recommendation, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

(2) The provisions of this Recommendation concerning employment or work underground in mines apply also to employment or work underground in quarries.

II. METHODS OF IMPLEMENTATION

2. Effect may be given to this Recommendation through national laws or regulations, collective agreements, arbitration awards, or court decisions or in such other manner consistent with national practice as may be appropriate under national conditions.

III. HEALTH, SAFETY AND WELFARE

3. Training programmes for young persons employed or to be employed underground in mines should include practical and theoretical instruction in the health and safety hazards to which workers in mines are exposed, in hygiene and first aid, and in the precautions to be taken to safeguard health and safety. Such instruction should be provided by persons who are qualified in these fields.

4. The employer should be required to inform a young person, both when engaging him and when giving him a specific job underground, of the risks of accident and hazards to health involved in the work, of protective measures and equipment, of regulations regarding safety, and of first-aid methods. The directions should be repeated at appropriate intervals.

5. (1) Officials in charge of safety, safety delegates, safety and health committees and all other internal bodies concerned with safety and health, as well as the national inspection service, should give particular attention to measures designed to safeguard the life and health of young persons employed or working underground in mines.

   (2) Such measures should include provision for the development of a practical safety programme for each mine including—

      (a) action to ensure prevention and correction of hazardous environmental and physical conditions;

      (b) appropriate means and facilities for training, inspection and accident investigation and prevention;

      (c) the initial supply and replacement after normal wear and tear, at the employers’ expense, of such protective clothing and equipment as are necessary in view of the nature of the work and the conditions in which it is performed, the young persons being required to use the clothing and equipment supplied; and

      (d) any other measures for the safety and health of young persons.

6. With a view to keeping young persons employed or working underground in mines in good health and to promoting their normal physical development, measures should be taken which aim, in particular, at—

      (a) encouraging recreational activities, including sports;

      (b) ensuring that changing-rooms and showers meeting approved hygiene standards are made available, changing-rooms and showers separate from those for adults being, where possible, reserved for persons under 18 years of age; and

      (c) ensuring that, if circumstances so require, young persons have at their disposal such additional food and such feeding facilities as would enable them to secure a diet suitable to their stage of development.

IV. WEEKLY REST AND ANNUAL HOLIDAYS WITH PAY

7. Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should be entitled to an uninterrupted weekly rest which should not be less than 36 hours in the course of each period of seven days.

8. The weekly rest period should be progressively extended, with a view to attaining at least 48 hours.

9. The weekly rest period should include the day of the week established as a day of rest by the traditions or customs of the country or district.

10. Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should not be employed on any work during the weekly rest period.

11. (1) Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should receive an annual holiday with pay of not less than 24 working days (corresponding to four working weeks) for 12 months of service.

   (2) Public and customary holidays and interruptions of attendance at work due to sickness should not be included in the annual holiday with pay.

12. (1) The employer should be required to keep, and make available to inspectors, records indicating in respect of persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground—

      (a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible;

      (b) the periods of weekly rest; and

      (c) the periods of holidays with pay.

   (2) The employer should make available to the workers’ representatives, at their request, the information mentioned in subparagraph (1).

V. TRAINING

13. In line with the principles set forth in the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962, the competent authorities should take the necessary measures to ensure that young persons employed or to be employed underground in mines—

      (a) receive systematic vocational training, through apprenticeship or other forms of training appropriate in the national circumstances, in order to ensure adequate preparation for the particular type of work in which they are to be engaged;

      (b) enjoy suitable opportunities for further technical training, enabling them to develop their occupational capacities without detriment to their health and welfare, account being taken of national circumstances; and

      (c) are provided with suitable opportunities for further education and training above ground with a view to ensuring their future adaptation to technological change in the mining industry and to their develop human capacities.

VI. CONSULTATION

14. The competent authority in each country should consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Recommendation.
(15) Text of the Resolution concerning the Employment of Young Persons on Surface Work in Mines and Quarries, Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the Conventions and Recommendations concerning the employment of young persons in underground work in mines of all kinds specifically exclude coverage of young people employed in open-cast mines, open quarries and similar operations,

Considering that such operations may involve risks to the safety and health of young persons which are similar to those encountered in work underground in mines;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

(This text is given in Report V (2) prepared by the International Labour Office for the 49th Session of the Conference.)

(2) Report of the Committee on Women Workers.

1. The Committee on Women Workers, set up by the Conference at its third sitting, consisted of 125 members (60 Government members, 25 Employers' members and 40 Workers' members). At the opening of the fourth sitting of the Committee two new Employers' voting members were added to the Committee in accordance with the decision of the Appeals Board, thus raising the membership of the Committee to 127. To achieve equality of voting strength amongst the three groups, each Government member had 18 votes, each Employers' member 40 votes and each Workers' member 27 votes. The modification of the composition of the Committee led to a statement by a spokesman of the Employers' group to the effect that any subsequent statement made to the Committee on behalf of that group would be in the name of those Employers' members only who had been listed as voting members prior to the decision of the Appeals Board. The Employers' member of Bulgaria said in reply that the two new members were full members of the Committee with full rights.

2. The Committee elected the following officers:

   Chairman : Mrs. Gatti Caporaso, Government member, Italy.

   Vice-Chairmen : Mr. Anderson, Employers' member, Australia, Mrs. R. Weber, Workers' member, Austria.

   Reporter : Miss Jedidi, Government member, Tunisia.

3. The Government members of the U.S.S.R., Hungary and Poland abstained from participating in the election of the Chairman and Vice-Chairmen of the Committee. Though they had no objections to the officers elected as individuals, they considered that in the nomination of officers for the Committees of the Conference in general there had not been adequate regard to the principle of equitable geographical distribution.

4. The Committee established a Drafting Committee composed of Miss Royce, Government member, Canada (substitute : Mrs. Konradi, Government member, Hungary); Mrs. Asuni, Employers' member, Nigeria (substitute : Mr. Schmidt, Employers' member, Canada); and Mrs. Zangy-Alt, Workers' member, Switzerland (substitute : Mrs. Troisgros, Workers' member, France).

5. The Committee held ten sittings. It had before it Reports V (1) and V (2) prepared by the Office on the fifth item on the agenda, the employment of women with family responsibilities, and in particular the text of the proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities included at the end of Report V (2).

General Discussion

6. Many speakers stated that, in their view, the proposed Recommendation provided a good basis of discussion. Some, however, said that, in their opinion, the proposed text prepared after consultation of governments was somewhat weaker and less satisfactory than the text adopted by the Conference after the first discussion. The Government members of Ghana, Poland and the U.S.S.R., as well as the Employers' member of Bulgaria and some Workers' members, indicated that they would have preferred a Convention on the subject, and the Government member of Hungary said that she thought that a Convention supplemented by a Recommendation would have been desirable. While recognising that a Recommendation would carry considerable moral weight, they believed that a Convention would have been a more authoritative instrument for the defence of the rights of women workers and would have shown at the same time how far the I.L.O. was prepared to go ahead in safeguarding these rights.

7. A good many speakers, including a number of Government members and members of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section, emphasised the need to draft an instrument in terms sufficiently flexible to take account of the great diversity of national conditions, arising particularly out of... differences in culture and in the level of economic development. However, a number of speakers also pointed out that the search for flexibility should not lead to any weakening of the instrument. Other members indicated difficulties that might be raised, especially in developing countries, by too detailed a text: for one thing, it would be unrealistic to ask these countries to develop for women services that did not yet exist for men, and for another, where unemployment and underemployment were widespread, protective measures on behalf of the unemployed would have to be offset by the cost of employing women to a level at which employers would prefer to employ men and thereby to restrict employment opportunities for women.

8. The Government member of Sweden made certain reservations as to the desirability of adopting an instrument specially devoted to the employment of women, because she feared that special measures on behalf of women might prejudice their chances of equality of opportunity on the employment market. In the view of the Government members of Denmark, Norway and Sweden a good many of the problems dealt with in the proposed Recommendation were of concern to men as well as to women and it was necessary to make an effort to come to a fairer distribution of family and home responsibilities between the mother and the father. In their opinion it would be desirable, in a few years' time, to review the provisions of the instrument which the Conference was going to adopt, which might by then no longer correspond to realities. This last suggestion was supported by the spokesman of the Workers' members.

9. On the other hand, several other members considered that it was natural to take special measures to facilitate the tasks of women workers with family responsibilities whom society expected to play a triple role as workers, mothers and home-makers. Some emphasised that the employment of women outside the home met national economic needs and made it possible to raise living standards and productivity. It was only right, therefore, that measures to facilitate the tasks of women work­ers with family responsibilities represented an important step forward, the I.L.O. should also consider that it was natural to take special privilege, but as a right stemming from their social function of motherhood. The financial burden of the employment of women with family responsibilities should be borne by the community as a whole and not by individual employers, in order not to jeopardise women's employment opportunities. Though it might be true that certain of the measures listed in the proposed Recommendation were of concern to men as well as to women, it was no less true that they were of special concern to women and it was therefore natural that they should be mentioned in an instrument on the employment of women. The proposed instrument should, it was emphasised, seek to achieve a balance between the need for equality of opportunity for women in the world of work and the need to help them to fulfil more easily their specific task in social and family life.

10. As regards the content of the instru­ment, some members expressed the hope that certain basic principles could be made more precise, in particular, the right of women to work, to equal remuneration, to equal access to education and vocational training, and to maternity protection. The importance of the vocational guidance and training of girls and women was underlined by several speakers. Emphasis was also placed on the need to develop child-care services. At the same time some speakers recalled, on the one hand, the necessity to take account not only of the needs of women workers but also of those of the whole community as a whole and on the other the important role of individual and voluntary initiative in this sphere.

11. Divergent views were expressed as to the desirability of mentioning the question of the progressive reduction of daily and weekly hours of work in the proposed instrument. The Workers' members emphasised the importance they attached to this question, which they would have preferred to see dealt with in the operative part of the proposed Recommendation rather than in the Preamble. The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section, on the other hand, took the view that it might be advisable not to mention this subject in the proposed Recommendation at all, since the Conference had already adopted, in 1962, a Recommendation on this subject.

12. Several Government members deplored the absence in the proposed instrument of provisions relating to part-time employment. Even if it were true that this question was of concern to women other than women workers with family responsibilities, this was not an adequate reason not to mention the subject. Part-time employment was a fact in a great many countries. It made it possible for those concerned to maintain contact with their occupation during the period during which their family responsibilities made it difficult for them to work full time.

13. A Government member expressed the hope that the rights and privileges of women with family responsibilities could be defined more precisely, especially in Section IV, taking due account of their interests as well as of the needs to raise productivity.

14. Finally, certain Government members considered that, while the adoption of a Recommendation on the employment of women with family responsibilities represented an important step forward, the I.L.O. should also continue and intensify its activity in this field, particularly within the framework of its regional conferences, by appointing regional advisers concerned with problems of women's employment and by placing national assis­tance experts at the disposal of governments.

Discussion of the Proposed Recommendation

PREAMBLE

15. As a result of the unanimous adoption of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members, the text of the second preambular clause was modified to make it clear that women were working outside their homes in "increasing numbers". In the third preinserting the words "in particular employers' in favour, 58 against, with 40 abstentions. The Algerian Government member, and the latter related to their legal status. The French member of Cyprus, this amendment was adopted unanimously. A second amendment to this part of the text, submitted by the Government member of Austria, no longer required examination as it went less far than that of the Workers' members. A further amendment, submitted by a number of Government members was withdrawn, since its sponsors considered that the new text of the Paragraph, modified in the light of the amendment of the Workers' members, made it unnecessary.

21. A third amendment submitted by the Workers' members aimed at replacing the words "who need or choose to work outside their homes" by the words "who work outside their homes". The spokesman of the Workers' members said that the word "need" was not at all clear and that it seemed preferable to deal only with the women who are already at work. The Government member of Poland, expressing the view that it was important not to neglect the position of women who were not yet in employment, might wish to work if conditions made it possible, submitted a sub-amendment proposing to replace the words
"who work" by the words "who work or intend to work". While several members of the Committee supported this proposal and emphasised that several parts of the text concerned women who were not yet working as well as those already at work, others thought it preferable to refer only to women who worked and pointed out that what was done on their behalf automatically benefited those who intended to work later on. After a fairly lengthy exchange of views the subamendment was rejected by 692 votes in favour, 2,116 against, with 126 abstentions. The amendment of the Workers' members was then adopted by 2,362 votes in favour, 72 against, with 54 abstentions.

22. An amendment was submitted by the Government member of Iraq to make it clear that the policy to be pursued should permit women who work outside their homes to "exercise their right to" do so without discrimination. The sponsor of the amendment stated that she thought it necessary to mention explicitly women's right to work. The amendment was not opposed by the Employers' members and was supported by several Government members, while the Workers' members and one Government member, though agreeing with the spirit of the amendment, regarded specific reference to it as unnecessary, since reference to the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, was already included in the text. After an exchange of views, the Workers' members agreed to support the amendment, and it was adopted by 2,617 votes in favour, 40 against, with 81 abstentions.

23. The Government member of Libya proposed adding at the end of the Paragraph mention not only of the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, but also of other standards relating to women's employment adopted by the International Labour Conference. While a number of Government members considered this addition to be useful and the Employers' members stated that they had no objection to it, certain other Government members and the Workers' members feared that the fundamental principle of non-discrimination might be obscured by this general reference to the other standards. At the request of a Government member the representative of the Secretary-General stated that agreement to this amendment did not imply assent by governments to all the other standards to which general reference was made. In the end the Workers' members accepted the amendment, and it was adopted by 1,455 votes in favour, 171 against, with 1,128 abstentions.

24. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Ireland aimed at making it clear that it should be a goal of social and economic policy to ensure, so far as possible, that women with family responsibilities were not obliged by economic circumstances to engage in employment outside the home to the detriment of their duties and responsibilities in the home. The Government member of Belgium submitted a subamendment, accepted by the sponsor of the amendment, which specified that it should be an aim of economic, social and family policy to ensure, so far as possible, freedom of choice so that women with family responsibilities should not be obliged by economic circumstances to work outside their homes. The amendment as subamended was rejected, after discussion, by 90 votes in favour, 2,386 against, with 382 abstentions.

25. Paragraph 1, as amended, was adopted by 2,993 votes in favour, none against, with 55 abstentions.

PROPOSAL TO INSERT A NEW SECTION BEFORE EXISTING SECTION II

26. The Austrian Government member proposed inserting, before Section II of the existing text, a new Section II entitled "Employment Policy" which would recommend the competent authorities to take all measures in accordance with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, to enable women with family responsibilities to become or to remain integrated in the labour force as well as to enter the labour force. The mover of the amendment explained that these two instruments were of direct relevance to the subject of the proposed Recommendation as they dealt with the creation of employment opportunities. As they did not make any direct reference to women with family responsibilities, they would be usefully supplemented by the instrument under discussion. Moreover, they covered a wide range of measures of interest to countries in all stages of development.

27. The Government member of Cyprus thought this amendment introduced a totally new idea which could hardly be accepted without careful study and he announced that he would abstain from voting on it. An Employers' member considered that reference to the two instruments on employment policy was superfluous. Other members supported the amendment, which was adopted in the end by 1,592 votes in favour, 1,018 against, with 333 abstentions. It was left for the Drafting Committee to insert the new Paragraph in the most appropriate place in the text.

II. PUBLIC INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

Paragraph 2

28. The Committee adopted unanimously an amendment submitted by the Workers' members to the introductory part of this Paragraph, which proposed inserting the words "in particular employers' and workers' organisations" after the words "public and private organisations".

29. The Bulgarian Employers' member proposed that in clause (a) it should be made quite clear that practical measures were necessary to help women with family responsibilities not only to become effectively integrated in the labour force but to become effectively integrated in the labour force on the basis of equal rights. While one Employers' member opposed this amendment, on the ground that it introduced unnecessary repetition which was detrimental to the clarity of the text, several Government members and the Workers' members supported it. The amendment was adopted by 1,754 votes in favour, 880 against, with 126 abstentions.

30. Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted unanimously, with the reservation that the Drafting Committee should examine one point affecting the French text only.

III. CHILD-CARE SERVICES AND FACILITIES

Paragraph 3

31. The Committee adopted unanimously an amendment submitted by the Workers' members proposing the insertion in the introductory part of the text, after the words "the public and private organisations concerned" of the words "in particular employers' and workers' organisations".

32. In the same part of the text, the Government member of Cyprus proposed adding the words "and subject to national priorities" after the word "information". He pointed out that all governments, when preparing their budgets, had to take account of national priorities and that, even if the General Principle made it clear that the competent authorities should take into consideration national and local needs and possibilities, this concept should not be confused with that of "national priorities". The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section indicated its support of the amendment, but a number of Government members and the Workers' members opposed it on the ground that the proposed Recommendation already made adequate provision for the reservations mentioned concerning the application of its provisions, while the additional phrase suggested would make the text less clear and would unduly limit its scope. The Government member of Cyprus pointed out that the idea underlying his amendment was not his own but emanated from a tripartite committee in his country which had examined the proposed Recommendation; the trade unions had approved the change suggested by the amendment. However, while insisting on the essential difference between "national possibilities" and "national priori-
33. The Government member of the United Kingdom submitted an amendment whose object was to insert in clause (b) the word "needs and", before "preferences for child-care services". She pointed out that the statistical information referred to in clause (a) would give only an approximate idea of demands and that the surveys referred to in clause (b) would be necessary also to determine more exactly what the needs were. The amendment was adopted unanimously.

34. Paragraph 3, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

Paragraph 4

35. The Government member of Poland withdrew, in favour of an amendment submitted by the Workers' members, an amendment aimed at deleting the words "where necessary" in clause (b), relating to the responsibility of the competent authorities, in co-operation with those concerned, to, inter alia, "encourage and facilitate and, where necessary, themselves organise" the provision of child-care services and facilities. The amendment of the Workers' members proposed replacing the words "and, where necessary", by the word "or". The spokesman of the Workers' members explained that the intention of the amendment was to follow the same pattern of language as had been agreed to in the General Principle. A number of Government members pointed out that the use of the word "or" left it to the competent authorities to decide whether to encourage and facilitate or themselves to organise child-care services. Others, in particular the Government members of Canada and the Netherlands, preferred that this freedom of choice should be maintained, while still others, including the Government members of Algeria, Iraq and Poland, preferred that an option should not be posed and that the word "and" should be replaced by "or". The Committee finally decided, by 1,664 votes in favour, 1,198 against, with 500 abstentions, to adopt a proposal of the Government member of the U.S.S.R., submitted formally as a subamendment by the Government member of Poland, to replace the beginning of Paragraph 4 (b) by a text similar to that unanimously adopted by the Committee on Women Workers at the 48th Session of the Conference, namely "themselves organise as well as encourage and facilitate the provision of child-care services". The Government member of the United Kingdom asked that it should be noted that in her country day nurseries were provided by local authorities for young children who have special needs, including those whose mothers worked, while there were also nurseries run by undertakings and by other bodies, all supervised by the public authorities. Paragraph 4 of the proposed Recommendation, inviting governments to see to it that child-care services corresponded to individual preferences as well as needs, raised practical difficulties. There were many demands on qualified staff, building and equipment and it would be impossible to satisfy all of these at the same time. Plans for some years ahead committed the Government of the United Kingdom to expansion of mental health services, care for the elderly and maternity services. The Government, therefore, could not at present hold out the prospect of any widespread extension of existing public facilities for mothers of young children who wished to work outside the home. This did not mean that the Government in any way lacked sympathy with the objectives of the Paragraph.

36. Paragraph 4, as amended, was adopted by 1,754 votes in favour, 680 against, with 500 abstentions.

Paragraphs 5 and 6

37. Paragraphs 5 and 6 were adopted unanimously without change.

IV. ENTRY AND RE-ENTRY INTO EMPLOYMENT

Paragraph 7

38. The Government member of Cyprus stated that, having regard to the discussion which had taken place on Section III of the text, he would withdraw the amendment he had submitted, which was designed to insert in the introductory part of the Paragraph the words "and appropriate" after the word "necessary".

39. The Workers' members proposed to add at the end of the Paragraph a new clause (c), stipulating that the competent authorities, in co-operation with the organisations concerned, should take all measures that might be necessary and appropriate "to convince parents and educators of the need to give girls a sound vocational preparation". This amendment, which was supported by a good many Government members as well as by the Employers' members, was adopted unanimously, it being left to the Drafting Committee to determine the most appropriate place for its insertion in the text.

40. Paragraph 7, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

Paragraph 8

41. The Government member of Kuwait submitted an amendment to subparagraph (1) aimed at making it clear that the text would apply to women who had not yet worked, as well as to those who had been in employment. There was no objection to the substance of the amendment, and the matter of any rewording of the text that might be necessary to clarify the point was referred to the Drafting Committee.

42. The Government member of Cyprus submitted an amendment proposing deletion from subparagraph (2) of the words "they should include adequate counselling, information and placement services and provide adequate vocational training and retraining facilities appropriate to the needs of the women concerned and available without distinction as regards age". In his view, there was a con-
43. Paragraph 8 was adopted unanimously.

Paragraph 9

44. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Cyprus, proposing to delete the whole of Paragraph 9, was withdrawn by its mover in favour of an amendment submitted by the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section, which aimed at replacing subparagraph (1) by a new text and deleting subparagraph (2). The substitute text for subparagraph (1) provided that, in the case of women who could not return to their employment immediately following exhaustion of the normal period of maternity leave established by law or practice or account of their responsibilities vis-à-vis their babies, appropriate measures should be taken to the extent possible to allow them a reasonable further period of leave of absence without relinquishing their employment, all rights with regard to retaining their employment being fully safeguarded. The spokesman of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section emphasised that the movers of the amendment submitted it in the spirit of understanding and cooperation, which testified both to their admiration for the magnificent work done by women in times of peace as well as in troubled times and to their gratitude for the increasingly essential role in economic life played by women with family responsibilities. They wished to see an instrument which would be applied by governments as fully and as rapidly as national conditions allowed. In any event, the employment of women who threatened to jeopardise the imperative need of skilled labour, and it was really not justifiable for skilled women to be absent from work for long periods employers who were sceptical of its practicality to accept it more easily.

45. The spokesman of the Workers' members praised the objectivity and spirit of cooperation which had characterised the work of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section of the Committee. She emphasised that the matter dealt with by Paragraph 9 did not affect only employers and employees; it was a matter of key importance to the future generation, which would be growing up in the inhuman conditions imposed by today's mechanised societies. The strain of modern life, which also fell heavily on mothers, sometimes prevented them from taking advantage of the rights granted to them, such as breaks for nursing their children. Subparagraph (1) was especially aimed at helping them to overcome their difficulties by allowing them additional leave to continue caring personally for their babies a little longer. The proposed amendment would withdraw from women the freedom of choice as to whether they should prolong their maternity leave or not. Use of the words "who cannot" implied that someone other than the woman herself would decide whether or not she would return to work; whether this was to be done by the employer, a government authority or a doctor, it was equally unacceptable to the workers.

46. A good many Government members, including a number from African countries, as well as several Employers' members, spoke in favour of the amendment. It was pointed out that the existing text of the subparagraph left too much freedom of choice to the women and that if the latter had the right to stay away from their work for long periods employers would hesitate to engage them, and this, in turn, would restrict their opportunities for access to employment on a footing of equality with men. There were other ways of helping women who wished to come back to work after a prolonged absence—for example, by improving facilities for their vocational guidance and training. Particularly in the developing countries, where the primary objective was to ensure a stable and well-ordered economy, it was necessary to take careful note of too much time which employers. In these countries large families were common, and the absences provided for by subparagraph (1) were likely to be frequent and to make for interruptions of employment which would be very difficult for undertakings to endure, obliging the employers to have recourse to temporary replacements or to work with lower productivity. Overprotection of women threatened to jeopardise the imperative needs of development. Moreover, some developing countries were suffering from serious shortage of skilled labour and a really not justifiable for skilled women to be absent from work for long periods. In any event, the employers, who assumed by far the greatest burden of the task of providing vocational training in many countries, would be reluctant to provide training for girls in the belief that later the women would ask for prolonged maternity leave as well as for priority of re-employment. Working women did not always share the same concerns in countries where full employment existed, a priority in respect of re-engagement might not raise any special problem, but in those suffering from unemployment it might be difficult to give this priority to women who did not need to work while others were seeking employment. The amendment which had been submitted was directed precisely towards meeting the special needs of women workers arising out of their maternity function without giving ground for discrimination in employment against them. In reply to objections raised by the spokesman of the Workers' members the sponsors of the amendment made it clear that there was no question of leaving it the employers to decide whether a woman could or could not return to work after the normal period of maternity leave, but that the matter might be dealt with by doctors or psychologists.

47. Some Government members said that, though they could support the new text of subparagraph (1), they could not agree to the deletion of subparagraph (2). The sponsors of the amendment, while underlining that in their view the new text covered both subparagaphs (1) and (2) and therefore made subparagraph (2) unnecessary, stated that they would not object to voting separately on the two parts of the amendment.

48. A number of Government and Workers' members opposed the amendment. It was a matter of ensuring women not only equality in law, but equality in practice, and recognition of women's right to work implied the need to guarantee them conditions which would allow them to hold a job at the same time as assuming their family obligations and bringing up their children as well as possible. In any event, it was for the women themselves, and not for some third party, to decide whether or not they should return to employment at the end of their maternity leave. From a legal standpoint it was necessary to distinguish three aspects: paid maternity leave, generally covered by legislation and not dealt with in the proposed Recommendation; an extended period of unpaid leave, which was dealt with in subparagraph (1); and interruption of employment, which was dealt with in subparagraph (2).

The consequences for women workers, employers and governments of accepting these provisions had to be examined separately. As regards women workers, it might be thought that, pressed by economic need, they would most often opt to take up their employment again and that, even if they were forced to stay away from work for a certain period, they would not prolong this period unreasonably. Moreover, there was no reason to doubt their conscientiousness both as workers and as citizens, which would prompt them to return to work as soon as possible. As for employers, the possibility of re-engaging, after a reasonable period, women who had already worked in the undertaking had advantages rather than risks. Finally, the creation of child-care services constituted a heavy liability for governments, which would be very different in developing countries and in industrialised countries, but it was necessary at the same time to take account of the problems of women workers in the latter countries where, though they might have fewer children, they had to look after them alone, often in very difficult conditions.

49. It was also emphasised that the provisions of subparagraph (1) would not entail any heavy financial burden for the employers, who were not called upon to pay wages to the women workers concerned during their period of absence. There was no reason to believe that they would be more difficult to apply in the developing countries than in industrialised countries; indeed, the former had the advantage of being able to start off on the right foot from the beginning without having to change long-established practice. It was noted that in Austria, where women were entitled to take unpaid maternity leave for a period of up to one year, and where about 80 per cent. of the women with this right took advantage of it, the number of women in the labour force had increased steadily and the labour-force participation rate of women was one of the highest in Europe.

50. In reply to a question put by a Government member the sponsors of the amendment made it clear that the words "who cannot return to their employment" did not mean that only medical grounds were to be taken into account and that the expression "all rights with regard to retaining their employment" covered such things as pension rights and annual leave, that is the accrued rights mentioned in subparagraph (2) of the proposed text. The object of the amendment was to protect those women workers who really needed to stay with their children. While appreciating this explanation, a number of members of the Committee, including the Workers' members, expressed the view that the original text of subparagraph (1) fully ensured this protection and was clearer than the text proposed by the amendment. As regards subparagraph (2), which several Government members found drafted in too loose terms, the Workers' members noted that they had themselves submitted an amendment proposing a substitute text. In their view this new text overcame the difficulties to which it gave rise in its present form and removed any ambiguity in the matter by referring to an international instrument already adopted by the Conference. A number of Government members stated that the Workers' amendment was in fact a distinct improvement on the original text.

51. Several speakers emphasised that the text under discussion was a proposed Recommendation, not a proposed Convention, and that it was drafted in sufficiently flexible terms to permit all countries to apply its various provisions in accordance with national possibilities. It was clear that the position of working women with family responsibilities would be very different in developing countries and in industrialised countries, but it was necessary at the same time to take account of the problems of women workers in the latter countries where, though they might have fewer children, they had to look after them alone, often in very difficult conditions.

52. After a long discussion it became apparent that the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section and the Workers' members could reach agreement on the wording of the end of the subparagraph but that they had divergent views on the use of the words "who cannot" or "who do not wish to". The Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section considered that the expression "who do not wish to" left too much latitude to the women workers concerned to decide whether or not they would go back to work at the end of their normal period of maternity leave and they feared that, particularly in the developing countries, the inclusion of a provision so drafted would give rise to practical difficulties of application of the Recommendation. On the other hand, the Workers' members took the view that the decision to return to work should be left to the women workers themselves and that due account should be taken of the need and right of babies to be cared for personally by their mothers; they pointed out that the inclusion of a provision in the proposed Recommendation was already subject to national and local resources and possibilities, so that it was possible for govern-
53. The Government member of Cyprus, while appreciating the validity of the objections raised to the amendment of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section, recognised that cases could arise where the wish of women to return to work might be based on caprice rather than on reasons really linked with maternity. In his view this difficulty could be overcome if it were made clear in the text that the provisions would apply to women who did not wish to return to work "on account of family responsibilities arising out of maternity". However, since all those concerned were not able to support this proposal, he suggested that the Committee set up a tri-partite working party with the mandate of seeking a compromise solution which might be acceptable to all members of the Committee. This proposal was agreed, and the Working Party, made up of Mr. Sparsis and Mrs. Jakubowicz (Government members), Mrs. Asuni and Mr. Anderson (Employers' members) and Miss Tegelaar and Mrs. M. Weber (Workers' members), met forthwith.

54. The text proposed by the Working Party was as follows: "In the case of women who, on account of their family responsibilities arising out of maternity, do not find themselves in a position to return to their employment immediately following exhaustion of the normal period of maternity leave established by law or practice, appropriate measures should be taken to the extent possible to allow them a reasonable further period of leave of absence without relinquishing their employment, all rights resulting from their employment being fully safeguarded." The spokesman for the Workers' members indicated that, although his group was not altogether satisfied with this text, it was ready to accept it in a spirit of compromise and in the interests of social progress. The Committee adopted unanimously the text submitted by the Working Party, which replaced subparagraph 9 (1) of the Office text.

55. The Government member of Austria stated that his Government interpreted the term "normal period of maternity leave established by law or practice" as meaning the period during which employment was legally prohibited, and the term "without relinquishing their employment" as meaning "without relinquishing their employment relationship". The Government member of the Netherlands declared that she had voted in favour of the text of the Working Party because she considered it more flexible than the text proposed by the Office but that, since the Netherlands Government had not yet been able to assess its legal implications, her delegation reserved its position on this point in the plenary session of the Conference.

56. As regards subparagraph (2) the Government member of the United Kingdom explained that her Government had feared that the text as it stood would give priority of re-employment to one category of workers, which could operate unfairly against others, and had therefore proposed its deletion. However, her fears had been set at rest by the amendment submitted by the Workers' members which provided that, in case of interruption of employment following maternity, the women concerned should be considered for re-employment, in accordance with the general principles laid down in the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1963. She therefore withdrew her amendment in favour of that submitted by the Workers' members. The spokesman of the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section stated that it could also support the amendment of the Workers' members. This amendment was adopted by 2,415 votes in favour, with 192 abstentions.

57. Paragraph 9 as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 2,496 votes in favour, none against, with 236 abstentions.

Paragraph 10

58. The Government members of Belgium, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Italy, Luxembourg and the Netherlands submitted an amendment proposing the addition, in subparagraph (2), of the harmonisation of working hours and hours of schools and childcare services or facilities to the matters of particular relevance to women workers with family responsibilities to which appropriate attention should be given. The French Government member explained that these were related problems which should not be considered separately. The amendment was adopted by 1,669 votes in favour, 1,000 against, with 36 abstentions.

59. Another amendment, submitted by the French Government member, aimed at making it clear that the facilities required to simplify and lighten household tasks should be provided "at low cost". This amendment was adopted by 1,300 votes in favour, 1,072 against, with 324 abstentions.

Paragraph 11

60. The Workers' members submitted an amendment aimed at making it clear that the assistance provided by home-aid services should be furnished "to women workers with family responsibilities", because these workers were the concern of the proposed Recommendation. This amendment was adopted by 2,440 votes in favour, none against, with 238 abstentions.

Proposals for a New Paragraph on Part-Time Employment in Section V

61. The Committee had two amendments before it, submitted respectively by the Government member of the Netherlands and the Government member of Canada and concerning part-time employment. In presenting the first amendment its mover recalled that at the previous year's discussion a whole Section dealing with part-time employment had been deleted from the Office text at the wish of the Workers' members and the Bureau of the Employers' Technical Section. It was nevertheless a fact that women worked part-time and that they should be safeguarded. This type of work had a number of advantages: it permitted... employers to have a reserve of manpower and it allowed women to fulfil their dual tasks more easily, as well as to keep in touch with their occupations during the period during which their family responsibilities prevented them from working full time. In developing countries it could be useful to meet shortages of skilled personnel. It was also a means of educating public opinion gradually to acceptance of the idea of women with family responsibilities working outside their homes in cases where there was resistance to part-time work. It was thus desirable that the proposed Recommendation should at least mention part-time employment and that it should include a Paragraph which, taking account of the fact that part-time employment might be of interest to various categories of workers, including in particular women with family responsibilities, would provide that steps should be taken to ensure that the terms and conditions of part-time employment were consistent with those applicable to full-time employment.

62. The amendment submitted by the Government member of Canada provided that, taking account of the fact that women workers with family responsibilities might seek part-time employment as a means of reconciling their responsibilities at home and at work, steps should be taken to ensure that terms and conditions of part-time employment were such as to safeguard the position of both full-time and part-time workers. While recognising that the question was controversial, since employers thought that part-time employment might encourage reduction of hours of work while workers thought it might check this movement, the sponsor of the amendment nevertheless considered that with industrialisation certain kinds of work would lend themselves increasingly to this type of employment. She would have no objection to wording changes or to withdrawing her amendment in favour of that submitted by the Netherlands Government member, if the latter seemed more widely acceptable: what mattered was to include mention of the question of part-time employment in the proposed instrument.

63. Several Government members spoke in favour of including in the proposed Recommendation a Paragraph mentioning part-time employment. In addition to the reasons already put forward, they pointed out that it was above all women with family responsibilities who made use of this type of employment and the fact that they were deprived of protection as regards working conditions endangered the position of all other workers. Even though the solution of the problems of women with family responsibilities were to be found rather in the improvement of the services aimed at facilitating their dual tasks, part-time employment could be of use both in industrialised countries and in developing countries, where it was very important to utilise human resources to the full and to avoid the wastage represented by vocational training not subsequently put to use. The protection of certain categories of part-time workers, such as domestic workers, was of special importance.

64. Many Government, Employers’ and Workers’ members expressed their opposition to mention of part-time employment in the proposed Recommendation. They noted that the question concerned categories of workers other than women with family responsibilities and that it was not a question of truly international scope because it was of concern primarily to industrialised countries. In the developing countries part-time employment scarcely existed and where it did it threatened to affect adversely women’s employment opportunities. What was important was to place the emphasis on full-time employment, which was the only means to promote economic development. The existing tendency was towards a reduction of hours of work without lowering wages and it would seem illogical for the I.L.O. to recommend a type of employment arrangement which was already outmoded in a number of countries. In any event, seeking to deal with the question of part-time employment by a single brief Paragraph in a Recommendation on the employment of women with family responsibilities might create more problems than it solved. The spokesman of the Workers’ members, in particular, stated that, while her group had no major objection to the substance of the amendments which had been submitted, it considered that the question should be dealt with in a more general context and feared that examination of the question in this wider context would be prejudiced if the Committee were to adopt a provision applying only to women with family responsibilities.

65. In reply to a statement made by the spokesman of the Workers’ members, which recalled the Conference had adopted at its 48th Session a resolution inviting the International Labour Office to make a comprehensive study of the question of part-time employment, the representative of the Secretary-General pointed out that the Office had not lost sight of the question but that owing to other heavy commitments in the field of women’s employment it had not yet been possible to embark on the study. The Office was, however, systematically studying current information and developments in the field of part-time employment in the various countries.

66. The amendment of the Government member of Canada was withdrawn and the Committee voted on the amendment of the Netherlands Government member, which was rejected by 283 votes in favour, 1,815 against, with 404 abstentions.

Resolution Submitted by the Government Members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden

67. The Government members of Denmark, Finland, Norway and Sweden submitted a resolution inviting the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to review, at regular intervals to be determined by the Governing Body, the first review to be made not later than 1975, the effects of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 6 (d), of the Constitution of the I.L.O., with a view to deciding on further action within the I.L.O. to redefine the role and status of women in the world of work in realistic relation to the changing pattern of employment opportunities for all workers.

68. The Committee adopted this resolution unanimously.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Recommendation and the Resolution

69. At its last sitting the Committee adopted its report unanimously.

70. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. suggested that in the proposed Recommendation the text of Paragraph 7 included in Section IV—Entry and Re-entry into Employment—which, in her opinion, expressed a fundamental idea, should be placed either in Section I—General Principle—or as a separate Paragraph in a new Section II entitled "Employment Policy". The Government member of Austria took the view that, as a result of the changes made during the Committee's work, all of Section IV had been substantially strengthened and in consequence it would have been more logical to place it immediately after Section I.

71. As the two members did not press their proposals, which had met with some opposition, the Committee adopted unanimously the proposed Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities. The Government member of the U.S.S.R. reserved the right to intervene on the question of the order of the Paragraphs in the plenary session of the Conference.

72. The resolution was adopted unanimously.

(3) Text of the Proposed Recommendation concerning the Employment of Women with Family Responsibilities, Submitted by the Committee on Women Workers.\(^1\)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and Noting the fact that in many countries women are working outside their homes in increasing numbers as an integral and essential part of the labour force, and Noting further that many such women have special problems arising out of the need to reconcile their dual family and work responsibilities, and
Noting that many of these problems, though they have particular relevance to the opportunities for employment of women workers with family responsibilities, also confront other workers and can be substantially alleviated by measures affecting all workers, such as the progressive reduction of daily and weekly hours of work, and
Noting further that many of the special problems faced by women with family responsibilities are not problems peculiar to women workers but are problems of the family and of society as a whole, and Recognising that continuous social adaptation is required to meet these problems in a manner consistent with the best interests of all concerned, and
Aware of the need for governments and for all public and private organisations concerned to give consideration to these problems in a broad social, economic and legal context, and
Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the employment of women with family responsibilities, which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session, and
Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Employment (Women with Family Responsibilities) Recommendation, 1965.

The Conference recommends that each Member should apply the following provisions as fully and as rapidly as national conditions allow.

I. General Principle

1. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, and in accordance with national and local needs and possibilities—

(a) pursue an appropriate policy with a view to enabling women with family responsibilities who work outside their homes to exercise their right to do so, without being subject to discrimination and in accordance with the principles laid down in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, as well as in other standards relating to women adopted by the International Labour Conference, and

(b) encourage, facilitate or themselves undertake the development of services to enable women to fulfil their various responsibilities at home and at work harmoniously.

II. Public Information and Education

2. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, take appropriate steps—

---
\(^1\) See Second Part, p. 387.
Appendix VII: The Employment of Women with Family Responsibilities

(a) to encourage such consideration of the problems of women workers with family responsibilities as may be necessary to help these workers to become effectively integrated in the labour force on the basis of equal rights;

(b) to undertake or promote such research as may be necessary and feasible into the various aspects of the employment of women workers with family responsibilities with a view to presenting objective information on which sound policies and measures may be based; and

(c) to engender broader public understanding of the problems of these workers with a view to developing community policies and a climate of opinion conducive to helping them to meet their family and employment responsibilities.

III. CHILD-CARE SERVICES AND FACILITIES

3. With a view to determining the scope and character of the child-care services and facilities needed to assist women workers to meet their employment and family responsibilities, the competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, and within the scope of their resources for collecting information, take such measures as may be necessary and appropriate—

(a) to collect and publish adequate statistics on the number of mothers engaged in or seeking employment and on the number and age of their children; and

(b) to ascertain, through systematic surveys conducted more particularly in local communities, the needs and preferences for child-care arrangements organised out-side the family.

4. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, take appropriate steps to ensure that child-care services and facilities meet the needs and preferences so revealed; to this end they should, taking account of national and local circumstances and possibilities, in particular—

(a) encourage and facilitate the establishment, particularly in local communities, of plans for the systematic development of child-care services and facilities; and

(b) themselves organise as well as encourage and facilitate the provision of adequate and appropriate child-care services and facilities, at reasonable charge or free in case of need, developed along flexible lines and meeting the needs of children of different ages and of their working parents.

5. With a view to safeguarding the health and welfare of the child—

(a) child-care services and facilities of all types should comply with standards laid down and supervised by the competent authorities;

(b) such standards should prescribe in particular the equipment and hygienic requirements of the services and facilities provided and the number and qualifications of the staff; and

(c) the competent authorities should provide or help to ensure the provision of adequate training at various levels for the personnel needed to staff child-care services and facilities.

6. The competent authorities should, with the co-operation and participation of the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, help to ensure public understanding and support for efforts made to meet the special needs of working parents in respect of child-care services and facilities.

IV. ENTRY AND RE-ENTRY INTO EMPLOYMENT

7. The competent authorities should take all measures in accordance with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, to enable women with family responsibilities to become or to remain integrated in the labour force as well as to re-enter the labour force.

8. With a view to enabling women with family responsibilities to become integrated in the labour force on a footing of equality, and with a view to facilitating their entry into employment or their re-entry after a comparatively long period of absence, the competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, take all measures that may be necessary in the national circumstances—

(a) to ensure the provision for girls of general education, vocational guidance and vocational training free from any form of discrimination on the ground of sex;

(b) to encourage girls to obtain a sound vocational preparation as a basis for their future work lives; and

(c) to convince parents and educators of the need to give girls a sound vocational preparation.

9. (1) The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned and taking account of national needs and possibilities, provide or help to ensure the provision of the services that may be necessary to facilitate the entry into employment of women who have not yet worked, or the re-entry into employment of women who have been out of the employment market for a comparatively long time, owing, in particular, to family responsibilities.

(2) Such services should be organised within the framework of existing services for all workers or, in default thereof, along lines appropriate to national conditions; they should include adequate counselling, information and placement services and provide adequate vocational training and retraining facilities appropriate to the needs of the women concerned and available without distinction as regards age.

(3) The services and facilities should be kept under review in order to ensure that they are properly adapted to the special needs of these women workers and to the changing needs and tendencies of economic and technological development.

10. (1) In the case of women who, on account of their family responsibilities arising out of maternity, do not find themselves in a position to return to their employment immediately following exhaustion of the normal period of maternity leave established by law or practice, appropriate measures should be taken to the extent possible to allow them a reasonable further period of leave of absence without relinquishing their employment, all rights resulting from their employment being fully safeguarded.

(2) In case of interruption of employment following maternity, the women concerned should be considered for re-employment in accordance with the provisions applicable under the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1963, to workers whose employment has been terminated owing to a reduction of the work force.

V. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

11. (1) To the extent necessary the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, should co-operate with the competent authorities and collaborate with each other to take other measures and promote other action to assist women workers to meet their employment and family responsibilities without detriment to their opportunities for employment and promotion.

(2) In this connection attention should be given, as local needs require and possibilities permit, to matters which have particular relevance for women workers with family responsibilities, such as the organisation of public transport, the harmonisation of working hours and hours of schools and child-care services or facilities, and the provision at low cost of the facilities required to simplify and lighten household tasks.

12. Particular efforts should be made to develop home-aid services operating under public authority or supervision and providing women workers with family responsibilities, in the event of family need, with qualified assistance at reasonable charge.

(4) Text of the Resolution concerning Periodic Review of the Effects of the Recommendation concerning the Employment of Women with Family Responsibilities, Submitted by the Committee on Women Workers.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—

Sixth Item on the Agenda: Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects

(1) Report of the Committee on Agrarian Reform.¹

1. The Committee on Agrarian Reform, appointed by the Conference at its third sitting on 3 June 1965, was composed of 127 members, later increased to 128 (66 Government members, 26 Employers' members and 36 Workers' members) by the inclusion of one new titular Employers' member and in accordance with the decision of the Appeals Board.² In order to ensure equal representation for the three groups, each Government member had 78 votes, each Employers' member had 198 votes and each Workers' member had 143 votes. The modification of the composition of the Committee led to a statement by a spokesman of the Employers' group to the effect that any subsequent statement made to the Committee on behalf of that group would be in the name of those Employers' members only who had been listed as voting members prior to the decision of the Appeals Board.

2. The Committee elected its officers as follows:

   Chairman: Mr. Armendares, Government member, Argentina.

   Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Sepúlveda Latapiat, Employers' member, Chile; Mr. González Navarro, Workers' member, Venezuela.

   Reporter: Mr. Pedersen, Government member, Denmark.

3. The Committee held ten sittings.

4. The Committee had before it the report prepared by the Office on the sixth item on the agenda of the Conference: Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects (Report VI).

GENERAL DISCUSSION

5. The representative of the Secretary-General, in introducing the report prepared by the Office, indicated the complexity of the issue at hand, the broad definition of agrarian reform utilised in the report, and previous I.L.O. activity in this field. He stressed the fact that the report focused primarily upon the employment and social aspects of agrarian reform, which were primarily of concern to the I.L.O. within the co-ordinated international action programme being undertaken by the F.A.O., the United Nations and various specialised agencies. He drew the attention of the Committee to the conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group on Agrarian Reform, which was convened by the Governing Body and met in February-March 1964. Its terms of reference were to make proposals for consideration by the Governing Body regarding the manner in which the subject of agrarian reform should be examined by the International Labour Conference in 1965 and to indicate those specific aspects of the question within the competence of the I.L.O. which should be discussed. The conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group were attached as an Appendix I to the report before the Conference, and the Committee might wish to use them as a basis for its discussions.

6. The Committee agreed to take as a basis for its discussions the conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group.

7. The Workers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the Workers' members, indicated that, in view of the vital importance of the subject and the need for the I.L.O. to play its proper role, the aim of the Committee should be the adoption of an effective international instrument, in the form of a Recommendation, accompanied by a resolution to place on the agenda of the 51st Session of the Conference the subject of agrarian reform.

8. Various Government members concurred that it would be desirable to formulate an international instrument on agrarian reform. Others, while fully recognising the importance of the problem, did not consider that the subject lent itself to the adoption of a formal instrument.

9. The Employers' Vice-Chairman, speaking on behalf of the majority of the Employers' members, stressed the major responsibilities faced by land owners in the implementation of agrarian reform and in fulfilling the economic and social objectives thereof. They had to assume the responsibilities inherent in land ownership, ensuring that it performed its social function in such a way that it would contribute to the economic and social progress of the farm population and of the nation as a whole. On the other hand, those land owners who were granting adequate social protection to their workers and who were farming efficiently and thus contributing to the national economy should not be adversely affected by reform.

10. A number of Government, Employers' and Workers' members described briefly the agrarian reform programmes within their respective countries. Most speakers indicated that the results of agrarian reform had been positive but some noted that the lack of finance, of technical assistance, or of similar prerequisites prevented the full success of such programmes.

11. Various members stressed those objectives which they considered as basic to agrarian reform. Several referred to the inter-relationship between the social and economic goals in accordance with the needs and levels of development of each country and the importance of the role of the government in providing the legal basis for reform, its implementation, and the economic requisites by which the beneficiaries of such reforms might increase their incomes and productivity. The elimination of large estates, the abolition of personal services and relief of indebtedness of agricultural workers were considered by certain members among the other primary objectives of agrarian reform.

12. Several members considered that linked to the success of agrarian reform measures to increase farm income and national income, particularly in developing nations, were those problems posed by the instability of agricultural prices and marketing possibilities, especially on the world market. The removal of the disparity between prices received from agricultural exports and those paid for industrial imports was considered by many members to be crucial if incomes in agriculture were to increase substantially.

13. Other, although fully agreeing with the importance of the problems of international trade and agricultural prices, stressed the necessity of limiting the discussion to the social and employment aspects of agrarian reform, those being of particular concern to the I.L.O.; several related problems should more properly be dealt with by the other specialised agencies.

14. The representatives of the United Nations and of the F.A.O. indicated their interest in agrarian reform. The former referred to the fact that the fourth report on progress in land reform would be presented at the coming session of the Economic and Social Council. The F.A.O. representative stressed the importance of I.L.O. action, particularly in relation to the employment aspects, within the international action programme, while pointing out that the F.A.O. had primary responsibility for the question as a whole. He drew the attention of the members of the Committee to the coming World Conference on Agrarian Reform sponsored by the United Nations and the F.A.O. in association with the I.L.O., to be held July 1966 in Rome, as well as to other F.A.O. activities, especially in the fields of evaluation and administration.

15. Several members stressed the important role which the I.L.O. had to play. They referred to the very significant social and employment aspects of agrarian reform, essential if those reforms were to achieve their desired results, as well as to such specific matters as the promotion of agricultural organisations, co-operatives and similar organisations, vocational training, social security programmes, the establishment of labour standards, and other measures that could directly improve living standards of agricultural workers.

16. Specific reference was made by one member to the activities of the I.L.O. under its Rural Development Programme, being implemented as the result of a unanimous resolution of the 1960 Conference. He also felt that greater emphasis in the conclusions should be given to legislative action and supported early Conference action on the problems of tenants, share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers.

17. A Working Party was constituted with the task of preparing a text for submission to the Committee based upon Appendix I of Report VI and on major points which emerged from the general discussion. It comprised, in addition to the Reporter, 14 Government members, namely the Chairman, Mr. Benamara (Algeria), Mr. Kirev (Bulgaria), Mr. Jaramillo Pérez (Ecuador), Mr. Serrain (France), Mr. Brobbey (Ghana), Mr. Parkhondepey (Iran), Mr. Obimbo (Kenya), Mr. Kuhne (Mexico), Mr. Tabigon (Philippines), Mr. Schiappacasse (Syrian Arab Republic), Mr. Cheremushkin (U.S.S.R.), Mr. Foggon (United Kingdom) and Mr. Hill (United States); seven Employers' members, namely the Employers' Vice-Chairman, Mr. Chinai (India), Mr. Konian Kodjo (Ivory Coast), Mr. Letaief (Tunisia), Mr. Misserville (Italy), Mr. Recalde (Argentina) and Mr. Vaandragers (Netherlands); seven Workers' members, namely the Workers' Vice-Chairman, Lord Collison (United Kingdom), Mr. Goodluck (Nigeria), Mr. Krugly (U.S.S.R.), Mr. McPherson (Jamaica), Mr. Mukherjee (India) and Mr. Principe (Brazil); and Mr. Jacoby, representative of the F.A.O.

DISCUSSION IN THE WORKING PARTY

18. The Working Party had a broad discussion of the underlying principles of agrarian reform. There was general agreement that problems of agrarian reform and of rural development in general were closely interrelated and that many general measures for rural development were also essential in areas where agrarian reforms were being implemented and envisaged. But it was also emphasised that agrarian reform had more specific purposes, namely the improvement of the agrarian structure, such as the land tenure system and other basic institutional elements. The Working Party considered, therefore, that the implementation of measures for agrarian reform was a prerequisite for any thorough-going action in the field of rural development. But such reforms had to take full account of the conditions prevailing in each country: no one approach.. was of universal application. In this respect the ultimate objective was to make it possible to give land to those who work it. Certain forms of land tenure, such as share-cropping, appeared to several delegates to be out of date and incapable of meeting the needs and of bringing about the development of a modern rural and agricultural structure. Recognising, however, that these systems still exist in many countries, the Working Party suggested that an item on the improvement of conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers should be placed on the agenda of the 1967 Session of the Conference.

19. The objectives of agrarian reform as set out in paragraph 5 of the conclusions of the Advisory Group appeared to the Working Party to be sufficiently clear and not to need any substantial changes. These objectives had a double concern: on the one hand, the need to elaborate satisfactory rural structures such as to favour improved levels of production and productivity; and, on the other, to provide the agricultural worker with a satisfactory social status, security of livelihood and an acceptable standard of living comparable, as far as possible, with that of industrial workers.

20. The measures to be taken to attain the objectives of agrarian reform were, however, the subject of a wide exchange of views in the Working Party. There was general agreement that land has a social function and that consequently land not utilised or insufficiently utilised must be brought into productive use within the framework of agrarian reform measures. The question of whether or not payment should be made for land to be made available under land redistribution and land settlement programmes was widely discussed by the Working Party which finally agreed to put on an equal footing the question of whether land should be distributed to agricultural workers free of charge or at a reasonable price with due consideration given to their ability to pay.

21. Although the Working Party considered that the diversification of agriculture at the level of the farm itself was desirable in order to provide the agricultural worker with an improved diet and to enable him to be less dependent on price fluctuations, the increasing tendency to transform subsistence agriculture into market agriculture posed in an acute fashion the problem of the levels of the prices of agricultural products and particularly that of their stabilisation. The importance of this question was stressed by several members. It was also taken up indirectly by the representative of the F.A.O. who underlined the progressive deterioration in the terms of trade in agricultural countries as a result of the increasing gap between the levels of agricultural prices and of industrial prices. Although several members considered that, important though the problem was, it was not directly relevant to the problem of agrarian reform, the Working Party decided to make reference to it in the preamble and to propose to the Committee that it should devote particular attention to it in its conclusions. A separate paragraph was therefore devoted to the importance of establishing efficient marketing systems and price mechanisms.

22. The question of social security for the agricultural populations was felt to be particularly serious in those countries where national and budgetary resources were often very limited. On this specific point the Working Party had the assistance of the Chief of the Social Security Branch of the International Labour Office. The Working Party prepared a new version of the paragraph on this point in the conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group which took into account, on the one hand, the need to provide agricultural workers with benefits not inferior to those of industrial workers, and, on the other, the low incomes of agricultural workers, especially at the outset of the implementation of agrarian reform programmes.

23. The participation of occupational organisations in agriculture in the planning and implementation of agrarian reform measures was considered essential by the Working Party. The role of such organisations should be to defend the interests of their members while participating at the same time in the general objectives of development. A new text was drafted accordingly.

24. The Working Party also introduced a new paragraph relating to the observance of the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations in the carrying out of agrarian reform programmes.

25. The Working Party's attention was drawn to two important problems, each of which had been dealt with in the conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group: the training of beneficiaries and the role of co-operatives. These two subjects were dealt with in the general conclusions of the Technical Advisory Group and subsequently set out at greater length in two special sections in its conclusions.

26. The first point, that of the training of the beneficiaries of agrarian reforms and of the necessary personnel for the implementation of such reforms, was the subject of a discussion concerning firstly the manner in which the conclusions on this question might be incorporated in the text to be proposed by the Working Party to the Committee, and secondly the substance of the matter. The Working Party decided to incorporate the text of the Advisory Group in that to be submitted to the Committee as Part B of its conclusions. With regard to the question of substance, the Working Party, taking account of the fact that this question had already been discussed at the Technical Meeting convened to deal specifically with this subject which was held in Caracas in 1963, endorsed the proposals of the Advisory Group. At the same time, accepting a proposal by the Workers' members, it agreed that training activities should in the first place be concentrated on the immediate beneficiaries of reform measures, namely those who receive land.

27. With respect to the role to be played by co-operatives in agrarian reform, it was recalled that the Committee on Co-operatives was examining, at the same session of the Conference, a draft Recommendation concerning the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. The Working Party insisted on the voluntary character of the participation of the members in a co-operative, whatever its nature, but otherwise made no changes in the text under examination, which was incorporated as Part C of the Working Party's conclusions.

28. The Working Party discussed at some length the paragraph concerning employment measures in relation to agrarian reform. Several members considered that it was essential to promote by all possible means the expansion of employment in rural areas and not to encourage urban migration. A revised text was agreed upon taking account of a number of observations made.

29. The Working Party also reviewed the section relating to I.L.O. action. The suggestions contained therein were considered to represent a well-balanced programme such as to make a significant contribution to the concerted international action and to assist member countries in the difficult task of preparing and implementing agrarian reforms. With respect to future Conference action, the Working Party agreed on a text submitted by the Workers' members urging the Conference to request the Governing Body to place on the agenda of early future sessions of the International Labour Conference, as a follow-up to the present discussion, items related to agrarian reform within the competence of the I.L.O., including an item on the subject of the improvement of living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers. With only minor modifications the Working Party agreed to the rest of this section, which appeared as Part D of its conclusions.

30. The Working Party decided to leave to the full Committee the question of the form in which the Committee's conclusions should be submitted to the Conference.

31. The conclusions of the Working Party, incorporating also a number of minor modifications to the original text not mentioned in the above paragraphs, were agreed to unanimously.

Discussion of the Text Proposed by the Working Party

32. The Committee proceeded to the consideration of the conclusions prepared by the Working Party, starting with those parts referring to the role of co-operatives in agrarian reform so as to enable the conclusions of the Committee to be passed to the Committee on Co-operatives to permit the latter to take account of them in preparing its texts. The relevant paragraphs 23 and 46-62, with minor amendments, were adopted.

33. The Committee then discussed the form in which its conclusions should be presented to the Conference. The Workers' members and several Government members felt that, owing to the great importance of the matter of agrarian reform to developing countries particularly, and the need for the Conference to take strong action, the aim should be the adoption of a Recommendation. Others felt that since the item had been placed on the agenda for general discussion, the conclusions could only be presented in the form of a resolution. After an explanation by the Legal Adviser of the Office, who pointed out that, since the form in which the item had been placed on the agenda was, under the Constitution, binding on the Conference, and since the provisions of the Standing Orders relating to the consideration of proposed Conventions or Recommendations, notably full consultation of the member States, had not been complied with, it was not possible for the Conference at its present session to examine the draft of a Convention or a Recommendation, the Committee decided to present its conclusions in the form of a resolution. The Workers' members, however, reserved the right to submit an appropriate text calling on the Conference to examine the question of agrarian reform at a very early session with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation.

34. The Committee then proceeded to an examination of the rest of the text, paragraph by paragraph. In general, the Committee accepted the conclusions prepared by the Working Party; however, a number of amendments were submitted by members of the Committee, the most important of which concerned the following paragraphs:

35. On paragraph 4 the Committee accepted the amendment submitted by the majority of the Employers' group to the effect that agrarian reform should take account of the extent to which existing systems of tenure provide adequate social protection to the workers concerned and permit efficient farming.

36. An amendment submitted by the Government member of Cyprus on the necessity for a national policy of water control and conservation was accepted as an additional paragraph to be inserted following paragraph 7.

37. On paragraph 14 an amendment submitted by the Workers' member of Jamaica, giving preference to the consolidation of fragmented holdings and enlargement or grouping of very small holdings through co-operatives and in accordance with national policy, was accepted.

38. Among the amendments which were not accepted by the Committee were the following:

(a) several amendments making specific reference to the abolition of "latifundia" (large estates);

(b) an amendment to paragraph 10 which would have removed the reference to the possibility of land being distributed free of charge under agrarian reform or land settlement programmes;

(c) an amendment to replace, in paragraph 24 on indigenous and tribal populations, the words "after full consultation with their democratically elected representatives", which were introduced by the Working Party, by the words "after full consultation and agreement with the people". The Government member who had proposed the amendment stated that the view of the people themselves must always be sought and agrarian reform introduced only with their agreement;

(d) an amendment to paragraph 26 to remove the reference to insurance against marketing hazards which had been introduced by the Working Party;

(e) an amendment to delete paragraph 58.

39. A wide exchange of views took place on future Conference action with respect to the subject of agrarian reform. While there was general satisfaction that the Governing Body was giving active consideration to placing on the agenda of the Conference in 1967 an item concerning the improvement of conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers, the Workers' members and several Government members favoured early examination by the Conference of the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the I.L.O. with a view to the adoption of an instrument. After a long exchange of views, and consultations between the different groups, there was unanimity on a revised text based on an amendment submitted by the Workers' members except with respect to a phrase concerning the placing on the agenda of future Conferences of "the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the I.L.O. . . . . . " or of "questions of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the I.L.O. . . . . . ". The matter was put to a vote, and the Committee finally adopted by 6,776 votes in favour, 5,334 against, with no abstentions, the following revised version of the amendment submitted by the Workers' group and containing the expression "the question of agrarian reform . . . . . :

The Conference recommends to the Governing Body to place on the agenda of the 51st and following sessions of the International Labour Conference, as a follow-up to the item already included in the agenda of the 49th Session in 1965, the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the International Labour Organisation, after consultation with the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned, especially the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, with a view to the preparation of appropriate instruments, including an item on the subject of the improvement of the living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers.

40. The Committee unanimously adopted the report and the resolution, which is reproduced below.

(2) Text of the Resolution on Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects, Submitted by the Committee on Agrarian Reform.1

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the solemn obligation of the International Labour Organisation under its Constitution to concern itself with the problems of all workers in countries at all stages of development,

Recognising that, as regards the rural sector, the International Labour Organisation is called upon to deal with all categories of workers whether wage-paid, semi-independent or self-employed,

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the raising of incomes and living conditions in rural communities, with particular reference to countries in the process of development, adopted at the 44th (1960) Session of the Conference, which led to the establishment of the International Labour Organisation Rural Development Programme,

Recalling the various resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations, and in particular resolution No. 370 (XIII) of the Economic and Social Council of 7 September 1951 which, among other things, recommended "that governments institute appropriate land reforms in the interests of landless, small and medium farmers and that governments take measures to provide opportunity for the cultivator to acquire ownership of land" and "take legislative or administrative measures to assist in the reduction of agricultural indebtedness",

Bearing in mind that agrarian reform is an essential factor in rural development and that many aspects of the latter affect agrarian reform, such as the stabilisation of the prices of primary agricultural products and an improvement in the terms of trade of agriculture and the provision of adequate resources for the development of the rural sector,

Bearing in mind, on the one hand, that the complexity of the problems is far beyond the field of action of any one single international agency and on the other hand the nature and scope of the concerted international action programme in the field of agrarian reform and the need for International Labour Organisation activities to be undertaken within full co-ordination and collaboration with the other international agencies concerned, particularly the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations,

Having examined the report on Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects;

Adopts the following resolution setting forth, with particular reference to employment and social aspects, the nature, scope and objectives of agrarian reform, and the measures to achieve these objectives, as well as suggestions for intensifying and strengthening International Labour Organisation action.

1 See Second Part, p. 427 and Appendix XII, p. 698.
A. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

General Considerations

1. Agrarian reform should be considered as denoting comprehensive measures for the improvement of the agrarian structure, including changes in land tenure, that is, reforms that, within the framework of broad programmes, tend to give land to those who work it, improve the position of tenants, hired workers and other categories of agricultural workers, or enlarge the units of cultivation or operation and consolidate fragmented holdings. It also includes the establishment or strengthening of essential governmental or other agencies or services relating to agricultural credit, supply, marketing, training and extension and research. So conceived, the ideal agrarian reform is an integrated programme of measures designed to eliminate obstacles to economic and social development arising out of defects in the agrarian structure, and in particular may be considered as a positive means of providing for a dignified existence, ensuring security of employment, increasing productivity and real incomes, reducing cost of production and raising levels of living in the countryside.

2. Agrarian reforms are thus designed to improve agricultural production and levels of living of the rural population by correcting major defects in the agrarian structure which have been described as being "the uneconomic size of farms; the maldistribution of land ownership with concentration of large estates insufficiently utilised and the landlessness of a large part of the rural population; fragmentation of holdings; the high rents and insecurity of tenure characteristic of many tenancy systems; indebtedness and lack of adequate credit facilities for the small farmer; absence of settled title to land and water; plantation economies which offer low wages and no share in management to the cultivators;... and in general an unsatisfactory set of incentives for a rising and sustained agricultural production" (See United Nations: Land Reform: Defects in Agrarian Structure and the Limits of Economic Development (New York, 1951)).

3. Agrarian reforms are therefore essential for the evolution of an agrarian structure favouring the production of more food and fibre to feed and clothe the rapidly growing population, to provide other raw materials for industry and to permit agriculture to make its proper contribution to economic and social development while raising levels of living in the countryside. To achieve these goals agrarian reforms must lead to the removal of social injustice and economic inefficiency, the abolition of the remnants of feudalism and the exploitation of man by man and the misuse of land.

4. No one approach to agrarian reform is of universal application. The objectives of agrarian reform and the measures to be taken to achieve these objectives and the priorities to be established in this respect must take full account of the physical, economic, social, cultural and political conditions prevailing in each country and of the extent to which existing systems of tenure provide adequate social protection to the workers concerned and permit efficient farming.

Objectives of Agrarian Reform (with Particular Reference to Social and Employment Objectives)

5. It should be the object of policy in each country to effect basic adjustments in land tenure and related institutions and structures having, in so far as their social and employment aspects in particular are concerned, the objectives listed below, the priority to be attached to the various objectives depending on conditions in each country:

(a) promoting the widest possible access to land through appropriate and progressive systems of land tenure which provide security of employment and of livelihood as well as opportunities and incentives for economic and social progress to the agricultural population;

(b) correcting large inequalities in the distribution of income, in land ownership and in socio-political status;

(c) ensuring that agricultural holdings are of sufficient size to permit efficient farming, the earning of adequate incomes and the full use of labour and of managerial ability;

(d) encouraging increased agricultural production and improvement in agricultural methods and ensuring that a fair share of the benefits resulting therefrom accrues to the agricultural population;

(e) encouraging the full development of the capacities of the agricultural population and leading to the recognition that farming is a skilled profession and that there is dignity in agricultural work;

(f) ensuring adequate employment, levels of income and living conditions for all elements of the agricultural population;

(g) promoting the fuller and more effective utilisation of rural human resources, whether in agricultural or non-agricultural employment;

(h) providing an adequate institutional structure to favour agricultural and rural development in general;

(i) enabling the rural sector to make a maximum contribution to general economic and social development, while at the same time participating fully in this development, and promoting the bringing of the subsistence sector into the exchange economy.

Measures to Achieve These Objectives.

6. In adopting measures to achieve these objectives particular consideration should be given, in accordance with priorities to be established in each country in the light of its particular conditions, to those referred to in the following paragraphs and which concern primarily social and employment aspects of agrarian reform.
An equitable distribution of land ownership—and, where necessary, of rights to water—should be promoted. With respect to land, this might be achieved by such means as the setting of ceilings of individual ownership of land, the acquisition—under such financial arrangements as may be provided by the national legislation—of land in excess of such ceilings and of holdings not fulfilling a social purpose, and the introduction of fiscal policies discouraging private ownership of excessively large holdings.

Where water resources are very limited, their control and conservation should be recognised as a primary duty of the government. The basic principle for an integrated national water policy should be that governments should determine the development and use of water as fully as may be required. Water resources should not be the private property of any individual interest for free and unrestricted exploitation, but should be regarded as a national resource to be used in the national interest.

The fuller and more intensive use of land should be encouraged through such means as the development and settlement of unused public land and of new lands and the introduction of measures favouring efficient land use. The settlement of new lands should not be considered a substitute for basic agrarian reforms in areas already settled.

Land made available through such means as those listed in paragraphs 7 and 9 should be distributed to agricultural workers free of charge or at a reasonable price with due consideration given to their ability to pay. Criteria for the determination of beneficiaries should be established. The holdings to be allocated should be of sufficient size to ensure adequate levels of income and the full utilisation of the labour of the beneficiary and of his family.

To facilitate measures relating to the distribution and settlement of land, provision should be made for adequately planned land surveys and the registration of titles.

The settlement of agricultural populations on new land should be carried out in an orderly and legal manner and the necessary communications facilities and social, educational and technical services should be provided. Measures should be taken to avoid unplanned and unorganised land settlement and to improve such forms of settlement where they prevail.

In areas where shifting cultivation is common, or other resource-depleting practices prevail, agrarian reforms should include the progressive introduction of productive and soil-conserving systems of farming.

Appropriate safeguards should be introduced to ensure against undue sale or subdivision of holdings made available to individuals under agrarian reform and land settlement programmes. In any case, measures should be envisaged to safeguard against the division of holdings into uneconomic-sized units. Arrangements might be made for granting firm titles in land only after a specific period and on condition that the beneficiary fulfils certain specified obligations, including particularly the practice of good husbandry.

Where appropriate, the consolidation of fragmented holdings as well as the enlargement or grouping of very small holdings should be encouraged through the promotion of cooperatives or in accordance with national policy. The public authority should make available grants or other financial assistance to meet major capital costs involved in the process. Especially in areas where rural underemployment and unemployment prevail, local labour resources should be used to the greatest extent practicable, for adequate duration of leases, for permissible causes for tenant eviction, for the determination of equitable rents and for compensation for improvements. Machinery should be provided for the settlement of disputes and for the enforcement of the regulations. Special provisions should be made for categories of agricultural workers not covered by either tenancy or labour legislation.

Personal services and other practices restricting the liberty of the individual should be abolished.

Regulations should be introduced and effectively enforced for improving conditions of employment of wage earners in agriculture. Particular attention should be given to the establishment of systems for collective bargaining and of appropriate machinery for the fixing of minimum wages in agriculture.

Particular attention should be paid to the education and training of beneficiaries of agrarian reforms. Training should include the use of agricultural extension and, where appropriate, community development methods and be provided both before and during the implementation of reform measures in appropriate programmes. Training should cover general orientation for living in a new environment as well as improved agricultural methods and management related to production, marketing, the use of credit, etc., to prepare the beneficiaries for their role as independent farmers. Special credits should be set aside for training activities and the assignment of personnel for this purpose in the budgets of agrarian reform programmes.

Priority should also be given to the training of personnel responsible for the implementation of agrarian reform measures, especially at the local level. Particular attention should be given to the training of lower level personnel, nongovernmental organisations and practical instructors for the training of beneficiaries. Conditions of employment of agricultural instructors and other personnel in rural areas should be improved so that more and better-qualified staff may be available for assignment to agrarian reform and land settlement programmes. Handbooks and other teaching materials should be adapted to the needs of the countries concerned, and arrangements made for the exchange of such materials among countries having a common language and similar social and economic conditions.

21. High priority should be given to the establishment of efficient marketing systems and other means to ensure that the farmer may find a ready outlet for his produce and to guarantee him stable and remunerative prices on the domestic and international markets. Similarly efficient distribution systems should be established to bring agricultural products to the consumer at reasonable prices.

22. The organisation and improvement of systems of short- and long-term credit at reasonable rates for productive purposes should be encouraged. Particular attention should be given to systems of supervised credit which combine the extension of credit with technical guidance on its sound use and training and improved agricultural methods, but which should not hamper the farmer in exercising his initiative and taking his responsibilities. Appropriate measures should be taken to relieve agricultural indebtedness and to prevent abuse connected therewith.

23. The special contribution which various forms of co-operatives can make to the successful implementation of agrarian reforms and to the improvement in the levels of living of the beneficiaries should be recognised. These include, among others, suitable voluntary systems of joint land use, savings and credit co-operatives, co-operatives for production, supply, distribution, marketing, for the utilisation and maintenance of machinery, and other services. For the sound growth of co-operative activities institutional arrangements should be made for supervision, for extension services to co-operatives, for systematic training programmes for co-operative office bearers and personnel, as well as for education of members of co-operatives and diffusion of co-operative principles and working methods among the rural population.

24. Special measures should be adopted to protect the interests in land of indigenous and tribal populations in accordance with the provisions of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), and Recommendation, 1957 (No. 104), adopted by the International Labour Conference. These populations should benefit on an equal footing with other sectors of the agricultural population from agrarian reform measures, including land settlement projects. Special measures should be adopted where appropriate, after full consultation with their democratically elected representatives, to assure to indigenous and tribal groups adequate land, taking account of the future growth in their numbers as well as the requirements of soil conservation. Particular attention should be devoted to problems arising out of adjustments in communal tenures as well as to those arising out of transition from tribal to other forms of tenure in line with requirements of economic and social development. Appropriate safeguards to protect the interests of the groups concerned should be taken. Arrangements in areas inhabited by indigenous and tribal groups involving unpaid personal services should be established. In countries with significant nomadic groups consideration should be given to measures aimed at facilitating the establishment of nomads as settled cultivators or stock-keepers or in non-agricultural employment, under conditions which will provide them with opportunities for security of employment and adequate levels of income.

25. Social security measures should make no distinction between wage earners in agriculture and in industry, and it should be the aim of policy to extend adequate and appropriate social security benefits to cover all categories of agricultural workers, including independent and semi-independent workers, as a part of and co-ordinated with general programmes for increasing economic security and improving conditions of life in rural areas. Provisions with respect to benefits should take full account of the particular needs of the agricultural population. In planning the financing of such measures, due account should be taken of the special difficulties arising out of low levels of income in agriculture, and appropriate measures should be taken to prevent the benefits provided for agricultural workers from being inferior to those provided for the rest of the population. While the ultimate objective should be the introduction of a comprehensive programme of social security covering a wide variety of risks, this should not prevent the initiation of more limited measures designed to meet the most pressing needs.

26. As an additional measure of providing income security to the agricultural population, systems of crop and livestock insurance should be promoted to protect against natural and marketing hazards which may result in substantial or total loss to the cultivator of his income and his investment in capital and labour. The introduction of co-operative crop and livestock insurance should be encouraged to the fullest extent.

27. Appropriate administrative machinery should be established for the implementation and enforcement of agrarian reforms. Representatives of the various groups of the population concerned with such machinery, especially at the local level, including bona fide representatives of employers’ and workers’ organisations where they exist, should be actively associated therewith. Adequate publicity should be given to agrarian reform measures, and care should be taken to ensure that all pertinent legislative enactments, regulations and information material are issued in languages fully understood by the populations concerned.

28. Agrarian reform measures should make provision for the setting up of procedures for objective and, if appropriate, independent evaluation of progress achieved. To the extent that this is possible, the evaluation should be current and continuous so that weaknesses or defects may be identified immediately and arrangements made for the earliest possible adjustment of the measures relating to the reform.

29. As a means of providing additional opportunities for employment, particularly in developing countries where unemployment and underemployment in the rural sector are serious problems, agrarian reform should be carried out with due regard to the employment objectives of national economic policy. The diversification of agriculture should be encouraged where conditions permit, so as to make fuller use of the farmer's labour and to increase his income. Similarly, strenuous efforts should be made to expand all feasible non-farm employment opportunities in rural areas, including primary processing, viable handicrafts and small-scale industries. To the greatest extent possible, local workers should be employed, making the most effective use of scarce capital, in construction and other activities associated with agrarian reform and land settlement programmes, and designed to benefit the rural population as a whole. Similarly, local labour should also be employed on public works programmes in rural areas to build up the infrastructure. In devising such measures for expanding employment opportunities in rural areas, use should be made of community development techniques whenever appropriate. Workers should be assisted in taking advantage of any employment opportunities that might develop in other economic activities. Appropriate training programmes should be organised to give the workers concerned the necessary skills required for the different occupations mentioned above.

30. For the effective formulation and implementation of agrarian reform measures, special importance should be attached to promoting the development of agricultural associations, especially peasants' and tenants' organisations and trade unions, so as to enable them to participate in the elaboration of agrarian reform programmes as well as to give expression to and defend the interests of these various categories of agricultural workers, and to contribute to the general objectives of development.

31. The competent authority should undertake programmes for general improvement in living conditions in rural areas and the provision of various facilities and amenities, making full use of the community development approach.

32. It should be the objective of national policy to promote a proper balance between agriculture and industry in such a way that each may contribute to and benefit from development in the other. Employment policy in particular should be formulated with these considerations in mind.

33. Appropriate safeguards should be applied to ensure that the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations are observed in the process of agrarian reform programmes, in particular those concerned with conditions of employment, minimum wage-fixing machinery and vocational training in agriculture, the rights of association of agricultural workers, and freedom from forced labour.

B. ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE TRAINING OF BENEFICIARIES OF AGRARIAN REFORM AND OF PERSONNEL REQUIRED FOR THE EFFECTIVE IMPLEMENTATION OF SUCH REFORMS

General Principles

34. The implementation of any programme of agrarian reform, including land settlement projects, depends on the availability of qualified personnel during the planning, initiation and implementation stages, and adequate provision for training of such personnel should be made.

35. The competent authority should include in the budgets for agrarian reform programmes adequate provision for the payment of the staff, including extension agents, necessary for the implementation of the programme as well as for the training of future personnel, the number of whom will necessarily increase as the projects develop.

36. Budgetary provision should also be made for the training of beneficiaries of agrarian reform measures in order to enable them better to face the various problems which will confront them.

37. The training programme for beneficiaries and for technical personnel alike should take account of—

(a) the physical environment in which the agrarian reform is to be undertaken;

(b) the general policy of the government with respect to food and agriculture as it affects the type of agrarian structure and method of cultivation to be introduced, the crops and livestock to be produced and the relations between cultivators and between the latter and the State.

Persons to Be Trained

Beneficiaries of Agrarian Reform.

38. The beneficiaries of agrarian reform measures, including land settlement projects, should receive adequate training, taking due account of the background of the beneficiaries on the one hand, and of the environment to which they may need to adapt themselves on the other. The important role of an agricultural extension service should be recognised.

39. The training to be given should concentrate in the first place on improving agricultural methods so as to permit those who receive land under agrarian reform to obtain as rapidly as possible adequate returns from their holding. It should also include training in farm management such as to assist those beneficiaries in adapting themselves to passing from the status of share-cropper or hired worker to that of independent farmer. Where necessary, the training should also provide general orientation with respect to the new areas in which the beneficiaries may have to live.

40. Careful consideration should be given to the place in which the training should take place. Depending on individual circumstances, training might be given either in the area in which the beneficiaries are to be established or at appropriate centres.

41. Consideration should be given to the advantages of establishing beneficiaries in homogeneous groups so as, on the one hand, to make it easier for the group to adapt itself, and, on the other hand, to facilitate the training process.

Personnel Required for the Implementation of Agrarian Reforms.

42. The personnel to be trained include both those concerned with the planning of agrarian reform measures and those responsible for their implementation. The former, having generally already received higher education, should primarily receive—through short courses, seminars and the diffusion of reports on agrarian reform measures in other countries—general orientation on the problems arising in the implementation of agrarian reforms and the different approaches used in different countries.

43. The staff called upon to implement agrarian reform measures should be available on a permanent basis to ensure that the programmes are effectively carried out. These technicians, who will for the most part be specialists in certain fields, should be given special training so that they may adapt their knowledge to the specific requirements of the reform measure being introduced. Special attention needs to be devoted to the selection of such personnel, particularly as concerns their ability to adapt themselves rapidly to new conditions and to living under difficult conditions.

Methods of Training

44. The training of beneficiaries should be essentially practical and have reference not only to basic training in agricultural methods, but also to training them to bring their holdings rapidly under cultivation. For practical training particular consideration should be given to agricultural extension methods and to the setting-up of demonstration plots, preferably on the holding of one of the beneficiaries. The training should also cover those elements necessary for the preparation of the beneficiaries for living in newly established communities. It would be particularly desirable to give the beneficiaries general education in co-operative organisation so as to enable them to understand the use of co-operative methods and properly to run the associations they may set up.

45. In the training of technical personnel consideration should be given to the following:

(a) all available institutions for education and training in agriculture should be orientated towards training a sufficient number of personnel with the necessary qualifications at all levels. Particular attention should be given to the practical training of personnel in direct contact with the cultivators, such as extension agents. Such personnel should be available at the very early stages of implementation to assist cultivators in establishing themselves and thus help to avoid early mistakes which may jeopardise the future of the projects;

(b) as one means of obtaining rapidly the necessary training personnel, consideration should be given to providing complementary training to technicians, including extension agents, already having basic training, so that they may be assigned to agrarian reform projects;

(c) particular consideration should be given to the organisation of refresher courses for all personnel concerned with the implementation of agrarian reform measures such as to enable them to keep abreast of recent developments and new techniques or approaches.

C. ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS ON THE ROLE OF CO-OPERATIVES IN AGRARIAN REFORM

46. In view of their importance as a means of promoting general economic and social progress, of directly associating the rural population with the development process and because of their educational and cultural value, co-operatives should be considered as having a vital role to play in programmes of agrarian reform.

47. Co-operatives should be used as a means of assessing the problems and interests of the rural population for the planning and preparation of agrarian reform measures. They should also serve for channelling information among agriculturists and making the purposes, principles and methods of such reforms understood.

48. Co-operatives should be promoted to facilitate the implementation of agrarian reform measures, to contribute to the achievement of the aims and objectives of such reforms and to ensure that in the long run there is substantial improvement in the living and working conditions of the beneficiaries.

49. Particular attention should be paid to the development of appropriate forms of co-operatives adapted to given local conditions and to the various patterns and phases of agrarian reform. They should, by all means available, enable cultivators to operate holdings efficiently and productively and allow for the greatest possible initiative and participation of the membership.

50. Where appropriate, suitable voluntary forms of co-operative land use should be encouraged. Their activities may range from the organisation of certain services and farming operations in common to the complete pooling of land, labour and equipment.

51. Where appropriate, the voluntary consolidation of fragmentary holdings through co-operatives should be encouraged.

52. In cases where measures are being envisaged for the transfer of ownership or division of large estates, due consideration should be given to the organisation of co-operative systems of holding and/or cultivation. At the same time, adequate provision should be made for the supply of services and technical guidance to those who work the land.

53. The establishment of co-operatives should also be considered in connection with land settlement schemes especially as regards land reclamation and improvement measures and the organisation of joint services and farming operations for settlers.

54. Development of thrift and credit co-operatives and co-operative banks should be encouraged among the beneficiaries of agrarian reforms as well as among other small farmers for the purpose of—

(a) providing loans to cultivators for the purchase of equipment and other farm requisites;
(b) encouraging and assisting cultivators to save and accumulate capital;
(c) advancing loans to, and promoting thrift among, especially, those agricultural families, including hired workers, who normally would not have access to established sources of credit;
(d) facilitating the implementation of special governmental credit schemes through an efficient channelling of loans to beneficiaries and appropriate supervision of the use made of such loans and timely reimbursement.

55. The development of supply, marketing or multi-purpose co-operatives should be encouraged for the purpose of—

(a) the joint purchase and supply of farm requisites of good quality on favourable terms;
(b) the supply of basic domestic requirements for all categories of agricultural workers;
(c) the joint conditioning, processing and marketing of agricultural products.

56. Wherever possible, supply, credit and marketing functions should be linked so that the members may benefit to the maximum extent both in economies in the purchase of requisites and from higher proceeds from the sale of produce. This may be achieved either through setting up multi-purpose co-operatives or through membership in several specialised co-operative societies.

57. Encouragement should be given to the development of co-operatives providing farmers with other services contributing to an improvement in methods of farming and in the economic and social status of the agricultural population. Such institutions might include those relating to the joint use of farm machinery, electrification, livestock breeding, the provision of veterinary and pest-control services, facilities for irrigation, crop and livestock insurance, etc.

58. With a view to improving employment opportunities, working conditions and income, landless agricultural workers should be assisted, where appropriate, to organise themselves voluntarily into labour-contracting co-operatives.

59. Where appropriate, agricultural co-operatives in the reform zones should be encouraged to form federations to engage in such activities which their local associations could only perform at higher cost or not at all.

60. Due consideration should also be given to the encouragement and development of other types of co-operative activities providing for full- or part-time non-agricultural employment for members of beneficiaries' families (e.g. crafts, home or cottage industries), adequate distribution of consumer goods and social services which the State may not always be in a position to provide (viz. health, education, culture, recreation, transport).

61. To permit co-operatives of the various types to play their full role in agrarian reform, the competent authority should pay special attention to—

(a) the framing and application of appropriate co-operative legislation, rules and by-laws;
(b) the establishment of competent promotional agencies;
(c) the provision of adequate technical guidance;
(d) the training of promoters, co-operative office bearers and staff, as well as the systematic education of members in co-operative principles and working methods;
(e) the provision of adequate sources of credit for co-operatives.

62. The interchange and dissemination of information on co-operative structures, their setbacks and achievements related to agrarian reform should be encouraged by all possible means so that the experience acquired may be made available to the largest possible number of countries.

D. ACTION BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

63. In the spirit of the concerted international action programme and in keeping with prevailing practice and existing co-coordinating machinery, the suggested International Labour Organisation activities indicated below—in the fields of study and research, technical co-operation and standard-setting and related activities—should be undertaken in full co-ordination of work and appropriate collaboration with the other agencies concerned, especially the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations.

Studies and Research

64. In the various studies and research activities of the International Labour Organisation in such fields as those relating to rural employment, rural training, co-operatives, handicrafts and small-scale industries and indigenous and tribal populations, due attention should be given to problems concerning changes in agrarian structure.

65. To the greatest extent possible, research should include field investigations, including the use of case studies, where appropriate.
66. The widest use should be made of the work of research bodies in member countries. Where appropriate, arrangements for active collaboration with national, regional and international research bodies should be envisaged.

67. Priority should be given to practical research activities which can help governments in dealing with the many complicated problems related to agrarian reforms, particularly with respect to implementation. Studies should contain quantitative data wherever possible and appropriate. The International Labour Organisation, along with the other agencies concerned, should act as a clearing-house for information on relevant aspects of agrarian reform and related matters.

68. Particular attention should be given to the following subjects:

(a) the impact of agrarian reforms on employment, incomes, production, productivity and living conditions in rural areas; the social effects of structural and technological changes in rural areas and the implications of such changes in the rural sector on employment in the urban sector and vice versa;

(b) the nature, causes and effects of rural-urban and other migratory movements of rural workers;

(c) practical measures for promoting the fuller utilisation of human resources in rural areas;

(d) the influence of changes in agrarian structure on part-time farming, particularly with respect to implications in relation to employment and levels of living;

(e) living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers and measures to improve them; establishment of standard terms in the official languages of the International Labour Organisation in respect to these;

(f) factors encouraging or restricting vertical social mobility among the agricultural population;

(g) social, cultural and economic factors in changes in land tenure and land settlement, with particular reference to those leading to success and failure;

(h) problems arising out of adjustment in communal or tribal tenures, including the sedentarisation of nomadic and semi-nomadic groups;

(i) selected patterns of organising production in rural areas, especially in relation to the problem of uneconomic-sized holdings;

(j) various types of co-operatives and analogous organisations for production, supply, marketing and services in agriculture and in small-scale industries, including new avenues and forms of co-operative action of a promising nature; institutional changes in the organisation of marketing, processing and credit needed to ensure maximum benefits to agricultural workers from the point of view of employment, income and incentives;

(k) the role of local councils and occupational and other voluntary organisations in rural areas and ways and means of encouraging their development and their active participation in promoting rural progress;

(l) employment impact of community development programmes;

(m) methods and organisation of training programmes designed for—

(i) beneficiaries of land redistribution and land settlement programmes and of other programmes to improve conditions of agricultural workers,

(ii) personnel responsible for implementing such programmes at the local level;

(n) factors related to the acceptance of improved techniques among farmers, obstacles to the diffusion of such knowledge and how these may be overcome;

(o) methods of evaluation of the social and employment effects of agrarian reforms and related rural development measures.

Technical Co-operation

69. In collaboration where appropriate with other international organisations concerned, and especially the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and the World Food Programme, the International Labour Organisation should assist governments requesting such aid in the formulation and execution of comprehensive and integrated programmes of agrarian reform, particularly with respect to—

(a) the introduction of appropriate measures to correct defects in the agrarian structure, in order to ensure an increase and a more equitable distribution of income in agriculture, and to promote the security of employment and of livelihood and to enhance the dignity of agricultural workers of all categories;

(b) the preparation and drafting of appropriate legislation for the protection of agricultural workers of all categories and for its effective application and enforcement;

(c) the establishment of appropriate government services responsible for the improvement of conditions of life and work of agricultural workers of all categories and generally for social and economic progress in rural areas;

(d) the planning and implementation of land settlement projects which increase agricultural production and provide additional employment opportunities and means of livelihood, ensuring that spontaneous land settlement is carried out in an orderly and legal manner;

(e) the implementation of programmes for promoting the fuller and more diversified utilisation of human resources in rural areas (in agriculture, in related occupations, in handicrafts and small-scale industries, in construction work, etc.);

(f) the organisation of appropriate systems of vocational training in connection with agrarian reforms, including land settlement projects, so as to develop and improve skills in agriculture and in rural crafts and to enable improvements to be made in agricultural equipment, in housing and in rural community construction;

(g) implementing comprehensive and multi-purpose rural development and community development projects in conjunction with agrarian reform measures, including those aimed at integrating indigenous and tribal groups into the economic and social life of the nation;

(h) promoting the development of various forms of co-operative organisation in rural areas and the training of the necessary co-operative personnel at all levels;

(i) assisting in the practical introduction of price arrangements with a view to ensuring remunerative prices to the primary producer.

Standard-Setting and Related Activities

70. The Conference recommends to the Governing Body to place on the agenda of the 51st and following sessions of the International Labour Conference, as a follow-up to the item already included in the agenda of the 49th Session in 1965, the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the International Labour Organisation, after consultation with the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned, especially the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, with a view to the preparation of appropriate instruments, including an item on the subject of the improvement of the living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers.

71. The Conference further requests the Governing Body to give consideration to action by the International Labour Conference on appropriate aspects of the role of co-operatives in agrarian reform and the training of beneficiaries of agrarian reforms and of the personnel required for the effective implementation of such reforms.

72. The Conference further requests the Governing Body to continue to take every opportunity of bringing before the International Labour Conference, regional conferences, and technical and other meetings organised by the International Labour Organisation, the importance of measures being taken to improve agrarian structures and other structures which affect rural development and to introduce related institutional adjustments such as to promote social justice.

73. Consideration should also be given, whenever appropriate, to the review and possible revision of international standards concerning all categories of rural workers with a view to improving the effectiveness of such standards in promoting the economic and social well-being of these workers.
Seventh Item on the Agenda: The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries

(1) Text of the Proposed Conclusions, Prepared by the International Labour Office.

(This text is given in Report VII (2) prepared by the International Labour Office for the 49th Session of the Conference.)

(2) Report of the Committee on Co-operatives.¹

1. The Committee on Co-operatives, set up by the Conference at its third sitting on 3 June 1965, consisted of 153 members (72 Government members, 33 Employers' members and 48 Workers' members). In order to ensure equality of voting strength, it was necessary to multiply each Government member's vote by 22, each Employers' member's vote by 48 and each Workers' member's vote by 33.

2. At the fourth sitting of the Committee on 8 June, two new Employers' voting members were added to the Committee in accordance with a decision of the Appeals Board², thus raising the total membership of the Committee to 155. To achieve equality of voting it accordingly became necessary to multiply each Government member's vote by 70, each Employers' member's vote by 144 and each Workers' member's vote by 105. The modification of the composition led to a statement by a spokesman of the Employers' members to the effect that any subsequent statement made to the Committee on behalf of that group would be in the name of those Employers' members only who had been listed as voting members prior to the decision of the Appeals Board. One of the two new Employers' members said that he was a fully accredited member of the Committee and could state his own opinions.

3. The Committee appointed its Officers as follows:

Chairman: Mr. Wahid, Government member, Lebanon.

Vice-Chairmen: Mr. Rifaat, Employers' member, United Arab Republic; Mr. Kane, Workers' member, Mauritania.

Reporter: Mr. Mathsson, Government member, Sweden.

4. The Committee appointed a Drafting Committee composed of the Reporter the Employers' Vice-President, Mr. Halie (Employers' member, Central African Republic), Mr. Mario (Workers' member, France) and Mr. Kelly (Workers' member, Jamaica).

5. The Committee held 13 sittings.

6. The Committee had before it Reports VII (1) and VII (2) on the seventh item of the agenda of the Conference: the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. The Committee took the conclusions proposed in Chapter II of Report VII (2) mentioned above as the basis for its discussion.

General Discussion

7. The Committee unanimously welcomed the inclusion of this item on the agenda of the Conference—the first time in the I.L.O.'s history that co-operatives were being discussed at a session of the Conference of the Organisation. The Committee recognised that the subject had a long and well-established tradition in the I.L.O. and was one deeply rooted in the social objectives for which the Organisation had originally been founded. Most members complimented the Office on the high standard of the reports and stated that discussion of this question was very timely. Co-operatives were now of particular interest to many of the new member States on account of their important economic and social significance for developing countries. Many members felt that because of its tripartite structure the I.L.O. was particularly suited for playing an important role in promoting action for co-operative development as a means of improving levels of living and stimulating economic growth in these countries.

8. A number of members from developing countries drew attention to the fact that co-operatives were neither new to them nor foreign to their traditions and concepts of society. On the contrary, co-operatives had a long tradition in many developing countries and bore marked affinities to closely-knit tribal and community structures that had prevailed since an early date. There were therefore no major sociological obstacles to the further growth of co-operatives in such countries. The new problems were those that related to techniques of production and business operations and the application of scientific methods to such practices. Their proper organisation was an essential element to the success of a co-operative.

² See Appendix X, p. 690.
At the same time there were in some instances psychological barriers of an individual and collective nature that had to be surmounted when new concepts took the place of traditional values. Co-operatives were specially important since they gave their members an increased sense of independence as well as an increased awareness of their personal role in the community. In this and other ways co-operatives were to be welcomed as a means of helping the transition of traditional societies to modernised methods of work and higher levels of production and consumption without disrupting the fabric of society.

The Workers' members felt that more could have been said in the report concerning the assistance that trade unions could give to co-operatives and vice-versa.

Several members from industrialised countries recognised the important role that co-operatives had played and were still playing in their own countries in improving levels of living and raising educational and cultural standards, particularly in remaining undeveloped areas. Co-operatives in these areas had helped to achieve a better use of human resources. A number of members had therefore initiated practical programmes of technical assistance and pledged their readiness to help the growth of the co-operative movement in developing countries. Some of these programmes had already been under way for some time, while others were being expanded to meet increased demands. Members from developing countries acknowledged in turn the importance of such assistance, which was being received under bilateral or international arrangements. In certain instances there was a need for increased assistance, particularly for long-term and multi-purpose projects which could have a substantial impact on co-operative development schemes.

The Employers' members wished to dispel any misunderstanding that might exist regarding their attitude towards co-operatives. They were convinced of the important role that co-operatives could play in the economic and social development of developing countries, since they covered a range of activities and were of practical use to a large section of the world's population. They attached great importance to certain criteria which they considered were fundamental to co-operatives. These were the voluntary nature of the association, the principle of democratic control and the independence of the co-operative. The activities of co-operatives should be co-ordinated with other sectors of the economy to maintain a balance in the economic and social structure. At the same time their efficiency and methods of operation had to be modernised, and the Employers' members were ready to assist developing countries secure managerial help where this was needed.

A number of speakers gave accounts of the role of the co-operative movement in their countries and the growth and diversification of its activities in various fields. On the basis of this experience they drew attention to some of the problems that called for solution—one of the most urgent in developing countries being the lack of adequate facilities for the training and education of co-operative members, office-bearers, officials of co-operative departments, technicians, managers and leaders.

Additionally, in the particular economic and social conditions prevailing in developing countries, a number of members felt that there were special areas where co-operatives could be of invaluable help in improving conditions of living of the population as a whole. One of these areas was the implementation of plans for agrarian reform, where co-operatives had contributed significantly to increasing agricultural production by changing techniques and raising living standards in rural areas. Other fields where experience had shown that co-operatives had a vital role to play were those of credit, small industry, agricultural processing, marketing of agricultural produce, housing, fishing and distribution.

While the economic value of co-operatives was perhaps pre-eminent, many members, and particularly those from developing countries, stressed their social and educational significance. As a social institution co-operatives were concerned with developing other facets of the human personality apart from the purely economic. Co-operatives were also a school of democracy and, while encouraging participation from broad segments of the population, also inculcated a sense of responsibility among their members. They provided an important training ground for future managers of enterprises as well as leaders of society and the rural community.

Members representing all three groups in the Committee underlined the importance of maintaining the true character of the co-operative institution as a first condition of success. This character was marked by the voluntary nature of the association, the democratic and equitable manner in which its operations were managed, and respect for its independence. In the conditions prevailing in developing countries government promotion, assistance and supervision were essential for co-operatives, but these should be of a temporary nature; as soon as co-operatives were able to stand on their own feet they should be allowed to do so. The Committee felt that, while a definition of a co-operative was difficult in view of the variety of forms that the institution had taken since its early days, it was nevertheless important to incorporate these essential characteristics of a co-operative in an appropriate part of the instrument.

The Committee heard a statement from the Director of the International Co-operative Alliance on behalf of his organisation and of the International Federation of Agricultural Producers. Both organisations were in complete agreement regarding the nature of the contribution that co-operation could make and should be encouraged to make towards quickening economic growth and social betterment in developing countries. While government action was essential for economic development, positive collaboration from the people themselves was equally important and this was a gap that co-operatives helped to fill. The value of co-operatives lay in their capacity to change... negative habits and attitudes of mind and to develop human potentialities to the full. The two organisations on behalf of whom he spoke represented most of the national co-operative organisations of economically advanced countries, and they were anxious that the experience they had gained should be made available to co-operatives in developing countries.

18. A statement was also made to the Committee on behalf of the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations. The F.A.O. representative referred to his Organisation's activities, particularly in the field of agricultural co-operatives. He drew attention to the need for government assistance in co-operative development in certain countries, especially as regards finance. As regards the possibilities of setting up an international co-operative bank, he felt that this was premature since there were few co-operative movements that had surplus funds to invest outside their national frontiers. He also underlined the arrangements that existed with the I.L.O. for the co-ordination of activities in regard to co-operatives and the good working relationships that existed at the secretariat level.

Examination of the Proposed Conclusion in Report VII (2)

I. FORM OF THE INSTRUMENT

Point 1

19. In view of the universal nature of the co-operative movement and the fact that everyone was agreed on the important role that co-operatives could play in the economic and social development of developing countries, the Workers' members proposed that the instrument should take the form of a Convention. This would be far more effective than a Recommendation, since governments in developing countries were agreed on the value of promoting co-operatives and there was hence no reason why this fact should not be given wide recognition and made obligatory on them through the binding nature of such an instrument. In order to make the adoption of such a Convention easy the Workers' members proposed that it should enunciate the general principles and objectives concerning co-operatives which were outlined in the Proposed Conclusions (Report VII (2)) and on which wide agreement had been expressed. To this end they submitted an amendment to Point 1 in the form of a draft Convention concerning co-operatives. Other Government members, however, felt that such a description was superfluous since there was no need to stress what was well known to be a basic feature of co-operatives. Other Government members agreed with this view and suggested that academic discussion of this kind was best avoided. It was more important to elaborate on the general directives to be embodied in the Recommendation.

Point 2

20. A few Government members from developing countries tended to share this view, but the majority were opposed to it on the grounds that a Convention would, by its very nature, be rigid and defeat the primary purpose of giving assistance to co-operatives. Co-operatives were a voluntary form of association and their independence had to be recognised. This feature of co-operatives would tend to disappear if they became solely the creatures of government promotion. Moreover, co-operatives had attained such a diversity of form and reached such different levels of development in different countries, while economic and social conditions tended to vary so widely, that a Convention could not legislate for all of them. The readiness of governments to help co-operatives was evidenced by their actions and this rendered a Convention superfluous. It was much more important to have a flexible instrument to suit changing conditions and which could be of real help to co-operatives. This could only take the form of a Recommendation.

21. This view was wholly endorsed by the Employers' members, who could not agree that it should become an obligation on governments to promote one particular form of enterprise. To do so would be to subject co-operatives to government control and make them completely dependent on governments for aid and assistance. At the same time, a convention which contained only general principles was ineffective and of little value.

22. The Government members insisted on putting the amendment to a vote. It was rejected by 5,530 votes in favour, 7,630 against, with 140 abstentions. Point 1 of the Proposed Conclusions was accordingly adopted.

23. The Workers' members proposed that the proposed Recommendation be supplemented by a resolution which they would put forward later, requesting the Governing Body to include on the agenda of a future Conference the question of adopting a Convention on co-operatives.

II. SCOPE

Point 2

24. Arguing that it was essential to stress the voluntary nature of co-operative organisations the Employers' members proposed that the term "voluntarily formed" be inserted in this Point. This view was supported by certain Government members. The Workers' members, however, felt that such a description was superfluous since there was no need to stress what was well known to be a basic feature of co-operatives. Other Government members agreed with this view and suggested that academic discussion of this kind was best avoided. It was more important to elaborate on the general directives to be embodied in the Recommendation.

25. There was general agreement on the intrinsically voluntary and independent nature of co-operatives and, subject to introducing this concept in a more appropriate part of the Proposed Conclusions, the amendment was withdrawn.

26. The Government member of Japan proposed the addition of another specific form of co-operative organisation to those listed in this Point, since it was important in his country. The Government member of Australia, while questioning the need to list specific forms of co-operatives, thought that, if they were so listed, recreational co-operatives should also be included. Views were, however, expressed against this since it was made clear in the text that the list was by no means meant to be exhaustive, but was rather illustrative of the main kinds of co-operatives of particular interest to developing countries.

27. Subject to a final decision to be taken by the Drafting Committee on whether the words "such as" might be substituted in particular " in the English text (the French text was unaffected), Point 2 was adopted.

III. OBJECTIVES OF POLICY CONCERNING CO-OPERATIVES

Point 3

28. Certain amendments proposed to this Point arose, it appeared, out of a difference of meaning in the English and French texts. Since the original text of the Proposed Conclusions was in French, the Committee agreed to refer such points for settlement by the Drafting Committee.

29. An amendment proposed by the Employers' members wished to make it explicit that co-operatives should be considered only as one of the important instruments of economic and social development. The view was expressed that this was the meaning of the text as it stood. This matter was referred to the Drafting Committee.

30. The Government member of Lebanon suggested that the objectives concerning co-operatives should cover a wider field than economic and social development and also extend to include human advancement. Membership of a co-operative implied consciousness of rights and obligations beyond immediate personal interests. Co-operatives helped to develop the whole man, and it was necessary to make this clear so that leaders in developing countries might appreciate the social and educational value of the co-operative movement. Other Government, Employers' and Workers' members supported this view.

31. The addition of the concept of human progress and advancement to the objectives mentioned in Point 3 won general approval. It was noted that this would also include cultural development, which was suggested as an additional objective of co-operative policy and might be given specific mention under Point 4. Point 3 was adopted with the addition mentioned.

Point 4

32. A number of amendments to this Point were mainly concerned with changes of emphasis and drafting. With the consent of their authors, who withdrew their amendments, these were referred to the Drafting Committee for settlement.

33. A proposal to change the order of the various clauses in this Point concerning specific objectives of the policy concerning co-operatives was put forward by the Government member of Austria. It was intended to draw attention to the importance of co-operatives as a means of improving the economic and social position of persons of limited resources and opportunities. Some members supported the proposal on the grounds that the first responsibility of a co-operative was to its members.

34. The Employers' members favoured the change, while the Workers' members were indifferent to it, since it was evident that there was no order of priority as between the different objectives, which had been arranged primarily in terms of their national importance. Most members favouring a change, it was agreed that the position of clauses (c) and (a) should be inverted.

35. The Government member of Cuba proposed the deletion of certain words in clause (b) so as to make it clear that the aim of a co-operative was to increase national, and not personal capital which was a natural consequence of setting up co-operatives. The amendment was withdrawn when many members pointed out that it was a good thing for co-operatives to know that when they formed a co-operative their individual material interests would also be protected.

36. The Government members of the U.S.S.R. and Czechoslovakia wished to amend clause (a) of this Point to indicate that co-operatives should be established and developed as a means of implementing systems of "progressive" agrarian reform. Considerable debate ensued, centred round the meaning of the word "progressive", which was evidently capable of many interpretations and led to semantic confusion. The proposers of the amendment, supported by the Government members of Cuba, Byelorussia and others, felt that unless agrarian reform and land settlement were progressive they could not be of much value for developing countries.

37. Other members felt that reform was necessarily progressive in the usual sense of the term. The addition of the word therefore served no useful purpose. On the other hand the word had a specific connotation in the background of Marxist philosophy, and in this sense was objectionable.

38. The proposers of the amendment made it clear that by "progressive" they did not mean "in stages". Their meaning would be clearer if for "progressive" the words "democratic" or "radical" were substituted. A compromise suggestion that the words "tending to promote a more equitable social order" be adopted instead was not acceptable. The issue was put to the vote and the amendment rejected by 1,163 votes in favour, 8,037 against, with 595 abstentions.

39. A similar but less serious difference of opinion centred round the word "exploitation" in the English text. On an amendment proposed by the Employers' members the Committee agreed to substitute "utilisation" as being less tendentious. A further proposal by the Employers' members that in clause (b) the word "proper" be added to qualify the use of credit was withdrawn as liable to being misunderstood. The matter was referred to the Drafting Committee.

40. Two proposals, one by the Workers' members and the other by the Government member of Switzerland, were made to add a further clause (a) which would make it clear that co-operatives should be developed as a means of helping to raise the general level of education and technical knowledge among members, and particularly of those whose opportunities for education were limited. The broader of the two proposals was accepted as meeting the aims of both and was adopted unanimously.

41. The Government member of Yugoslavia, supported by some other Government members, proposed that further clauses be added to this Point to include other specific co-operative objectives, such as the elimination of exploitation and the bringing together of workers and peasants. Other members felt that co-operatives were for all, regardless of social class, and that these additional objectives were too vague to be included here. As most members seemed to share this view, the amendment was withdrawn.

42. Subject to these changes Point 4 was adopted.

Point 5

43. An amendment having been withdrawn without discussion, Point 5 was adopted unchanged.

Point 6

44. The Workers' members proposed that paragraph (1) of this Point, which suggested that the economic and social conditions of a country should be taken into account in formulating a policy on co-operatives, be deleted since the instrument was to be a Recommendation and not a Convention. Moreover, retention of this paragraph seemed dangerous, since it could give an excuse to governments to act or refrain from acting in the interests of co-operatives.

45. Most Government members, in particular those of the Netherlands, Senegal, Venezuela, Australia, Cyprus and Kenya, did not share this view. Economic and social conditions varied so widely that it was both imperative and realistic to take them into account in formulating policy. If what was stated was obvious, there was no harm in leaving it in. This was a matter, for example, which technical assistance experts had to bear in mind in view of the differences between developing and more developed countries. This provision had also to be retained if the instrument was to be flexible. If governments wished to shirk their responsibilities they could do so in any case. This paragraph served as a guide to governments in developing countries on the need to adapt new techniques to old problems.

46. After this exchange of views the amendment was withdrawn and Point 6 adopted unchanged.

Point 7

47. This Point was adopted unanimously without change.

Point 8

48. Certain Government members proposed the deletion of the words "when appropriate" in this Point, since their meaning seemed to run counter to the provisions of the following Point, which invited governments to associate co-operatives with the formulation of national economic plans. Workers' members, too, saw no reason why a distinction should be made between association in the formulation of policy and association in its application.

49. Other Government members felt that the distinction was important. All co-operatives had not reached the same level of development and governments should be free to decide at which stage of development co-operatives should be associated in the application of policy. Co-operatives could not be both judges and parties to the suit. Application of policy was a matter for the executive. Yet other Government members felt that it made no difference whether the words were removed or retained.

50. The Employers' members felt that governments should be free to decide on the application of policy if their good will was to be retained. After an exchange of views a compromise was found whereby the rest of Point 8 was maintained with the substitution of the words "where possible" for "where appropriate".

Point 9

51. The Workers' members, as well as a few Employers' members, felt that the invitation extended to governments to associate any co-operatives "which have achieved a sufficient measure of maturity and expansion" with the formulation of national economic plans was gratuitous and unnecessary. The question arose as to who was to judge the degree of maturity, and this opened the door to discrimination between co-operatives. The fact that co-operative members had associated together for an economic purpose seemed sufficient proof of their maturity.

52. Most Government members felt that it would be absurd to associate all co-operatives, however inefficient and mismanaged they were —and there were many such in developing countries—with the formulation of economic and other plans, which were highly technical operations.

53. A compromise solution which sought to limit such association to central co-operative bodies or bodies capable of furnishing the requisite collaboration was not accepted since the question as to which body should be chosen still remained open. A refinement of this idea, which proposed that co-operative organisations as such should be associated on the same footing as other enterprises, found general favour, and on the basis of this amendment Point 9 was adopted.

IV. Methods of Implementation of Policy concerning Co-operatives

A. Legislation

Point 10

54. The Employers' members proposed that the provisions of this Point should be qualified to relate to provisions in national laws and regulations which might have the effect of “unfairly” restricting the development of co-operatives. Most members were not opposed to this amendment. The Workers’ members introduced an amendment to include specific reference to certain areas such as the allocation of licences and quotas, as well as taxation, in which co-operatives allegedly suffered from discrimination.

55. A number of Government members felt that a Recommendation could not provide for all types of eventualities that might exist in most countries. There were perhaps other fields which would also have to be mentioned, and this would make the instrument too cumbersome. On the other hand, co-operatives in most countries received preferential treatment on a number of points, and it would be invidious to make references to certain areas where they apparently suffered from disabilities.

56. After an exchange of views it was agreed to refer to licences, quotas and taxation as examples of areas in which co-operatives should not be penalised or suffer unfair treatment. With this amendment Point 10 was adopted.

Point 11

57. The Government member of Byelorussia proposed that the instrument should, in addition to providing for national laws or regulations specifically concerned with the establishment and functioning of co-operatives, also provide for their protection. He stressed that there was no question of giving them a privileged position. Their protection by means of laws and regulations, the granting to them of favourable treatment and certain incentives would only give them the chance to compete with other undertakings which were often extremely powerful. Other Government members felt that the “protection” of co-operatives as such was unnecessary since this concept was either covered in other basic laws relating to rights of association or was ipso facto covered by laws whose purpose was to encourage and promote co-operatives. The Government members of Nigeria and Australia felt that co-operatives should not expect a more privileged position than other sectors of the economy; this view was shared by the Government members of Ceylon and the Malagasy Republic.

58. The Employers’ members objected to the concept of protection for one type of economic organisation since this might lead to discrimination against other forms. A number of Workers’ members felt that protection, if it meant the defence of weak co-operatives, was a good proposition, but it should not become a substitute for control.

59. Resulting from the discussion, a compromise formula proposed by the Government member of Sweden was accepted by the Committee, subject to review by the Drafting Committee. This provided for a guarantee to co-operatives to operate on equal terms with other forms of enterprise. Subject to this change Point 11 was adopted.

60. In view of the difficulty of arriving at a commonly acceptable definition of the word “co-operative”, the Government members of the United Kingdom and Nigeria proposed that “description” be substituted for “definition” in clause (a). The suggestion won wide approval, but at the instance of the Government member of France the Committee agreed to include both terms. A proposal by an Employers’ member to replace the word “particular” by “essential” was likewise adopted.

61. A joint amendment to clause (a) of Point 12 was submitted by the Employers’ and Workers’ members with the intention of including in the instrument certain essential features that should characterise a co-operative. They mentioned that the description was based on elements taken from Report VII (1) and seemed to them to include the basic principles of a co-operative without making it too exclusive. This happy initiative made in a truly co-operative spirit was generally acclaimed. Subject to a few minor drafting changes the amendment was endorsed by the Committee.

Point 13

62. The Committee adopted Point 13 without discussion.

B. EDUCATION AND TRAINING

Point 14

63. The Committee adopted Point 14 without discussion.

Point 15

64. The Government member of Australia proposed that Point 15, which listed certain types of educational institutions in which it was desirable that instruction on co-operatives be given, be replaced by a more broadly worded paragraph. This was, after all, a matter in which governments should be left some discretion and he found the present text too detailed. His views were backed by the Government member of India.

65. The Workers’ members disagreed with this view since they felt that Point 14 was the operative part of the text and that the list contained in Point 15 was illustrative only and served as a useful guide to countries where the co-operative movement was inadequately developed. A compromise solution was reached on the basis of adding the words “such as” to make it clear that some discretion was left to governments in the matter.

66. The Government member of Czechoslovakia proposed that co-operative colleges and similar institutions be added to the list in Point 15. In this he was supported by the Government members of the U.S.S.R., the United Kingdom, Sweden, Kenya, Cyprus and others. A number of other Government members, particularly those of the Federal Republic of Germany and the Malagasy Republic, pointed out that Point 15 dealt with general instruction in the field of co-operation, whereas specialised instruction was covered in Point 18. The addition of this clause therefore seemed unnecessary here.

67. After an exchange of views it was agreed to amend this Point so as to make it clear that in addition to the instruction available on co-operation in specialised institutions, such instruction should be given in those institutions already listed.

68. Subject to the above changes Point 15 was adopted.

Point 16

69. Point 16 was adopted by the Committee without discussion.

Point 17

70. Subject to adding a phrase to the text to make it clear that action in this field should begin in the first place at the local level, as proposed by the Government member of Australia, paragraph (1) was accepted by the Committee.

71. On the proposal of the Employers' members the Committee also agreed that paragraph (2) of this Point, subject to a few drafting changes, should be made a separate Point distinct from Point 17.

Point 18

72. The Government member of Australia, for the reasons mentioned under Point 15, proposed that paragraph (2) of this Point should be less explicit and expressed in general terms. He felt that, in view of the capital expenditure involved, governments should not feel obliged to set up co-operative colleges unless existing facilities were inadequate. After views were exchanged on this matter it was agreed to refer this to the Drafting Committee.

73. The Employers' members proposed the addition of a new paragraph (3) to provide for demonstration and pilot projects where practical training in co-operative organisation and management might be made available for co-operatives in developing countries.

74. A number of Government members, in particular those of Nigeria, the United Kingdom, Sweden and Cyprus, were opposed to the idea of "small experimental co-operatives", since they maintained that co-operatives should come into existence on a voluntary basis to meet needs felt and an "experimental co-operative" was a contradiction in terms. The Workers' members, too, expressed doubts as to the proposal.

75. After it was made clear that what was intended was practical training and not experimentation unrelated to economic needs, an additional paragraph (3) suitably amended was accepted by the Committee. A further amendment proposed by the Employers' members suggesting that agricultural production co-operatives should in the early stages be of limited size owing to the inconvenience of rural co-operatives was withdrawn when Workers' members objected to it on the ground that this ran counter to the very concept of freedom of initiative and voluntary association.

76. Subject to the changes mentioned earlier Point 18 was adopted.

C. AID TO CO-OPERATIVES

Point 19

77. The Employers' members proposed an amendment to this Point which was intended to make it clear that financial aid given to co-operatives should not adversely affect the principle of equality of treatment as between different economic sectors. Most Government members, particularly those of the Netherlands, Czechoslovakia, Senegal and the Malagasy Republic, were unable to accept the proposal. They felt that a government should be free to give help to underprivileged sections of the community and this would inevitably result in unequal treatment as between different economic sectors. It was the definite policy of the government in a number of developing countries to give preferential treatment to co-operatives as representing a sector that was economically weak, and this policy could not be revised.

78. The Employers' members were concerned that preferential treatment should not be such as to wipe out private enterprises that were functioning efficiently and rendering services to the community. The Workers' members were completely opposed to the proposal, even in an amended form, as running contrary to the whole aim of the proposed instrument. After further discussion the Employers' members withdrew their proposal.

79. Subject to minor drafting changes Point 19 was accordingly adopted.

Point 20

80. A number of amendments to this Point were put forward by Government, Employers' and Workers' members, most of which dealt with its form. A more substantial amendment proposed by the Employers' members was intended to delete reference to exemptions from taxes being given as a form of assistance to co-operatives.

81. Most of the amendments were finally withdrawn and Point 20 was adopted subject to a rearrangement proposed by the Government member of Australia.

Point 21

82. A minor amendment proposed to this Point having been withdrawn, it was adopted without change.

Point 22

83. An amendment put forward by Employers' members with similar intent as in Point 20 met with opposition from the Government members of Peru, Senegal and Cameroon. It was accordingly withdrawn and Point 22 was adopted without change.

Point 23

84. In the interests of sound banking and financial practices the Employers' members Proposed an amendment to this Point so as to enable public and semi-public funds for co-operatives to be channelled through banking institutions rather than co-operative banks. The amendment was eventually withdrawn.

85. There was an amendment by the Employers' members suggesting the deletion of paragraph (2) of this Point. The Government member of Byelorussia pointed out that a majority of governments would prefer financial aid to co-operatives being channelled through central co-operative, public or semi-public institutions. Private capital, as a rule, was not interested in promoting the co-operative movement. He therefore suggested a subamendment to another amendment to the paragraph proposed by the Government member of Lebanon. This amendment was, however, withdrawn and the Chairman ruled that the subamendment, which had not been submitted in writing, was invalid.

86. Point 23 was adopted without change.

Point 24

87. This Point was adopted with a minor change proposed by the Government member of Australia.

Point 25

88. Subject to eventual modifications of the text by the Drafting Committee this Point was adopted without change.

D. SUPERVISION AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR IMPLEMENTATION

Point 26

89. The Workers' members proposed an amendment to this Point asking that the instrument should provide for the collaboration of trade union organisations in the elaboration and, if necessary, application of policy concerning the setting up and development of co-operatives.

90. A number of speakers pointed out that the amendment should relate to Section III of the Proposed Conclusions and was inappropriate here. The Government members of Uganda, Senegal, Venezuela, Kenya, Nigeria and India were also opposed to the idea on the grounds that this violated the voluntary nature of co-operatives and failed to maintain their separate identity and interests. Co-operatives were for all sections of the population and their membership did not correspond to that of trade unions. Besides, co-operatives were non-political bodies and without any specific religious affiliation, whereas this could occur in the case of trade unions. For workers, trade unions were not and should not be political bodies; trade unions which engaged in political activities were exceptions. Other speakers pointed out that if trade unions were to be given this role there was no reason why it should not also be extended to other groups such as employers' organisations, farmers' associations, organisations of fishermen, etc.

91. The Workers' members explained that what they sought was collaboration and not control. Such collaboration in developing countries could help both parties. The Government member of the United States of America sympathised with the Workers' members' viewpoint.

92. Following consultation between the different groups a compromise amendment was adopted whereby it was agreed that the instrument should encourage the co-operative movement to secure the support of interested organisations in the elaboration and application of a policy on co-operatives. This proposal should become a separate Point and be placed in Section III between existing Points 8 and 9.

93. A number of Government members, in particular those of Italy and Japan, were concerned with the provisions of paragraph (2), which indicated that responsibility for supervision should be the responsibility of a federal co-operative body. After it was made clear that this did not free co-operatives from their liability for supervision under the provisions of national law, Point 26 was adopted subject to a minor change.

Point 27

94. The Government member of Czechoslovakia proposed that provision should be made for the accounts of a co-operative to be audited by internal "auditing commissions" in addition to a qualified external body. In the view of the Government member of the U.S.S.R. this was necessary to comply with democratic principles of management. It became clear after some discussion that practices varied from country to country and that rules for internal and external audit were already covered by Points 24 and 25. The proposal was hence withdrawn and Point 27 adopted.

Point 28

95. Point 28 was adopted without change.

Point 29

96. A number of Government members, particularly those of Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Senegal and Nigeria, as well as the Workers' members criticised the suggestion that "qualified private or semi-private bodies" might in addition to the competent authority be given the functions of promoting co-operatives when appropriate, and pending the establishment of federal co-operative bodies. They thought this would open the door to undesirable propaganda and misuse of co-operatives. It was, however, mentioned that private bodies had contributed to the growth of the co-operative movement, especially in Finland and Jamaica.

97. Subject to a drafting change which referred to other appropriate qualified bodies and deleted the reference to "private and semi-private", the objection was withdrawn.

98. On the proposal of the Government member of Canada, the Committee also agreed to add a new paragraph (3) so that the instrument should call on the competent authority to collect and publish at least annual statistics relating to the growth and operation of co-operatives in each country. This it was felt would be of great value in developing countries and received the support of the Government members of Kenya and Senegal. With these changes and additions Point 29 was adopted.

Point 30

99. After some doubts were raised by the Government members of Czechoslovakia and India regarding the advisability of insisting that the functions referred to in Point 29 should be discharged as full-time work, the Committee agreed to adopt this Point without change, since the instrument was to be a Recommendation.

Point 31

100. This Point was adopted without change.

V. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION

Point 32

101. A number of amendments were put forward to this Point. A proposal by the Government member of Ceylon, which was supported by Government members of the Federal Republic of Germany, Lebanon and other countries as well as by the Employers’ and Workers’ members proposed the addition of “other interested international organisations” to those bodies already being called upon to give aid to co-operatives in developing countries.

102. Similar proposals by the Government members of the Scandinavian countries suggesting the expansion of technical assistance to the co-operative movements of developing countries and the drawing up of co-ordinated projects therefor, as well as for action in the field of research and problems of co-operatives in developing countries, were approved by the Committee.

103. The Committee requested its Drafting Committee to co-ordinate these amendments and incorporate them into Point 32.

104. Subject to these changes and a few minor additions, Point 32 was approved.

Communication concerning Conclusions on Co-operatives from the Committee on Agrarian Reform

105. The Committee at its thirteenth sitting received a communication from the Conference transmitting Points 23 and 46 to 62 of the Proposed Conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform concerning the role of co-operatives in this field. The Committee noted that it was not expected to have any substantive discussion on the subject at this stage.

106. The Reporter recalled that many of the Points included in these Proposed Conclusions had already been discussed in the wider context of the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries. After an exchange of views the Committee decided to attach as an annex to its report to the Conference the Conclusions on the Role of Co-operatives in Agrarian Reform that it had received from the Committee on Agrarian Reform. These could then be taken into consideration when the Office prepared its report for transmission to governments following the Conference.

Adoption of the Report, the Proposed Conclusions and the Resolution concerning the Placing on the Agenda of the Question of the Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries

108. The Committee considered its report and the Proposed Conclusions at its thirteenth sitting and agreed to certain changes suggested by members during the course of the discussion. The report of the Committee, the Proposed Conclusions, and the text of a resolution to place on the agenda of the next Ordinary Session of the Conference an item entitled “The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries” were adopted unanimously. The Proposed Conclusions concerning the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries prepared by the Drafting Committee and adopted by the Committee are appended and are submitted to the Conference for consideration.

(Signed) R. WAHID, Chairman.
B. MATHSSON, Reporter.
Conclusions of the Committee on Agrarian Reform on the Role of Co-operatives in Agrarian Reform

23. The special contribution which various forms of co-operatives can make to the successful implementation of agrarian reforms and to the improvement in the levels of living of the beneficiaries should be recognised. These include, among others, suitable voluntary systems of joint land use, savings and credit co-operatives, co-operatives for production, supply, distribution, marketing, for the utilisation and maintenance of machinery, and other services. For the sound growth of co-operative activities institutional arrangements should be made for supervision, for extension services to co-operatives, for systematic training programmes for co-operative office bearers and personnel, as well as for education of members of co-operatives and diffusion of co-operative principles and working methods among the rural population.

Additional Conclusions on the Role of Co-operatives in Agrarian Reform

46. In view of their importance as a means of promoting general economic and social progress, of directly associating the rural population with the development process and because of their educational and cultural value, co-operatives should be considered as having a vital role to play in programmes of agrarian reform.

47. Co-operatives should be used as a means of assessing the problems and interests of the rural population for the planning and preparation of agrarian reform measures. They should also serve for channelling information among agriculturists and making the purposes, principles and methods of such reforms understood.

48. Co-operatives should be promoted to facilitate the implementation of agrarian reform measures, to contribute to the achievement of the aims and objectives of such reforms and to ensure that in the long run there is substantial improvement in the living and working conditions of the beneficiaries.

49. Particular attention should be paid to the development of appropriate forms of co-operatives adapted to given local conditions and to the various patterns and phases of agrarian reform. They should by all means enable cultivators to operate holdings efficiently and productively and allow for the greatest possible initiative and participation of the membership.

50. Where appropriate, suitable voluntary forms of co-operative land use should be encouraged. Their activities may range from the organisation of certain services and farming operations in common to the complete pooling of land, labour and equipment.

51. Wherever appropriate the voluntary consolidation of fragmentary holdings through co-operatives should be encouraged.

52. In cases where measures are being envisaged for the transfer of ownership or division of large estates due consideration should be given to the organisation of co-operative systems of holding and/or cultivation. At the same time adequate provision should be made for the supply of services and technical guidance to those who work the land.

53. The establishment of co-operatives should also be considered in connection with land settlement schemes especially as regards land reclamation and improvement measures and the organisation of joint services and farming operations for settlers.

54. Development of thrift and credit co-operatives and co-operative banks should be encouraged among the beneficiaries of agrarian reforms as well as among other small farmers for the purpose of:

(a) providing loans to cultivators for the purchase of equipment and other farm requisites;

(b) encouraging and assisting cultivators to save and accumulate capital;

(c) advancing loans to, and promoting thrift among, especially, those agricultural families, including hired workers, who normally would not have access to established sources of credit;

(d) facilitating the implementation of special government credit schemes through an efficient channeling of loans to beneficiaries and appropriate supervision of the use made of such loans and timely reimbursement.

55. The development of supply, marketing or multi-purpose co-operatives should be encouraged for the purpose of—

(a) the joint purchase and supply of farm requisites of good quality on favourable terms;

(b) the joint conditioning, processing and marketing of agricultural products.

56. Wherever possible, supply, credit and marketing functions should be linked so that the members may benefit to the maximum extent both in economies in the purchase of requisites and from higher proceeds from the sale of produce. This may be achieved either through setting up multi-purpose co-operatives or through membership in several specialised co-operative societies.

57. Encouragement should be given to the development of co-operatives providing farmers with other services contributing to an improvement in methods of farming and in the economic and social status of the agricultural population. Such institutions might include those relating to the joint use of farm machinery, electrification, livestock breeding, the provision of veterinary and pest control services, facilities for irrigation, crop and livestock insurance, etc.

58. With a view to improving employment opportunities, working conditions and income, landless agricultural workers should be assisted where appropriate, to organise themselves voluntarily into labour contracting co-operatives.

59. Where appropriate, agricultural co-operatives in the reform zones should be encouraged to form federations to engage in such activities which their local associations could only perform at higher cost or not at all.

60. Due consideration should also be given to the encouragement and development of other types of co-operative activities providing for full or part-time non-agricultural employment for members of beneficiaries' families (e.g. crafts, home or cottage industries), adequate distribution of consumer goods and for social services which the State may not always be in a position to provide (viz. health, education, culture, recreation, transport),

61. To permit co-operatives of the various types to play their full role in agrarian reform, the competent authority should pay special attention to—

(a) the framing and application of appropriate co-operative legislation, rules and by-laws;

(b) the establishment of competent promotional agencies;

(c) the provision of adequate technical guidance;

(d) the training of promoters, co-operative office bearers and staff, as well as the systematic education of members in co-operative principles and working methods;

(e) the provision of adequate sources of credit for co-operatives.

62. The interchange and dissemination of information on co-operative structures, their set-backs and achievements related to agrarian reform should be encouraged by all possible means so that the experience acquired may be made available to the largest possible number of countries.

(3) Text of the Proposed Conclusions with a View to the Adoption of a Recommendation concerning the Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries, Submitted by the Committee on Co-operatives.¹

I. Form of the Instrument
1. The instrument should be a Recommendation.

II. Scope
2. The instrument should apply to all categories of co-operatives, such as the following: consumer co-operatives; land improvement co-operatives; agricultural productive and processing co-operatives; rural supply co-operatives; agricultural marketing co-operatives; fishery co-operatives; service co-operatives; handicrafts co-operatives; workers' productive co-operatives; labour contracting co-operatives; co-operative thrift and credit societies and banks; housing co-operatives; transport co-operatives; mutual insurance co-operatives; and health co-operatives.

III. Objectives of Policy Concerning Co-operatives
3. It should be emphasised that the establishment and growth of co-operatives should be regarded as one of the important instruments for economic, social and cultural development as well as human advancement in developing countries.

4. In particular, co-operatives should be established and developed as a means of—
   (a) improving the economic, social and cultural situation of persons of limited resources and opportunities;
   (b) increasing personal and national capital resources by the encouragement of thrift and the sound use of credit;
   (c) increasing national income, export revenues and employment by a fuller utilisation of resources, for instance in the implementation of systems of agrarian reform and of land settlement aimed at bringing fresh areas into productive use and in the establishment of scattered but fully modernised industries processing local raw materials;
   (d) improving social conditions, and supplementing social services, in such fields as housing and, where appropriate, health and communications;
   (e) helping to raise the level of general and technical knowledge of their members.

5. The instrument should invite the governments of developing countries to formulate and carry out a policy under which co-operatives receive aid and encouragement without losing their independence.

6. (1) In elaborating such a policy, regard should be had to economic and social conditions, the available resources and the role which co-operatives can play in the development of the country.

   (2) The policy should be integrated in general development plans in so far as this is consistent with the essential features of co-operatives.

7. The policy should be kept under review and adapted to changes in social and economic needs and to technological advances.

8. Existing co-operatives should be associated with the formulation and, where possible, application of the policy.

9. The instrument should suggest that the co-operative movement should be encouraged to seek the co-operation of organisations with common objectives in the elaboration and, if necessary, application of the policy concerning the establishment and development of co-operatives.

10. (1) The instrument should invite the governments concerned to associate co-operative organisations as such, on the same basis as other undertakings, with the formulation of national economic plans and other general economic measures, at least whenever such plans and measures are liable to affect their activities. Such co-operatives should also be associated with the application of such plans and measures in so far as this is consistent with their essential features.

   (2) Federations of co-operatives should be empowered to represent their member societies at the local, regional and national levels, in the elaboration of economic plans.

IV. Methods of Implementation of Policy Concerning Co-operatives
A. Legislation

11. The instrument should provide that all appropriate measures, including the consultation of existing co-operatives, should be taken—
   (a) to detect and eliminate provisions contained in national laws and regulations which may have the effect of unfairly restricting the development of co-operatives, such as the allocation of licences and quotas and taxation;
   (b) to avoid the inclusion of such provisions in future laws and regulations.

12. The instrument should provide that there should be national laws or regulations specifically concerned with the establishment and functioning of co-operatives, and with the protection of their right to operate on equal terms with other forms of enterprise. These laws or regulations should preferably be applicable to all categories of co-operatives.

13. The matters dealt with in such laws and regulations should include at least—
   (a) a definition or description of a co-operative bringing out its essential characteristics, namely that it is an association of persons who have voluntarily joined together to achieve a common end through the formation of a democratically controlled business organisation, making equitable contributions to the capital required and accepting a fair share of the risks and benefits of the undertaking in which the members actively participate;

(b) the description of the objects of a co-operative, and procedures for its establishment and registration, the amendment of its statutes, and its dissolution;

(c) the conditions of membership and rights and duties of members;

(d) methods of administration, management and internal audit, and procedures for the establishment and functioning of competent organs;

(e) the protection of the name "co-operative";

(f) machinery for the external audit and guidance of co-operatives and for the enforcement of the laws and regulations.

14. The instrument should provide that laws and regulations concerning co-operatives should authorise co-operatives to federate.

B. EDUCATION AND TRAINING

15. The instrument should provide that measures should be taken to disseminate a knowledge of the principles, methods, possibilities and limitations of co-operatives as widely as possible among the peoples of developing countries.

16. Instruction on the subject should be given not only in co-operative schools, colleges and training centres but also in other suitable educational institutions such as—

(a) universities and centres of higher education;

(b) teachers' training colleges;

(c) agricultural schools and other vocational educational establishments, and workers' education centres;

(d) secondary schools;

(e) primary schools.

17. With a view to promoting practical experience in co-operative principles and methods, the formation and operation of student co-operatives in schools and colleges should be encouraged.

18. Steps should be taken, in the first place at the local level, to familiarise the adult population with the principles, methods and possibilities of co-operatives.

19. The instrument should provide that, for the purpose of disseminating knowledge of the principles, methods and possibilities of co-operatives among the peoples of developing countries, full use should be made of such media of instruction as text books, lectures, seminars, study and discussion groups, mobile instructors, guided tours of co-operative undertakings, the press, films, radio and television and other media of mass communication. These should be adapted to the particular conditions of each country.

20. (1) Provision should be made both for appropriate technical training and for training in co-operative principles and methods of persons who will be—and, where necessary, of persons who are—members of the board of directors and members of the staffs of co-operatives, as well as of their advisers and publicists.

(2) Where existing facilities are inadequate, special colleges or schools should be established to provide such training by specialised teachers or leaders of the co-operative movement with teaching materials adapted to the requirements of the country; if such specialised institutions cannot be established, special courses on co-operation should be given either by correspondence or in such establishments as schools of accountancy, schools of administration and schools of commerce.

(3) The use of special programmes of practical training should be one of the means of contributing to the education and further training of members of co-operatives.

C. AID TO CO-OPERATIVES

Financial Aid

21. (1) The instrument should provide that, where necessary, financial aid from outside should be given to co-operatives when they initiate their activities or encounter financial obstacles to growth or transformation.

(2) Such aid should not entail any obligations contrary to the independence of co-operatives, and should be designed to encourage rather than replace the initiative and effort of the members of co-operatives.

22. (1) Such aid should preferably take the form of loans, reductions in or exemptions from certain taxes, credit guarantees or grants.

(2) Grants and tax exemptions may be provided, in particular, to help to finance—

(a) publicity, promotional and educational campaigns;

(b) certain clearly defined tasks benefiting the public.

23. Where such aid cannot be provided by the co-operative movement, it should preferably be given by the State or other public bodies, although it may, if necessary, come from private institutions.

24. (1) Grants and tax exemptions or reductions should be subject to conditions prescribed by national laws or regulations and relating in particular to the use to be made of the aid and the amount thereof; the conditions of loans and credit guarantees may be determined in each case.

(2) The competent authority should ensure that the use of financial aid and, in the case of a loan, its repayment, are adequately supervised.

25. (1) Financial aid from public or semi-public sources should be channelled through a national co-operative bank or, failing that, another central co-operative institution capable of assuming responsibility for its use and, where appropriate, repayment; pending the establishment of such institutions the aid may be given directly to individual co-operatives.
(2) Financial aid from private institutions may be given directly to individual co-operatives.

Administrative Aid

26. The instrument should provide that, while the management and administration of a co-operative must, from the outset, be the responsibility of the members and persons elected by them, the competent authority should, in appropriate cases and for an initial period and as required—

(a) assist the co-operative in obtaining and remunerating competent staff;

(b) place at the disposal of the co-operative persons competent to give guidance and advice.

27. (1) Generally, co-operatives should be able to obtain guidance and advice on matters relating to management and administration, as well as on technical matters, preferably from a federation of co-operatives or from the competent authority.

(2) Such guidance and advice must respect the autonomy of the co-operative and the responsibility of its staff.

D. SUPERVISION AND RESPONSIBILITY FOR IMPLEMENTATION

28. (1) The instrument should provide that co-operatives should be subject to a form of supervision designed to ensure that they carry on their activities in conformity with the objects for which they were established and in accordance with the law.

(2) Supervision should be the responsibility of a federation of co-operatives; pending the establishment of such a body the competent authority should assume the task.

29. The accounts of co-operatives should be audited by a qualified external body.

30. The measures referred to in Points 28 and 29 should be so planned and carried out as to—

(a) ensure good management and administration of co-operatives;

(b) protect third parties;

(c) provide an opportunity of completing the education and training of the members of the board of directors and members of the staff of co-operatives through practice and through critical examination of mistakes.

31. (1) The instrument should provide that the functions of promoting co-operatives, providing for education concerning co-operatives and for the training of office-bearers and staffs of co-operatives, and giving aid in their organisation and functioning, should preferably be performed by one central body so as to ensure coherent action.

(2) The performance of these functions should preferably be the responsibility of a federation of co-operatives; pending the establishment of such a body the competent authority or, where appropriate, other qualified bodies, should assume the task.

(3) The competent authority should collect and publish at least once a year statistics relating to the operations and growth of co-operatives in the national economy.

32. (1) The functions referred to in Point 31 should, wherever possible, be discharged as full-time work.

(2) They should be performed by persons who have received training specifically directed towards the exercise of such functions; such training should be provided by specialised institutions or, wherever suitable, through specialised courses in the schools and colleges referred to in Point 20.

33. Where the services of federations of co-operatives cannot adequately meet the need for research, exchanges of experience and publications, special institutions, serving the entire country or several regions, should, if possible, be established.

V. INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION

34. (1) Members should, to the greatest extent possible, collaborate in providing aid and encouragement to co-operatives in developing countries.

(2) Such collaboration should be envisaged—

(a) between two or more developing countries; and

(b) between countries with an old-established co-operative movement and developing countries.

(3) As appropriate, the help of national co-operative organisations should be enlisted for such collaboration, and use should be made, particularly with a view to the co-ordination of international effort, of international co-operative organisations and other interested international bodies.

(4) The collaboration should extend to such measures as—

(a) the increased provision of technical assistance to the co-operative movement of developing countries, wherever possible in the form of co-ordinated programmes involving different agencies, both inter-governmental and non-governmental;

(b) the preparation and supply of information, textbooks, audio-visual aids and analogous material to assist in the drafting of legislation, in instruction on co-operation and in the training of office bearers and qualified staffs of co-operatives;

(c) the exchange of qualified personnel;

(d) the grant of fellowships;

(e) the organisation of international seminars and discussion groups;

(f) the inter-co-operative exchange of goods and services;

(g) the initiation of systematic research into the structure, working methods and problems of co-operative movements in developing countries.
(4) Text of the Resolution concerning the Placing on the Agenda of the Next Ordinary Session of the Conference of the Question of the Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries, Submitted by the Committee on Co-operatives.¹

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having adopted the report of the Committee appointed to consider the seventh item on the agenda, and

Having in particular approved as general conclusions, with a view to the consultation of governments, proposals for a Recommendation relating to the role of co-operatives in the economic and social development of developing countries;

Decides that an item entitled "The Role of Co-operatives in the Economic and Social Development of Developing Countries" shall be included in the agenda of its next ordinary session for a second discussion, with a view to the adoption of a Recommendation.

APPENDIX X

Communications to the Conference

When the Governing Body of the International Labour Office considered at its 160th (November 1964) Session the action to be taken on the resolution adopted by the Conference in 1964 concerning the programme and structure of the I.L.O. it decided to set up a Working Party composed of the Chairman and eight Government members, six Employers’ members and six Workers’ members to assist the Director-General in the study of the proposals made at the 47th and 48th Sessions of the Conference and in the implementation of the resolution concerning the programme and structure of the I.L.O.

At its 161st Session in March 1965 the Governing Body considered the initial report of the Working Party concerning the organisation of its work and adopted the proposals of the Working Party.

The Working Party met from 4 to 7 May 1965 to examine proposals relating to the major programme areas of I.L.O. action and reached conclusions concerning the major programme of human resources. These conclusions are included in the report of the Working Party which the Governing Body considered at its 162nd (May 1965) Session and decided to transmit as the first report of the Working Party to the Conference, so that it may be discussed in connection with the Report of the Director-General (Part I).

FIRST REPORT OF THE WORKING PARTY ON THE PROGRAMME AND STRUCTURE OF THE I.L.O. TO THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

1. The Working Party on the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. was appointed by the Governing Body at its 160th Session to assist the Director-General of the I.L.O. in the study of proposals made at the 47th and 48th Sessions of the Conference concerning the programme and structure of the Organisation and in the implementation of the resolution concerning the programme and structure of the I.L.O. adopted by the International Labour Conference at its 48th Session (1964).

2. The Working Party met for the first time on 20 February 1965 for the purpose of deciding upon the sequence and organisation of its work. In its initial report, submitted to the 161st Session of the Governing Body (document G.B.161/14/37), the Working Party indicated that it had decided to consider in the first instance the proposals concerning the major programme areas of I.L.O. activity and thereafter to proceed by stages to the discussion of the proposals concerned with the various means for the determination of such programmes and the implementation thereof.

3. In accordance with this decision the Working Party held its first working session from 4 to 7 May 1965 under the chairmanship of Mr. G. V. Haythorne (Canada), Chairman of the Governing Body of the International Labour Office.

4. The Working Party was composed at this session as follows:

Government Members:
- Algeria: Mr. Bouhara
- Argentina: Mr. Cámpera
- France: Mr. Parodi
- India: Mr. Parushottam
- Poland: Mr. Chajn
- U.S.S.R.: Mr. Pozharasky
- United Kingdom: Mr. Heron
- United States: Mr. Weaver

Employers’ Members:
- Mr. Bergenström
- Mr. Fennema
- Mr. Rifaat
- Mr. Robinson
- Mr. Tata
- Mr. Yllanes Eamos

Workers’ Members:
- Mr. De Bock
- Lord Collison
- Mr. ben Ezzedine
- Mr. Kaplansky
- Mr. Weaver

5. The Working Party had before it the following documentation—
(a) the Report of the Director-General (Part I) to the 47th and 48th Sessions of the International Labour Conference;
(b) the report and analysis by major categories of all the proposals put forward at the 47th and 48th Sessions of the Conference (document G.B.160/5/15) submitted to the Governing Body at its 160th Session in pursuance of the 1964 Conference resolution on the programme and structure of the I.L.O. and transmitted to member States for their comments by decision of the Governing Body;

(c) the list by major categories of the proposals concerning the programme and structure of the I.L.O. requested by the Governing Body at its 160th Session (document ORG 32-1, Annex), and transmitted to member States for their comments by decision of the Governing Body;

(d) a summary of the communications received from governments and employers' and workers' organisations concerning the proposals included in the documents mentioned under (b) and (c) which relate to the major programme areas of human resources, social institutions and conditions of life and work;

(e) the Report of the Director-General (Part I) to the 49th Session of the Conference;

(f) a working paper indicating the objectives, scope and content, methods of implementation, and procedures for review and evaluation of the major programme area relating to human resources.

6. The Director-General of the International Labour Office made an introductory statement in which he explained to the Working Party the steps he had taken within the Office to initiate the framing of specific proposals for programme development in each programme area.

7. The Working Party took note of the statement by the Director-General. In the course of the Working Party's deliberations the Director-General and the Principal Deputy Director-General took an active part in the consideration and clarification of the various points that came up for discussion.

8. The Working Party noted that by 26 April 1963 comments on the documents mentioned under (b) and (c) in paragraph 5 above had been received from 40 governments, 22 employers' organisations and 16 workers' organisations.

9. The Working Party noted the information given by the Director-General in his Report (Part I) to the 49th Session of the Conference and in the statement which he made to the Working Party concerning the steps he has taken to adapt the organisation of the Office to present and foreseeable needs. The technical work of the Office is now organised on a departmental basis and the division of responsibility among the various departments corresponds roughly to the scope of the proposed major programme areas which are described in Chapter II of the Report. The aim of this departmentalisation is to facilitate the formulation and implementation of comprehensive and integrated activities in each sector of I.L.O. action.

10. The "major programmes" of the Organisation have been defined, for purposes of programme planning, as broad areas of continuing and closely co-ordinated activities designed to accomplish important objectives. Such "major programmes" are composed of "programmes", which are described as related activities of a continuing nature designed to contribute to the attainment of one or more of these objectives. These programmes, in turn, are subdivided into specific activities of a recurring or continuing nature identified as "sub-programmes" and "projects". The latter being specific activities called for under the arrangements for the attainment of the objectives of a major programme, but which have a clearly defined aim and a fixed completion date. Certain tasks of the Organisation, for example those in the rural field, concern several "major programmes".

11. The new system of programme planning control and evaluation set up within the Office should enable the Governing Body and the Conference to examine programmes in fuller awareness of the inter-relationships between different types of action, and of their financial implications.

12. At the outset of the deliberations in the Working Party certain members recalled the views of their governments concerning the relation between the proposed major programmes under consideration and the long-term objectives of the Organisation and the respective roles of the Conference and the Governing Body in the determination and control of programmes. The Working Party took note of these observations and decided that it would review the proposals and comments relating to these points at the appropriate stage in its proceedings on the occasion of a future session.

13. After reviewing the documentation before it, and having due regard to the scope and significance for the Organisation of the questions raised in this documentation, the Working Party decided to focus attention on the proposed major programme relating to human resources. There was general agreement that it was preferable to hold initially a full discussion and endeavour to reach an agreed body of unanimous conclusions in this complex area rather than to attempt to cover with less thoroughness all three of the major programme areas described by the Director-General in his Report to the 49th Session of the Conference, namely human resources, social institutions, and conditions of life and work.

14. The choice of the major programme area of human resources as the subject for initial thorough consideration by the Working Party at this session does not in any way suggest that the two other major programme areas proposed by the Director-General are of any less importance. The Working Party noted that all three major programme areas will be discussed by the Conference at its 49th Session within the framework of the discussion on the Report of the Director-General.

15. The Working Party wished to record its appreciation of the manner in which its task had been facilitated by the governments and the workers’ and employers’ organisations who had put forward proposals and comments relating to the major programme area of human resources.

Need for a Major Programme in the Field of Human Resources

16. The Organisation has been concerned since its inception with questions relating to the development and utilisation of human resources. The Preamble to the Constitution and the Declaration of Philadelphia, in particular Part III of the Declaration, set out clearly the responsibilities of the I.L.O. in this field. Since the Second World War the I.L.O. has increased its efforts and experience in this connection, particularly through action for the benefit of the developing countries. More recently, the importance of human resources in economic development has been further recognised and this has stimulated greater efforts by the I.L.O. in this field, the reasons for which have been stressed at recent sessions of the General Conference and other meetings of the various organs of the I.L.O. The Working Party is convinced that a reorganisation of I.L.O. activities in this field into a rationally ordered major programme with clearly defined objectives and methods of action would enable the Organisation greatly to increase the contribution it is making to the solution of the complex problems of developing human resources throughout the world.

17. It is appropriate to restate very briefly at this stage the main reasons for the further strengthening of I.L.O. action in the human resources field.

18. National development does not depend only on the existence of natural resources and on an ample supply of capital and equipment. If people do not have the skills needed to exploit these resources fully, if they are not productively employed, if they do not participate actively, freely and in a responsible manner in the various tasks of development, it will be very difficult to achieve significant economic and social progress. This is particularly true of developing countries in which human resources are abundant but where the skill potential of such resources is inadequately developed and the opportunities for productive employment are insufficient. In short, it is increasingly recognised in the theory and practice of development that the development and utilisation of “human resources” are decisive factors in economic expansion and, in consequence, in social progress.

19. The role which human beings can play in the process of development will be enhanced if living and working conditions are improved, if standards of living are made more satisfactory and if a greater degree of social justice is attained. This makes it necessary to stress the other fundamental aspect of human resources policy, namely that the ultimate objective of development is human fulfilment. A policy for the development and utilisation of human resources therefore implies recognition of the right of each person to obtain employment, to enjoy the fruits of the production to which he has contributed, and to develop his faculties to the fullest extent.

20. As a world-wide agency with special responsibilities in the field of social and labour policy, it is not surprising that the International Labour Organisation should have engaged in a whole series of activities relating to the development and utilisation of human resources. The effectiveness of its action in this field is strengthened by three factors. Firstly, its tripartite structure, which enables those representing the essential sectors of economic and social life to participate in the drawing up and implementation of policies and programmes in this field; secondly, the technical competence which it has acquired; and, thirdly, its universality, owing to which it benefits from the very diverse experience of its member States and from the comparison of the different solutions which have been found for the many complex problems which arise in the field of human resources.

Objectives in the Human Resources Field

21. The Working Party noted that, in his Report to the 47th (1963) Session of the Conference, the Director-General expressed the view that problems relating to the development and utilisation of human resources should be given priority in I.L.O. activities. He suggested that the development of an effective strategy in this field should concentrate on the following objectives, which have been proposed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations for the United Nations Development Decade:

(1) better utilisation of the labour force by creating higher levels of productive employment;
(2) improving the quality of the labour force by vocational education and training;
(3) enlisting popular support for the tasks of national development and the participation of broad social groups in them.\(^1\)

22. In his reply to the discussion on his Report, the Director-General noted that the Conference fully agreed that these three objectives should be given priority in the development of a strategy in the field of human resources. Moreover, in resolution 984 (XXXVI) the Economic and Social Council requested the specialised agencies to consider the development of human resources as one of the priority areas which should be borne in mind in the planning and implementation of their programmes of action.

23. The Working Party wished to stress the special role which the I.L.O. can play in this field. In pursuance of specific I.L.O. objectives, it should continue to define principles of universal application and develop policies which are suited to the situation in countries at various stages of development. It must then develop programmes and techniques which enable effect to be given to the principles and policies thus defined, paying particular attention to the speed at which technological, economic, social and institutional change is taking place in each country and throughout the world. It is called upon to encourage the adoption of the principles and policies which it recommends in this field and the implementation of appropriate programmes; in so doing, it must stress the need for making the adjustments called for by changing needs and by the lessons of experience.

24. In order to be able to carry out these tasks, the I.L.O. must continue to accumulate technical knowledge which will serve as a basis for the assistance and the advice which it will be called upon to give to governments, employers' and workers' organisations and other bodies competent in the field of human resources.

25. The I.L.O. must also seek the co-operation of the international organisations active in some particular field of human resources development. National planning of education does much to further the success of training schemes, and this calls for co-operation with the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation. The Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations has an obvious interest in matters relating to employment and training in agriculture. Improvements in nutrition and hygiene have a considerable bearing on the development of human resources, and these questions are within the province of the F.A.O. and the World Health Organisation. As for the policies and programmes for the creation of productive employment, these have major economic aspects which must be looked into with the competent organisations, in the first place with the United Nations and more particularly its regional economic commissions, and also with the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development and other similar institutions. The International Labour Organisation will also wish to co-operate with regional organisations and non-governmental institutions operating in this sphere, including employers' and workers' organisations. Finally, the I.L.O. should encourage the co-ordination of all efforts undertaken in a particular country, including those taking the form of bilateral assistance, so that such efforts may have maximum effectiveness.

26. The participation of the three constituent groups of the I.L.O. in the human resources programmes undertaken by the Organisation at the national and international levels is an essential factor in the success of these programmes.

27. In view of the overriding social importance of the various aspects of human resources policy and having due regard to the scope of the technical action of the I.L.O. in this field, the Working Party considered that the Organisation should act as the focal point in worldwide efforts for the development and utilisation of human resources. The Working Party expressed the view that member States should be invited to provide the I.L.O. with relevant information on the technical co-operation activities which they are carrying out in the field of human resources and that the I.L.O. should disseminate information on its pilot projects, research and other activities so as to make generally available the expert knowledge it acquires.

28. At this stage in its discussions the Working Party decided to consider separately the programmes and methods of action by which the I.L.O. could best help its member States to achieve the objectives set out in paragraph 21. It noted that these objectives called essentially for the implementation of programmes relating to employment, training and the participation of all concerned in the tasks of development.

Relations between a Major Human Resources Programme and Other Major Programmes

29. The Working Party observed that the third element—namely the active and free participation of the population in the tasks of development—was essential to the success of the programmes to be undertaken in the fields of employment and training. The whole population should be fully associated, through the medium of representative organisations, in the definition and implementation of these programmes; there was a need to develop systems of labour relations and social institutions which would enable the various groups making up the population to give their authentic support to collective efforts to promote economic and social development and to participate in such efforts; co-operative movements should be strengthened; finally, there should be a fair distribution of the fruits of development. If these requirements were not met, such programmes might well run counter to the interests of the individual and the community as a whole and prove ineffective.

30. The Working Party considered that, of all the international organisations, the I.L.O. was best qualified to make an important contribution in this field. It noted that a number of proposals regarding these questions had been formulated in the context of the major programme relating to social institutions and decided to discuss them at a later date.

31. The Working Party considered, furthermore, that the success of programmes relating to human resources did not depend solely on the development of the activities which would be undertaken with respect to employment, training and participation, and stressed the importance in this connection of the improvement of conditions of life and work. It noted that these aspects of the subject were embodied in the proposals concerning another major I.L.O. programme which it would also study at a later date.

Scope of a Major Programme in the Field of Human Resources

32. Before trying to specify the content of specific I.L.O. programmes in matters of employment and training—within the frame­work of a major human resources programme— the Working Party had an exchange of views on what should be the scope of these pro­grammes. It stressed at the outset the importance which it attached to universality in I.L.O. activities. It concluded that all member States of the Organisation could derive benefit from the technical contribution which the I.L.O. could make to the solution of the various problems facing them, according to the importance and urgency of their requirements and to their degree of development. It considered, however, that the I.L.O. should continue to provide to the developing countries a broader range of services, the nature of which would differ from that of the services rendered to those member States which are economically more advanced.

Content of Specific I.L.O. Programmes relating to Employment and Training

33. On the basis of the proposals and comments before it, the Working Party was of the opinion that the I.L.O. could assist its member States to attain the first two objectives set out in paragraph 21 by undertaking specific pro­grammes which should be concerned with the following aspects: creation and development of productive employment; manpower assessment and planning; manpower services; and training services.

34. The programme concerning the creation and development of productive employment should enable the I.L.O. to give its member States practical assistance in stimulating eco­nomic growth and development, raising levels of living, meeting manpower requirements and overcoming unemployment and underemploy­ment. To this end the I.L.O. should define principles of universal application in order to promote the creation and development of productive employment. It was the I.L.O.'s task to ensure that national manpower policies had due regard to the need to formulate and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment. It should also undertake activities that would enable it to make a practical contribution to the solution of a number of technical problems involved in defining and implementing such an employ­ment policy. Finally, the I.L.O. should con­tinue to give all possible assistance and advice in this field to those who request it.

35. The activities which the I.L.O. will undertake should relate in particular to the following: methods of establishing employ­ment targets within the framework of economic development plans and programmes; methods—particularly labour-intensive methods—of securing a rapid increase in the volume of employment in all sectors where such an increase is likely to speed up economic develop­ment and industrialisation; the role of small industries and rural development within an over-all policy of productive employment and development of skills; the employment of major population groups, such as women and young persons and other cate­gories such as those in non-manual employ­ment, workers of a certain age in need of retraining, older workers and the disabled, the special employment problems created by technological progress, including automation; the social consequences of employment pro­grammes and the means of eliminating any discrimination in the framing and implementa­tion of those programmes. The Working Party noted that employment problems in rural areas in developing countries were of particular importance because the bulk of the population of those countries lives in rural areas and because the extent of unemployment and underemployment in those areas was extremely serious. Moreover, it agreed that the I.L.O. should stress in all its work the implications of increased population pressure for employment policy and the consequent need to create new jobs.

36. The aim of the programme relating to manpower assessment and planning should be to continue to define principles and adopt methods whereby an inventory can be made of manpower needs and resources at all levels of skill and in all sectors of the economy and a forecast made of the probable trends of man­power supply and demand. These studies would be necessary if rational decisions are to be made with respect to the creation of employment, the planning of training, the development of man­power services and, in general, all activities related to the proper utilisation of human resources.

37. The aim of the programme relating to manpower services should be to assist in drawing up the principles and methods to be applied in the utilisation of employment, placement and vocational guidance services, which are essential instruments of any manpower policy, and the various measures for ensuring more effective distribution of manpower and better utilisation of occupational skills. These instru­ments play a particularly important part in an "active" manpower policy.

38. The aim of the programme relating to training should be to assist in defining the principles, policies, programmes and techniques whereby workers at all levels, including senior management personnel in undertakings, can be given the skills which will enable them to carry out their work effectively. They relate to tasks connected with the planning and organisation of vocational training—conceived as an integral part of over-all development policies. The activities undertaken under this programme include the initial training of young persons intending to take up employment, the training, specialisation and further training of workers already in employment, and the retraining and adjustment of manpower in the light of con­stantly changing economic needs. They may be directed to the training of key groups such as management, technical personnel, foremen and instructors. They relate to the develop­ment of new systems and methods whereby workers may acquire more rapidly and at less expense occupational skills of a level equal to those of skills acquired by traditional methods. They may also relate to special techniques and activities for training of the disabled.
Methods of Action

39. The Working Party then reviewed the whole range of methods of action at the disposal of the I.L.O. with particular reference to their applications relating to human resources; in its deliberations on the subject it was made clear that such a review would not prejudice the results of future consideration of proposals concerning the questions of structure and procedures of the Organisation and its various organs.

40. Furthermore the Working Party agreed that the same methods discussed below would be relevant to the implementation of other major programmes; in this report they have been dealt with in terms of their specific role in the human resources field and no attempt has been made to discuss their significance as I.L.O. tools in a wider framework.

41. It goes without saying that these methods—research, technical co-operation, meetings (from the meeting of experts up to the General Conference), standard-setting and the dissemination of information—are interdependent and need to be closely co-ordinated, each contributing to the achievement of the objectives of the major programme.

42. The recent activities of the I.L.O. in respect of the creation and expansion of employment afford an example of the way in which these methods hinge on one another. Research carried out by the Office in this field formed the basis for discussion at a Meeting of Experts on Employment Objectives in Economic Development, convened by the I.L.O. in 1960. On the basis of the report of that Meeting, the Conference in 1961 held a general discussion on employment problems and policies. That discussion had the effect of arousing enhanced interest in problems of employment promotion, facilitating exchanges of views and experience between the delegations, publicising the results throughout the world and preparing the ground for further international action. More detailed research was then carried out by the Office and the findings were widely disseminated by publishing articles and studies. All these activities led up to the comprehensive report prepared for a Preparatory Technical Conference on Employment Policy held in 1963. The work of that Conference prepared the way for the adoption of a Convention and of a Recommendation on employment policy by the General Conference in 1964. Pursuant to a resolution adopted by the Conference in the same year, the I.L.O. is now engaged in concrete action, and I.L.O. experts are at present carrying out missions to various countries in connection with the fixing of employment targets and manpower planning. It need hardly be said that this example of the interdependence of the I.L.O.'s methods of action applies to many other areas of human resources development.

43. Within this range of methods, the function of research is to provide technical support for the other activities. Such research is deliberately directed towards action and its aim is to produce new ideas that can be used in a practical way in the development of the major programme and its component parts. The study and comparison of the experience and problems of countries at various stages of development is of particular importance in this respect since it facilitates the elaboration of appropriate policies and methods. The evaluation, through research, of the results of practical action contributes to the continuing review and adjustment of the policies, programmes and methods applied. Another purpose of research is to place the objectives which the major programme on human resources sets out to achieve in appropriate relationship to the objectives of the International Labour Organisation as a whole. In so doing it must always be guided by the basic principles which underlie all I.L.O. action.

44. Among the technical subjects which at present call for further investigation, mention should be made of some which have particular importance: the determination of employment objectives; the repercussions on employment and training of industrialisation and rural development within the framework of general development policies; selection of techniques for employment creation and promotion; steps to combat unemployment and underemployment among young persons and among special categories such as non-manual workers; techniques for forecasting manpower resources and requirements; the role of manpower services in relation to an active manpower and employment policy; planning of vocational training in all sectors of the economy; development of new training systems and methods, including those relevant to management development, and, in particular, the formulation of training methods adapted to the needs of the developing countries; and comparative studies on the cost of various training systems and on the financing of measures connected with programmes of human resources development.

45. Other types of research, with a broader scope, should also be carried out; for example studies concerning the sociological aspects which influence the implementation of the various measures encompassed in the major programme, the study of the social repercussions of such measures, and the study of all the technical, economic and social problems raised by the harnessing of human resources. The study of methods aimed at producing a multiplying effect should be undertaken within this broader type of research.

46. Technical co-operation is a concrete expression of I.L.O. action, and a wide range of projects has been undertaken in recent years in connection with the different programmes which will be grouped under the major programme of human resources. The major programme in this field may have the following effects.

47. The types of projects which have proved useful will be given a new orientation; they will be better co-ordinated and integrated in a wider framework. For example, projects relating to training in industrial undertakings may be given a new impetus if they are carried out in connection with action relating to further training of management personnel and to organisation of the undertakings concerned.
The effectiveness of this sequence of activities will also be strengthened if they are carried out within the framework of an over-all training policy. Those projects which are only of marginal interest and which are not clearly linked to the objectives of the major programme could be eliminated. Moreover, new projects should be drawn up; for example projects may be undertaken to cover the needs of specific industrial sectors with respect to management development and vocational training at all technical levels; technical services may be established to meet the needs of undertakings of varying sizes, and measures may be adopted to promote co-operative arrangements between these undertakings.

48. Wider use may also be made of the possibilities of establishing systems of regional technical co-operation, for example arrangements for the utilisation of facilities existing in one country of a given region for the training of specialised personnel from other countries in the region. It was also suggested that the human resources aspects of regional economic integration efforts be studied and taken into account in technical co-operation work. Other activities may take the form of the establishment of—or increasing support for—regional research and training institutions such as the Inter-American Vocational Training Research and Documentation Centre (CINTERFOR), the organisation of seminars covering broad questions such as manpower planning methods, and increased participation in the training activities of the regional institutes for economic development.

49. The carrying out of pilot projects is of particular importance and the number of such projects should be increased. Projects of this kind, whether they cover fairly large regions—as in vast rural areas—or are only of limited geographical scope, help to broaden I.L.O. experience, and the results of such experience can be of assistance to all who, throughout the world, wish to benefit from it and to develop new methods of action.

50. Technical co-operation projects could be given a new orientation in the light of other factors. For example the broader scope of the particular programmes of which they form part and the increased importance of the objectives of the major programme will no doubt give rise to activities which are not covered by existing projects. Moreover, the more extensive material resources which it is expected will be placed at the disposal of the Organisation—for example by the United Nations Special Fund or other sources of financing—may add a new dimension to projects already under way. Furthermore, the fact that the developing countries—at least those which have reached a more advanced stage of economic development—will already have acquired appreciable experience and qualified experts may make it possible to devise new arrangements for co-operation under which developing countries, developed countries and international organisations would jointly contribute to the solution of various problems.

51. These changes will conceivably affect the nature of the services provided by the International Labour Office itself. The Office will be able to assist governments at their request, through advisory missions carried out by members of its staff or by I.L.O. experts, to define a human resources policy and draw up programmes of action to implement that policy. Such missions may subsequently lead to the establishment of technical co-operation projects relating to the human resources policy as a whole, to a programme which derives from that policy or to certain activities covering specific aspects. In certain cases, these advisory missions could be carried out in collaboration with other international organisations concerned, under the leadership of the I.L.O.

52. The implementation of a major programme in the field of human resources will require the recruitment and training of suitably qualified experts, who are at present all too rare. This is a serious problem which, if it is not solved, may compromise the success of this programme. Particular attention should therefore be devoted to this matter. Among the obstacles to the recruitment of such experts, mention should be made of the fact that the substantive questions for which the aid of these experts is needed are new problems and that they are raised at the level at which national decisions relating to economic and social development are taken.

53. In providing advice and training to persons recruited to carry out technical co-operation projects in this field, the I.L.O. should devote particular attention to the general social framework within which the complex techniques which are often needed must be placed; it must impress on the persons concerned that they should never lose sight of the fundamental principles on which I.L.O. action is based.

54. The I.L.O. will make the maximum use of the facilities available to it through such bodies as the International Institute for Labour Studies and the International Centre for Advanced Technical and Vocational Training in Turin. These institutions can provide valuable assistance in the implementation of I.L.O. policies and programmes in the field of human resources.

55. The different types of meetings convened by the I.L.O. can make an important contribution to the objectives of the major programme in the field of human resources. The consideration by the General Conference of items submitted for general discussion or with a view to the adoption of new standards has major implications for international and national social policy. The adoption of such standards as the Convention and the Recommendation on employment policy has, by itself, contributed to stimulating member States in readjusting their national policies with a view to creating and developing more productive employment opportunities. Furthermore, the value of technical discussion and exchange of views and experience, as well as of the dissemination of information must be fully recognised.

56. Regional conferences have provided and will continue to provide avenues for the examination of problems and policies relating to the development of human resources in their regional context. Furthermore, technical meetings where experts of the I.L.O. and national specialists would exchange their views and experience on questions relating to human resources in a given region or country would be extremely valuable for the promotion of the major programme. Meetings of the Industrial Committee-type may be increasingly used to discuss sectoral needs and problems. The International Institute for Labour Studies has successfully organised seminars open to experts drawn from governments and management, trade union and academic circles.

57. Other meetings complete the present range of facilities for technical discussion and specialised advice. Thus, expert meetings, such as the meeting of experts on the assessment of manpower requirements for economic development held in 1962, have served to orient the course of I.L.O. action in this field. Similar meetings might be convened on such questions as the assessment of requirements of industrialising countries or the possible direction of vocational guidance and counselling in developing countries. Care must continue to be taken to associate as active participants in such meetings, wherever appropriate, specialists drawn from management and trade union circles.

58. Joint meetings with other organisations can also have a useful function in this programme area, bringing together participants engaged in research and action programmes in countries at various stages of development who are developing new techniques which may be relevant elsewhere. This is also the value of the programme planning and evaluation meetings which the I.L.O. organises from time to time to assist in adapting operational activities to actual needs and available resources, in improving methods of operation, in evaluating progress made and appraising different methods of action.

59. The dissemination of information is another method of action through which the International Labour Office can contribute to the solution of the problems posed by the development and utilisation of human resources. The inclusion, in its various publications, of general and technical studies on these problems, the dissemination of the results achieved under different technical co-operation activities carried out by the I.L.O. and the publicity given to the proceedings of meetings convened to discuss questions relating to human resources all have the aim of reaching specialists, persons with functions at various levels of responsibility in national and international circles and the general public. Thus, all these forms of dissemination of information constitute an indispensable tool for the strengthening of the effectiveness of the Organisation's action.

Planning, Controlling and Evaluating Programmes in the Field of Human Resources

60. The Working Party concluded its review of the major programme on human resources by considering certain matters relating to the internal arrangements within the Office for programme planning, control and evaluation of programmes in this field. In so doing the Working Party reaffirmed its intention of considering the respective roles of the Governing Body and the Conference as the organs responsible for finally determining programmes, controlling their implementation and appraising their results, at the appropriate stage of its proceedings on the occasion of a future session.

61. The new internal procedures for programme development and control and for planning activities in relation to priorities established within the Office are aimed at integrating into a balanced programme proposals being made in response to a continuing assessment of needs. The Director-General informed the Working Party that procedures for quantitative and qualitative evaluation of activities will be introduced as part of the system at a later stage so as to bring about a detailed overview of the organisation of the programme planning targets and to provide elements for the planning of future activities, all as part of a continuing process. The Director-General also informed the Working Party that within the Human Resources Department a number of measures were being taken to integrate hitherto independent activities into a coherent whole; to determine tentative priorities and to plan individual programmes and projects in relation to these priorities; to initiate new programme development; and to evaluate past action.

62. The Director-General recalled that he has under consideration alternative ways of changing the presentation of the budget so as to enable the Governing Body and the Conference to see more clearly the relationships between programmes and the ways in which all I.L.O. resources and methods of action are contributing to their realisation, and also the precise financial consequences of alternative choices between possible I.L.O. activities, the areas in which expansion, revision, reorientation, reduction or elimination may appear to be needed, etc. In his view, a new budgeting procedure of this kind should facilitate the task of the Governing Body and the Conference in fulfilling their respective roles in the development and adjustment of the I.L.O. programme and in determining over-all priorities.

63. The importance of priorities was stressed by the Working Party. Several members made preliminary observations on some of the factors which might be borne in mind in attempting to determine priorities. The Working Party noted these observations and decided that when the appropriate stage was reached in the proceedings the matter should be given very careful examination.

64. Having reviewed the way in which an I.L.O. major programme on human resources might be developed, the Working Party decided to devote its next working session to the consideration of the other proposed major programme areas. It therefore decided to recommend to the Governing Body that its next session should be held in autumn 1965.
and to request the Office to prepare the necessary documentation with a view to facilitating the consideration of the other major programme areas.

ANNEX

Summary of Communications Received on the Proposals concerning the Major Programme Area of Human Resources

This document analyses in summary form the comments and proposals referring to the major programme area of human resources received from governments and from employers' and workers' organisations; these communications relate to the two documents transmitted by the International Labour Office on the instructions of the Governing Body: Action Taken on the Recommendations of the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. (document G.B.160/5/15), and the List by Major Categories of Proposals concerning the Programme and Structure of the I.L.O. (document ORG.32-1, Annex). The numbering of points in the present document follows the numbering in the list by major categories. Numbers in square brackets are used to identify suggestions not directly related to the points in the list.

The present document incorporates all the points made concerning the major programme area of human resources in the comments and observations received by 10 May 1965 from 42 governments, 22 employers' organisations and 18 workers' organisations.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS RELATING TO THE MAJOR PROGRAMME AREA OF HUMAN RESOURCES

In considering the choice of major programme areas for I.L.O. action, the Governments of Argentina, Austria, Denmark, Eastern Cameroon, Ethiopia, Israel, Italy, Japan, Kenya, Malaysia, Peru, Sweden and the United States, the employers' organisations of Canada, Denmark, Italy, Kenya and Norway, and the workers' organisations of Austria, Byelorussia, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland and the United Kingdom express approval, inter alia, of the major programme area of human resources. The Italian Government adds that the three proposed major programme areas are interdependent. The Government of Malaysia considers that the most important area is the improvement of skills and the utilisation of national manpower for economic development, with particular emphasis on developing countries. The Government of Burma supports the view that major programme areas should be flexible enough to include necessary new threats in the fields of manpower and employment policy, training and rural development.

SPECIFIC COMMENTS AND PROPOSALS

116. The Governments of Argentina, Austria, Bulgaria, Eastern Cameroon, Ethiopia, Japan, Kenya, Italy, Syrian Arab Republic, Sweden and Tunisia, the employers' organisations of Ghana, Italy, Norway and Sweden and the workers' organisations of Austria, Denmark, Norway, Peru and the United Kingdom subscribe in general to the view that the strategy of human resources development should concentrate on: (1) better utilisation of the labour force by creating higher levels of productive employment; (2) improving the quality of the labour force by vocational training; (3) enlisted popular support for national development.

The Government of Bulgaria adds a fourth objective—limiting the profits of monopolies. The Government of Kenya stresses that account must be taken of established customs. The Government of Morocco is in general agreement with the suggestions regarding human resources development, so far as in particular that emphasis should be laid on improving the quality of manpower through vocational training and education. The Austrian workers' organisations point out that those objectives are of equal importance, while the Italian employers' organisation would put them in reverse order of priority. The Norwegian workers' organisation considers that acceptance of these objectives should not exclude other activities which from time to time may become necessary. The workers' organisation of Peru considers that full employment and vocational training must be primary objectives and that, in the latter, the Turin Centre can play an important part.

118. The Governments of Ethiopia, Kenya, Morocco and the United Arab Republic and the employers' organisation of Kenya consider that the I.L.O. should study intensively: (1) how employment targets should be fixed; (2) how to speed up the growth of employment in developing countries.

119. The Government of Ethiopia and one workers' organisation of Austria (Osterreichischer Gewerkschafts­ bund) consider that the I.L.O.'s search for employment policies appropriate to development should include the finding of realistic answers to the problem of financing labour-intensive projects.

120. The Governments of Ethiopia, Israel, Kenya, the United Kingdom and the United States, the employers' organisations of Cyprus, Kenya and Uganda and one workers' organisation of Austria (Osterreichischer Gewerkschaftsbund) agree that the I.L.O. should promote manpower planning. The United States Government considers that the I.L.O. should, in cooperation with employment objectives and the development of the vocational training programme to implement and support human development, consider man­ power planning a priority area for the I.L.O.

The United Kingdom Government lists the development of manpower planning machinery as one of four priorities, the others being training, vocational training of supervisors and managers, and the development of employment services. The other governments and employers' organisations mentioned consider that technical assistance should be given in organising courses in manpower planning. The Austrian workers' organisation adds that the I.L.O. should also study labour market statistics and the reduction of unemployment.

SUGGESTIONS ON HUMAN RESOURCES DEVELOPMENT NOT DIRECTLY RELATED TO THE LIST OF PROPOSALS

[1] The Japanese employers' organisation suggests that the Governing Body should consider means of establishing co-operation with the United Nations agencies and policies essential to the formulation of a co-ordinated strategy for the development of human resources in co-operation with the United Nations agencies.

[2] The Governments of Switzerland, Togo, the United Arab Republic and Yemen agree that human resources development programmes should concentrate on the developing countries. The Government of Yugoslavia further considers that there is a need for a clearer view of the interdependence of employment problems and the degree of development, and also of employment and economic relations, both national and international.

[3] The Government of Austria and the Austrian employers' organisations state that full employment must be one of the chief aims of economic and social policy. The Government refers specifically to developing countries; in developing ones the aim must be a higher level of employment, taking into account national conditions.

[4] The Government of Yugoslavia suggests that the I.L.O. should help in framing general employment policies compatible with conditions in the countries concerned.

[5] The Governments of Argentina, Austria, Bulgaria, Kenya, Peru and the United Arab Republic and Yugoslavia, one employers' organisation of Austria (Bundeskammer der gewerblichen Wirtschaft), the employers' organisations of Kenya and Uganda and the workers' organisation of the United Kingdom state that the I.L.O. should, in co-operation with other United Nations agencies, seek to promote higher levels of employment in particular in the African countries. The Government of the U.S.S.R. agrees, although not referring to co-operation with other agencies. The Bulgarian Government points out that the repre­ sentatives of newly independent countries at the Conference made it clear that they wished to be free to develop their economies in general and not be obliged to organise simple manufacturing. The Government of Uganda considers that the I.L.O. should help developing countries to promote industrialisation and manufacturing industries so as to diversify the economy and create employment opportunities. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that it is unrealistic to speak of full employment in developing countries; the problem is to expand employment. The Government of the United Arab Republic adds that the general social and economic philosophy of each country must be respected, while the Yugoslav Government states that there must be a choice of employment and that the aim should be to create effective national institutions. The Austrian employers' organisation adds that all employment measures should be based on economic growth.

6. The Government of Finland believes that the I.L.O. should pay more attention to employment problems at the international level, formulating international conventions and programmes and publicising the adaptability of workers from rural areas to industrial life.

7. The workers' organisation of Belgium considers that the I.L.O. must continue its work in the field of employment policy. It can assist industrialised and developing countries alike. But its main contribution will be to bring member States to consider employment problems at the international level, and to fight unemployment on a world-wide basis.

8. The workers' organisation of Czechoslovakia refers to the development of manpower as a prime requirement for economic advancement.

9. The Government of Israel proposes the establishment of a committee to study the problem of a higher level of employment. States should substitute full employment, including relief employment, for unemployment insurance. The Government further considers that special attention should be paid to the problems of employment of elderly and handicapped persons, including:
   (a) a world-wide drive to stimulate their employment;
   (b) research into possibilities of placement;
   (c) conferences and meetings on the subject;
   (d) establishment of a permanent committee of experts.

10. The Governments of Argentina, Austria, Eastern Cameroon, Kenya and the Syrian Arab Republic, the employers' organisations of Kenya, Uganda and the United Kingdom agree that the work of employers' and workers' organisations of Austria and the United Kingdom is close for the development of employers' and workers' organisations with a policy of social security and manpower planning. The Government of the U.S.S.R. also refers to increased participation by workers in national development and in action to increase employment.

11. The employers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also refers to the problem of employment as one into which the I.L.O. should undertake research. They believe that the I.L.O. should give more attention to helping developing States to build up their economies and raise the standard of living of the workers. Such help should be in the form of expert advice and should be given without any conditions restricting the sovereignty of the nations concerned.

12. The Government of Ghana considers that there should be some flexibility in the basic standards relating to freedom of labour in the light of the needs of developing countries. The Government of Switzerland agrees that the I.L.O. should seek ways of helping countries to overcome the problems which have induced them to resort to compulsory methods of mobilisation of labour. The employers' organisation of Austria states that the I.L.O. should undertake research. They believe that the I.L.O. must continue its work in the field of employment and that the employers' organisation of Greece fully supports the emphasis on training. The workers' organisation of Belgium supports all the proposals relating to training.

124. The Government of Morocco and Switzerland approve the suggestions for short and medium-term action in the training field:
   (1) to train trainers and key personnel;
   (2) to use accelerated methods;
   (3) to keep costs to a minimum.

129. The Government of Israel and the employers' organisation of Cyprus believe that there should be a closer relationship between the I.L.O. and the governments of developing countries. Freedom to offer and accept employment must be fully respected.

Suggestive Proposals on Training Not Directly Related to the List of Proposals

1. The Governments of Denmark, South Africa, Togo and the United Kingdom consider that training is likely to be of a concrete character and should be given with a view to co-operation between governments, employers' associations, workers' organisations and the United Nations. The workers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also mentions training for youth and for adult workers.

2. The Governments of Ghana, Kenya and Yugoslavia suggest that special attention should be paid to youth training facilities. The Japanese employers' organisation does not share this view.

3. The Governments of Ghana, Kenya and Yugoslavia point out that first priority in training should go to the developing countries.

4. The Government of Sweden suggests that priorities in training should be drawn up in respect of more extensive regions than at present.

5. The employers' organisation of the Netherlands and the workers' organisations of Czechoslovakia and the United Kingdom suggest that training should be preceded by a survey of manpower needs and should be organised by co-operation between education authorities, governments and industry; apprenticeship schemes are also desirable.

6. The employers' organisation of the Netherlands and the employers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also mention training for top management. The employers' organisation of the United Kingdom and the employers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also refer to the need for training supervisors, and the Governments also mention training for top management. The employers' organisation of the United Kingdom and the employers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also refer to the need for training supervisors, and the Governments also mention training for top management. The employers' organisation of the United Kingdom and the employers' organisation of the U.S.S.R. also refer to the need for training supervisors, and the Governments also mention training for top management.
general technical education so as to help solve the problems of industrialisation and automation.

[9] The Government of Israel suggests that, in developing countries, attention should be given to the training of women in light handicrafts so as to attract them to gainful employment.

[10] The Government of the United Arab Republic considers that the I.L.O. should establish training centres in connection with development projects in developing countries so as to improve the quality of the workers' organisation.

[12] The Governments of the Syrian Arab Republic and the United Arab Republic express the hope that workers from the developing countries will be given priority at the Turin Centre. The Government of Italy also points to the potential value of the Centre for these countries.

132. The Governments of Israel, Italy, the United Arab Republic and the United States, the Swedish employers' organisation and the workers' organisations of Norway and the United Kingdom agree on the need for a vigorous practical programme in the field of technological change and automation, but the United Kingdom workers' organisation emphasises the importance of overlapping with the work of other organisations must be avoided. The United States Government, the Swedish employers' organisation, one Austrian workers' organisation (Österreicher Gewerkschaftsbund) and the workers' organisation of Belgium express general approval for the programme in the field of automation at present being developed or proposed by the I.L.O. The Government of Israel believes that the I.L.O. should concentrate on the labour and social consequences of automation and should organise a special research programme on partial low-cost automation in small industries. The Government and the employers' and workers' organisations of Denmark agree that the I.L.O. should study automation but suggest that the subject should not have high priority, as automation is not yet an urgent question for the developing countries. The Government of Poland considers that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation dissents from this suggestion. The Japanese employers' organisation rejects the suggestion that developed countries in which automation is increasing should be urged to confine themselves to the production of sophisticated manufactures. The Government of Japan suggests that the I.L.O. should draw on the work of the O.E.C.D. concerning the theory and practice of manpower policy. The Japanese employers' organisation rejects the suggestion that the I.L.O. should concentrate on the armed forces should not be used for civilian work except in emergencies.

134. The Government of Switzerland considers that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

135. The Government of Switzerland considers that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

137. The Government of Switzerland considers that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

138. The Government of Switzerland considers that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

139. The Japanese employers' organisation agrees that a full understanding of the problems and consequences of full employment for developed and developing countries should be secured through the I.L.O.

140. The Government of Poland considers that the main task of the I.L.O. is to guarantee fully the right to work, and consequently the Government agrees that the I.L.O. should concentrate on the eradication of mass unemployment. The Government of Sweden expresses the hope that the I.L.O. should deal with the expansion of international trade and stable prices for raw materials. The workers' organisation of Burma states that the I.L.O. should seek the most effective means of helping governments to deal with mass unemployment. The employers' organisations of Italy and Japan oppose the suggestion that the I.L.O. should deal with the expansion of international trade and the stabilisation of prices for raw materials.

141. The employers' organisations of Italy and Japan do not favour the establishment of a world agency for economic planning.

142. The Japanese employers' organisation does not consider that the creation and maintenance of full employment in relation to automation should be achieved by: (1) a reduction in hours of work with no reduction in earnings; (2) an extension of the period of school attendance. The employers' organisation of Japanfavours a lowering of the age of retirement.

143. The employers' organisations of Japan and Norway dissent from the view that, in order to absorb unemployment and raise living standards, developing countries should be assisted to industrialise and to become active exporters of usually advantageous trade transactions with other States.

144. The Government of Poland considers that labour-intensive projects should be emphasised in developing countries faced with unemployment. (See also point 119 above.)

145. The Japanese employers' organisation rejects the suggestion that developed countries in which automation is increasing should be urged to confine themselves to the production of sophisticated manufactures.

146. The Japanese employers' organisation rejects the suggestion that the I.L.O. should concentrate on the armed forces should not be used for civilian work except in emergencies.

147. The Governments of Bulgaria and Burma consider that national training courses should meet the needs of national development plans and should be organised preferably in the countries concerned. The Japanese employers' organisation dissents from this suggestion. The Government of Bulgaria adds that this was the view expressed by the majority of the developing countries at the Conference.

148. The Governments of Cyprus and Israel believe that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

149. The Governments of Bulgaria and Burma consider that national training courses should meet the needs of national development plans and should be organised preferably in the countries concerned. The Japanese employers' organisation dissents from this suggestion. The Government of Bulgaria adds that this was the view expressed by the majority of the developing countries at the Conference.

150. The Governments of Cyprus and Israel believe that the time is probably not ripe for an international instrument on automation. The Government of Italy believes that standard-setting on particular aspects may be desirable but that an over-all instrument would be premature. The Government of Poland considers that an instrument on automation and technological change and measures to deal with them. However, the United Kingdom workers' organisation adds that this is a part of its activities in this field. The Government of Japan suggests that consideration might be given to meetings of experts on the social and economic consequences of automation. The employers' organisation of Uganda states that research into automation must not be at the expense of technical assistance.

151. The Governments of Bulgaria and Burma consider that national training courses should meet the needs of national development plans and should be organised preferably in the countries concerned. The Japanese employers' organisation dissents from this suggestion. The Government of Bulgaria adds that this was the view expressed by the majority of the developing countries at the Conference.

152. The Government of Burma favours the suggestion that the I.L.O. should take the initiative of convening, in co-operation with the United Nations and other organisations concerned, a world conference on training for development.

153. The employers' organisation of Japan does not think that the question of overpopulation should be studied by the I.L.O. or placed on the agenda of the Conference. On the other hand, the employers' organisation in Uganda considers the problem of population growth important in connection with the raising of living standards.

154. See point 124.

155. See point 129. The employers' organisation of Japan does not agree that the I.L.O. should concentrate especially on the training of young persons.

(2) Statement on Behalf of the Appeals Board concerning the Procedure to Be Followed by the Board.

The Appeals Board has requested that the following statement be issued on its behalf. By a letter dated 4 June 1963 the President of the 49th Session of the International Labour Conference forwarded to the Board the requests concerning the composition of committees submitted to him by the Employers' delegates of Bulgaria, Byelorussia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Rumania, U.S.S.R. and Yugoslavia, which were transmitted to the Board by the International Labour Conference on 4 June 1965.\(^1\)

The Board has decided to follow the same procedure as did the Boards in the years 1959 to 1964 in discharging the responsibility entrusted to it by the Conference. There are two considerations to which it must attach decisive importance.

The first consideration is that the delegate lodging an appeal and the group against which an appeal is made should be treated on a footing of complete equality in the procedure of the Board and should have an opportunity of making the grounds for the appeal or the decision appealed against, as the case may be, known to the Board.

The second consideration is that the proceedings should be sufficiently expeditious to permit of the decision of the Board becoming effective at as early a stage of the Conference as possible.

In the light of these considerations the Board has decided that it will, in reaching its decision, take into account any statement which may be submitted to it in writing by 10.30 a.m. on Saturday, 5 June 1965, by any of the appellants or by the group of the Conference concerned.

The Board has before it the text of the decision taken by the Conference on 8 June 1959, together with the report of the Committee to Consider the Improvement of the Practical Methods of Working of the International Labour Conference, the relevant majority and minority reports of the Credentials Committees of the 37th to 48th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, the report of the Committee on Freedom and Independence of Employers' and Workers' Organisations, and the debates in the plenary sittings of the 37th to 48th Sessions of the International Labour Conference concerning these reports and concerning the composition of committees and the report of the Secretary-General's representative on the official meetings of employer's group held on 2 and 3 June 1965. It does not propose to consider any other documentation or evidence except any statements in writing which may be submitted by the appellants or the group against whose decision the appeal is made.

The Board will announce its decision at an earlier date after the opening of the Conference than in previous years.

3. The Board elected as Chairman Mr. M. K. Vellodi.

4. The Board, like the Board of the past two years, has had the statement as to the procedure to be followed by the Board issued on its behalf prior to its meeting, thus avoiding the necessity of holding a preliminary meeting of the Board for this purpose and enabling the Board to draw up its report at a meeting held at an earlier date after the opening of the Conference than in previous years.

5. In all other respects the Board decided to follow the same procedure as did the Boards in the years 1959 to 1964 in discharging the responsibility entrusted to it by the Conference. There are two considerations to which it must attach decisive importance.

6. The first consideration is that the delegate lodging an appeal and the group against which an appeal is made should be treated on a footing of complete equality in the procedure of the Board and should have an opportunity of making known to the Board the grounds for the appeal or the decision appealed against, as the case may be.

7. The second consideration is that the proceedings should be sufficiently expeditious to permit of the decision of the Board becoming effective at as early a stage of the Conference as possible.

8. In the light of these considerations the Board decided that, in reaching its decision, it would take into account any statement which might be submitted to it in writing by 10.30 a.m. on Saturday 5 June 1965, by any of the appellants or by the group of the Conference concerned.

9. Such a statement was received from Mr. Domínguez Oceja, Employers' delegate, Cuba. The Chairman of the Board has also received a statement on the matter addressed by the Chairman of the Employers' group to the President of the Conference.

10. In addition to these statements the Board has studied the text of the decision taken by the Conference on 8 June 1959, together with the report of the Committee to Consider the Improvement of the Practical Methods of Working of the International Labour Conference, the relevant majority and minority reports of the Credentials Committee of the 37th to 48th Sessions of the International Labour Conference.

\(^2\) See Second Part, p. 76.
Labour Conference, the report of the Committee on the Freedom and Independence of Employers’ and Workers’ Organisations, the debates in the plenary sittings of the 37th to 48th Sessions of the International Labour Conference concerning these reports and concerning the composition of the committees, and the report of the Secretary-General’s representative on the official meetings of the Employers’ group held on 2 and 3 June 1965. It has not considered any other documentation or evidence.

11. With respect to the appeals submitted to it, the Board has before it the statement addressed to the President of the Conference on 5 June 1965 by the Chairman of the Employers’ group.

12. The Chairman of the Employers’ group begins by recalling that the large majority of the Employers’ group do not recognise the Employers’ group held on 2 and 3 June 1965. The Appeals Board having decided, in previous years, that it was not called upon to inquire into the validity of the decision on the part of the Conference by which it was established, he confines himself to emphasising that the large majority of the Employers’ delegates consider that the system adopted, which empowers a Board constituted of persons external to the Conference to give decisions, which are not subject to appeal, concerning the functioning of the Conference, is in contradiction with the right of every delegate to vote individually on all matters which are taken into consideration by the Conference (article 4 of the Constitution). This procedure, which was adopted in 1959 by a small majority, has, in their view, dealt a serious blow to the principle of tripartism, which is the basis of the International Labour Conference.

13. Nor does he ask the Appeals Board to pronounce either on the definition of the term "employer", as understood in the Constitution of the I.L.O., or on the powers of certain delegates, as there exists a special procedure for this purpose. The attitude of the majority of the Employers’ group towards the representatives of regimes whose economies are entirely state-controlled, he says, is well known and it is not necessary to refer to it further.

14. The Chairman of the Employers’ group states that, leaving aside these problems, as well as the question of the constitutionality of the decision taken by the Conference on 8 June 1959, he wishes to base his position precisely on this decision, which laid down the following principle on the basis of which the Board shall examine appeals which are presented to it: "The Conference has the duty to ensure equality of treatment for all members attending the Conference. Specifically this principle applies to the question of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference."

15. With regard to participation in the work of committees, such equality of treatment is ensured by the provisions of paragraph 2 of Part II of the decision referred to above, which provides that: "Every delegate making application to his group for membership of a committee shall be placed on the list of members of that committee."

16. It cannot be denied, says the Chairman of the Employers’ group, that all the delegates who have asked to participate in a committee have been placed on the list of members of that committee by the secretariat of the group, and this on a footing of complete equality, as is clear from the Annex to the second report of the Selection Committee. Now, by virtue of article 96, paragraph 5, of the Standing Orders of the Conference, all the members of the committee have the same rights and the same possibility of participating in the work of the committee, with the exception of the right to vote. Year after year, he says, this does not seem to be understood by certain complainants.

17. It is necessary, continues the Chairman of the Employers’ group to draw a definition between participation in the work of a committee and the exercise of the right to vote, that is to say, having the status of a titular member. The right to vote, he declares, unlike the simple act of belonging to a committee, does not belong automatically to every delegate who may have expressed a desire to have this right accorded to him as such, as the authors of the complaints appear to think. It is simply the exercise of a mandate conferred by the group to which the delegate belongs. Paragraph 3 of Part II of the decision of the Conference provides, indeed, that the Conference, on the recommendations of the Conference groups, will decide in respect of each committee how many and which members of each group in the committee shall have the right to vote, which implies, a contrario, that certain members may not have this right.

18. In reality, declared the Chairman of the Employers’ group, the attribution of the right to vote to certain members of committees by the Conference, on the recommendation of their group, must be regarded as a delegation of powers on the part of the group in question to a limited number of persons authorised to represent the group on a particular question in the event of a vote.

19. How, in these circumstances, does the principle of equality of treatment apply? It certainly does not, in his view, give any particular delegate a right to be appointed ipso facto a voting member the moment that he shows a desire to have this right accorded to him. Such a procedure would in no sense be in the nature of an election and would deprive of all meaning the previous decision of the Conference or of the groups as regards the number of voting members in each committee. On the other hand, he considers, the principle of equality of treatment makes it obligatory to place all candidates on the same footing before the group and to make the final choice by means of the democratic procedure which makes it possible to ensure that the Employers’ members in a committee may vote validly on behalf of their group.

20. The Chairman of the Employers’ group considers that the democratic character of the procedure followed is confirmed by the report of the Representative of the Secretary-General on the meetings of the Employers’ group held on 2 and 3 June 1965. This year, in order to manifest more clearly this democratic character, the Employers' group decided unanimously at its meeting on 3 June to adopt a procedure of voting by secret ballot. The appellants, he says, have made no objection to the adoption of this procedure which guarantees to all the members of the group complete freedom and absolute independence in choosing candidates. The minutes of the elections annexed to the report in question show that, as in previous years, it was by a very large majority that the Employers' group decided to refuse to accord to the appellants the right to vote in the name of the group.

21. It is true, concludes the Chairman of the Employers' group, that in previous years the Appeals Board has taken the view that regularity of procedure alone does not guarantee in fact substantive equality of treatment. He says that it may be asked, in these circumstances, what procedure should be adopted and what significance should be attached to the term "elections".

22. The only new considerations raised on this occasion by the Chairman of the Employers' group is the fact that voting in the Employers' group for the election of voting members of committees was, this year, by secret ballot. The reason for adopting this course, he states, was to manifest more clearly the democratic character of the procedure followed by the Employers' group.

23. The Board fully recognises that voting by secret ballot represents an improvement in that it is a further measure for ensuring regularity of procedure. The Board does not consider, however, that this in any way invalidates the principle by which it has always been guided that regularity of procedure alone does not guarantee and has not in fact secured substantive equality of treatment. This principle does not imply, however, that any candidate who has not been elected may claim that he has been a victim of inequality of treatment. The question is one of fact and, on the facts, the Board is satisfied that the applicants have not, in fact, been accorded such equality of treatment. Regularity of procedure alone does not guarantee, and has not in fact secured, substantive equality of treatment.

24. The Board has noted the contention made this year, as in previous years, that the attribution of the right to vote to certain members of committees must be regarded as a delegation of powers on the part of the group concerned. This is not a matter which the Board considers it proper to examine. This issue was considered and decided by the Conference when it took its decision to establish the Board by the terms of which decision the Board is bound.

25. Previous Boards have taken the view that they were not called on to undertake the task of defining the term "employer" in the Constitution of the I.L.O. The present Board finds itself in agreement with its predecessors that this question does not fall within its competence. By direction of the Conference the function of the Board is to consider appeals relating to participation in committees and to deal with the individual cases referred to it without prejudice to any other issue.

26. The Conference has defined the principle on the basis of which the Board is to consider appeals in the following terms:

The Conference has the duty to ensure equality of treatment for all members attending the Conference. Specifically this principle applies to the question of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference.

27. The appellants contend that the failure of the Employers' group to give them places on committees is a violation of this principle.

28. The principle which the Board is called upon to apply by the decision taken by the Conference is that of equality of treatment for all members of the Conference in respect of full participation in the work of the committees of the Conference. In the view of the Board the decisive factor is that the appellants have not, in fact, been accorded such equality of treatment. Regularity of procedure alone does not guarantee, and has not in fact secured, substantive equality of treatment.

29. The Board has accordingly, in pursuance of the responsibility placed upon it by the Conference, determined as follows:

(1) Mr. Plechač, Employers' delegate, Czechoslovakia, and Mr. Polyakov, Employers' delegate, U.S.S.R., shall be added to the voting section of the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

(2) Mr. Kazantsiev, Employers' delegate, Byelorussian S.S.R., and Mr. Olteanu, Employers' delegate, Rumania, shall be added to the voting section of the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.

(3) Mr. Bogacki, Employers' delegate, Poland, and Mrs. Peeva, Employers' delegate, Bulgaria, shall be added to the voting section of the Committee on Women Workers.

(4) Mr. Polyakov, Employers' delegate, U.S.S.R., shall be added to the voting section of the Committee on Agrarian Reform.

(5) Mr. Domínguez Oceja, Employers' delegate, Cuba, and Mr. Tucaković, Employers' delegate, Yugoslavia, shall be added to the voting section of the Committee on Cooperatives.

30. The decision taken by the Conference provides that the decisions of the Board shall be final and shall be put into effect by the Conference without debate.

31. In accordance with section III, paragraph 3, of the proposals relating to the procedure for the appointment of committees by the Conference, adopted by the Conference on 8 June 1959, if the Board decides that one or two delegates shall be added to the voting section of his or their group or groups in a committee, the Conference shall make the necessary arrangements to preserve the equality of voting strength among the three groups in the committee.

32. Under the system of voting in force in committees of the Conference the number of votes of each member of the committee depends on the number of members of his group in the voting section of the committee.

33. While it is for the Conference to make the necessary arrangements to preserve equality of voting strength among the three groups in each committee, the Board has noted that such equality can be maintained by the application of the normal practice of the Conference of adjusting the voting power of the members of each group on the basis of the number of members of the group.

34. For the convenience of the Conference the Board has requested and included in its report the figures for each committee of the Conference as resulting from its decisions. These figures are as follows:

35. The Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations now consists of 56 Government voting members, 14 Employers' voting members and 28 Workers' voting members. In order to preserve equality of voting strength, it will be necessary to multiply each Employers' member’s vote by four and each Workers' member’s vote by two, the entire voting strength of each group thus amounting to 56.

36. The Committee on Employment of Young Miners now consists of 35 Government voting members, 20 Employers' voting members and 25 Workers' voting members. In order to preserve equality of voting strength, it will be necessary to multiply each Government voting member’s vote by 20, each Employers' voting member’s vote by 35 and each Workers' voting member’s vote by 28, the entire voting strength of each group thus amounting to 700.

37. The Committee on Women Workers now consists of 60 Government voting members, 27 Employers' voting members and 40 Workers' voting members. In order to preserve equality of voting strength, it will be necessary to multiply each Government voting member’s vote by 18, each Employers' voting member’s vote by 40 and each Workers’ member’s vote by 27, the entire voting strength of each group thus amounting to 1,080.

38. The Committee on Agrarian Reform now consists of 66 Government voting members, 26 Employers' voting members and 36 Workers' voting members. In order to preserve equality of voting strength, it will be necessary to multiply each Government voting member’s vote by 78, each Employers' voting member’s vote by 198 and each Workers' member’s vote by 143, the entire voting strength of each group thus amounting to 5,148.

39. The Committee on Co-operatives now consists of 72 Government voting members, 35 Employers' voting members and 48 Workers' voting members. In order to preserve equality of voting strength, it will be necessary to multiply each Government voting member’s vote by 70, each Employers' voting member’s vote by 144 and each Workers' voting member’s vote by 105, the entire voting strength of each group thus amounting to 5,040.

APPENDIX XII

Resolutions Adopted by the Conference

(1) Resolution concerning Paid Educational Leave, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.¹

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the development of modern society, which is largely conditioned by scientific and technological progress both in industrialised and in developing countries, calls for new and ever-widening knowledge which cannot be provided solely through initial general schooling and vocational training, and that it is therefore desirable to promote for the workers appropriate continuing education to facilitate their adjustment to contemporary occupational, educational and civic requirements,

Noting that such education enables workers in the developing countries to participate more effectively in the task of economic and social development of their countries and constitutes a positive contribution to the implementation of economic and social development plans,

Noting that some countries have already made progress towards providing a measure of paid educational leave for workers,

Noting that workers who are dependent on their wage or salary, to the extent that they do not yet benefit from paid educational leave, must either sacrifice free time intended for recreation or forgo the possibility of continuing their education, and that it is therefore in their interest that new forms of further education be developed and encouraged;

1. Calls on the governments of all States Members of the International Labour Organisation as well as on the employers' organisations and trade unions to take effective action by statutory means, through collective agreements or any other means, according to national practice, towards ensuring the access of workers to various types of paid educational leave, as distinct from holidays with pay for recreational purposes, in order to give them the opportunity and incentive to acquire the further education and training which they need to carry out their duties at the workplace and assume their responsibilities as members of the community.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to compile information concerning legislative and collective agreement provisions and other arrangements relating to paid educational leave, existing in the States Members of the International Labour Organisation, as well as the methods employed in such States to ensure to workers who benefit from educational leave compensation for wages or salary lost.

3. Invites the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake surveys in the light of the above-mentioned studies with a view to the adoption by the International Labour Conference of an international instrument concerning paid educational leave.

(2) Resolution concerning the Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.²

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that in a number of member countries, both developed and developing, domestic workers in many cases are either not protected at all or only insufficiently by legislation or other provisions concerning their working and living conditions,

Considering the urgent need to provide for domestic workers in all member countries the basic elements of protection which would assure to them a minimum standard of living, compatible with the self-respect and human dignity which are essential to social justice,

Considering that in many member countries a considerable lack of experience exists in establishing minimum standards of working conditions in domestic employment,

Considering that as early as 1936 an International Labour Organisation committee dealing with holidays with pay adopted a resolution calling upon the Governing Body to place on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the conditions of employment of domestic workers,

Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the 31st (1948) Session of the International Labour Conference requesting the Governing Body to consider the advisability of placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of the status and employment of domestic workers,

Considering the conclusions of the Meeting of Experts on the Status and Conditions of Employment of Domestic Workers which was held from 2 to 6 July 1951, in accordance with the decisions of the Governing Body adopted at its 112th (Geneva, June 1950) and 113th (Brussels, November 1950) Sessions,

Considering the resolution concerning the conditions of employment of domestic workers adopted by the Second African Regional Conference of the International Labour Organisation (Addis Ababa, 30 November to 11 December 1964) inviting the Governing Body to request the Director-General to undertake studies and research on the problems of domestic workers with a view to improvement of their living and working conditions;

1. Urges member States to make all practicable efforts to promote the introduction of protective measures for domestic workers, such as hours of work and other conditions of employment, as well as the training of such workers in accordance with International Labour Organisation standards.

2. Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—
   (a) to request the Director-General to intensify studies and research on the problems of domestic workers in both rural and urban areas, directing particular consideration to the problems of women workers;
   (b) to request the member States to make available to the Office a comprehensive report on the legal provisions pertaining to domestic workers in their respective countries;
   (c) to consider convening a second meeting of experts including, among others, participants from employers' and workers' organisations, to examine, inter alia, the possibility of drafting a model contract or a code of guiding principles for the protection of the working and living conditions of domestic workers;
   (d) to consider, on the basis of the above studies and research, placing on the agenda of an early session of the Conference the question of conditions of employment of domestic workers with a view to the adoption of an international instrument.

(3) Resolution concerning Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.¹

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Recalling the provisions of the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955,
Reaffirming the importance of the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons,
Considering the progress in mechanisation and automation since the adoption of the above Recommendation,
Considering that this progress should affect the methods and techniques of training disabled persons;
Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to—
   (a) request member States to furnish reports to the Director-General on their law and practice in regard to the matter dealt with in the Recommendation with a view to consideration of the matter by the Committee on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations;
   (b) request the Director-General of the International Labour Office to collect and disseminate information on the measures and techniques employed by member States in the rehabilitation and training of disabled persons for new forms of employment;

(c) request the Director-General, in the light of the above, to consider at an appropriate moment the convening of a meeting of experts, including, among others, persons from workers’ and employers’ organisations, in order to study the problem in the light of new developments.

(4) Resolution concerning the Industrial Activities of the International Labour Organisation, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.¹

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Considering that lasting peace can be established only if it is based on social justice,

Considering that social justice both at national and international levels cannot be achieved without closely associating workers’ and employers’ organisations with policy and decision-making dealing with social and economic development,

Considering that at the international level the International Labour Organisation provides the only forum within the framework of the United Nations family in which the representatives of workers and employers enjoy equal status with those of governments,

Considering that on the basis of its structure and in accordance with the aims and purposes as formulated in its Constitution and in the Declaration of Philadelphia the International Labour Organisation is the United Nations agency best equipped for promoting social progress throughout the world,

Considering that the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field, their results and the experience gained have proved to be of basic value for the over-all activities of the Organisation and very often indispensable for its activities in the field of technical co-operation and standard-setting,

Considering the great contribution which the Industrial Committees and analogous bodies have made to the activities of the Organisation in the industrial field,

Considering that the particular social problems of a number of industries and sectors of employment as well as of the public services have not yet been adequately covered by International Labour Organisation action,

Considering that particular industrial problems may arise and require International Labour Organisation action in certain regions of the world, both developing and industrialised,

Considering that it is necessary for the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation that the International Labour Office should at all times strive to be abreast of developments in the industrial field, including the public service, and of research into industrial matters, and disseminate the information so obtained, and also initiate such additional studies as may be necessary,

Considering the need of making the activities of the International Labour Organisation in the industrial field more effective;

Invites the Governing Body, when reviewing the programme and structure of the International Labour Organisation, to request, as appropriate, the Director-General and/or the Working Party of the Governing Body on the Programme and Structure of the Organisation, to—

(1) devote particular attention to practical measures which would lead to the strengthening of International Labour Organisation activities in the industrial field;

(2) review the activities of Industrial and analogous Committees with a view to making them more effective, inter alia, by improving the methods of preparation and presentation of reports, the functioning of the meetings and the follow-up of their conclusions;

(3) study the most appropriate ways and means through which the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation could best contribute to the successful implementation of the over-all programme of the International Labour Organisation, for example in the field of standard-setting and technical co-operation, as well as in specific regions of the world;

(4) consider the convening of tripartite and/or bipartite meetings, as appropriate, both for the private and public sectors, to review the situation in the light of the needs and social and economic problems of industries and branches of occupation which have not yet been dealt with by the International Labour Organisation, and to consider the desirability of establishing a joint committee to deal with the problems of the public service;

(5) consider the possibility of setting up a tripartite advisory committee and/or utilising other appropriate means to examine the problems of small-scale industry and handicrafts, particularly in developing countries;

Appendix XII : Resolutions Adopted by the Conference

(6) ensure that sufficient staff is allocated to keep under continuing study and disseminate information concerning social problems arising out of economic and other developments in the major industries and sectors of employment, in order that the industrial activities of the International Labour Organisation may be carried out effectively.

(5) Resolution concerning the Carrying Out by the International Labour Organisation of Studies of the Social and Economic Consequences of Disarmament, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.¹

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Convinced that economic and social progress is closely bound up with the preservation and consolidation of peace,

Recognising the immense importance of an agreement on disarmament for the preservation of peace and the achievement of more rapid progress in the economic and social fields for the benefit of mankind,

Fully sharing the hope expressed by the General Assembly in its resolution 1908 (XVIII) and by the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development that the governments of all States will intensify their efforts to achieve an agreement on general and complete disarmament under effective international control, in accordance with the Joint Statement of Agreed Principles for disarmament negotiations, and to achieve agreement on measures which could serve to reduce international tension, lessen the possibility of war and facilitate agreement on general and complete disarmament,

Considering that studies of the economic and social aspects of disarmament, which might serve as a basis for the formulation of principles and methods for determining a policy of economic and social reconversion, could be of primary importance for the improvement of the welfare of workers and that this places a particular responsibility on the International Labour Organisation in this field,

Taking account of the information provided by the Director-General concerning the progress of international studies, including studies undertaken by the International Labour Office for and in collaboration with the Economic Commission for Europe, as well as activities aimed at securing a fuller knowledge of the social and economic consequences of disarmament, and the decisions which have already been taken by the International Labour Organisation concerning this problem,

Having regard to the agreement reached in the Administrative Committee on Co-ordination concerning the preparation of concerted programmes of work and the co-ordination of all studies of the economic and social consequences of disarmament carried out by the United Nations, the specialised agencies and the International Atomic Energy Agency, and the establishment for that purpose of the Inter-Agency Committee,

Welcoming the statement made by the Director-General concerning the intention of the International Labour Organisation to provide the fullest possible co-operation in the implementation of that agreement,

Taking account of the fact that the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, in its resolution 1026 (XXXVII) of 11 August 1964, recommended that the activities of the United Nations family of organisations relating to the economic and social consequences of disarmament should be continued and accelerated as far as possible,

Taking account of the report on the economic and social consequences of disarmament (document E/3898 of 3 July 1964 and its addenda) submitted by the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the 37th Session of the Economic and Social Council;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General—

(1) to continue to work closely with the Inter-Agency Committee with a view to the inclusion in the concerted programme of studies on the economic and social consequences of disarmament of such proposals as may in his judgment be appropriate for studies on that subject and which are directly within the field of competence of the International Labour Organisation;

(2) to prepare for the information of the Governing Body a report on the work already done by the International Labour Organisation in the field of the economic and social consequences of disarmament;

(3) to keep the General Conference and the Governing Body informed of the work of the International Labour Office in this field and of the activities of the Inter-Agency Committee.

(6) Resolution Condemning the Government of Portugal on the Grounds of the Forced Labour Policy Practised by the Said Government in Territories under Its Administration, Submitted by the Resolutions Committee.¹

(Adopted on 23 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Whereas the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation provides that universal and lasting peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice and that the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries,

Whereas the International Labour Conference has adopted the Forced Labour Convention, 1930, and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957,

Whereas the Government of Portugal has ratified these Conventions,

Whereas the United Nations and the International Labour Organisation Ad Hoc Committee on Forced Labour in 1953 and the Commission appointed by the Governing Body in 1961 in accordance with article 26 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation have, after finding that these Conventions are not fully applied, made recommendations concerning the measures which should be taken by the Government of Portugal to give full effect to the provisions of these Conventions,

Noting the United Nations General Assembly resolution 1819 (XVII) of 1962, which has affirmed, inter alia, that the economic life of Angola is to a large extent based on forced labour;

1. Reaffirms its condemnation of forced labour and all practices involving the use of forced labour.

2. Urges that the necessary action be taken to put an end to these practices, which are contrary to the principles of the International Labour Organisation.

3. Requests the Government of Portugal to give effect without delay to the recommendations of the 1962 Commission of Inquiry of the Governing Body, particularly in so far as they relate to forced labour practices and the sequels of forced labour.

4. Requests the Director-General and the Governing Body to keep the matter under review and to take any appropriate measures to ensure that these recommendations are or shall be implemented and to report to it at an early session.

(7) Resolution concerning the Employment of Young Persons on Surface Work in Mines and Quarries, Submitted by the Committee on Employment of Young Miners.²

(Adopted on 21 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Noting that the Conventions and Recommendations concerning the employment of young persons in underground work in mines of all kinds specifically exclude coverage of young people employed in open-cast mines, open quarries and similar operations,

Considering that such operations may involve risks to the safety and health of young persons which are similar to those encountered in work underground in mines;

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office—

(1) to have a study made of the employment conditions of young persons employed in open-cast mines, open quarries and similar operations; and

(2) to consider the inclusion of this question in the agenda of a future session of the International Labour Conference.

(8) Resolution concerning Periodic Review of the Effects of the Recommendation concerning the Employment of Women with Family Responsibilities, Submitted by the Committee on Women Workers.³

(Adopted on 21 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation—

Invites the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to request the Director-General to review at regular intervals to be determined by the Governing Body, the first review to be made not later than 1975, the effects of the Recommendation concerning the employment of women with family responsibilities, in accordance with article 19, paragraph 6 (d), of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation, with a view to deciding on further action within the International Labour Organisation to redefine the role and status of women in the world of work in realistic relation to the changing pattern of employment opportunities for all workers.

(9) Resolution on Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects, Submitted by the Committee on Agrarian Reform.¹

(Adopted on 22 June 1965)

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Recalling the solemn obligation of the International Labour Organisation under its Constitution to concern itself with the problems of all workers in countries at all stages of development,

Recognising that, as regards the rural sector, the International Labour Organisation is called upon to deal with all categories of workers, whether wage-paid, semi-independent or self-employed,

Bearing in mind the resolution concerning the contribution of the International Labour Organisation to the raising of incomes and living conditions in rural communities, with particular reference to countries in the process of development, adopted at the 44th (1960) Session of the Conference, which led to the establishment of the International Labour Organisation Rural Development Programme,

Recalling the various resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly of the United Nations, and in particular resolution No. 370 (XIII) of the Economic and Social Council of 7 September 1951 which, among other things, recommended "that governments institute appropriate land reforms in the interests of landless, small and medium farmers" and that governments take measures to "provide opportunity for the cultivator to acquire ownership of land" and "take legislative or administrative measures to assist in the reduction of agricultural indebtedness",

Bearing in mind that agrarian reform is an essential factor in rural development and that many aspects of the latter affect agrarian reform, such as the stabilisation of the prices of primary agricultural products and an improvement in the terms of trade of agriculture and the provision of adequate resources for the development of the rural sector,

Bearing in mind, on the one hand, that the complexity of the problems is far beyond the field of action of any one single international agency and on the other hand the nature and scope of the concerted international action programme in the field of agrarian reform and the need for International Labour Organisation activities to be undertaken in full co-ordination and collaboration with the other international agencies concerned, particularly the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations,

Having examined the report on Agrarian Reform, with Particular Reference to Employment and Social Aspects;

Adopts the following resolution setting forth, with particular reference to employment and social aspects, the nature, scope and objectives of agrarian reform, and the measures to achieve these objectives, as well as suggestions for intensifying and strengthening International Labour Organisation action.

A. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

General Considerations

1. Agrarian reform should be considered as denoting comprehensive measures for the improvement of the agrarian structure, including changes in land tenure, that is, reforms that, within the framework of broad programmes, tend to give land to those who work it, improve the position of tenants, hired workers and other categories of agricultural workers, or enlarge the units of cultivation or operation and consolidate fragmented holdings. It also includes the establishment or strengthening of essential governmental or other agencies or services relating to agricultural credit, supply, marketing, training and extension and research. So conceived, the ideal agrarian reform is an integrated programme of measures designed to eliminate obstacles to economic and social development arising out of defects in the agrarian structure, and in particular may be considered as a positive means of providing for a dignified existence, ensuring security of employment, increasing productivity and real incomes, reducing cost of production and raising levels of living in the countryside.

2. Agrarian reforms are thus designed to improve agricultural production and levels of living of the rural population by correcting major defects in the agrarian structure which have been described as being "the uneconomic size of farms; the maldistribution of land ownership with concentration of large estates insufficiently utilised and the landlessness of a large part of the rural population; fragmentation of holdings; the high rents and insecurity of tenure characteristic of many tenancy systems; indebtedness and lack of adequate credit facilities for the small farmer; absence of settled title to land and water; plantation economies which offer low wages and no share in management to the cultivators; ... and in general an unsatisfactory set of incentives for a rising and sustained agricultural production" (see United Nations: Land Reform: Defects in Agrarian Structure as Obstacles to Economic Development (New York, 1951)).

3. Agrarian reforms are therefore essential for the evolution of an agrarian structure favouring the production of more food and fibre to feed and clothe the rapidly growing population, to provide other raw materials for industry and to permit agriculture to make its proper contribution to economic and social development while raising levels of living in the countryside. To achieve these goals agrarian reforms must lead to the removal of social injustice and economic inefficiency, the abolition of the remnants of feudalism and the exploitation of man by man and the misuse of land.

4. No one approach to agrarian reform is of universal application. The objectives of agrarian reform and the measures to be taken to achieve these objectives and the priorities to be established in this respect must take full account of the physical, economic, social, cultural and political conditions prevailing in each country and of the extent to which existing systems of tenure provide adequate social protection to the workers concerned and permit efficient farming.

Objectives of Agrarian Reform (with Particular Reference to Social and Employment Objectives)

5. It should be the object of policy in each country to effect basic adjustments in land tenure and related institutions and structures having, in so far as their social and employment aspects in particular are concerned, the objectives listed below, the priority to be attached to the various objectives depending on conditions in each country:

(a) promoting the widest possible access to land through appropriate and progressive systems of land tenure which provide security of employment and of livelihood as well as opportunities and incentives for economic and social progress to the agricultural population;

(b) correcting large inequalities in the distribution of income, in land ownership and in socio-political status;

(c) ensuring that agricultural holdings are of sufficient size to permit efficient farming, the earning of adequate incomes and the full use of labour and of managerial ability;

(d) encouraging increased agricultural production and improvement in agricultural methods and ensuring that a fair share of the benefits resulting therefrom accrues to the agricultural population;

(e) encouraging the full development of the capacities of the agricultural population and leading to the recognition that farming is a skilled profession and that there is dignity in agricultural work;

(f) ensuring adequate employment, levels of income and living conditions for all elements of the agricultural population;

(g) promoting the fuller and more effective utilisation of rural human resources, whether in agricultural or non-agricultural employment;

(h) providing an adequate institutional structure to favour agricultural and rural development in general;

(i) enabling the rural sector to make a maximum contribution to general economic and social development, while at the same time participating fully in this development, and promoting the bringing of the subsistence sector into the exchange economy.

Measures to Achieve These Objectives.

6. In adopting measures to achieve these objectives particular consideration should be given, in accordance with priorities to be established in each country in the light of its particular conditions, to those referred to in the following paragraphs and which concern primarily social and employment aspects of agrarian reform.

7. An equitable distribution of land ownership—and, where necessary, of rights to water—should be promoted. With respect to land, this might be achieved by such means as the setting of ceilings of individual ownership of land, the acquisition —under such financial arrangements as may be provided by the national legislation—of land in excess of such ceilings and of holdings not fulfilling a social purpose, and the introduction of fiscal policies discouraging private ownership of excessively large holdings.

8. Where water resources are very limited, their control and conservation should be recognised as a primary duty of the government. The basic principle for an integrated national water policy should be that governments should determine the development and use of water as fully as may be required. Water resources should not be the private property of any individual interest for free and unrestricted exploitation, but should be regarded as a national resource to be used in the national interest.

9. The fuller and more intensive use of land should be encouraged through such means as the development and settlement of unused public land and of new lands and the introduction of measures favouring efficient land use. The settlement of new lands should not be considered a substitute for basic agrarian reforms in areas already settled.

10. Land made available through such means as those listed in paragraphs 7 and 9 should be distributed to agricultural workers free of charge or at a reasonable price with due consideration given to their ability to pay. Criteria for the determination of beneficiaries should be established. The holdings to be allocated should be of sufficient size to ensure adequate levels of income and the full utilisation of the labour of the beneficiary and of his family.

11. To facilitate measures relating to the distribution and settlement of land, provision should be made for adequately planned land surveys and the registration of titles.

12. The settlement of agricultural populations on new land should be carried out in an orderly and legal manner and the necessary communications facilities and social, educational and technical services should be provided. Measures should be taken to avoid unplanned and unorganised land settlement and to improve such forms of settlement where they prevail.

13. In areas where shifting cultivation is common, or other resource-depleting practices prevail, agrarian reforms should include the progressive introduction of productive and soil-conserving systems of farming.

14. Appropriate safeguards should be introduced to ensure against undue sale or subdivision of holdings made available to individuals under agrarian reform and land settlement programmes. In any case, measures should be envisaged to safeguard against the division of holdings into uneconomic-sized units. Arrangements might be made for granting firm titles in land only after a specific period and on condition that the beneficiary fulfils certain specified obligations, including particularly the practice of good husbandry.

15. Where appropriate, the consolidation of fragmented holdings as well as the enlargement or grouping of very small holdings should be encouraged through the promotion of co-operatives or in accordance with national policy. The public authority should make available grants or other financial assistance to meet major capital costs involved in the process. Especially in areas where rural underemployment and unemployment prevail, local labour resources should be used to the greatest extent possible for carrying out works programmes related to consolidation, using community development and similar approaches wherever appropriate.

16. Provision should be made for improvements in the conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers. General principles with respect thereto should be established by the competent authority in consultation with occupational organisations where they exist, and provision should be made for written contracts to the extent practicable, for adequate duration of leases, for permissible causes for tenant eviction, for the determination of equitable rents and for compensation for improvements. Machinery should be provided for the settlement of disputes and for the enforcement of the regulations. Special provision should be made for categories of agricultural workers not covered by either tenancy or labour legislation.

17. Personal services and other practices restricting the liberty of the individual should be abolished.

18. Regulations should be introduced and effectively enforced for improving conditions of employment of wage earners in agriculture. Particular attention should be given to the establishment of systems for collective bargaining and of appropriate machinery for the fixing of minimum wages in agriculture.

grammes. Training should cover general orientation for living in a new environment as well as improved agricultural methods and management related to production, marketing, the use of credit, etc., to prepare the beneficiaries for their role as independent farmers. Special credits should be set aside for training activities and the assignment of personnel for this purpose in the budgets of agrarian reform programmes.

20. Priority should also be given to the training of personnel responsible for the implementation of agrarian reform measures, especially at the local level. Particular attention should be given to the training of lower level personnel, such as local extension agents and practical instructors for the training of beneficiaries. Conditions of employment of agricultural instructors and other personnel in rural areas should be improved so that more and better-qualified staff may be available for assignment to agrarian reform and land settlement programmes. Handbooks and other teaching materials should be adapted to the needs of the countries concerned, and arrangements made for the exchange of such materials among countries having a common language and similar social and economic conditions.

21. High priority should be given to the establishment of efficient marketing systems and other means to ensure that the farmer may find a ready outlet for his produce and to guarantee him stable and remunerative prices on the domestic and international markets. Similarly, efficient distribution systems should be established to bring agricultural products to the consumer at reasonable prices.

22. The organisation and improvement of systems of short- and long-term credit at reasonable rates for productive purposes should be encouraged. Particular attention should be given to systems of supervised credit which combine the extension of credit with technical guidance on its sound use and training and improved agricultural methods, but which should not hamper the farmer in exercising his initiative and taking his responsibilities. Appropriate measures should be taken to relieve agricultural indebtedness and to prevent abuse connected therewith.

23. The special contribution which various forms of co-operatives can make to the successful implementation of agrarian reforms and to the improvement in the levels of living of the beneficiaries should be recognised. These include, among others, suitable voluntary systems of joint land use, savings and credit co-operatives, co-operatives for production, supply, distribution, marketing, for the utilisation and maintenance of machinery, and other services. For the sound growth of co-operative activities institutional arrangements should be made for supervision, for extension services to co-operatives, for systematic training programmes for co-operative office bearers and personnel, as well as for education of members of co-operatives and diffusion of co-operative principles and working methods among the rural population.

24. Special measures should be adopted to protect the interests in land of indigenous and tribal populations in accordance with the provisions of the Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107), and Recommendation, 1957 (No. 106), adopted by the International Labour Conference. These populations should benefit on an equal footing with other sectors of the agricultural population from agrarian reform measures, including land settlement projects. Special measures should be adopted where appropriate, after full consultation with their democratically elected representatives, to assure to indigenous and tribal groups adequate land, taking account of the future growth in their numbers as well as the requirements of soil conservation. Particular attention should be devoted to problems arising out of adjustments in communal tenures as well as to those arising out of transition from tribal to other forms of tenure in line with requirements of economic and social development. Appropriate safeguards to protect the interests of the groups concerned should be taken. Arrangements in areas inhabited by indigenous and tribal groups involving unpaid personal services should be established. In countries with significant nomadic groups consideration should be given to measures aimed at facilitating the establishment of nomads as settled cultivators or stock-keepers or in non-agricultural employment, under conditions which will provide them with opportunities for security and adequate levels of income.

25. Social security measures should make no distinction between wage earners in agriculture and in industry, and it should be the aim of policy to extend adequate and appropriate social security benefits to cover all categories of agricultural workers, including independent and semi-independent workers, as a part of and co-ordinated with general programmes for increasing economic security and improving conditions of life in rural areas. Provisions with respect to benefits should take full account of the particular needs of the agricultural population. In planning the financing of such measures due account should be taken of the special difficulties arising out of low levels of income in agriculture, and appropriate measures should be taken to prevent the indebtedness of agricultural workers from being inferior to that provided for the rest of the population. While the ultimate objective should be the introduction of a comprehensive programme of social security covering a wide variety of risks, this should not prevent the initiation of more limited measures designed to meet the most pressing needs.

26. As an additional measure of providing income security to the agricultural population, systems of crop and livestock insurance should be promoted to protect against natural and marketing hazards which may result in substantial or total loss to the cultivator of his income and his investment in capital and labour. The introduction of co-operative crop and livestock insurance should be encouraged to the fullest extent.

27. Appropriate administrative machinery should be established for the implementation and enforcement of agrarian reforms. Representatives of the various groups of the population concerned with such machinery, especially at the local level, including bona fide representatives of employers' and workers' organisations where these exist, should be actively associated therewith. Adequate publicity should be given to agrarian reform measures, and care should be taken to ensure that all pertinent legislative enactments, regulations and information material are issued in languages fully understood by the populations concerned.

28. Agrarian reform measures should make provision for the setting up of procedures for objective and, if appropriate, independent evaluation of progress achieved. To the extent that this is possible, the evaluation should be current and continuous so that weaknesses or defects may be identified immediately and arrangements made for the earliest possible adjustment of the measures relating to the reform.

29. As a means of providing additional opportunities for employment, particularly in developing countries where unemployment and underemployment in the rural sector are serious problems, agrarian reform should be carried out with due regard to the employment objectives of national economic policy. The diversification of agriculture should be encouraged where conditions permit, so as to make fuller use of the farmer's labour and to increase his income. Similarly, strenuous efforts should be made to expand all feasible non-farm employment opportunities in rural areas, including primary processing, viable handicrafts and small-scale industries. To the greatest extent possible, local workers should be employed, making the most effective use of scarce capital, in construction and other activities associated with agrarian reform and land settlement programmes, and designed to benefit the rural population as a whole. Similarly, local labour should also be employed on public works programmes in rural areas to build up the infrastructure. In devising such measures for expanding employment opportunities in rural areas, use should be made of community development techniques whenever appropriate. Workers should be assisted in taking advantage of any employment opportunities that might develop in other economic activities. Appropriate training programmes should be organised to give the workers concerned the necessary skills required for the different occupations mentioned above.

30. For the effective formulation and implementation of agrarian reform measures, special importance should be attached to promoting the development of agricultural associations, especially peasants' and tenants' organisations and trade unions, so as to enable them to participate in the elaboration of agrarian reform programmes as well as to give expression to and defend the interests of these various categories of agricultural workers, and to contribute to the general objectives of development.

31. The competent authority should undertake programmes for general improvement in living conditions in rural areas and the provision of various facilities and amenities, making full use of the community development approach.

32. It should be the objective of national policy to promote a proper balance between agriculture and industry in such a way that each may contribute to and benefit from development in the other. Employment policy in particular should be formulated with these considerations in mind.

33. Appropriate safeguards should be applied to ensure that the relevant international labour Conventions and Recommendations are observed in the process of agrarian reform programmes, in particular those concerned with conditions of employment, minimum wage-fixing machinery and vocational training in agriculture, the rights of association of agricultural workers, and freedom from forced labour.

B. ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS CONCERNING THE TRAINING OF BENEFICIARIES OF AGRARIAN REFORM AND OF PERSONNEL REQUIRED FOR THE EFFECTIVE IMPLEMENTATION OF SUCH REFORMS

General Principles

34. The implementation of any programme of agrarian reform, including land settlement projects, depends on the availability of qualified personnel during the planning, initiation and implementation stages, and adequate provision for training of such personnel should be made.
35. The competent authority should include in the budgets for agrarian reform programmes adequate provision for the payment of the staff, including extension agents, necessary for the implementation of the programme as well as for the training of future personnel, the number of whom will necessarily increase as the projects develop.

36. Budgetary provision should also be made for the training of beneficiaries of agrarian reform measures in order to enable them better to face the various problems which will confront them.

37. The training programme for beneficiaries and for technical personnel alike should take account of—

(a) the physical environment in which the agrarian reform is to be undertaken;
(b) the general policy of the government with respect to food and agriculture as it affects the type of agrarian structure and method of cultivation to be introduced, the crops and livestock to be produced and the relations between cultivators and between the latter and the State.

Persons to Be Trained

Beneficiaries of Agrarian Reform.

38. The beneficiaries of agrarian reform measures, including land settlement projects, should receive adequate training, taking due account of the background of the beneficiaries on the one hand, and of the environment to which they may need to adapt themselves on the other. The important role of an agricultural extension service should be recognised.

39. The training to be given should concentrate in the first place on improving agricultural methods so as to permit those who receive land under agrarian reform to obtain as rapidly as possible adequate returns from their holding. It should also include training in farm management such as to assist those beneficiaries in adapting themselves to passing from the status of share-cropper or hired worker to that of independent farmer. Where necessary, the training should also provide general orientation with respect to the new areas in which the beneficiaries may have to live.

40. Careful consideration should be given to the place in which the training should take place. Depending on individual circumstances, training might be given either in the area in which the beneficiaries are to be established or at appropriate centres.

41. Consideration should be given to the advantages of establishing beneficiaries in homogeneous groups so as, on the one hand, to make it easier for the group to adapt itself, and, on the other hand, to facilitate the training process.

Personnel Required for the Implementation of Agrarian Reforms.

42. The personnel to be trained include both those concerned with the planning of agrarian reform measures and those responsible for their implementation. The former, having generally already received higher education, should primarily receive —through short courses, seminars and the diffusion of reports on agrarian reform measures in other countries—general orientation on the problems arising in the implementation of agrarian reforms and the different approaches used in different countries.

43. The staff called upon to implement agrarian reform measures should be available on a permanent basis to ensure that the programmes are effectively carried out. These technicians, who will for the most part be specialists in certain fields, should be given special training so that they may adapt their knowledge to the specific requirements of the reform measure being introduced. Special attention needs to be devoted to the selection of such personnel, particularly as concerns their ability to adapt themselves rapidly to new conditions and to living under difficult conditions.

Methods of Training

44. The training of beneficiaries should be essentially practical and have reference not only to basic training in agricultural methods, but also to training them to bring their holdings rapidly under cultivation. For practical training particular consideration should be given to agricultural extension methods and to the setting-up of demonstration plots, preferably on the holding of one of the beneficiaries. The training should also cover those elements necessary for the preparation of the beneficiaries for living in newly established communities. It would be particularly desirable to give the beneficiaries general education in co-operative organisation in order to enable them to understand the use of co-operative methods and properly to run the associations they may set up.
45. In the training of technical personnel consideration should be given to the following:

(a) all available institutions for education and training in agriculture should be orientated towards training a sufficient number of personnel with the necessary qualifications at all levels. Particular attention should be given to the practical training of personnel in direct contact with the cultivators, such as extension agents. Such personnel should be available at the very early stages of implementation to assist cultivators in establishing themselves and thus help to avoid early mistakes which may jeopardise the future of the projects;

(b) as one means of obtaining rapidly the necessary training personnel, consideration should be given to providing complementary training to technicians, including extension agents, already having basic training, so that they may be assigned to agrarian reform projects;

(c) particular consideration should be given to the organisation of refresher courses for all personnel concerned with the implementation of agrarian reform measures such as to enable them to keep abreast of recent developments and new techniques or approaches.

C. ADDITIONAL CONCLUSIONS ON THE ROLE OF CO-OPERATIVES IN AGRARIAN REFORM

46. In view of their importance as a means of promoting general economic and social progress, of directly associating the rural population with the development process and because of their educational and cultural value, co-operatives should be considered as having a vital role to play in programmes of agrarian reform.

47. Co-operatives should be used as a means of assessing the problems and interests of the rural population for the planning and preparation of agrarian reform measures. They should also serve for channelling information among agriculturists and making the purposes, principles and methods of such reforms understood.

48. Co-operatives should be promoted to facilitate the implementation of agrarian reform measures, to contribute to the achievement of the aims and objectives of such reforms and to ensure that in the long run there is substantial improvement in the living and working conditions of the beneficiaries.

49. Particular attention should be paid to the development of appropriate forms of co-operatives adapted to given local conditions and to the various patterns and phases of agrarian reform. They should, by all means available, enable cultivators to operate holdings efficiently and productively and allow for the greatest possible initiative and participation of the membership.

50. Where appropriate, suitable voluntary forms of co-operative land use should be encouraged. Their activities may range from the organisation of certain services and farming operations in common to the complete pooling of land, labour and equipment.

51. Where appropriate, the voluntary consolidation of fragmentary holdings through co-operatives should be encouraged.

52. In cases where measures are being envisaged for the transfer of ownership or division of large estates, due consideration should be given to the organisation of co-operative systems of holding and/or cultivation. At the same time, adequate provision should be made for the supply of services and technical guidance to those who work the land.

53. The establishment of co-operatives should also be considered in connection with land settlement schemes, especially as regards land reclamation and improvement measures and the organisation of joint services and farming operations for settlers.

54. Development of thrift and credit co-operatives and co-operative banks should be encouraged among the beneficiaries of agrarian reforms as well as among other small farmers for the purpose of—

(a) providing loans to cultivators for the purchase of equipment and other farm requisites;

(b) encouraging and assisting cultivators to save and accumulate capital;

(c) advancing loans to, and promoting thrift among, especially, those agricultural families, including hired workers, who normally would not have access to established sources of credit;

(d) facilitating the implementation of special governmental credit schemes through an efficient channelling of loans to beneficiaries and appropriate supervision of the use made of such loans and timely reimbursement.
55. The development of supply, marketing or multi-purpose co-operatives should be encouraged for the purpose of—
(a) the joint purchase and supply of farm requisites of good quality on favourable terms;
(b) the supply of basic domestic requirements for all categories of agricultural workers;
(c) the joint conditioning, processing and marketing of agricultural products.

56. Wherever possible, supply, credit and marketing functions should be linked so that the members may benefit to the maximum extent both in economies in the purchase of requisites and from higher proceeds from the sale of produce. This may be achieved either through setting up multi-purpose co-operatives or through membership in several specialised co-operative societies.

57. Encouragement should be given to the development of co-operatives providing farmers with other services contributing to an improvement in methods of farming and in the economic and social status of the agricultural population. Such institutions might include those relating to the joint use of farm machinery, electrification, livestock breeding, the provision of veterinary and pest-control services, facilities for irrigation, crop and livestock insurance, etc.

58. With a view to improving employment opportunities, working conditions and income, landless agricultural workers should be assisted, where appropriate, to organise themselves voluntarily into labour-contracting co-operatives.

59. Where appropriate, agricultural co-operatives in the reform zones should be encouraged to form federations to engage in such activities which their local associations could only perform at higher cost or not at all.

60. Due consideration should also be given to the encouragement and development of other types of co-operative activities providing for full- or part-time non-agricultural employment for members of beneficiaries' families (e.g. crafts, home or cottage industries), adequate distribution of consumer goods and social services which the State may not always be in a position to provide (viz. health, education culture, recreation, transport).

61. To permit co-operatives of the various types to play their full role in agrarian reform, the competent authority should pay special attention to—
(a) the framing and application of appropriate co-operative legislation, rules and by-laws;
(b) the establishment of competent promotional agencies;
(c) the provision of adequate technical guidance;
(d) the training of promoters, co-operative office bearers and staff, as well as the systematic education of members in co-operative principles and working methods;
(e) the provision of adequate sources of credit for co-operatives.

62. The interchange and dissemination of information on co-operative structures, their setbacks and achievements related to agrarian reform should be encouraged by all possible means so that the experience acquired may be made available to the largest possible number of countries.

D. ACTION BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION

63. In the spirit of the concerted international action programme and in keeping with prevailing practice and existing co-ordinating machinery, the suggested International Labour Organisation activities indicated below—in the fields of study and research, technical co-operation and standard-setting and related activities—should be undertaken in full co-ordination of work and appropriate collaboration with the other agencies concerned, especially the United Nations and the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations.

Studies and Research

64. In the various studies and research activities of the International Labour Organisation in such fields as those relating to rural employment, rural training, co-operatives, handicrafts and small-scale industries and indigenous and tribal populations, due attention should be given to problems concerning changes in agrarian structure.

65. To the greatest extent possible, research should include field investigations, including the use of case studies, where appropriate.
66. The widest use should be made of the work of research bodies in member countries. Where appropriate, arrangements for active collaboration with national, regional and international research bodies should be envisaged.

67. Priority should be given to practical research activities which can help governments in dealing with the many complicated problems related to agrarian reforms, particularly with respect to implementation. Studies should contain quantitative data wherever possible and appropriate. The International Labour Organisation, along with the other agencies concerned, should act as a clearing-house for information on relevant aspects of agrarian reform and related matters.

68. Particular attention should be given to the following subjects:

(a) the impact of agrarian reforms on employment, incomes, production, productivity and living conditions in rural areas; the social effects of structural and technological changes in rural areas and the implications of such changes in the rural sector on employment in the urban sector and vice versa;

(b) the nature, causes and effects of rural-urban and other migratory movements of rural workers;

(c) practical measures for promoting the fuller utilisation of human resources in rural areas;

(d) the influence of changes in agrarian structure on part-time farming, particularly with respect to implications in relation to employment and levels of living;

(e) living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers and measures to improve them; establishment of standard terminology in the official languages of the International Labour Organisation in respect to these;

(f) factors encouraging or restricting vertical social mobility among the agricultural population;

(g) social, cultural and economic factors in changes in land tenure and land settlement, with particular reference to those leading to success and failure;

(h) problems arising out of adjustment in communal or tribal tenures, including the sedentarisation of nomadic and semi-nomadic groups;

(i) selected patterns of organising production in rural areas, especially in relation to the problem of uneconomic-sized holdings;

(j) various types of co-operatives and analogous organisations for production, supply, marketing and services in agriculture and in small-scale industries, including new avenues and forms of co-operative action of a promising nature; institutional changes in the organisation of marketing, processing and credit needed to ensure maximum benefits to agricultural workers from the point of view of employment, income and incentives;

(k) the role of local councils and occupational and other voluntary organisations in rural areas, and ways and means of encouraging their development and their active participation in promoting rural progress;

(l) employment impact of community development programmes;

(m) methods and organisation of training programmes designed for—
   (i) beneficiaries of land redistribution and land settlement programmes and of other programmes to improve conditions of agricultural workers,
   (ii) personnel responsible for implementing such programmes at the local level;

(n) factors related to the acceptance of improved techniques among farmers, obstacles to the diffusion of such knowledge and how these may be overcome;

(o) methods of evaluation of the social and employment effects of agrarian reforms and related rural development measures.

Technical Co-operation

69. In collaboration where appropriate with other international organisations concerned, and especially the United Nations, the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations and the World Food Programme, the International Labour Organisation should assist governments requesting such aid in the formulation and execution of comprehensive and integrated programmes of agrarian reform, particularly with respect to—

(a) the introduction of appropriate measures to correct defects in the agrarian structure, in order to ensure an increase and a more equitable distribution of income in agriculture, and to promote the security of employment and of livelihood and to enhance the dignity of agricultural workers of all categories;

(b) the preparation and drafting of appropriate legislation for the protection of agricultural workers of all categories and for its effective application and enforcement;
(c) the establishment of appropriate government services responsible for the improvement of conditions of life and work of agricultural workers of all categories and generally for social and economic progress in rural areas;

(d) the planning and implementation of land settlement projects which increase agricultural production and provide additional employment opportunities and means of livelihood, ensuring that spontaneous land settlement is carried out in an orderly and legal manner;

(e) the implementation of programmes for promoting the fuller and more diversified utilisation of human resources in rural areas (in agriculture, in related occupations, in handicrafts and small-scale industries, in construction work, etc.);

(f) the organisation of appropriate systems of vocational training in connection with agrarian reforms, including land settlement projects, so as to develop and improve skills in agriculture and in rural crafts and to enable improvements to be made in agricultural equipment, in housing and in rural community construction;

(g) implementing comprehensive and multi-purpose rural development and community development projects in conjunction with agrarian reforms, including those aimed at integrating indigenous and tribal groups into the economic and social life of the nation;

(h) promoting the development of various forms of co-operative organisation in rural areas and the training of the necessary co-operative personnel at all levels;

(i) assisting in the practical introduction of price arrangements with a view to ensuring remunerative prices to the primary producer.

Standard-Setting and Related Activities

70. The Conference recommends to the Governing Body to place on the agenda of the 51st and following sessions of the International Labour Conference, as a follow-up to the item already included in the agenda of the 49th Session in 1965, the question of agrarian reform as regards those aspects within the competence of the International Labour Organisation, after consultation with the United Nations and the specialised agencies concerned, especially the Food and Agriculture Organisation of the United Nations, with a view to the preparation of appropriate instruments, including an item on the subject of the improvement of the living and working conditions of tenants and share-croppers and similar categories of agricultural workers, 71. The Conference further requests the Governing Body to give consideration to action by the International Labour Conference on appropriate aspects of the role of co-operatives in agrarian reform and the training of beneficiaries of agrarian reforms and of the personnel required for the effective implementation of such reforms.

72. The Conference further requests the Governing Body to continue to take every opportunity of bringing before the International Labour Conference, regional conferences, and technical and other meetings organised by the International Labour Organisation, the importance of measures being taken to improve agrarian structures and other structures which affect rural development and to introduce related institutional adjustments such as to promote social justice.

73. Consideration should also be given, whenever appropriate, to the review and possible revision of international standards concerning all categories of rural workers with a view to improving the effectiveness of such standards in promoting the economic and social well-being of these workers.

Recommendation 123

(1) Recommendation concerning the Employment of Women with Family Responsibilities.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and Noting the fact that in many countries women are working outside their homes in increasing numbers as an integral and essential part of the labour force, and Noting further that many such women have special problems arising out of the need to reconcile their dual family and work responsibilities, and
Noting that many of these problems, though they have particular relevance to the opportunities for employment of women workers with family responsibilities, also confront other workers and can be substantially alleviated by measures affecting all workers, such as the progressive reduction of daily and weekly hours of work, and Noting further that many of the special problems faced by women with family responsibilities are not problems peculiar to women workers but are problems of the family and of society as a whole, and Recognising that continuous social adaptation is required to meet these problems in a manner consistent with the best interests of all concerned, and
Aware of the need for governments and for all public and private organisations concerned to give consideration to these problems in a broad social, economic and legal context, and
Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to the employment of women with family responsibilities, which is the fifth item on the agenda of the session, and Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this twenty-second day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Employment (Women with Family Responsibilities) Recommendation, 1965:

The Conference recommends that each Member should apply the following provisions as fully and as rapidly as national conditions allow:

I. General Principle

1. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, and in accordance with national and local needs and possibilities—
   (a) pursue an appropriate policy with a view to enabling women with family responsibilities who work outside their homes to exercise their
Recommandation 123

1) Recommandation concernant l'emploi des femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales.

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1965, en sa quarante-neuvième session ;
Constatant que, dans de nombreux pays, les femmes travaillent en nombre toujours croissant en dehors de chez elles et font partie intégrante de la population active dont elles constituent un élément essentiel ;
Constatant que beaucoup de ces femmes ont à faire face à des problèmes particuliers par suite de la nécessité de concilier leur double responsabilité, familiale et professionnelle ;
Constatant que nombre de ces problèmes, tout en affectant particulièrement les possibilités d'emploi des travailleuses ayant des responsabilités familiales, concernent aussi les autres travailleurs et que des mesures touchant l'ensemble des travailleurs — telles que la réduction progressive de la journée ou de la semaine de travail — peuvent y remédier dans une large mesure ;
Constatant, en outre, que beaucoup des problèmes particuliers rencontrés par les femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales ne concernent pas seulement les femmes qui travaillent, mais également leur famille et la société dans son ensemble ;
Reconnaissant qu'une adaptation sociale continue est nécessaire afin de résoudre ces problèmes au mieux des intérêts de chacun ;
Consiente de la nécessité où se trouvent les gouvernements et toutes les organisations publiques et privées intéressées de vouer leur attention à ces problèmes dans un large contexte social, économique et juridique ;
Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à l'emploi des femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales, question qui constitue le cinquième point à l'ordre du jour de la session ;
Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation, adopté, ce vingt-deuxième jour de juin mil neuf cent soixante-cinq, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur l'emploi des femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales, 1965 :

La Conférence recommande aux Membres d'appliquer les dispositions suivantes, aussi pleinement et aussi rapidement que les conditions nationales le permettront.

I. PRINCIPE GÉNÉRAL

a) poursuivre une politique appropriée visant à permettre aux femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales, qui travaillent en dehors de chez right to do so without being subject to discrimination and in accordance with the principles laid down in the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958, as well as in other standards relating to women adopted by the International Labour Conference; and

(b) encourage, facilitate or themselves undertake the development of services to enable women to fulfil their various responsibilities at home and at work harmoniously.

II. PUBLIC INFORMATION AND EDUCATION

2. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, take appropriate steps—

(a) to encourage such consideration of the problems of women workers with family responsibilities as may be necessary to help these workers to become effectively integrated in the labour force on the basis of equal rights;

(b) to undertake or promote such research as may be necessary and feasible into the various aspects of the employment of women workers with family responsibilities with a view to presenting objective information on which sound policies and measures may be based; and

(c) to engender broader public understanding of the problems of these workers with a view to developing community policies and a climate of opinion conducive to helping them to meet their family and employment responsibilities.

III. CHILD-CARE SERVICES AND FACILITIES

3. With a view to determining the scope and character of the child-care services and facilities needed to assist women workers to meet their employment and family responsibilities, the competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, and within the scope of their resources for collecting information, take such measures as may be necessary and appropriate—

(a) to collect and publish adequate statistics on the number of mothers engaged in or seeking employment and on the number and age of their children; and

(b) to ascertain, through systematic surveys conducted more particularly in local communities, the needs and preferences for child-care arrangements organised outside the family.

4. The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, take appropriate steps to ensure that child-care services and facilities meet the needs and preferences so revealed; to this end they should, taking account of national and local circumstances and possibilities, in particular—

(a) encourage and facilitate the establishment, particularly in local communities, of plans for the systematic development of child-care services and facilities; and

(b) themselves organise as well as encourage and facilitate the provision of adequate and appropriate child-care services and facilities, at reasonable charge or free in case of need, developed along flexible lines and meeting the needs of children of different ages and of their working parents.

5. With a view to safeguarding the health and welfare of the child—

(a) child-care services and facilities of all types should comply with standards laid down and supervised by the competent authorities;
elles, d'exercer leur droit à le faire sans être exposées à aucune discrimination et conformément aux principes établis tant dans la convention concernant la discrimination (emploi et profession), 1958, que dans les autres normes adoptées par la Conférence internationale du Travail et intéressant les femmes ;

b) encourager, faciliter ou assurer elles-mêmes l'établissement de services qui permettent aux femmes de remplir harmonieusement leurs diverses responsabilités familiales et professionnelles.

II. INFORMATION ET ÉDUCATION DU PUBLIC

2. Les autorités compétentes, en collaboration avec les organisations publiques et privées intéressées — notamment les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs — devraient prendre des mesures appropriées :

a) pour que l'on voue l'attention nécessaire aux problèmes des travailleuses ayant des responsabilités familiales, afin de les aider à s'intégrer effectivement et à égalité de droits dans la population active ;

b) pour entreprendre ou encourager toutes recherches qui seraient nécessaires et qui pourraient être menées à bien sur les divers aspects de l'emploi des travailleuses ayant des responsabilités familiales, en vue d'obtenir des informations objectives sur lesquelles puissent se fonder des politiques et des mesures efficaces ;

c) pour amener le public à mieux comprendre les problèmes de ces travailleuses afin de susciter, au sein de la collectivité, une ligne de conduite et un courant d'opinion qui contribuent à les aider à s'acquitter de leurs responsabilités familiales et professionnelles.

III. SERVICES ET INSTALLATIONS DE SOINS AUX ENFANTS

3. En vue de déterminer l'ampleur et la nature des services et installations de soins aux enfants nécessaires pour aider les travailleuses à s'acquitter de leurs responsabilités familiales et professionnelles, les autorités compétentes, en collaboration avec les organisations publiques et privées intéressées — notamment les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs —, et compte tenu des ressources dont elles disposent pour réunir des informations, devraient prendre toutes mesures nécessaires et appropriées :

a) pour réunir et publier des statistiques suffisamment complètes sur le nombre des mères de famille ayant un emploi ou en quête de travail, ainsi que sur le nombre et l'âge de leurs enfants ;

b) pour déterminer, par des enquêtes systématiques effectuées plus particulièrement au sein des collectivités locales, quels arrangements sont nécessaires, et préférés, lorsqu'il s'agit d'assurer les soins aux enfants en dehors de la famille.

4. Les autorités compétentes, en collaboration avec les organisations publiques et privées intéressées, devraient prendre toutes mesures appropriées pour que les services et installations de soins aux enfants correspondent aux besoins et aux préférences ainsi révélés ; à cette fin, elles devraient notamment, selon les conditions et les possibilités nationales et locales :

a) encourager et faciliter l'établissement, notamment dans les collectivités locales, de plans visant au développement méthodique de services et installations de soins aux enfants ;

b) assurer elles-mêmes, ainsi qu'encourager et faciliter l'organisation, en nombre suffisant et sur une base appropriée, de services et installations fournissant des soins aux enfants, à un prix raisonnable, ou gratuitement en cas de besoin, selon des modalités souples et de manière à répondre aux besoins des enfants d'âges divers et des parents qui travaillent.

5. En vue de protéger la santé et le bien-être des enfants :

a) les services et installations de soins aux enfants, de quelque type qu'ils soient, devraient être conformes à des normes établies par les autorités compétentes et être contrôlés par celles-ci ;
Appendix XIII : Authentic Texts

(b) such standards should prescribe in particular the equipment and hygienic requirements of the services and facilities provided and the number and qualifications of the staff; and

(c) the competent authorities should provide or help to ensure the provision of adequate training at various levels for the personnel needed to staff child-care services and facilities.

6. The competent authorities should, with the co-operation and participation of the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, help to ensure public understanding and support for efforts made to meet the special needs of working parents in respect of child-care services and facilities.

IV. ENTRY AND RE-ENTRY INTO EMPLOYMENT

7. The competent authorities should take all measures in accordance with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964, and the Employment Policy Recommendation, 1964, to enable women with family responsibilities to become or to remain integrated in the labour force as well as to re-enter the labour force.

8. With a view to enabling women with family responsibilities to become integrated in the labour force on a footing of equality, and with a view to facilitating their entry into employment or their re-entry after a comparatively long period of absence, the competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, take all measures that may be necessary in the national circumstances—

(a) to ensure the provision for girls of general education, vocational guidance and vocational training free from any form of discrimination on the ground of sex;

(b) to encourage girls to obtain a sound vocational preparation as a basis for their future work lives; and

(c) to convince parents and educators of the need to give girls a sound vocational preparation.

9. (1) The competent authorities should, in co-operation with the public and private organisations concerned and taking account of national needs and possibilities, provide or help to ensure the provision of the services that may be necessary to facilitate the entry into employment of women who have not yet worked, or the re-entry into employment of women who have been out of the employment market for a comparatively long time, owing, in particular, to family responsibilities.

(2) Such services should be organised within the framework of existing services for all workers or, in default thereof, along lines appropriate to national conditions; they should include adequate counselling, information and placement services and provide adequate vocational training and retraining facilities appropriate to the needs of the women concerned and available without distinction as regards age.

(3) The services and facilities should be kept under review in order to ensure that they are properly adapted to the special needs of these women workers and to the changing needs and tendencies of economic and technological development.

10. (1) In the case of women who, on account of their family responsibilities arising out of maternity, do not find themselves in a position to return to their employment immediately following exhaustion of the normal period of maternity leave established by law or practice, appropriate measures should be taken to the extent possible to allow them a reasonable further period of leave of absence without relinquishing their employment, all rights resulting from their employment being fully safeguarded.

(2) In case of termination of employment following maternity, the women concerned should be considered for re-employment in accordance with the provisions applicable under the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1963, to workers whose employment has been terminated owing to a reduction of the work force.
b) ces normes devraient avoir trait notamment à l'équipement de ces services et installations, aux conditions d'hygiène auxquelles ils doivent répondre et au nombre et aux qualifications des membres de leur personnel ;

c) les autorités compétentes devraient fournir ou aider à fournir une formation suffisante, aux divers échelons, au personnel nécessaire au fonctionnement des services et installations de soins aux enfants.

6. Les autorités compétentes devraient, avec la collaboration et la participation des organisations publiques et privées intéressées — notamment les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs —, s'efforcer de faire connaître et de faire appuyer les efforts déployés pour répondre aux besoins particuliers des parents qui travaillent en ce qui concerne les services et installations de soins aux enfants.

IV. EXERCICE ET REPRISE D'UN EMPLOI

7. Les autorités compétentes devraient prendre toutes mesures conformes à la convention sur la politique de l'emploi, 1964, et à la recommandation sur la politique de l'emploi, 1964, en vue de permettre aux femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales de s'intégrer dans la population active, de continuer à en faire partie ou de reprendre un emploi.

8. Afin de permettre aux femmes ayant des responsabilités familiales de s'intégrer dans le monde du travail sur un pied d'égalité avec les autres travailleurs et de leur faciliter l'entrée en emploi ou la reprise d'un emploi après une absence relativement longue, les autorités compétentes, en collaboration avec les organisations publiques et privées intéressées — notamment les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs —, devraient prendre toutes mesures qui seraient nécessaires dans les conditions nationales :

   a) pour assurer aux jeunes filles une instruction générale ainsi qu'une orientation et une formation professionnelles exemptes de toute forme de discrimination fondée sur le sexe ;
   b) pour encourager les jeunes filles à obtenir une solide préparation professionnelle comme fondement de leur future vie professionnelle ;
   c) pour convaincre les parents et les éducateurs de la nécessité de donner aux jeunes filles une solide préparation professionnelle.

9. (1) Les autorités compétentes, en collaboration avec les organisations publiques et privées intéressées et compte tenu des possibilités et des besoins nationaux, devraient assurer ou aider à assurer le fonctionnement des services qui peuvent être nécessaires pour faciliter l'entrée en emploi aux femmes qui n'ont pas encore travaillé en raison notamment de leurs responsabilités familiales, ou la reprise d'un emploi à celles qui n'ont pas travaillé pendant une période relativement longue pour les mêmes raisons.

   (2) Ces services et ces moyens devraient faire l'objet d'un examen régulier, aux fins d'assurer leur adaptation aux besoins particuliers de ces travailleuses et à l'évolution des besoins et des tendances du développement économique et technique.

10. (1) Des dispositions appropriées devraient être prises, dans la mesure du possible, pour permettre aux femmes qui, du fait de leurs responsabilités familiales découlant de leur maternité, ne se trouvent pas en mesure de reprendre leur emploi immédiatement après l'écoulement de la période normale du congé de maternité déterminée par la législation ou par la pratique, de prolonger quelque temps leur congé sans perdre leur emploi, tous les droits résultant de celui-ci étant pleinement sauvegardés.

   (2) En cas de cessation de l'emploi consécutive à une maternité, les femmes intéressées devraient être considérées pour le réembauchage conformément aux dispositions qui, dans la recommandation sur la cessation de la relation de travail, 1963, s'appliquent aux travailleurs dont l'emploi a cessé à la suite d'une réduction de personnel.
V. MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

11. (1) To the extent necessary the public and private organisations concerned, in particular employers' and workers' organisations, should co-operate with the competent authorities and collaborate with each other to take other measures and promote other action to assist women workers to meet their employment and family responsibilities without detriment to their opportunities for employment and promotion.

(2) In this connection attention should be given, as local needs require and possibilities permit, to matters which have particular relevance for women workers with family responsibilities, such as the organisation of public transport, the harmonisation of working hours and hours of schools and child-care services or facilities, and the provision at low cost of the facilities required to simplify and lighten household tasks.

12. Particular efforts should be made to develop home-aid services operating under public authority or supervision and providing women workers with family responsibilities, in the event of family need, with qualified assistance at reasonable charge.
11. (1) Dans la mesure où cela est nécessaire, les organisations publiques et privées intéressées — notamment les organisations d'employeurs et de travailleurs — devraient coopérer avec les autorités compétentes et collaborer les unes avec les autres pour prendre d'autres mesures et encourager d'autres actions afin d'aider les travailleuses à s'acquitter de leurs obligations professionnelles et familiales, sans nuire aux possibilités d'emploi et de promotion des intéressées.

(2) A cet égard, toute l'attention voulue devrait être accordée, dans la mesure du possible et pour autant que les besoins locaux l'exigent, aux questions qui intéressent particulièrement les travailleuses ayant des responsabilités familiales, telles que l'organisation des moyens de transport publics, l'harmonisation des horaires de travail et des horaires des écoles, services ou installations recevant les enfants et les moyens requis pour simplifier et alléger, à un prix accessible, les tâches ménagères.

12. Des efforts particuliers devraient être faits pour développer des services d'aide familiale assurés ou contrôlés par une autorité publique et fournissant, en cas de besoin, une assistance qualifiée pour un prix raisonnable aux travailleuses ayant des responsabilités familiales.
(2) Convention concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Noting that the Underground Work (Women) Convention, 1935, prohibits in principle the employment of any female, whatever her age, on underground work in any mine, and

Noting that the Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937, which is applicable to mines, provides that children under the age of 15 years shall not be employed or work in any public or private undertaking, or in any branch thereof, and

Noting that the Convention further specifies that, in respect of employments which by their nature or the circumstances in which they are carried on are dangerous to the life, health or morals of persons employed therein, national laws shall either prescribe or empower an appropriate authority to prescribe a higher age or ages than 15 years for the admission thereto of young persons or adolescents, and

Considering that, in view of the nature of employment underground in mines, international standards establishing a higher age than 15 years for admission to such employment are desirable, and adopts this twenty-second day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965:

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

2. The provisions of this Convention concerning employment or work underground in mines include employment or work underground in quarries.

Article 2

1. Persons under a specified minimum age shall not be employed or work underground in mines.

2. Each Member which ratifies this Convention shall specify the minimum age in a declaration appended to its ratification.

3. The minimum age shall in no case be less than 16 years.

Article 3

Each Member which has ratified this Convention may subsequently notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office, by a further declaration, that it specifies a minimum age higher than that specified at the time of ratification.

Article 4

1. All necessary measures, including the provision of appropriate penalties, shall be taken by the competent authority to ensure the effective enforcement of the provisions of this Convention.
2) Convention concernant l'âge minimum d'admission aux travaux souterrains dans les mines.

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail,
Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1965, en sa quarante-neuvième session ;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à l'âge minimum d'admission aux travaux souterrains dans les mines, question qui est comprise dans le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session ;

Notant que la convention des travaux souterrains (femmes), 1935, interdit en principe l'emploi d'aucune personne du sexe féminin, quel que soit son âge, aux travaux souterrains dans les mines ;

Notant que la convention (revisée) de l'âge minimum (industrie), 1937, qui s'applique aux mines, prévoit que les enfants de moins de quinze ans ne peuvent être employés ou travailler dans les établissements industriels, publics ou privés, ou dans leurs dépendances ;

Notant que cette convention énonce en outre qu'en ce qui concerne les emplois qui, par leur nature ou les conditions dans lesquelles ils sont remplis, sont dangereux pour la vie, la santé ou la moralité des personnes qui y sont affectées, les lois nationales doivent, soit fixer elles-mêmes un âge ou des âges supérieurs à quinze ans pour l'admission des jeunes gens et adolescents à ces emplois, soit conférer à une autorité appropriée le pouvoir de le faire ;

Considérant qu'étant donné la nature des travaux souterrains dans les mines, il y a lieu d'adopter des normes internationales fixant un âge supérieur à quinze ans pour l'admission à de tels travaux ;

Après avoir décidé que ces normes prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt-deuxième jour de juin mil neuf cent soixante-cinq, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur l'âge minimum (travaux souterrains), 1965 :

Article 1

1. Aux fins de l'application de la présente convention, le terme « mine » s'entend de toute entreprise, soit publique, soit privée, dont le but est l'extraction de substances situées en dessous du sol, et qui comporte l'emploi souterrain de personnes.

2. Les dispositions de la présente convention relatives à l'emploi ou au travail souterrains dans les mines couvrent l'emploi ou le travail souterrains dans les carrières.

Article 2

2. Tout Membre qui ratifie la présente convention doit spécifier cet âge minimum dans une déclaration annexée à sa ratification.

3. L'âge minimum ne peut, en aucun cas, être inférieur à seize ans.

Article 3

Tout Membre ayant ratifié la présente convention pourra informer le Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail, par une déclaration ultérieure, qu'il relève l'âge minimum spécifié au moment de sa ratification.

Article 4

1. Toutes les mesures nécessaires, y compris l'adoption de sanctions appropriées, doivent être prises par l'autorité compétente pour assurer l'application effective des dispositions de la présente convention.
2. Each Member which ratifies this Convention undertakes either to maintain an appropriate inspection service for the purpose of supervising the application of the provisions of the Convention or to satisfy itself that appropriate inspection is carried out.

3. National laws or regulations shall define the persons responsible for compliance with the provisions of this Convention.

4. The employer shall keep, and make available to inspectors, records indicating, in respect of persons who are employed or work underground and who are less than two years older than the specified minimum age—

(a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible; and
(b) the date at which the person was employed or worked underground in the undertaking for the first time.

5. The employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, lists of the persons who are employed or work underground and who are less than two years older than the specified minimum age; such lists shall contain the dates of birth of such persons and the dates at which they were employed or worked underground in the undertaking for the first time.

Article 5

Article 6

The formal ratifications of this Convention shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

Article 7

1. This Convention shall be binding only upon those Members of the International Labour Organisation whose ratifications have been registered with the Director-General.

2. It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members have been registered with the Director-General.

3. Thereafter, this Convention shall come into force for any Member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

Article 8

1. A Member which has ratified this Convention may denounce it after the expiration of ten years from the date on which the Convention first comes into force, by an act communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration. Such denunciation shall not take effect until one year after the date on which it is registered.

2. Each Member which has ratified this Convention and which does not, within the year following the expiration of the period of ten years mentioned in the preceding paragraph, exercise the right of denunciation provided for in this Article, will be bound for another period of ten years and, thereafter, may denounce this Convention at the expiration of each period of ten years under the terms provided for in this Article.

Article 9

1. The Director-General of the International Labour Office shall notify all Members of the International Labour Organisation of the registration of all ratifications and denunciations communicated to him by the Members of the Organisation.

2. Tout Membre qui ratifie la présente convention s'engage à disposer d'un système d'inspection approprié pour surveiller l'application des dispositions de la convention, ou à vérifier qu'une inspection appropriée est effectuée.

3. La législation nationale doit déterminer les personnes chargées d'assurer l'exécution des dispositions de la présente convention.

4. L'employeur doit tenir des registres qui seront à la disposition des inspecteurs qui indiqueront, pour chaque personne employée ou travaillant sous terre et dépassant de moins de deux ans l'âge minimum d'admission spécifié :
   a) la date de naissance, dûment attestée dans la mesure du possible;
   b) la date à laquelle la personne a été employée ou a travaillé sous terre, dans l'entreprise, pour la première fois.

5. L'employeur doit, à la demande des représentants des travailleurs, mettre à leur disposition des listes des personnes employées ou travaillant sous terre et dépassant de moins de deux ans l'âge minimum d'admission spécifié ; ces listes doivent indiquer la date de naissance de ces personnes et la date à laquelle elles ont été employées ou ont travaillé sous terre, dans l'entreprise, pour la première fois.

Article 5

L'âge minimum d'admission qui doit être spécifié en vertu des articles 2 et 3 de la présente convention doit être fixé après consultation des organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs intéressées.

Article 6

Les ratifications formelles de la présente convention seront communiquées au Directeur général du Bureau international du Travail et par lui enregistrées.

Article 7

Recommendation 124

(3) Recommendation concerning the Minimum Age for Admission to Employment Underground in Mines.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,
Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and
Having adopted the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965, and Having decided upon the adoption of certain further proposals with regard to the minimum age for admission to employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this twenty-second day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Recommendation, 1965:

1. (1) For the purpose of this Recommendation, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

(2) The provisions of this Recommendation concerning employment or work underground in mines include employment or work underground in quarries.

2. Where the minimum age for admission to employment or work underground in mines is less than 16 years, measures should be taken as speedily as possible to raise it to that level.

3. (1) The minimum age for admission to employment or work underground in mines should be progressively raised, with a view to attaining a minimum age of 18 years.

(2) Each Member should work towards the objective set forth in subparagraph (1) of this Paragraph within the limits of its possibilities, taking into account especially the dangers inherent in employment underground in mines, and also the development of educational facilities, including those for the vocational preparation of future miners, the minimum school-leaving age, the minimum age for admission to other industrial occupations and other relevant factors.

4. Persons between the age specified for the purpose of the Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965, and a higher age to be laid down in each country and not to be less than 18 years should be employed or work underground in mines only—

(a) for purposes of apprenticeship or other systematic vocational training provided under adequate supervision by competent persons with technical knowledge and practical experience of the work; and

(b) under conditions determined by the competent authority relating to the places of work and occupations permitted and the measures of systematic medical and safety supervision to be applied:

Provided that if a young person to whom this Paragraph applies has completed apprenticeship or other systematic vocational training, he may, under the conditions provided for in clause (b), be employed underground for purposes other than such training.

5. (1) There should be special provisions concerning the minimum age for employment or work underground in mines—

(a) on certain specified jobs which are harmful to health;

(b) under certain specified conditions which are harmful to health; and

(c) on certain specified jobs which may endanger the safety of the worker and that of other persons.
3) Recommandation concernant l'âge minimum d'admission aux travaux souterrains dans les mines.

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1965, en sa quarante-neuvième session ;

Après avoir adopté la convention sur l'âge minimum (travaux souterrains), 1965 ;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses autres propositions relatives à l'âge minimum d'admission aux travaux souterrains dans les mines, question qui est comprise dans le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session ;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation, adopte, ce vingt-deuxième jour de juin mil neuf cent soixante-cinq, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur l'âge minimum (travaux souterrains), 1965 :

1. (1) Aux fins de l'application de la présente recommandation, le terme « mine » s'entend de toute entreprise, soit publique, soit privée, dont le but est l'extraction de substances situées en dessous du sol, et qui comporte l'emploi souterrain de personnes.

(2) Les dispositions de la présente recommandation relatives à l'emploi ou au travail souterrain dans les mines couvrent l'emploi ou le travail souterrains dans les carrières.

2. Lorsque l'âge minimum d'admission à l'emploi ou au travail souterrains dans les mines est fixé à un âge inférieur à seize ans, des mesures devraient être prises aussi rapidement que possible pour le porter à ce niveau.

3. (1) L'âge minimum d'admission à l'emploi ou au travail souterrains dans les mines devrait être élevé progressivement, l'objectif devant être un âge minimum de dix-huit ans.

(2) Tout Membre devrait s'efforcer d'atteindre cet objectif, dans la mesure de ses possibilités, en tenant compte surtout des dangers inhérents aux travaux souterrains dans les mines et aussi du développement des moyens d'enseignement — notamment des moyens de formation professionnelle des futurs mineurs —, de l'âge minimum de fin de scolarité, de l'âge minimum d'admission à d'autres travaux industriels et de tous autres facteurs pertinents.

4. Les personnes dont l'âge se situe entre l'âge minimum spécifié aux fins de la convention sur l'âge minimum (travaux souterrains), 1965, et un âge supérieur que chaque pays aura à préciser et qui ne devrait pas être inférieur à dix-huit ans, ne devraient être employées ou travailler sous terre que :

   a) aux fins d'apprentissage ou de toute autre formation professionnelle systématique ayant lieu sous la surveillance appropriée de personnes compétentes possédant les connaissances techniques et l'expérience pratique du métier ;

   b) dans des conditions fixées par l'autorité compétente quant aux lieux de travail et aux métiers autorisés, et quant aux mesures systématiques de contrôle médical et de surveillance de la sécurité à appliquer.

Toutefois, lorsqu'un adolescent visé au présent paragraphe a terminé son apprentissage ou une autre formation professionnelle systématique, il pourrait, dans les conditions prévues à l'alinéa b), être employé sous terre à d'autres fins.

5. (1) Des dispositions particulières devraient être prises concernant l'âge minimum d'admission à l'emploi ou au travail souterrains pour les personnes appelées à :

   a) exécuter certaines tâches déterminées qui sont préjudiciables pour la santé ;

   b) travailler dans certaines conditions déterminées qui sont préjudiciables pour la santé ;

   c) exécuter certaines tâches déterminées, susceptibles de les exposer ou d'exposer d'autres personnes à un danger.
(2) The competent authority in each country should determine the jobs and conditions in question and should specify a sufficiently high minimum age appropriate to each which in no case should be less than 18 years.

6. (1) Measures should be taken to meet the problems of persons who wish to work in mines but are too young for employment or work underground because the minimum age for admission to such employment or work is higher than the minimum school-leaving age. These measures should be related to or integrated with measures to educate, train and utilise all youth in the country.

(2) The measures to be taken in accordance with subparagraph (1) of this Paragraph might include one or more of the following:

(a) employment in surface work with appropriate training;
(b) vocational training on the surface designed to prepare the persons concerned for their future occupations;
(c) further education and vocational guidance;
(d) raising the minimum school-leaving age.

7. The competent authority in each country should consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Recommendation.
(2) L'autorité compétente dans chaque pays devrait déterminer les tâches et conditions de travail dont il s'agit et fixer un âge minimum approprié à chaque cas, suffisamment élevé et qui ne devrait en aucun cas être inférieur à dix-huit ans.

6. (1) Des mesures devraient être prises en faveur des personnes qui se destinent à la mine, mais qui sont trop jeunes pour être employées ou travailler sous terre du fait que l'âge minimum d'admission est plus élevé que l'âge minimum de fin de scolarité. Ces mesures devraient être liées ou intégrées aux mesures prises pour instruire, former et utiliser l'ensemble de la jeunesse du pays.

(2) Les mesures visées au sous-paragraphe (1) ci-dessus, appliquées séparément ou conjointement, pourraient être les suivantes :

a) emploi à des travaux de surface, comportant une formation appropriée ;

b) formation professionnelle à la surface, conçue pour préparer les personnes intéressées à leur futur métier ;

c) enseignement post-scolaire avec orientation professionnelle ;

d) élévation de l'âge minimum de fin de scolarité.

7. L'autorité compétente dans chaque pays devrait consulter les organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs intéressés avant de déterminer la politique générale d'application de la présente recommandation et d'adopter une réglementation destinée à donner suite à celle-ci.
(4) Convention concerning Medical Examination of Young Persons for Fitness for Employment Underground in Mines.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals with regard to medical examination of young persons for fitness for employment underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Noting that the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946, which is applicable to mines, provides that children and young persons under 18 years of age shall not be admitted to employment by an industrial undertaking unless they have been found fit for the work on which they are to be employed by a thorough medical examination, that the continued employment of a child or young person under 18 years of age shall be subject to the repetition of a medical examination at intervals of not more than one year, and that national laws or regulations shall make provision concerning additional re-examinations, and

Noting that the Convention further provides that in occupations which involve high health risks medical examination and re-examinations for fitness for employment shall be required until at least the age of 21 years, and that national laws or regulations shall either specify or empower an appropriate authority to specify the occupations or categories of occupations to which this requirement applies, and

Considering that, in view of the health risks inherent in employment underground in mines, international standards requiring medical examination and periodic re-examination for fitness for employment underground in mines until the age of 21 years, and specifying the nature of these examinations, are desirable, and adopts this twenty-third day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Convention, which may be cited as the Medical Examination of Young Persons (Underground Work) Convention, 1965:

Article 1

1. For the purpose of this Convention, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

2. The provisions of this Convention concerning employment or work underground in mines include employment or work underground in quarries.

Article 2

1. A thorough medical examination, and periodic re-examinations at intervals of not more than one year, for fitness for employment shall be required for the employment or work underground in mines of persons under 21 years of age.

2. Alternative arrangements for medical supervision of young persons aged between 18 and 21 years shall be permitted where the competent authority is satisfied on medical advice that such arrangements are equivalent to or more effective than those required under paragraph 1 of this Article and has consulted and reached agreement with the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned.
4) Convention concernant l'examen médical d'aptitude des adolescents à l'emploi aux travaux souterrains dans les mines.

Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1965, en sa quarante-neuvième session ;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives à l'examen médical d'aptitude des adolescents à l'emploi aux travaux souterrains dans les mines, question qui est comprise dans le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session ;

Notant que la convention sur l'examen médical des adolescents (industrie), 1946, qui s'applique aux mines, prévoit que les enfants et adolescents de moins de dix-huit ans ne pourront être admis à l'emploi par une entreprise industrielle que s'ils ont été reconnus aptes à l'emploi auquel ils seront occupés à la suite d'un examen médical approfondi, que l'emploi d'un enfant ou d'un adolescent de moins de dix-huit ans ne pourra être continué que moyennant renouvellement de l'examen médical à des intervalles ne dépassant pas une année et que la législation nationale devra comporter des dispositions visant des examens médicaux supplémentaires ;

Notant que la convention dispose en outre que, pour les travaux qui présentent des risques élevés pour la santé, l'examen médical d'aptitude à l'emploi et ses renouvellements périodiques doivent être exigés jusqu'à l'âge de vingt et un ans au moins et que la législation nationale devra, soit déterminer les emplois ou catégories d'emplois pour lesquels cette obligation s'impose, soit conférer à une autorité appropriée le pouvoir de les déterminer ;

Considérant qu'étant donné les risques que présentent, pour la santé, les travaux souterrains dans les mines, il y a lieu d'adopter des normes internationales exigeant un examen médical d'aptitude à l'emploi souterrain dans les mines ainsi que des examens médicaux périodiques jusqu'à l'âge de vingt et un ans, et spécifiant la nature de ces examens ;

Après avoir décidé que ces normes prendraient la forme d'une convention internationale, adopte, ce vingt-troisième jour de juin mil neuf cent soixante-cinq, la convention ci-après, qui sera dénommée Convention sur l'examen médical des adolescents (travaux souterrains), 1965 :

Article 1

1. Aux fins de l'application de la présente convention, le terme « mine » s'entend de toute entreprise, soit publique, soit privée, dont le but est l'extraction de substances situées en dessous du sol, et qui comporte l'emploi souterrain de personnes.

2. Les dispositions de la présente convention relatives à l'emploi ou au travail souterrain dans les mines couvrent l'emploi ou le travail souterrain dans les carrières.

1. Un examen médical approfondi d'aptitude à l'emploi et des examens périodiques ultérieurs à des intervalles ne dépassant pas douze mois seront exigés pour les personnes âgées de moins que vingt et un ans, en vue de l'emploi et du travail souterrains dans les mines.

2. L'adoption d'autres mesures concernant la surveillance médicale des adolescents entre dix-huit et vingt et un ans sera néanmoins permise lorsque l'autorité compétente estime, après avis médical, que de telles mesures sont équivalentes à celles exigées au paragraphe 1, ou plus efficaces, et qu'elle a consulté les organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs intéressées et a obtenu leur accord.
Article 3

1. The medical examinations provided for in Article 2—
   (a) shall be carried out under the responsibility and supervision of a qualified physician approved by the competent authority; and
   (b) shall be certified in an appropriate manner.

2. An X-ray film of the lungs shall be required on the occasion of the initial medical examination and, when regarded as medically necessary, on the occasion of subsequent re-examinations.

3. The medical examinations required by this Convention shall not involve the young person, or his parents or guardians, in any expense.

Article 4

3. National laws or regulations shall define the persons responsible for compliance with the provisions of this Convention.

4. The employer shall keep, and make available to inspectors, records containing, in respect of persons under 21 years of age who are employed or work underground—
   (a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible;
   (b) an indication of the nature of their occupation; and
   (c) a certificate which attests fitness for employment but does not contain medical data.

5. The employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, the information mentioned in paragraph 4 of this Article.

Article 5

The competent authority in each country shall consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Convention.

The formal ratifications of this Convention shall be communicated to the Director-General of the International Labour Office for registration.

Article 7

2. It shall come into force twelve months after the date on which the ratifications of two Members have been registered with the Director-General.

3. Thereafter, this Convention shall come into force for any Member twelve months after the date on which its ratification has been registered.

   a) être effectués sous la responsabilité et la surveillance d'un médecin qualifié agréé par l'autorité compétente ;

Recommendation 125

(5) Recommendation concerning Conditions of Employment of Young Persons Underground in Mines.

The General Conference of the International Labour Organisation,

Having been convened at Geneva by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, and having met in its Forty-ninth Session on 2 June 1965, and

Noting the terms of existing international labour Conventions and Recommendations, applicable to mines, which contain provisions on conditions of employment of young persons, and

Considering that additional standards are called for in certain respects, and

Having decided upon the adoption of certain proposals regarding the conditions of employment of young persons underground in mines, which is included in the fourth item on the agenda of the session, and

Having determined that these proposals shall take the form of a Recommendation, adopts this twenty-third day of June of the year one thousand nine hundred and sixty-five the following Recommendation, which may be cited as the Conditions of Employment of Young Persons (Underground Work) Recommendation, 1965:

I. DEFINITION

1. (1) For the purpose of this Recommendation, the term "mine" means any undertaking, whether public or private, for the extraction of any substance from under the surface of the earth by means involving the employment of persons underground.

   (2) The provisions of this Recommendation concerning employment or work underground in mines include employment or work underground in quarries.

II. METHODS OF IMPLEMENTATION

2. Effect may be given to this Recommendation through national laws or regulations, collective agreements, arbitration awards, or court decisions or in such other manner consistent with national practice as may be appropriate under national conditions.

III. HEALTH, SAFETY AND WELFARE

3. Training programmes for young persons employed or to be employed underground in mines should include practical and theoretical instruction in the health and safety hazards to which workers in mines are exposed, in hygiene and first aid, and in the precautions to be taken to safeguard health and safety. Such instruction should be provided by persons who are qualified in these fields.

   4. The employer should be required to inform a young person, both when engaging him and when giving him a specific job underground, of the risks of accident and hazards to health involved in the work, of protective measures and equipment, of regulations regarding safety, and of first-aid methods. The directions should be repeated at appropriate intervals.

5) Recommandation concernant les conditions d'emploi des adolescents occupés aux travaux souterrains dans les mines.

La Conférence générale de l'Organisation internationale du Travail, Convoquée à Genève par le Conseil d'administration du Bureau international du Travail, et s'y étant réunie le 2 juin 1965, en sa quarante-neuvième session;

Notant les termes des conventions et recommandations internationales du travail existantes qui sont applicables aux mines et qui contiennent des dispositions relatives aux conditions d'emploi des adolescents;

Considérant qu'il est souhaitable de formuler des normes supplémentaires sur certains points;

Après avoir décidé d'adopter diverses propositions relatives aux conditions d'emploi des adolescents occupés aux travaux souterrains dans les mines, question qui est comprise dans le quatrième point à l'ordre du jour de la session;

Après avoir décidé que ces propositions prendraient la forme d'une recommandation, adopte, ce vingt-troisième jour de juin mil neuf cent soixante-cinq, la recommandation ci-après, qui sera dénommée Recommandation sur les conditions d'emploi des adolescents (travaux souterrains), 1965:

I. DÉFINITION

1. (1) Aux fins de l'application de la présente recommandation, le terme « mine » s'entend de toute entreprise, soit publique, soit privée, dont le but est l'extraction de substances situées en dessous du sol, et qui comporte l'emploi souterrain de personnes.

(2) Les dispositions de la présente recommandation relatives à l'emploi ou au travail souterrains dans les mines couvrent l'emploi ou le travail souterrains dans les carrières.

II. MÉTHODES D'APPLICATION

2. La présente recommandation pourra être appliquée par voie de législation nationale, de conventions collectives, de sentences arbitrales ou de décisions judiciaires, ou de toute autre manière qui serait conforme à la pratique nationale et semblerait appropriée, compte tenu des conditions propres à chaque pays.

III. SANTÉ, SÉCURITÉ ET BIEN-ÊTRE

3. Les programmes de formation des adolescents employés ou appelés à être employés sous terre devraient comprendre un enseignement pratique et théorique portant sur les risques auxquels la santé et la sécurité des travailleurs sont exposées dans les mines, sur l'hygiène et les premiers secours et sur les précautions à prendre pour protéger la santé et assurer la sécurité. Cet enseignement devrait être donné par des personnes qualifiées dans les domaines en question.

4. L'employeur devrait être tenu, lorsqu'il embauche un adolescent et lorsqu'il l'affecte à une tâche déterminée sous terre, de l'informer des risques d'accident et de maladie que comporte ce travail, ainsi que des mesures et de l'équipement de protection, des règlements de sécurité et des moyens de premiers secours. Ces instructions devraient être rappelées à des intervalles appropriés.
5. (1) Officials in charge of safety, safety delegates, safety and health committees and all other internal bodies concerned with safety and health, as well as the national inspection service, should give particular attention to measures designed to safeguard the life and health of young persons employed or working underground in mines.

(2) Such measures should include provision for the development of a practical safety programme for each mine including—

(a) action to ensure prevention and correction of hazardous environmental and physical conditions;

(b) appropriate means and facilities for training, inspection and accident investigation and prevention;

(c) the initial supply and replacement after normal wear and tear, at the employers' expense, of such protective clothing and equipment as are necessary in view of the nature of the work and the conditions in which it is performed, the young persons being required to use the clothing and equipment supplied; and

(d) any other measures for the safety and health of young persons.

6. With a view to keeping young persons employed or working underground in mines in good health and to promoting their normal physical development, measures should be taken which aim, in particular, at—

(a) encouraging recreational activities, including sports;

(b) ensuring that changing-rooms and showers meeting approved hygiene standards are made available, changing-rooms and showers separate from those for adults being, where possible, reserved for persons under 18 years of age; and

(c) ensuring that, if circumstances so require, young persons have at their disposal such additional food and such feeding facilities as would enable them to secure a diet suitable to their stage of development.

IV. WEEKLY REST AND ANNUAL HOLIDAYS WITH PAY

7. Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should be entitled to an uninterrupted weekly rest which should not be less than 36 hours in the course of each period of seven days.

8. The weekly rest period should be progressively extended, with a view to attaining at least 48 hours.

9. The weekly rest period should include the day of the week established as a day of rest by the traditions or customs of the country or district.

10. Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should not be employed on any work during the weekly rest period.

11. (1) Persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground in mines should receive an annual holiday with pay of not less than 24 working days (corresponding to four working weeks) for 12 months of service.

(2) Public and customary holidays and interruptions of attendance at work due to sickness should not be included in the annual holiday with pay.

12. (1) The employer should be required to keep, and make available to inspectors, records indicating in respect of persons under 18 years of age employed or working underground—

(a) the date of birth, duly certified wherever possible;
5. (1) Les agents préposés à la sécurité, les délégués à la sécurité, les comités de sécurité et d’hygiène et tout autre organe de l’entreprise s’occupant de la sécurité et de l’hygiène, ainsi que le service national d’inspection, devraient vouer une attention particulière aux mesures qui permettent de sauvegarder la vie et la santé des adolescents employés ou travaillant sous terre dans les mines.

(2) Au nombre de ces mesures, il conviendrait de prévoir l’élaboration d’un programme pratique de sécurité pour chaque mine, comprenant :

a) des dispositions visant à prévenir les risques que peuvent présenter les conditions ambiantes du milieu de travail et à améliorer ces conditions ;

b) des moyens appropriés de formation, d’inspection et d’enquêtes sur les accidents ainsi que de prévention des accidents ;

c) la fourniture initiale et le remplacement, après usure normale, des vêtements et équipements de protection que la nature du travail et les conditions dans lesquelles il est exécuté exigent, aux frais de l’employeur, ainsi que l’obligation pour les adolescents d’en faire usage ;

d) toutes autres mesures utiles à la sécurité et à la santé des adolescents.

6. Afin de maintenir en bonne santé les adolescents employés ou travaillant sous terre dans les mines et de favoriser leur développement physique normal, des mesures devraient être prises ayant notamment pour but :

a) d’encourager les activités récréatives, y compris les sports ;

b) de mettre à leur disposition des vestiaires et des douches conformes aux règlements d’hygiène, des vestiaires et des douches séparés devant, si possible, être réservés aux personnes âgées de moins de dix-huit ans ;

c) d’assurer, si les circonstances le nécessitent, que les adolescents aient à leur disposition un complément d’alimentation et des services d’alimentation qui leur permettent de bénéficier d’un régime alimentaire convenant à leur état de développement.

IV. REPOS HEBDOMADAIRE ET CONGÉS ANNUELS PAYÉS

8. La période de repos hebdomadaire devrait être prolongée progressivement, l’objectif devant être une période de repos hebdomadaire de quarante-huit heures au moins.

9. La période de repos hebdomadaire devrait comprendre le jour de repos consacré par la tradition ou les usages du pays ou de la région.

10. Les personnes âgées de moins de dix-huit ans employées ou travaillant sous terre dans les mines ne devraient être occupées à aucun travail pendant la période de repos hebdomadaire.

11. (1) Les personnes âgées de moins de dix-huit ans employées ou travaillant sous terre dans les mines devraient bénéficier d’un congé annuel payé d’au moins vingt-quatre jours ouvrables (correspondant à quatre semaines de travail) par période de douze mois de service.

(2) Les jours fériés officiels ou coutumiers et les interruptions du travail dues à la maladie ne devraient pas être comptés dans le congé annuel payé.

12. (1) L’employeur devrait tenir des registres qui seront mis à la disposition des inspecteurs et qui indiqueront pour chaque personne âgée de moins de dix-huit ans employée ou travaillant sous terre :

a) la date de naissance, dûment attestée dans la mesure du possible ;
(b) the periods of weekly rest; and
(c) the periods of holidays with pay.

(2) The employer should make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, the information mentioned in subparagraph (1) of this Paragraph.

V. Training

13. In line with the principles set forth in the Vocational Training Recommendation, 1962, the competent authorities should take the necessary measures to ensure that young persons employed or to be employed underground in mines—

(a) receive systematic vocational training, through apprenticeship or other forms of training appropriate in the national circumstances, in order to ensure adequate preparation for the particular type of work in which they are to be engaged;

(b) enjoy suitable opportunities for further technical training enabling them to develop their occupational capacities without detriment to their health and welfare, account being taken of national circumstances; and

(c) are provided with suitable opportunities for further education and training above ground with a view to ensuring their future adaptation to technological change in the mining industry and to developing their human capacities.

VI. Consultation

14. The competent authority in each country should consult the most representative organisations of employers and workers concerned before determining general policies of implementation and before adopting regulations in pursuance of the terms of this Recommendation.
b) les périodes de repos hebdomadaire ;
c) les périodes de congé payé.

(2) L'employeur devrait mettre à la disposition des représentants des travailleurs, sur leur demande, les renseignements mentionnés au sous-paragraphe 1.

V. FORMATION

13. Conformément aux principes énoncés dans la recommandation sur la formation professionnelle, 1962, l'autorité compétente devrait prendre les mesures nécessaires pour veiller à ce que les adolescents qui sont employés sous terre dans les mines ou qui se destinent à un tel emploi :
a) reçoivent une formation professionnelle systématique, dans le cadre de l'apprentissage ou de toute autre méthode de formation appropriée aux conditions nationales, de façon qu'ils soient bien préparés au type particulier de travail auquel ils seront affectés ;
b) disposent, compte tenu des conditions nationales, des possibilités appropriées de formation technique complémentaire qui leur permettent de développer leurs qualifications professionnelles sans compromettre leur santé ni leur bien-être ;
c) disposent de possibilités appropriées de poursuivre à la surface leur éducation et leur formation, de manière qu'ils soient capables de s'adapter plus tard au progrès technique dans l'industrie minière et de cultiver leurs qualités humaines.

VI. CONSULTATION

14. L'autorité compétente dans chaque pays devrait consulter les organisations les plus représentatives des employeurs et des travailleurs intéressées avant de déterminer la politique générale d'application de la présente recommandation et d'adopter une réglementation destinée à donner suite à celle-ci.
