First edition 2010

The publication of information concerning action taken in respect of international labour Conventions and Recommendations does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated such information (including the communication of a ratification or declaration), or on its authority over the areas or territories in respect of which such information is communicated; in certain cases this may present problems on which the ILO is not competent to express an opinion.

ILO publications can be obtained through major booksellers or ILO local offices in many countries, or direct from ILO Publications, International Labour Office, CH-1211 Geneva 22, Switzerland. A catalogue or list of new publications will be sent free of charge from the above address.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations by ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

- (a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part 1A, pages 1–4).
- (b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it draws the attention to issues of general interest arising out of the Committee's work (Part 1A, pages 5–40).
- (c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part 1A, pages 41–802).
- (d) Part III: General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the state of the legislation and practice regarding a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations. This examination covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the given Conventions. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)) and this year it concerns employment instruments in light of the 2008 Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization (Part 1B).

Finally, the Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities is prepared by the Office and supplements the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. This document primarily provides an overview of recent developments relating to international labour standards, the implementation of special supervisory procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It contains, in tabular form, information on the ratification of Conventions and Protocols, and “country profiles” (Part 2).

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards, promoting their ratification and application in its member States and the supervision of their application as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level.¹

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report at intervals on the measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through annual reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution),² as well as through special procedures based on complaints or representations to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanism is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments comments on the reports concerning the implementation of ratified Conventions. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding a Convention and thus lead the Committee of Experts to request further information from the government. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit comments on the application of Conventions directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these comments to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the comments are examined by the Committee of Experts.

¹ For detailed information on all the supervisory procedures, see the Handbook of procedures relating to international labour Conventions and Recommendations, International Labour Standards Department, International Labour Office, Geneva, Rev. 2006.

² Reports are requested every two years for the so-called fundamental Conventions and priority Conventions, and every five years for other Conventions. Reports have been due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter. As regards the recent decision taken by the Governing Body concerning the reporting cycle, see para. 25 of the General Report.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference. However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary of the Conference would not be able to examine all of these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution³ establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members,⁴ who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the proposal of the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among completely impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three-year appointment. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee decided that its Chairperson would be elected for a period of three years, which would be renewable once for a further three years. At the start of each session, the Committee would also elect a Reporter.

Mandate

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body,⁵ the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the annual reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.⁶

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.⁷

The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations contain comments on fundamental questions raised by the application of a particular Convention by a member State. These observations are reproduced in the annual report

⁴ There are currently 18 experts appointed.

⁵ Terms of reference of the Committee of Experts, Minutes of the 103rd Session of the Governing Body (1947), Appendix XII, para. 37.

⁶ Article 35 covers the application of Conventions to non-metropolitan territories.

⁷ In its 1987 report, the Committee stated that in its evaluation of national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions: "... its function is to determine whether the requirements of a given Convention are being met, whatever the economic and social conditions existing in a given country. Subject only to any derogations, which are expressly permitted by the Convention itself, these requirements remain constant and uniform for all countries. In carrying out this work, the Committee is guided by the standards laid down in the Convention alone, mindful, however, of the fact that the modes of their implementation may be different in different States".

of the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests usually relate to questions of a more technical nature or of lesser importance, or contain requests for information. They are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned.⁸ In addition, the Committee of Experts examines, in the context of the General Survey, the state of the legislation and practice concerning a specific area covered by a given number of Conventions and Recommendations chosen by the Governing Body. The General Survey is based on the reports submitted in accordance with articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution, and it covers all member States regardless of whether or not they have ratified the concerned Conventions. This year's General Survey covers employment.

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The report consists of two volumes. The first volume (Report III 1A)⁹ is divided into two parts:

- Part I: The General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards.
- Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities.

The second volume contains the General Survey (Report III (Part 1B)).¹⁰

Furthermore, an Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities (Report III (Part 2)) accompanies the report of the Committee of Experts.¹¹

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which include a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Mandate

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the June session of the Conference. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution);
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys);
- measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non-metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present a report to the Conference.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to review together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations, particularly with regard to ratified Conventions. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the General Report and the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion, including a discussion on the General Survey. The Conference Committee subsequently examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee embarks upon its main task, which is to examine a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee invites the Government representatives concerned to attend one of its sessions to discuss the observations in question. After listening to the Government representatives, the members of the Conference Committee may ask questions or make comments. At the end of the discussion, the Conference Committee adopts conclusions on the case in question. Furthermore, in accordance with a resolution adopted by the Conference in 2000,¹² the Conference Committee holds, at each of its sessions, a special sitting on the application by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

In its report submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

Relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has emphasized the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility that has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. In recent years, it has become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee including the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. Similarly, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts during its sessions and discuss issues of common interest within the framework of a special session held for that purpose.

Part I. General Report

I. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by member States of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 80th Session in Geneva from 26 November to 11 December 2009. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

Composition of the Committee

2. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Mario ACKERMAN (Argentina), Mr Anwar Ahmad Rashed AL FUZAIE (Kuwait), Mr Denys BARROW, SC (Belize), Ms Janice R. BELLACE (United States), Mr Lelio BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr Halton CHEADLE (South Africa), Ms Laura COX, QC (United Kingdom), Ms Blanca Ruth ESPONDA ESPINOSA (Mexico), Mr Rachid FILALI MEKNASSI (Morocco), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Mr Pierre LYON-CAEN (France), Mr Vitit MUNTARBHORN (Thailand), Ms Angelika NUSSBERGER, MA (Germany), Ms Ruma PAL (India), Mr Paul-Gérard POUGOUÉ (Cameroon), Mr Raymond RANJEVA (Madagascar), Mr Miguel RODRIGUEZ PIÑERO Y BRAVO FERRER (Spain), Mr Yozo YOKOTA (Japan). Appendix I of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

3. The Committee noted that Ms Esponda Espinosa was unable to participate in its work this year and that she had submitted her resignation before the beginning of the present session.

4. The Committee noted that Ms Bellace and Mr Rodriguez Piñero y Bravo Ferrer would not seek the renewal of their respective mandates, which were due to expire at the end of the year. The Committee would like to express its deep appreciation of the outstanding manner in which Ms Bellace, Ms Esponda Espinosa and Mr Rodriguez Piñero y Bravo Ferrer discharged their duties during their 15 years of service on the Committee. The Committee also wishes to commend Ms Bellace warmly for the excellent and inspired way in which she carried out the important and exacting task of leading the Committee during the two years she served as its Chairperson.

5. During its session, the Committee welcomed Mr Vitit Muntarbhorn, nominated by the Governing Body at its 304th Session (March 2009), as well as Mr Rachid Filali Meknassi and Mr Paul-Gérard Pougoué, nominated by the Governing Body at its 305th Session (June 2009).

6. Ms Bellace continued her mandate as Chairperson of the Committee, and the Committee re-elected Mr Al-Fuzaie as Reporter. As the mandate of Ms Bellace had come to an end, the Committee elected Mr Yokota as Chairperson of its next session.

Working methods

7. The Committee has in recent years undertaken a thorough examination of its working methods. In order to guide this reflection on working methods efficiently, a subcommittee was set up in 2001. The mandate of the subcommittee includes examining the working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee.¹ The subcommittee met on three occasions between 2002 to 2004.² During its sessions in 2005 and 2006, issues relating to its working methods were discussed by the Committee in plenary sitting.³ The subcommittee met again in 2007 and in 2008.⁴

¹ The subcommittee comprises a core group, but its meetings are open to any other member of the Committee wishing to participate.

8. This year, the subcommittee on working methods met under the guidance of Mr Yokota, who was re-elected as chairperson of the subcommittee, to examine issues relating to its methods of work, particularly in light of the discussions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), and the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009). Following consideration of the recommendations made by the subcommittee, the Committee agreed on the following issues.

- (1) The question of the criteria for the identification of cases of “good practice” with a view to clarifying their distinguishing features in comparison with cases of progress. The outcome of the Committee’s discussions is reflected in paragraphs 57–63 and 64–65 respectively.
- (2) A review of the current procedure concerning the treatment of comments received from employers’ and workers’ organizations on the application of Conventions in a non-reporting year in view of the decision of the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009) to extend the cycle for the submission of reports from two to three years for the fundamental and governance Conventions (also known as priority Conventions). The outcome of the Committee’s discussion is reflected in paragraphs 77–80.
- (3) With regard to the ongoing review of the report forms under article 22 of the Constitution carried out at the request of the Governing Body, as well as the preparation of the new questionnaire under article 19 of the Constitution to be submitted to the Governing Body at its 307th Session (March 2010), the Committee decided to continue with the arrangements adopted up to now and designated the members who have the initial responsibility for the Conventions concerned to assist the Office in its work.
- (4) The Committee also agreed on further improvements concerning the presentation and accessibility of its report, as well as its efficient functioning.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

9. A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed in the Committee’s relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee of Experts takes the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards into full consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in particular with regard to specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standards-related obligations. In this context, the Committee again welcomed the participation of its Chairperson, Ms Bellace, as an observer in the general discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session (June 2009) of the International Labour Conference. It noted the request by the Conference Committee for the Director-General to renew this invitation for the 99th Session (June 2010) of the Conference. The Committee of Experts accepted this invitation.

10. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts once again invited the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009) (Mr Edward Potter and Mr Luc Cortebeeck, respectively) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. They both accepted this invitation.

11. An interactive and thorough exchange of views took place on matters of mutual interest. While underlining the inherent differences in the work of both Committees, the discussion highlighted the importance of maintaining and reinforcing their complementarity in the interests of the effective application of international labour standards. In particular, as both Committees are engaged in reviewing their methods of work, the discussion offered an opportunity to focus on those aspects, which have implications for the work of the other Committee. Hence, the discussion centred on the manner in which the report of the Committee of Experts can provide the best possible basis for the work of the Conference Committee, with particular reference to the selection of individual cases relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Emphasis was placed in this connection on the identification by the Committee of Experts of cases in which governments are required to provide full particulars to the Conference (so-called “double footnotes”), as well as cases of progress and good practices.⁵ In a spirit of enhancing mutual understanding between both Committees, an exchange of views took place on other issues, including the general observations on the application of ratified Conventions formulated by the Committee of Experts.

12. The special sitting also pursued the discussion which began last year on the implications of the ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008 (Social Justice Declaration) for the work of both Committees with regard to General Surveys. The exchange of views underlined the need to ensure that General Surveys, as well as their discussion by the Conference Committee, have a real impact on the related, albeit broader discussions at the International Labour Conference, while at the same time preserving the value of General Surveys as authoritative documents concerning the legal aspects of the application of international labour standards.

Meetings during the current session

13. This year, in a plenary sitting, the Committee discussed the issue of the interpretation of International Labour Conventions, in particular in light of article 37, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, as the basis for submitting its views to the Governing Body. The Committee hopes that its discussions and the views it submits will be helpful for the work currently carried out by the Office on this important matter and hopes that the Governing Body will take this into consideration. The Committee was also informed of the work undertaken by the Office concerning the issue of the measurement of decent work (also referred to as decent work country profiles).

14. The Committee had the pleasure of welcoming this year representatives of the European Committee of Social Rights (ECSR). The ECSR monitors the application of the European Social Charter. The Vice-President of the ECSR, Professor Swiatkowski, addressed the Committee at its opening session and highlighted the importance of the close collaboration between the two supervisory bodies. Professor Swiatkowski, together with Mr O’Cinneide, the other Vice-President of the ECSR, and Mr Leppik, member of the ECSR, also participated in a working session on the preparation of the Committee’s General Survey on social security to be undertaken next year.

II. Compliance with obligations

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

15. The Committee recalls that, at the instigation of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 93rd Session (June 2005) of the International Labour Conference, the two committees, with the assistance of the Office, strengthened the follow-up given to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations with a view, in so far as possible, to identifying more accurately the difficulties underlying these failures and enabling appropriate solutions to be identified. As both committees have recalled on numerous occasions, such failures hinder the functioning of the supervisory system, which is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Cases of failure to fulfil reporting obligations therefore have to be given the same level of attention as those relating to the application of ratified Conventions.

16. The Committee notes the discussions held in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session (June 2009) of the International Labour Conference, with particular reference to the general discussion and the discussions and conclusions of the special sitting on cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil their reporting and other standards-related obligations. The Conference Committee recalled once again that the decrease in the total number of reports received, as well as the high incidence of reports received after the 1 September deadline, threatened the functioning and credibility of the supervisory system. At the same time, the Conference Committee noted the substantial progress that had been made in addressing serious failures relating to reporting as a result of the strengthened follow-up. Technical assistance activities in this framework should be further intensified and the difficulties behind reporting problems should be identified more accurately in order to address them effectively.

17. The Committee was informed that, as part of the follow-up on the discussions of the Conference Committee, the Office had sent special letters to the 44 member States mentioned in the relevant paragraphs of the report of the Conference Committee concerning their failure to fulfil their respective obligations (there were 55 such member States in 2008, 45 in 2007, 49 in 2006 and 53 in 2005). Although 29 of these 44 member States had already been mentioned for the same failures in the 2008 report of the Conference Committee (and even, in some cases, in previous reports), some of them have made significant progress in resolving most of the failures for which they were mentioned. The external offices were invited to contact on a priority basis the 29 member States experiencing persistent difficulties: 21 of them have received technical assistance from the Office, or will do so very shortly.

18. With regard to the reasons for the difficulties experienced by member States in fulfilling their reporting obligations, the information available this year (discussion of the Conference Committee, government replies to the Office's letters and information from external offices) confirms yet again that failures to report are mostly of an institutional nature and more specifically the insufficiency of infrastructure attributable to a lack of human and financial resources. It has also been increasingly emphasized that governments experience difficulties in the submission of reports due to obstacles relating to the internal coordination between the relevant ministries and institutions concerning the collection of information for the preparation of reports. Other countries have reported that the difficulties that they face in the submission of reports are due to language problems. In a smaller number of cases, serious difficulties have persisted due to national circumstances. Considering these difficulties, and with a view to providing adequate assistance, the Office has strengthened its efforts, while building on previous experience to promote dialogue and provide assistance, taking into account national needs and priorities. Technical assistance activities have included national and regional workshops on reporting obligations, technical advisory missions and participation in a distance training course on best practices in reporting on international labour standards, organized for the first time in 2009, as well as other training programmes. To the extent possible, steps have been taken to include officials from the various ministries involved in the preparation of reports, as well as representatives of employers' and workers' organizations, which can make an important contribution to the preparation of reports.

19. The Committee notes that certain of the 44 member States referred to above have, frequently with the assistance of the Office, fulfilled their reporting and other standards-related obligations, since the end of the session of the Conference.⁶ For example, in the region of the Caribbean, following technical assistance, the overall reporting ratio increased from 50 per cent last year to 75 per cent this year. Furthermore, the Committee has been informed that, in view of the efforts made by the two Committees to raise awareness of the importance of the sending of reports, supplemented by the Office's follow-up, almost all the member States concerned have taken initiatives to overcome their difficulties and that it is rare to find that no action has been taken on the matter.⁷

20. The Committee notes that an assessment of the follow-up in cases of serious failure to comply with reporting obligations was presented to the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009).⁸ This assessment highlighted that the follow-up has contributed to the identification of specific problems encountered by member States in fulfilling their reporting obligations. Furthermore, the work of the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee has contributed effectively to determining the priorities of the technical assistance provided by the Office. The Committee notes that, according to the findings of the assessment, the strengthened and systematic provision of technical assistance has had a significant impact on the submission of reports.

21. The Committee, like the Conference Committee and the Governing Body, therefore confirms that it is essential for the Office to pursue and step up its action to follow up cases of serious failures by member States to fulfil reporting obligations. Special efforts should be made to improve the integration of reporting issues in broader technical cooperation programmes.

22. The Committee reminds governments that they are required to comply with all the reporting and other standards-related obligations that they accept upon becoming Members of the Organization. Compliance with these obligations is essential for dialogue between the supervisory bodies and member States on the effective implementation of ratified Conventions. Governments that request technical assistance may benefit from it, yet such assistance can only be useful and adapted to national circumstances if governments are prepared to inform the Office of their specific problems and have the will to adopt lasting solutions. Finally, the Committee welcomes the fruitful collaboration that it maintains with the Conference Committee on this matter of mutual interest, which is essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks.

A. Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

23. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by member States and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories.

24. Reports are requested every two years for the fundamental Conventions and Conventions regarded as most significant from the viewpoint of governance (the governance Conventions),⁹ and every five years for other Conventions. In accordance with the procedure adopted by the Governing Body in November 2001 and March 2002,¹⁰ particularly with a view to facilitating the collection of information on related subjects at the national level, requests for reports on Conventions covering the same subject are grouped together and addressed simultaneously to each country.¹¹ In the case

⁶ Armenia (submission of first reports on Conventions Nos 14, 150 and 173 due since 2007), Dominica (submission of first report on Convention No. 169 due since 2004), Saint Kitts and Nevis (submission of first reports on Conventions Nos 87 and 98 due since 2002 and on Convention No. 138 due since 2007), Saint Lucia (submission of first report on Convention No. 182 due since 2002), Tajikistan (submission of first report on Convention No. 182 due since 2007), The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (submission of first report on Convention No. 182 due since 2004 and on Convention No. 144 due since 2007) and Togo (submission of some reports due). The following countries have since replied to all or the majority of the Committee's comments: Bolivia, Gambia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Paraguay, Russian Federation, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, United Republic of Tanzania and United Kingdom (Bermuda).

⁸ GB.306/LILS/4(Rev.), paras 36–42.

⁹ These Conventions are also known as "priority Conventions".

of the fundamental and the governance Conventions, as well as for certain other groups of Conventions containing a large number of instruments, reports are requested, with a view to balancing their submission, in accordance with the English alphabetical order, the first year by member States beginning with the letters A to J, and the second year by those names beginning with the letters K to Z, or the converse¹² (for a list of Conventions grouped by subject, see page v).

25. The Committee notes that the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009) discussed the evaluation of the grouping of Conventions by subject for reporting purposes.¹³ The evaluation found that the grouping by subject had reduced the administrative burden and improved the collection of information at the national level in terms of reporting and had allowed for a comprehensive view of the application of Conventions by subject area. The Committee notes that at the same session the Governing Body decided to adopt a broader grouping of Conventions for reporting purposes with a three-year cycle for the fundamental and governance conventions and a five-year cycle for the other Conventions. This grouping will be established on the basis of the four strategic objectives of the ILO, which have been laid down by the Social Justice Declaration: employment, social protection, social dialogue and tripartism, and fundamental principles and rights at work. The Committee notes that arrangements are currently being made to give effect to this decision by the Governing Body and the new reporting cycle is not expected to start operating before 2011. Until that time, the reporting cycle will continue to operate under the arrangements currently in force.

26. In addition to the reports requested according to the reporting cycle, the Committee also had before it reports especially requested from certain governments for one of the following reasons:

- (a) a first detailed report was due after ratification;
- (b) important discrepancies had previously been noted between national law or practice and the Conventions in question;
- (c) reports due for the previous period had not been received or did not contain the information requested;
- (d) reports were expressly requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Committee also had before it a number of reports that it was unable to examine at its previous session.

27. In some cases, reports are not accompanied by copies of the relevant legislation, statistical data or other documentation necessary for their full examination. In cases where this material was not otherwise available, the Office, as requested by the Committee, has written to the governments concerned asking them to supply the necessary texts to enable the Committee to fulfil its tasks.

28. Appendix I of this report lists the reports received and not received, classified by country/territory and by Convention. Appendix II shows, for each year in which the Conference has met since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

Reports requested and received

29. This year a total of 3,121 reports (under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution) were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by member States compared to 2,868 reports last year. At the end of the present session of the Committee, 2,053 reports had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 65.78 per cent of the reports requested. Last year, the Office received a total of 1,985 reports, representing 69.21 per cent.

30. In accordance with article 22 of the Constitution, 2,733 reports were requested from governments. Of these, 1,853 had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 68 per cent of the reports requested (compared to 70.24 per cent last year). The Committee wishes to express its gratitude to the 91 member States, which have submitted all the reports due this year.

31. In accordance with article 35 of the Constitution, 388 reports were requested on Conventions declared applicable with or without modifications to non-metropolitan territories. Of these, 200 reports, or 52 per cent, had been received by the end of the Committee's session (compared to 61.82 per cent last year).

32. The Committee notes that this year the number of reports requested was higher than last year and that this increase is also reflected in the number of reports received. Moreover member States were asked to reply in an exceptionally short time to a new format of report under article 19 of the Constitution encompassing several employment instruments covered by the General Survey.¹⁴ Notwithstanding these particular circumstances, a significantly higher number of reports under article 19 of the Constitution have been received than last year.¹⁵ The Committee encourages governments and the Office to continue their respective efforts to ensure the submission of reports. The Committee will continue to follow this issue closely and will draw the attention of the Conference Committee to it, where necessary.

¹⁵ See paragraph 99 of the General Report.

Compliance with reporting obligations

33. Most of the governments from which reports were due on the application of ratified Conventions have supplied most or all of the reports requested (see Appendix I). However, no reports due have been received for the past two or more years from the following 14 countries: Burundi, Cape Verde, Czech Republic, Eritrea, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, United Republic of Tanzania (Tanganyika), United Republic of Tanzania (Zanzibar), Turkmenistan, United Kingdom (British Virgin Islands), United Kingdom (Falkland Islands (Malvinas)) and Vanuatu. In addition, the following 37 countries have not submitted the total or the majority of the reports due this year: Afghanistan, Armenia, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Congo, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, France, Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Malta, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, San Marino, Senegal, Seychelles, Slovakia, Solomon Islands, Thailand, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, United Kingdom (Gibraltar), United Kingdom (Montserrat), United Kingdom (St Helena), Uzbekistan, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

34. The Committee urges the governments of these countries to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions. As it emphasized in paragraph 18, the Committee is aware that where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems can make it difficult for the government concerned to fulfil its constitutional obligations. In this respect, the Committee is bound to recall the importance of the assistance provided by the Office, in particular through the specialists on international labour standards in the external offices, in helping the governments concerned to overcome these difficulties.

Late reports

35. The reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due consideration is given, when setting this date, to the time required to translate the reports and, where necessary, to conduct research into legislation and review other documents that are relevant to the examination of reports.

36. The Committee is grateful to the 88 countries which have submitted all the reports due on time.¹⁶ However, the Committee observes that by 1 September 2009, the proportion of reports received was 24.9 per cent, compared with 32.4 per cent at its previous session. The Committee expresses serious concern at the significant decrease in the number of reports received on time. It reiterates that the supervisory system can function adequately only if reports are communicated in due time. This is particularly true in the case of first reports or reports on Conventions where there are serious or continuing discrepancies, which the Committee has to examine in greater depth. The Committee urges governments to make a special effort to ensure the submission of reports in time next year. For this purpose, it also asks the Office to continue to provide technical assistance to help member States send reports by 1 September.

37. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a number of countries sent some or all of the reports due by 1 September 2008 on ratified Conventions during the period between the end of the Committee's last session (November–December 2008) and the beginning of the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), or even during the Conference.¹⁷ The Committee emphasizes that this practice also disturbs the regular operation of the supervisory system and makes it more burdensome. It wishes to provide below the list of countries which followed this practice in 2008–09, as requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards: Angola (Convention No. 107); Armenia (Conventions Nos 26, 132); Barbados (Conventions Nos 12, 17, 19, 42, 97, 100, 101, 102, 105, 118, 122, 128, 138, 144, 172, 182); Belize (Conventions Nos 97, 98, 101, 150, 151, 182, 183); Botswana (Conventions Nos 14, 29, 98, 105, 111, 138, 144, 182); Brazil (Convention No. 142); Cameroon (Convention No. 158); Chad (Conventions Nos 14, 29, 41, 81, 105, 132, 138); Côte d'Ivoire (Conventions Nos 3, 14, 29, 41, 52, 81, 105, 110, 129, 138, 182); Denmark (Conventions Nos 149, 182); Denmark (Faeroe Islands) (Conventions Nos 5, 6, 11, 14, 18, 19, 27, 29, 52, 87, 98, 105, 106, 126); Denmark (Greenland) (Conventions Nos 14, 29, 105, 106); Dominica (Conventions Nos 12, 14, 19, 81, 105, 135, 144, 150, 182); France (Conventions Nos 14, 29, 105, 106, 140); Gabon (Conventions Nos 29, 81, 105, 158); Gambia (Conventions Nos 105, 138, 182); Hungary (Conventions Nos 3, 14, 29, 81, 105, 129, 132, 138, 140, 142, 182, 183); Iceland (Conventions Nos 138, 182); Italy (Convention No. 117); Kenya (Conventions Nos 111, 142); Lao People's Democratic Republic (Conventions Nos 138, 182); Liberia (Conventions Nos 22, 23, 53, 55, 58, 81, 92, 105, 111, 112, 144, 147, 150, 182); Malawi (Conventions Nos 26, 81, 89, 98, 99, 107, 129, 149); Malaysia

Supply of first reports

38. The Committee notes with concern that only 52 of the 103 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time the Committee's session ended, compared to last year when 94 of the 164 first reports due had been received. However, a number of countries have failed to supply first reports, some of which are more than a year overdue. Thus, certain first reports on ratified Conventions have not been received for a certain number of years from the following ten member States:

- since 2004 – Antigua and Barbuda (Conventions Nos 161, 182);
- since 2007 – Armenia (Convention No. 160); since 2008 (Conventions Nos 87, 97, 138, 143, 182);
- since 2006 – Dominica (Convention No. 147);
- since 1998 – Equatorial Guinea (Conventions Nos 68, 92);
- since 1994 – Kyrgyzstan (Convention No. 111); since 2006 (Conventions Nos 17, 184);
- since 1992 – Liberia (Convention No. 133);
- since 2007 – Sao Tome and Principe (Conventions Nos 135, 138, 151, 154, 155, 182, 184);
- since 2007 – Seychelles (Conventions Nos 73, 144, 147, 152, 161, 180);
- since 1999 – Turkmenistan (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111);
- since 2008 – Vanuatu (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 182).

39. The Committee, like the Conference Committee, wishes to emphasize the importance of first reports. They provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the observance of ratified Conventions by member States. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply these reports.

Replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies

40. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee, and the majority of governments have provided the replies requested. In accordance with the established practice, the Office has written to all the governments which failed to provide such replies requesting them to supply the necessary information. The Committee notes with serious concern that of the 38 governments to which such letters were sent, only one has provided the information requested.

41. There are still many cases of failure to reply to its comments in which, either:

- (a) no reply has been received to all the reports requested from governments; or
- (b) the reports received contained no reply to most of the Committee's comments (observations and/or direct requests), and/or did not reply to the letters sent by the Office.

42. In total, there were 695 cases in which no reply was received (concerning 48 countries).¹⁸ There were 519 such cases (concerning 46 countries) last year. Under these conditions, the Committee is bound to repeat the observations or direct requests already made on the Conventions in question.

¹⁸ Afghanistan (Conventions Nos 100, 105, 111); Armenia (Conventions Nos 81, 98, 100, 111, 122, 135, 144, 151, 154); Bulgaria (Conventions Nos 22, 23, 53, 55, 56, 68, 69, 73, 87, 98, 100, 108, 111, 146, 147, 163, 164, 166, 178, 179, 180); Burkina Faso (Conventions Nos 87, 98, 100, 111, 144, 150); Burundi (Conventions Nos 14, 29, 52, 81, 87, 89, 98, 100, 101, 105, 111, 135, 138, 144, 182); Cambodia (Conventions Nos 87, 98, 100, 105); Cape Verde (Conventions Nos 17, 19, 29, 81, 87, 98, 100, 111, 118, 182); Congo (Conventions Nos 29, 81, 87, 89, 95, 98, 100, 105, 111, 138, 144, 149, 150, 152, 182); Croatia (Conventions Nos 8, 22, 23, 53, 56, 69, 73, 74, 87, 91, 92, 98, 100, 111, 122, 147, 179); Czech Republic (Conventions Nos 1, 14, 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 122, 132, 135, 140, 144, 150, 160, 171, 182); Democratic Republic of the Congo (Conventions Nos 29, 62, 87, 94, 98, 100, 105, 111, 117, 119, 121, 135, 144, 150, 158); Djibouti (Conventions Nos 1, 9, 16, 23, 26, 38, 55, 56, 63, 71, 73, 87, 94, 95, 96, 98, 100, 101, 106, 111, 115, 120, 122, 144); Dominica (Conventions Nos 16, 19, 29, 81, 95, 100, 105, 111, 138); Equatorial Guinea (Conventions Nos 1, 29, 30, 87, 98, 103, 105, 111, 138, 182); Eritrea (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 138); Ethiopia (Conventions Nos 87, 98, 100, 111, 156, 158); France (Conventions Nos 16, 22, 23, 27, 53, 69, 73, 74, 88, 96, 122, 134, 137, 145, 149, 163, 164, 166, 178, 179, 180); Guinea (Conventions Nos 3, 16, 26, 29, 81, 87, 89, 90, 94, 95, 98, 99, 100, 105, 111, 113, 115, 117, 118, 119, 121, 122, 132, 133, 134, 136, 138, 140, 142, 143, 144, 148, 149, 150, 152, 156, 159, 182); Guinea-Bissau (Conventions Nos 7, 12, 14, 17, 18, 19, 29, 69, 73, 74, 81, 89, 91, 92, 98, 100, 105, 106, 108, 111); Guyana (Conventions Nos 19, 29, 42, 81, 87, 97, 98, 100, 111, 129, 137, 138, 140, 142, 144, 149, 150, 166, 172, 175, 182); Islamic Republic of Iran (Conventions Nos 14, 19, 29, 95, 100, 106, 111, 122, 182); Ireland (Conventions Nos 14, 23, 29, 100, 111, 122, 132, 138, 144, 147, 160, 172, 177, 178, 179, 180, 182); Kiribati (Conventions Nos 29,

43. The failure of the governments concerned to fulfil their obligations considerably hinders the work of the supervisory bodies. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session (June 2009) of the International Labour Conference expressed regret at the significant number of cases of failure to reply to the comments. Within the framework of the follow-up on cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting obligations, the Office has specifically drawn the attention of the governments concerned to the necessity to submit the information requested.¹⁹ Like the Conference Committee, the Committee cannot overemphasize the importance of ensuring the communication of the replies to its comments. It therefore urges the governments concerned to send the information required, with the assistance of the Office, if appropriate.

B. Examination by the Committee of Experts of reports on ratified Conventions

44. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its normal practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. Reports received early enough are sent to the members concerned in advance of the Committee's session. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

Observations and direct requests

45. In many cases, the Committee has found that no comment is called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention has been implemented.²⁰ In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form either of "observations", which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or "direct requests", which are not published in the Committee's report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned.²¹

46. The Committee's observations appear in Part II (sections I and II) of this report, together with a list under each Convention of any direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

Special notes

47. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes at the end of the observations (traditionally known as footnotes) the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has seemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case and, in some instances, to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in June 2010.

48. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following general considerations. First, the criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of the criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, the criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a "single footnote", as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a “double footnote”. The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Third, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of the case in the Conference Committee. Finally, the Committee wishes to point out that it exercises restraint in its recourse to double footnotes in deference to the Conference Committee’s decisions as to the cases it wishes to discuss.

49. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers’ health, safety and well-being, as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;
- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case-specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life-threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government’s response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

50. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

51. This year, under the present reporting cycle the Committee has requested early reports after an interval of either one or two years, according to the circumstances, in the following cases:

Practical application

54. It is customary for the Committee to note the information contained in governments' reports allowing it to assess the application of the Conventions in practice, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as the specific terms of some Conventions.

55. The Committee notes that 409 reports received this year contain information on the practical application of Conventions. Of these, 63 reports contain information on national jurisprudence. The Committee also notes that 346 of the reports contain information on statistics and labour inspection.

56. The Committee wishes to emphasize to governments the importance of submitting such information, which is indispensable to complete the examination of national legislation and to help the Committee to identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee also wishes to encourage employers' and workers' organizations to submit clear and up to date information on the application of Conventions in practice.

²² Detailed reports are to be drawn up in accordance with the report form approved by the Governing Body for each Convention. They are requested the year following the entry into force of a Convention or where they are explicitly requested by the Committee of Experts or the Conference Committee. Subsequently simplified reports are requested periodically (see the decisions of the Governing Body in this respect: GB.282/LILS/5 (November 2001) and GB.283/LILS/6 (March 2002)).

Cases of progress

57. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions. Over the years, the Committee has developed a general approach, described below, concerning the identification of cases of progress.

58. At the outset, and in light of the discussion held this year to clarify the distinction between cases of progress and cases of good practice, the Committee wishes to clarify the following.

- (1) The Committee exercises its discretion in noting progress, taking into account the particular nature of the Convention and the specific circumstances of the country:
- (2) The expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures relating to national legislation, policy or practice.
- (3) The Committee must emphasize that an expression of progress is limited to a specific issue arising out of the application of the Convention and the nature of the measure taken by the government concerned.
- (4) The expression of interest or satisfaction is not a reflection of the overall compliance with the Convention by the country in question. Therefore, in the same comment, the Committee may express satisfaction or interest on a particular issue, while expressing regret on important issues which in its view have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner.
- (5) If the satisfaction or interest relates to the adoption of legislation or draft legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up measures for its practical application.

59. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,²³ the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through either the adoption of new legislation, an amendment to the existing legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold:

- to place on record the Committee's appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments; and
- to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues.

60. Details concerning these cases of progress are to be found in Part II of this report and cover 71 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 49 countries. The full list is as follows:

61. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 2,740 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

62. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.²⁴ In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. In comparison to cases of satisfaction, cases of interest relate to progress, which is less significant. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may encompass a variety of measures. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention. This may include:

- draft legislation that is before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes forwarded or available to the Committee;
- consultations within the government and with the social partners;
- new policies;
- the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office;
- judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system, would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there is a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction; or
- the Committee may also note as cases of interest the progress made by a State, province or territory in the framework of a federal system.

63. Details concerning the cases in question are to be found either in Part II of this report or in the requests addressed directly to the governments concerned, and include 276 instances in which measures of this kind have been adopted in 114 countries. The full list is as follows:

Cases of good practices

64. In accordance with the decision taken at its 78th Session (November–December 2007), the Committee highlights cases of good practice to express its appreciation of the special efforts in applying a Convention, and so that they might where appropriate serve as a model for other countries to assist in the implementation of ratified Conventions and the furtherance of social progress. At its 79th Session (November–December 2008), the Committee agreed on the general criteria that it would apply to identify cases of good practice. The Committee further agreed that it would continue to follow a two-stage process for the identification of cases of good practice: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee that measure or measures should be identified as a case of good practice; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions (it will be recalled that this two-stage process is also used for the so-called “double footnotes”: see paragraph 50 above). This year, in its examination of the criteria used, the Committee focused, in particular, on clarifying the distinction between cases of good practice and cases of progress. In this respect, the Committee wishes to underline at the outset that cases of good practice are necessarily also cases of progress, although the reverse is not always true.

65. The Committee wishes to point out that the identification of a case of good practice does not in any way imply additional obligations for member States under the Conventions that they have ratified. Moreover, mere compliance with the requirements of a Convention is not sufficient for the identification of a case of good practice, as compliance is a basic requirement deriving from ratification of the Convention. Cases of good practice are therefore of an informative rather than of a prescriptive nature. Their identification forms part of the ongoing dialogue with the government concerned on the application of a ratified Convention and can relate to any measure taken in national legislation, policy or practice. A certain caution must clearly be exercised in the identification of cases of good practice so as to minimize the possibility that such practices may with hindsight come to be viewed as unsatisfactory. Bearing in mind these aspects, the Committee wishes to confirm the following three criteria, which were already identified at its 79th Session (November–December 2008), on the understanding that they are indicative, but not exhaustive.

- (1) A case of good practice may consist of a new approach to achieving or improving compliance with the Convention and could therefore be useful as a model for other countries in implementing that Convention.
- (2) The practice may reflect an innovative or creative way of either implementing the Convention, or of addressing difficulties which arise in its application.
- (3) Recognizing that Conventions lay down minimum standards, the practice may offer an example of a country extending the application or coverage of the Convention to enhance the achievement of its objectives, particularly in cases where the Convention contains flexibility clauses.

Cases in which the need for technical assistance has been highlighted

66. The combination of the work of the supervisory bodies and the practical guidance given to member States through technical cooperation and assistance has always been one of the key dimensions of the ILO supervisory system. Further, since 2005, at the initiative of the Conference Committee, heightened attention has been given to the complementarity between examination by the ILO supervisory bodies and the Office’s technical assistance. As pointed out in paragraphs 15–22, this has led to enhanced follow-up of cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. In addition, the Conference Committee has made more systematic references to technical assistance in its conclusions regarding individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions. The aim of this strengthened combination between the work of the supervisory bodies and the Office’s technical assistance is to provide an effective framework to member States for full compliance with their standards-related obligations, including the implementation of the Conventions which they have ratified.

67. In this context, the Committee decided at its 79th Session (November–December 2008) to highlight the cases for which, in the Committee’s view, technical assistance would be particularly useful in helping member States to address gaps in law and in practice in the implementation of ratified Conventions. Details of these cases can be found in Part II of the report of the Committee of Experts. The Committee also takes note of a general request for technical assistance by the Government of Argentina in particular to provide support to the examination of the legislative questions raised by the supervisory bodies. The specific case concerning the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182): Time-bound Programmes

68. The Committee notes that the Time-bound Programmes (TBPs) are a set of tightly integrated and coordinated policies and programmes to prevent and eliminate a country's worst forms of child labour within a defined period of time. It is a comprehensive approach that operates at different levels: family or individual, community, provincial, national, global. TBPs are country-owned programmes, in which the International Programme for the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) and other development partners fulfil a support role. They emphasize the need to protect the rights of children and address the root causes of child labour, linking action against child labour to the national development effort, with particular emphasis on economic and social policies to combat poverty and to promote universal basic education and social mobilization. The following contains the list of countries that benefit or have benefited from a TBP (period covered 2008 and 2009) supported by IPEC.

Questions concerning the application of certain Conventions

69. This year, the report contains two general observations on the application of ratified Conventions. The first appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), and deals with the registration of enterprises and the annual reports on the work of the labour inspection services. A second general observation, which appears as an introduction to the individual examination of reports due on the application of the wages-related Conventions, deals with the application of these Conventions in the context of the global economic crisis.

70. At its previous session, the Committee had made a general observation on the application of ILO social security standards in the context of the global financial crisis in which it invited member States to provide detailed information on the impact of the crisis on national social security systems and the measures taken or planned with a view to maintaining their financial viability and reinforcing social protection for the most vulnerable groups of the population. The Committee is grateful to the 41 governments which responded, highlighting the global nature of the crisis and the variety of the situations affecting national social security systems. Many reports contained detailed explanations of the legal, financial and organizational measures taken to strengthen the provision of social security to the most affected categories of the population. The Committee will analyse these replies within the framework of its General Survey on social security in 2010.

Comments made by employers' and workers' organizations

71. At each session, the Committee draws the attention of governments to the important role of employers' and workers' organizations in the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Moreover, it highlights the fact that numerous Conventions require consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, or their collaboration in a variety of measures. The Committee notes that almost all governments have indicated in the reports supplied under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, they have communicated copies of the reports supplied to the Office. The Committee recalls however that last year for the first time it noted with concern an increase in the number of governments which did not indicate in their reports the representative organizations of employers and workers to which copies of the reports shall be communicated. The Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session (June 2009) of the International Labour Conference echoed this concern, which it considered a significant problem in view of the tripartite nature of the ILO. The Committee is pleased to note that the two countries for which it made observations on this issue last year have now complied with their obligations under article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution.

72. Since its last session, the Committee has received 705 comments (compared to 630 last year), 115 (compared to 57 last year) of which were communicated by employers' organizations and 590 (compared to 573 last year) by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to this contribution by employers' and workers' organizations to the work of the supervisory bodies. This contribution is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of ratified Conventions in law and in practice.

73. The majority of the comments received (527) relate to the application of ratified Conventions (see Appendix III).²⁵ Some (327) of these comments relate to the application of fundamental Conventions, 40 relate to governance Conventions and 160 concern the application of other Conventions. Moreover, (178) comments concern reports provided by governments under article 19 of the Constitution on the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189), and the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193).²⁶

74. The Committee notes that, of the comments received this year, (455) were transmitted directly to the Office which, in accordance with the practice established by the Committee, referred them to the governments concerned for comment. The Committee emphasizes that comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest to allow governments to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine the issues in question at its session in November the same year. Comments received later than 1 September will be examined by the Committee at its session the following year. In (250) cases, the governments transmitted the comments made by employers' and workers' organizations with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments.

75. The Committee also examined a number of other comments by employers' and workers' organizations, consideration of which had been postponed from its previous session because the comments of the organizations or the replies of the governments had arrived just before, during or just after the session. It again had to postpone until its next session the examination of a number of comments when they were received too close to or even during the Committee's present session, in particular to allow reasonable time for the governments concerned to make comments.

76. The Committee notes that in general the employers' and workers' organizations concerned endeavoured to gather and present elements of law and fact on the application in practice of ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls that it is essential for the organizations, when referring specifically to the Convention or Conventions deemed relevant, to provide detailed information that has real additional value with regard to the information provided by governments and the issues addressed in the Committee's comments. Such information should help to update or renew the analysis of the application of Conventions and emphasize real problems concerning their application in practice. The Committee invites the organizations interested to request technical assistance from the Office to this end.

Treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations in a non-reporting year

77. The Committee recalls that at its 77th Session (November–December 2006), it gave guidance to the Office as to the procedure to be followed in determining the treatment of comments received from employers' and workers' organizations concerning the application of a ratified Convention in a non-reporting year. This year, the Committee examined this procedure in light of the decision of the Governing Body at its 306th Session (November 2009) to extend the cycle for the submission of reports from two to three years for the fundamental and governance Conventions. In this respect, the Committee is fully conscious of the need to apply in a fair and judicious manner the decisions taken by the Governing Body to extend the reporting cycle and to ensure that employers' and workers' organizations comments may effectively draw its attention to areas of concern, even when no report on the Convention in question is due from the government that year.

78. The Committee confirms that, where the comments received from employers' and workers' organizations simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, they will be examined in accordance with the normal cycle in the year when the government's report is due, and a report will not be requested from the government outside that cycle. This procedure may also be followed in the case of comments which provide additional information on law and practice concerning matters already raised by the Committee, or on minor legislative changes, although consideration may be given, depending on the specific circumstances, to requesting an advanced report in such cases.

79. However, where the comment raises more serious allegations of important acts of non-compliance with a particular Convention – as opposed to mere repetitions – the government will be requested to reply to these allegations outside the normal reporting cycle and the Committee will consider the comments in the year in which they are received, where the allegations go beyond mere declarations. Comments referring to important legislative changes, or to proposals which have a fundamental impact on the application of a Convention will be considered in the same manner, as will comments which refer to minor, new legislative proposals or draft laws, not yet examined by the Committee, where their early examination may assist the government at the drafting stage.

80. The Committee emphasizes that the procedure set out above aims at giving effect to decisions taken by the Governing Body which have both extended the reporting cycle and provided for safeguards in that context to ensure that effective supervision of the application of ratified Conventions is maintained. One of these safeguards consists in giving due recognition to the possibility afforded to employers' and workers' organizations to draw the attention of the Committee to matters of particular concern arising from the application of ratified Conventions, even in a year when no report is due; in such cases, comments received directly by the Office are communicated to the governments concerned in a timely fashion so as to ensure respect for due process. The Committee will continue to give full and careful consideration to all the elements made available to it in order to ensure the effective, up to date and regular monitoring of the application of ratified Conventions in the context of the new extended reporting cycle for the fundamental and governance Conventions.

81. The comments received are examined in the observations made by the Committee (Part II of this report or in requests addressed directly to the governments).

C. Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

82. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by the governments of member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization:

- (a) information on the steps taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 96th Session (Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 199) on 14 June 2007;
- (b) replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 79th Session (November–December 2008).

83. Appendix IV of Part Two of the report contains a summary indicating, where appropriate, the name of the competent authority to which the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 96th Session in 2007 were submitted and the date of submission.

84. Other statistical information is to be found in Appendices V and VI of Part Two of the report. Appendix V, compiled from information sent by governments, shows where each member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall situation of instruments adopted since the 51st Session (June 1967) of the Conference. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent branches of the Office and can be accessed via the Internet.

96th Session

85. At its 96th Session in May–June 2007, the Conference adopted the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), and Recommendation, 2007 (No. 199). The 12-month period for submission to the competent authorities of Convention No. 188 and Recommendation No. 199 ended on 14 June 2008, and the 18-month period on 14 December 2008. In all, 65 governments out of the 178 member States concerned have sent new information on the steps taken in this regard: Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Bahrain, Belarus, Benin, Brazil, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, China, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Honduras, Hungary, Iceland, India, Indonesia, Israel, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Lebanon, Lithuania, Mauritania, Mauritius, Mexico, Morocco, Myanmar, Namibia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Oman, Philippines, Poland, Romania, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Serbia, Singapore, Slovakia, Slovenia, South Africa, Spain, Switzerland, Timor-Leste, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, United States, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Cases of progress

86. The Committee notes with interest the information sent in 2009 by the Governments of Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Chad, Senegal, Spain and Timor-Leste. It welcomes the efforts made by these governments to make up for the significant delay in submission and thus fulfil their obligation to submit to their parliamentary bodies the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

87. To facilitate the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, this report only mentions the governments which have not provided information on submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference for at least the seven sessions held from 2001 (i.e. from the 89th Session to the 96th Session in 2007). This time frame was deemed long enough to warrant inviting Government delegations to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they could account for the delays in submissions.

88. The explanations provided in June 2009 to the Conference Committee by 14 Government delegations show that these countries intend to make up for the delay in submission to the competent authorities rapidly. Some delegations have referred to peculiarities linked to the transmission of the instruments adopted by the Conference through the various governmental and regional authorities. Others have mentioned a lack of human resources in the administrative departments responsible for standard issues.

89. The Committee notes that these arguments still cannot justify the delay in fulfilling the obligation under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. Several governments have recently demonstrated diligence and have shown that they anticipate obtaining the texts in the national languages to attract greater attention from members of parliament. Furthermore, it should be borne in mind that, in fulfilling this obligation, prior discussions with the social partners are also important.

90. The Committee notes that at the closure of its 80th Session, on 11 December 2009, 49 governments have failed to provide information on the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference over the seven sessions which corresponded to the period of reference in 2009 (i.e. from the 89th Session in June 2001 to the 96th Session in May–June 2007). The governments concerned are as follows: Antigua and Barbuda, Bahrain, Bangladesh, Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, Chile, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Guinea, Haiti, Ireland, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mozambique, Nepal, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Sudan, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Uzbekistan, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela and Zambia.

91. These countries have been identified in the observations published in this report and the instruments which have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. The Committee therefore considers it useful to draw the attention of these countries to this matter so that they can immediately, as a matter of urgency, take the appropriate measures to bring themselves up to date.

92. The Committee also hopes that the government authorities and the social partners in these countries will be the first to benefit from the measures that the Office will take to assist them in the steps required for the rapid submission to the legislative body of the pending instruments.

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

93. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations in section III of Part Two of this report on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. Observations are made in cases where there has been no information for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see the list of direct requests at the end of section III).

94. The Committee hopes that the 74 observations and 48 direct requests that it is addressing this year to governments will enable them to better discharge their constitutional obligation of submission, thereby contributing to the promotion of the standards adopted by the Conference.

95. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments send the information and documents required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive, for examination, a summary or a copy of the documents submitting the instruments to the parliamentary bodies and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on them. The obligation of submission is only discharged once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to parliament and the competent authorities have taken a decision on them. The Office has to be informed of this decision, as well as of the submission of instruments to parliament.

96. The Committee notes with concern that during the last ten years, as shown in Appendix VI to the report, there has been a significant decline in timely submission of instruments to the competent authorities. It hopes to be able to note progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

D. Instruments chosen for reports under article 19 of the Constitution

97. In accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body,²⁷ governments were requested to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution as a basis for the General Survey on the following instruments: the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142), the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189), and the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193).

98. A total of 826 reports were requested and 460 were received (compared to last year when 492 reports were requested and 262 were received).²⁸ This represents 55.69 per cent of the reports requested.

99. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution have been received from the following 22 countries: Cape Verde, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Liberia, Russian Federation, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Somalia, Swaziland, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Timor-Leste, Togo, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Uzbekistan and Vanuatu.

100. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible. It hopes that the Office will supply all the necessary technical assistance to this end.

101. Part III of this report (issued separately as Report III (Part 1B)) contains the General Survey on employment. In accordance with the practice followed in previous years, the survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising five members of the Committee.

III. Highlights and major trends

102. In accordance with its decision at its 78th Session (November–December 2007),²⁹ the Committee considers that it is useful to draw attention to the following highlights and major trends in relation to topical issues arising from the reports that it has examined this year.

A. Sixtieth anniversary of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

103. In this, its 60th anniversary year, the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention has become more relevant than ever to the growing needs of the labour market in a globalized environment. The Convention is of fundamental importance for the realization of decent work and social justice throughout the world. The Committee would recall, in this regard, that respect for fundamental principles and rights at work is not only essential for human dignity, but also critical to recovery and development. In such times of economic crisis as the present, it is vitally important that a culture of social dialogue be established, and in particular that collective bargaining be promoted as a useful mechanism for engaging in dialogue to effectively address the issue of economic recovery. Collective bargaining is an important mechanism by which enterprises, in full and meaningful dialogue with workers' organizations, can ensure their sustainability both in times of growth and in times of crisis. Collective bargaining gives representational voice to the workers in a way that enables innovation in decision-making and can maximize the impact of crisis responses to the needs of the real economy, while ensuring meaningful protection of workers' rights.

104. The Committee thus affirms the importance of the development, to the widest degree possible, of collective agreements between employers and their organizations, on the one hand, and, on the other, workers' organizations – whose very raison d'être is to bargain collectively on behalf of the workers they represent. The Committee further wishes to emphasize in this regard the importance it attaches to the establishment of effective mechanisms for ensuring adequate protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. Clearly such mechanisms, including effective and rapid procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, are essential to ensuring organizational rights in practice and thus constitute the bedrock for any meaningful promotion of collective bargaining. The rights to organize and to bargain collectively go hand in hand and, by regulating terms and conditions of work at all levels through social dialogue and the conclusion of collective agreements, collective bargaining makes an invaluable contribution towards social and economic progress, harmonious industrial relations, and social justice, particularly in times of crisis.

B. Relevance and application of ILO wage-related Conventions in the context of the global economic crisis

105. The ongoing global economic crisis – the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression – has impacted severely on the wage income of millions of workers around the world. The economic crisis has led to job losses while also exerting downward pressure on real wages. The global number of unemployed persons is expected to rise by 38 million in 2009 while over 75 million people could be added to the working poor as a result of the reduction of incomes at the household level and the erosion of purchasing power.³⁰ According to a recent ILO survey of wage indicators, real wages have fallen in the first quarter of 2009 in more than half of the 35 countries for which data are available and the situation is likely to get worse.³¹ These trends are not only a major social issue but also an economic one. Indeed, a downward wage spiral would affect global demand and aggravate the crisis.³² This is why the Global Jobs Pact, adopted by the International Labour Conference in June 2009, warns against a race to the bottom in wages and stresses the importance of enhancing support for vulnerable women and men hit hard by the crisis including youth at risk, low-wage, low-skilled, informal economy and migrant workers (paragraph 9).

²⁹ Report of the Committee of Experts, General Report, Report III (Part 1A), ILC, 97th Session, 2008, para. 8(2).

³⁰ See The financial and economic crisis: A decent work response, ILO, 2009, pp. 12–13.

Maintaining decent minimum wage levels

106. Minimum wage fixing is a tool for poverty reduction and social protection by ensuring the satisfaction of the basic needs of the low-paid, unskilled workers and their families. Minimum wage systems, however, may function meaningfully only if minimum wage rates are periodically re-examined and readjusted so as to reflect socio-economic realities and maintain the purchasing power of the minimum wage by reference to a basket of basic consumer goods. With minimum wages representing in most countries 25 to 40 per cent of the average wage and in some countries set well below the poverty line, there is a risk of the minimum wage floor for the most vulnerable groups of wage earners being lowered to simply unsustainable levels. The risk is even greater in times of crisis as many governments feel pressured to freeze minimum wages as a means of containing labour costs and avoiding job losses (although in the current crisis, a number of countries have adjusted their minimum wages upwards). The Committee has consistently taken the view that minimum wage systems are effectively emptied of all their practical significance when statutory minimum wages remain unchanged for long periods of time or when revised rates manifestly fail to keep abreast of variations in economic indicators such as the inflation rate.

107. The Committee considers it essential to recall that the periodic adjustment of minimum wages, through a process guaranteeing the full consultation and participation of the social partners on an equal footing, and based on regular and independent surveys of the national economic conditions, is a core element of a minimum wage system as envisaged in the Minimum Wage Fixing Convention, 1970 (No. 131), which sets out the most up to date standards in this area. In this connection, the Committee notes with special interest that, in adopting the Global Jobs Pact, ILO member States agreed that “minimum wages should be regularly reviewed and adapted” (paragraph 12) and further reaffirmed that “Governments should consider options such as minimum wages that can reduce poverty and inequity, increase demand and contribute to economic stability”, making express reference to Convention No. 131 as providing guidance in this respect (paragraph 23).

108. In periods of crisis, the enforcement of the minimum wage through the effective control and supervision of labour inspection services becomes of crucial importance. Strengthening the institutional capacity of labour inspection services to monitor the situation of pay conditions in the labour market and to apply truly dissuasive sanctions for those violating the minimum permissible wage levels is a crucial prerequisite for the implementation of any minimum wage policy.

109. The Committee is equally concerned about other abusive pay practices such as the growing recourse to undeclared wages, also known as “envelope wages”, whereby employees are officially paid at the minimum wage rate – while a further sum is paid to them informally in cash – in order to minimize taxation and social contributions. In Turkey, for instance, the percentage of private sector workers earning the minimum wage stood at 52 per cent in 2006 which is thought to be explained by the high incidence of undeclared wages. One survey covering 2,000 garment workers in seven cities in Turkey demonstrated that 88.2 per cent of the workers concerned received envelope wages.³³ Such practices distort data and render impossible a proper analysis of the operation of a minimum wage system with all the negative implications this may have. More fundamentally, these practices erode the fiscal capacity needed to fund social protection and to thus help cope with the social impacts of the global crisis.

Preventing the vicious circle of wage arrears

110. Over the past 15 years, the Committee has extensively commented on the failure of numerous governments to ensure the regular payment of wages and prevent the accumulation of wage arrears in accordance with Article 12(1) of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95). As the Committee noted in its 2003 General Survey on the protection of wages, “the delayed payment of wages or the accumulation of wage debts clearly contravenes the letter and the spirit of the Convention and render the application of most of its other provisions simply meaningless” (paragraph 355). The Committee has been emphasizing the need for strong commitment and rigorous action on the part of governments in addressing the three key parameters of the problem, namely tight supervision, severe sanctions and appropriate compensation to workers for the loss incurred.

See also Jaan Masso and Kerly Krillo, “Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania: Minimum wages in a context of migration and labour shortages”, ibid., pp. 142–145.

111. The current economic crisis threatens in many countries – mainly among the “transition economies” of Eastern Europe and Central Asia which had experienced wage arrears on an alarmingly large scale in the late 1990s – the prospects of a complete elimination of outstanding wage debts and the beginning of a new cycle of wage arrears. Increased wage arrears would not only affect national economies but would also affect global demand and delay recovery from the crisis. The increase in wage arrears has already reached worrying levels in certain countries. For instance, in Ukraine, wage arrears nearly doubled from US$110 to US$201 million between April and July 2009. It is significant that wage arrears did not only affect bankrupt or inactive enterprises but also economically active enterprises that represented 64 per cent of total wage arrears in 2009, compared to 36 per cent the previous year.³⁴ Similarly, in the Russian Federation, wage arrears have constantly been rising for the last three years and now stand at US$262 million. Accumulated wage arrears are also reported in other countries, including Armenia (US$11 million), Kyrgyzstan (US$9.5 million) and Tajikistan (US$6.4 million). Unpaid wages are estimated to represent on average 8 per cent of the annual wage bill in the Commonwealth of Independent States (CIS) countries.³⁵ This situation creates great insecurity for workers and their families. Migrant workers may be especially affected by delayed or non-payment of wages due to massive job losses in sectors particularly hit by the crisis, such as construction, manufacturing and hotels and restaurants. In countries where work permits are linked to residency permits, the effective protection of the right of migrant workers to claim unpaid wages becomes all the more important as they may have to leave the country upon loss of employment.

112. In the present context, the Committee wishes to point out that as similar experiences in the recent past have shown, there is need to reaffirm that the payment of wages is not an “option” to be honoured if and when other conditions permit. It is also important to remember that any effort to tackle the problem of wage arrears should not result in some other abusive form of payment such as money surrogates or bonds and vouchers. Systematic collection of up to date statistics on the wage arrears phenomenon from reliable and independent sources is essential to any serious effort aimed at putting an end to the problem of wage arrears. Open and continuous social dialogue is indispensable to the search for negotiated solutions to problems which may only be resolved progressively. Finally, meaningful results in containing the accumulation of wage arrears cannot be expected in the absence of properly functioning labour inspection services and an adequate system of sanctions.

Protecting workers’ wage claims in the face of mounting insolvencies

113. Major economic crises invariably result in a significant rise in corporate bankruptcy or insolvency which often leads to not only massive lay-offs but also to claims for considerable sums of unpaid wages with dim prospects of recovery – through lengthy bankruptcy proceedings. This reinforces the need for proper regulatory frameworks that offer better chances for workers to effectively recover the sums owed to them. The Committee recalls, in this respect, that the ILO has adopted the Protection of Workers’ Claims (Employer’s Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173), which strengthens the system of privileged claims, established by Convention No. 95, but also introduces new forms of protection by means of wage guarantee institutions.

114. As the Committee indicated in its 2003 General Survey on the protection of wages, “at a time of growing uncertainty and gloomy economic forecast for the global economy, as has recently been confirmed and amplified by some of the most serious corporate bankruptcies of all times, the need for enhanced protection of workers’ earnings for work already performed is more pressing than ever and, in this respect, the significance of Convention No. 173 and Recommendation No. 180 can hardly be overemphasized” (paragraph 353). The objective of wage guarantee funds is of course the assurance of payment, yet such schemes call for cautious planning, mature social security institutions and solid social dialogue.

115. Although wage guarantee funds have so far been set up mostly in industrialized countries, such as Australia, the European Union Member States, Japan, the Republic of Korea and Switzerland, there is recently a growing interest in such institutions. For instance, Armenia ratified Convention No. 173 in 2005 accepting the obligations of Part III concerning the protection of workers’ claims by a guarantee institution while the Government of the Russian Federation is in the process of drafting new legislation on the subject. The Government of Ukraine, which ratified Convention No. 173 in 2006 but only with respect to Part II concerning the protection of workers’ claims by means of a privilege, is currently examining the feasibility of establishing a wage guarantee institution. The Committee trusts that the Office will continue to offer its advisory services with a view to assisting ILO member States in modernizing their legislation by moving towards the principles and rules reflected in Convention No. 173, in particular Part III dealing with wage guarantee funds.

Stimulating national economies through socially responsible public spending

116. Probably the most common policy response to the crisis has been infrastructure spending.³⁶ As construction is one of the hardest hit sectors and also particularly labour intensive, infrastructure projects generally focus on building and repair of roads, bridges, railway lines and rural infrastructure. However, there has been concern about the extent to which infrastructure projects increase employment and pay adequate wages. By ensuring that decent work is at the centre of crisis responses, the recovery will be faster and more sustainable. This also implies ensuring that migrant workers, noticeably present in the construction sector in a number of countries, equally benefit without discrimination from economic stimulus packages in countries of destination and that no wage inequalities emerge between nationals and migrant workers. Under these circumstances, the Committee considers that the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94), is highly relevant and offers a sound answer to the risk of pay inequalities which is exacerbated in times of crisis.

117. The Committee recalls that Convention No. 94 is about good governance and addresses socially responsible public procurement by requiring bidders/contractors to align themselves with wages, hours of work and other conditions of labour not less favourable than those established for work of the same character in the trade or industry concerned in the district where the work is carried on, as determined by collective agreement, arbitration award or by national laws or regulations. As the Committee concluded in its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, given the impact of globalization and the intense competition, “the objectives of the Convention are even more valid today than they were 60 years ago, and strengthen the ILO’s call for fair globalization” (paragraph 308). The ILO report, The financial and economic crisis: A decent work response, lists Convention No. 94 among the relevant ILO instruments in the crisis context that “can help ensure that investments financed by public stimulus packages generate jobs with decent pay and working conditions”.³⁷ Echoing the same view, in the recently adopted Global Jobs Pact, ILO member States stressed that “governments as employers and procurers should respect and promote negotiated wage rates” (paragraph 12).

118. The Committee recalls that despite its limitations, Convention No. 94 is the only multilateral Convention setting out a universal labour standard in the area of public contracting and firmly believes that it has an important role to play especially in periods of crisis. Recognizing its intrinsic value in the current context, the Office should pursue efforts at enhancing the visibility of the Convention and familiarizing state and non-state actors with its requirements.

Conclusion

119. In conclusion, the Committee emphasizes that wage protection takes on particular importance in times of crisis and therefore relevant standards should not be undermined but rather put at the centre of crisis responses, as is underlined in the Global Jobs Pact (paragraph 14). Indeed, this will support recovery and help put the economy on a sustainable track. Whether it is setting a decent minimum wage floor, ensuring the timely payment of wages, protecting wage claims in the event of the employer’s insolvency either by means of a privilege or through the intervention of a wage guarantee institution or preventing downward pressures on wages in the context of public procurement, ILO wages-related standards and principles serve as a reminder of the special nature of wages as the workers’ principal, if not sole, means of subsistence and hence of the need for targeted and priority action in this field. As the ILO Director-General has put it, “the different elements of the way forward are to be found in the international labour standards adopted, promoted and supervised by the ILO”.³⁸ The Committee hopes that ILO member States will act positively in the current economic downturn by carrying out the necessary reforms in wage legislation and wage policy consistent with the letter and the spirit of the above-highlighted Conventions.

IV. Collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments

A. Cooperation in the field of standards with the United Nations

120. The Committee notes that the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues (UNPFII), at its Eighth Session in May 2009, paid particular attention to the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), and the work of ILO supervisory bodies. The UNPFII recommended “that an appropriate form of coordination should be explored between the Committee of Experts and the Forum regarding the implementation of ILO Convention No. 169” and it “reiterate[d] the need for a mechanism of coordination to also be established between the ILO supervisory mechanisms and indigenous peoples, which may include the establishment of an ad hoc committee consisting of indigenous representatives or experts”.³⁹

121. With regard to the issue of coordination raised by the UNPFII, the Committee recalls that Convention No. 169 is one of the instruments in respect of which special arrangements have been made between the ILO and the United Nations, under which the UNPFII can contribute to the supervision of the application of this Convention. The Committee notes that a member of the UNPFII participated in the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards at its 98th Session (June 2009). The Committee considers that the issue of the access of indigenous and tribal peoples to the ILO supervisory mechanisms merits further study, particularly as Convention No. 169 is the only international treaty specifically dedicated to these peoples. It is, however, mindful that further discussions on this matter would have to take place in the competent bodies of the ILO.

B. United Nations treaties concerning human rights

122. The Committee recalls that international labour standards and the provisions of related United Nations human rights treaties are complementary and mutually reinforcing. It emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations with regard to the application and supervision of relevant instruments is necessary, particularly in the context of United Nations reforms aimed at greater coherence and cooperation within the United Nations system and the human rights-based approach to development.

123. The Committee welcomes the fact that the Office has continued to provide information on the application of international labour standards to the United Nations treaty bodies on a regular basis, in accordance with the existing arrangements between the ILO and the United Nations. It also continued to follow the work of these bodies and to take their comments into consideration where appropriate. The Committee considers that coherent international monitoring is an important basis for action to enhance the enjoyment of and compliance with economic, social and cultural rights at the national level. The Committee itself had the opportunity to continue its collaboration with the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the context of the annual meeting between the two Committees which took place on 26 November 2009, at the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. This year, “social security, social assistance and protection against poverty” was selected as a topic for discussion and representatives of the European Committee of Social Rights also participated in the meeting.

124. The Committee notes that the Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, adopted by the United Nations General Assembly on 10 December 2008, has obtained 30 signatures to date. The Committee considers it essential for its collaboration with the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights to be strengthened, especially when the Optional Protocol enters into force.

C. European Code of Social Security and its Protocol

125. In accordance with the supervisory procedure established under Article 74, paragraph 4, of the European Code of Social Security, and the arrangements made between the ILO and the Council of Europe, the Committee of Experts examined 20 reports on the application of the Code and, as appropriate, its Protocol. At the sitting in which the Committee examined the reports on the Code and its Protocol, the Council of Europe was represented by Ms Ana Gomez Heredero. The conclusions of the Committee regarding these reports will be sent to the Council of Europe for examination by its Committee of Experts on Social Security. Once approved, the Committee’s comments should lead to the adoption of resolutions by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the application of the Code and the Protocol by the countries concerned.

126. With its dual responsibility for the application of the Code and for international labour Conventions relating to social security, the Committee is seeking to develop a coherent analysis of the application of European and international instruments and to coordinate the obligations of the States parties to these instruments. The Committee also draws attention to the national situations in which recourse to technical assistance from the Council of Europe and the Office may prove to be an effective means of improving the application of the Code.

127. Lastly, the Committee would like to express its appreciation for the invaluable assistance again rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its increasingly voluminous and complex task in a limited period of time.

Geneva, 11 December 2009.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution)

General observations

Antigua and Barbuda

The Committee notes that the great majority of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received. It welcomes the fact that the measures taken by the Government in 2008 to fulfil its constitutional obligation of reporting have had a lasting effect. However, it notes that difficulties persist relating to the sending of the two first detailed reports on Conventions Nos 161 and 182, which have been due since 2004. The Government has twice benefited from technical assistance in relation to the preparation of reports, firstly in the context of a training programme at the beginning of 2009, and then in the form of a workshop in August 2009. The Committee strongly hopes that these difficulties will be resolved rapidly so that the Government can submit the two reports in question, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Armenia

The Committee notes that the majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. Fifteen reports are now due: the first report on Convention No. 160 (due since 2007); the first reports on Conventions Nos 87, 97, 138, 143 and 182 (due since 2008); and nine other reports (Conventions Nos 81, 98, 100, 111, 122, 135, 144, 151 and 154). It notes that since the efforts made in 2007, with the assistance of the Office, to make up the significant backlog in the sending of reports on the application of ratified Conventions, the Government is once again faced by a backlog in the sending of reports which has been accumulated over the past two years. As the Committee invited it to do in its 2008 observation, the Office has nevertheless continued its technical assistance. Accordingly, as indicated in its letter of 24 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Government benefited from a training programme on the preparation of reports at the beginning of 2009. Furthermore, the Office recently informed the Government of its availability to provide support for the preparation of reports on the occasion of two missions to the country in 2009. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the Office's technical assistance, with a view to submitting the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Burundi

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received and that as a result 16 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 1, 14, 29, 52, 81, 87, 89, 98, 100, 101, 105, 111, 135, 138, 144 and 182). The Office drew the Government's attention to this situation in its letter of 15 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), in which it indicated its availability to provide any necessary support. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the technical assistance of the Office, with a view to submitting the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Cape Verde

The Committee notes with serious concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. Eleven reports are now due (Conventions Nos 17, 19, 29, 81, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111, 118 and 182). It takes due note of the explanations provided by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009) referring to the lack of human and material resources. These difficulties are compounded, according to the Office, by other problems of a linguistic nature. Both the Committee in its observation of 2008, and the Office, in its letter of 15 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards, have emphasized the importance of technical assistance to address the persistent difficulties related to the preparation of reports. Such technical assistance was provided to the Government twice in November 2009, including through in-depth training for the officials of all the administrative services concerned and the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations. Under these circumstances, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will be in a position to submit the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Czech Republic

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 22 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 1, 14, 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 108, 111, 122, 132, 135, 138, 140, 142, 144, 150, 160, 163, 164, 171 and 182). The Office drew the Government's attention to this situation in its letter of 24 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009). Noting the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards, who emphasized that the backlog in the sending of reports was due to an unforeseen situation which had now been resolved, the Committee trusts that the Government will without further delay submit the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Dominica

The Committee notes that the great majority of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, including five of the first reports due since 2003, 2004 and 2006. Four reports are still due: the first report on the application of Convention No. 147 (due since 2006) and three other reports (Conventions Nos 29, 95 and 138). The Committee notes in this respect that the Government benefited from the Office's technical assistance in the context of a workshop on the preparation of reports held in August 2009. The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government in this respect. It firmly hopes that the measures adopted in this connection will enable the Government to submit the reports that remain due, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 14 reports are now due: the first reports on Conventions Nos 68 and 92 (due since 1998) and 12 other reports (Conventions Nos 1, 14, 29, 30, 87, 98, 100, 103, 105, 111, 138 and 182). The Committee notes with regret that, with the exception of a report submitted in 2008, the Government has not submitted any reports since 2006. In its letter of 15 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office once again took the initiative of offering the Government its technical assistance through the subregional standards specialist. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to submit all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Eritrea

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. Seven reports are now due (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 138). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the technical assistance of the Office, with a view to submitting the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

France

Non-metropolitan territories

The Committee has been informed that the Government communicated a statement to the Director-General indicating that, in the absence of any statement to the contrary, all the Conventions ratified by France are applicable to the non-metropolitan territories within the meaning of article 35 of the Constitution. The declaration further specifies that certain territories will no longer henceforth be considered as non-metropolitan territories as they will form part of the metropolitan territory of France. The Government has been invited to identify which territories should henceforth be considered as non-metropolitan territories within the meaning of the Constitution of the ILO. Once these clarifications have been received, the Committee will proceed at its next session to examine the reports concerning the Conventions declared applicable to the non-metropolitan territories.

Guinea

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 43 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 3, 11, 14, 16, 26, 29, 45, 81, 87, 89, 90, 94, 95, 98, 99, 100, 105, 111, 113, 115, 117, 118, 119, 121, 122, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 138, 140, 142, 143, 144, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 156, 159 and 182). In its letter of 13 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office described the specific arrangements for training activities in order to respond to the needs officially reported by the Government. The Committee firmly hopes that, as soon as the national situation so permits, these activities will be carried out so that the Government is able to submit all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guinea-Bissau

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 24 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 1, 7, 12, 14, 17, 18, 19, 27, 29, 68, 69, 73, 74, 81, 89, 91, 92, 98, 100, 105, 106, 107, 108 and 111). In its letter of 13 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office describes the practical arrangements for technical assistance activities in response to an official request made by the Government. The Government participated in a workshop on the preparation of reports for the Conventions on the abolition of child labour in November 2009, during which it reported difficulties of a linguistic nature. The Committee firmly hopes that the other activities envisaged will be carried out in the near future so that the Government can submit all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Guyana

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 26 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 12, 19, 29, 42, 81, 87, 97, 98, 100, 105, 108, 111, 129, 135, 137, 138, 140, 142, 144, 149, 150, 151, 166, 172, 175 and 182). The Office has drawn the Government's attention to this situation, in particular in its letter of 15 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including having recourse to the technical assistance of the Office, with a view to submitting the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Kyrgyzstan

The Committee notes with serious concern that the majority of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 22 reports are now due: the first report on Convention No. 111 (due since 1994); the first reports on Conventions Nos 17 and 184 (due since 2006); and 19 other reports (Conventions Nos 29, 78, 79, 81, 87, 95, 105, 115, 119, 120, 122, 124, 134, 138, 144, 148, 149, 154 and 159). It notes that, even though the Government has continued its efforts to submit reports this year, the Government is still confronted by a substantial backlog of reports to be sent. The Committee notes, in addition, that the Office has continued to provide technical assistance. Accordingly, as indicated in the letter of 24 July 2009 sent by the Office pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Government benefited from a training programme on the preparation of reports at the beginning of 2009 and then a training course in May 2009. Moreover, the Office has recently offered additional technical assistance. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to submit all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Liberia

The Committee notes that 14 reports on the application of ratified Conventions have been received, including the first reports due since 2005. Five reports remain due: the first report on Convention No. 133 (due since 1992) and four other reports (Conventions Nos 29, 108, 113 and 114). The Government is accordingly continuing the efforts made the previous year when it recommenced the submission of reports after an interruption of eight years. The Committee welcomes the Government's commitment, which is taking the form of practical measures, to submitting the reports due with the Office's support. According to the indications provided by the Office in its letter of 13 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), this support will be continued. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will, in accordance with its constitutional obligation, manage to submit in the near future the remaining reports due.

Sao Tome and Principe

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 18 reports are now due: the first reports on Conventions Nos 135, 138, 151, 154, 155, 182 and 184 (due since 2007) and 11 other reports (Conventions Nos 29, 81, 87, 88, 98, 100, 105, 106, 111, 144 and 159). In its letter of 15 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office noted an official request made by the Government to receive technical assistance for the preparation of reports. The Government thus participated in a workshop on the preparation of reports on the Conventions on the abolition of child labour in November 2009. Nevertheless, training designed specifically for the officials responsible for preparing reports would still be desirable. The Committee firmly hopes that it will be possible to continue providing this technical assistance and that the Government will submit all of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Seychelles

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 17 reports are now due: the first reports on Conventions Nos 73, 144, 147, 152, 161 and 180 (due since 2007) and 11 other reports (Conventions Nos 2, 8, 22, 29, 81, 105, 138, 148, 151, 155 and 182). The efforts made to submit a number of reports on the application of ratified Conventions in 2008 have not been followed up this year. In its letter of 24 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office offered technical assistance to the Government in response to an official request made by the latter. The Committee firmly hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide this assistance in the near future so as to enable the Government to submit all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Sierra Leone

The Committee notes with serious concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. A total of 23 reports are now due (Conventions Nos 8, 17, 19, 26, 29, 32, 45, 59, 81, 87, 88, 94, 95, 98, 99, 100, 101, 105, 111, 119, 125, 126 and 144). It notes that, according to the letter of 13 July 2009 sent by the Office pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the technical assistance that was envisaged in 2009 has been put off until 2010. The Committee firmly hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide this assistance in the very near future so as to enable the Government to submit in the near future all of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Somalia

The Committee notes with serious concern that, for the fourth consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. Nine reports are now due (Conventions Nos 17, 19, 29, 45, 84, 94, 95, 105 and 111). As soon as the national situation so permits, the Committee hopes that the Office, as it indicated in its letter of 24 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), will be in a position to provide all the necessary assistance so that the Government can submit the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

United Republic of Tanzania

Tanganyika

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. Four reports are now due (Conventions Nos 45, 81, 88 and 101).

Zanzibar

The Committee notes that the only report due on the application of Convention No. 97 has not been received for the third consecutive year. According to the letter of 24 July 2009 sent by the Office pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), an official request has been made to receive technical assistance.

The Committee firmly hopes that the Office will be in a position to provide this assistance in the very near future and to extend it to all the reports that are still due, so as to enable the Government to submit all the reports on the application of ratified Conventions in the near future, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Turkmenistan

The Committee notes with serious concern that, for the 11th consecutive year, the six reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. As it did in its 2008 observation, the Committee wishes to express particular concern. On the one hand, the reports in question are all first reports due since 1999 on the application of fundamental Conventions (Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111) and, on the other, since the country became a Member of the Organization, it has not provided any information on the application of the Conventions that it has itself ratified. In its letter of 24 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office once again drew the Government's attention to this situation and proposed the organization of a technical assistance mission to examine all the matters related to international labour standards. On the occasion of a mission in November 2009, the Office received assurances from the Government that it would work towards resolving the difficulties related to the preparation of reports, which are mainly of an institutional nature, and that the Government wished to receive further training in this respect. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay for the preparation and submission of the reports due.

United Kingdom

British Virgin Islands

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance provided last year will be continued in the very near future so that the 11 reports that are now due can be submitted soon (Conventions Nos 10, 14, 26, 29, 59, 82, 87, 94, 97, 98 and 105).

Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

The Committee notes that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been received. The Committee hopes that appropriate measures will be taken so that the ten reports that are now due will be submitted soon (Conventions Nos 10, 14, 29, 32, 45, 59, 82, 87, 98 and 105).

Gibraltar

The Committee notes that the measures taken in 2008 for the submission of certain of the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been followed up this year, as none of the reports have been received this year. The Committee hopes that appropriate measures will be taken so that the 12 reports that are now due will be submitted soon (Conventions Nos 2, 29, 45, 59, 81, 82, 98, 100, 105, 135, 142 and 151).

Montserrat

The Committee notes that the measures adopted in 2008 for the submission of the great majority of the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been followed up this year, as none of the reports have been received. This non-metropolitan territory benefited in 2008 from the technical assistance of the Office, and then from the assistance of a consultant to prepare all the reports. The Committee hopes that the technical assistance provided last year will be continued in the near future so that the four reports that are now due are submitted soon (Conventions Nos 29, 82, 85 and 105).

St Helena

The Committee notes that the measures taken in 2008 for the submission of certain reports due on the application of Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory have not been followed up this year, as none of the reports have been received. The Committee hopes that appropriate measures will be taken so that the 18 reports that are now due will be submitted soon (Conventions Nos 8, 10, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 19, 29, 58, 59, 63, 82, 85, 105, 108, 150 and 151).

The Committee notes the statement by the Government representative to the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), recalling that the difficulties relating to the submission of reports in certain non-metropolitan territories referred to above were due to a lack of resources. The Committee noted in its 2008 observation that the Government and the Office had joined efforts to provide support to certain non-metropolitan territories. This support made it possible to reduce the number of reports due in certain cases, and even to make up the backlog fully in two cases. Under these circumstances, the Committee once again calls for these efforts to be continued and extended to all the territories that need them and for appropriate measures to be identified to make it possible for the Government to submit regularly all the reports due on the application of the Conventions declared applicable to these territories, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Vanuatu

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. These reports are all first reports due since 2008 on Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111 and 182. In its letter of 21 July 2009 pursuant to the conclusions adopted by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2009), the Office took the initiative of offering the Government its technical assistance. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay, including through recourse to the Office's assistance, with a view to submitting the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Afghanistan, Algeria, Belize, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Cambodia, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Ethiopia, France, Gambia, Georgia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Ireland, Kiribati, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Luxembourg, Malta, Nigeria, Norway, Pakistan, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, San Marino, Senegal, Slovakia, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sudan, Tajikistan, Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, Uzbekistan, Zambia, Zimbabwe.

Freedom of association, collective bargaining, and industrial relations

Albania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania (CTUA) concerning the Government's last report, and the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on matters already examined by the Committee in previous comments. The Committee notes that, according to the CTUA, it is only possible to call a strike after the completion of mediation and conciliation procedures and that, of the approximately 30 cases submitted by the union for mediation, only eight, all in the energy sector, have been examined over the past two years. The Committee recalls that while the requirement of the exhaustion of remedies before a strike is compatible in spirit with the principles of freedom of association, the procedures should not be so complex or slow that a lawful strike becomes impossible in practice or loses its effectiveness (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 171). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the comments of the CTUA, and to provide further information in its next report on the mediation and conciliation procedures required prior to calling a strike, including the number of appeals lodged and examined.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right to strike. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the need to ensure that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State are able to exercise the right to strike. The Committee recalls that, in a previous report in 2007, the Government indicated that it envisaged amending the Law on the conditions of service of civil employees so as to authorize them to call a strike, subject to a minimum service requirement. The Committee notes that the Government's latest report no longer refers to the amendment of the Law on the conditions of service of civil employees with a view to recognizing their right to strike. The Committee is bound to express the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay to amend the Law on the conditions of service of civil employees so as to allow public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State to exercise the right to strike, and that it will provide a copy of the relevant text when it has been adopted.

In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to amend section 197/7(4) of the Labour Code, under the terms of which a sympathy strike is lawful if it is staged in support of a lawful strike against an employer who is actively supported by the employer of the sympathy strikers. The Committee recalled that workers should be able to stage sympathy strikes provided that the initial strike that they are supporting is itself lawful. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that it is considering the amendment of section 197/7(4) in accordance with the principles recalled above. The Committee trusts that the Government's next report will contain information on the amendment of section 197/7(4) of the Labour Code to bring it into conformity with the principles of freedom of association.

Finally, the Committee previously requested the Government to clarify the meaning of the term "extraordinary situation" in which a strike may be suspended, under the terms of section 197/4 of the Labour Code. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the expression "extraordinary situation" set out in section 197/4 of the Labour Code corresponds to a state of emergency decreed by the National Assembly under the terms of the National Constitution.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania (CTUA) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in August 2009.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide statistics of the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination heard in the past five years. The Committee notes the information to the effect that eight cases of anti-union discrimination were brought to the attention of the Ministry of Labour and were settled by conciliation except for one case which was referred to the courts of law. The Committee observes that the CTUA expresses regret that the law does not allow workers to obtain compensation of up to one year's pay rather than reinstatement in their jobs. The CTUA further indicates that anti-union dismissals are now affecting those close to trade unionists (spouses, relatives). The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention prescribes adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and invites the Government to join forces with the social partners to examine the matter of remedies for anti-union dismissals, it being understood that systems providing for preventive measures (such as prior authorization), sufficiently dissuasive sanctions or reinstatement, are deemed to be compatible with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all progress made in this regard.

In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate the measures taken to establish the arbitration tribunal and the labour court envisaged in the 2003 Labour Code. The Committee notes with regret that according to the Government, although the legal framework exists and efforts have been made by the Ministry of Labour, Social Affairs and Equal Opportunities, these bodies have still not been established. The Committee notes that in their respective communications, the CTUA and the ITUC regret this situation. Recalling once again that general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination are not enough unless they are accompanied by procedures ensuring effective protection against such acts, the Committee urges the Government to take all necessary steps without delay to establish the arbitration tribunal and labour court provided for in the Labour Code so as to provide effective and rapid procedures affording protection against acts of anti-union discrimination.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee noted previously that under section 161 of the Labour Code, collective agreements may be concluded at enterprise or branch level and requested the Government to indicate whether collective bargaining is possible at national level. The Committee notes that in referring to collective bargaining at national level, the Government reiterates that no collective agreements have, as yet, been concluded, other than one memorandum of understanding concluded in 2003–04 with the CTUA, the Independent Trade Union of Miners and the Union of Independent Trade Unions of Albania (BSPSH). Noting that the National Labour Council resumed activities in 2006, the Committee asks the Government to submit to the Council the matter of promoting collective bargaining in the public and private sectors, including at national level, and to supply information on developments in collective bargaining in practice, including the negotiation of the collective agreements in force, at all levels, and the number of workers covered by them.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in dealing with all the points raised.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania (CTUA) dated 31 August 2007 and 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the Government's observations, dated 3 October 2007 on the earlier comments of the CTUA. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report comments on the most recent observations by the CTUA.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee had noted in its previous comments that, according to the CTUA, Law No. 8549 of 11 November 1999 on the Status of Civil Servants, which guarantees to civil servants as defined in section 2(1), the right to form and join labour unions and take part in decision-making processes relating to their working conditions, is not applicable to employees in the customs, taxation and local governance offices (prefectures). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that section 20 of the Law on the Statute of Civil Servants, all civil servants, including those in the areas of duties, taxes, customs and local authorities have the right to establish and join trade unions. The Committee notes that the CTUA indicates in its report that these guarantees should be supported with legal acts as regards to these workers.

The Committee notes with concern the Government's statement that no public workers' trade unions have yet been established.

Article 4. Protection against anti-union discrimination of public workers. The Committee noted in previous comments that by virtue of section 4 of Law No. 7961, dated 7 December 1995, the Code of Labour of the Republic of Albania, protection against anti-union discrimination granted by sections 10 and 146(1)(e) of the Code is applicable to civil servants covered by Law No. 8549. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate in its report whether all categories of employees in the public sector and all civil servants enjoy such protection from anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that public workers covered by the Labour Code are entitled to establish and become members of trade unions as guaranteed by article 50 of the Constitution and sections 177–179 of the Labour Code. Article 10 of the Labour Code, in addition, guarantees protection against discrimination of workers with regard to employment or occupation because of their membership, or lack of membership, in a trade union. The Government also indicates that civil servants, under section 20(d) and (dh) of the Law on the Status of the Civil Servants and section 4 of the Labour Code, are entitled to organize and participate in decision-making processes with regard to working conditions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any progress in this regard.

Article 5. Protection against acts of interference. In previous comments, the Committee noted that articles 184–186 of the Labour Code prohibit any acts of interference by state bodies and employers in the establishment, functioning or administration of employees' organizations and article 202 sanctions violations of these provisions. The Committee also noted however that the rules on labour union activities of civil servants have not been formulated yet as required under section 20(d) of Law No. 8549 on the Status of Civil Servants. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that no regulations on the functioning of the civil workers' trade unions have been set, but that section 4 of the Labour Code and section 1(3) of the Law on the Status of Civil Servants do apply to civil servants. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to formulate the said rules under sections 184–186 of the Labour Code, and to transmit a copy of the rules, when adopted.

Article 6. Facilities for workers' representatives. The Committee previously noted that section 181(7) of the Labour Code requires employers to create all the necessary conditions and facilities for the elected representatives of the organizations of employees to normally exercise their functions, which are defined in the collective contract. Noting that the Government indicates that, under section 4 of the Labour Code, trade union representatives are entitled to all necessary facilities provided for in section 181(7), the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether the civil servants covered by the Law on the Status of Civil Servants have entered into collective contracts defining the necessary conditions and facilities to be extended to the elected representatives of their organizations. The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, representatives of recognized organizations of civil servants and public employees are afforded the facilities necessary to enable them to carry out their functions promptly and efficiently, both during and outside their hours of work.

Article 7. Participation in the conditions of employment determinations. The Committee noted in its previous comments that section 20(dh) of the Law on the Status of Civil Servants guarantees to civil servants the right to take part through labour unions or representatives, in decision-making processes relating to working conditions. Article 4(3) of the Law on the Status of Civil Servants provides that the Council of Ministers shall issue instructions on the negotiation of working conditions with labour unions or representatives in the institutions of the central administration subordinated to it. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that regulations as regards to the functioning of the civil servants' trade union activities have not yet been determined, though public employees may establish organizations as provided for in Article 4 of the Labour Code. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to issue the requisite instructions under section 4(3) of the Law on the Status of Civil Servants and to transmit a copy of the instructions, when issued.

Article 8. The Committee had indicated in several of its previous comments that, according to the CTUA, the mediation, conciliation and arbitration procedures provided for in sections 188–196 of the Labour Code for the resolution of collective disputes have never functioned normally and that boards of conciliation are not always set up in order to settle labour disputes. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that according to the Labour Code, sections 189–196, employment disagreements are solved through the means defined in the collective agreement or through mediation, Reconciliation Offices, Arbitration Court or the courts.

Algeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the observations of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which concern matters already examined by the Committee and report obstruction of unionization in the public sector and violent police repression of protest action by unions. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC's communication of 2009 and to indicate any judicial decisions handed down in cases involving teacher trade unionists cited by name by the ITUC in its observations of 2007, particularly members of the National Council of Higher Education Teachers (CNES) and the Inter-Union Education Coordination (CISE), who have reportedly been prosecuted for taking strike action.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to establish trade unions. The Committee noted previously that section 6 of Act No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990 restricts the right to establish a trade union organization to persons who are Algerian by birth or who have had Algerian nationality for at least ten years. The Committee recalled that the right to organize must be guaranteed to workers and employers without distinction or discrimination whatsoever, with the exception of those categories listed in Article 9 of the Convention, and that foreign workers too must have the right to establish organizations. In its report, the Government confirms that under Act No. 90-14, only workers who have been Algerian nationals for at least ten years may be founder members of a trade union organization and that once such an organization is established, any worker, without distinction as to nationality, is free to join it. The Committee notes with regret that no measures have been taken in response to its previous request to align Act No. 90-14 with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 6 of Act No. 90-14 so as to grant all workers, without distinction as to nationality, the right to establish a trade union organization.

Articles 2 and 5. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization, and to establish and join federations and confederations. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to take specific steps to amend the legislative provisions that prevent workers' organizations, irrespective of the sector to which they belong, from forming federations and confederations of their own choosing (sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14). It noted the Government's statement that it was aware of the need to clarify the working of this provision by introducing a definition of the notions of federation (or union) and confederation. The Committee notes that, in its last report, the Government states that section 4 of Act No. 90-14 will be made clearer as a result of discussions now under way on the draft Labour Code. The Committee urges the Government to report on any developments regarding the amendment of section 4 of Act No. 90-14 so as to remove all obstacles preventing workers, regardless of the sector to which they belong, from establishing federations and confederations of their own choosing.

Article 3. Right of organizations to carry on their activities in full freedom and formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 87bis of the Penal Code defines as subversive any act directed against the stability and normal functioning of institutions through any action intended to: (i) obstruct the operation of establishments providing public services; or (ii) impede traffic or the freedom of movement in public places or thoroughfares, subject to sanctions that include even the death penalty where the offence is punishable by life imprisonment (section 47bis(1)). The Committee recalled that the use of very general wording in certain provisions runs the risk of infringing on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in defence of the interests of their members, particularly through strike action. It requested the Government to take specific steps to ensure that this provision of the Penal Code may on no account be applied to workers who have peacefully exercised the right to strike. The Committee notes the Government's statement that recourse to strike action, besides being guaranteed by the National Constitution, is covered solely by Act No. 90-02 of 6 February 1990 on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes, and that section 87bis of the Penal Code is unrelated to the exercise of trade union rights. The Government adds that there are still strike movements in the country without any workers being charged under section 87bis of the Penal Code. The Committee takes note of these clarifications and trusts that the Government will continue to ensure that the provisions of section 87bis of the Penal Code are not invoked against workers who have exercised peacefully their right to strike.

The Committee commented previously on section 43 of Act No. 90-02 under which strikes are forbidden not only in essential services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population, but also when the strike "is liable to give rise to a serious economic crisis". Noting the Government's reply that this expression, set forth in section 43, is similar to the expression used by the Committee, which refers to "strikes which, by reason of their scope and duration, could lead to a national crisis", the Committee asked the Government to take steps to amend the legislation or to adopt a regulatory text that would clarify this point along the lines indicated by the Government. The Committee observes that the Government's last report contains no information on measures taken to this end. Consequently, the Committee again asks the Government to adopt a text amending section 43 of Act No. 90-02 or a regulatory text stating expressly that strikes are forbidden in essential services the interruption of which may endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population, or where the strike, by reason of its scope and duration, could lead to a serious national crisis.

Lastly, the Committee asked the Government to amend section 48 of Act No. 90-02 which empowers the Minister or the competent authority, where the strike persists or if mediation fails, to refer the dispute to the National Arbitration Commission, after consulting the employer and the workers' representatives. The Committee again recalls that recourse to arbitration to end a collective dispute should be possible only at the request of both parties and/or in the event of a strike in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the case of a strike the extent and duration of which are likely to give rise to a serious national crisis, or in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes that the Government's last report contains no information on measures taken, in response to the Committee's request, to amend section 48 of Act No. 90-02. The Committee urges the Government to take measures without delay to ensure that the National Arbitration Commission may be seized only of the cases recalled above, in order to fully safeguard the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authority, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

Angola

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been asking the Government:

- to amend sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92d on the right to collective bargaining which provide that collective labour disputes in public utility enterprises may be settled through compulsory arbitration by the Ministry of Labour, Public Administration and Social Security after the parties have been heard. The Committee noted that the list of public utility activities (section 1.3) is much broader than the concept of essential services in the strict sense of the term (namely, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). While noting that the Government once again indicates that the bills to amend Act No. 20-A/92 on collective bargaining, Act No. 21-C/92 on trade unions and Act No. 23/91 on strikes have been submitted to the competent authorities for approval and that, during this process it will be possible for sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92 to be revised, the Committee expresses the firm hope that these bills will shortly be approved by the National Assembly and that they will be fully consistent with the Convention so that compulsory arbitration may be imposed only in cases involving essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office;

- to indicate whether the legislation guarantees the right to collective bargaining of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State and, if so, to indicate the relevant provisions. In its comments, the ITUC asserts that collective bargaining is prohibited in the public service. The Committee also asked the Government to specify which public services are not organized in the form of an establishment whose employees are excluded from the scope of Act No. 20-A/92 by virtue of section 2 of the Act. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's reply contains no information on the matter. The Committee recalls that according to Article 4 of the Convention, all public servants other than those engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy the right to collective bargaining, and again asks the Government to send its observations and, where this has not been done, provide its workers with the rights and safeguards laid down in the Convention. It also asks the Government to send information on the collective negotiation of the wages of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

Antigua and Barbuda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 19 of the Industrial Court Act 1976, which permits the referral of a dispute to the court by the minister or at the request of one party with the consequent effect of prohibiting strike action. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that it has no intention to change its position at this time as regards the power of the minister to refer a dispute to binding arbitration resulting in a ban on strike action. In this regard, the Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration resulting in a ban on strike action should be limited to strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or to cases of acute national crisis, or at the request of both parties. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 19 of the Industrial Court Act 1976 taking into account the abovementioned principles.

Prohibition of strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 21 of the Industrial Court Act 1976 which permits injunctions against legal strikes when the national interest is threatened or affected. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a concerted effort will be made to bring the Industrial Court Act 1976 into conformity with the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that measures will be taken to amend section 21 of the Industrial Court Act 1976 and requests the Government to communicate any developments in this regard.

Essential services. The Committee had also requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the overly broad list of essential services in the Labour Code, in particular with respect to the government printing office and the port authority. In this regard, it notes the comments of the Government that the government printing office could be excluded from the list of essential services. It further notes that the Government considers it imperative to note that, as Antigua and Barbuda is a relatively small country and what works in other industrial countries cannot be expected to work there, an extended strike at the port authority could have damaging consequences for the economy as this is the major trans-shipment point for goods into the country. According to the Government, strikes at the port should not be banned, but should be controlled. The Committee notes that the Government adds that it has amended the list of essential services in the Labour Code. Recalling that the implementation of a minimum service for workers at the port authority would be in conformity with the Convention, the Committee appreciates the Government's comments in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to provide, with its next report, details of any legislative amendment to the list of essential services so as to eliminate from the list the government printing office and the port authority, which are not essential services in the strict sense of the word, and to transmit a copy of the current list of essential services.

Sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 20(3), (4) and (7) of the Industrial Court Act 1976 which provide for penalties of imprisonment ranging from three months to two years for participating in strikes or lock-outs declared unlawful under that section. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a concerted effort will be made to bring the Industrial Court Act 1976 into conformity with the Convention. The Committee hopes that that measures will be taken to amend section 20(3), (4) and (7) of the Industrial Court Act 1976, taking into account the abovementioned principles.

Argentina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the comments of 2006 and 2007 by the Central of Argentine Workers (CTA), those of 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and to comments made in 2007 by the Federation of Employees of the Government of the Autonomous City of Buenos Aires. It also takes note of the comments of 31 August 2008 and 31 August 2009 by the CTA and the comments of 26 August 2009 by the ITUC, which refer largely to legislative matters already highlighted by the Committee. It observes that in particular the CTA's comments refer as well to numerous allegations of violations of trade union rights. It notes the Government's statement that it has already commented on some of the CTA's allegations in the context of a number of cases examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, and that: (1) most of the issues raised concern the protection of trade union representatives against acts of persecution and unfair practices; (2) such practices are outside the competence of the administrative authority, with the ordinary courts having sole jurisdiction in such matters; (3) in registering communications from trade unions, the National Directorate of Trade Union Associations enters only an administrative file number and, since no such numbers are indicated in the comments, it is impossible to identify the incidents referred to; and (4) information has been requested from the regional delegations, and for some of its allegations the CTA should be asked to specify the incidents and the administrative and/or judicial proceedings. The Committee observes that the trade union organization for the most part refers only briefly to the alleged violations and that the list of cases is fairly long. The Committee invites the Government to take the necessary steps to set up a working group with the CTA in order to examine the issues raised, other than those dealt with in cases that have been, or are being, heard by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Application by the CTA for trade union status

The Committee points out that since 2005 it has been noting in its observations that the CTA's application for trade union status (filed in August 2004) is pending. On several occasions the Committee, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association, has urged the Government to secure a decision on this matter without delay. In its comments of 2009, the CTA affirms that there has so far been no decision on its application for trade union status. The Committee notes that the Government states in its report that: (1) the file is active and formalities are ongoing without any delays; (2) the Government is complying with the procedure laid down in the legislation and the competent authority has consistently followed the proceedings and guarantees observance of the rights laid down in the National Constitution and ILO Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98); (3) in proceedings involving first-, second- and third-level organizations that have conflicting subjective rights, the fact of complying with procedure and ensuring that all concerned have their say necessarily implies a period of time commensurate with the case itself; (4) it must also be remembered that Argentina is a country with much trade union activity and many trade unions; and (5) formalities are still moving forward with the receipt and analysis of submissions from the first-level unions that belong to the federations making up the Central of Argentine Workers (CTA), and the receipt of submissions from unions belonging to second-level associations affiliated to the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) in order to verify, in the context of the ongoing comparison of representativeness, the number of dues-paying members in each of the first-level organizations; since 5 February 2009, the file has been under examination by the Ministry of Labour's Directorate General of Legal Affairs. While noting the Government's information regarding the reasons for the delay, the Committee once again regrets the length of time that has elapsed – more than five years – without any decision from the administrative authority on the CTA's application for trade union status. In these circumstances, given the adverse effects of this situation for the CTA, the Committee again urges the Government to ensure that a decision is reached without delay and to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Ruling by the Supreme Court of Justice of Argentina

The Committee notes the ruling of 11 November 2008 by the Supreme Court of Justice of Argentina in Association of State Workers v. the Ministry of Labour regarding Act on Trade Union Associations No. 23551 of 1998 in which the Court found that section 41(a) of Act No. 23551 breaches the right to freedom of association provided for both in article 14bis of the National Constitution and in provisions based on international law, in that it requires "the staff representatives" and the members of "works committees and similar bodies" provided for in section 40 of Act No. 23551 to be members of "the corresponding association with trade union status and to be elected in a ballot called by the latter". The Court found that this restriction undermines the freedom of association not only of the workers taken individually since it forces them, albeit indirectly, to join the association with trade union status despite the existence of another union which is merely registered, but also that of associations which are merely registered by preventing them from carrying on their activities in pursuit of one of the most fundamental aspects and purposes of their existence. The ruling states that the restriction goes well beyond the established bounds within which the award of an exclusive entitlement to the most representative unions might be warranted. The Committee observes that the ruling party endeavours to avoid discrimination between trade unions. In these circumstances, it requests the Government to indicate whether section 41(a) of Act No. 23551 has been officially repealed or amended.

Act on Trade Union Associations and its implementing decree

The Committee points out that it has been referring for many years in its comments to certain provisions of Act on Trade Union Associations No. 23551 and its enabling regulations issued by Decree No. 467/88. The Committee takes note of the Government's response to the CTA's comments on legislative issues, and of the report, in which it refers to statements it has made in the past, namely: (1) the existing legal framework and national practice show that freedom of association is fully in force in the country; (2) that the provisions of the Act draw on the best principles of social justice, since account was taken of the interpretations in the ILO of the scope of the concept of freedom of association, and the technical assistance from the Office in 1984; (3) that there are currently more than 2,900 first-, second- and third-level trade union associations (more than 2,820 are first-level organizations, of which 1,396 have trade union status; there are 101 federations, 83 of which have trade union status and 16 third-level associations of which seven have trade union status), i.e. one trade union organization for every 3,500 wage workers, which demonstrates that freedom of association is not only a right but is also widely and fully exercised. With regard to the specific provisions addressed by the Committee, the Government reiterates its past observations. The Government also states that pursuant to Resolution No. 502 of 1 July 2005 issued by the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security, a group of experts on labour relations was set up to write a report identifying the main problems faced by the system of labour relations in Argentina. On the matter of Act No. 23551, while recognizing the need to amend some of its provisions, the group of experts found generally that the Act contains a set of precepts regarding the protection of freedom of association in connection with acts by employers and the State that are to be regarded as appropriate and sufficient. The group further indicated that any change seeking to follow the guidelines of the Committee of Experts should be approached with caution and common sense to avoid introducing into the system of labour relations new factors that further complicate its functioning. The Government states that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security has decided to continue to work with the social partners in working out the necessary agreements to ensure that any changes proposed in the trade union system of Argentina are truly effective.

In these circumstances, while noting the Government's observations and welcoming the initiative to create a group of experts, the Committee is bound to reiterate its previous comments on the following provisions:

Trade union status

- Section 28 of the Act, under which, in order to challenge an association's trade union status, the petitioning association must have a "considerably larger" membership; and section 21 of implementing Decree No. 467/88, which qualifies the term "considerably larger" by laying down that the association claiming trade union status must have at least 10 per cent more dues-paying members than the organization which currently holds the status. The Committee points out that a requirement of a "considerably larger" membership, amounting to 10 per cent more members than the union holding most representative status, is unduly high and is contrary to the Convention. In practice, this requirement stands in the way of trade unions that are merely registered and that wish to claim trade union status.
- Section 29 of the Act, under which an enterprise trade union may be granted trade union status only when no other organization with trade union status existing in the geographical area, occupation or category; and section 30 of the Act, under which, in order to be eligible for trade union status, unions representing a trade, occupation or category must show that they have different interests from the existing trade union and the latter's status must not cover the workers concerned. The Committee considers that the requirements that unions representing enterprises, trades or categories have to meet in order to obtain trade union status are unduly demanding, and in practice restrict their access to trade union status, giving preferential treatment to existing organizations even where unions representing enterprises, trades or categories of workers are more representative according to section 28.

Benefits which derive from trade union status

- Section 38 of the Act, under which check-off of trade union dues is allowed only for associations with trade union status, and not associations that are merely registered. The Committee points out that, as the Supreme Court of Justice emphasized in the abovementioned ruling, the "most representative" status should not imply privileges other than priority of representation in collective bargaining, in consultations with the authorities and in the appointment of delegates to international bodies. Consequently, the Committee considers that this provision adversely affects and discriminates unduly against organizations that are merely registered.
- Sections 48 and 52 of the Act give special protection (trade union immunity) only to representatives of organizations that have trade union status. The Committee considers that sections 48 and 52 provide preferential treatment for representatives of organizations with trade union status in the event of acts of anti-union discrimination, and that this exceeds the privileges that may be granted to the most representative organizations, by virtue of the principle set out in the previous paragraph. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the ruling of 11 November 2008 handed down by the Supreme Court of Justice has any implications for the application of these provisions.

The Committee points out that it has been making these comments for many years. It recalls that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards asked the Government in 2007 to join forces with the social partners in order to formulate, with ILO assistance, draft legislation to give full effect to the Convention. It notes with regret that no steps have been taken in this regard. The Committee urges the Government to adopt the necessary measures without delay to secure the legislative amendments requested, and asks the Government to provide information in its next report in this regard.

Determination of minimum services

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the CTA referred to Decree No. 272/2006 regulating section 24 of Act No. 25877 on collective labour disputes and that, specifically, it objected that, by virtue of section 2(b) of the Decree, the Guarantees Commission, which establishes minimum services and which comprises representatives of employers' and workers' organizations as well as independent members, may act only in an advisory capacity since the final decision as to essential minimum services lies with the Ministry of Labour when "the parties have come to no agreement" or "when the agreements are inadequate". The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the cases in which the Guarantees Commission has intervened regarding minimum services and, more specifically, information on the number of instances in which the administrative authority has changed the terms of the Guarantees Commission's opinion regarding minimum services. The Committee furthermore observes that in its comments of 2009 the CTA states that the Guarantees Commission has not been formed and does not intervene in disputes, and that responsibility for defining minimum service lies with the Ministry of Labour. The Committee notes the Government's statement that when the Guarantees Commission intervenes regarding minimum services, it will so inform the Committee. The Government also indicates that there is always access to a judicial body, which means that determination of minimum services can be carried out and the rights of workers can be properly protected in observance of the safeguards laid down in the Constitution. Observing the Government's indication in its report that the Guarantees Commission has not been formed or convened, the Committee emphasizes that it is important that the statutory institutions responsible for the settlement of collective disputes should function effectively. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to ensure without delay that the abovementioned Commission is put into operation, and to provide information in this regard in its next report.

Finally, the Committee takes note of a recent communication from the Government in which it requests the technical assistance of the Office in the treatment of the different issues raised by the supervisory bodies concerning the legislation. The Committee appreciates this initiative and hopes that this technical assistance will take place next year.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2010.]

Australia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes the comments of the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 31 August 2009, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (ACCI) in a communication dated 14 October 2009 and the Australian Industry Group (AI) dated 14 October 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the passage of the Fair Work Act, 2009, and the creation of Fair Work Australia (FWA) to oversee the administration of the provisions of this Act. As a general consideration, the Committee notes with interest that the Fair Work Act was prepared in full consultation with the social partners and was aimed at resolving a number of issues that the Committee has been raising over recent years in relation to the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes with interest that the Government indicates that the development of the new system under the Fair Work Act benefited from a process of genuine and extensive consultation with the social partners and key stakeholders – the most comprehensive consultation process on workplace relations ever undertaken in Australia. According to the Government, this extensive consultation process ensured that all stakeholders had the opportunity for their concerns to be raised and addressed before the Bill was debated in Parliament and adopted in amended form as the Fair Work Act. The Government indicates that Australia's new system represents a significant move away from the fundamental elements of the previous Government's Work Choices regime and that the Fair Work Act has been designed to balance the needs of employees, unions and employers and to foster increased competitiveness and prosperity, at the same time as safeguarding workplace rights and guaranteeing minimum standards. The Government considers that the new legislation strikes the right balance between fairness and flexibility in the workplace to achieve the objectives of both social equity and economic modernization.

Article 3 of the Convention. The right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it previously expressed the need to amend numerous provisions of the Workplace Relations Act, 1996 (WR Act) which lifted the protection of industrial action in support of: multiple business agreements (section 423(1)(b)(i)); "pattern bargaining" (section 439); secondary boycotts and general sympathy strikes (section 438); negotiations over "prohibited content" (sections 356 and 436 of the WR Act, in connection with the Workplace Relations Regulations, 2006); strike pay (section 508 of the WR Act); and provisions which prohibited industrial action in case of danger to the economy (sections 430, 433 and 498 of the WR Act), through the introduction of compulsory arbitration at the initiative of the Minister (sections 500(a) and 504(3) of the WR Act). The Committee also recalls that it previously raised the need to amend provisions of the WR Act which prohibited industrial action in instances when it risked harm to the national economy and empowered the Minister to order compulsory arbitration.

The Committee notes the concerns raised by the ACTU that most of the restrictions remain in place in the Fair Work Act. In particular, sections 408–411 protect industrial action only if it is undertaken in the process of bargaining for an agreement, which would appear to effectively prohibit sympathy strikes and general secondary boycotts. The Act maintains the removal of protection of industrial action in support of multiple enterprise agreements (section 413(2)). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, under the Fair Work Act, certain categories of multiple employers with a close connection to each other are able to bargain together as single-interest employers for a single enterprise agreement with their employees. In that instance, protected industrial action is available to employers and employees. The Fair Work Act also allows voluntary multi-employer bargaining. However, employers and employees do not have access to protected industrial actions in these circumstances. In addition, the pre-existing secondary boycott arrangements, regulated by the Trade Practices Act, 1974, remain in place. The Committee requests the Government to review the abovementioned provisions, in the light of its previous comments, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, with a view to bringing them into full conformity with the Convention.

Pattern bargaining remains unprotected, unless the parties are “genuinely trying to reach an agreement” (sections 409(4) and 412). Industrial action remains unprotected if it is in support of the inclusion of unlawful terms, including: to extend unfair dismissal benefits to workers not yet employed for the statutory period; to provide strike pay; to pay bargaining fees to a trade union; and to create a union right to entry for compliance purposes that are different or superior to those contained within the Act (section 409(3)). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, under the Fair Work Act, industrial action in pursuit of an agreement that contains non-permitted matters is still protected, provided the bargaining representatives reasonably believed the claims were permitted. The Government further indicates that, under the Fair Work Act, it remains unlawful for an employer to pay, or an employee to demand or request strike pay, but that when protected industrial action is taken there will no longer be a minimum mandatory deduction of four hours’ pay. In addition, section 423 permits the suspension or termination of protected industrial action if it may cause significant economic harm. Section 424(1)(d) requires the suspension or termination of industrial action if it has threatened, is threatening or would threaten to cause significant damage to the Australian economy or an important part of it, while section 431 permits the Minister to terminate proposed industrial actions in the same circumstances. Industrial actions that are threatening to cause significant harm to a third party must also be suspended or terminated (section 426). The Government indicates that in order for the prohibition or suspension of industrial action to be ordered by the FWA, that agency must be satisfied that the action is threatening to cause significant and imminent economic harm. The Committee observes that these restrictions depend upon a complex review of conditions apparently set forth with the aim of balancing a number of concerns. With reference to its previous comments on these matters and recalling that the right to strike is an intrinsic corollary of the right of association protected by Convention No. 87 (see in particular the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 159, 160, 168 and 179), the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the application of these provisions by the FWA and to continue to keep them under review with the social partners with the aim of ensuring the full application of the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the need to amend section 30J of the Crimes Act, 1914, which prohibits industrial action threatening trade or commerce with other countries or among states. Section 30K of that Act prohibits boycotts resulting in the obstruction or hindrance of the performance of services by the Australian Government or the transport of goods or persons in international trade. The Committee notes that the ITUC states that there have been no amendments to the Crimes Act. In addition, section 419 of the Fair Work Act, 2009, requires the FWA to suspend or terminate industrial action in non-national enterprises or by non-national employees, if the event will or would be likely to have the effect of causing substantial loss or damage to the business of a constitutional corporation. The Committee once again requests the Government to review the abovementioned provisions, in the light of its previous comments, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, with a view to bringing them into full conformity with the Convention and, in the meantime, to provide detailed information on any use of these provisions in practice.

In addition, the Committee notes the concerns raised by the ACTU in relation to the potential obstacles to the effective exercise of industrial action that may be posed by the provisions concerning strike ballots. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of those provisions in practice.

The Committee recalls that it previously raised the need to amend the restrictive conditions set for granting a permit allowing trade union representatives to have entry to the workplace in order to meet with workers. The Committee notes that, under the Fair Work Act, a union official must hold a permit provided by the FWA in order to have the right of entry under the Fair Work Act for a certain workplace. In determining whether to grant an entry permit, the FWA will consider any matter it considers relevant, including whether the applicant has ever been convicted of violating an industrial law or convicted of a crime involving fraud, entry onto premises, or intentional use of violence or destruction of property (section 513). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Fair Work Act permits union officials to hold discussions with employees who are members, or eligible to be members, of a union and to enter workplaces to investigate suspected breaches of the Act or an instrument made under the Act. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of this provision, including statistics relating thereto.

Building industry. The Committee recalls from previous comments that: (i) the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act of 2005 renders virtually all forms of industrial action in the building and industrial sector unlawful; (ii) introduces severe financial penalties, injunctions and actions for uncapped damages in case of “unlawful” industrial action; (iii) gives the enforcement agency known as the Australian Building and Construction Commission (ABCC) wide-ranging coercive powers akin to an agency charged with investigating criminal matters; (iv) grants the capacity to the Minister for Workplace Relations to regulate industrial affairs in the building and construction industry by ministerial decree through a device referred to as a building code which is inconsistent with the Convention on several points and is implicitly “enforced” through an “accreditation scheme” for contractors who wish to enter into contracts with the Commonwealth. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate whether the proposed bill would: (i) amend sections 36, 37 and 38 of the BCII Act, 2005, which refer to “unlawful industrial action” (implying not simply liability in tort vis-à-vis the employer, but a wider responsibility towards third parties and an outright prohibition of industrial action); (ii) amend sections 39, 40 and 48–50 of the BCII Act so as to eliminate any excessive impediments, penalties and sanctions against industrial action in the building and construction industry; (iii) introduce sufficient safeguards into the BCII Act so as to ensure that the functioning of the ABCC and inspectors does not lead to interference in the internal affairs of trade unions – especially provisions on the possibility of lodging an appeal before the courts against the ABCC’s notices prior to the handing over of documents (sections 52, 53, 55, 56 and 59 of the BCII Act); and (iv) amend section 52(6) of the BCII Act which enables the ABCC to impose a penalty of six months’ imprisonment for failure to comply with a notice to produce documents or give information so as to ensure that penalties are proportional to the gravity of any offence.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Office of the ABCC will be retained until 31 January 2010 and that, after that date, subject to the passage of legislation, it will be replaced with a new agency, the Office of the Fair Work Building Industry Inspectorate. In addition, based on an independent report the Government commissioned and consultation with industry stakeholders, the Government developed and introduced the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Amendment (Transition to Fair Work) Bill, 2009, into Parliament on 17 June 2009. According to the ACTU, that Bill maintains the coercive powers of the ABCC, while allowing trade unions to petition for the coercive powers to be switched off. This Bill: (i) repeals sections 36, 37 and 38 of the BCII Act; (ii) repeals sections 39 and 40 of the BCII Act and repeals and substitutes sections 48–50 with the effect that the provisions of the Fair Work Act apply to the building and construction industry in the same way as they do to all other industries; (iii) introduces numerous safeguards and limits the coercive powers to no longer allow investigation of matters relating to compliance with laws governing the registration of the internal affairs of unions; and (iv) maintains the current limitation on the ABCC’s power to impose any penalty under section 52(6) of the BCII Act, which requires the ABCC to refer the matter to the Office of the Commonwealth Director of Public Prosecutions who determines whether to prosecute. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made concerning the adoption of the Transition to Fair Work Bill. The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken to instruct the ABCC to refrain from imposing penalties or commencing legal proceedings under the ABCC while the review is under way.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes the comments of the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 31 August 2009, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (ACCI) in a communication dated 14 October 2009 and the Australian Industry Group (AI) dated 14 October 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the passage of the Fair Work Act, 2009, and the creation of Fair Work Australia (FWA) to oversee the administration of the provisions of this Act. As a general consideration, the Committee notes with interest that the Fair Work Act was prepared in full consultation with the social partners and was aimed at resolving a number of issues that the Committee has been raising over the years in relation to the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that it is firmly committed to the ILO and to the implementation of ratified Conventions.

In particular, the Committee notes with interest that collective bargaining at the enterprise level is at the heart of the Government’s new workplace relations system. Statutory individual agreements cannot be made under the new system. There are provisions for the phasing out of existing statutory individual agreements – either Australian Workplace Agreements or Individuals Transitional Employment Agreements – which will continue to apply until they are terminated. This is in line with the Government’s prior policy commitments and honours commitments that were lawfully made when they were entered into. In relation to the building and construction industry and the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act, a comprehensive consultation process into the regulation of the industry was conducted by the Hon. Murray Wilcox, QC, and further consultation with stakeholders followed receipt of Mr Wilcox’s report by the Government in March 2009. The Government has accepted Mr Wilcox’s recommendations and has introduced legislation into the Parliament to replace the BCII Act and, in particular, to determine that the general compliance and penalty regimes of the Fair Work Act will apply to the industry.

Article 1 of the Convention. Adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in respect of employment. In previous comments, the Committee raised the need to ensure that workers are adequately protected against anti-union discrimination, especially dismissals for industrial action taken in the context of negotiations of multiple business agreements and “pattern bargaining” (i.e. negotiations seeking common wages or conditions of employment for two or more proposed collective agreements with different employers or even different subsidiaries of the same parent company). The Committee notes with interest that section 347 of the Fair Work Act, 2009, defines protected industrial action and includes: (i) the organization or promotion of a lawful activity for, or on behalf of, an industrial association; or (ii) encouragement or participation in a lawful activity organized or promoted by an industrial association. In addition, section 772 of the Act prohibits termination of an employee due to their trade union membership or participation in trade union activities outside working hours or, with the employer’s consent, during working hours. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, under the general protection provisions of the Fair Work Act, it is unlawful for a person to take adverse action, such as dismissal or refusing to employ or demoting a person, because that person is or is not a union member, or engages or does not engage in lawful industrial activity. In addition, it is prohibited to take adverse action against employees exercising a workplace right or acting as a representative of employees in the workplace. These protections extend to all employees in the national workplace relations system. The Committee understands that they will cover pattern bargaining to the extent that the parties are genuinely trying to reach an agreement. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which industrial action related to pattern bargaining is protected in practice, including any relevant decisions from the FWA. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged to ensure protection against anti-union dismissals related to actions taken in respect of multiple business agreements.

Article 2. Protection against interference. The Committee previously raised the need to amend section 339 of the Workplace Relations Act, 1996, (WR Act) to ensure that the choice of a bargaining agent, even in new businesses, may be made by the workers themselves even if an “employer greenfields agreement” has been registered (enabling the employer to unilaterally determine the terms and conditions of employment in a new business including any new activity by a government authority, or a body in which a government has a controlling interest, or which has been established by law for a public purpose as well as a new project which is of the same nature as the employer’s existing business activities). The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government indicates in its report that the Fair Work Act removes the capacity for “employer greenfields agreements” and provides that a greenfields agreement can only be made between the new employer and one or more employee organizations that are entitled to represent the majority of employees to be covered by the agreement.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide additional information on the provisions which will govern the transition from the previous system, based on Australian Workplace Agreements (AWAs), to the new system and to specify, in particular, the conditions under which workers covered by AWAs will be free to be represented in collective bargaining, as well as the relationship between AWAs already concluded and the new collective agreements. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government indicates that collective bargaining for enterprise agreements is at the heart of Australia’s new workplace relations system. Individual statutory agreements are not part of the new system; this is emphasized by the object of the Fair Work Act which states that statutory individual employment agreements of any kind can never be part of a fair workplace relations system. In line with the Government’s prior policy commitments, existing AWAs will continue to apply until they are terminated. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice.

In several of its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to repeal or amend sections 151(1)(h), 152, 331(1)(a)(ii) and 332(3) of the WR Act so as to ensure that multiple business agreements are not subject to a requirement of prior authorization at the discretion of the employment advocate. The Committee notes that the ACTU refers to the abilities of parties to negotiate multi-employer agreements by consent and that the FWA can facilitate multi-employer collective bargaining for low-paid employees, or employees who have not historically had access to the benefits of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Fair Work Act allows employers who wish to voluntarily bargain together for a multi-enterprise agreement to do so with no public interest test and no requirement of FWA approval. In this instance, employers and employees do not have access to protected industrial action. The FWA will also facilitate multi-employer bargaining for low-paid employees. The Committee notes that section 186 of the Fair Work Act, 2009, requires FWA authorization of any enterprise agreement and that agency may only approve multi-employer agreements if it is satisfied that no person coerced, or threatened to coerce, any of the employers to make the agreement. In addition, sections 409 and 412 of that Act prohibit pattern bargaining unless the parties are genuinely trying to reach an agreement. Recalling that the Government should promote and encourage the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or their organizations and workers’ organizations, the Committee requests the Government to inform it of the application of these provisions in practice.

Building industry. The Committee recalls that it previously requested the Government to: (i) revise section 64 of the BCII Act to ensure that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or the decision of the administrative authority; and (ii) promote collective bargaining, especially by ensuring that there are no financial penalties or incentives linked to undue restrictions on collective bargaining. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that it has introduced the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Amendment (Transition to Fair Work) Bill, 2009, which amends the BCII Act, and which would: (i) repeal section 64 of the BCII Act with the effect that the level of bargaining would be determined in accordance with the Fair Work Act; and (ii) retain the capacity currently for the Minister to issue a Building Code though, to date, the Government has not issued a Building Code under section 27 of the BCII Act. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes with interest that the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements (HEWRRs) upon which it had commented previously have been abolished by the Higher Education Support Amendment (Removal of the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements and National Governance Protocols Requirements and other matters) Act, 2008.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments of the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) dated 31 August 2009, on the application of the Convention.

The Committee previously invited the Government to engage in dialogue with the National Tertiary Education Industry Union (NTEU) concerning its use of premises at various universities so as to find a commonly accepted solution and to ensure in any case, including by revising the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements (HEWRRs) if necessary, that no obstacles are raised to the respect of collective agreement clauses which provide for the use of premises by trade unions. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the HEWRRs were abolished by the current Australian Government with the passage of the Higher Education Support Amendment Act 2008, which now subjects all education providers to the same workplace relations laws as all other employers.

Azerbaijan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the observations of the Government in response to the comments dated 20 November 2007 of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the application of the Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee previously requested the Government to amend section 281 of the Labour Code, which prohibits strikes in the railway and air transport sectors, and section 233 of the Criminal Code, which penalizes strikes in public transport with penalties of up to three years of imprisonment, so as to ensure that workers of public transport, including those employed in air and railway transport, can exercise the right to strike, and to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection of the Population officially approached the appropriate state authorities, national representative organizations of employers and workers and also the ILO with a view to examining international experiences in the field with subsequent discussion. These experiences show that transport services are among the main areas in which there are limitations on holding strikes. The Committee requests the Government to communicate in its next report any amendments taken or contemplated to section 281 of the Labour Code and section 233 of the Criminal Code so as to allow the exercise of the right to strike in railways and air transport sectors, acknowledging that a minimum service created with the participation of the employers and the trade unions concerned could be established.

The Committee previously requested the Government to amend section 6(1) of the Act on Trade Unions so as to strike a balance between, on the one hand, the legitimate interests of organizations to express their point of view on issues of economic and social policy affecting their members and workers in general and, on the other hand, the separation of political activities in the strict sense of the term from trade union activities. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the provision "trade unions are prohibited from engaging in political activity, associating with political parties or carrying out joint activities, providing and receiving assistance or donations to/from political parties" was repealed and limitations on the activities of trade unions were removed. The Committee requests the Government to transmit with its next report a copy of the repealing instrument.

The Committee previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that multinational enterprises operating on its territory respect freedom of association norms and principles. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that additions to article 80 of the Labour Code of the Republic of Azerbaijan adopted by the Milli Mejlis (Parliament) on 10 October 2006, significantly strengthened the status of the trade unions at the enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy, with its next report, of the additions to article 80 of the Labour Code.

Articles 1 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2007, which alleged in particular that despite the law, an effective system of collective bargaining between unions and enterprise managements had not yet been established: employers often delayed negotiations, and unions rarely participated in determining wage levels and were often bypassed in the conclusion of bilateral agreements between the Government and multinational enterprises. The ITUC further alleged cases of anti-union discrimination and interference that took place in multinational enterprises.

The Committee, recalling that it was the responsibility of the Government to ensure the application of the Convention, requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that multinational enterprises operating on its territory respect freedom of association norms and principles and to inform it of the measures taken in this respect. It further requested the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's previous allegation of cases of anti-union discrimination and interference that took place in multinational enterprises.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the legislation made a distinction between a "collective agreement", concluded at the enterprise level following bipartite negotiations between workers and employers, and a "collective accord", concluded at industry, territorial or national levels following tripartite negotiations between trade unions of the appropriate level, the National Confederation of Entrepreneurs' (Employers') Organization and the authorities. The Committee recalled that while tripartism was particularly appropriate for the regulation of questions of a larger scope (drafting of legislation, formulating labour policies), the principle of tripartism should not replace the principle of autonomy of workers' organizations and employers (or their organizations) in collective bargaining on conditions of employment. The Committee also recalled that, according to Article 4 of the Convention, free and voluntary bargaining with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment should be conducted between workers' organizations and an employer or employers' organization and therefore requested the Government to take measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that steps are being taken to set up national and local collaborative committees comprising representatives of unions, employers' associations, relevant executive bodies and public associations representing the interests of those especially in need of social protection, with a view to promoting employment.

The Committee reiterates its previous requests to the Government, as set out above, and reminds the Government that ILO technical assistance remains at its disposal on the abovementioned issues.

Bahamas

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 30 September 2009, concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

The Committee notes that the Government repeats the information sent in its previous report. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous direct request it noted that the Labour Relations Act does not apply to the prison service (section 3) and requested the Government to guarantee these workers the right to organize. The Committee noted the Government's statement that it was currently reviewing the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) with a view to address the right of prison staff to organize. The Committee expresses the hope that the IRA will be amended in the near future so as to formally and expressly recognize the right to organize to prison staff and asks the Government to provide a copy of the amended text as soon as it has been adopted.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous direct request, the Committee noted that, according to section 8(1)(e) of the IRA, the registrar shall refuse to register a trade union if he considers, after applying the rules for the registration of trade unions, that the union should not be registered. The rules for registration are provided in Schedule I. According to section 1 of the Schedule, in applying the rules of the registration of trade unions, the registrar shall exercise his discretion. The Committee noted the Government's statement that this provision is intended to ensure that there is no confusion or ambiguity regarding the rights of workers to certain information (finances and related matters) and that trade unions do not adopt names that are similar in nature and thereby confusing to the bargaining unit. As already stated, it is the Committee's view that provisions which confer on the competent authority a genuinely discretionary power to grant or reject a registration request, or to grant or withhold the approval required for the establishment and functioning of an organization, are tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention [see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74]. The Committee therefore asks the Government once again to take the necessary measures to ensure that no discretionary power is conferred to the registrar to refuse the registration of trade unions or employers' organizations and to provide information on any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives freely. The Committee noted, in its previous direct request, that section 20(2) of the IRA, according to which the secret ballot for election or removal of trade union officers and for amendment of the constitution of trade unions should be taken under the supervision of the registrar or a designated officer, was contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee noted the Government's statement to the effect that it concurs with the Committee's view regarding this section and that recommendation for its amendment is in the process of being submitted to Cabinet for consideration. The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken to amend section 20(2) of the IRA so as to ensure that trade unions could conduct a ballot without interference from the authorities. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives freely. The Committee notes that the constitution of every trade union should provide that executive committees and officers of trade unions should be elected at intervals not exceeding three years (section 9(4)(1) of Schedule I). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this section implies that trade union officers cannot be re-elected for a consecutive term.

The Committee notes that, according to section 9(4)(3) of Schedule I, the constitution of a trade union should include a provision to the effect that every officer must be a person who is legally entitled to be employed in the Bahamas in the industry, or as a member of the craft or category of employees, which the union represents. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the meaning of this provision and, in particular, to indicate whether only nationals of the Bahamas can be elected to the posts of trade union officers.

Right to strike. The Committee notes section 20(3) requiring a strike ballot to be taken under supervision by an officer of the ministry. If this section is not complied with, a strike is unlawful. The Committee considers that, with a view to ensuring freedom from any influence or pressure by the authorities, which might affect the exercise of the right to strike in practice, the legislation should not provide for supervision of a ballot by the authorities. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 20(3) accordingly to the above principle and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that, under the terms of section 73, the minister shall refer the dispute to the tribunal if the parties to the dispute, within non-essential services, failed to reach a settlement. It is unlawful to have recourse to strike action once the dispute is referred to the tribunal (section 77(1)). Furthermore, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might be referred to the tribunal for settlement. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in the event of an acute national emergency, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that section 75 restricts the objective of a strike. It appears to the Committee that protest and sympathy strikes are illegal under the terms of section 75. In the view of the Committee, organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. Furthermore, the Committee considers that a general prohibition on sympathy strikes could lead to abuse and that workers should be able to take such action, provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 165 and 168). The Committee requests the Government to ensure the right of workers' organizations to recourse to this type of strike and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes that, when a strike is organized or continued in violation of the abovementioned provisions, excessive sanctions, including imprisonment for up to two years are provided (sections 74(3), 75(3), 76(2)(b) and 77(2)). The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to amend the Labour Relations Act so as to bring it into conformity with freedom of association principles on this point.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. The Committee notes section 4 of Schedule I concerning the registration of federations, etc. The Committee asks the Government to explain how this provision is applied in practice.

The Committee notes section 39 concerning control of foreign connections of unions and federations. Under the terms of this section, it shall not be lawful for a trade union to be a member of any body constituted or organized outside the Bahamas without a licence from the minister, who has discretionary power to grant or refuse it and/or to accompany it with certain conditions. The Committee recalls that Article 5 of the Convention stipulates that first-level organizations, as well as federations and confederations, have the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. Legislation which restricts the right of international affiliation by requiring prior authorization by the public authorities, or by permitting it only in certain conditions established by law, poses serious difficulties with regard to the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Finally, with reference to its previous direct request, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the situation with regard to the draft Trade Union and Labour Relations Act and the draft Industrial Tribunal and Trade Disputes Act.

The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the issues raised above in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 30 September 2009, which refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

Prison guards. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's statement to the effect that measures to allow for the organization of prison guards were currently under consideration and that it was envisaged to review the relevant provision. The Committee expressed the hope that, as the Government stated that amendments to the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) were under review, the future legislation would recognize prison guards' right to organize and to collective bargaining and asked the Government to inform it of developments in this regard.

Fire brigade workers. The Committee had further noted the Government's view that, as far as the fire brigade was concerned, it was not desirable that its members be allowed to organize in view of the fact that it consisted exclusively of police officers, that is members of a disciplined force, who doubled as trained firefighters. The Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether they were police agents which also had functions of firefighters or whether they were exclusively firefighters covered by police status.

Other questions. The Committee had also regretted to note that the Government had not replied to the questions raised in its previous comments concerning Article 2 of the Convention (acts of interference). The Committee had requested the Government to adopt legislative provisions to protect workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference by each other or each other's agents, accompanied by effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. In a previous comment, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that provisions strengthening this protection were contained in the Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill, 2000, a copy of which would be sent to the ILO after its adoption by the Legislative Assembly. The Committee expressed the hope that the future legislation would guarantee an adequate protection against acts of interference and had requested the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Representativeness for collective bargaining. The Committee had also taken note of the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the ITUC criticizing the requirement for a trade union to represent 50 per cent of the workers plus one in a unit in order to be recognized for bargaining purposes and the fact that an employer may, after 12 months of unsuccessful negotiations, apply for a union's recognition to be revoked (with some employers deliberately dragging out negotiations for that purpose). The ITUC added that the Government had failed to honour industrial agreements. The Committee requested the Government to send its comments on the ITUC's observations.

Regretting that the Government's report contains no information concerning the issues raised in its previous comment, the Committee asks the Government to take the measures requested therein and to provide full information in this regard in its next report.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008. As concerns the ITUC's allegations of violations of the Convention in the garment sector, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the present Government was committed to ensuring workers' freedom of association rights and intends to take all measures to protect workers' rights, health and safety in the workplace, and that the establishment of the Minimum Wages Board to enhance garment workers' minimum wages was in progress. The Government states that the aggrieved workers have the legal right to submit grievances to their employers, to lodge a complaint with the Government Inspection Department or in the Department of Labour, and to sue in the labour court if necessary. Moreover, in early 2008, a crisis management committee in the garment sector was constituted to face the crisis and solve the relevant issues amicably through negotiations. The Government further indicates, in this respect, that all citizens of Bangladesh have the right to seek the shelter of the law to protect their lives or property, and that it was closely monitoring the issues so that employers may not fire innocent workers at will.

With regard to the 2008 ITUC allegations concerning the arrest and detention of the General Secretary of the Dhaka University Teachers' Association (DUTA) and four other professors, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the cases have been concluded and the teachers released. In respect of the allegation that, despite a tripartite agreement signed on 12 June 2006 to withdraw cases lodged against the workers in 2006 and release the arrested persons in Gazipur, Tongi, Savar and Ashulia Police Stations, Cases Nos 49/06, 50/06 and 51/06 against workers which were under the jurisdiction of the Joydevpur Police Station were yet to be withdrawn, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it was taking initiatives to withdraw all three cases under the Joydevpur Police Station's jurisdiction – which concerned a total of 41 persons – in accordance with the 2006 tripartite agreement.

Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's allegation that the Joint Director for Labour (JDL), who is responsible for registering trade unions, refused to take any action on pending union registration applications in 2007, particularly in the textiles sector. It had also requested the Government to indicate the status of the Bangladesh Garments and Industrial Sramik Federation (BGIWF), which according to the ITUC had faced deregistration. The Government indicates, in this regard, that due to the declaration of an emergency in 2007 some constitutional and labour law provisions relating to trade union formation and registration were suspended – thus rendering trade union registration impossible that year. The Government adds that since January 2009, 73 trade unions have been registered. As concerns the BGIWF, the Government states that the Registrar of Trade Unions had applied to the Court seeking the cancellation of the BGIWF's registration; while the case was presently under examination the BGIWF remains a registered organization under the law and is freely pursuing its activities. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the status of the court case concerning the BGIWF's registration, the reason for the cancellation request by the Registrar and to provide a copy of the court's judgement should it have been rendered.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested information on: (i) the measures taken, including instructions given to the law enforcement authorities, so as to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations, and ensure that arrests are made only where criminal acts have been committed; (ii) the charges brought in 2004 against 350 women trade unionists, including the General Secretary of the JSL's Women's Committee, Shamsur Nahar Bhuiyan and all judicial decisions taken in this matter; and (iii) the measures taken to ensure the prompt registration of Immaculate (Pvt) Ltd Sramik Union. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) it is fully aware and committed to freedom of association free from violence, pressure of threat of any kind, and that the necessary provisions are laid down in the laws. Arrests, furthermore, are only made pursuant to the law and when crimes are committed; (2) the law enforcement authorities are to avoid unnecessary violence, and the situation is monitored through monthly meetings of the Crisis Management Committee, comprised of officials of different law enforcement authorities. Moreover, at present there is no worker or trade union leader arrested for participation in demonstrations; (3) the charges brought in 2004 against the 350 women trade unionists had been dropped – they are presently free and enjoying the exercise of their trade union rights; and (4) the Director of Labour, who is responsible for trade union registration, is still awaiting the application for registration of the Immaculate (Pvt) Ltd Sramik Union; the Department of Labour (DOL) would take prompt measures to register the union upon receipt of its application. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that, once the Immaculate (Pvt) Ltd Sramik Union's application is received, the Government will actively pursue measures to ensure the union's prompt registration.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 26 August 2009. The ITUC alleges additional violations of the Convention in 2008. In particular, the ITUC refers to the following violations in the garment sector: the arrest of and bringing of charges (later dropped) against members and leaders of the Bangladesh Independent Garment Workers Union Federation (BIGWUF), the Shawdhin Bangla Garments Sramik Karmachari Federation (SBGSKF), the Textile Garments Workers Federation (TGWF), the Bangladesh Posak Shilpo Sramik Federation (BPSSF), and the National Garment Workers Federation (NGWF); the imprisonment from September to December of the President of the New Modern Garment Workers and Employees Union (NMGWEU); the beating of female garment workers for having participated in a strike; and arrests, detentions and physical assault by the police against numerous workers from more than a dozen garment factories. The Committee recalls once again that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of workers' organizations and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers, constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular. The Committee notes with concern these allegations and requests the Government to provide full particulars in respect of the ITUC's allegations.

Right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's allegation that the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) continued to raise obstacles to the establishment of workers' associations in EPZs – even though section 13(1) of the Industrial Relations Act 2004 provided that workers had the right to apply to form workers' associations after the deadline of 31 October 2006 – and had requested the Government to provide statistical information on the number of workers' associations established in the EPZs after 1 November 2006. The Government indicates that it has, through a letter sent to all enterprises, encouraged the formation of workers' associations as of 1 November 2006. To date, workers' associations have been established in 188 enterprises, or 75.20 per cent of all the eligible enterprises. In this connection, the Committee notes that in its 2009 comments the ITUC alleges a number of restrictions on freedom of association rights in the EPZ sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee further recalls that it had previously commented on the EPZ Workers' Associations and Industrial Relations Act 2004, which contains numerous and significant restrictions and delays in relation to the right to organize in EPZs. The Committee notes that according to the Government, the BEPZA is aware of the Committee's comments in this regard, which would be taken into consideration in the present review and amendment process of the EPZ Workers' Associations and Industrial Relations Act 2004. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the review and amendment process referred to by the Government would soon bring the following provisions of the said Act into conformity with the Convention, in line with its previous comments:

- section 24, which provides that workers' associations will not be allowed in industrial units established after the commencement of the Act until a period of three months has expired after the commencement of commercial production in the concerned unit;
- section 25(1), which provides that there can be no more than one workers' association per industrial unit;
- sections 14, 15, 17 and 20, which establish excessive and complicated minimum membership and referendum requirements for the establishment of workers' associations (a workers' association may be formed only when a minimum of 30 per cent of the eligible workers of an industrial unit seek its formation, and this has been verified by the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA, who shall then conduct a referendum on the basis of which the workers shall acquire the legitimate right to form an association under the Act, only if more than 50 per cent of the eligible workers cast their vote, and more than 50 per cent of the votes cast are in favour of the formation of the workers' association);

- section 17(2), which confers excessive powers of approval of the Constitution Drafting Committee to the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA;
- section 16, which prevents steps for the establishment of a workers' association in the workplace for a period of one year after a first attempt failed to gather sufficient support in a referendum;
- section 35, which permits the deregistration of a workers' association at the request of 30 per cent of the workers even if they are not members of the association and prevents the establishment of another trade union for one year after the previous trade union was deregistered;
- sections 36(1)(c), (e)–(h) and 42(1)(a), which provide for the cancellation of the registration of a workers' association on grounds which do not appear to justify the severity of this sanction (such as contravention of any of the provisions of the association's constitution);
- sections 54(3) and (4), which establish a total prohibition of industrial action in EPZs until 31 October 2008 (section 88(1) and (2)); provides for severe restrictions of strike action, once recognized (possibility to prohibit a strike if it continues for more than 15 days or even before this deadline, if the strike is considered as causing serious harm to productivity in the EPZ);
- section 18(2), which prevents workers' associations from obtaining or receiving any fund from any outside source without the prior approval of the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA;
- section 32(1), which establishes an excessively high minimum number of trade unions to establish a higher level organization (more than 50 per cent of the workers' associations in an EPZ);
- section 32(3), which prohibits a federation from affiliating in any manner with federations in other EPZs and beyond EPZs; and
- sections 5(6) and (7), 28(1), 29, and 32(4), which do not seem to afford guarantees against interference with the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom (e.g. the procedure of election is to be determined by the BEPZA).

The Committee further requests the Government to indicate any developments concerning the amendment and review process in its next report.

Other discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee recalls that for many years it had been referring to serious discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act 2006 (the Labour Act), which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance of 1969, and noted with deep regret that the Labour Act did not contain any improvements in relation to the previous legislation and, in certain regards, contained even further restrictions which were contrary to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that a tripartite labour law review committee to identify the gaps and discrepancies in the Labour Act and suggest the necessary amendments had been constituted, as well as its indication that the workers excluded from the Labour Act's provisions were not covered by other legislation. The Committee requests the Government to inform it of developments with regard to the review process referred to and expresses the firm hope that the Labour Act will soon be amended in line with the discrepancies previously identified, which it repeats as follows:

- the need to repeal provisions on the exclusion of managerial and administrative employees from the right to establish workers' organizations (section 2 XLIX and LXV of the Labour Act) as well as new restrictions of the right to organize of firefighting staff, telex operators, fax operators and cipher assistants (exclusion from the provisions of the Act based on section 175 of the Labour Act);
- the need to either amend section 1(4) of the Labour Act or adopt new legislation so as to ensure that the workers in the following sectors, which have been excluded from the scope of application of the Act including its provisions on freedom of association, have the right to organize: offices of or under the Government (except workers in the Railway Department, Posts, Telegraph and Telephone Departments, Roads and Highways Department, Public Works Department and Public Health Engineering Department and the Bangladesh Government Press); the security printing press; establishments for the treatment or care of the sick, infirm, aged, destitute, mentally disabled, orphans, abandoned children, widows or deserted women, which are not run for profit or gains; shops or stalls in public exhibitions which deal in retail trade; shops in any public fair for religious or charitable purposes; educational, training and research institutions; agricultural farms with less than ten workers; domestic servants; and establishments run by the owner with the aid of members of the family.
- the need to repeal provisions which restrict membership in trade unions and participation in trade union elections to those workers who are currently employed in an establishment or group of establishments, including seafarers currently engaged in merchant shipping (section 2 LXV and 175, 185(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal or amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of a worker or trade union, an act aimed at "intimidating" any person to become, continue to be or cease to be a trade union member or officer, or “inducing” any person to cease to be a member or officer of a trade union by conferring or offering to confer any advantage and the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(2)(a) and (b) and 291 of the Labour Act); the Committee considers that the terms “intimidating” or “inducing” are too general and do not sufficiently safeguard against interference in internal trade union affairs, since, for instance, a common activity of trade unions is to recruit members by offering advantages, including with regard to other trade unions;

- the need to repeal provisions which prevent workers from running for trade union office if they were previously convicted for compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to agree to any demand by using intimidation, pressure, threats, etc. (sections 196(2)(d) and 180(1)(a) of the Labour Act);
- the need to lower the minimum membership requirement of 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in an establishment or group of establishments for initial and continued union registration, as well as the possibility of deregistration if the membership falls below this number (sections 179(2) and 190(f) of the Labour Act); the need to repeal provisions which provide that no more than three trade unions shall be registered in any establishment or group of establishments (section 179(5) of the Labour Act) and that only one trade union of seafarers shall be registered (section 185(3) of the Labour Act); finally, the need to repeal provisions prohibiting workers from joining more than one trade union and the consequent penalty of imprisonment in case of violation of this prohibition (sections 193 and 300 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions denying the right of unregistered unions to collect funds (section 192 of the Labour Act) upon penalty of imprisonment (section 299 of the Labour Act);
- the need to lift several restrictions on the right to strike: requirement for three-quarters of the members of a workers’ organization to consent to a strike (sections 211(1) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes which last more than 30 days (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes at any time if a strike is considered prejudicial to the national interest (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act) or involves a public utility service including the generation, production, manufacture, or supply of gas and oil to the public, as well as railways, airways, road and river transport, ports and banking (sections 211(4) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); prohibition of strikes for a period of three years from the date of commencement of production in a new establishment, or an establishment owned by foreigners or established in collaboration with foreigners (sections 211(8) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); penalties of imprisonment for participation in – or instigation to take part in unlawful industrial action or go-slow (sections 196(2)(e) and 291, 294–296 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions which provide that no person refusing to take part in an illegal strike shall be subject to expulsion or any other disciplinary measure by the trade union, so as to leave this matter to be determined in accordance with trade union rules (section 229 of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of workers, an act of compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to accept or agree to any demand by using “intimidation”, “pressure”, “threat” so as to ensure that there is no interference with the right of trade unions to engage in activities like collective bargaining or strikes, and to repeal the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(d) and 291(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend provisions which impose a penalty of imprisonment for failure to appear before the conciliator in the framework of settlement of industrial disputes (section 301 of the Labour Act).

The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate whether rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules 1977 (IRR), which previously granted the Registrar of Trade Unions (RTU) overly broad authority to enter trade union offices, inspect documents, etc., without judicial review, had been repealed by the entry into force of the Labour Act 2006. The Committee notes that the Government states, in this regard, that rule 10 of the IRR remains valid, and that – as its purpose was to maintain discipline in trade union administrations – it was not in favour of repealing the said provision. The Government further indicates that the workers’ representatives in the tripartite review process towards the enactment of the Labour Act had raised no objections to the RTU’s authority in these matters. In this respect, the Committee must once again recall that the right of workers’ and employers’ organizations to organize their administration without interference by the public authorities includes in particular, autonomy and financial independence and the protection of the assets and property of these organizations. There is no violation of the Convention if such verification is limited to exceptional cases, for example in order to investigate a complaint, or if there have been allegations of embezzlement. Both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should however always be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity [see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraphs 124 and 125]. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal rule 10 of the IRR or amend the latter so as to ensure that the Registrar of Trade Unions’ (RTU) authority to supervise a trade union’s internal affairs conforms to the principles mentioned above.

The Committee takes due note of the Government’s statement that it was fully committed to ensuring compliance with the Convention and the promotion of freedom of association in the country. The Committee invites the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in respect of all the matters raised above.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008. It further notes the latest comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication dated 26 August 2009.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers in export processing zones (EPZs) against anti-union discrimination. Previously the Committee had taken note of the ITUC's comments made in 2007 that there were numerous instances of dismissals, suspensions and harassment of trade unionists in EPZs, in particular in the garment and textile industries, and that the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) had failed to protect trade unionists, thus significantly undermining the extension of associational rights to workers in EPZs. The Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's comments and to furnish statistical information on the number of anti-union discrimination complaints submitted to the competent authorities and their outcomes since November 2006, when workers' associations were authorized in the EPZs, as well as the number of collective agreements concluded in EPZ enterprises and their coverage. The Committee notes the Government's statement that from August to December 2006, 16 trade unions in different garment industries were registered.

As concerns protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Committee notes that the Government, in its reply to the ITUC's 2008 comments, indicates that the BEPZA has taken steps to protect the interests of workers and issued instructions pertaining to labour administration in the zones. Furthermore, industrial relations departments have been established in each EPZ; the industrial relations departments entertain worker grievances and complaints and engage in supervision and monitoring so as to maintain a harmonious industrial relations environment in the EPZs. While noting this information, the Committee notes that in its 2009 communication the ITUC refers once again to numerous instances of harassment, dismissal and violence against workers in the EPZ sector, particularly in the garment industry. The ITUC further states that although the law provides for the establishment of an EPZ Labour Tribunal and an EPZ Labour Appellate, these two bodies had yet to be established – thus denying workers access to the judicial system for their grievances.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that as required by the EPZ Workers' Association and Industrial Relations Act, two conciliators and panels of arbitrators have been appointed to facilitate dispute resolution among the workers and employers. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that EPZ workers can also seek judicial redress in cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in respect of these matters, including information on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination in the EPZ sector submitted to the competent authorities, as well as the outcomes of those complaints.

The Committee notes the ITUC's indication that at the start of 2008 workers voted to establish trade unions in 69 EPZ enterprises, and that pursuant to a decision of the BEPZA, 124 more EPZ enterprises must hold trade union elections by 2010. The Committee further notes that the Government, in its reply to the ITUC's 2008 comments, states that referendums and elections on workers' associations had been completed in 188 out of a total of 250 eligible EPZ enterprises – or 75.2 per cent of the total number of eligible enterprises. Noting these developments, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the extent of collective bargaining in the EPZ sector, including statistics on the number of collective agreements concluded and the number of workers they cover.

Article 2. Lack of legislative protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the Labour Act 2006 did not contain a prohibition of acts of interference designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or their organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the object of placing them under the control of employers or their organizations, and had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to adopt such a prohibition. The Committee notes that the Government refers to legal provisions which would confer partial protection against acts of interference. These provisions state that no employer (or anyone acting on his or her behalf) shall: induce any person to refrain from becoming, or to cease to be a member or officer of a trade union, by conferring or offering to confer any advantage on, or by procuring or offering to procure any advantage for such person or any other person; compel any officer of the collective bargaining agent to sign a memorandum of settlement or arrive at a settlement by using intimidation, coercion, pressure, threat, confinement to a place, physical injury, disconnection of water, power and telephone facilities and such other methods; or interfere with, or in any way influence, ballots. The Committee requests the Government to indicate which law contains the abovementioned provisions, as well as to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt a comprehensive prohibition that: (1) covers acts of financial control of trade unions or trade union leaders, as well as acts of interference in internal trade union affairs; and (2) is coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against all acts of interference in the establishment and functioning of workers' organizations by employers and vice versa.

Article 4. Legal requirements to collective bargaining. In its previous comment, the Committee had referred to section 179(2) of the Labour Act, which provides that a trade union may only obtain registration if it represents 30 per cent of the workers in an establishment, as well as to section 202(15) of the Labour Act, which provides that if there is more than one trade union in an enterprise, no trade union shall be declared to be the collective bargaining agent unless it obtains the votes of at least one third of the employees in a secret ballot. The Committee regrets that the Government provides no information respecting this matter. Noting once again that the percentage requirements for registration of a trade union and for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent set out in sections 179(2) and 202(15) of the Labour Act 2006 may impair the development of free and voluntary collective bargaining, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated so as to lower these requirements.

Tripartite wages commissions in the public sector. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative or other measures to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment in the public sector by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions (section 3 of Act No. X of 1974). The Committee notes with regret that, as with the other legislative matters previously raised, the Government fails to provide information in this regard. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalls that Article 4 relates to free and voluntary negotiations between employers or their organizations and workers' organizations with a view to the regulation of wage rates and other conditions of employment by means of collective agreements, including with regard to public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions, so as to favour free and voluntary negotiations between workers' organizations and employers or their organizations, who should be able to appoint freely their negotiating representatives.

Finally, noting the Government's statement that it is fully committed to complying with the ILO's Conventions, the Committee requests the Government to adopt all the measures requested without delay.

Barbados

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made in 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados on the application of the Convention.

Article 3. The right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the need to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, according to which any person who wilfully breaks a contract of service or hiring, knowing that this could endanger real or personal property, is liable to a fine or up to three months' imprisonment, so as to eliminate the possibility of employers invoking it in a case of future strikes. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government once again states that there is no record that this section has ever been invoked and that in practice, workers in all sectors take industrial action when they perceive it to be beneficial. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. Once again, the Committee invites the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

In addition, the Committee notes that, in its 2008 comments on the application of the Convention, the Congress of Trade Unions and Staff Associations of Barbados indicated that the Government submitted an amended Trade Union Act Cap. 361 to the trade unions for comment and review. The Committee requests the Government to provide with its next report a draft copy of this legislation and to indicate any progress made in this regard.

The Committee takes note of the response of the Government, dated 19 January 2009, to the comments received and previously noted from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), as well as the comments by the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that in previous observations, it requested the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that its legislation provides adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination, in taking up employment and throughout the course of employment, including at the time of termination and covering all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, demotions, transfers and other prejudicial acts) as well as adequate and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the inadequacy of remedies for workers discharged for their union activity, since courts may not reinstate dismissed workers. In addition, the ITUC refers to section 40A of the Trade Union Act which states that an employer who dismisses, adversely affects, or threatens to dismiss or adversely affect a worker due to their trade union membership or activities can be subject to a fine of US$1,000 and imprisonment for up to six months. The Committee also notes with interest that the Government's report refers to the drafting of new employment rights legislation which would create an independent tribunal to hear cases alleging unfair dismissals and to issue adequate awards. The Committee requests the Government in its next report to include a copy of the draft legislation. The Committee hopes that the Government will enforce section 40A of the Trade Union Act to ensure that employees are protected against acts of anti-union discrimination. Once again, the Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention in the very near future.

Belarus

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in communications dated 26 and 28 August 2009, respectively.

The Committee also takes note of the seminar on the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations organized jointly by the ILO and the Government of Belarus in January 2009 and welcomes the plan of action to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry subsequently adopted by the tripartite National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI). The Committee further notes with interest that, pursuant to the plan of action, the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere ("the Council") evolved into a tripartite body where trade unions could raise their concerns and that the Council's composition now included three representatives of the CDTU.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with regret the absence of action by the Government to register trade union organizations, the registration of which had been requested by the ILO supervisory bodies (i.e. those primary-level organizations that were the subject of the complaint before the Commission of Inquiry, as well as organizations of the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) in Mogilev, Gomel, Smolevichi and Rechitsa and its primary trade union at "Avtopark No. 1"; two regional organizations of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) in Mogilev and Baranovichi; and the Belarusian Trade Union of Individual Entrepreneurs "Razam", a partner organization of the CDTU.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that at its sitting of 30 April 2009 the Council discussed the issue of trade union registration and reached the following decisions, agreed upon by all members of the Council:

- The Council noted registration of the primary REWU organizations in Smolevichi and Rechitsa.
- The primary trade union of the Belarus Independent Trade Union (BITU) at the "Belshina" enterprise could not be registered due to the absence of confirmation of its legal address. The Council recommended to the administration of the enterprise, the Confederation of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs (Employers) (CIE(E)), the BITU, the CDTU and the local executive body to find a solution to the question of legal address in this case.
- The Council took note of the information provided by a Ministry of Justice representative that no request for registration was submitted by the BFTU regional organization in Baranovichi.
- The Council noted the reasons for denial of registration of the BFTU regional organization in Mogilev and "Razam" union.
- In the Council's opinion, refusals to register the REWU territorial structures in Gomel and Mogilev were justified because their members were not bound by common interests by virtue of the nature of their work, as required by section 1 of the Law on Trade Unions.
- The Council noted that the abovementioned grounds for refusal were not applicable to the REWU primary trade union at "Avtopark No. 1" as all its members were employed at the same enterprise.

The Committee notes with interest the registration of the primary REWU organizations in Smolevichi and Rechitsa. It further notes with interest that, following the Council's decision, suitable premises for the legal address of the "Belshina" enterprise union were found and that this organization was re-registered in October 2009. The Committee observes that at its sitting of 26 November 2009, the Council once again discussed the issue of registration of the "Razam" union. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the discussion. It encourages the Government to continue its close cooperation with the social partners in addressing the difficulties with registration in practice. Regretting that no information has been provided by the Government on the number of registered organizations and those denied registration during the reporting year, the Committee requests the Government to provide this information with its next report.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a REWU representative present at the sitting argued that the common interest of the members of the Gomel and Mogilev territorial organizations lay in the fact that they were all employed workers. This view was rejected by the Council's members, who concluded that the refusal to register these organizations did not restrict the right of unions to freely determine their own structures and activities.

The Committee notes the CDTU's view that despite the specific cases mentioned above, no real progress had been achieved with regard to trade union registration. Firstly, there had been no clear and unambiguous instructions issued by the Government to employers and registering bodies to register the unions mentioned in the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. Only some of the unions succeeded in getting legal address, the largest number of the organizations had to terminate their existence. Secondly, referring to the Council's decision of 30 April 2009, the CDTU confirms that the tripartite body reviewed the refusals to register the REWU territorial structures in Gomel and Mogilev, "Razam" union and the BFTU regional organizations in Baranovich and Mogilev. With regard to the latter two, the CDTU indicates that the Council limited itself by stating the fact that there were no organizations left to be registered; those primary organizations mentioned in the ILO recommendations no longer existed.

The Committee recalls that it had previously noted with regret that the requirement of legal address continued to raise difficulties with the registration of trade unions in practice and requested the Government to take the necessary measures to immediately amend Presidential Decree No. 2 of 1999 so as to ensure that workers and employers may form organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. In this regard, the Committee notes the CDTU's indication that the legal address requirement continues to hinder the establishment and functioning of trade unions.

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, the Council adopted a number of measures intended to resolve problems arising from the implementation of the national legislation in practice and discussed approaches to developing legislation on trade unions on the basis of Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Council took note of the explanation provided by a representative of the Ministry of Justice that the 10 per cent requirement was not applicable to union organizational structures, including primary trade unions. Pursuant to the Council's request, the Ministry of Justice informed the local authorities of the need for strict adherence to this approach. The Committee notes the copy of this instruction forwarded by the Government. The Government further indicates that the Council's members were requested to provide their proposals for the further development of legislation on trade unions by 1 July 2009. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the issue of legislation on trade union registration was discussed at the Council's meeting on 26 November 2009. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the discussion.

The Committee notes with regret that, while the Government refers to continued work on developing legislation on trade unions, it has given no precise indication as to the steps taken to amend Decree No. 2, its rules and regulations, in particular, as regards the legal address requirement – a requirement which the Commission of Inquiry had observed gave rise in practice to arbitrary obstacles in the way of workers' right to organize (see Trade union rights in Belarus, para. 591 et seq.). While observing that the Council was able to successfully resolve the legal address problem for the BITU primary trade union at "Belshina" enterprise, the Committee notes that this very case demonstrates that the legal address requirement as applied in the country continues to be an obstacle to the registration of trade unions. Furthermore, while welcoming the Ministry of Justice's instruction requesting the registering bodies to ensure that the 10 per cent minimum membership was only required to form an autonomous union at the enterprise level, the Committee recalls that, since the issuance of the Decree, it has been expressing its concern over the effect of this requirement on the right to organize in large enterprises. It further recalls that on more than one occasion the Government referred to its intention to amend Decree No. 2. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend without delay Presidential Decree No. 2 as concerns trade union registration in consultation with the social partners so as to ensure that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed. It requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this respect.

Articles 3, 5 and 6. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it expressed its concern at the allegations of repeated refusals to authorize the BITU and the REWU to hold pickets and meetings and requested the Government to conduct independent investigations into these allegations and to bring the attention of the relevant authorities to the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests. The Committee notes with regret that no information has been provided by the Government in this respect. The Committee notes with concern from the CDTU's communication that 15 requests to hold pickets were allegedly denied. Recalling that protests are protected by the principles of freedom of association and that public meetings and demonstrations should not be arbitrarily refused, the Committee recalls the conclusions of the Commission of Inquiry in this regard (see Trade union rights in Belarus, paras 625–627) and once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to investigate the alleged cases of refusals to hold pickets and meetings and to bring the attention of the relevant authorities to the right of workers to participate in peaceful demonstrations to defend their occupational interests.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that National Bank employees may have recourse to industrial action without penalty.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been asking the Government to amend the Law on Mass Activities, sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code, and Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid. The Committee notes with regret that aside from the general statement to the effect that an agreement has been reached by the members of the Council that any legislation on trade unions should be developed on the basis of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and that the members of the Council had until 1 July 2009 to submit their proposals in this regard, there were no concrete proposals to amend the abovementioned pieces of legislation. Recalling that the abovementioned legislative provisions are not in conformity with the right of workers to organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities and their amendment had been requested by the Commission of Inquiry over five years ago, the Committee reiterates its previous requests and asks the Government to indicate concrete measures taken in this respect.

The Committee welcomes the continued commitment to social dialogue expressed by the Government and, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at its last discussion in June 2009, encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure full freedom of association in close cooperation with all the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO. It expresses the firm hope that the Government and the social partners will continue the cooperation within the framework of the tripartite Council so as to ensure that full freedom of association is effectively guaranteed in law and in practice.

The Committee requests the Government to respond to the observations made by the ITUC.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the measures taken to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in communications dated 26 and 28 August 2009, respectively.

The Committee also takes note of the seminar on the implementation of the Commission of Inquiry's recommendations organized jointly by the ILO and the Government of Belarus in January 2009 and welcomes the plan of action to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry subsequently adopted by the tripartite National Council on Labour and Social Issues (NCLSI). The Committee further notes with interest that, pursuant to the plan of action, the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Sphere ("the Council") evolved into a tripartite body where trade unions could raise their concerns and that the Council's composition now included three representatives of the CDTU.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee regretted that no information was provided by the Government on the measures taken to carry out independent investigations into the alleged instances of anti-union discrimination and interference suffered by members of the primary trade unions affiliated to the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU) at the "Mogilev ZIV" and "Avtopark No. 1". It also noted with regret the allegations by the ITUC of instances of anti-union discrimination against members of the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BITU) at the "Polymir" company and the leaders of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) at the Brest State Pedagogical University; as well as an alleged denial of access to the workplace ("Belaruskaliy") of the leader of the BITU. In these circumstances, the Committee requested the Government to carry out independent investigations into all alleged instances of interference and anti-union discrimination and reiterated its request to immediately redress all damages suffered from anti-union discrimination by those workers mentioned in the complaint filed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution, as well as those cases that had come to light the examination of the follow-up given by the Government to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that at its sitting of 14 May 2009 the tripartite Council discussed cases of termination of employment of Messrs Gaichenko, Dukhomenko, Obukhov, Shaitor, Shcherbo and Stukov (listed in the 352nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association). According to the Government, these workers were invited to the Council's meeting and the necessary measures were taken to ensure that employers did not obstruct their participation in the meeting and that the workers were given a day off for that purpose. The Government indicates that Mr Gachenko declined the invitation of the Council as he was satisfied with his employment at the "Naftan" enterprise in Novopolotsk. The Committee notes the minutes of the meeting provided by the Government and, in particular, the following conclusions, agreed upon by all members of the Council:

- The Council noted that the abovementioned workers were not experiencing any pressure from their respective employers.
- The Council took note of Mr Shcherbo's desire to work in his previous post and decided to assist him in obtaining a post of an electrical train driver at Minsk Metro.
- The Council noted that Mr Shaitor left the enterprise on 6 April 2009 and at the time of the meeting was unemployed. It was decided to ask the state employment service for assistance in getting him employed in his previous post or any other acceptable position.
- The Council noted that Messrs Dukhomenko and Obukhov no longer wished to work at their previous workplaces unless they were reinstated with full compensation. Noting that under the current legislation it was impossible to reinstate them in their previous posts, Mr Dukhomenko was offered assistance with his entrepreneurial activities, while Mr Obukhov, who was satisfied with his current employment, was informed of opportunities for further training.

- The Council discussed the situation of Mr Stukov who was currently employed at the Polotsk-Steklovolokno company. In April 2004 he was dismissed for causing material loss to his employers as established by the court. He was subsequently allowed back to his previous post in May 2004. Because of his dismissal, Mr Stukov lost his entitlement to a special length-of-service payment. The Council therefore decided to apply to the company for restoration of his full entitlements relating to the length of service which had been interrupted by his dismissal in April 2004.
- The Council emphasized that it would continue examining the issues relating to the protection of trade union members from discrimination and considered it appropriate to discuss existing legal mechanisms for protecting citizens from anti-union discrimination in the light of national legislation and international labour standards.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that, following the Council's decision, an agreement was reached with the Minsk Metro authority regarding the appointment of Mr Shcherbo, that Mr Shaitor has been hired as a driver at the Polotsk Dairy Combine and that full length-of-service entitlement was restored to Mr Stukov.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Office of the Public Prosecutor examined a representation by the BITU leader with regard to the alleged denial of access to the workplace by the management of "Belaruskaliy". The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that, at present, the dispute appears to no longer exist and that the trade union leader has visited the enterprise's premises on a number of occasions without hindrance.

The Committee notes with concern the comments made by CDTU on the continuing discriminatory use of fixed-term contracts. In its communication, the CDTU alleges that members of free and independent unions are forced to leave their unions under the threat of dissolution or non-renewal of their contracts. The CDTU provides the following statistics on the impact of threats of non-renewal of fixed-term contracts on independent unions (CDTU's affiliates):

- primary trade union at "Grodno-Azot" enterprise has lost 930 members since 2006;
- primary trade union at "Belshina" enterprise in Bobruisk has lost 50 members since 2006;
- primary trade union at "Polimir" chemical company in Novopolotsk has lost nearly 400 members since 2006; and
- primary trade union at Mozyr oil refinery company has lost at least 50 members since the beginning of 2009.

The CDTU further alleged that trade union membership of primary trade unions at "Zenit" company in Vileika (Minsk region), Brest Pedagogical University, hydraulic power station in Novolukoml and other small union organizations also suffered. According to the CDTU, the scenario of pressure on workers in all these cases was almost the same: the floor managers or managers on ideology would invite trade union members to sign statements indicating that they were leaving independent unions and discontinuing payment of trade union membership dues. Those who refused were threatened with dismissal and non-renewal of their fixed-term contracts. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Council will examine the allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference suffered by the CDTU-affiliated trade unions and their members at the abovementioned enterprises, as well as at "Mogilev ZIV", "Avtopark No. 1", with regard to the members affiliated to the REWU, in the near future. It requests the Government to inform it of the outcome of the discussion and of measures taken to redress the damages suffered.

Furthermore, the Committee once again urges the Government to pursue vigorously, on the one hand, the instructions to be given to enterprises so as to ensure that enterprise managers do not interfere in the internal affairs of trade unions and, on the other, instructions to the Prosecutor-General, Minister of Justice and court administrators that all complaints of interference and anti-union discrimination are thoroughly investigated.

Article 4. The Committee notes with interest that the CDTU is now a party to the General Agreement for 2009–10. It observes, however, the alleged instances of refusal to sign collective agreements with the CDTU-affiliated trade unions at "Grodno-Azot" and "Naftan-Polimir" enterprises, as described in the CDTU communication. The Committee notes that at its sitting of 26 November 2009, the tripartite Council discussed the issue of collective bargaining at enterprises with several trade union organizations, as well as development of the social partnership including conclusion of collective agreements at "Grodno-Azot" and "Naftan" enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of this discussion.

The Committee encourages the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry without delay in close cooperation with all the social partners and with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government and the social partners will continue the cooperation within the framework of the tripartite Council and that the latter will have a real impact on ensuring that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed in law and in practice.

Belgium

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009, concerning the increasingly systematic acts by employers of the judicial authorities to prohibit certain types of collective action by trade unions, and particularly the setting up of strike pickets. In the view of the ITUC, trade unions are not able to fully exercise their right to collective action since the informal agreement in 2002 between the social partners envisages that referral of trade disputes to the court would only occur when conciliation procedures have been exhausted and certain courts still issue injunctions even before the commencement of collective action. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's comments.

The Committee recalls that its comments have for many years concerned the need to take measures for the adoption of objective, pre-established and detailed legislative criteria determining the rules for the access of the occupational organizations of workers and employers to the National Labour Council, and that in this respect, the Organic Act of 29 May 1952 establishing the National Labour Council still contains no specific criteria on representativeness, but leaves broad discretionary power to the Government. The Committee notes with interest the information that a political agreement was found in September 2009 in consultation with the most representative organizations to amend the Organic Act of 29 May 1952 with a view to establishing quantitative and qualitative criteria that the most representative organizations which wish to be represented on the National Labour Council would have to meet. In this respect, the Government indicates that a Bill will be tabled at the beginning of the parliamentary session to amend the Act of 29 May 1952 and that the National Labour Council approved a draft which will be adopted by the Parliament before the end of the year relating to the criteria of representativeness. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Act once it is adopted.

Finally, the Committee notes the detailed information contained in the Government's report relating to the latest developments in case law respecting the protection of freedom of association and invites the Government to continue to provide information of this nature, where appropriate.

Belize

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) communication of 29 August 2008, which refers to employer strategies to prevent the growth of unions, for example, the non-recognition of unions and other anti-union practices, as well as to problems in practice for the exercise of trade union rights in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

Article 3 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend the Settlement of Disputes in Essential Services Act 1939 (SDESA), which empowers the authorities to refer a collective dispute to compulsory arbitration, to prohibit a strike or to terminate a strike in services that cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, namely: the banking sector, civil aviation, port authority (pilots), postal services, social security scheme and the petroleum sector. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the Committee's comments had been submitted to the Labour Advisory Board, which was recently reactivated and one of whose main duties is to review national labour legislation. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the SDESA will soon be amended so as to permit compulsory arbitration or a prohibition on strikes only in services that are essential in the strict sense of the term. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the new legislation once it is adopted.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 30 September 2009, which refers to matters previously raised by the Committee as well as the dismissals of trade unionists and violations of collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that in its 2008 comments, the ITUC alleged that court procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination were too slow and cumbersome, while the fines imposed were extremely low. The Committee had also noted the ITUC's allegation that in practice violations occurred in the banana plantation sector and in export processing zones, where employers do not recognize unions, and had requested the Government to provide information on these matters. Noting the Government's indication that the ITUC's 2008 comments would be submitted to a tripartite body established under the provisions of the Trade Unions and Employers'

Organizations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act and appointed in August 2008, the Committee requests the Government to inform it of the outcome of the tripartite body's deliberations on the matters raised by the ITUC.

Articles 3 and 4. The Committee had previously recalled that, under the provisions of section 27(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act, Chapter 304 (the Act), a trade union could be certified as a bargaining agent if it received 51 per cent of the votes and that problems might arise from such a requirement of an absolute majority since, where this percentage was not attained, the majority union would be denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 27(2) of the Act has still not been amended, and that it will keep the Office informed of progress concerning the revision of the said law. The Committee expresses the hope that it will be in a position in the near future to note progress on the amendment of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organisations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act and requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

The Committee had previously noted that according to the ITUC, collective bargaining rights were frequently violated by employers, despite the fact that they are guaranteed in law. The Committee had requested the Government to provide its observations in this respect, as well as statistical information on the number of collective agreements concluded during the last two years and the sectors and number of workers covered by such agreements. The Committee notes that according to the Government one agreement was signed in 2006 in the agricultural sector, covering approximately 42 workers, and seven agreements were concluded in 2007 in the agricultural, banking and services sectors, covering approximately 779 workers.

Benin

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009, reporting acts of intimidation against the leaders of the principal trade union federations which called a general strike in 2008 to protest against the decline in purchasing power. In general, the Committee considers that the right to organize public meetings is an important aspect of trade union rights. Similarly, protest action planned by trade unions may be a part of lawful trade union activities within the meaning of Article 3 of the Convention and is accordingly protected by the principles of freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comments concerning acts of discrimination and intimidation by the authorities against trade union leaders, and where necessary to conduct an inquiry.

Article 2. Right to establish trade unions without previous authorization. The Committee has been requesting the Government for many years to take measures to amend the provisions of the Labour Code which require the filing of trade union by-laws in order to obtain legal personality from the authorities, including the Ministry of the Interior, under penalty of a fine. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's indication that its comments, particularly on the need to amend section 83 of the Labour Code, would be taken into account during the revision of the labour legislation. In its latest report, the Government indicates that proposed amendments will soon be submitted to the National Labour Council and that this action, for which the Government has requested technical assistance from the Office, is covered by the annual workplan of the Ministry. The Committee trusts that the revision of the labour legislation, with the assistance of the Office, will be completed in the very near future. It expects that the Government will indicate in its next report the amendments made in order to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

Right of workers without distinction whatsoever to establish trade unions. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to revise Ordinance No. 38 PR/MTPTPT of 18 June 1968 issuing the Merchant Navy Code, which gives seafarers neither the right to organize nor the right to strike and provides for prison sentences for breaches of labour discipline. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its statement that the new Merchant Navy Code, taking into account the Committee's comments, is currently under examination by the National Assembly with a view to its adoption. The Committee trusts that the Government will indicate in its next report the adoption of the new Merchant Navy Code and that it will grant seafarers all the guarantees set out in the Convention in respect of freedom of association. The Government is requested to provide a copy of the adopted text.

Bolivia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 29 August 2008, which referred to legislative matters already raised by the Committee, as well as death threats against the Executive Secretary of the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB) and a dynamite attack against the COB headquarters in La Paz. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's recognition that the attack against the headquarters of the COB was reprehensible and caused material damage, although there were no fatalities. The Government adds that the corresponding complaint was made to the criminal investigation forces in the national police, but that progress was not made in the investigation as it was impossible to find those responsible. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected.

The Committee notes the new comments made by the ITUC on 26 August 2009, which refer to matters that are already under examination. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee notes the new Political Constitution of the State enacted on 7 February 2009. The Committee notes with satisfaction that articles 14, 49 and 51 of the new Constitution recognize the universal nature of the right to organize and collective bargaining for all workers, including agricultural workers, and the trade union protection of trade union leaders, and that it provides in article 112 that the rights recognized are directly applicable. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the State now has to adopt new legislation in accordance with the new Constitution and that consequently all the national legislation, including the General Labour Act, will be amended (repealed) and harmonized with the new Constitution, under which international Conventions have precedence in their application. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, with regard to freedom of association, the new Constitution was drawn up using Convention No. 87 as inspiration and accordingly many of the trade union rights set out in the law were transformed into constitutional rights. Now their implementation needs to be regulated through explicit legislation. In this respect, the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Insurance is engaged in drawing up a new Labour Act in accordance with the new Constitution, and during this process it will take into consideration and incorporate the Committee's comments.

The Committee recalls that for many years its comments have referred to the following matters:

- The exclusion of agricultural workers from the scope of the General Labour Act of 1942 (section 1 of the General Labour Act of 1942 and Regulatory Decree No. 224 of 23 August 1943, issued under the Act), which implies their exclusion from the guarantees afforded by the Convention. The Committee notes the reference by the Government in its report to various provisions which have gradually granted the guarantees set out in the Convention to agricultural workers and the indication that the Bill on agricultural and rural workers, establishing the conditions and rights of agricultural workers, is before the Senate of the National Congress. The Committee hopes that the Bill will be adopted in the near future and will ensure the application of the guarantees set out in the Convention to all agricultural workers, whether they are wage earners or own-account workers.
- Denial of the right to organize of public servants (section 104 of the General Labour Act). The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, public servants, like all workers, without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish organizations of their own choosing and to join those organizations without previous authorization for the promotion and defence of their interests.
- The requirement of 50 per cent of the workers in an enterprise in order to establish a trade union, if the latter is industrial in nature (section 103 of the General Labour Act). In this respect, the Committee recalls that this percentage is very high and could therefore hinder the establishment of trade unions at the industry level.
- The broad powers of supervision conferred on the labour inspectorate over trade union activities (section 101 of the General Labour Act, which provides that labour inspectors shall attend the deliberations of trade unions and monitor their activities). The Committee recalls that Article 3 of the Convention provides that workers' organizations shall enjoy the right to organize their administration and that the public authorities shall refrain from any interference which would restrict this right.
- The requirement that trade union officers must be of Bolivian nationality (section 138 of the Regulatory Decree of the General Labour Act) and permanent employees in the enterprise (sections 6(c) and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of June 1951). In the view of the Committee, national legislation should allow foreign workers to take up trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country, regardless of the acquisition of nationality (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 118). Provisions which lay down the requirement to belong to an occupation or establishment in order to be a trade union officer are not consistent with the Convention, as they may infringe the organization's right to elect representatives in full freedom by preventing qualified persons, such as full-time union officers or pensioners, from carrying out union duties, or by depriving unions of the benefit of the experience of certain officers when they are unable to provide enough qualified persons from among their own ranks (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 117).
- The majority of three-quarters of the workers in order to call a strike (section 114 of the General Labour Act and section 159 of the Regulatory Decree). The Committee recalls that the requirement of a decision by over half of all the workers involved in order to declare a strike is too high and could excessively hinder the possibility of calling a strike, particularly in large enterprises. The Committee considers, for example, that it would be more appropriate to reduce the required majority to a simple majority of the votes cast.
- The illegality of general and sympathy strikes, subject to penal sanctions (sections 1 and 2 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 and section 234 of the Penal Code). The Committee recalls that the general prohibition of sympathy strikes could lead to abuse, especially where the initial strike is legal, and that these strikes, as well as general strikes, are means of action that should be available to workers. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where, during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringement of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts.

- The illegality of strikes in the banking sector (section 1(c) of Supreme Decree No. 1958 of 1950). The Committee recalls that banking services are not regarded as essential services in the strict sense of the term (services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) in which strikes may be banned or restricted. However, the Committee recalls the possibility of establishing a negotiated minimum service in cases where, although the total prohibition of strike action is not justified, and without calling into question the right to strike of the great majority of workers, it is considered necessary to ensure that the basic needs of users are met.
- The possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration by decision of the executive authorities in order to bring an end to a strike, including in services other than those that are essential in the strict sense of the term (section 113 of the General Labour Act). The Committee recalls that a system of compulsory arbitration through the labour authorities, if a dispute is not settled by other means, can result in a considerable restriction of the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and may even indirectly involve an absolute prohibition of strikes, contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and strike situations is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or in cases where the strike may be restricted, or even banned, that is in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.
- The possibility of dissolving trade union organizations by administrative authority (section 129 of the Regulatory Decree). The Committee recalls that measures of suspension or dissolution by administrative authority constitute serious infringements of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee considers that the dissolution of trade union organizations is a measure which should only occur in extremely serious cases. Such dissolutions should only occur following a judicial decision so that the rights of defence are fully guaranteed.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that in the context of the planned legislative reform, further to the adoption of the new Constitution, all of its comments will be taken into account. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect and recalls that, if it so wishes, it may have recourse to the technical assistance of the Office.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring in particular to anti-union dismissals in a mining enterprise in the department of Oruro and a telecommunications cooperative in Sucre. The Committee takes note of the Government's general comments in reply to the effect that: (1) in the event of an anti-union dismissal, the Government has the obligation to enforce the Constitution and applicable laws, either through administrative channels, namely the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security, or through judicial channels and, if the dismissal is proved to be an anti-union act, immediate reinstatement must be ordered of the man or woman worker holding the trade union office who are protected by trade union immunity, in accordance with article 51, paragraph VI of the Political Constitution of the State; (2) trade union immunity implies that trade union officials may not be dismissed without trial; (3) trade union immunity protects trade union leaders from the time of their election, by virtue of Supreme Decree No. 29593 of 1 May 2008. The Committee observes that, apart from these general observations, the Government provides no specific information in response to the ITUC's allegations. In these circumstances, the Committee asks the Government to hold an inquiry into the matter and if it is ascertained that the dismissals were anti-union in origin, to take the necessary steps to remedy the measures found to be discriminatory.

The Committee notes the ITUC's new comments of 26 August 2009, referring to issues that are already under examination. It requests the Government to send its observations in response.

Legislative matters raised previously. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been addressing the following matters in its comments:

- The need to adjust the amount of the fines (from 1,000 to 5,000 bolivianos) envisaged in Act No. 38 of 7 February 1944 (former Legislative Decree No. 38) to make them sufficiently dissuasive against acts of anti-union discrimination or interference.

- The need to guarantee the right to organize of public servants and agricultural workers and, hence, their right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government refers to a number of provisions that have gradually extended the guarantees laid down in the Convention to agricultural workers, and indicates that the Chamber of Senators of the National Congress has before it a Bill on agricultural or rural workers the aim of which is to establish conditions of work and rights for agricultural workers. The Committee hopes that the Bill will be adopted in the near future and will apply the guarantees laid down in the Convention to all agricultural workers, whether they are wage workers or self-employed.
- With regard to the exclusion of public servants from the right to organize the Committee pointed out that, although Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories of workers should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 262).
- With regard to the need for swift and efficient procedures to ensure application of the rights laid down in the Convention, the Committee recalls that it also asked the Government to provide information on progress made in the passage of the Bill to issue the new Code of Labour Procedure, which the President had submitted to Parliament. The Committee notes in this connection the Government's statement that, in view of the adoption of the new Constitution, a new draft will have to be aligned with the Constitution and submitted to Parliament for consideration after the presidential elections of 6 December 2009. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Employment and Social Welfare will satisfy itself that the new draft is efficient and effective, allowing labour disputes or conflicts to be resolved more promptly.

The Committee takes note of the new Political Constitution of the State, promulgated on 7 February 2009. It notes with satisfaction that articles 14, 49 and 51 of the new Constitution recognize as universal the right to organize and the right to collective bargaining of all workers, including agricultural workers, as well as trade union immunity for union officials, and provides in article 112 that the rights established shall apply directly. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the State has at present to adopt new legislation that is consistent with the new Constitution and that all national laws, including the General Labour Act, will therefore be amended (repealed) and aligned with the new Constitution, under which international treaties take precedence. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, as regards freedom of association, the new Constitution drew on Convention No. 98 and for that reason many of the trade union rights laid down in the legislation became constitutional rights. Specific enabling regulations are now needed for their application. In this connection, the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare is drafting a new Labour Act consistent with the new Constitution, and the Committee's observations will be considered and incorporated in this context.

Subjects open to negotiation. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it asked the Government to indicate the criteria used by departmental labour services to approve collective agreements, and to send copies of the agreements that they have recently approved. The Committee notes the Government's statement that an example of how collective bargaining is encouraged is to be found in Supreme Decree No. 0016 of 19 February 2009 under which a wage increase was established for the private sector to cover 2009. Ministerial Resolution No. 115/09 of 9 March 2009 regulates the abovementioned Supreme Decree and provides that agreements to increase wages are required to contain: (a) the minimum percentage increase provided for in Supreme Decree No. 0016; (b) retroactive payment to January 2009; (c) the date of the agreement; (d) the number and payroll of the workers benefiting from the increase; (e) an indication as to whether the increase granted for 2009 amounts to or exceeds the 12 per cent established in section 3 of Supreme Decree No. 0016 as the basis for collective bargaining of the increase between employers and workers; and (f) the signatures of the beneficiary workers, trade union leaders, representatives of trade union committees or delegates, and the employers' representatives, demonstrating the parties' consent to the substance of the agreement.

The Committee has been noting for years that in practice collective bargaining deals only with wages and not other conditions of work. It recalls that, according to Article 4, the Government has a duty to adopt appropriate measures to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for collective bargaining with a view to regulating not only wage increases but also conditions of work. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to encourage collective bargaining, including the bargaining of subjects other than wages such as other conditions of employment, and to provide information in this regard.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that article 49, paragraph II of the new Constitution provides that "the law shall regulate labour relations respecting collective contracts and agreements; sectoral and general minimum wages and wage increases; reinstatement; paid rest and holidays, accounting of years of service, hours of work, overtime, supplements for night work, Sunday rates; end of year extra salary; bonuses or other schemes for participating in a company's profits; compensation and severance pay; maternity allowances; training and vocational training and other social rights". The Committee asks the Government to explain the exact meaning of this provision and to state specifically whether its purpose is to establish minimum standards for the areas covered or to replace provisions concluded in the framework of collective bargaining.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that in the context of the legislative reforms that are to be carried out pursuant to the adoption of the new Constitution, all the Committee's comments will be taken into account. It asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this area that concern the new General Labour Act and the Code of Labour Procedure, and reminds it that, if it so wishes, it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of collective agreements in the public sector and the private sector, the subjects dealt with and the number of workers covered.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments of both the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSSBiH) dated 24 December 2007 and 28 November 2008, the Confederation of Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (CTUBH) dated 20 August 2009, and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention, as well as the Government's observation thereon. The Committee notes the adoption of the Law on amendments to the Law on associations.

Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. Requirement of previous authorization for the establishment of employers' and workers' organizations and dissolution or cancellation of registration. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to amend section 32 of the Law on the associations and foundations of Bosnia and Herzegovina which authorizes the Minister of Justice to accept or refuse a request for registration and provides that the request shall be considered as rejected if the Minister does not adopt a decision within 30 days. The Committee also expressed the hope that the necessary amendments would be made to sections 30(2), 34 and 35 as regards dissolution or cancellation of registration along the lines of its previous requests. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that in case the Ministry does not resolve the application, for any reason within 30 days from the date of its submission, the request is not considered tacitly rejected, but the process continues until a decision is made. In this instance, the applicant may, however, immediately after the deadline expiration for making the first instance decision, appeal to the second instance authority in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Law. The second instance authority shall, within three days upon receipt of appeal, request from the first instance authority all the case files and a written statement on the reason why the party's application was not resolved within the prescribed period. If the second instance authority determines that the decision is not made within the prescribed period due to a justifiable reason, or due to the party's guilt, it shall specify the term for the first instance authority to make the decision. The Committee further notes with interest that sections 30(2), 34 and 35 have been amended. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the impact in practice of these amendments.

Registration of the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina. The Committee further recalls that in several of its previous observations it had noted the unreasonable period which had elapsed since the filing of a registration request by the SSSBiH and had requested information on the measures taken or contemplated in order to grant registration to this organization as soon as possible. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Appeal Commission, as an autonomous and independent second instance authority has now made decision No. 01-02-4/08, dated 11 May 2009, rejecting the appeal of the SSSBiH. The SSSBiH appealed this decision before the Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina on 17 July 2009.

The Committee observes with regret that the SSSBiH has not yet been registered despite the fact that the Committee has been raising this issue for several years now. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the basis of the Appeal Commission's denial of the SSSBiH's request for registration and to transmit a copy of that decision. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the litigation commenced by the SSSBiH in the Court of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (CTUBH) dated 20 August 2009 and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. Measures to encourage and promote the development of voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations. In several of its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated in order to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations, including at the level of the Republic as a whole. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that public authorities cannot influence or ensure the organization of trade unions in the private sector. Nevertheless, the Committee also observes from the Government's report that in the Brcko District, no collective agreement has been signed between the trade unions and employers of that district. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide it with statistics on the number and coverage of collective agreements that have been concluded throughout the territory.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1993)

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers' representatives. The Committee had previously recalled that it had taken note of the comments communicated by the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSSBiH) and the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republika Srpska (CTURS) with regard to dismissals of trade union representatives without the mandatory approval from the Federal Ministry of Labour; the workers' organizations mentioned that although the Labour Law contained provisions on the prohibition of discrimination, it was impossible to prove the breaches of these provisions at court because discrimination often occurred in a hidden manner. The Committee had further requested the Government to specify the provisions in the Labour Law which provide that the dismissal of workers' representatives shall be subject to approval by the Federal Ministry of Labour, as indicated by the SSSBiH and CTURS in their comments. It also requested the Government, while the Labour Code and Law on changes and amendments to the Labour Code of Brcko District (Official Gazette of Brcko District of BiH, Nos 7/00 and 33/04) were being translated, to specify the provisions which afford protection against anti-union discrimination to workers' representatives in the Brcko District.

While the Committee is still awaiting the translation of the Labour Code and Law on changes and amendments to the Labour Code of Brcko District (Official Gazette of Brcko District of BiH, Nos 7/00 and 33/04), it notes with interest the Government's statement that section 93 of the Labour Law of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FBiH) provides that only with the prior approval of the Federal Ministry of Labour may an employer terminate the employment agreements of trade union commissioners during their period of service, and for six months after having completed their period of service. Furthermore, the General Collective Agreement for the FBiH also includes this requirement of prior approval for the termination of trade union commissioners' employment agreements. The Committee also notes with interest that, according to the Government, section 26 of the Law on the Works Council provides that only with the previous consent of the works council may an employer terminate the employment of a works council member; the termination of a works council member's employment without such consent is an offence punishable by a fine.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Labour Law of the Brcko District includes a prohibition on discrimination on the basis of the following: membership or non-membership of a trade union; the choice of trade union; the opting in or out of trade union membership; and involvement in trade union activities. The prohibition, furthermore, extends to discriminatory dismissals. While noting this information, the Committee nevertheless recalls that, in the information submitted by the Government on the application of Convention No. 98, the Government indicates that the legislation of the Brcko District contains no sanctions against employers for acts of anti-union discrimination. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to clarify whether the Labour Law of Brcko district or any other legislation pertaining to Brcko District affords protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, and if so to specify the relevant provisions.

Article 2. Facilities granted to workers' representatives. The Committee had previously noted with interest the numerous facilities provided to workers' representatives according to the Government in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (time off from work, right to return to work after end of mandate, right to compensation of salary and premises, administrative and technical support for the performance of trade union representative functions). The Committee requested the Government to specify the legal texts on the basis of which these facilities were provided (e.g. law, collective agreement, etc.) in the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as well as to provide a copy of the General Collective Agreement for the territory of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of the Federation BiH, No. 54/05).

In respect of the above, the Committee notes that the Government indicates the following: (1) section 139 of the Labour Law of the FBiH provides that for employees elected to a professional trade union post, upon their request the rights and obligations arising from employment shall be on stand-by for no longer than four years from the day of election or appointment; (2) section 15 of the Law on the Works Council prescribes that the cost of elections of works council members shall be borne by the employer; (3) section 33 of the Law on the Works Council provides that the works council shall perform tasks and hold session during work hours. Each member of the works council shall be entitled to carry out the tasks from the scope of competencies of the works council several times per week, provided that members may assign work hours to each other. The tasks of the president or members of the works council may be carried out during full-time work hours if the sum of the assigned work hours so permits; (4) section 34 of the Law on the Works Council provides that council members shall be entitled to compensation for council-related work in the amount of the salary they would have earned for work done pursuant to their employment agreement; (5) section 35 of the Law on the Works Council provides that the president or members of the works council who have carried tasks for the works council during full-time work hours shall, once the said tasks have ceased, be entitled to return to the tasks they had previously performed or, if no such tasks remain, to other tasks corresponding to their professional qualifications; (6) section 36 of the Law on the Works Council provides that the employer shall be required to ensure to the works council the necessary space, administrative and technical conditions for work, which is more closely governed through an agreement between the employer and the works council; and (7) sections 27 and 28 of the General Collective Agreement for the territory of the FBiH provide that trade union representatives not employed by the employer but whose trade union includes members employed by the employer shall be allowed access when so required for carrying out trade union activities. Also, the employer's employment policy must stipulate and ensure the conditions for work and activity of the trade union in compliance with the general and collective agreements in the specific industries. Noting this information, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the General Collective Agreement for the territory of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of the Federation BiH, No. 54/05).

Facilities granted to workers' representatives in the Republika Srpska and Brcko District. In respect of the Committee's previous request to provide information on the legislative or other provisions which give effect to Article 2 of the Convention in the Republika Srpska and the Brcko District, the Committee notes that, in respect of the Brcko District, the Government states that the Labour Law of the Brcko District provides that, where an employer hires more than 15 workers, the workers shall be entitled to form the works council to represent them with the employer for the protection of their rights and interests. The Government further indicates in this regard that method and procedure of formation of the works council, as well as other issues related to the work and activity of the works council, are governed in the Law on the Works Council of Brcko District. The Committee notes this information. While it awaits the translation of the General Collective Agreement of Republika Srpska (Official Gazette of the Republika Srpska, No. 27/06) the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the legislative or other provisions which give effect to Article 2 of the Convention concerning facilities granted to workers' representatives in the Republika Srpska.

Articles 3, 4 and 5. Relations between trade union representatives and elected representatives. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the provisions which give effect to the provisions of Articles 3, 4 and 5 of the Convention in the Republika Srpska and Brcko District. In this regard the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the conditions for work of trade unions and the rights of labour or trade union representatives are regulated by sections 52 to 56 of the General Collective Agreement (Official Gazette of the Republika Srpska, No. 27/06, as well as through individual industry-specific collective agreements. The Committee once again requests the Government, while it awaits the translation of the General Collective Agreement of Republika Srpska (Official Gazette of the Republika Srpska, No. 27/06), to indicate the provisions which give effect to the provisions of Articles 3, 4 and 5 of the Convention in the Brcko District.

Botswana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2008 and 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to:

- amend section 2(1)(iv) of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO) (Amendments) Act, 2003 and section 2(11)(iv) of the Trade Disputes Act, both of which deny employees of the prison service the right to organize, as well as section 35 of the Prisons Act – which similarly prohibits prison officers from becoming members of a trade union or any body affiliated to a trade union;
- amend section 48B(1) of the TUEO Act, which grants certain facilities (access to an employer's premises for purposes of recruiting members, holding meetings or representing workers; the deduction of trade union dues from employees' wages, recognition by employers of trade union representatives in respect of grievances, discipline, and termination of employment) only to unions representing at least one third of the employees in an enterprise;
- amend section 10 of the TUEO Act, so as to afford industrial organizations the opportunity to rectify the absence of some of the formal registration requirements provided for in that section, and to repeal sections 11 and 15, which result in the automatic dissolution and banning of activities of non-registered organizations;
- amend sections 9(1)(b), 13 and 14 of the Trade Disputes Act, which empower the Commissioner and the Minister to refer a dispute in essential services to arbitration, or to the Industrial Court for determination; and to amend the list of essential services specified in the Schedule of the Trade Disputes Act, which includes, among others, the Bank of Botswana, railway services, and the transport and telecommunications services necessary to the operation of all of these services.

In this respect, the Committee had noted the Government's statement that it has taken note of its comments, and that consultations with the social partners on the legal provisions referred to therein are ongoing. Recalling that consultations with the social partners with regard to legislative amendments had commenced last year, the Committee requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress made with respect to the points previously raised.

Finally, the Committee recalls that it had previously asked the Government to amend the following sections of the TUEO Act, so as to ensure that trade unions enjoy autonomy and financial independence from the authorities: section 43, providing for the inspection of accounts, books and documents of a trade union by the Registrar "at any reasonable time"; and sections 49 and 50, providing for the inspection by the Minister "whenever he considers it necessary in the public interest" of the financial affairs of a trade union. In this regard, the Committee had noted the Government's statement that the Minister's power to inspect trade union finances under sections 49 and 50 of the TUEO Act is limited to exceptional circumstances in order to investigate a complaint by members of the union or allegations of embezzlement. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the practical application of sections 49 and 50 of the TUEO Act, including the frequency with which these sections are invoked to inspect trade union finances. Recalling, moreover, that the control by the public authorities over trade union finances should, except when exercised on the basis of a complaint from a certain percentage of workers, normally not exceed the obligation to submit periodic reports, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the measures necessary to amend section 43 of the TUEO Act.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Scope of the Convention. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (Amendment) Act, and section 35 of the Prison Act so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that consultations with the social partners with regard to the said legislative amendments have not been concluded. Recalling that consultations with the social partners with regard to legislative amendments had commenced two years ago, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be in a position, in the near future, to report progress on these legislative amendments to ensure to prison staff the rights enshrined in the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that consultation is still ongoing concerning the ITUC's previous observation according to which if a trade union is not registered, union committee members are not protected against anti-union discrimination. In this regard the Committee, recalling that the Government is responsible for preventing all acts of anti-union discrimination in order to give effect to Article 1 of the Convention, requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all union committee members, including those of unregistered trade unions, enjoy protection against anti-union discrimination.

Articles 2 and 4. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the progress made with respect to the legislative changes requested in its previous comment, which it repeats as follows:

- the adoption of specific legislative provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or employers' organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of trade unions, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- the repeal of section 35(1)(b) of the Trade Disputes Act, which permits an employer or employers' organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer;
- the amendment of section 20(3) of the Trade Disputes Act, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration of disputes of interest is permissible only in the following instances: (1) where the party requesting arbitration is a trade union seeking a first collective agreement; (2) disputes concerning public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State; and (3) disputes arising in essential services.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat the points raised in its previous observation:

The Committee notes the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO) (Amendment) Act, 2003, and the Trade Disputes (Amendment) Act, 2004.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee had noted that the TUEO Act had been amended and now includes the "public officers", including the unified local government service and the unified teaching service. However, the Committee noted that the Botswana prison service is still excluded from the scope of the Public Service Act, the TUEO Act and the Trade Disputes Act. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the Botswana prison service has been determined by national laws and regulations to be providing a security service. In this respect, the Committee recalled that under Article 1, only the police, the armed forces, high-level employees, whose functions are normally considered as policy-making or managerial, and employees whose duties are of a highly confidential nature, may be excluded from the scope of the Convention. Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO) (Amendments) Act, 2003, section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, and section 35 of the Prisons Act so as to guarantee for the prison service the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Article 5. The Committee notes that the current legislation does not provide adequate protection to public employees' organizations from acts of interference by the public authorities in their establishment, functioning or administration. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Public Service Act is being reviewed and consideration will be given to the Committee's comments. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that draft legislation contains precise provisions providing adequate protection to public employees' organizations from acts of interference by the public authorities in their establishment, functioning or administration.

Brazil

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 2007 on the murder of leaders of rural workers' organizations and of one trade unionist in the footwear sector, and particularly that judicial investigations have been initiated into these matters. The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC of 26 August 2009, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, such as acts of repression by the police against demonstrators, attacks against trade union premises and the homes of trade union leaders, anti-union dismissals and failure to comply with collective agreements. The Committee also notes the comments of the Workers' Union of the Electrical Energy Industries of the North and Noroeste Fluminense (STIEENNFF) alleging that an enterprise in the energy sector unilaterally modified standards agreed with the unions. Finally, the Committee notes the comments of Força Sindical, Noca Central dos Trabalhadores do Brasil, the General Union of Workers, the Single Confederation of Workers, the Confederation of Men and Women Workers of Brazil and the General Confederation of Workers of Brazil, dated 3 September 2009, on the application of the Convention. In particular, it notes with concern the allegations concerning the murder of 11 trade unionists between 1993 and 2009 and the attempted murders of trade unionists. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on this matter and to ensure without delay that investigations are launched into the allegations of violence with a view to elucidating the facts and punishing those responsible.

Article 4 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's indication that: (1) under Constitutional Amendment No. 45 of 8 December 2004 (reform of the judiciary, amendment to article 114), it was established that a collective dispute (dissídio coletivo) may only be determined with the agreement of both parties (the intervention of the judiciary cannot be requested unilaterally); (2) the draft trade union reform, prepared in the context of the National Labour Forum (FNT), envisages as one of the priorities the promotion of collective bargaining at all levels and in all spheres of representation, removing dialogue between workers and employers from the scope of the State; and (3) under the trade union reform, labour tribunals are designed to become bodies for the voluntary settlement of disputes (the Government indicated that the discussions in the FNT led to the consolidation of a proposal for a Constitutional Amendment, which is before the National Congress, and a preliminary draft of industrial relations legislation). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any developments relating to the draft trade union reform, and particularly any provisions adopted in relation to arbitration as a means of dispute settlement, and to supply statistical information on the number of collective disputes (dissídios coletivos) dealt with by the labour tribunals since the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment of 2004.

In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (1) with reference to the draft trade union reform, the proposed Constitutional Amendment is still under examination by the National Congress with a view to bringing an end to trade union unity and promoting collective bargaining; (2) Decree No. 186 was adopted under which the parties may discuss, in the context of the Ministry of Labour and Employment, disputes which arise in relation to the registration of trade unions, thereby allowing the Ministry to act as a mediator in the dispute; (3) the labour courts may only intervene in collective bargaining at the request of both parties to the dispute; and (4) with regard to the statistical data requested on collective disputes (dissídios coletivos), 714 were resolved in 2005, 561 in 2006, 792 in 2007 and 820 in 2008. The Committee requests the Government to indicate, if it is still possible in practice, to impose a dissídio coletivo (judicial compulsory arbitration) at the request of only one party and to provide information in its next report on the progress made with regard to the draft trade union reform referred to above.

Right to collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to the need, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, for public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State to have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication, as it reported previously, that there are constitutional limitations on the freedom of action of the public administration, which make collective bargaining in the public sector difficult, and it reiterates that in June 2003 the Standing National Negotiation Board (MNNP) (composed of the representation of eight ministries and all the representative bodies of federal public servants) was established with a view to seeking negotiated solutions to the issues raised by public servants and by the Federal Public Administration, formulating the legal regulations for a permanent system of negotiation, promoting discussions and negotiations of the harmonized guidelines concerning the claims of public servants, etc. Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on whether, as a result of the activities of the MNNP, there has been any change in terms of the possibility of concluding collective agreements covering public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State, or whether other measures have been adopted to guarantee this right. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft Legislative Decree for the ratification of the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) has been forwarded to the National Congress.

Subjection of collective agreements to the financial and economic policy. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it also referred to the need to repeal section 623 of the Consolidation of Labour Laws (CLT), under the terms of which the provisions of an agreement or accord that are in conflict with the orientations of the Government's economic and financial policy or the wage policy that is in force shall be declared null and void. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, even though in 2007 two Bills to amend the above section were tabled in the Chamber of Deputies, the Bills were set aside. The Committee recalls once again that, except in exceptional circumstances required by economic stabilization policies, it is the parties to the collective bargaining process who are best placed to determine wages and should be the ones to do so. It therefore considers that the restriction contained in section 623 of the CLT affects the independence of the social partners during collective bargaining and impedes the development of voluntary collective bargaining procedures between employers or their organizations and organizations of workers for the determination of terms and conditions of employment. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to repeal the legislative provision referred to above and to inform it in its next report of any measure adopted in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bulgaria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bulgaria (CITUB). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee notes the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008 on the application of the Convention. In particular, it notes that the Government intends to resolve issues relating to the right to strike with ILO technical assistance and through tripartite consultation. According to the Government, the provision prohibiting strikes in the energy, communications and health sectors has not been applied since 2006. Furthermore, the Government is prepared to reopen the debate once again on the right to strike of public servants with a view to reaching an acceptable solution.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee recalls that it has been referring for years to the need to amend the following provisions:

- section 11(2) and (3) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act, which provide that the decision to call a strike shall be taken by a simple majority of the workers in the enterprise or the unit concerned, and section 11(3) which requires the duration of the strike to be declared;
- section 51 of the Railway Transport Act of 2000, which provides that, where industrial action is taken under the Act, the workers and employers must provide the population with satisfactory transport services corresponding to no less than 50 per cent of the volume of transportation that was provided before the strike. The Committee recalled previously that, as the establishment of too broad a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, workers' organizations should be able to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities; in cases where agreement is not possible, the issue should be referred to an independent body; and
- the restrictions on the right to strike of public servants under the terms of section 47 of the Civil Servant Act, including public servants who cannot be considered as exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee hopes that, in accordance with the commitments made by the Government, it will be in a position to note additional progress in relation to the issues raised. It hopes that the technical assistance requested by the Government will be provided as soon as possible.

The Committee requests the Government to provide the legal text which repealed the prohibition on strikes in the energy, communication and health sectors.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions in Bulgaria (CITUB), particularly those concerning the lengthiness of anti-union discrimination proceedings.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the provisions which protect against acts of interference by employees' and employers' organizations in each other's affairs. The Committee noted that the Government had referred to section 33 of the Labour Code – which provides for the autonomy of workers' and employers' organizations in formulating their statutes, electing their representatives, and adopting their programmes of action. In this respect, the Committee recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, all acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial means with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations, shall be deemed to constitute acts of interference. The Committee further recalls that legislation should explicitly prohibit all such acts of interference and make express provision for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2. Moreover, to ensure that these measures receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down these substantive provisions, as well as appeals and sanctions to guarantee their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). Noting that the legislation contains no provisions concerning such protection as described above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection, including by means of dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference by employers' organizations.

Article 4. The Committee had previously noted that section 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code provides that collective agreements at the level of the branch or industry are concluded between the representative workers' and employers' organizations on the basis of an agreement between the national organizations to which they are respectively affiliated, and had requested the Government to specify whether a majority organization in the industry or the branch can conclude a collective agreement, even if it is not affiliated to a national representative organization, as well as to provide a copy of the general framework agreement concluded between national organizations of employers and workers on collective bargaining at the branch or industry levels. The Committee had noted the Government's statement that organizations not affiliated to a national representative organization cannot conclude collective agreements at the branch and sectoral levels, though they may do so at the enterprise level. The Government further states that there is no framework agreement providing for collective agreements at the sectoral and branch levels. The Committee considers, in this regard, that requiring organizations to be affiliated with a national organization in order to be able to conclude sectoral and branch level agreements is incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining established in Article 4 of the Convention; it requests the Government to amend section 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code so as to eliminate this requirement.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee had previously taken note of the comments made by the ITUC and the CITUB on the denial of collective bargaining rights to public servants. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, despite the absence of the right of collective bargaining in the narrow sense of the term, under section 44(3) of the Civil Service Act trade unions are able to represent and defend the rights of civil servants on civil service and social security issues through proposals, requests, and participation in the drafting of relevant internal regulations and ordinances, as well as in the discussion of issues of economic and social interest. The Government adds that representatives of organizations of civil servants may take part in the competition commission for the selection of candidates to the civil service, as well as participate in the process for the appraisal of civil servants. Issues related to income and social security in the public service, however, are discussed in the National Council for Tripartite Cooperation, in which all nationally representative employers' and workers' organizations are represented. The Committee recalled that, although Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories of public servants should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 262). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the steps necessary to amend the Civil Service Act so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining of all public servants, with the only possible exception being those engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee had noted the comments of the Bulgarian Industrial Association (BIA) on the application of the Convention. Noting that the Government does not respond to the BIA's comments concerning section 51(a), (b) and (c) of the Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether employers' organizations enjoy the same right as workers' organizations to submit draft collective agreements in the course of negotiations.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of ILO technical assistance.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Burkina Faso

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) reporting restrictions on the right to strike in the legislation and acts of intimidation and threats against the leaders of the principal national trade union federations on grounds of their participation in a national strike. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply, and notes in particular that it has adopted Act No. 028-2008/AN of 13 May 2008 issuing the Labour Code. The Committee further notes the communication of 26 August 2009 by the ITUC reporting the arrest without charge and interrogation of an activist of the Union of Education and Research Workers, and the requisitioning of employees to contain strikes in various sectors. The Committee urges the Government to send its comments on the above.

Article 3. Right of organizations to carry on their activities in full freedom and to formulate their programmes. Purpose of the strike. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 351 of the Labour Code so as to enable organizations representing workers to resort to strike action in order to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular in regard to employment, social protection and standards of living. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, in the new Labour Code (Act No. 028-2008/AN of 13 May 2008), section 382 now defines a strike as a concerted and collective cessation of work with a view to supporting professional demands and ensuring defence of the workers' material or moral interests.

Occupation of premises in the event of a strike. The Committee notes that, according to section 386 of the Labour Code, exercise of the right to strike shall on no account be accompanied by occupation of the workplace or immediate surroundings subject to the penal sanctions established in the legislation in force. The Committee recalls in this connection that any restrictions on strike pickets and workplace occupations should be limited to cases where the action ceases to be peaceful or where observance of the freedom of non-strikers to work, or the right of management to enter the premises, are impeded. Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the restrictions provided for in section 386 of the Labour Code apply only where a strike ceases to be peaceful or where observance of the freedom of non-strikers to work and the right of management to enter the premises are impeded.

Requisitioning of public employees. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled the need to amend sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN of 25 July 1960 under which, in order to ensure continuity of administration and the safety of persons and property, public servants may be required to perform their duties. The Committee pointed out that it would be advisable to restrict the powers of the public authorities to requisition workers to cases in which the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited. Noting the Government's statement that it was planning to revise Act No. 45-60/AN, the Committee asked the Government to indicate any amendment or repeal of sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN. Noting the absence of any information in this regard, the Committee again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken either to amend sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN so as to take account of the Committee's comments, or to repeal those sections.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be able to indicate the approximate number of workers covered by these agreements, and requests it to give an account of all measures to promote collective bargaining (including in the bakery, road transport and media sectors, in relation to which the Committee has requested information in its previous comments), taken in particular by the Directorate of Labour Relations and the Promotion of Social Dialogue.

Collective bargaining in the public sector. With regard to the public service advisory bodies, including the Tripartite Public Service Advisory Council, which is competent with regard to dialogue (section 51 of Act No. 013/98/AN of 13 April 1998 on the public service), the Committee notes the indication that the employees have not yet appointed their representatives and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee previously asked the Government to specify the categories of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State who enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all public servants not engaged in the administration of the State and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to guarantee the right to collective bargaining on conditions of employment between their trade union organizations and the employers.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the very near future.

The Committee notes the communication of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), reporting that public servants affiliated to the National Union of Treasury Employees (SATB) and the Union of Employees of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (SAMAE) were transferred for having taken part in protest action in May 2007, and that the General Secretary of the General Confederation of Workers of Burkina Faso (CGT-B) was arrested on 15 December 2008 following a commemorative march, and questioned by the national gendarmerie. The Committee requests the Government to send comments in response to the ITUC's allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination.

Burundi

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and by the Confederation of Burundi Trade Unions (COSYBU) on the application of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of public employees without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee once again notes with regret the lack of the statutory provisions on the right to organize of magistrates and observes that this situation is the reason behind difficulties of registration of the SYMABU. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to adopt such statutory provisions so as to ensure and clearly define the right to organize of magistrates.

Right to organize of minors. For several years, the Committee has been raising the matter of the compatibility of section 271 of the Labour Code with the Convention, as this section provides that minors under the age of 18 may not join a trade union without the explicit permission of their parents or guardians. The Committee requests the Government to recognize the right to join trade unions of minors under 18 years of age who are engaged in an occupational activity without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. Election of trade union officers. The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to section 275 of the Labour Code which sets the following conditions for holding the position of trade union officer or administrator:

- Criminal record. Under section 275(3) of the Labour Code, holders of trade union office may not have been sentenced to imprisonment without suspension of sentence for more than six months. The Committee recalls that conviction for an act which, by its nature, does not call into question the integrity of the person and implies no real risk for the performance of trade union duties should not constitute grounds for exclusion from trade union office.
- Belonging to the occupation. Section 275(4) of the Labour Code requires trade union leaders to have belonged to the occupation or trade for at least one year. The Committee previously requested the Government to make the legislation more flexible by allowing persons who had previously worked in the occupation to stand for office or by lifting this requirement for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 275(3) and (4) of the Labour Code, taking fully into account the principles recalled above.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the matter of the succession of compulsory procedures to be followed before calling a strike (sections 191 to 210 of the Labour Code), which appear to authorize the Minister of Labour to prevent all strikes. Recalling that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, the Committee urges the Government to adopt and provide a copy of the text to be issued under the Labour Code on the modalities for the exercise of the right to strike, taking into account the principles recalled above.

The Committee also noted that, under section 213 of the Labour Code, strikes are lawful when they are called with the approval of a simple majority of the employees of the workplace or enterprise. The Committee recalled that, when voting on strikes, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult in practice. If a member State sees fit to establish in its legislation provisions requiring a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required majority and quorum are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to amend section 213 of the Labour Code in the light of the comments made above.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Government had adopted a legislative decree prohibiting the exercise of the right to strike and to demonstrate throughout the national territory during the period of the elections. According to the Government, this legislative decree has not been used in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this legislative decree was repealed following the elections.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union organizations can exercise in full their right to organize their activities freely without interference from the public authorities.

The Committee notes that the Government has set up a tripartite committee responsible for rapidly proposing new provision of the Labour Code which would take into account the claims of the social partners, the reports of the labour inspection and the comments of the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress made in revising the Labour Code and recalls that technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee urges the Government to send its observations in response to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Confederation of Trade Unions of Burundi (COSYBU) concerning the application of the Convention.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Non-dissuasive nature of the sanctions established by the Labour Code for violations of Article 1 (protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination) and Article 2 (protection of employers' and workers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other) of the Convention. In its past comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the provisions in question would be amended with the collaboration of the social partners. The Committee regrets that no amendments have been made to the legislation and, recalling the need to establish sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, hopes that the Government will be able to make the necessary amendments to the legislation in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 4. Right of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee noted previously that there was only one collective agreement in Burundi. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, it is for the social partners to take the initiative to propose collective agreements and that in practice they limit themselves to concluding enterprise agreements of which there are many in para-public enterprises. The Committee recalls that, although nothing in the Convention places a duty on the Government to enforce collective bargaining by compulsory means with the social partners, this does not mean that governments should abstain from any measure whatsoever aiming to establish a collective bargaining mechanism. The Committee notes the launch of a capacity-building programme for the social partners and once again asks the Government to provide information on the precise measures adopted to promote collective bargaining, together with information of a practical nature on the situation with regard to collective bargaining and, in particular, to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded up to now and the sectors covered. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate substantial progress in its next report.

Article 6. Right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the shortcomings in social dialogue in the public service pointed out by the ITUC and the COSYBU. The Committee previously requested the Government to specify whether provisions that imply restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining for the public service as a whole are still in force in Burundi, particularly as regards the determination of wages, such as: (1) section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 of 26 July 1988, which provides that, following approval by the relevant ministry, the governing councils of public establishments set the level of remuneration for permanent and temporary posts and determine the conditions for appointment and dismissal; and (2) section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24, which provides that governing councils of public establishments draw up staff regulations for personalized administrations subject to the approval of the competent minister. The Committee noted that, in its reply, the Government indicated that these provisions were still in force, but that, in practice, state employees participate in determining their terms and conditions of employment. According to the Government, they are aware of the right of collective bargaining, and this is the reason for the existence of agreements in the education and health sectors. In the case of public establishments and personalized administrations, the employees participate in the determination of remuneration as they are represented on the governing councils, and wage claims are submitted to the employer by enterprise councils or trade unions, with the competent minister only intervening to safeguard the general interest; in certain ministries, trade union organizations have obtained bonuses to supplement wages. The Committee once again asks the Government to take measures to align the legislation with practice and, in particular, to amend section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 and section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24 so as to ensure that organizations of public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their wages and other terms and conditions of employment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received and requests the Government to send its comments on the observation made by the Trade Unions Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), according to which the legislation has not been regulated with regard to trade union representatives.

Cambodia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments submitted in August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC), concerning acts of violence, and harassment against trade union leaders and trade unionists, as well as other violations of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2318 (351st Report).

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comment, the Committee had taken note of the discussion on Cambodia in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007, and in particular that the Conference Committee had expressed its deep concern at the statements made concerning the assassination of the trade unionists Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth, and Hy Vuthy; death threats; and the emerging climate of impunity in the country. The Conference Committee, recalling that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations could only be exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, had called upon the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure respect for this fundamental principle and bring an end to impunity; it further urged the Government to take steps immediately to ensure full and independent investigations into the murders of the abovementioned Cambodian trade union leaders so as to bring not only the perpetrators, but also the instigators of these heinous crimes to justice.

Having also noted the ITUC's comments on the irregularities that had attended the trials of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun, the two men convicted of Chea Vichea's murder despite substantial evidence of their innocence, and numerous acts of harassment and violence against trade union leaders, the Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures, including the initiation of judicial inquiries, to bring an end to the acts of violence and intimidation against trade union officials and members. Finally, the Committee had noted the Government's acceptance of an ILO direct contacts mission, as requested by the Conference Committee, and had expressed the firm hope that the mission would achieve significant results in respect of all of the serious matters raised above.

Against this backdrop, the Committee notes with concern that according to the FTUWKC, a campaign of systematic violence and repression has been carried out against it in one factory, comprising vicious attacks on union leaders by gangs outside the factory; the violent dispersal of a FTUWKC rally, in which one worker was shot in the back by the police and 16 trade unionists were arrested and detained; the dismissal of 1,500 workers following the protest, virtually all of whom were FTUWKC leaders or members; and the subsequent blacklisting of the dismissed individuals by the management, which had distributed their names and photos to other factories. The FTUWKC also asserts that the authorities have done little to investigate the serious injuries inflicted on union leaders, and in fact have been regularly involved in the violent suppression of worker protests, strikes and marches at various factories.

The ITUC also indicates that in many factories trade unionists continue to face repression of all kinds, with virtually no intervention from the authorities. Anti-union acts include beatings from hired thugs, death threats, blacklisting, the bringing of trade unionists before the courts on false charges, wage deductions and exclusion from promotion. One FTUWKC leader was beaten by four or five masked individuals armed with iron rods on his way home from work. The ITUC also refers to the continued obstruction of the activities of the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA), which the Government does not recognize as a trade union and whose demonstrations and protests have often been prohibited. Another organization, the Cambodian Independent Civil Service Association (CICSA), is also not recognized as a trade union.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the report of the direct contacts mission to Cambodia, held on 21 to 25 April 2008. The Committee notes with grave concern that the mission report contains, inter alia, the following conclusions: (1) that the Cambodian judiciary is plagued by serious problems of capacity and a lack of independence, (2) that the conviction of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun for the murder of trade union leader Chea Vichea was upheld on 12 April 2007, in a trial marked by procedural irregularities, including the Court's refusal to entertain evidence of their innocence; (3) that Thach Saveth was sentenced to 15 years in prison for the murder of trade union leader Ros Sovannareth; and (4) that no concrete steps had been indicated by the Government to ensure a meaningful and independent review of the outstanding cases. The Committee notes with concern, moreover, that it has received no information on any progress made in the investigation respecting Hy Vuthy.

In these circumstances, the Committee can only deplore the absence of any further developments in this regard in the Government's report, six months after the direct contacts mission. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to take concrete and tangible steps, as a matter of urgency: (1) to carry out independent inquiries, as a matter of urgency, into the murders of Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth and Hy Vuthy; (2) to facilitate an expedited review of the convictions of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun for the murder of Chea Vichea, as well as the conviction of Thach Saveth for the murder of Ros Sovannareth, and to take steps for their release pending the outcome of the above independent inquiries; (3) to take the necessary steps to ensure the independence and effectiveness of the judicial system, including capacity-building measures and the institution of safeguards against corruption. In this regard, the Committee suggests that the Government have recourse to the technical cooperation facilities of the Office, notably in the area of reinforcing institutional capacity, as well as with respect to the establishment of labour courts and the revision of the Law on Trade Unions. Finally, it urges the Government, as also requested by the Committee on Freedom of Association, to take all necessary measures to ensure that the trade union rights of workers in Cambodia are fully respected and that trade unionists are able to exercise their activities in a climate free of intimidation and risk to their personal security and their lives.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2318 and in particular the decision of the Supreme Court on 31 December 2008 ordering the release of Born Samnang and Sok Sam Oeun. Observing in this regard that the Supreme Court had also ordered the reopening of the investigation into Chea Vichea's murder, the Committee, like the Committee on Freedom of Association, urges the Government to ensure that the investigation is prompt, independent and expeditiously carried out, and to indicate the outcome.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2008 comments submitted by the ITUC and the FTUWKC and hopes that the task force which examines the reform of the trade union legislation will take into account all issues raised by the Committee. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that more than 1,000 trade unions have been established and that tripartite activities have been conducted.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 99th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2010.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments submitted in August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to matters already under examination, as well as to extremely serious and numerous acts of anti-union discrimination and interference – including instances where employers had violated trade union rights with impunity – and obstacles to collective bargaining. The Committee also notes the comments submitted by the Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC). The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations including on the question of favouritism to the shop stewards in detriment to union leaders and the question of non prosecution in practice of anti-union practices of employers.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In previous comments, the Committee had noted that in Case No. 2443 the Committee on Freedom of Association had referred to the need for appropriate legal protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, including sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, and had requested the Government to inform it of the measures adopted in order to modify the legislation so as to provide for such sanctions. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the steps necessary to provide adequate protection in its legislation against all acts of anti-union discrimination, including by means of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4. Recognition of trade unions for purposes of collective bargaining. The Committee takes note of Prakas No. 13 of 2004, which lays down the procedure for granting most representative status to professional organizations at the enterprise or institutional level. The Committee notes in particular that section 1 of Prakas No. 13 provides that the Ministry of Social Affairs, Labour, Vocational Training and Youth Rehabilitation (MOSALVY) may refuse to grant most representative status to a trade union when an objection is put forward from a member of the Labour Advisory Committee, or from enterprises, institutions, or a concerned third party. The Committee considers, in this respect, that permitting the objections of third parties as grounds for refusing a union most representative status runs counter to the principle of promoting collective bargaining expressed in Article 4 of the Convention. It requests the Government to amend section 1 of Prakas No. 13 accordingly, and to provide information on the progress made in this respect.

Articles 4 and 6. Public servants. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 1 of the Labour Law, certain categories of workers, which include persons appointed to a temporary or a permanent post in the public service, are not covered by this legislation. It had further noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association (see 334th Report, paragraphs 202–226) had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Common Statutes of Civil Servants so as to guarantee the right to collective bargaining of civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State, and requested the Government to indicate whether the categories of workers in question benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention under other legal provisions and, if not, to take the necessary measures in order to ensure the application of the Convention to these categories of workers. In this regard the Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that the rights of judges, teachers, and temporary and permanently appointed officials in the public service are provided for by separate laws pertaining to public ministries or institutions, and that it was unable therefore to amend the labour law in accordance with the Committee's previous comments. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the laws pertaining to all public sector workers, so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining for all public servants, with the exception of those engaged in the administration of the State.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that it is preparing amendments to the labour law with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee expresses the hope that these amendments will bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with its comments above, and requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee requests the Government to communicate statistics on the collective agreements (workers and sectors covered in the different regions, and number of collective agreements).

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2008 ITUC and FTUWKC comments and hopes that the task force which examines the reform of the trade union legislation will take into account the above comments.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 99th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2010.]

Cameroon

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the elements provided by the Government in reply to the comments received in 2007 from the General Confederation of Labour–Liberty of Cameroon (CGTL), the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), concerning restrictions that are already under examination. The ITUC's comments also reported mass dismissals of workers by the enterprise DTP Terrassement for calling a strike, the arrest and imprisonment of a member of the Confederation of Cameroon Trade Unions (CSTC) and the dismissal of the Secretary-General of the Federation of Health, Pharmaceutical and Allied Unions (FESPAC), due to his trade union activities.

In its report, the Government indicates that the dismissal of the Secretary-General of the FESPAC is unconnected with the exercise of his trade union activities and that the dismissals of workers of the enterprise DTP Terrassement is a result of the unlawful nature of their strike, as the local administrative authorities had prohibited any public demonstrations for the duration of the work concerned. In this regard, the Committee recalls that responsibility for declaring a strike illegal should lie with an independent body which has the confidence of the parties involved and that strikes may only be prohibited in essential services in the strict sense of the term, disputes in the public service in relation to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in the case of an acute national crisis. The Committee also recalls that the arrest and detention of trade unionists, without any charges being brought and without a warrant, constitute a grave violation of trade union rights.

The Committee also notes the comments of the UGTC and the ITUC, dated 16 October 2008 and 26 August 2009, respectively, relating to, in addition to the points already raised before the Committee, Government interference in various forms (favouritism towards specific organizations, refusal to recognize the Trade Union Federation of the Public Sector (CSP)) and the arrest of a leader of the CSP during the riots in February 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide observations in this respect in its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. For many years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to amend Act No. 68/LF/19 of 18 November 1968 (under the terms of which the existence in law of a trade union or occupational association of public servants is subject to prior approval by the Minister for Territorial Administration). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, a draft amendment of this Act in relation to this point is under examination.

Similarly, the Committee has been requesting the Government for many years to take the necessary measures to amend section 6(2) of the Labour Code of 1992 (which provides that persons establishing a trade union which has not yet been registered and who act as if the said union has been registered shall be liable to prosecution) and section 166 of the Labour Code (establishing heavy fines for members of a union who commit this offence). In this respect, the Government indicates that the Bill to amend and supplement certain provisions of the Labour Code was adopted by the National Labour Advisory Commission and has been submitted for approval by the competent authorities of Cameroon. The adoption of the proposed amendments would replace the current system for the registration of trade unions, which is equivalent to a system of previous authorization, by a procedure of declaration and would involve the disappearance of sentences and/or fines in the event of violations of the law. The Committee further notes that cancellation of the registration of an organization would lie solely with the judicial authorities, thereby bringing to an end the possibilities for the dissolution of organizations by administrative authority. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to indicate the progress achieved on all these points without delay.

Article 5 of the Convention. For many years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal section 19 of Decree No. 69/DF/7 of 6 January 1969 (under the terms of which trade unions or associations of public servants may not join a foreign occupational organization without obtaining prior authorization from the Minister responsible for “supervising public freedoms”). The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on this subject. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures in the very near future to amend the legislation to remove the requirement for previous authorization for the affiliation of trade unions of public servants to an international organizations.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the process of reforming the legislation will result in the near future in the legislation being brought into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Government is requested to provide copies of all the legislative texts adopted in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments received in 2007 from the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). It also notes the comments of the UGTC and the ITUC dated 16 October 2008 and 26 August 2009, respectively. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect in its next report.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that, since the adoption of the Labour Code in 1992, it has been asking the Government to amend or delete sections 6(2) and 166 of the Labour Code, which allow the imposition of fines ranging between 50,000 and 500,000 francs on members responsible for the administration or management of a non-registered trade union, who act as if the union had been registered, which is in breach of Article 1 of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee notes that a Bill to amend and supplement certain provisions of the Labour Code has been submitted to the competent authorities and that it would result in the abolition of the penalties and/or fines referred to above. The Committee expects that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report the progress achieved in bringing the national legislation into full conformity with Article 1 of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to reply to the comments made by trade union organizations concerning the lack of true collective bargaining in the country since 1996. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, several collective agreements and enterprise agreements have been concluded in various sectors and branches of activity, such as: security enterprises, journalism, agriculture, polygraphic industries, banking, commerce, pharmaceuticals, dockers and stevedores, processing industries, insurance, construction and public works. It notes that certain commissions for the negotiation and revision of collective agreements are continuing their work (telecommunications, merchant shipping, water, first level hospitals, postal services and petroleum producing and storage enterprises). The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data on the number of collective agreement concluded in both the public and the private sectors and the number of workers covered by these agreements.

Canada

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the comments from the International Trade Unions Confederation (ITUC) dated 30 September 2008 and 26 August 2009, as well as of the Government’s reply thereto.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in a number of cases concerning allegations of interference into the right to organize and carry out trade union activities, including collective bargaining, in various provinces of Canada (Case No. 2173, 354th Report, paragraphs 35–46; Case No. 2254, 355th Report, paragraphs 29–33; and Case No. 2430, 353rd Report, paragraphs 66–68).

With regard to the implementation of the Convention in a broad perspective, the Committee recalls that in its previous observation it noted with interest the decision of 8 July 2007 of the Supreme Court of Canada (Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Association v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27), which held that freedom of association encompasses a measure of protection for collective bargaining under section 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and by doing so the Court referred to Convention No. 87 as well as the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights, and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, noting that the “interpretation of these Conventions, in Canada and internationally, not only supports the proposition that there is a right to collective bargaining in international law, but also suggests that such a right should be recognized in the Canadian context under section 2(d). The Committee notes from the Government's report that a number of tripartite round-table discussions were held pursuant to the decision of the Supreme Court, at federal and provincial levels, on its potential implications on future labour relations and the country's international obligations. The Government also indicates that it expects a number of ongoing cases before courts to further clarify the scope of the Supreme Court decision and its implication for the application of the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on any development in relation to this decision which may have an impact on the application of the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of certain categories of workers. The Committee recalls that it has been expressing concern for many years on the exclusion of wide categories of workers from statutory protection of freedom of association and on the restrictions on the right to strike in several provinces.

Workers in agriculture and horticulture (Alberta, Ontario and New Brunswick). The Committee recalls from its previous comments that workers in agriculture and horticulture in the Provinces of Alberta, Ontario and New Brunswick are excluded from the coverage of labour relations legislation and thereby deprived of statutory protection of the right to organize.

The Committee notes with regret from the Government's report that there are no plans for a legislative review in Alberta, although the province is closely monitoring the constitutional challenge to the Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002, before the Ontario Court of Appeal and subsequently before the Supreme Court of Canada.

As for Ontario, the Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted the decision dated December 2001 by the Supreme Court of Canada which found the exclusion of agricultural workers from the Labour Relations Act, 1995, to be unconstitutional in the absence of any other statutory protection of their freedom of association (Dunmore v. Ontario/Attorney-General, 2001, 207 DLR (4th) 193 (SCC)). The Committee also noted that, although the Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002 (AEPA) gave agricultural employees the right to form or join an employees' association, it however maintained the exclusion of agricultural employees from the Labour Relations Act and did not provide a right to a statutory collective bargaining regime. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the appeal lodged by the United Food and Commercial Workers (UFCW) challenging the constitutionality of the AEPA before the Ontario Court of Appeal resulted in a decision acknowledging the right for Ontario farm workers to legislation that protects their ability to bargain collectively. The Ontario Government appealed the decision to the Supreme Court of Canada and the hearing on the case is expected at the end of 2009.

The Committee notes that, as regards the Province of New Brunswick, the Government reiterates that agricultural workers are not excluded from the protection of the Industrial Relations Act, 1971; however their bargaining rights are limited to units comprising at least five or more employees.

The Committee recalls once again that all workers without distinction whatsoever (with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police) shall have the right to organize under the Convention. Therefore, any provincial legislation that would deny or limit the application of the Convention in relation to the freedom of association of agricultural workers should be amended. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that the Governments of Alberta and Ontario take all necessary measures to amend their legislation so as to fully guarantee the right of agricultural workers to organize freely and to benefit from the necessary protection to ensure observance of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to forward the text of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada concerning the constitutionality of the AEPA when it is delivered and to indicate any review on its implication with regard to the exclusion of agricultural employees from statutory protection of the right to organize in the Provinces of Alberta and Ontario.

Domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors (Ontario, Alberta, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan). The Committee recalls that it has been raising for many years the need to ensure that a number of categories of workers in Ontario, who have been excluded from statutory protection of freedom of association under sections 1(3) and 3(a) of the Labour Relations Act, 1995 (domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors), enjoy the protection necessary, either through the Labour Relations Act, or by means of specific regulations, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

In its previous comments, the Committee also noted that legislative provisions in other provinces (Alberta, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan) contain similar exclusions of domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers from the scope of industrial relations law. Moreover, these workers might be excluded also in Newfoundland, Labrador and Saskatchewan if the employer has less than two or three employees, respectively.

The Committee notes with regret the statements from the Governments of Ontario, Alberta, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island that no legislative amendments are planned in respect of the exclusion of domestic workers. The Committee also takes note of the statement by the Government of New Brunswick according to which it will consult stakeholders on the potential for amendment of the Industrial Relations Act to remove the exclusion of domestic workers. With regard to the other professionals, such as architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers doctors and engineers (for Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island), the Committee also notes the statement from the respective governments that these professionals in question are generally members of professional organizations that represent their interests, including through collective bargaining. Hence, they cannot be considered disadvantaged in the labour market.

The Committee is bound to recall once again its view that the exclusion of these categories of workers from the Labour Relations Act has had as a result that, although they can still exercise their right to associate under the Common Law, their associations are devoid of the higher statutory protection provided for in the Labour Relations Act, 1995, and this can function as an impediment to their activities and discourage membership. Consequently, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that the Governments of Ontario, Alberta, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan take all necessary measures to remedy the exclusion of the abovementioned categories of workers from the statutory protection of freedom of association and to amend its legislation to adopt specific regulations so as to ensure that domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers, doctors and engineers are allowed to form and join organizations of their own choosing and that these organizations enjoy the same rights, prerogatives and means of recourse as other workers' organizations under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of New Brunswick indicates the outcome of discussions held on the amendment to the Industrial Relations Act to remove the exclusion of domestic workers and any measures taken thereon.

Nurse practitioners (Alberta). In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2277 to the effect that nurse practitioners have been deprived of the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing by the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act of the Province of Alberta. The Committee notes with regret from the Government's report that there are no planned reviews of the status of nurse practitioners. The Committee once again recalls that the expression "all workers and employers without distinction whatsoever" used in Article 2 of the Convention means that freedom of association should be guaranteed without discrimination of any kind. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of Alberta takes all necessary measures to amend the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act so that nurse practitioners have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

Principals, vice-principals in educational establishments and community workers (Ontario). The Committee recalls, with regard to Ontario, that its previous comments concerned the need to ensure that principals and vice-principals in educational establishments as well as community workers have the right to organize, pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1951 and Case No. 1975. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that it has no plan to amend the legislation concerning principals and vice-principals in educational establishments. However, the Government adds that, with regard to community workers, a detailed review of the 1998 amendments to the Ontario Works Act by the Act to Prevent Unionization with respect to community participation under the Ontario Works Act, 1997, has identified options that would be considered. While the Committee considers that it is not necessarily incompatible with freedom of association principles to deny managerial or supervisory employees the right to belong to the same trade union as other workers; such categories of workers should have the right to form their own associations to defend their interests and should not be defined so broadly as to weaken the organizations of other workers by depriving them of a substantial portion of their present or potential membership. Taking into account the abovementioned principles, the Committee reiterates its request to ensure that the Government of the Province of Ontario takes all necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to guarantee to principals and vice-principals in educational establishments, as well as community workers, the fundamental right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

Public colleges' part-time employees (Ontario). The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2430 (see 353rd Report, paragraphs 66–68) and notes with interest that the Government of Ontario introduced the Act to Enact the Colleges Collective Bargaining Act which allows part-time academic and support staff workers at Ontario's 24 colleges to join unions for collective bargaining purposes. Along with the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in the adoption of this Bill which would allow part-time academic and support staff in colleges of applied arts and technology in Ontario to fully enjoy the right to organize, as enjoyed by other workers, as provided in the Convention.

Education workers (Alberta). With regard to the right to organize of education workers in the Province of Alberta, the Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to repeal the provisions of the University Act which empower the board of governors to designate the academic staff members who are allowed, by law, to establish and join a professional association for the defence of their interests. The Committee expressed its view that such provisions would allow for future designations to exclude faculty members and non-management administrative or planning personnel from membership of the staff associations whose purpose is to protect and defend the interests of these categories of workers. The Committee notes with regret that there are no plans to amend this legislation. The Committee is bound to request once again the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of Alberta takes all necessary measures with a view to ensuring that all university staff are guaranteed the right to organize without any exceptions.

Workers in social, health and childcare services (Quebec). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned two Acts (Act modifying the Act on health and social services (LQ, 2003, c.12) and Act modifying the Act on early childhood centres and other nursery services (LQ, 2003, c.13)), by which the Government redefined workers in social and health services and childcare services as “independent workers”, thus divesting them of the status of “employee” and denying them the right to unionize, leading to the cancellation of their trade union registrations. While emphasizing that the Convention does not exclude any of the above categories of workers who should have the right to establish and join organizations of their choosing, the Committee expressed the hope that the domestic courts would render decisions that would take into account the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee takes note with interest of the Government’s indication that a decision whereby the Superior Court of Quebec held the Act modifying the Act on health and social services and the Act modifying the Act on early childhood centres and other nursery services unconstitutional as they were contrary to section 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to section 3 of the Charte québécoise des droits et libertés de la personne. Following that court decision, the Government of the Province of Quebec adopted an Act on the representation of family-type resources and intermediate resources and on the respective collective bargaining regime (LQ 2009, c.24) as well as an Act on the representation of certain persons responsible for childcare in family environment on the respective collective bargaining regime (LQ 2009, c.36) on 12 and 19 June 2009. These new texts established a system of representation for family-type resources and intermediate resources as well as for persons responsible for childcare in family environments. A system of collective agreement “similar to the one encompassed in the Labour Code of the Province of Quebec” is established. The Committee notes with interest the indication that the newly adopted texts provide for rules for recognition by the Committee on labour relations of associations representing such persons, the rules of collective bargaining between these associations and the Government and the matters covered by the negotiation. They also provide for measures for better access to government programmes, such as parental insurance, the pension plan and the programme for safe motherhood.

Prosecutors (Quebec). In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2467 with regard to the Prosecutors Act (as amended by the Act amending the Act respecting Prosecutors and the Labour Code, LQ 2004, c.22), which denied to prosecutors the right to join a trade union and deprives them of protection against hindrances, reprisals or sanctions related to the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee takes note with interest of the Act on the collective bargaining regime of prosecutors for criminal and penal affairs (LRQ, c. R-8.1.2), which grants them the right to organize as well as protection in the exercise of trade union rights, including the right to strike and to bargain collectively.

Article 2. Trade union monopoly established by law (Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the specific reference to the trade union recognized as the bargaining agent in the law of Prince Edward Island (Civil Service Act, 1983), Nova Scotia (Teaching Professions Act) and Ontario (Education and Teaching Professions Act).

The Committee notes with regret from the Government’s report that there are still no plans to amend the legislation in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario. The Committee is bound to recall that, although it may consider a system in which a single bargaining agent can be accredited to represent workers in a given bargaining unit and bargain on their behalf to be compatible with the Convention, a trade union monopoly established or maintained by the specific designation of a trade union in the law is in violation of the Convention, thus suppressing any freedom of choice. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will indicate measures taken or contemplated by the Governments of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario to bring their legislation into full conformity with the standards of freedom of choice laid down in the Convention by removing the specific designation of individual trade unions as bargaining agents and replacing them with a neutral reference to the most representative organization.

Article 3. Right to strike of workers in the education sector. The Committee recalls from its previous comments that problems remain in several provinces with regard to the right to strike of workers in the education sector (British Columbia and Manitoba).

British Columbia. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the Skill Development and Labour Statutes Amendment Act (Bill No. 18), which declares education to be an essential service, and the need to adopt provisions ensuring that workers in the education sector may enjoy and exercise the right to strike pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2173. The Committee notes the information pertaining to measures undertaken to support and facilitate the bargaining process between teachers and school employers resulting in the parties achieving, through collective bargaining, a five-year collective agreement effective 1 July 2006. However, the Committee observes that progress is yet to be made on the issues raised.

The Committee notes that, when it last examined Case No. 2173 (see 354th Report, paragraphs 35–46), the Committee on Freedom of Association expressed the hope that the settlement reached in the health-care sector, following the Supreme Court decision noted above, would serve as an inspiration for the settlement of grievances prevailing in the education sector between the Government of the Province of British Columbia and the unions concerned with regard to the Skills Development and Labour Statutes Amendment Act and the Education Services Collective Agreement Act. The Committee invites the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect. Furthermore, while noting that decisions on essential services are made by the Labour Relations Board (LRB) in consultation with the parties concerned, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any decision taken by the LRB with regard to the essential service level (minimum service) in the education sector and the factors taken into consideration in doing so.

Finally, while recalling that an outright ban on strikes should only be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term and that the education sector does not qualify as such, the Committee asks the Government to specify if the Skills Development and Labour Statutes Amendment Act takes away the right of teachers to engage in strike action.

Manitoba. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 110(1) of the Public School Act which prohibits teachers from engaging in strike action. The Committee once again notes with regret from the Government's report that there are no plans to make amendments to the Public Schools Act in the immediate future. The Committee is bound to recall that the right to strike should only be restricted for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and in essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Manitoba Government to amend its legislation so that schoolteachers, who do not provide essential services in the strict sense of the term and do not qualify as public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, may exercise the right to strike without undue restrictions, and suggests that the Manitoba Government give consideration to the establishment of a voluntary and effective dispute-settlement mechanism in this regard, on the basis of consultations with all organizations concerned.

Article 3. Right to strike of certain categories of employees in the health sector (Alberta). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the prohibition on strikes for all employees within the regional health authorities, including various categories of labourers and gardeners under the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Act in question does not take away the right to strike for the vast majority of gardeners and labourers in the health-care sector, and states that these employees were rather prohibited from striking as staff members of facilities on designated hospital lists prior to the enactment of the Act. The Committee, recalling its view that gardeners and labourers do not provide essential services in the strict sense of the term, expresses the firm hope that the Government will indicate in its next report measures taken by the Government of the Province of Alberta in order to ensure that all workers in the health-care sector, who are not providing essential services in the strict sense of the term, are not deprived of the right to strike.

Article 3. Right to strike in the public sector (Quebec). The Committee recalls that its comments concerned Act No. 43 which put a unilateral end to negotiations in the public sector by imposing collective agreements for a determined period, and depriving the workers concerned, including teachers, of the right to strike (labour law in Quebec prohibits strikes during the term of a collective agreement). Furthermore, this Act provided for:

- severe and disproportionate sanctions in the event of an infringement of the provisions prohibiting recourse to strike action (suspension of the deduction of trade union dues merely by the employer declaring that there has been an infringement of the Act for a period of 12 weeks for each day or part of a day that the infringement is observed (section 30));
- the reduction of employees' salary by an amount equal to the salary they would have received for any period during which they infringe the Act, in addition to not being paid during that period – a measure applicable also to employees on trade union release during the period in question (section 32);
- the facilitation of class actions against an association of employees by reducing the conditions required by the Civil Procedures Code for such an action (section 38); and
- severe penal sanctions (sections 39–40).

The Committee notes the Government's statement that this Act is currently under appeal before the domestic courts. The Committee once again urges the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of Quebec takes all necessary measures with a view to: (i) ensuring that, where the right to strike may be restricted or even prohibited, adequate compensatory guarantees are afforded to the workers concerned, for example, conciliation and mediation procedures leading, in the event of deadlock, to arbitration machinery seen to be fully impartial and independent by the parties concerned and leading to binding awards which should be implemented rapidly and fully; (ii) reviewing the excessive sanctions provided for in the Act in order to ensure that they may be applied only in cases where the right to strike may be limited in accordance with the principles of freedom of association and that they are proportionate to the infringement committed; and (iii) reviewing the provisions facilitating class actions against an association of employees, as there is no reason, in the Committee's view, to treat such actions differently from other class actions in the Civil Procedures Code. Furthermore, the Government is requested to indicate the outcome of the appeal pending on Act No. 43 before the domestic courts.

Article 3. Arbitration imposed at the request of one party after 60 days of work stoppage (article 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act) (Manitoba). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend article 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act which allowed a party to a collective dispute to make a unilateral application to the Labour Board so as to initiate the dispute-settlement process, where a work stoppage exceeded 60 days. The Committee notes from the Government's report that there has been no change to the legislation. The Committee recalls once again that provisions which allow for one of the parties to refer a dispute to compulsory arbitration seriously limit the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and formulate their programmes (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 148 and 153). The Committee urges the Government to ensure that the Government of the Province of Manitoba takes all necessary measures to amend the Labour Relations Act so that an arbitration award may only be imposed in cases involving essential services in the strict sense of the term, of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or where both parties to the collective dispute agree.

Comments from the ITUC on Bills adopted by the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan. The Committee takes note of communications dated 30 September 2008 and 26 August 2009 from the ITUC denouncing the Public Service Essential Services Act (Bill No. 5) and the Act to amend the Trade Union Act (Bill No. 6), adopted in May 2008 by the Government of the Province of Saskatchewan. While questioning beforehand the need for such legislative texts to be adopted, the ITUC indicates that Bill No. 5 weakens the right of workers to organize, permits employers to potentially designate every worker individually as providing an essential service without recourse to such potential avenues as binding arbitration, reducing the bargaining rights of workers. Furthermore, the ITUC alleges that Bill No. 6 weakens the rights of workers and unions to organize into associations and it potentially permits employers to use coercive means to prevent the creation of union associations, and punish workers for engaging in union activities.

The Committee takes note that a number of national and provincial trade unions have filed in the provincial court in July 2008 to have Bills Nos 5 and 6 declared unconstitutional for violating, amongst other fundamental texts, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and international Conventions ratified by Canada. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any outcome of the appeal lodged before the provincial court.

The Committee also observes that the National Union of Public and General Employees (NUPGE) had presented in 2008 a complaint before the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to Bills Nos 5 and 6.

Cape Verde

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee has learned that a new Labour Code was adopted by Legislative Decree No. 5/2007, which, like the earlier Code, contains provisions on protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted that there were very few collective agreements. In the absence of a report from the Government, the Committee is unable to note any improvements in the situation. It recalls that in its previous comments it noted that the Government had sent copies of two collective agreements (telecommunications and private security) and indicated that collective bargaining must be voluntary and that the role of government is to promote it without forcing it. The Government added that technical assistance for building the capacity of the social partners in collective bargaining techniques would contribute to improving the situation. It stated that the social partners were in agreement to request such assistance.

The Committee once again asks the Government to pursue its efforts to promote collective bargaining and expresses the hope that the technical assistance requested by the Government with the agreement of the social partners would be provided in the near future.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary steps in the near future.

Central African Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009, which refer to constant violations of social dialogue and the dismissal of the Secretary General of the Association of Teachers during the general strike called in January 2008. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on this matter.

Additionally, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 009.004 of 29 January 2009 establishing the Labour Code.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations without previous authorization. The Committee notes that section 17 of the new Labour Code does not limit the right to join organizations on the basis of nationality, but it does, however, draw a distinction based on the criteria of legal residence (paragraph 1) accompanied by a condition of reciprocity (paragraph 2). It recalls that, under Article 2 of the Convention, workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to join organizations of their own choosing, with the sole exception of members of the armed forces and police. Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 17 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee all foreigners the right to join organizations which aim to defend their interests as workers.

The Committee observes that, under section 26 of the Labour Code, parents and guardians may oppose the right to organize of minors under 16 years of age. It recalls that the minimum age for joining a trade union in full freedom should be the same as that established by the Labour Code for admission to employment (14 years according to section 259 of the Code), without the permission of the parents or guardian being necessary. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 26 of the Labour Code in that regard.

Article 3. Right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom and to organize their activities freely. The Committee observes that, under section 25 of the new Code, the following persons may not be trade union officers: (1) persons who have been convicted to a prison sentence, with the exception of convictions for negligence, except in the case of the concomitant offence of leaving the scene of an accident; and (2) persons with a criminal record or persons deprived under a court decision of their right of eligibility in accordance with the law authorizing such deprivation. The Committee holds the view that conviction for an act the nature of which is not such as to call into question the integrity of the person concerned and is not such as to be prejudicial to the performance of trade union duties should not constitute grounds for disqualification from trade union office (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 120). In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 25 of the Labour Code taking into account the above principle.

Further to its previous comments, the Committee previously requested the Government to take measures to amend sections 1 and 2 of Act No. 88/009 amending the Labour Code, which provide that any person having lost the status of worker cannot either belong to a trade union or participate in its leadership or administration, and that trade union officers must be members of a trade union, with a view to ensuring that qualified persons, such as persons employed by trade unions or retirees, may hold trade union office. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that the legislation has been revised on this point by providing, in section 27 of the revised Code, that persons who have ceased to perform their duties or who have left their profession may continue to belong to a trade union.

On numerous occasions, the Committee has also requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of Order No. 81/028 concerning the Government's powers of requisition in the event of a strike when so required in the general interest so as to restrict powers of requisitioning to cases in which the right to strike may be limited, or even prohibited, that is in the public service in respect of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in essential services in the strict sense of the term and in a situation of acute national crisis. Noting with regret that the Government has not provided information on this matter, the Committee requests it to take the necessary measures to amend this provision taking the above principle into account.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that, under section 381 of the Labour Code, during a strike, a compulsory minimum service shall be required for certain enterprises on account of their social utility or their distinctive nature. The list of enterprises concerned and the conditions for implementing the minimum service shall be determined by order of the minister responsible for labour, following consultation with the Permanent National Labour Council. The Committee recalls that the establishment of minimum services in the case of strike action should only be possible in: (1) services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (essential services in the strict sense of the term); (2) services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term but where the extent and duration of a strike might be such as to result in an acute national crisis endangering the normal living conditions of the population; and (3) in public services of fundamental importance. Furthermore, the determination of the minimum services and the minimum number of workers providing them should involve not only the public authorities, but also the relevant employers' and workers' organizations. This not only allows a careful exchange of viewpoints on what in a given situation can be considered to be the minimum services that are strictly necessary, but also contributes to guaranteeing that the scope of the minimum service does not result in the strike becoming ineffective in practice because of its limited impact, and to dissipating possible impressions in the trade union organizations that a strike has come to nothing because of overgenerous and unilaterally fixed minimum services. In view of the above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the determination of the minimum service and to provide a copy of the list of enterprises concerned.

Articles 5 and 6. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations of their own choosing. Further to its previous comments concerning section 4 of Act No. 88/009 of 19 May 1988, which provided that occupational trade unions formed into federations and confederations could join together in a single central national organization, the Committee notes with interest the removal of the reference to the single trade union system in the drafting of the new Code. However, the Committee notes that, under section 49(3) of the Code, no central organization may be formed without first having the occupational federations and regional unions defined in paragraphs 1 and 2. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the Convention does not merely recognize the right of organizations to establish bodies operating at the higher level; it gives to the latter the same rights as are accorded to the first-level organizations. Emphasizing the interest in forming groups at the occupational, interoccupational or geographical level, or all three at the same time, the Committee considers that the guarantees afforded to workers' and employers' organizations imply that they may group together in full freedom into federations and confederations without intervention from the public authorities (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 189 and 194). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 49(3) of the Labour Code to guarantee in full the right of workers' organizations to establish federations and confederations of their own choosing, and to indicate any progress in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 09.004 of 29 January 2009 issuing the Labour Code.

Article 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee indicated that the negotiation of collective agreements by professional groupings should only be possible where no trade union exists. It requested the Government to amend the legislation in this respect. The Committee notes with regret that, under the terms of sections 197 and 198 of the new Labour Code, the representatives of trade union organizations and professional groups of workers are placed on an equal footing and may engage in collective bargaining. While noting that, according to the Government, collective agreements and work agreements are, in practice, always negotiated by the representatives of workers' unions and of employers, the Committee notes with regret that the national authorities did not take the opportunity of the reform of the Labour Code to amend the legislation as indicated. Recalling that the Convention promotes collective bargaining between employers and trade union organizations, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the amendment of the legislation in the near future and to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Articles 4 and 6. On several occasions, the Committee requested the Government to provide its observations in reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which in the public sector wages are fixed by the Government after consulting the trade unions, but without any negotiation. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, measures relating to the implementing texts of the Labour Code, particularly on the question of wages, are currently being adopted. The Committee observes that the new Labour Code, in section 211, envisages the right to collective bargaining in public services, enterprises and establishments where their personnel are not governed by specific conditions of service. Recalling that the Convention also applies to public officials not engaged in the administration of the State, the Committee requests the Government to provide clarification on the scope of the right to collective bargaining in the public sector in relation to public officials not engaged in the administration of the State and public officials who are not governed by specific conditions of service. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that all public officials, with the sole possible exception of public servants engaged in the administration of the State, the armed forces and the police, enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Government is requested to indicate any progress achieved in this respect.

Chad

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not reply to the observations that it has been making for many years, nor to the comments received in 2008 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes the recent comments of the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009, referring, in addition to the legislative issues already raised before the Committee, to cases of harassment and infringement of the freedom of expression of trade union leaders. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the new comments made by the ITUC. The Committee also notes the conclusions and the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2581 (see the 354th Report).

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations without previous authorization. The Committee noted in its previous comments that, under section 294(3) of the Labour Code, parents or guardians may oppose the right to organize of young persons under 16 years of age. The Committee recalls once again that Article 2 guarantees all workers, without distinction whatsoever, the right to establish and join organizations. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that section 294(3) of the Labour Code will soon be amended to guarantee the right to organize to minors who have reached the legal minimum age (14 years) for access to the labour market, either as workers or apprentices, without parental or guardian authorization being necessary. The Committee urges the Government to provide information in its next report on all the measures adopted in this regard.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. The Committee has also noted on many occasions that, under section 307 of the Labour Code, the accounts and supporting documents relating to the financial transactions of trade unions must be submitted without delay to the labour inspector, when so requested. Recalling once again that the inspection by the public authorities of trade union finances should not go beyond the obligation of organizations to submit periodic reports, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 307 of the Labour Code taking into account the abovementioned principle. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the instructions issued by the Director of Labour and Social Security with regard to the inspection of the financial transactions of trade unions.

With regard to Act No. 008/PR/07 of 9 May 2007 regulating the right to strike in public services, the Committee reiterates its comments, which concerned the following points:

- Section 11(3) of the Act, which imposes the obligation to declare the “possible” duration of a strike. The Committee recalls that, under section 13(1), non-compliance with this condition would result in a strike being declared illegal. Recalling that trade unions should be able to call strikes of unlimited duration and considering that the legislation should be amended to this effect, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted for this purpose.
- Sections 20 and 21, under which the public authorities (the Minister concerned) have the discretion to determine the minimum services and the number of officials and employees who will ensure that they are maintained in the event of a strike in the essential services enumerated in section 19. In this respect, the Committee recalls once again that such a service should nevertheless meet at least two requirements: (1) firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear; and (2) as this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 160 and 161). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend the legislation to ensure that the minimum service is limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to avoid jeopardizing the life or normal living conditions of all or part of the population, that the workers’ organizations concerned are able to participate in defining such a service, along with the employers and the public authorities, and to indicate any progress achieved in this respect.
- Section 22(1) of the Act, which provides that any refusal by officials or employees to comply with requisition orders (sections 20 and 21) makes them liable to the penalties provided for in sections 100 and 101 of Act No. 017/PR/2001 issuing the general public service regulations. In this regard, the Committee recalls that these legislative provisions describe the degrees of disciplinary penalties to be imposed by order of gravity, but without indicating those which correspond to the different degrees of fault. The Committee once again requests the Government to clarify the scope of penalties for contraventions of legal provisions and also requests it to indicate any other penalties that can be imposed for violations of Act No. 008/PR/2007 regulating the exercise of the right to strike in public services.

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009, reporting the persistence of anti-union acts against the leaders and members of the Union of Trade Unions of Chad (UST), and the difficulties of social dialogue in the petroleum sector. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it already noted comments by the ITUC denouncing the fact that the Government refuses to recognize, in the context of social dialogue, the status of the UST as the most representative organization, that some trade union leaders were dismissed, transferred or prosecuted for anti-union reasons and that the Government refused to negotiate with the inter-trade union association which includes the UST. As the Government confined itself to indicating that the ITUC’s allegations did not reflect the real situation, the Committee requested it to ensure that neither the UST nor its leaders or members were discriminated against on account of their trade union activities and that, in the relations between the authorities and the UST, the status of the UST as the most representative trade union organization was given due consideration. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in reply to the 2009 comments of the ITUC. In the meantime, the Committee urges the Government to guarantee, as required by the Convention, adequate protection against all acts which could jeopardize the exercise of freedom of association by trade union leaders and members, and particularly those of the UST, and to ensure that this trade union organization, the representative nature of which has not been contested by the Government, is not subject to any discrimination.

Chile

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 28 August 2007, which referred to matters under examination by the Committee, as well as to the prohibition of the right to strike by agricultural workers during the harvest. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that Chilean labour legislation envisages a semi-regulated procedure under which agricultural workers represented by a trade union negotiate collectively with their employer an instrument known as an “collective agreement” which, once concluded, has the same effect as a collective contract (sections 314bis A and 314bis B). Such bargaining is not of a binding nature, so that it does not give rise to the rights, prerogatives and duties established through regulated collective bargaining, and consequently there is no right to strike. The fact that these workers cannot negotiate a collective agreement or benefit from the right to strike is due to the fact that they perform seasonal work of short duration. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the right to strike is an intrinsic corollary to the right to organize which may only be restricted in the case of essential services (the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) and in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. Under these conditions, observing that agricultural workers do not form part of either of these categories, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure in law and practice that agricultural workers can enjoy the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC on 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the comments sent by the National Inter-Enterprise Union of Airport Workers of Chile and other unions in various sectors, dated 24 March 2009, which refer to legislative matters already raised by the Committee, and particularly to questions relating to the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this regard.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been asking the Government to amend or repeal various legislative provisions, or to take steps to ensure that certain workers are afforded the guarantees laid down in the Convention. Specifically, in its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to:

- repeal section 11 of Act No. 12927 on the internal security of the State, which provides that any interruption or collective suspension, stoppage or strike in public services or services of public utility, or in production, transport or commercial activities which is not in accordance with the law and results in prejudice to the public order or to compulsory legal functions or damage to any vital industries shall constitute an offence and be penalized with imprisonment or relegation;
- ensure that officials of the judiciary are afforded the guarantees set forth in the Convention;
- amend article 23 of the Political Constitution, which provides that the holding of trade union office is incompatible with active membership in a political party and that the law shall lay down sanctions for trade union officials who participate in party political activities;
- amend sections 372 and 373 of the Labour Code, under which an absolute majority of the workers in the enterprise is required for a decision to strike;
- amend section 374 of the Labour Code, under which a strike must be carried out within three days of the decision to call it, otherwise the workers in the enterprise concerned shall be deemed to have refrained from going on strike and so accept the employer's final offer;
- amend section 379 of the Labour Code, which provides that at any time the group of workers concerned by the negotiations may be called upon to vote, by at least 20 per cent of them, for the purpose of taking a decision, by absolute majority, to censure the negotiating committee, in which case a new committee shall be elected forthwith;
- amend section 381 of the Labour Code containing a general prohibition on the replacement of striking workers, but which provides for the possibility of such replacement subject to compliance by the employer with certain conditions in the final offer during the process of negotiation, and the requirement to pay a bond of four units of account (UF) for each worker hired as a replacement;
- amend section 384 of the Labour Code, which provides that strikes may not be called by workers in enterprises which provide public utility services, or services the interruption of which would seriously endanger the health, public supply, the national economy or national security (the third subsection of section 384 provides that, in such cases, if no agreement is reached between the parties to the bargaining, the matter shall be referred to compulsory arbitration). The Committee noted previously that the definition of services in which strikes may be prohibited, as well as the list drawn up by the government authorities, is too broad and goes beyond services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. In particular, the list includes certain private port terminals and also the Arica–La Paz railway, which cannot be considered as essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee also notes Case No. 2649 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to the exercise of the right to strike by workers in sanitary enterprises (water supply).
- amend or repeal section 385 of the Labour Code, which provides that, in the event of a strike which by reason of its nature, timing or duration causes a serious risk to health, the supply of goods or services to the population, the national economy or national security, the President of the Republic may order the resumption of work;
- amend section 254 of the Penal Code, which provides for penal sanctions in the event of the interruption of public services or public utilities or the abandonment of their posts by public employees; and
- amend section 48 of Act No. 19296 which grants broad powers to the Directorate of Labour for the supervision of the accounts and financial and property transactions of associations.

The Committee observes that the Government reiterates its intention to include in the relevant domestic legislation all of the provisions necessary to bring the legislation rapidly into harmony with the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures in the near future to amend the legislation with a view to bringing it fully into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this respect.

Furthermore, in its previous observation, the Committee noted the preparation of a draft revision of the Constitutional Organic Act on Municipalities, No. 18695, and hoped that it would take into account the principle that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be confined to officials exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft text is undergoing its first constitutional reading in the Chamber of Deputies, and that the proposal to adopt legislation on this subject has been approved, while the only amendments adopted concern the removal of the prohibition for trade union leaders to take office as deputies or senators. In these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in relation to this draft text.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments of 24 March 2009 sent by the National Inter-Enterprise Union of Airport Workers of Chile and other unions from various sectors in a lengthy communication covering numerous matters, and also the comments of August 2009 made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect, and also on the comments of the ITUC of 28 August 2007 (the Government declares that it has requested information from the competent authorities and will send it once it has been received).

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to the following provisions of the Labour Code which are not in conformity with the provisions of the Convention:

- section 1 of the Labour Code, which provides that the Code does not apply to officials of the National Congress or the judiciary, or to workers in state enterprises or institutions, or those in which the State contributes or in which it participates or is represented, provided that such officials or workers are subject by law to special regulations;
- section 82 of the Labour Code, which provides that the remuneration of apprentices may on no account be determined by means of collective agreements or contracts, or arbitration awards issued in the context of collective bargaining, and section 305(1), which provides that workers governed by an apprenticeship contract and those engaged solely for a specific task or activity, or for a specific period, may not engage in collective bargaining;
- section 304 of the Labour Code, which does not allow collective bargaining in state enterprises dependent on the Ministry of National Defence or which are connected to the Government through this Ministry, and in enterprises in which it is prohibited by special laws, or in public or private enterprises or institutions in which the State has financed 50 per cent or more of the budget of either of the last two calendar years, either directly or through duties or taxes;
- While appreciating the Government's statement in which it indicates that it will take account of the observations made in this respect, the Committee recalls that, in accordance with Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, only members of the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from collective bargaining. The Committee therefore considers that the categories of workers mentioned above should enjoy the right to collective bargaining;
- section 334(b) provides that two or more unions of different enterprises, an inter-enterprise union or a federation or confederation may submit draft collective labour contracts on behalf of their members and the workers who agree to the contracts, but in order to do so it shall be necessary in the enterprise concerned for an absolute majority of the worker members who are entitled to engage in collective bargaining to accord representation to the trade union concerned in an assembly, by secret ballot and in the presence of a public notary. The Committee appreciates the Government's statement that it will take account of these comments in future legal discussions. In the Committee's view, these requirements are difficult to meet and do not promote collective bargaining, and should accordingly be abolished or amended;
- section 334bis, which provides that for employers, bargaining with the inter-enterprise union shall be voluntary or optional and that where an employer refuses, the workers who are members of the inter-enterprise union may submit draft collective contracts in accordance with the general rules set forth in Book IV (on collective bargaining). The Committee appreciates the Government's statement that it will take account of these comments at the appropriate time. The Committee considers that these provisions do not, generally speaking, adequately promote collective bargaining with trade union organizations;
- sections 314bis and 315 of the Labour Code, which provide that groups of workers, even when there are unions, may submit draft collective agreements. The Committee notes the Government's statement that a draft Act is currently under examination which contains various amendments to the current legislation on collective bargaining and will enable collective bargaining to be undertaken by groups of workers formed for this purpose solely in enterprises where there is no existing trade union;

- section 320 of the Labour Code, which places an obligation on employers to notify to all workers in the enterprise the submission of a draft collective agreement so that they can propose draft texts or agree to the draft submitted. The Committee notes that the Government undertakes to keep the Committee informed of any measures adopted in this regard in the future. The Committee recalls that direct bargaining between an enterprise and its workers, over and above representative organizations where these exist, may be to the detriment of the principle that collective bargaining between employers' and workers' organizations is to be encouraged, and that groups of workers should be able to negotiate collective agreements or accords only in the absence of such organizations.

Although it appreciates that the Government is open to the introduction of improvements in relation to the application of the Convention, the Committee emphasizes that significant restrictions on the exercise of the rights established in the Convention have continued to occur for a number of years. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all specific measures adopted in this respect.

China

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (notification: 1997)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 and 9 September 2009 concerning discrimination of the authorities against the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) and limited protections for the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments with regard to these issues in its next report.

The Committee previously noted the proposals to implement article 23 of the Basic Law which, among others, would allow for the proscription of any local organization which was subordinate to a mainland organization, the operation of which had been prohibited on the grounds of protecting the security of the State. The Committee previously expressed the firm hope that any further action on proposed legislation to implement article 23 of the Basic Law would take fully into account the provisions of this Convention, in particular, the right of workers and employers to form and join the organization of their own choosing and to organize their administration and activities free from interference by the public authorities. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that article 27 of the Basic Law guarantees that residents of the HKSAR shall have freedom of association and the right and freedom to form and join trade unions, while article 18(1) of the Hong Kong Bill of Rights, as set out in the Hong Kong Bill of Rights Ordinance, stipulates that "everyone shall have the right to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and join trade unions for the protection of his interests". The Committee notes that the ITUC indicates that several substantive changes have been made to the draft text of article 23 but that there has not been an announced timetable for enactment of the bill. The Committee requests the Government to include in its next report a copy of the draft bill for article 23 of the Basic Law and to indicate any progress made in the enactment of the bill.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (notification: 1997)

The Committee notes the observations of the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) dated August 2009 and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 and 9 September 2009 concerning discrimination of the authorities against the HKCTU, as well as the Government's comments.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. In several of its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to provide further protection against anti-union discrimination and noted the Government's reference to the drafting of an amendment bill that would empower the Labour Tribunal to make an order of reinstatement/re-engagement in cases of unreasonable and unlawful dismissal without the need to secure the employer's consent. The Committee notes the Government, in its report, indicates that progress on amendments to introduce new provisions on mandatory reinstatement and re-engagement under the Employment Ordinance, Chapter 57 and that upon completion of the draft, it will be introduced into the Legislative Council. The Government indicates that it has committed to introduce a bill which criminalizes non-payment of labour tribunal awards. The Committee once again expresses the hope that this bill, which has been under examination since 1999, will soon be adopted so as to give legislative expression to the principle of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and requests the Government to indicate any progress made in this respect.

Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. Several of the Committee's previous comments concerned the need to strengthen the collective bargaining framework, in particular with respect to the low levels of coverage of collective agreements which were not binding on the employer (see Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 1942), and the absence of an institutional framework for trade union recognition and collective bargaining. The Committee previously requested the Government to continue to provide information on measures adopted or contemplated for the promotion of new bipartite collective agreements through the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations and to indicate any further sectors covered by collective agreements, as well as the level of coverage (number of collective agreements and workers covered). In addition, the Committee previously requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to continue to promote voluntary bipartite negotiations in the private sector and to provide additional information concerning new sectors in which collective agreements have been concluded. The Committee notes that the Government refers to promotional materials, seminars, and operational activities between workers' and employers' representatives and indicates that since the last report, collective agreements have been negotiated in the food processing and security services. The Committee also notes that the Government states that it will continue to use tripartite committees as one of the useful channels for promoting bipartite voluntary negotiation at the industry level. The Government adds that it has been promoting direct and voluntary negotiations between employers' and workers' organizations. In addition, the Committee notes that the ITUC indicates that less than 1 per cent of workers are covered by collective agreements and those that exist are not binding. The Government answers that in the recent years the number of trade unions and affiliates has increased steadily. The Committee wishes to recall the comments submitted by the Hong Kong and Kowloon Trade Union Council with respect to the need for the Government to introduce legislation on collective bargaining rights. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that it has all along taken measures appropriate to local conditions to promote voluntary and direct negotiations between employers and employees or their respective organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to continue to promote collective bargaining and to provide information in this regard.

Article 6. Measures to promote collective bargaining for civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the different categories and functions of the civil servants so as to identify which of them are in the administration of the State and which are not. The Committee notes that the Government again reports that all civil servants in the HKSAR, i.e. persons employed to work in government bureaux/departments, are engaged in the administration of the State as they are responsible for, among others, formulating policies and strategies and performing law enforcement and regulatory functions. The Committee notes that according to the ITUC, all employees in the public sector are deprived of the right to engage in collective bargaining. Noting that it follows from the Government's report that in the public sector there are consultations but not collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that, according to Article 4, civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy not only the right to be consulted on their conditions of employment but also the right to bargain collectively and requests the Government to ensure this right. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the different categories and functions of the civil servants so as to identify which of them are engaged in the administration of the State and which are not. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate any agreement concluded in the public sector.

Colombia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT), dated 28 August 2009 and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 26 August 2009. These comments relate to matters that are already under examination by the Committee, and particularly acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, including murders and other acts of violence, and the impunity relating to many acts of violence (most acts of violence have been referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee also notes the comments made by the National Association of Telephone, Communication and Allied Technicians (ATELCA) related to a case examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee further notes the comments of the National Association of Employers of Colombia (ANDI). The Committee notes various communications from the Government related to these comments, and its reply to the comments made previously by the Union of Maritime and Inland Water Transport Workers (UNIMAR).

The Committee notes the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009 on the application of the Convention, and particularly the commitment expressed by the Government and the social partners to reinforce social dialogue in the country. The Committee also notes that the Conference Committee invited the Government to continue receiving ILO assistance in relation to all the pending matters.

In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that, pursuant to the conclusions of Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Government of Colombia invited the Standards Department of the ILO to undertake a mission to the country with a view to observing the action taken as a result of the conclusions. The mission was undertaken from 19 to 23 October 2009 and interviewed the representatives of the Government and the social partners, as well as the representatives of the principal institutions in the country.

Finally, the Committee also notes the cases examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA) concerning Colombia. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that the Government delivered a communication to the mission indicating that: (1) the Special Committee for the Handling of Conflicts referred to the ILO (CETCOIT) constitutes a special and particularly valuable forum for creating trust between the social partners; (2) it supports the reinforcement of the procedure and, to this end, will allocate the necessary resources so that it is supported for one year by a university ensuring the process of facilitating the resolution of the cases before the CETCOIT; and (3) it will examine the possibility of having recourse to the procedure of a preliminary contacts mission, envisaged in the rules of procedure of the CFA, as it holds the conviction that implementing all mechanisms can improve industrial relations in the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in the work of the CETCOIT.

Trade union rights and civil and political liberties

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been examining allegations of violence against trade unionists and the situation of impunity, at which it has expressed its concern. The Committee notes that the comments made by the CUT and the ITUC refer to a significant number of acts of violence against trade unionists. In the latest information provided by the CUT to the mission which visited Colombia, it reported that the acts of violence against the trade union movement in 2009 included the murder of 26 unionized workers, and that 38 convictions were handed down in 2009 against those responsible for acts of violence against trade unionists. The CUT further indicated that the trade union movement has provided to the Office of the Attorney-General a list of 2,688 murder victims during the period between January 1986 and 15 March 2009 (which was also submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association in the context of Case No. 1787), but indicates that the list has not been taken into account by the Office of the Attorney-General. Moreover, during their interviews with the mission in October 2009, certain representatives of the trade union movement expressed concern at the possibility that the programme of protection for trade unionists would be ended at the end of 2009.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, according to its statistics, 23 trade unionists were murdered in 2009 and that 49 convictions were obtained against those responsible for acts of violence against the trade union movement, while protection measures were provided for 1,450 trade unionists and over US$13 million was provided for protection measures. The Government informed the mission that, with regard to the 23 trade unionists murdered in 2009, the investigations carried out by the Office of the Attorney-General found that 15 were not for trade union reasons and, up to now, of the other eight only one was murdered because of their trade union activities. The Government adds that the number of violent deaths in the country has decreased, that its objective is for there to be no murders of trade unionists and that instructions have been given at the highest level of the Government to protect the trade union movement.

With reference to all of these matters, the Committee expresses appreciation of the tangible commitments given by the Government in a communication that it delivered to the mission which visited the country in October 2009. The communication stated that "for the State of Colombia, it is of crucial importance to elucidate violent acts committed against trade union leaders and unionized workers. In this respect, the Government undertakes to allocate the necessary financial resources for the strengthening of the Trade Union Members Sub-Unit of the National Human Rights Unit of the Office of the Attorney-General of the Nation and the Specialized Magistrates of the Higher Council of the Judiciary, so that they can complete the investigation of the acts of violence alleged in the context of Case No. 1787". The communication also indicates that "the Government, with the assistance of the ILO, will enter into dialogue with the workers' federations on the criteria to harmonize information on acts of violence against the trade union movement, for transmission to the investigatory bodies, and in this manner support the investigations". With regard to the protection of trade unionists, the Government's communication notes that "in relation to the preventive measures to avoid new acts of violence against trade union leaders and workers, the Government undertakes to continue the protection programme and to continue allocating resources to its financing and affirms that, irrespective of the body implementing protection measures, responsibility for the programme will always rest with the State." The Committee also notes the statement by the Office of the Attorney-General to the mission that it is prepared, with the additional funding made available to it by the Government, to conduct investigations into all the allegations contained in Case No. 1787 that is under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association (concerning over 2,600 murders since 1986, to which the CUT refers in its comments).

The Committee further notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 1309 of 2009, concerning the examination of which the Government had provided information to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, and which: (1) provides that the time limit for the prescription of acts punishable as murder of a member of a legally recognized trade union organization shall be 30 years; (2) considers as an aggravating circumstance for the imposition of penalties crimes against members of a trade union organization or human rights ombudsperson; (3) provides that any person who prevents or disturbs a lawful assembly or the exercise of rights granted by labour laws or engages in reprisals on grounds of strike action, assembly or legitimate association, shall be liable to a fine of between 100 and 300 minimum monthly wages as established by law; and (4) provides that, in the event of threats or intimidation against a member of a trade union organization, the penalty shall be increased by one third. The Committee also notes with interest that the authorities of the Ministry of the Interior and Justice confirmed to the mission that the Victims Compensation Fund established by Act No. 975 on Justice and Peace, applies to cases related to trade union leaders and members and its coverage currently amounts to 177 trade union leaders.

The Committee once again expresses deep regret at the murders and acts of violence against trade unionists which have been occurring for many years and those that have occurred in 2009, since the previous examination of the application of the Convention. Taking into account the gravity of the situation, the Committee recognizes all the measures, of a practical and legislative nature, that the Government has been adopting recently to combat violence in general and violence against the trade union movement, and it notes a decrease in the murders of trade unionists between 2008 and 2009, and in violence in general. The Committee hopes that the new measures will make it possible to combat violence against trade unionists effectively and will lead to the conviction of those responsible. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Pending legislative and practical matters

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee referred previously to the use of associated work cooperatives as a contractual mechanism which, according to the allegations of trade union organizations, can cover actual employment relationships and are used for the performance of functions and work that are within the normal activities of the establishment and under which workers may not establish or join trade unions. The Committee noted in its previous observation the approval by the Congress of the Republic, on 22 July 2008, of Act No. 1233 respecting associated work cooperatives, following lengthy consultations with the representative organizations of associated work cooperatives, workers' federations, branch organizations representing employers and academic circles. On that occasion, the Committee noted that the Act refers to the "workers" of cooperatives and in that context recalled that under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, all workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report, and the indication provided to the mission, that the new Act prohibits the use of cooperatives as a mechanism for labour mediation and grants the administrative authority the means to penalize such conduct. The representatives of the ANDI indicated to the mission that nothing currently prevents workers in cooperatives from establishing and registering trade unions, as unions exist in this sector. It referred in this respect to the SINTRACORTEROS trade union. The representatives of the workers indicated to the mission that there is a proliferation of cooperatives and that the workers in such cooperatives are not allowed to exercise the right to organize or to engage in collective bargaining. In this respect, taking into account the contradictory indications provided, the Committee requests the Government to consider the possibility of an independent expert undertaking a national study on the application of the Act respecting cooperatives and their use in the area of industrial relations, and also to clarify the issue of whether or not workers in cooperatives can organize. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this matter in its next report.

Right to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the arbitrary refusal by the authorities to register new trade union organizations, new trade union rules or the executive committee of a trade union at the discretion of the authorities for reasons that go beyond the explicit provisions of the legislation. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to repeal the provision of Resolution No. 626 of February 2008 which establishes, among the causes for which the competent official may refuse an entry in the trade union register, "that the trade union organization has been established for purposes that are different from those deriving from the fundamental right of association". In this respect, the Committee notes with interest ruling No. 695 of 2008 of the Constitutional Court, which provides that "the expression 'its legal recognition [of the union] shall be the result of the mere registration of the founding statutes', contained in article 39 of the Constitution, this statement shall be interpreted in conformity with the principle of publicity, in the meaning that such recognition does not consist of the granting of legal personality to the union, nor an act declaring its legal existence by the State, but that the founding statutes may be asserted or produce legal effects in respect of the State, as a third party, with the inclusion of all its bodies, in relation to the participants of the expression of the collective will to found the union, namely those who founded the union, and in respect of all third parties, and primarily the employer, on the basis of the above registration. Based on the above statement and taking into account that section 372, first indent, of the Substantive Labour Code (as replaced by section 50 of Act No. 50 of 1990, and explicitly amended by section 6 of Act No. 584 of 2000), may be interpreted in the sense that the registration of the founding statutes of the union with the Ministry of Social Protection is a requirement for the existence and lawful status of the union. This interpretation of section 372 would be contrary to the provisions of article 39 of the Political Constitution, and Article 2 of Convention No. 87 of the ILO, which forms part of the constitutional provisions, such that the incorporation shall be declared enforceable as conditioned by such expression, in relation to the functions examined in this ruling, on the understanding that such registration shall exclusively fulfil functions of publicity, without authorizing the Ministry referred to above to carry out prior controls of the content of the founding statute."

The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in accordance with this ruling, Resolution No. 626 of 2008 is not applicable and that, as a consequence, the Ministry of Social Protection has been depositing, immediately upon presentation in person, documents setting out the decision to establish trade union organizations, new executive committees and amendments to their statutes, without the application of a procedure and without prior control.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been referring to the prohibition of strikes, not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in a very broad range of services that are not necessarily essential (section 430(b), (d), (f), (g) and (h); section 450(1)(a) of the Labour Code, Tax Act No. 633/00 and Decrees Nos 414 and 437 of 1952, 1543 of 1955, 1593 of 1959, 1167 of 1963, and 57 and 534 of 1967) and the possibility to dismiss workers who have intervened or participated in an unlawful strike (section 450(2) of the Labour Code), even when the unlawful nature of the strike is a result of requirements that are contrary to the principles of freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee notes the ruling of the Labour Cassation Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice, of 3 June 2009 (No. 40428), indicating that the Constitutional Court in each individual case referred to it will examine whether or not a particular activity, taking into account its material content, corresponds to an essential service. The Supreme Court finds that "in accordance with constitutional doctrine, even where there may exist a legislative definition of the classification of a public service as essential, this does not prevent it being determined through interpretation that in a specific case a certain activity may effectively be considered an essential public service in view of its material content". The ruling continues by indicating that "this must be the case, as article 56 of the Constitution cannot lay down for the legislator an absolute classification such that the terms of the higher level or supra-legal text is sufficient in itself for the determination of a matter, without the interpreter examining its spirit or its objective, in the light of the constitutional principles". The Committee observes that it was found in the context of this ruling that "it may not be affirmed that the rail transport of freight may be considered an essential public service".

The Committee also notes the Government's indication to the mission in a written communication setting out its readiness to examine in a tripartite forum in the context of the National Dialogue Commission on Wage and Labour Policies the legislative discrepancies that are still pending before the ILO supervisory bodies. In this respect, the Committee observes that, in accordance with Act No. 1210 (amending section 451 of the Substantive Labour Code) "the legality or unlawful nature of a collective labour suspension or stoppage shall be the subject of a judicial ruling in a priority procedure, and that in accordance with the above holding, it rests with the judicial authorities to determine when a service is essential". Under these conditions, the Committee hopes that the highest judicial authority will take into account the principles of the supervisory bodies in relation to essential services, in which the right to strike may be prohibited or restricted, and it requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any development in the case law on this matter and whether it is envisaged that the legal provisions referred to above will be repealed or amended.

Declaring a strike illegal. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 1210 of 2008, amending section 451 of the Substantive Labour Code to read as follows: "the legality or unlawful nature of a collective work suspension or stoppage shall be declared by the judicial authorities in a priority procedure". The Committee takes due note of the fact that, following the adoption of this Act, the Constitutional Court handed down ruling No. C-349/09 declaring unconstitutional section 1(2) of Act No. 1210, which empowered the President of the Republic, with a prior favourable opinion issued by the Labour Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice, to order the cessation of a strike at any time and the referral of the disputes which gave rise to it to compulsory arbitration where the strike, in view of its nature, is seriously prejudicial to the health, safety, public order or the economy of the whole or part of the population.

Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that Act No. 1210 amends section 448(4) of the Substantive Labour Code and provides that: (1) the employer and the workers may, within the following three days of a labour dispute, convene any settlement, conciliation or arbitration machinery; (2) if they do not reach agreement, automatically or at the request of the parties, the Commission for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies shall intervene and use its good offices for a maximum of five days; (3) once this period has elapsed without it being possible to achieve a definitive solution, both parties shall request the Ministry of Social Protection to convene an Arbitration Board; and (4) the workers shall be under the obligation to return to work within three days. In this respect, the Committee takes due note of the fact that a Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards confirmed that the request to refer disputes to an Arbitration Board must be made by both parties. The Committee observes that this was also confirmed to the mission which visited the country in October 2009.

Article 6. Restrictions imposed on the activities of federations and confederations. The Committee has been referring for several years to the prohibition on the calling of strikes by federations and confederations (section 417(i) of the Labour Code). The Committee recalled that higher level organizations should be able to resort to strikes in the event of disagreement with the Government's economic and social policy and requested the Government to amend the above provision. The Committee notes the indication by the Government in a written communication that it is prepared to analyse, in a tripartite forum in the context of the National Dialogue Commission on Wage and Labour Policies, the pending legislative discrepancies that are before the ILO supervisory bodies. The Committee also observes that, under the terms of Act No. 1210, a strike called by a federation or confederation may only be declared illegal by the judicial authorities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 29 August 2008 and 26 August 2009; the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT), the General Confederation of Workers (CGT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), of 28 January and 13 June 2008; of the CGT of 19 August 2008; of the CUT and the CTC of 27 August 2008; and of the CUT of 28 August 2009. These organizations refer to matters that are under examination by the Committee, as well as to anti-union dismissals and the lack of adequate protection in this respect. The Committee also notes the comments made by the National Association of Telephone, Communication and Allied Technicians (ATELCA) of 16 August 2008 and 28 August 2009 referring to a case under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments of the National Association of Employers of Colombia (ANDI), of 1 September 2009, which refer to matters under examination by the Committee and mention the various committees and commissions operating in the country, of which it places emphasis on: the National Dialogue Commission on Wage and Labour Policies, the Inter-Institutional Human Rights Commission, the Special Committee for the Handling of Conflicts Referred to the ILO (CETCOIT) and the Negotiations Commission in the Public Sector. Furthermore, every five weeks a meeting is held between the President and Vice-President of the Republic, the Minister of Social Protection and workers' organizations. The ANDI also refers to USAID assistance programmes and the bipartite Swedish technical cooperation programme, which are carrying out training programmes for dispute resolution, collective bargaining and social dialogue.

The Committee also notes the various communications from the Government relating to these comments, and its reply to the comments made previously by the Union of Maritime and Inland Water Transport Workers (UNIMAR).

Furthermore, the Committee notes with interest the invitation made by the Government to the Office for a mission to visit the country with a view to observing the effect given to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in relation to the examination of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), which nevertheless addressed certain matters relating to Convention No. 98. The mission visited the country from 19 to 23 October 2009 and held interviews with representatives of the Government and of the social partners, as well as representatives of the principal institutions in the country.

The Committee also notes the cases examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to Colombia. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that the Government delivered a communication to the mission referred to above, in which it indicates that: (1) the CETCOIT constitutes a special and particularly valuable forum for creating trust between the social partners; (2) it supports the reinforcement of the procedure and, to this end, will allocate the necessary resources so that it is supported for one year by a university to facilitate the resolution of the cases before the CETCOIT; and (3) it will examine the possibility of having recourse to the procedure of a preliminary contacts mission, as envisaged in the rules of procedure of the Committee on Freedom of Association, as it holds the conviction that implementing all mechanisms can improve industrial relations in the country. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any progress made in the work of the CETCOIT.

The Committee further notes the adoption of Act No. 1149 of 2007 amending the Code of Labour Procedures and Social Security by introducing oral hearings and making judicial proceedings more flexible. The Committee notes that the mission was informed that it is the responsibility of the Higher Council of the Judiciary to give effect to the Act, for which a time period of four years is envisaged. The Committee notes the existence of pilot plans for the application of these procedures in certain regions of the country, with appeals being decided upon in two months in the first instance and in one month in the second instance.

The Committee welcomes the adoption of Act No. 1309 of 2009 which provides that any person who prevents or disturbs a lawful assembly or the exercise of rights granted by labour laws or engages in reprisals on grounds of lawful strike action, assembly or association, shall be liable to a fine of between 100 and 300 minimum monthly wages as established by law or to imprisonment.

Pending issues

Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to the need to give effective recognition to the right to collective bargaining of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes with satisfaction that for the first time since the ratification of the Convention in 1976, and following repeated requests, on 24 February 2009 the Government issued Decree No. 535 respecting collective bargaining in the public sector and it observes that, according to the Government's indications in its report, it has already given rise to tangible results, as processes of dialogue have progressed in the District of Bogotá, in the Ministry of Social Protection and in the Ministry of Education (in the latter case, with the Colombian Federation of Educational Staff (FECODE)), resulting in the conclusion of agreements. The Committee observes that the objective of this Decree is "to establish bodies within which dialogue will be furthered between the trade union organizations of public employees and public sector entities" (section 1), with a view to determining conditions of work and regulating relations between employers and employees (section 2). The Decree also envisages the procedure for engaging in dialogue. The Committee observes that the Decree applies to all state employees, with the exception of high-level employees discharging functions of management, direction and institutional guidance the exercise of which involves the adoption of policies or directives.

In this respect, the Committee notes the indication by the CUT in its comments that the agreement with the FECODE has not been fully respected and that the CUT has lodged an application with the State Council to strike down Decree No. 535, which is currently being examined (this organization and other representative workers' organizations informed the mission that they challenge Decree No. 535 and indicated that the first draft of the new Decree to amend it, which is not attached, is not in conformity with the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151)). The Committee observes that the application for the Decree to be struck down is based in particular on the interpretation of certain provisions of the Colombian Constitution and on issues of compliance with domestic legislation, on which matter the Committee is clearly not competent.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication to the mission that it is planned to revise the Decree and that a draft Decree to amend it was forwarded to workers' and employers' organizations for discussion.

The Committee requests the Government to continue dialogue with trade union organizations with a view to improving the Decree that has already been adopted and to keep it informed on this matter. The Committee is aware that the Decree is very short, can be improved and establishes principles which probably require further regulation to comply more effectively with its objectives and to extend in practice collective agreements in the various institutions. While from a technical viewpoint such regulation may well be appropriate, the Committee recalls that the Convention does not require exhaustive regulation, but rather is compatible with systems that envisage a minimum of interference by the State in collective bargaining in the public sector.

Collective accords with non-unionized workers. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it referred to the need to ensure that collective accords are not used to undermine the position of trade union organizations, and to the need to ensure the possibility in practice to conclude collective agreements with them. It requested the Government to provide information on the total number of collective agreements and collective accords and the respective number of workers covered by them. The Committee notes that the ITUC and the CUT refer to the low rate of collective bargaining in the country, which only covers 1.2 per cent of workers. In 2008, only 473 agreements were concluded, consisting of 256 collective agreements and 217 collective accords (negotiated directly with the workers).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the conclusion of collective accords, which is permitted by the legislation, in no event prevents the trade union from submitting claims and concluding collective agreements, provided that they are in accordance with ruling C-345 of 2007 of the Constitutional Court, under which "direct negotiations between employers and non-unionized workers may not undermine collective bargaining and trade union rights". The Government emphasizes that the only case in which the same employer may conclude a collective labour agreement and a collective accord is when the trade union represents less than one-third of the workers in the enterprise. The Government adds that in 2008 a total of 209 collective accords were deposited, 15 per cent more than the previous year, when 182 were deposited. With regard to collective agreements, 261 were deposited in 2008, 3 per cent more than in 2007, when 254 were deposited. In this respect, while recalling that collective accords negotiated directly with workers should not be used to undermine the position of trade union organizations, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of voluntary collective bargaining, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, and to ensure that the conclusion of collective accords negotiated directly with the workers is only possible in the absence of a trade union and that it is not carried out in practice for anti-union purposes.

Restrictions on the content of negotiations. The Committee notes Legislative Act No. 01 of 2005, amending article 48 of the Constitution on social security, and thereby limiting the right of collective bargaining on pensions. The Committee notes that the comments of ATELCA refer to this matter. The Committee observes that the Act provides that: as from the coming into force of the present Legislative Act, pension conditions that differ from those set out in the laws on the General Pensions System shall not be established in accords, collective labour agreements, awards or any juridical act. Without prejudice to acquired rights, the scheme applicable to members of the public forces and the President of the Republic, as established in the clauses of this section, the period for which special pension schemes are in force, those covered by exceptions, as well as any other difference from the permanent provisions of the laws on the General Pensions System, shall expire on 31 July 2010.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in this respect that article 48 of the Constitution provides that social security shall be provided in accordance with the principles of efficiency, universality and solidarity. The Government adds that the universality of the system presupposes protection guarantees for all persons, without discrimination whatsoever, at all the stages of life, and that this guarantee without discrimination can only be offered by a unified system which cannot be varied at the will of one sector of beneficiaries. Account has to be taken not only of the principles governing the social security system, but also of the economic consequences of the current situation, as well as those in the medium and long term. The Government adds that Act No. 100 of 1993 already provided that pension schemes were not to be included in collective bargaining. The principal objective of Legislative Act No. 01 of 2005 is to ensure effective entitlement to a pension for all inhabitants who meet the requirements of the law for the granting of such entitlement, under conditions of equality and without privilege.

The Committee observes that this matter was examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in the context of Case No. 2434 (see 344th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association). The Committee of Experts observes that in its conclusions the Committee on Freedom of Association considered that, with regard to agreements concluded prior to the entry into force of the legislation, which would no longer be in force as from 2010 under the terms of the Legislative Act, this could imply in certain cases a unilateral modification of the content of signed collective agreements, which is contrary to the principles of collective bargaining, as well as the principle of the acquired rights of the parties. In this respect, it requested the Government to take the appropriate measures so that collective agreements containing clauses on pensions continue to produce their effects until their expiry date, including after 31 July 2010.

With regard to agreements concluded after the entry into force of Legislative Act No. 01, and particularly in relation to the general prohibition of the establishment of a pension scheme that differs from any established under the General Pensions Scheme, the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government, in order to ensure harmonious industrial relations in the country, to hold in-depth consultations on retirement and pensions with the interested parties in order to find a negotiated solution acceptable to all the parties concerned, in accordance with the Conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining ratified by Colombia, and to ensure in particular that the parties to collective bargaining can improve statutory pension benefits or pension schemes by mutual agreement.

In the same way as the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee of Experts recalls that measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention; tripartite discussions for the preparation, on a voluntary basis, of guidelines for collective bargaining are a particularly appropriate method to resolve these difficulties (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 250).

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments made by the National Association of Telephone, Communication and Allied Technicians (ATELCA) and the Government's reply. The Committee is examining these comments in the context of its examination of the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide its observations concerning the comments made by the Union of Public Officials of the University Hospital of Valle (SINSPUBLIC), of 3 April 2006, and the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), of 4 April 2006, according to which Act No. 909 of 2004 and its implementing regulations, enacted without prior consultation with trade union organizations, compel workers in the public sector to undergo once again merit competitions in order to be confirmed in their posts, in violation of the collective agreement concluded between SINSPUBLIC and the hospital administration. The Committee reiterates its request.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee welcomes the adoption of Act No. 1309 of 2009 (respecting conduct that may be punished which is prejudicial to the legally protected property of the members of a legally recognized trade union organization) which provides that any person who prevents or disturbs a lawful meeting or the exercise of the rights afforded by labour laws or engages in reprisals by reason of a lawful strike, meeting or association, shall be liable to a fine of from 100 to 300 minimum monthly wages as set out in the law or to imprisonment.

Article 7. The Committee is examining Decree No. 535, of 24 February 2009, on collective bargaining in the public sector, in the context of its examination of the application of Convention No. 98.

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice and to provide information on the following matters:

- the facilities to be afforded to representatives of recognized public employees' organizations in order to enable them to carry out their functions promptly and efficiently, both during and outside their hours of work. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the facilities applicable under the legislation and whether facilities have been established through collective agreements, and to provide examples (Article 6 of the Convention).
- the independent and impartial machinery established for the settlement of disputes arising in connection with the determination of terms and conditions of employment in the context of the process of collective bargaining (Article 8 of the Convention).

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication concerning the adoption of Decree No. 3399, of 8 September 2009, modifying the composition of the Inter-sectoral Commission to Promote the Formalization of Decent Work in the Public Sector, which will include the Minister of Social Protection, the Minister of Finance and Public Credit, the Director of the National Planning Department, the Director of the Administrative Department of the Public Service (and in which the Superintendent of the Solidarity Economy and a delegate of each of the public sector federations, designated by workers' confederations, will have the status of permanent invited participants).

Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC). The Committee notes in particular the indication by the CUT that, despite the existence of the National Commission for Dialogue on Wage and Labour Policies, recent legislative changes were not subject to consultations with the social partners in that Commission. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on this matter.

The Committee notes the comments made by the National Association of Telephone, Communication and Allied Technicians (ATELCA) and the Government's reply. The Committee refers in this respect to its comments on the application of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 535 of 24 February 2009 on collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee notes the comments made by the CUT, CGT and CTC in this respect. The Committee refers in this regard to its comments on the application of Convention No. 98.

Comoros

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been requesting the Government to take measures to promote collective bargaining in the public and private sectors. The Committee notes that the Government expresses regret in its report that there has not been substantial progress in this respect and reiterates its desire to receive technical assistance to help the partners concerned gain a better understanding of the socio-economic importance of collective bargaining. In this respect, the Committee notes the comments of the Employers' Organization of Comoros (OPACO), according to which collective agreements in the pharmaceuticals and bakeries sectors, which have been under negotiation for several years, have still not been concluded, and that negotiations in the press sector are currently under way. The Committee notes with regret that, according to OPACO, the Government is not taking any measures to promote collective bargaining in either the public or the private sectors.

The Committee regrets the lack of progress in collective bargaining in these sectors and expresses the firm hope that it will be completed in the near future. The Committee expresses the firm hope that ILO technical assistance will be provided in the very near future and requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to promote collective bargaining in both the private and the public sectors. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC comments.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to amend the legislation on the minimum service organized by the employer to be maintained in the public service that is indispensable for safeguarding the general interest (section 248-15 of the Labour Code), in order to limit the minimum service to operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population, within the framework of a negotiated minimum service. In this regard, the Committee noted that the Government had indicated that section 248-15 had indeed been amended but that it was not in a position to produce the copy of the text amending the provisions of the said section. The Committee recalls that, since the definition of a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). The Committee again expresses the hope that the text amending section 248-15 of the Labour Code takes account of these principles and requests the Government to send a copy of the text as soon as possible.

The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the draft revised Labour Code.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Costa Rica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, on the application of the Convention. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the report of the high-level technical assistance mission which visited San José from 2 to 6 October 2006 in the context of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee notes the reasons given by the Government for the delay in the examination of the Bills relating to the application of the Convention by the Legislative Assembly (the need to adopt additional legislation under the Free Trade Agreement). Furthermore, the Government organized a forum with the participation of members of Parliament to promote the draft reform of labour procedures.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. Prohibition upon foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions (article 60, second paragraph, of the Constitution and section 345(e) of the Labour Code). The Committee observed previously that Bill No. 13475 (currently on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly) amends section 345(e) of the Labour Code so that it no longer provides that the members of the executive board of a trade union must be of Costa Rican nationality or of Central American origin, or foreign nationals married to a Costa Rican woman and having completed five years of permanent residence in the country. Nevertheless, the Bill provides that the bodies of trade unions have to comply with the provisions of article 60 of the Constitution, which provides that “foreign nationals are barred from positions of management or authority in trade unions”. The Committee noted previously that a draft reform of the Constitution, prepared with the assistance of the ILO, had been submitted to the Plenary of the Legislative Assembly in 1998. The Committee regrets to note the Government’s indication in its report that the draft reform of the Constitution has been shelved as the four-year period has elapsed. The Government expresses its good will to make all the necessary efforts to promote this issue among the members of the Legislative Assembly. The Committee previously drew the Government’s attention to the importance of amending not only section 345 of the Labour Code, but also article 60, second paragraph, of the Constitution, to abolish the excessive restrictions that are currently placed on the right of foreign nationals to hold trade union office, which are inconsistent with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee reiterates its comments in this respect.

Obligation for the trade union assembly to appoint the executive board each year (section 346(a) of the Labour Code). The Committee noted previously that Bill No. 13475 no longer establishes the requirement for the executive board to be appointed each year. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that in practice the Ministry of Labour ensures the full autonomy of organizations to determine the duration of the mandates of their executive boards.

Right of organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom. Restrictions on the right to strike: (i) requirement of “60 per cent of the persons who work in the enterprise, workplace or establishment concerned” – section 373(c) of the Labour Code; and (ii) prohibition of the right to strike for “workers engaged in rail, maritime and air transport enterprises” and “workers engaged in loading and unloading of docks and quays” – section 373(c) of the Labour Code.

The Committee noted previously that, according to the Government, on 25 August 2005 the judicial authorities referred to the Executive for its submission to the Legislative Assembly a Bill to reform labour procedures, which benefitted from ILO technical assistance. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, the Bill takes into account the ruling of 27 February 1998 by the Constitutional Chamber and the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, and has been endorsed by the trade union organizations and employers’ associations, except with regard to certain provisions. The Committee observed previously that the Bill:

- proposes 40 per cent of workers in order to call a strike (the employers’ associations rejected this percentage, citing the principle of democratic participation);
- the right to strike is restricted only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, although these include the loading and unloading of perishable goods in ports; transport is considered an essential service as long as the journey has not been completed;
- strikes may no longer be deemed unlawful before they have occurred;
- arbitration is introduced for disputes in essential services and in the public sector (in this respect, the Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration is only admissible in relation to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and in essential services the interruption of which would endanger life, personal safety or health); and
- a special and very short summary procedure is introduced for workers with trade union immunity.

Moreover, in a direct request, the Committee observed previously that the Bill establishes a maximum limit for strikes of 45 calendar days (after which arbitration is compulsory).

With regard to the right to strike, the Committee also noted that a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice had indicated that of the 600 or so strikes that had occurred over the past 20 or 30 years, no more than ten had been declared lawful. Furthermore, according to trade union federations, the procedure to set a strike in motion could last up to three years.

The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government indicates that: (1) the Bill to reform labour procedures has been placed on the agenda of the Plenary of the Legislative Assembly as a result of the Government’s promotional activities; and (2) the establishment of a joint commission of the Legislative Assembly to further the Bill was decided upon and agreed to in the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite body).

Articles 2 and 4. The need for Bill No. 13475, in amending section 344 of the Labour Code, to establish a specific and short period during which the administrative authority is to reach a decision on the registration of trade unions and after which, in the absence of a decision, legal personality is deemed to have been obtained. The Committee notes the Government's repeated indication in its latest report that in practice registration procedures are carried out without any delay and that, if they fall short of the legal documentary requirements, applicants are asked to remedy the matter and are entitled to appeal. The Department of Trade Union Organizations has 15 days within which to respond and, if it issues a favourable opinion within that period, the Ministry of Labour issues its decision as soon as possible thereafter, and in any event within one month of the report being issued. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the issue raised by the Committee, in addition to being superseded in practice, is no longer valid in relation to the law, as the General Act on the public administration provides that, where the statutory time limits are not respected, those concerned may appeal to the respective higher authority. The Committee previously invited the Government to have these deadlines set out explicitly in Bill No. 13475 and notes the Government's indication in its latest report that it has forwarded a copy of this request to the President of the Legislative Commission. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this respect.

Submission of legislative matters to a joint commission in the National Assembly. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report of its complete readiness and will to resolve the problems raised.

The Committee previously noted the initiatives taken by the high-level mission with a view to expediting the draft texts submitted to the Legislative Assembly on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts and that, when attending a special session of the Higher Labour Council (a dialogue body composed of some of the most important representatives of trade unions and employers and the Minister of Labour), the mission consulted its members and it was agreed unanimously to call on the Legislative Assembly to establish a joint commission with the technical assistance of the ILO to examine the Bill to reform labour procedures. It was also resolved that the Council would examine the other draft texts pending on labour matters with a view to studying them and facilitating their passage to the extent to which consensus was achieved.

The Committee hopes that the above joint commission in the National Assembly will address all pending matters without delay. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government has requested the technical assistance of the ILO to ascertain the conformity of the Bill to reform labour procedures (No. 15990) with the principles of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and it suggests that such assistance should be provided as soon as the joint commission is established in the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee once again emphasizes that the pending matters raise important issues relating to the application of the Convention. Taking into account the various ILO missions that have visited the country over the years and the gravity of the problems, the Committee hopes to be in a position to note substantial progress in the near future in both law and practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this matter in its next report.

Comments by trade union organizations. The Committee noted previously that the Union of Public and Private Enterprise Workers (SITEPP) indicates that the unionization rate in the country is only 2.5 per cent in the private sector and that the commitments made to the ILO over many years relating to the draft legislation submitted to the Legislative Assembly have only been vain promises. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the unionization rate is 9.37 per cent. The Committee requests the Government to provide official statistical data on the number of trade unions and higher level organizations (in the public and private sectors) and the number of trade union members. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the previous comments of the ITUC referring to acts of violence against the premises of a trade union and death threats against a trade union leader. The Committee notes that it consists of a criminal matter (and not unfair labour practices), and that the judicial authorities are competent as the matter relates to acts of common vandalism.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the ITUC's communication, dated 26 August 2009 and particularly on: (1) its allegation that in the event of a strike the unions are required to provide the names of the strikers; (2) its statement that unions are practically non-existent in the private sector; (3) the alleged unlawful arrest of a trade union leader in the construction sector; and (4) the violation of the Act by prohibiting trade union activities by solidarist associations in certain banana and pineapple ranches.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the report of the High-level Mission that visited Costa Rica in October 2006, and Cases Nos 2490 and 2518, examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which confirmed that a large number of trade unionists had been dismissed. The Committee took note of the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), the Petroleum, Chemical and Allied Workers' Union (SITRAPEQUIA) and the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprises (UCCAEP). The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments in the CTRN's communication of 12 September 2008. Lastly, it notes the discussion on the application of the Convention that took place in June 2009 in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

Slowness and ineffectiveness of procedures regarding complaints and compensation in the event of anti-union acts. The Committee noted that, according to the High-level Mission that visited the country in 2006, the proceedings in cases of anti-union discrimination are so slow that it takes at least four years to obtain a final ruling. The Committee notes that in its comments the ITUC states that the problem still exists. The employers' organization UCCAEP states that legislative and judicial treatment of anti-union discrimination is satisfactory, and points out that the criticism of Costa Rican law has mostly been levelled at the slow proceedings for complaints claiming cancellation of dismissals of trade union leaders, and that work has been done to improve matters, particularly through a Bill to reform labour procedures currently on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee notes the Government's statements to the effect that: (1) discussion of the legislation being developed under the Free Trade Agreement, signed by Central America, the Dominican Republic and the United States, has delayed discussion of the Bill to reform labour procedures in the Legislative Assembly but, because the Executive called for discussion of the Bill at the first meeting of the Assembly's extraordinary plenary session (August 2009), at which the Executive determines the order of agenda items, the Bill to reform labour procedures (which addresses the problem of slow proceedings in cases of anti-union acts and strengthens the right to collective bargaining in the public sector) is the second item on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly's Legal Affairs Committee (whose subcommittee was attended by three deputies, the President of the Second Chamber, a representative of the Ministry of Labour and representatives of employers' and workers' organizations); (2) the Bill, which also had the backing of the Higher Labour Council (a national tripartite body), introduces oral proceedings, strengthens protection against anti-union acts and is the outcome of ILO technical assistance; (3) furthermore, Bill No. 13475 to reform various provisions of the Labour Code, Act No. 2 of 27 August 1943, and sections 10, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of Decree No. 832 of 4 November 1949, and the amendments thereto is high on the agenda of the Assembly's plenary session; the aim of this initiative is to strengthen trade union activity in the country through amendments to the Labour Code that contribute to the establishment of unions in private enterprises and to compliance with ILO international standards; the deputies are aware that this proposal forms part of the Government's commitments still outstanding in the ILO, yet the Executive has placed adoption of the Bill to reform labour procedures higher on the plenary agenda, because it is broader and more inclusive than the provisions of Bill No. 13475.

The Committee further notes the information from the Government to the effect that various training activities have been conducted in connection with the problems pointed out by the Committee of Experts and have included judges, deputies and employers' and workers' organizations.

The Government adds that in 2008 the Judiciary had some 22,563 new labour-related cases before it, but completed 27,936 out of a total case load of 30,029. It can be inferred from this that the Judiciary has significantly shortened the average length of the proceedings in labour cases, and has reduced the case load. It is also pursuing a programme to deal with the backlog of cases, the aim being to develop a new system to improve the response and running of the administration of justice. To this end, a process has begun to reorganize the supernumerary judges' programme by switching from an office-based scheme for the distribution of judges to a centralized scheme consisting of groups, each with a maximum of 20 judges and a work programme geared to providing assistance to offices with workloads that exceed their normal capacity; between the start-up of this programme in 2001, and 2008, 46,398 cases were received, in 38,209 of which there have been judgements, and in 8,189 of which files have been returned and matters have been settled from which it can be inferred that 82.3 per cent of the cases submitted were resolved by judges belonging to the abovementioned programme. Specifically, in 2008 the annual average of cases received was 5,799, with an annual average of 4,776 cases judged. In order to strengthen the justice administration system even further, the Supreme Court of Justice, at a plenary sitting held on Monday, 12 March 2007, approved the establishment of the Conciliation Centre of the Judiciary, which promotes flexible, informal and effective judicial mechanisms; in the course of 2008, in the various chambers of the abovementioned Conciliation Centre, 3,505 conciliation hearings were held and 2,606 agreements were reached, in other words conciliation agreements were reached in 74.35 per cent of the cases heard. The Government further indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security is also engaged in strengthening alternative methods of administrative dispute settlement, and that through the Alternative Dispute Settlement Centre (RAC) of the Ministry's Labour Relations Department, in 2008 and the first quarter of 2009 the number of persons heard rose to 8,738, with an average of 2,815 applications for conciliation hearings.

The Committee welcomes the actions and initiatives referred to by the Government that are described in the above paragraphs, particularly in the light of the Government's previous report stating that in 2005 there were 38 cases of complaints of anti-union discrimination. There is no doubt that the general improvement in the administration of justice and the efficiency of proceedings will likewise have a positive effect on cases of anti-union practices. The Committee nonetheless notes that the Government has not assessed the impact of the general improvements in the administration of justice on proceedings relating to trade union actions, where the main problem is that owing to appeals and constitutional complaints (recursos de amparo), it can take years for a decision to be handed down. Nor has the Government provided information on the number of instances where penalties were imposed for breach of the labour legislation on trade union rights, and the number of decisions in such cases that have become final, as well as the length of the proceedings.

The Committee hopes that the Bill to reform labour procedures will be adopted in the near future and asks the Government to provide the text of the future Act as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee notes with regret, however, that Bill No. 13475 to reform various provisions of the Labour Code and other legal texts has not as yet been discussed although it is high on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly's plenary session, and requests the Government to take steps to move the processing of the Bill forward, and to provide information in this regard. The Committee recalls that, at its session of June 2009, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards asked the Government to submit, this year, a detailed time schedule of steps taken and future steps so that the legislative reforms were made a reality, and expressed the hope that the bills upon which tripartite consensus has been reached would be adopted without delay.

Submission of collective bargaining to criteria of proportionality and rationality. In its case law, the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice had ruled unconstitutional a significant number of clauses in collective agreements in the public sector, at the instigation of public authorities (Citizens' Ombudsman, General Prosecutor of the Republic) or one or another political party.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that SITRAPEQUIA and the CTRN emphasized the seriousness of the problem of collective bargaining in the public sector and the constraints placed on public employers by the Committee on Negotiation Policy. It further noted that the CTRN and the country's other confederations held the view that the long delay in the adoption of the bills to amend the legislation and ratify the Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151), and the Collective Bargaining Convention, 1981 (No. 154) (which resulted from a tripartite agreement), demonstrates a lack of interest in moving forward.

The Committee observes that the Government referred to statements it had made in previous reports to the effect that: (1) the Government possesses the will and commitment to resolve the problems raised by the Committee of Experts; (2) it has requested the ILO's technical assistance and trusts that this will enable it to overcome the problems raised; (3) the Government's efforts (many of them supported by tripartite agreement) to solve these problems have included the submission of several legislative proposals to the Legislative Assembly and their reconsideration: a draft constitutional amendment (of article 192), a Bill on collective bargaining in the public sector and the addition of a subsection (5) to section 112 of the General Act on Public Administration (the three initiatives are intended to strengthen collective bargaining in the public sector); a draft amendment to the chapter of the Labour Code on freedom of association; approval of ILO Conventions Nos 151 and 154; (4) the Government's efforts have also included other types of initiatives in legal actions of unconstitutionality brought in order to annul specific clauses in the agreements; (5) the present Government has the will to push forward draft legislation to resolve pending problems and has maintained contact with the Executive – including the Ministry of the Presidency – and parliament (deputies from various parties as well as the leaders of the principal opposition party which also supports the reforms sought by the ILO) for the re-examination of the draft texts in question. The Government states that it has sent reports to the judiciary forwarding the observations and position of the Committee of Experts. The Government lays emphasis on the follow-up meetings held by the Minister of Labour and Social Security, on occasion with the technical assistance of the ILO Subregional Office, with this assistance including the gathering of information on matters relating to Conventions Nos 151 and 154 on collective bargaining. The Government adds that a meeting was held with various representatives of all the sectors involved (the authorities, civil society, etc.) to analyse and seek consensus for the bill to reform labour procedures which is on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee requested the Government to provide information on developments regarding the draft legislation that has been under examination by the Legislative Assembly for years and which is intended to achieve greater efficiency and speed in the procedures for collective bargaining in the public sector, and on any developments regarding the Supreme Court of Justice's case law on this matter.

The Committee notes that, at its session of June 2009, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards took note of the Government's commitment to create a bipartisan congressional committee with participation of all the State Powers and the social partners to promote the adoption of the bills that had tripartite support, with ILO technical assistance. The Committee recalls in this connection that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards expressed the firm hope that in the very near future it would be able to note considerable progress in the application of the Convention, and trusted that the bills upon which tripartite consensus had been reached would be adopted without delay. It likewise trusted that the report due this year for examination by the Committee of Experts would include a copy of the bills so that the Committee of Experts could verify their conformity with the Convention. It asked the Government to submit, this year, a detailed time schedule of steps taken and future steps so that the legislative reforms were made a reality.

The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government reiterates many of its earlier statements, and indicates that the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite advisory body) agreed to analyse the bills relating to collective bargaining issues to determine which of them can be promoted on a tripartite basis, and that they include the bills relating to ILO Conventions Nos 151 and 154. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the bill to reform labour procedure – which has tripartite support – is the second item on the agenda of the Legal Affairs Committee of the Legislative Assembly and that it aims, among other things, to strengthen the right to collective bargaining in the public sector. According to the Government, the Bill on the collective negotiation of collective agreements in the public sector, and the addition of a subsection (5) to section 112 of the General Act of Public Administration, is currently under examination. It was referred by the Legal Affairs Committee for consideration by the Special Commission on Human Rights. It is currently item No. 14 on the latter's agenda. A legal report on the bill has been submitted by the Technical Services Department of the Legislative Assembly and it is expected that the deputies will move to have it discussed in ordinary sittings. As to the other bills and the ILO Conventions relating to freedom of association and collective bargaining, the Government indicates that, as soon as circumstances allow, they will be submitted to the Legislative Assembly, bearing in mind that these are matters pending for the Government which are of vital importance to strengthening the trade union rights of men and women workers in Costa Rica. The Committee notes with regret that discussion of the bills has again delayed.

According to the UCCAEP, the bill in question deals satisfactorily with collective bargaining in the public sector. The Government states that it is attaching copies of the bills as requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference. However, these texts have not been received and it is therefore not possible to verify their consistency with the Convention, as the Conference Committee asked.

It is with regret that the Committee must take note of this statement, in view of the fact that in previous years it was informed that these bills, which aimed to strengthen collective bargaining in the public sector, and most particularly those relating to ratification of Conventions Nos 151 and 154, had tripartite support and had already been submitted several times to the Legislative Assembly. The Committee asks the Government to do everything in its power to ensure that the bills to strengthen the right to collective bargaining in the public sector, including those relating to the ratification of Conventions Nos 151 and 154 are examined and, it is to be hoped, adopted by the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee also takes note of the information sent by the Government concerning developments in the case law since it last examined the application of the Convention, regarding relevant judicial decisions cancelling collective agreements on the basis of “criteria of proportionality and rationality”.

The Government states in particular that it views with optimism the developments regarding the issue of the cancelling by judicial bodies of clauses in collective agreements, and sees these developments as a positive outcome since there have been significant changes in the practical effect given to Convention No. 98 in recent years, owing to intense training and information activities that it has been carrying out with technical assistance from the ILO. The Government also expresses the view that it sees as positive the advances in the case law of the Second Chamber of the Supreme Court of Justice, the highest court dealing with labour matters. Time and again in its decisions, the Chamber has risen fully to the challenge set by the constitutional case law, finding collective agreements in the public sector to be constitutional. Furthermore, in its case law the Chamber cites not only the ILO Conventions that Costa Rica has ratified but also Conventions it has not ratified, such as Conventions Nos 151 and 154, as well as citing the ILO’s 1998 Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work and recalling that freedom of association and the right to organize, and effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are established in the abovementioned instrument as fundamental rights to be applied by all member States of that Organization; it also confirms that Convention No. 98, along with the rights laid down in the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, not only take precedence over the law, but would be divided of their substance if exemption from the right to collective bargaining were to become the rule.

The Second Chamber thus finds that allowing collective bargaining is the rule and to restrict it the exception. In support of its finding, the Chamber cites Executive Decree No. 29576 of 31 May 2001 regulating the negotiation of collective agreements in the public sector. This decision, along with the dissenting opinions of the Constitutional Chamber, which the High-level Mission noted, together with the Second Chamber’s acceptance of the Regulations on collective bargaining in the public sector, are important legal events which could not only reduce but ultimately preclude the challenging of approved clauses in collective agreements, which might be the beginning of a ius laboris approach to analysis of an issue that has been dominated in recent years by administrative law scholars. But there are other positive cases where the Constitutional Chamber itself has found against appeals challenging public sector collective agreements as unconstitutional, as in Decision No. 2005-6858 of 1 June 2005.

The dissenting opinions of the Constitutional Chamber, referred to in the previous report (2008), which were noted by the High-level Mission, and the Second Chamber’s acceptance of the Regulations on collective bargaining in the public sector, are important legal events which could preclude any future appeals against approved clauses in collected agreements, which could be the beginning of a ius laboris approach to analysis of an issue which has for years been dominated by scholars of administrative law. This, says the Government, would increase the Costa Rican Government’s interest in overcoming the shortcomings pointed out by the Committee of Experts, for which it trusts that there will be international cooperation and technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee welcomes these developments in the case law and infers from the foregoing that in 2008–09 there has been no further cancelling of clauses in collective agreements, and requests the Government to provide information on any new developments.

The Committee also welcomes the training for members of the three Powers of State and the social partners, referred to by the Government, and appreciates in particular the forthcoming workshop on collective bargaining in the public sector, which is to include an up to date study on developments on constitutional case law and the strengths and weaknesses of the existing regulations; information on this will be sent to the Committee.

The Committee recalls that, although there may be instances of serious breach of constitutional rights in certain clauses of agreements, it is normal and usual for collective agreements to provide favourable treatment for trade union members, particularly as many such agreements arise in the context of a collective dispute in which both parties make concessions, there is nothing preventing non-unionized from joining one or another union if they are seeking more favourable treatment, and in any event collective bargaining, as an instrument for social peace, cannot be repeatedly subjected to recurrent scrutiny as to constitutionality, without losing its credibility and enormous usefulness. In other words, undue recourse to constitutional challenge is to be avoided.

With regard to SITRAPEQUIA's comments on the constraints that the Committee on Policy Negotiation places in practice on negotiation procedures in the public sector, the Committee asks the Government to refer this matter to the Higher Labour Council and to ask the latter and other relevant public authorities to undertake a thorough examination of the working of the current system, it being understood that state resources are not unlimited and that the Government has many social needs to meet.

With regard to the tripartite assessment requested by the Committee of Experts, relating to the high proportion of agreements concluded directly with non-unionized workers in relation to collective agreements, and which the Committee had asked to be carried out in the light of the report of an independent technical expert, the ITUC states that most such direct agreements are promoted by employers and that as a result the number of collective agreements in the private sector has been reduced to a minimum. The employers' organization UCCAEP states that all parties have drawn attention to the importance of standing workers' committees and the protection that arises for them pursuant to the Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135), ratified by Costa Rica, and it is clear that this is a reality in Costa Rica which has acted as a means of guaranteeing freedom, democracy and social peace and that to eliminate standing workers' committees or direct agreements is to overlook and abuse the right of workers to associate freely and settle their disputes peacefully and through dialogue.

The Committee welcomes the Government's statement that it placed the abovementioned expert report on the agenda of the Higher Labour Council's meeting of 30 April 2008; the meeting of 26 June 2008 re-examined the need for an analysis of the report, which proved owing to discussion of other items. The Government states that only collective bargaining has constitutional rank and that an administrative directive of 4 May 1991 bans the labour inspectorate from looking into the content of a direct agreement when there is an established union, so that when there is such a union the direct agreement must be rejected outright. The Committee notes that the Government is aware of the need to reactivate as soon as possible the tripartite study of the content of the expert report and hopes to be able to report on progress when discussions are resumed in the Higher Labour Council.

Lastly, the Government indicates that, in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, it sought ILO technical assistance to prevent standing committees of workers (non-unionized) and direct agreements (with non-unionized workers) from having any anti-union impact in practice, as pointed out by the independent expert. The Government states that the matter is complex and hopes that in the near future there will be an agreed-upon proposal for a satisfactory solution to the situation noted by the independent expert.

The Committee recalls that the independent expert pointed out a little over two years ago that there were 74 direct agreements in force whereas only 13 collective agreements remained. Lastly, the Committee recalls that at its meeting of June 2009 the Conference Committee asked the Government to submit this year a detailed time schedule of steps taken and future steps, so that the legislative reforms would be made a reality.

The Committee hopes to receive information on a tripartite approach to the problem of direct agreements with non-unionized workers in the light of the expert report, and of any other satisfactory solution proposed, including measures to promote collective bargaining with existing organizations of workers and to avoid direct agreements being used for anti-union purposes, which is to be presumed where a representative trade union already exists.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that it is fully disposed and willing to resolve the abovementioned problems. The Committee noted previously the initiatives taken by the High-level Mission to promote the bills submitted to the Legislative Assembly that pertain to the issues raised by the Committee of Experts, and that, at a special meeting of the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite body) that it attended, the Mission consulted the members and agreed unanimously to request the Legislative Assembly to set up a joint committee with ILO technical assistance for the processing of the bill to reform labour procedure. The Committee expresses the hope that the abovementioned joint committee in the Legislative Assembly will be established without delay and will take up the issues pending. It requests the Government to provide information in this regard. It notes that the Government has requested ILO technical assistance in ascertaining the consistency of the text of the Bill to reform labour procedure (No. 15990) with the principles of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, and suggests that such assistance be provided as soon as the Joint Committee is set up in the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee again points out that the issues pending raise important problems regarding the application of the Convention. Bearing in mind the various ILO missions that had visited the country over the years and the seriousness of the problems, it expresses the hope that it will be in a position to note significant progress in the near future in both the legislation and practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Union of Public and Private Enterprise Workers (SITEPP) on the application of the convention. The Committee also notes the comments of the Costa Rican Federation of Chambers and Associations of Private Enterprises (UCCAEP). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

In its previous observations the Committee noted that the number of protected trade union representatives was small (section 365 of the Labour Code – one leader for the first 20 unionized workers and one for every additional 25 up to a maximum of four) and expressed the view that it would be appropriate to extend protection to a larger number of representatives without prejudice to satisfactory general protection for all workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. In view of the fact that the Government has not sent any observations on this matter, the Committee urges the Government to examine this issue in the Higher Labour Council (a tripartite national body).

The Committee also previously noted a draft Act before the Legislative Assembly to extend and improve protection against anti-union discrimination. It noted that the draft Act, which fully addresses acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, provides for rapid procedures prior to dismissal which have to be undertaken by the employer, for summary proceedings before the judicial authorities, with compulsory time limits to ascertain the reasons for the dismissal, and for severe penalties for refusal to reinstate the worker where justified grounds are not found to exist. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft Act contains two key components: (1) establishing expeditious (summary) proceedings in the administrative and judicial bodies with the purpose of establishing whether or not the challenged dismissal complies with the law; and (2) ensuring that the legislation promotes the harmonious and orderly development of the labour sector and its representatives. The draft Act is high on the legislative agenda. The Government adds that in 2005 the Executive Authority submitted a draft Act to the Legislative Assembly on procedural reforms in labour legislation containing a special chapter which governs special procedures taking into account the protection of trade union immunity and the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies. The abovementioned draft Act (file No. 15990) has been under examination since June 2009 by a new subcommittee, which meets on a weekly basis, and was included on the agenda of extraordinary meetings of the Legislative Assembly held from 1 to 31 August 2009. The Committee expresses the hope that the draft Act on labour reform will be approved in the near future and will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the Act, once it has been adopted. The Committee also underlines the importance of the prompt adoption, by means of expeditious procedures, of the draft Act defining anti-union acts. The Committee reminds the Government that this draft Act has received tripartite support and, taking into account the cases of dismissals of union leaders examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association in recent years, urges the Government to take steps to ensure that it is discussed and adopted in the Legislative Assembly.

Croatia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the 2007 International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) comments concerning the right to strike as well as the imposition of sanctions against strikers in specific cases mentioned by the ITUC. In this instance, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the law prescribes that trade unions and their higher level associations have the right to call and undertake a strike in order to protect and promote the economic and social interests of their members or on the ground of non-payment of salary or salary compensation within 30 days of their maturity date, and that a worker may be dismissed only if he or she organized or participated in a strike which was not organized in compliance with the law, collective agreement or trade union rules, or if in the course of a strike he or she commits some other grave violation of a labour contract. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, as regards the cited cases of strikers dismissed, the Government indicates that those cases were before the courts and that it would send the relevant court decisions.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on the issue of the distribution of trade union assets. In this respect, it had urged the Government to determine the criteria for the division of trade union assets, in consultation with workers' organizations, and to fix a specific time frame for completing the division of the property. Noting that the Government has not provided information in regard to this matter, the Committee once again urges the Government to undertake the abovementioned measures and to indicate developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 26 August 2009 with regard to violations of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1991)

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009 which refer, inter alia, to excess court delays in dealing with cases of anti-union discrimination. The Government indicates, in this respect, that Parliament has adopted a judicial reform strategy and legislative steps have been taken to improve the functioning of the judicial system. Furthermore, a comprehensive process of reform has been initiated to, inter alia, enhance the efficiency of the judicial process and reduce the backlog of cases. There has thus far been a 35.5 per cent reduction in the backlog of cases before the municipal courts. The Government also states that a pilot project on mediation in courts, which offers an alternative means of dispute resolution, is being implemented and has shown positive results. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to inform it of the progress made with respect to the measures referred to.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations on the ITUC's comment according to which the Act on salaries in public services also limits collective bargaining rights in the public sector by setting coefficients for the workplace, with the result that public sector workers can negotiate on their basic salaries only.

The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's allegation that the Act on the realization of the government's budget of 1993 allows the Government to modify the substance of a collective agreement in the public sector for financial reasons, and had requested the Government to provide a copy of the legislative provisions allowing the Government to modify the substance of collective agreements in the public service and to provide information on their application in practice. The Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no information respecting this matter. Recalling that, in general, a legal provision which allows one party to modify unilaterally the content of signed collective agreements is contrary to the principles of collective bargaining, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the said legislative provisions, as well as information on their application in practice.

Cuba

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 26 August 2009 and those of the Independent National Confederation of Cuba (CONIC) (of which the Government contests the trade union status) of 10 August 2009. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to these comments.

Trade union rights and civil liberties

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to take the necessary measures for the immediate release of trade union members and leaders sentenced to terms of imprisonment of between 12 and 26 years for treason and conspiracy. The Committee notes the regret expressed by the Government that account has not been taken of the replies that it has provided and reiterates the comments made on previous occasions. The Government emphasizes that there are no trade unionists who are imprisoned, persecuted or under threat in Cuba for the fact of being trade union members, and denies that property belonging to trade union organizations has been confiscated. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it noted that, according to the Government: (1) none of those convicted were trade union leaders as, by their own decision, they had had no employment relationship for several years; (2) those sentenced were engaged in activities to overthrow the political, economic and social system decided upon by the Cuban people and enshrined in the Constitution; (3) the responsibility of all of them was proven for actions that amounted to crimes intended to undermine the sovereignty of the nation and they were penalized under section 91 of the Penal Code and Act No. 88 of 1999 to protect the national independence and economy of Cuba; (4) none of them were convicted or sentenced for exercising or defending freedom of opinion or expression; (5) all of them had taken action prejudicial to the human rights of the Cuban people, and particularly against the exercise of their rights to free determination, development and peace; (6) at the present time, most of those convicted remain in prison serving the corresponding sentences, although some of them have benefited from extra-penal leave for humanitarian reasons; and (7) the human dignity and physical and psychological integrity of those convicted have been rigorously respected, and the detainees have received in prison the full benefits available to the entire prison population in Cuba.

In this respect, the Committee notes with concern that in its 2009 comments CONIC refers to the deplorable conditions of detention suffered by trade unionists who are still detained (including physical punishment, ill treatment and threats). While emphasizing that the Committee on Freedom of Association also examined these convictions and called for the release of the convicted leaders, the Committee reiterates its previous observations and recalls that freedom of industrial association is only one aspect of freedom of association in general, which must itself form part of the whole range of basic civil liberties, all interdependent and mutually complementary, which were enumerated by the Conference in the resolution of 1970 and consist in particular of: (a) the right to freedom and security of person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention; (b) freedom of opinion and expression and in particular freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media irregardless; (c) freedom of assembly; (d) the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal; and (e) the right to protection of the property of trade union organizations. In these conditions, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to release the trade union members and leaders sentenced to severe penalties of imprisonment, investigate the allegations of the CONIC and, if they are found to be true, punish those who committed such acts.

The Committee also requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the ITUC, of 28 August 2007, which referred to other specific cases of the detention of workers who are members of the CONIC, persecution and threats of imprisonment against delegates of the Light Industry Workers' Union (SITIL), the confiscation of materials and humanitarian aid sent from abroad to the Single Council of Cuban Workers (CUTC, the trade union status of which is contested by the Government). The Committee notes that the ITUC adds in its latest comments, of 26 August 2009, that four leaders of the CUTC who had been convicted have been released and expelled from the country, but that five others remain in prison. The Committee further notes that the CONIC refers (in its comments of 10 August 2009) to: (1) the arrest between 18 and 24 February 2009 of 14 members of the CONIC; (2) the disappearance on 24 February 2009 of a leader of the CONIC; and (3) the intimidation by the public authorities of trade union leaders of the CONIC, of the Independent Union “William Le Santé” and of the Independent Union of Light Industries so that they refrain from participating in trade union activities.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in this respect that the persons mentioned are not trade union leaders and do not enjoy any representative status; the acts with which they were charged were duly proven with all the guarantees of due process set out in the Cuban legislation; they committed offences set out in Cuban legislation and were duly tried and sentenced by courts of law; none of them were tried or sentenced for exercising or defending trade union rights and the responsibility of all of them was proven in acts classified as crimes directly intended to undermine the sovereignty of the Nation. The Government adds that neither the CUTC nor the CONIC are trade unions and denies that the leaders released were expelled from the country, but indicates that they were freed for humanitarian reasons and travelled of their own free will to other countries. With regard to the communication of the CONIC in 2009, the Government indicates that it contains unfounded allegations which amount to a political manoeuvre intended to misinform the world’s trade unionists and project an image of division among Cuban workers, discrediting the Cuban trade union movement and its achievements. The above organization does not associate workers and its few members are not covered by any labour relationship, nor do they represent any sector of workers. It adds that in Cuba there are no restrictions or prohibitions on the exercise of trade union rights. Cuban workers enjoy one of the most complete and rigorous systems of the protection of labour and trade union rights. The Government indicates that it will provide the Committee with further information so that it can make a comprehensive and impartial assessment. The Committee notes the contradictory nature of the ITUC’s comments and the Government’s reply. Under these conditions, taking into account the very high number of allegations relating to human rights and civil liberties, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the court rulings to which it refers in its report.

Legislative matters

In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government’s indication that the process of revising the Labour Code was continuing. The Committee expressed the hope that the revision of the Labour Code would be completed in the near future and would take into account its comments. The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its report that the legislation that is in force is being maintained and that a process has recently been commenced of changes in the structure and operation of the bodies of the Central State Administration, and that efforts are being made to further improve institutions and their effectiveness. On 2 March 2009 an important restructuring was carried out of various central bodies and the examination is continuing of the current structure and operation of the Government, which is inevitably having an impact on the country’s legislative programme. The Government adds that the process of consultation and the updating of the Labour Code is being continued in accordance with current programmes. In this respect, the Committee hopes that the revision of the Labour Code will be completed in the near future and that the comments that it has made on the application of the Convention, which are examined below, will be taken into account. The Committee reminds the Government that the technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal and requests it to provide a copy of the draft Labour Code to which it refers.

Trade union monopoly

Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention. For many years, the Committee has been referring to the need to delete the reference to the Confederation of Cuban Workers from sections 15 and 16 of the Labour Code of 1985. The Committee notes the Government’s reiterated indication that the legislation in force and everyday practice in all work units guarantee the full exercise of trade union activities and the broadest application of the right to organize. According to the Government, the representation of workers is exercised at different levels and in different decision-making bodies by national sectoral unions and the Confederation which, by decision of the workers themselves, as adopted in their assemblies, constitutes the expression of the desire for the unity of the Cuban trade union movement. The existence of a single trade union confederation was not imposed by the Government, nor does it correspond to any provision that is not the expression of the sovereign will of Cuban workers. The application of the Convention in practice is guaranteed by legal provisions establishing that “all workers, both manual and intellectual, shall be entitled, without previous authorization, to organization voluntarily and to establish trade union organizations”. These rights are guaranteed in practice by the existence of 19 national sectoral unions with their municipal and provincial structures and in 169 municipal areas and 14 provinces, which gather together around 110,000 trade union chapters and first-level unions. In each labour unit, there are one or more trade union chapters. Their leaders are elected by the workers themselves. In each labour unit collective labour agreements are concluded between the administration and the trade union organization and are approved in workers’ assemblies, where the workers are able to make suggestions and express opinions on the matters contained in the agreements. The Government adds that neither the Labour Code that is in force, nor the supplementary legislation, provide for restrictions on the establishment of trade unions. All Cuban workers have the right to establish and freely join trade union organizations without previous authorization. The Government reiterates that section 15 of the Labour Code reaffirms the essential provisions of Article 3 of the Convention. The statutes, rules and principles governing the activity of the 19 national sectoral unions and the Confederation of Cuban Workers, in which they are federated of their own will, are discussed and approved in their own congresses, and there is no provision in law setting standards relating to trade union structure. The Committee is nevertheless bound to emphasize once again that trade union pluralism must remain possible in all cases and that the law must not institutionalize a factual monopoly by referring to a specific trade union confederation; even in a situation where at some point all workers have preferred to unify the trade union movement, they should still remain free to choose to set up unions outside the established structures should they so wish and to join the organization of their own choosing (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 96). Under these conditions, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, are able to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee further requests the Government to take measures to amend the above sections of the Labour Code and to provide information in its next report on any measure adopted in this respect.

Article 3. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the need to amend section 61 of Legislative Decree No. 67 of 1983, which confers upon the Confederation of Cuban Workers the monopoly to represent the workers of the country on government bodies. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the workers who are members of each union put forward and elect their leaders at the various levels, from first-level workers' assemblies, up to the respective congresses which are held periodically, in complete compliance with the strictest trade union democracy. The trade union representatives democratically elected by the workers participate with broad powers in management boards, where the decisions are taken which affect them, both at the basic enterprise level, and in the bodies and institutions of the State administration. The Government adds that work is being carried out on the restructuring and operation of various bodies of the Central State Administration and the structure of the Government as a whole. The Committee firmly hopes that, in the context of the studies that are being conducted into the structure and functioning of the State administration, the Government will amend in the near future section 61 of Legislative Decree No. 67 of 1983 so as to guarantee trade union pluralism, for example by replacing the reference to the Confederation of Cuban Workers by the expression "the most representative organization".

Right to strike

For many years, the Committee has been referring to the absence of recognition of the right to strike in the legislation and the prohibition of its exercise in practice and it requested the Government to take measures to ensure that no one suffers discrimination or prejudice in their employment for having peacefully exercised this right, and to keep it informed in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's repeated indication that Cuban legislation does not establish any prohibition on the right to strike, nor does the legislation establish any penalty for the exercise of this right, and that it is the prerogative of trade union organizations to take the respective decisions. If, at some point, Cuban workers decided to have recourse to strike action, nothing could prevent them from doing so. The Government adds that the claim that certain rights of workers who advocate in many countries recourse to the circumstantial mechanism of strike action, has in practice been superseded in industrial relations in Cuba by the existence and use of other more effective mechanisms for the exercise of their rights, to which workers systematically have recourse through their multiple forms of effective participation and the exercise of real decision-making power in the matters that affect them, which cannot be considered a limitation or prohibition of the right to strike. In the various institutionalized forms of participation by workers and their representatives in the resolution of disputes and in decision-making procedures, trade union representatives enjoy broad capacities and mandates. Cuban workers are the beneficiaries of participatory and democratic social dialogue at all decision-making levels, and an approach of collaboration rather than conflict has been developed, which has led to improvements in the level of wages, social security benefits and safety and health measures, among other matters, and in the continuous development of their capacities. Trade union representatives participate in all the processes for the preparation of labour and social security legislation and on many occasions draft texts are referred for consultation to workers' assemblies in work units. The Committee recalls that the Convention does not require the adoption of legal provisions to regulate the right to strike provided that this right may be exercised in practice without organizations and participants being at risk of the imposition of penalties. The Committee further recalls that almost all States have opted for the explicit recognition and/or regulation of the right to strike. The Committee therefore invites the Government, with a view to safeguarding the legal security of workers who decide to have recourse to strike action, to consider, in the context of the current legislative reform to which the Government refers, the adoption of provisions explicitly recognizing the right to strike and the fundamental principles indicated by the Committee (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 136–179).

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the comments of the Independent National Confederation of Cuba (CONIC) (the trade union status of which is contested by the Government), dated 10 August 2009, and the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 26 August 2009, referring to matters that are already under examination. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to these comments.

The Committee further notes the comments of the Workers' Central Union of Cuba (CTC), which were forwarded with the Government's report.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to the need to amend or repeal the following provisions to bring them into conformity with the Convention:

- Section 14 of Legislative Decree No. 229 on collective agreements and section 8 of its implementing regulations, which require any disputes that arise in the drafting phase of a collective labour agreement (including when first-level unions are concerned) to be referred to the highest levels of the parties concerned (Confederation of Workers of Cuba), with the participation of those affected.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the implementing regulations of Legislative Decree No. 229/2002 (Resolution No. 27 of 2 July 2002) have been repealed by Resolution No. 78/2008, issuing new implementing regulations. In this respect, the Committee notes that section 8 of the new Regulations, which amends section 8 of the previous Regulations, provides that where any disputes occur in the process of drafting, amending or revising the agreement, the parties may refer them to the respective higher levels or, where appropriate, to arbitration, during or after the negotiation phase, as applicable. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this wording confirms the voluntary nature and the total autonomy of the parties in the process of negotiating, amending or revising collective labour agreements in seeking solutions to disputes which may arise, as the procedure to be adopted has to be by common agreement between the parties, and that furthermore such a procedure is voluntary and not compulsory.

In this respect, the Committee expresses appreciation for this development; nevertheless, with a view to achieving greater legislative coherence and avoiding confusion, the Committee also requests the Government to amend section 14 of Legislative Decree No. 229 in the same manner as section 8 of the new implementing regulations, that is to ensure that any dispute during the process of the formulation of a collective labour agreement can be resolved with the intervention of the authorities and the Confederation of Workers of Cuba only where both parties to the dispute so request.

- Section 17 of Legislative Decree No. 229 and sections 9, 10 and 11 of its implementing regulations, which require any disputes that arise once the agreement has been concluded to be referred, when the conciliation procedure has been exhausted, for arbitration by the National Labour Inspection Office with the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and the parties concerned, with the decision that is adopted being binding.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that sections 9, 10 and 11 of the implementing regulations are null and void as they are totally repealed by the second final provision of the new implementing regulations of 2008.

The Committee nevertheless observes that section 17 of the Legislative Decree has not been amended. This provision establishes that "disputes which arise during the process of the formulation, amendment or revision of the collective labour agreement or while it is in force, concerning the interpretation of its provisions or failure to comply with its clauses, after the conciliation procedure described above has been exhausted, shall be submitted for arbitration to the National Labour Inspection Office with the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and the parties concerned. The final decision adopted shall be binding". In this respect, the Committee recalls once again that, except in the public service and in essential services in the strict sense of the term, compulsory arbitration by the authorities is contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements laid down in Convention No. 98 and, hence, contrary to the autonomy of the parties to bargaining. The Committee also considers that legislation which requires the referral of disputes relating to collective bargaining to the administrative authority, and which also provides for the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba, also raises problems of incompatibility with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take measures with a view to the amendment of section 17 of Legislative Decree No. 229 in order to ensure that where disputes arise between the parties in the process of collective bargaining, the interference or intervention of the authorities and the Confederation of Workers of Cuba is not imposed as an obligation and that, except in the public service and in essential services in the strict sense of the term, recourse to binding arbitration is only possible with the agreement of all the parties to the negotiations.

- Section 11 of Legislative Decree No. 229, which provides that "discussion of the draft labour collective agreement at a general assembly of workers shall proceed in accordance with the methodology determined for that purpose by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba".

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, in accordance with the principle of the independence and autonomy of trade unions, the Government cannot prevent trade unions from adopting the decisions that they consider appropriate. The Government refers to the comments sent by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba, according to which the workers, far from considering the participation of the CTC and its methodology in bargaining processes and the resolution of disputes as an undesired interference, perceives it as a benefit. The CTC adds that it is the workers who immediately refer matters to the CTC through its various bodies to obtain the necessary support and guidance for their claims and interests, which does not prejudice the will of the parties, but ensures the necessary guidance, without undermining the principal role played by first-level unions in negotiation. With regard to the methodology itself, the CTC indicates that it consists of the application of the law which assists the national trade union organization to guide and instruct its affiliates, which represent 95 per cent of the workers in the country. Furthermore, the methodology and the other instruments guiding this action are not imposed, but are analysed and discussed in the various bodies of the trade union movement at both the central and sectoral levels, and in many cases by the workers themselves.

The Committee nevertheless considers that, in the context of the monopoly trade union system of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba as set out by the legislation (see the observation on the application of Convention No. 87), section 11 imposes upon all trade union organizations a methodology for the discussion of draft collective agreements established by the Confederation which, when combined with the existence of overly detailed provisions on the manner in which negotiations are to be held, does not adequately promote free and voluntary collective negotiations within the meaning of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of Legislative Decree No. 229 by deleting the explicit reference to the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and ensuring the autonomy of the parties to collective bargaining.

- Section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 229 and section 3 of the implementing regulations, which provide that the National Labour Inspection Office shall approve the conclusion of collective labour agreements in the units provided for in the budget and in the production and service activities of bodies, sectors, branches and activities that share the same characteristics, when so agreed and requested by the head of the body and the Secretary-General of the corresponding federation.

The Committee observes that the former section 3 of the implementing regulations has been amended by the new regulations and that it no longer refers to this matter. With regard to section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 229, the Committee notes the Government's reiteration that: (1) the provision is of an exceptional nature and is only applied when so requested by common agreement between the head of the body and the corresponding trade union; (2) it does not apply to all sectors, nor to all the entities belonging to the same sector, but to small local service units with the same or similar characteristics in relation to working conditions; (3) the objective of the provision is to ensure that the collective agreements that are adopted in these units are specifically adapted to these specific characteristics; and (4) this procedure is not made compulsory in the legislation, but it is a possibility that is allowed when it is assessed by common agreement, and in exceptional cases requested by the parties.

The Committee recalls that in a previous report the Government indicated that the provision applied to units in the budget with similar characteristics, such as bakeries, schools, hairdressers, service centres and polyclinics. The Committee emphasizes that the law subjects the conclusion of collective agreements in a broad sector of activities to approval by the National Labour Inspection Office. More specifically, the text of section 5 provides that: "the units provided for in the budget and the production and service activities of bodies, sectors, branches and activities that share the same characteristics may, on an exceptional basis, conclude collective labour agreements, when this is advisable in view of the similarity or analogue nature of the working conditions, where so agreed by the head of the body and the corresponding national union with the prior approval of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security". The Committee considers that this situation is contrary to the principle of free and voluntary negotiation and once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 229 with a view to ensuring that full effect is given to the principle of free and voluntary negotiation.

Czech Republic

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and by the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned measures taken to increase the efficiency of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report an overall assessment of the effectiveness of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, including data on the number of complaints brought to the labour inspection and the courts, as well as the duration of proceedings and their outcome.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning cases of violation of the Convention. The Government is requested to send comments in reply to the observations made by the ITUC.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 1 of the Labour Code excluded from its scope of application magistrates, career officials in the state public services governed by the general conditions of service, and career employees and officials of the state public services governed by specific conditions of service. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the trade union rights of these categories of state employees. The Committee had also noted that, by virtue of section 56 of Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of the state public services, public officials and employees were affiliated automatically to the then Union of Workers of Zaire (UNTZA). However, pending the amendment of these conditions of service, the Minister for the Public Service had issued Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./105/94 of 13 January 1994 establishing provisional regulations respecting trade union activities within the public administration, amended by Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./0174/96 of 13 September 1996. The Committee had noted that, according to the Government, the reform of the public administration was under way and that it will bring about a revision of the conditions of service of career members of the state public services. The Committee trusts that the reform of the public administration will allow, as soon as possible, all state employees to benefit from the guarantees provided under the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate any new developments in this respect, in particular the repeal of section 56 of Act No. 81-003.

Article 3. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union elections were organized in various branches of activity and to provide specific information on the results of these elections. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress in the organization of trade union elections in other branches of activity and contain the results of these elections.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to the questions raised by the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo (CSC) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention.

The Committee had noted with interest that the Government stated that it intends to give effect to the Committee's recommendation to conduct an independent investigation in order to clarify the questions raised by the ITUC and by the CSC concerning: (1) acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in private enterprises (including threats of dismissal against union members despite the fact that section 234 of the Labour Code prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination); (2) the existence of many unions established and financed by employers; and (3) the failure to comply with collective agreements. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate the developments and conclusions of the independent investigation.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee noted previously that, according to the Government, the National Labour Council has not yet adopted the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. The Committee recalled that, although section 235 of the new Labour Code prohibits all acts of interference by organizations of employers and workers in each others' affairs, section 236 provides that acts of interference must be defined more precisely. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the effect that the National Labour Council has not yet taken a decision on the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. To that end, the Committee notes that the Government undertakes to provide a copy of the Order once it has been adopted. The Committee hopes that the Order concerned will be adopted as soon as possible and requests the Government to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee noted previously that section 1 of the Labour Code explicitly excludes from the Code career members of the state public services who are governed by the general conditions of service (Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of state public services and explicitly providing for the establishment of institutions ensuring the representation of the personnel) and career employees and officials of state public services who are governed by specific conditions of service. The CSC had indicated the existence of measures allowing the establishment of mechanisms for the promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government concerning the right of public employees not engaged in the administration of the state to engage in collective bargaining, and particularly: (1) the agreement of 11 September 1999 on basic wages concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration at a meeting of the joint committee; (2) the "social contract for innovation" of 12 February 2004 concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration; and (3) the agreement concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration following a strike by unions in the education sector in 2005. The Committee had concluded that, in practice, there were wage negotiations and agreements in the public sector.

The Committee observes that the Government has sent the text of Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/ar/NK/054 of 12 October 2004, establishing the procedures for the representation and recourse to elections of workers in enterprises or establishments of all types. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that it intends to regulate the salaries of public servants set by negotiated agreements in the context of the imminent reform of the public administration. In this regard, the Committee also notes the comment by the ITUC that the staff of decentralized entities (towns, territories and sectors), who comprise a subcategory of public servant, do not enjoy the right to bargain. The Committee reiterates its previous request to the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation guarantees the right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, as established under Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, and requests the Government to indicate the developments concerning the reform of the public administration.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the observations made by the ITUC and requests the Government to send its reply.

Denmark

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee recalls that in several of its previous observations, it requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that Danish trade unions may represent all their members – residents and non-residents employed on ships sailing under the Danish flag – without any interference from the public authorities, in accordance with Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention and whether, in particular, these unions may freely represent seafarers who are not Danish residents in respect of their individual grievances. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Government, in its report, indicates that the Danish International Ships Register (DIS) agreement states that seafarers not resident in Denmark working on board DIS ships have the right to be members of several trade unions (i.e. both a Danish trade union, and a trade union in their home country). This agreement enables the seafarers' contracting parties to represent a seafarer who is not domiciled in Denmark or a foreign trade union in matters relating to the Danish Legislation and assist seafarers without a Danish residence in relation to the Danish public authorities. The Committee requests the Government to include in its next report a copy of the DIS agreement.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1955)

Article 4 of the Convention. In several of its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 10 of Act No. 408 – the Danish International Ships Register Act (DIS) – has the effect of, on the one hand, restricting the scope of negotiable issues by Danish trade unions by excluding from their bargaining power seafarers working on ships under the Danish flag who are not Danish residents and, on the other hand, preventing these seafarers from freely choosing the organization they wish to represent their interests in the collective bargaining process.

In its previous report the Government had indicated that the framework agreement between the social partners – the agreements on mutual information, coordination and cooperation concerning DIS ships, concluded since 1997 – had been prolonged to 31 December 2007. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this agreement has been most recently renewed for an indefinite period.

The Government indicated that this prolongation had taken the form of two agreements of 16 January 2004 (collective agreement with protocol attached) and of 15 December 2005 (collective agreement with protocol incorporated). The Government indicated in its report that two unions representing seafarers of a lower rank had wished not to be parties to the agreements: the United Federation of Danish Workers (3F) and its branch organization, the Union of Danish Seafarers, and the Union of Restaurant Workers (RBF) which had from 1 July 2006 been part of 3F. The Government had also indicated that the agreements still dealt with the conditions for seafarers and contained objectives concerning employment of Danish seafarers at an internationally competitive level, training of Danish seafarers and coverage of collective agreements between Danish shipowners and foreign unions, etc.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the agreement also states that seafarers not resident in Denmark working onboard DIS ships have the right to be members of several trade unions (i.e. both a Danish trade union, and a trade union in their home country) and that this enables the seafarers' contracting parties to represent a seafarer not domiciled in Denmark or a foreign trade union in matters relating to the Danish legislation and assist seafarers without a Danish residence in relation to the Danish public authority. Additionally, the Government indicates that it has not received information that the collective agreements concerning wages and general working conditions on board Danish ships, regardless of whether they were concluded by Danish or foreign trade unions, were not at internationally acceptable levels.

In several of its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the agreements between the social partners, but observed that the legislative aspect of the matter had not been resolved and that two trade union organizations had again decided not to be bound by the new agreements. The Committee had underlined section 10 of Act No. 408 which has the effect of restricting the activities of Danish trade unions by prohibiting them from representing, in the collective bargaining process, those of their members who were not considered as residents in Denmark. Taking due note of the figures presented by the Government concerning the Danish shipping industry, and, in particular, that as of 2008, out of a total of 9,594 seafarers on DIS ships, 5,317 were foreigners and, stressing that this issue has been examined since 1989, the Committee requests, once again, the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 10 of Act No. 408 so that Danish trade unions may freely represent all their members – Danish residents and non-residents – working on ships sailing under the Danish flag in the collective bargaining process, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention.

Collective bargaining rights of majority organizations. This issue again relates to the application of section 12 of the Conciliation Act and had been raised in several previous comments following an examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1971 in 1999. Section 12 makes it possible for an overall draft settlement, made by the public conciliator and sent out for ballot, to cover collective agreements involving an entire sector of activity, even if the organization representing most of the workers in that sector rejects the overall draft settlement. In several of its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to review the legislation, in consultation with the social partners, and to provide information on these consultations.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that, in the view of the Government, the rule on combining mediation proposals also takes into account the way in which the Danish employees' and employers' organizations wish things to be organized and that the Government will resubmit the issue of section 12 concerning the possibility of the public conciliator to combine mediation to the permanent ILO committee. While taking note of the Government's arguments, the Committee recalls that it had stressed in several of its previous comments that section 12 of the Conciliation Act could, in some cases, have the result of excluding the most representative trade union organizations from the outcome of the negotiations of collective agreements or from the resolution of a conflict.

The Committee once again encourages the Government to engage in dialogue with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations on this issue in order to find the means to resolve it. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard, including the results of the resubmission of this issue to the permanent ILO committee. The Committee trusts that every effort will be made to fully ensure the collective bargaining rights of the most representative organizations and the principles of free and voluntary collective bargaining.

Djibouti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Legislative problems. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the provisions of Act No. 133/AN/05/5^e L of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. The Act was denounced by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and also by the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) and the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) as challenging fundamental rights relating to freedom of association. The Committee noted that, according to the report of the direct contacts mission undertaken in January 2008, the Government reaffirmed that all the social partners were consulted in the process of preparation of the Labour Code. However, the Committee noted that the Government held working meetings with the mission to consider the points of divergence between the national legislation and the Conventions in order to rectify them and that it undertook to bring the recommended solutions to the attention of a tripartite National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training (CNTEFP), which was due to be constituted. The Committee noted that, in its report of May 2008, the Government reiterated its commitment to reviewing certain provisions of the legislation in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention and bring them to the attention of the CNTEFP. In this respect, the Committee noted the warning contained in the report of the direct contacts mission regarding any excessive delay in constituting the CNTEFP and the impact thereof on the adoption of the necessary legislative amendments. It also noted the mission's recommendation that, in a context where the representativeness of workers' organizations has not yet been established in a clear and objective manner, no representation from the trade unions in Djibouti should be discarded from the work of the CNTEFP. The Committee endorses the recommendations of the direct contacts mission on this point and requests the Government to indicate whether the CNTEFP has been constituted and state the composition thereof.

The Committee wishes to remind the Government of its comments concerning the following points of divergence between the Labour Code and the Convention:

- Sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code. These provisions concern the suspension of employment contracts. Section 41 provides that the employment contract shall be suspended, among other cases, for the duration of any regular, political or trade union office held by the worker which is not compatible with paid employment (paragraph 8). Section 42 provides in addition that the period during which the employment is suspended shall not be counted for the purpose of determining the worker's seniority within the undertaking. The Committee considers that the holding of trade union office is not incompatible with professional life and, consequently, any worker holding trade union office should be able to remain employed. The Committee therefore considers that sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code, in providing for a more or less automatic suspension of the employment contract when a worker holds trade union office, are likely to be detrimental to the rights of all workers to establish and join the organization of their own choosing or to hold trade union office (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code by providing that the possibility of suspending the employment contract during a period in which a worker holds a trade union office that is incompatible with a professional activity is a matter for negotiation between the employer and the trade union, who must establish the relevant arrangements, and that in any case such suspension cannot be automatic.
- Section 214 of the Labour Code. This section provides that any person convicted "by any court" may not hold office as a trade union leader. The Committee recalls that a law which generally prohibits access to trade union office because of any conviction is incompatible with the principles of freedom of association (Article 3 of the Convention), when the activity condemned is not prejudicial to the attitude and integrity required to exercise trade union office. In this case, the Committee considers that section 214 of the Code, in deeming any person who has been convicted to be unsuitable for trade union office, is formulated too broadly and would cover situations in which the nature of the conviction is not inherently such as to rule out the holding of trade union office. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 214 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that only court convictions for offences which by their nature call into question the integrity of the individual are deemed to be incompatible with the holding of trade union office.
- Section 215 of the Labour Code. This section concerns the formalities for registration and verification of the legality of a trade union. Under the terms of this section, the founders of any occupational trade union are required to deposit their regulations and the list of persons responsible for their administration and management; within a period of 30 days following their deposit, copies of the regulations and the list of persons responsible for the administration and management of the union are transmitted by the labour inspector to the Minister of Labour and the Chief Public Prosecutor; the documents are accompanied by a report prepared by the Labour Inspectorate; the Minister of Labour then has 15 days to issue a receipt granting legal recognition to the union; the Chief Public Prosecutor then has 30 days to verify the regulations and review the situation of each of the officials responsible for the administration and management of the union and to notify the Minister of the Interior, the Minister of Labour and the union leaders concerned of his/her conclusions; any modification to the regulations and any changes to the composition of the officials responsible for the management or administration of the trade union have to be brought to the knowledge of the same authorities and are subject to verification under the same conditions. The Committee firstly wishes to remind the Government that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization by the public authorities. It therefore considers that national legislation which requires the deposit of the regulations of organizations is compatible with this provision if it is a mere formality intended to ensure that the regulations are available to the public. Nevertheless, problems of compatibility with the Convention may arise if the registration procedure is lengthy or complicated, or if the rules concerning registration are applied in such a way as to defeat its purpose and the registration authorities make excessive use of their discretionary power. The Committee notes that section 215 of the Labour Code, under which the decision of the Minister of Labour requires not only the deposit by the founders of the trade union of the relevant documents but also a detailed report by the labour inspector, would appear to grant the administration more or less discretionary power in deciding whether or not an organization meets the registration criteria. This situation could amount in practice to denying the right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization, in contravention of Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend, in consultation with the social partners, section 215 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee the right to establish workers' and employers' organizations without previous authorization, remove the provisions which give de facto discriminatory powers to the administration and ensure that the registration procedure is merely a formality.

Finally, the Committee recalls that its previous comments were also concerned with the need for the Government to repeal or amend the following provisions of the legislation:

- Section 5 of the Act on associations. This provision, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions, is contrary to Article 2 of the Convention.
- Section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983. This provision, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public servants who are indispensable to the life of the nation and the proper operation of essential public services, should be amended in order to restrict the power of requisition to public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Noting that the Government displayed a degree of openness during the direct contacts mission by indicating that it was planning a number of amendments and declaring its willingness to receive technical assistance and advice from the Office, the Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps as soon as possible to revise and amend the legislative provisions, taking into account the comments reiterated above. It expresses the firm hope that the Government's next report will contain information on the progress made in this respect.

The Committee takes note of the comments dated 26 August 2009 from the ITUC which reiterate matters already examined by the Committee, as well as denouncing persistent acts of anti-union harassment and discrimination and the brutal repression of strike actions. The Committee urges the Government to provide its reply to the ITUC's comments.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the conclusions of the Credentials Committee of the Conference concerning the examination of an objection, in June 2009, concerning the nomination of the Workers' delegation of Djibouti. The Credentials Committee concluded that the Government had not fulfilled its obligations as set out in article 3 of the ILO Constitution because it had not nominated Workers' delegates representing the workers of Djibouti in agreement with the most representative workers' organization. Furthermore, it regretted the absence of any progress, despite the expectations raised in the recommendations of the direct contacts mission of January 2008, as well as the hopes expressed last year, and called upon the Government to guarantee the implementation of a procedure based on objective and transparent criteria for the nomination of the Worker representatives at future sessions of the Conference. To this end, it expected that these criteria will be identified so that consultation with all parties concerned, and particularly with the genuine workers' organizations in Djibouti, which includes the UGDT whose current secretary-general is Mr Mohamed Abdou, could be carried out in an environment respecting the ability of the workers' organizations to act in total independence from the Government, in accordance with Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the comments contained in the communications from the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT), the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received between 2005 and 2007 denouncing dismissals and acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in the postal and other sectors. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to order without delay an independent investigation into the alleged acts. The Committee notes that, in a report of May 2008, the Government indicates that the matter was the subject of in-depth discussions with the direct contacts mission which visited Djibouti in 2008, which encouraged all the parties to bring an end to the disputes. The Government also indicated that it would provide information on developments in the situation. The Committee, observing that the Government has not provided any information since then, requests it to indicate the cases referred to which have been resolved and to specify the cases in which the penalties established by the law were imposed when violations of the rights set out in the Convention were found to have been committed.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009, indicating that the ILO mission to Djibouti in January 2008 had offered some hope of an opening, but that the commitments made on that occasion by the Government, including those relating to the reinstatement of workers and trade unionists who suffered abusive dismissal, have not been given effect. The ITUC also denounces the pressure exerted on the Postal Union. Following the dismissal of its Secretary-General and the defection of two members of its executive board, the union had to establish a new executive board headed by Abdourahman Ali Omar, who had been reinstated in his job following suspension. However, the management interrupted the check-off of workers' trade union dues, thereby preventing the union from defending the rights of postal workers. The Committee notes with concern the deterioration in the situation in the postal sector and urges the Government to provide its observations in reply to the ITUC's comments.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the Decree envisaged under section 282 of the Labour Code, establishing the structure and procedures of the National Joint Committee on Collective Agreements and Wages, and any relevant information on its work.

Dominica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been referring, for a number of years, to the need to amend legislation so as to exclude the banana, citrus and coconut industries as well as the port authority, from the schedule of essential services annexed to Act No. 18 of 1986 on industrial relations, which makes it possible to stop a strike in these sectors by compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). Nevertheless, the Committee recalls that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 160).

The Committee had also requested the Government to amend sections 59(1)(b) and 61(1)(c) of the Act that empowers the minister to refer disputes to compulsory arbitration if they concerned serious issues in his or her opinion. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted or prohibited (as mentioned above, i.e. for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term).

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there has been no change in the legislation or practice since its last report.

In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation to bring it into conformity with the principles of freedom of association. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate in its next report any evolution in this respect.

Dominican Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, relating to matters that are under examination and the imprisonment of and imposition of excessive fines on two trade union leaders of the National Transport Confederation (CONATRA) and the National Dominican Transport Federation (FENATRADO) for having organized a strike in the transport sector. In this respect, the Government indicates that the persons concerned are employers in the transport sector who engaged in misappropriation of State property and were convicted by the courts of first and second instance in rulings that were confirmed by the Supreme Court of Justice.

The Committee notes the new comments of the ITUC, dated 26 August 2009, referring to legislative matters that are already under examination and the difficulties faced by workers engaged under subcontracts and by Haitian workers in sugar plantations to organize in trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, from a legal and practical point of view, workers are entirely free to establish trade union organizations (in 2008, the registration of trade unions increased by 9.5 per cent). The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in the same way as in other commercial or service enterprises, workers enjoy full freedom in the sugar sector to establish unions and to engage in collective bargaining. Furthermore, the files of the Secretariat of State for Labour record a significant number of trade unions registered in this sector of the national economy. The Government adds that the Supreme Court of Justice has found on various occasions that foreign workers who work in the country enjoy labour rights irrespective of their status as migrants.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on:

- the explicit exclusion from the scope of the Labour Code (Principle III) and the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act of employees of autonomous and municipal state institutions (section 2); and
- the requirement of 40 per cent of the total number of employees in the institution for public servants to be able to establish organizations (section 142(1) of the Regulations adopted under the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act).

The Committee notes the Government's indication that on 16 January 2008 the Public Service Act No. 41-08 was adopted, which recognizes the right of public servants to organize in accordance with the provisions of the law and any other standards that are in force. The Committee also notes the adoption of the Regulations issued under the Act (Decree No. 523-09). The Committee observes that the new Act repeals the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act (section 104) and provides in section 1 that the Act shall apply to public servants working for the State, municipal authorities and autonomous entities. The Committee further notes that the implementing Regulations maintain the requirement that no less than 40 per cent of all the employees in the respective institution who are entitled to organize for the establishment of organizations of public servants (section 84(I) of Decree No. 523-09). The Committee recalls that the requirement of a minimum number of members to establish an organization is not in itself incompatible with the Convention, although it considers that this number should be fixed in a reasonable manner so that the establishment of organizations is not hindered (see paragraph 81 of the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 84(I) of the implementing Regulations (Decree No. 523-09) to reduce the percentage required for the establishment of organizations of public servants.

Articles 3 and 5. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on certain provisions of the Labour Code relating to:

- the requirement that federations must obtain a two-thirds majority vote by their members to be able to establish a confederation (section 383 of the Labour Code of 1992); and
- the statutory requirement of a majority of 51 per cent of workers' votes in the enterprise in order to call a strike (section 407(3) of the Labour Code).

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that tripartite discussions have been resumed in the Labour Advisory Council with a view to discussing relevant reforms of these provisions. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the tripartite discussions that have been initiated will produce tangible results in the near future and that they will lead to the amendment of the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measure adopted to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007, which refer to various acts of anti-union discrimination, particularly the dismissal of workers in various enterprises (betting and lottery, cardboard packaging, beverages, agri-exports and an enterprise in an export processing zone (EPZ)) for attempting to set up trade unions. The ITUC also alleges delays in the admission and handling of cases. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that: (1) the length of labour judgements has been reduced considerably and they currently take less than one year; (2) special labour courts have been set up in most provinces which have a large economically active population; (3) the number of labour inspectors has been increased and their salaries have improved (12 of these inspectors undertake periodic visits to sugar refineries); (4) a programme has been implemented for awareness raising of rights at work, particularly on freedom of association and trade union immunity. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that, in 2006 and 2007, 18 unions were registered in the EPZs. With regard to the allegations of anti-union discrimination, the Government points out that, in the betting and lottery enterprise, the registration of the enterprise union was effected; in the cardboard packing enterprise, infringements were reported and a negotiation process is currently under way; in the beverages enterprise, an infringement of freedom of association was reported and an agreement was reached between the workers and the representatives of the enterprise. As regards the agri-export enterprise and the EPZ enterprise, the Government states that no violations of freedom of association were found.

The Committee also notes the comments from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009 which refer to the matters examined by the Committee and the length of judicial proceedings, which go on for some 18 months or more, and indicate that collective agreements have been negotiated in only four export processing enterprises. While noting the Government's statement that the length of judicial proceedings has been reduced to less than one year, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations on these comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Lack of sufficiently dissuasive penalties against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee previously asked the Government to carry out a full investigation into the allegations from the ITUC dated 31 August 2005 regarding the absence of effective penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination, the dismissal on trade union grounds of leaders in sugar plantations, the drawing up of blacklists of trade unionists in EPZs and the dismissal of all the founding members of a trade union which the administrative authority had refused to register. The ITUC refers once again to this matter in its comments made in 2009. The Committee previously asked the Government to provide further information on the absence of effective penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination. In its 2009 comment, the ITUC emphasizes the fact that the penalties are not sufficiently dissuasive. While observing that the Government has not sent any specific information in reply to the allegations made by the ITUC in 2005, the Committee notes the Government's statement that information and guidance are provided on an ongoing basis to workers who report violations of their trade union rights. Moreover, in 2007 and 2008 numerous inspections were carried out (12 of them in EPZs) on the basis of requests made by union federations or the unions themselves, and on the occasions when violations of freedom of association were established, reports of the infringements were drawn up and sent to the courts so that the appropriate penalties could be imposed. Accordingly, nine reports of infringements were dealt with in 2007 and seven in 2008. Recalling once again that investigations should be carried out without delay in cases where acts of anti-union discrimination are reported, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will carry out an investigation without delay into these allegations and thus be able to assign responsibility and, if appropriate, impose sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee also requests the Government to state which specific penalties may be imposed under the legislation for persons found guilty of anti-union acts.

Article 4. Majorities required to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the fact that, in order to engage in collective bargaining, a trade union must represent an absolute majority of the workers in an enterprise or the workers in a branch of activity (sections 109 and 110 of the Labour Code). The Committee observes that the Government has not sent its observations in this respect and recalls that in its previous observation it noted that the Labour Advisory Committee had held a meeting with a view to establishing consensual proposals between the social partners and the Government for amending the legislation. The Committee recalls that in cases where the law provides that, in order to be recognized as a bargaining agent, a union has to obtain the support of 50 per cent of the members of a specific bargaining unit, problems may arise since a majority union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee considers that under such a system, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps without delay to amend sections 109 and 110 of the Labour Code in order to bring them into conformity with the provisions requiring the promotion of collective bargaining.

Right of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee notes with interest that, on 16 January 2008, Act No. 41-08 concerning the civil service and its implementing regulations (Decree No. 523-09) were enacted. The Committee appreciates that this Act establishes the right to organize for civil servants, including in federations and confederations, and that it applies to those employed in the service of the State, municipalities and autonomous entities, guaranteeing special protection (organizational immunity) to the founders of associations and to some members of their executive committees. Penalties for violations of this protection are also provided for, ranging as far as dismissal from the post concerned.

The Committee expresses the hope that the protection provided for in the new legislation extends to acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and in the course of employment, prohibiting any discrimination on the basis of union membership or participation in legitimate union activities. The Committee also requests the Government to establish specific protection for associations against interference from the employer aimed at interfering in or controlling the activities of the organization, whether in the form of financial control or otherwise. The Committee also requests the Government to lay down sufficiently dissuasive penalties against such acts of discrimination or interference.

Finally, the Committee observes that although the new regulations guarantee the legal right to strike, they are silent with regard to the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, who, under the terms of Article 6 of the Convention, should enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the trade unions concerned, to ensure recognition of this right and provide information in this respect.

Right to collective bargaining in practice. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that 15 collective agreements were registered in 2007 and 14 collective agreements were filed for registration in 2008, in the latter case benefiting 7,420 workers. The Committee observes that the numbers of agreements and workers covered are low, and it is not clear from the information supplied by the Government whether the figures refer to the private or public sector. While recalling that, under Article 4 of the Convention, the Government has the obligation to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers and workers, the Committee requests the Government to take specific measures in this respect and send statistical information on any collective agreements concluded in the public and private sectors, including in the EPZs, indicating the numbers of workers covered by them.

Ecuador

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of 28 August 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the removal by the police of workers taking part in a strike in the banana sector on 11 February 2006. According to the Government, the police removed the workers in order to prevent damage to the facilities and avoid a confrontation between the workers and the owners of the plantation. Furthermore, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent its observations on the other comments of the ITUC concerning repression by the police and the army of a demonstration called by the trade union federations in 2006, causing serious injuries and arrests, or on the alleged threats and acts of intimidation against leaders of the CTE and CEDOCUT. The Committee reminds the Government in this connection that the arrest or detention, even for short periods, of trade union leaders and members engaged in legitimate trade union activities constitutes a grave violation of the principle of freedom of association, and emphasizes that in the event of assaults on the physical or moral integrity of individuals, an independent judicial inquiry should be instituted immediately as the most appropriate means of fully clarifying the facts, determining responsibility, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts. Lastly, the Committee notes the comments of 24 August 2009 by the National Federation of Workers of the Enterprise "Petróleos del Ecuador" (FETRAPEC) and those of 26 August 2009 by the ITUC referring to legislative issues highlighted by the Committee, and in particular certain provisions of the new Constitution of Ecuador (especially article 326, paragraph 16, which provides that state institutions and private law entities in which public resources have a majority share that carry on representational, management, administrative or professional activities, shall be subject to the laws regulating the public administration and that all others shall be covered by the Labour Code). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on this matter.

The Committee also notes the comments of 30 August 2009 by the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) in which the latter asserts that the new Constitution of Ecuador includes certain amendments that adversely affect relations between workers and employers and that although representatives from various sectors played an active part in the preparation of the new constitutional texts, there was no real or effective participation or any balanced input to the framing of constitutional provisions from the main partners in the labour relationship, and hence no objective analysis and diagnosis of the issues to be treated in the Constitution. The IOE objects in particular to article 326, paragraph 8, which establishes that the State shall promote the democratic, participatory and transparent operation of workers' and employers' organizations with alternation of leadership, on the grounds that this provision constitutes a form of state intervention in the internal activities of workers' and employers' organizations, in breach of the Convention.

New Constitution of Ecuador

The Committee notes that on 28 September 2008 a new Constitution was adopted, which entered into force on 20 October 2008. The Committee observes that some of its provisions raise problems of compatibility with the Convention:

- article 326, paragraph 8, which provides that "the State shall encourage the creation of organizations of men and women workers and of men and women employers, in accordance with the law; and shall promote democracy, participation and transparency in their running with alternation in their leadership". In this connection, the Committee emphasizes that according to Article 3 of the Convention, decisions as to alternation in executive offices rest solely with the organizations of workers and employers and their members. In these circumstances, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to repeal or amend this provision so as to allow the re-election of officers of workers' and employers' organizations.
- article 326, paragraph 12, which establishes that collective labour disputes shall, in all instances, be referred to courts of conciliation and arbitration. The Committee reminds the Government that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute or a strike is acceptable only where requested by both parties to the dispute and where the strike may be restricted or prohibited, namely in disputes in the public service involving public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense, i.e. services the interruption of which would endanger the life or personal safety of the whole or part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary steps to repeal or amend this provision to ensure that compulsory arbitration is possible only in the instances cited above.

- article 326, paragraph 15, which prohibits suspension of public services in education, social security, production and transformation of hydrocarbons, transport and distribution of fuel, and provides that the law will provide limits to ensure the said services' operation. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the right to strike can only be restrained or prohibited: (1) for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; or (2) in essential services in the strict sense of term (i.e. services the interruption of which could endanger the life or personal safety of the whole or part of the population). The Committee also recalls that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in other services which are of public utility. The Committee requests the Government to take appropriate measures in order to modify this provision so as to ensure that the right to strike can be exercised in the abovementioned services, with the possibility to provide a system of minimum services which is to be determined with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations.

Pending legislative issues

The Committee points out that for many years it has been asking the Government to take steps to repeal or amend:

- sections 450, 459 and 466 of the Labour Code establishing a minimum requirement of 30 workers for the creation of associations, works committees or assemblies to organize works committees;
- section 26(g) of the Codification of the Framework Act on the Civil Service and Administrative Careers and the Unification and Standardization of Public Sector Remuneration which prohibits work stoppages on any grounds in public services which may not be deemed essential in the strict sense (education, social security, hydrocarbon production, fuel processing, transport and distribution, and public transport) and provides for dismissal for failure to observe the prohibition;
- section 522, second paragraph, of the Labour Code respecting the determination of minimum services by the Ministry of Labour in case of disagreement between the parties in the event of a strike;
- section 505 of the Labour Code which implicitly denies federations and confederations the right to strike;
- Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967 establishing the imposition of prison sentences for participation in unlawful work stoppages and strikes; and
- section 466(4) of the Labour Code requiring Ecuadorian nationality for service as a trade union officer.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that a detailed study will be conducted in the National Assembly for the drafting of a bill to amend the Labour Code and that the Committee's observations will be submitted to the National Assembly. The Committee hopes that it will be able to note progress in the legislation in the near future and asks the Government in its next report to provide information on all developments in this regard. It reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in the context of its reform of the Labour Code.

The Committee has received information about two proposals for acts being debated in the National Assembly: the Basic Public Service Act and the Basic Act on Public Enterprises. The Committee hopes that the new texts will establish in full the rights laid down in the Convention: the right to organize of public officials and employees and the right to strike of public servants other than those exercising authority in the name of the State.

Furthermore, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the number of associations that have been set up for the promotion and defence of the interests of public servants, the sectors covered and the approximate number of members.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the comments of 24 August 2009 by the National Federation of Workers of the Enterprise "Petróleos del Ecuador" (FETRAPEC) alleging that some provisions of the new Constitution of Ecuador are inconsistent with the Convention. The Committee also notes the comments of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to legislative issues raised by the Committee, and particularly certain provisions of the new Constitution of Ecuador and to the following matters: anti-union repression and intimidation of trade union officers and workers in a telecommunications enterprise; the dismissal of four trade union officers in the petroleum sector; lengthy proceedings; restriction of the subjects that may be negotiated collectively in cement enterprises and electricity and drinking water supply enterprises; interference by employers who encourage the establishment of "solidarista" organizations and acts of anti-union persecution against union officials in the judiciary which are being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on these matters and on the ITUC's comments of 28 August 2007 asserting that the law does not provide for sufficiently dissuasive penalties for breaches of labour and trade union law.

The Committee furthermore notes with regret that the Government has not sent its observations on the comments of 10 August 2006 by the ITUC concerning the lack of collective bargaining rights for subcontracted or outsourced workers, the use of “blacklists” in Los Rios Province and anti-union dismissals. Observing that, according to the ITUC's latest comments, subcontracting persists through so-called “complementary services”, the Committee reminds the Government that the right to negotiate working conditions freely with employers is an essential component of freedom of association and that all workers, with the possible exception of the armed forces, the police and persons engaged in the administration of the State, are covered by the Convention and particularly Article 4. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that workers performing “complementary services” are able fully to exercise trade union rights and, in particular, bargain collectively.

Furthermore, with regard to the alleged use of “blacklists” in one province, the Committee points out that the practice of placing trade union officials or members on “blacklists” is a serious threat to the free exercise of trade union rights, and requests the Government to hold an inquiry and, if the allegation of blacklisting is confirmed, to take the necessary steps to ensure that this practice is sanctioned by sufficiently dissuasive penalties.

New Constitution of Ecuador

The Committee notes that on 28 September 2008 a new Constitution was adopted and that it entered into force on 20 October 2008.

The Committee notes that, in the context of the Constitution's adoption, the Constituent Assembly passed a number of “Constituent Resolutions”, which are mandatory decisions of a “supraconstitutional” nature and are not subject to oversight or challenge by any other authority (including judicial review). The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association examined the conformity of these resolutions with the provisions of the Convention in the context of Case No. 2684. The Committee refers in particular to:

- Constituent Resolutions Nos 002 and 004 which place a ceiling on public sector pay, compensation for unfair dismissal and other grounds of termination of the employment relationship, and ban supplementary private pension funds that involve input from state funds (Executive Decree No. 1406 provides that no state resources shall be contributed to supplementary funds). The Committee is of the view that these provisions, which apply even when public sector enterprises have sufficient income, impose permanent limitations on collective bargaining that are incompatible with the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps for the removal of these limitations and for the reinstatement of the right to collective bargaining on all subjects that affect the working and living conditions of workers.
- Constituent Resolution No. 008 establishes the need to revise clauses in public sector contracts that contain abuses and undue privileges, and Ministerial Order No. 00080 and Order No. 00155A lay down administrative procedures for the automatic adjustment and revision of work contracts that include such clauses. The Committee points out in this connection that the checking of clauses in public sector agreements for possible abuses should be done not by the administrative authority – which in the public sector is both judge and party – but by the judicial authority, and only in extremely serious cases. The Committee is of the view that regulations that allow the administrative authority unilaterally to cancel or reduce the clauses of a collective agreement are contrary to the principle of free and voluntary bargaining. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend Ministerial Order No. 00080 and Order No. 00155A and to indicate whether Constituent Resolution No. 008 is compatible with judicial review of certain clauses in public sector collective agreements that may contain abuses.

The Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2684 objecting to the unilateral review by the administrative authority of collective agreements it deemed abusive in the petroleum and health sectors. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the constituent resolutions abovementioned and the provisions adopted in its development are still in force or whether they have been modified or repealed by the new Constitution.

Pending legislative issues

The Committee again reminds the Government that for several years it has been commenting on the following matters:

- The need to include in the legislation provisions that ensure protection against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the protection is ensured by virtue of section 44(f) of the Labour Code which provides that it is prohibited “to require a worker, by whatever means, to leave the association to which he belongs ...”. The Committee points out that this protection covers anti-union discrimination: (1) at the time of recruitment; (2) in the course of employment; and (3) upon termination of the employment relationship, and includes all measures that are discriminatory in nature (whether dismissals, transfers, relegations in grade or any other measures adversely affecting the worker).

- The need to amend section 229, second paragraph, of the Labour Code respecting the submission of the draft collective agreement, so that minority trade union organizations with a membership amounting to no more than 50 per cent of the workers subject to the Labour Code may, on their own or jointly (when there is no majority union representing all the workers), negotiate on behalf of their own members.
- The need for teachers and heads of education establishments in the public sector and for staff performing technical and vocational duties in the education sector who are governed by the Higher Education Act (Act No. 2000-16) and the Act on Educational Careers and Posts in the Public Teaching Sector (Act No. 94 of 1990) to enjoy the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes that in this connection that the Government refers to articles 96–99 of the new Constitution of Ecuador. The Committee also observes that Constituent Resolution No. 008 guarantees collective bargaining in public sector institutions. It requests the Government to indicate whether this guarantee extends to public sector teaching staff.

Noting the Government's statement that the National Assembly is working on amendments to various laws including a proposal for a Labour Code Reform Act, a proposal for a Basic Public Service Act and a proposal for a Basic Act on Public Enterprises, the Committee expresses the hope that these will take full account of the provisions of the Convention recognizing the right to collective bargaining of public sector organizations and adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, with sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. It reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the ILO in proceeding with the amendment of the Labour Code and the Public Service Act.

Egypt

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2009, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as the violent repression by the police of a demonstration by workers on 6 and 7 April 2008, resulting in the death of six workers and the detention of 500 people, including three trade unionists who were held in detention for 54 days. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, when disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial enquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such actions, and that the arrest and detention, even for short periods, of trade union leaders and members engaged in their legitimate trade union activities, without any charges being brought and without a warrant, constitute a grave violation of the principles of freedom of association (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 29 and 31). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee notes the discussion during the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008 on the application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee notes the Government's indications during that meeting, in relation to the ITUC's comments made in 2007, that: (1) trade union elections were conducted in conformity with the rules adopted by the trade unions at their general assemblies; (2) all candidatures were registered, under legal supervision, in the framework of this election cycle, and over 18,000 persons were elected to the workers' representative bodies in the enterprises and undertakings of the country; (3) 23 new trade unions were established; (4) the Central Council of the Confederation of Trade Unions also held elections and re-elected 70 per cent of its executive committees; and (5) a process of such a large scale as this, which mobilized over 4 million workers, gave rise to rivalry and incidents which required the intervention of the security forces, although such intervention could not be seen as Government intervention in trade union affairs. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that its comments on the application of the Convention would be submitted to the Labour Advisory Council with a view to taking the necessary measures to review the Labour Code and the Trade Union Act and bringing them into conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee invited the Government to accept an ILO technical assistance mission and welcomed the Government's readiness in this regard.

The Committee notes that the technical assistance mission requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards visited Egypt on 20–23 April 2009.

The Committee recalls that for several years its comments have been referring to the discrepancies between the Convention and the national legislation, namely the Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995, and the Labour Code No. 12 of 2003, with regard to the following points:

- the institutionalization of a single trade union system under Act No. 35 of 1976 (as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995), and in particular sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52;
- the control granted by law to higher level trade union organizations, and particularly the Confederation of Trade Unions, over the nomination and election procedures to the executive committees of trade unions, under the terms of sections 41, 42, and 43 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);

- the control exercised by the Confederation of Trade Unions over the financial management of trade unions, by virtue of sections 62 and 65 of Act No. 35 (as amended by Act No. 12);
- the removal from office of the executive committee of a trade union which has provoked work stoppages or absenteeism in a public service or community services (section 70(2)(b) of Act No. 35 of 1976);
- the requirement of the prior approval of the Confederation of Trade Unions for the organization of strike action, under section 14(i) of the same Act;
- restrictions on the right to strike and recourse to compulsory arbitration in services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term (sections 179, 187, 193 and 194 of the Labour Code); and
- penalties for breaches of section 194 of the Labour Code (section 69(9) of the Code).

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, following the technical assistance mission referred to above, the Government and the social partners signed a memorandum of understanding through which they undertook to participate in a tripartite seminar to be organized by the ILO subregional office to analyse the issues raised concerning the application of the Convention, and to study the comparative experience of other countries and make proposals for the measures to be adopted so as to give effect to the Committee's comments. The Committee considers that the holding of this seminar will be an important first step in addressing this longstanding matter. The Committee expresses the hope that the seminar referred to above will be held in the near future and will take up all the matters raised in its comments. The Committee further hopes that, following this activity, the necessary measures will be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee observes that the ITUC refers again to the provisions of the 2002 Special Economic Zones Law, which exempts investment companies newly established in the zones from the legal provisions concerning the organization of labour, and to anti-union acts, including pressure on members to leave unions. The union also previously stated that most workers in the Tenth of Ramadan City zone were forced to sign letters of resignation before beginning employment so that they could be fired at the employers' convenience. The ITUC also alleges that trade unionists were harassed by the authorities, including in connection with the promotion of union membership, and that administrative penalties were imposed on a number of trade unionists. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the ITUC comments, stating in particular that: (1) workers in special economic zones are covered by the provisions of the Labour Code (Labour Law No. 12 of 2003); (2) the Labour Code lays down procedures for ensuring their application and frequent inspections are carried out in such zones by duly trained inspectors with the authority to impose penalties, pursuant to an order of the Ministry of Justice, and; (3) no evidence of the allegations made by the ITUC has been submitted. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to carry out an investigation into the alleged anti-union acts and the imposition of administrative penalties for activities undertaken by a number of trade unionists referred to by the ITUC.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it has been making comments for a number of years on various provisions of the Labour Code, as follows:

- as regards section 154 of the new Labour Code, under which any clause of a collective agreement contrary to the law on public order or general ethics shall be null and void, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the scope of this section and the impact the broad wording of this section might have on the application of the principle of voluntary negotiation. Further noting that section 154 referred to a law that was still in its preparatory phase, the Committee asked the Government to provide a copy of the relevant provisions of the law, once adopted, in order to assess their compatibility with the principle of voluntary negotiation contained in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the section in question does not refer to a law which is in the preparatory phase and that it merely provides that collective agreements must respect the law, public order and general ethics. The Government also indicates that public order derives from economic, ethical, political and social foundations on which the society of a country is based. The Committee welcomes the Government's explanations and requests it to indicate the specific cases in which use has been made in practice of section 154 of the Labour Code;
- as regards section 158 of the new Labour Code, the Committee asks the Government to amend that section so as to ensure that the approval of a collective agreement may only be refused if: (1) it contains a procedural flaw; or (2) it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation (the Committee had observed that the legislation does not state the specific reasons why the registration of a collective agreement may be refused). The Committee notes the Government's statement that the only reasons for refusing the registration of a collective agreement are those mentioned by the Committee and that, since the promulgation of the Labour Code in 2003, the administrative authority has not refused the registration of any collective agreement;

- as regards sections 148 and 153 of the Labour Code, the Committee asked the Government to take the necessary steps to repeal these sections, as they enable higher level organizations to interfere in the negotiation process conducted by lower level organizations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the purpose of the participation of higher level organizations in the negotiation process of a union is to support and strengthen the position of smaller unions. According to the Government, the application of the Convention is ensured by concluding agreements which apply to all workers belonging to a higher level organization. The Committee recalls that such interference by higher level organizations in the bargaining process undertaken by lower level organizations is incompatible with the autonomy which must be enjoyed by bargaining parties which, as such, must have the right to free and voluntary negotiation of collective agreements. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps to repeal the sections in question. Observing that, in the context of the examination of the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), by Egypt, the Government stated that a tripartite symposium would be held to analyse the Committee's comments in this respect, the Committee expresses the hope that these comments will be examined by that body. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this respect.

Finally, the Committee previously asked the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the Labour Code (sections 179 and 187, in conjunction with sections 156 and 163 of the Labour Code) so that the parties could have recourse to arbitration only by mutual agreement. The Committee observes that the Government has not sent its observations in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the abovementioned provisions of the Labour Code so that compulsory arbitration is possible only for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all progress made in this respect.

El Salvador

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2006)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee recalls that under article 47 of the Constitution of the Republic, public officials and public employees did not enjoy the right to establish organizations. The Committee notes with satisfaction the amendment of article 47 of the Constitution by Decree No. 33 of June 2009, which establishes that employers and workers in the private sector, without distinction as to nationality, sex, race, creed or political persuasion, and whatever their activity or the nature of the work they perform, have the right freely to associate in order to defend their respective interests, forming occupational associations or unions; the same right is given to workers of autonomous official institutions, public officials and employees and municipal employees. The Committee has furthermore been informed that legal personality was recently granted to the Union of Men and Women Workers of the Judicial Body (SITTOJ), the Union of Judiciary Employees of El Salvador (SINEJUS), and to unions of workers in education, ministries and municipalities.

As regards other issues relating to article 47 of the Constitution and other legislative matters, including the exclusion of certain categories of public employees from the right to organize, the Committee is addressing a request directly to the Government.

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 2006)

Article 1 of the Convention. Exclusion of public servants. The Committee recalls that under article 47 of the Constitution of the Republic, civil servants and public employees did not enjoy the right to establish unions. The Committee notes with satisfaction that article 47 of the Constitution, as amended by Decree No. 33 of June 2009, establishes that employers and workers in the private sector, without distinction as to nationality, sex, race, creed or political views, regardless of the activity or the nature of the work they perform, have the right to associate freely in order to defend their respective interests, by forming professional associations or unions; the same right applies to workers in autonomous official institutions, civil servants, public employees and municipal employees. The Committee notes in this connection that legal personality has recently been granted to a number of unions in ministries, municipalities and the judiciary.

In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 4(k) and (l), under which certain categories of public employees are excluded from the safeguards established in the Convention. The Committee understands that some of the former provisions of the Civil Service Act have been eliminated following the amendment of the Constitution and asks the Government to provide particulars.

Articles 6, 7 and 8. Facilities and procedures for determining the conditions of employment of public employees. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to send information on the measures taken to apply the Convention and to indicate whether, in the context of collective bargaining, it was possible to establish facilities for trade unions. The Committee notes in this connection that, according to the Government, with the amendment of the Constitution, the right of public employees to collective bargaining has been recognized. The Government adds that it will take the necessary measures to promote collective bargaining processes in the public sector and that the Ministry of Labour will launch a process for training of the staff of the Civil Service Tribunal in procedures regarding collective disputes of an economic nature. It further notes that, according to the Government, a number of collective agreements have been registered in the public sector which include trade union leave and time off, contributions for social, cultural, artistic and sports facilities and the grant of trade union premises. The Committee requests the Government to examine with the social partners how to promote, on a broader basis, the facilities to be granted to workers' representatives, and to provide information on any developments regarding the legislation that applies to collective bargaining and dispute settlement.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009, which refer to the application of the Convention and also to the administrative authority's persistent refusal to register the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). According to the ITUC, the administrative authority does not recognize trade unions which are classified as independent and obstructs the registration process. The Committee recalls that the discretionary power of the competent authority to grant or reject a registration request is tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74). The Committee therefore urges the Government once again to register without delay those trade unions which have fulfilled the legal requirements and provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for a number of years to:

- amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that employees' organizations may be occupational or sectoral – so that workers may, if they so desire, establish enterprise trade unions;
- amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have a minimum of 50 employees in order to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level;
- confirm that, as a result of a revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised under the conditions laid down by law;
- provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined, as provided for in section 37 of Act No. 12/1992; and
- state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike (section 58 of the Fundamental Act).

The Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and to send the information requested. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

Finally, observing that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards noted with regret at its 2008 meeting that it had been unable to examine the case of the application of the Convention by Equatorial Guinea due to the fact that the Government was not represented at the Conference, the Committee expresses the strong hope that the Government will take all possible steps without delay to renew constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009, which refer once again to the impossibility of establishing any trade union organization which the authority considers to be "too independent". The Committee recalls that in 2004 the Government indicated in its report that there were no trade unions in the country owing to the lack of a trade union tradition. The Committee emphasizes once again that the existence of trade unions established freely by workers is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention and for exercising the right to collective bargaining. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps without delay for creating appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions which can engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to bargain collectively. The Committee notes that, according to the comments made by the ITUC, the right of workers in the public service to establish trade unions has still not been recognized by law, despite the fact that section 6 of Act No. 12/1992 on trade unions and collective labour relations provides that the right to organize of officials in the public administration shall be regulated by a special law. The Committee requests the Government once again to state whether the special law has been adopted, whether this law guarantees public servants' right to organize, and to send detailed information on the application of the Convention with regard to public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee infers from the above that the situation concerning collective bargaining is a source of concern and reminds the Government once again that it may seek technical assistance from the Office with regard to these issues. Finally, observing that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards noted with regret at the 2008 session that it had been unable to examine the case of the application of the Convention by Equatorial Guinea due to the fact that the Government was not represented at the Conference, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will make every effort without delay to renew a constructive dialogue with the ILO.

Eritrea

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous direct request.

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 26 August 2009, which refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 28(3) provides for reinstatement of trade union leaders in case of an unjustifiable dismissal and had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 23 of the Labour Proclamation, which protects workers against dismissal linked to trade union membership or trade union activities, so as to broaden the protection to cover acts of anti-union discrimination committed at the time of recruitment or during the course of employment (transfers, relocations, demotions, etc.).

In this connection, the Committee, while noting the Government's statement that article 120(7) of the Labour Proclamation, which covers labour disputes, also includes complaints directed against steps taken by the employer on promotion, job transfer and training of employees, observes that article 120(7) merely sets out the types of collective labour disputes which may be subject to conciliation or arbitration. The Committee must therefore recall that the Convention requires protection against discrimination against workers for anti-union reasons to cover recruitment and all prejudicial acts during the course of employment, including dismissal, transfer, relocation, demotion, deprivation and restrictions of all kinds (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 212). Noting the Government's indication that the Ministry would consider broadening the protection against anti-union discrimination to cover recruitment and all prejudicial acts during the course of employment, including dismissal, transfer, relocation, demotion, deprivation and restrictions of all kinds, the Committee once again expresses the hope that section 23 of the Labour Proclamation will be amended accordingly in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee recalls that it had previously considered that a fine of 1,200 nakfa, set out in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation, to punish those guilty of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference, did not constitute an adequate protection and had noted the Government's indication that section 692 of the Transitional Penal Code became applicable in cases where an offence was considered severe or repeated.

In this respect, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information concerning the cases, means and method by which an offence of anti-union discrimination or interference by employers in workers' organizations was deemed to become so severe as to attract higher penalties than those provided for in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that any breach of the law – even a petty one – is also punishable under the Transitional Penal Code. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the sanctions applicable and provide copies of penal sentences regarding cases of anti-union discrimination and interference.

The Committee recalls that the existence of general legislative provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference is not enough, if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see General survey, op. cit., paragraph 214). The Committee expresses the hope that the legislative amendments mentioned by the Government concerning anti-union discrimination will take into account the Committee's observations and requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had further requested the Government to indicate whether, by referring solely to breaches by employers' associations, section 156 of the Proclamation only provided for sanctions against employers' organizations and not against individual employers who may or may not be members of organizations. The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 156 in the national language indeed applies to individual employers.

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6. Previously, the Committee had expressed the strong hope that the Ministry would issue a regulation in the near future that ensured that domestic employees were entitled to exercise their trade union rights, guaranteed under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee notes the Government's statement that domestic employees, like all other categories of workers, are entitled to the right to organize and collective bargaining, since the promulgation of the Labour Proclamation No. 118/2001. It also notes that the Government's statement that a trade union organization of domestic workers, the Dembe Sempel Houses Association, has been constituted and is affiliated with the National Confederation of Eritrean Workers.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide specific information concerning the status of the draft Civil Service Proclamation. The Committee regrets that the Government reiterates that the drafting of the legal text concerning public servants, which would guarantee the right to organize to civil servants, reached its final stage and would be communicated to the ILO once adopted. In this regard, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, to improve its legislation on public servants in respect of the rights enshrined in the Convention and requests it to transmit copies of the relevant legislative acts upon their adoption.

Estonia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, which refers to matters previously raised by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been raising the issue of the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service (section 21(1) of the Collective Labour Dispute Resolution Act), and had previously requested the Government to inform it of the progress achieved with respect to the adoption of legislative provisions ensuring the right to strike for public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that it has approved the draft Public Service Act, which had been submitted to the Parliament and successfully underwent a first reading. The draft legislation retains the prohibition on the right to strike of public servants, but the term "public servant" would be more narrowly defined. The Government further indicates that, according to the explanatory memorandum to the draft Public Service Act, 45 per cent of the current public service would gain the right to strike. In these circumstances, the Committee, recalling that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, expresses the hope that the Public Service Act would ensure the right to strike in the public service in accordance with this principle and requests the Government to provide a copy of the said legislation once it is adopted.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide the list of services where the right to strike will be restricted, as referred to in section 21(3) and (4) of the Collective Labour Dispute Resolution Act. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it has experienced problems establishing the list of enterprises and agencies wherein the right to strike will be restricted (through a minimum service), in accordance with section 21(4) of the said law, as the list must be based on the services provided by the enterprises or agencies and not on the names of the enterprises or agencies themselves. The Government further indicates that it has started to review the entire industrial relations field and that the current laws and regulations – including those concerning minimum services – needed to be analysed and discussed with the social partners before amendments could be introduced. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to indicate the progress achieved in respect of the adoption of legislative provisions ensuring that the right to strike may be prohibited only in essential services in the strict sense of the term (i.e. services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) and for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

Ethiopia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in relation to the recommendations of the 2008 direct contacts mission, the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 29 August 2008 and 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee further notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009.

In its previous comments, the Committee had urged the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into the allegations made by the ITUC and the Education International (EI) relating to arrests of trade unionists, their torture and mistreatment when in detention, and continuing intimidation and interference. The Committee notes the Government's indication that all allegations presented with credible evidence are fully investigated by constitutional bodies including the courts, the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission, the Office of the Ombudsman, or by a mechanism approved by the House of Peoples' Representatives. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the status and specific details on the outcome of the ongoing investigations of each of the abovementioned allegations.

In its previous comments, the Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the resolution of the registration of the National Association of Ethiopian Teachers (NTA). It further notes the conclusions of the Conference Committee in which the Government was asked to report on the measures taken to ensure concrete progress including the registration of the NTA. The Committee regrets to note that the NTA has not yet been registered despite its comments and the conclusions of the Conference Committee and urges the Government to ensure its registration without delay so that all teachers may fully exercise the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

The Committee recalls that in previous comments it had requested the Government to take measures to amend the Civil Servant Proclamation, so as to ensure the right of civil servants, including teachers in public schools, to form and join trade unions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that this right is enshrined under article 42 of the Constitution and provides that government employees whose work compatibility allows for it and who are below a certain level of responsibility have the right to form associations to improve their conditions of employment and economic well-being. In addition, the Government states that it has expressed to all relevant bodies that it shall achieve full compliance gradually by preparing the necessary conditions and the capacity of the country to shoulder the full extent of this right. The Committee recalls that public servants, like all other workers, without distinction whatsoever, have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, without previous authorization, for the promotion and defence of their occupational interests. The Committee once again urges the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken to fully guarantee the rights under the Convention to civil servants (including teachers in the public sector).

The Committee once again recalls that for several years it has been expressing its concern over the Labour Proclamation (2003), which falls short of ensuring full application of the Convention. In particular, the Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government:

- to ensure the right to organize of the following categories of workers excluded, by section 3, from the scope of application of the Labour Proclamation: workers whose employment relations arise out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship); contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes; managerial employees, as well as employees of state administration; judges and prosecutors, who were governed by special laws;
- to delete air transport and urban bus services from the list of essential services in which strike action is prohibited (section 136(2));
- to amend its legislation so as to ensure that, except in situations concerning essential services in the strict sense of the term, acute national crisis and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, recourse to arbitration is allowed only upon the request of both parties;
- to amend section 158(3), according to which the strike vote should be taken by the majority of the workers concerned in a meeting in which at least two-thirds of the members of the trade union were present, so as to lower the quorum required for a strike ballot; and
- to ensure that the provisions of the Labour Proclamation which, as noted above, restrict the right of workers to organize their activities, are not invoked to cancel an organization's registration pursuant to section 120(c) until they have been brought into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee regrets that the Government provides no indication as to the concrete measures taken to bring the legislation and practice into greater conformity with the Convention, nor is there any mention of a timetable on steps to be taken as requested by the Conference Committee. In these circumstances, the Committee urges the Government to provide detailed information with its next report on the measures envisaged in this regard and on the time frame for such action.

The Committee recalls the previous comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and Education International (EI) concerning specific violations of the Convention regarding teachers' trade union rights in the public sector, including the control by the Government of a teachers' trade union, and the harassment of teachers (dismissals, transfers, etc.) in connection with their expression of their freedom of association rights. The Committee once again urges the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into these allegations and to provide full information in its next report.

The Committee had previously noted that the national legislation, in particular the Labour Proclamation (2003), provided inadequate protection of the rights afforded by the Convention and expressed the following concerns:

- Scope of application of the Convention. According to its section 3, the Labour Proclamation was not applicable to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care of rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes and managerial employees. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the categories of worker excluded from the scope of the Labour Proclamation enjoy the rights under the Convention, either by amending the Labour Proclamation or by adopting specific legislative provisions.

- Absence of adequate protection against acts of interference. The Committee had requested the Government to amend its legislation by adopting specific provisions coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, providing for protection of organizations of employers and workers against acts of interference by each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration so as to give full effect to Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention.
- Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had requested the Government to amend section 130(6) of the Labour Proclamation, as amended by Proclamation No. 494/2006, providing that, if the negotiation to modify or replace a collective agreement is not finalized within three months from the expiry date of the collective agreement, the provisions of the collective agreement relating to wages and other benefits shall cease to be effective. The Committee considered that this provision did not take into account the reasons behind a failure to finalize a new agreement nor the eventual responsibility of one or the other party for this failure and was not conducive to promoting collective bargaining. The Committee also considered that it was up to the parties to decide on the moment when the collective agreement becomes inapplicable after the date of its expiration.

The Committee had noted the Government's indication in its previous report that the above comments with regard to the application of the Convention to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes were on the agenda to be discussed by the Ethiopian labour law reform committee and that the discussion would be extended to the Committee's observation protection to be granted to workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference committed by each other, as well as on Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Labour Proclamation will be amended without delay so as to ensure its full conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to indicate progress made in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the rights under the Convention of managerial employees.

The Committee recalls that it had previously taken note of article 4 of the draft regulation concerning employment relations established by religious or charity organizations, which provided that "religious or charity organizations employing persons for administrative or charity work shall not be obliged to enter into collective bargaining concerning salary increment, fringe benefits, bonus and similar other benefits which may incur financial expense upon the organization". Recalling that collective bargaining should be promoted also in respect of these categories of worker and that no restrictions on the scope of bargaining should be imposed on workers by religious or charity institutions, the Committee had requested the Government to bring this draft into conformity with the Convention. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that the draft regulation has already been presented at the consultative meeting with the persons concerned and it was decided that the draft regulation should be replaced with a new draft regulation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard and to transmit a copy of the bill once it has been drafted.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee once again urges the Government to amend the Civil Servant Proclamation so as to ensure the right of civil servants, including public teachers, to defend their occupational interests through collective bargaining. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Fiji

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in communications dated 29 August 2008 and 4 September 2009 concerning issues already raised by the Committee, as well as allegations of police disruption of the National Union of Public Workers annual meeting and of the brief detention of its general secretary and his lawyer. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that recourse to force during trade union activities is unjustified, unless it is absolutely necessary, and that the arrest and detention of trade union leaders, without any charges being brought and without a warrant, constitutes a grave violation of the principle of freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations on the ITUC's comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 3(2) of the Employment Relations Act No. 36 of 2007 (ERA) so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the prisons and correction services are governed by separate legislation but that they enjoy similar privileges in regard to terms and conditions of employment except for the right to strike or access to the institutions under the ERA, and that on 29 November 2006, the Parliament had committed to undertake a revision of section 3 of the ERA to also include the correctional authorities (including workers in the prisons and correction services). The Committee must once again recall that the only admissible exceptions to the right to organize are those explicitly provided for under Article 9 of the Convention, i.e. the armed forces and the police. All other categories of workers, without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee considers that the functions exercised by prison guards are different from the regular functions of the army and the police and do not justify their exclusion from the right to organize (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 56). The Committee hopes that, under the revision of section 3(2) of the ERA, prison guards will enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in that regard in its next report.

Right to join organizations of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 119(2) of the ERA, in order to enable workers exercising more than one occupational activity in different occupations or sectors to join the corresponding trade unions as full members. While noting the Government's statement that it is almost unknown for a worker to have two jobs in Fiji and that it considers multi-union membership as a luxury, the Committee considers that demanding that workers belong to no more than one union in order to sign an application for registration may unduly infringe upon the right of workers to join organizations of their choosing. Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to amend section 119(2) of the ERA so as to allow workers who engage in more than one occupational activity in different occupations or sectors to join corresponding trade unions.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. Previously, the Committee had asked the Government to amend section 122(1)(c) of the ERA, which grants the Registrar the power to determine whether a trade union name is "undesirable" and refuse the organization's registration until an alteration has been made. In this respect the Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that it is appropriate for the Registrar to hold and wield these general discretionary powers as the adoption of appropriate names has always been the source of conflicts and social unrest. The Committee recalls once again that the term "undesirable" is too general and establishes a genuinely discretionary power in the Registrar. The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to amend section 122(1)(c) of the ERA so as to establish safeguards against interference by the Registrar.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information as to the manner in which the principal objectives of the persons seeking registration were determined and evaluated by the Registrar, who under section 125(1)(a) of the ERA may refuse registration if the principal objectives of the persons seeking registration are not in accordance with those set out in the definition of a trade union. The Committee takes note of the Government's answer that the Registrar exercises his discretion and that the factors used by the Registrar are whether the applicants are genuine in their application for the purposes of collective bargaining as an extension of social dialogue to improve terms and conditions of employment or a mere formality. The Committee considers, in this respect, that section 125(1)(a) of the ERA confers upon the authorities wide discretionary powers in deciding whether or not an organization meets all the conditions for registration. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend section 125(1)(a) of the ERA, by ensuring, for instance, that refusals to register an organization under the said section are determined on the basis of objective criteria.

Article 3. Right to draw up constitutions and rules. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 184 of the ERA, which entitled the courts to decide the sanctions against trade union members for refusal to participate in a strike, so as to grant this power to the trade unions themselves. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the Committee's comments will be taken to social partners through the Employment Relations Advisory Board for deliberation. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that section 184 of the ERA will soon be amended so that the issue of sanctions against trade union members for refusal to participate in a strike can be left to trade union constitutions and rules and requests the Government to indicate the results of the Employment Relations Advisory Board's deliberations.

Right to elect workers' and employers' representatives in full freedom. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 127 of the ERA, which provides that officers of a registered trade union must have been engaged or occupied for a period of not less than six months in an industry, trade or occupation with which the union is directly concerned and 127(d) of the ERA, which forbids non citizens of the Fiji Islands to be trade union officers. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the Committee's comments will be taken to the social partners through the Employment Relations Advisory Board for deliberation. The Committee recalls that provisions of this type infringe the organization's right to elect representatives in full freedom by preventing qualified persons from carrying out union duties or by depriving unions of the benefit of the experience of certain officers (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 117). The Committee expresses the hope that section 127 of the ERA will soon be amended so as to allow for a certain proportion of the officers to come from outside the particular profession, and to allow non-citizens to run for trade union office at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country. It further requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the Board's deliberations with respect to sections 127 and 127(d) of the ERA.

Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 128 of the ERA, which provides that the account books and other related documents must be open to inspection during normal business hours by the Registrar, and that the Registrar may request detailed and certified accounts from the treasurer and also provides for fines or imprisonment in case a person obstructs or impedes the Registrar in carrying out an inspection. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the obligation for submission of annual returns has been put back by five months and that, furthermore, the Registrar only intervenes when a complaint has been lodged. However, the Committee must recall that a provision which grants authorities the power to examine the books of an organization at any time, unless there is a complaint from a certain percentage of the trade union members, infringes the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 125). Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to amend section 128 of the ERA so as to ensure that the power of the Registrar to examine trade union accounts is explicitly limited to cases where a complaint from a certain percentage of members needs to be investigated, or when the annual returns give rise to a manifest need to inspect trade union accounts.

Secret ballot. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend section 175(3)(b) of the ERA, which provides that each issue on which a strike mandate is sought must be supported in a strike ballot by more than 50 per cent of all members entitled to vote. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the situation in Fiji is such that allegiance to the extended family influences the result of the secret ballot, thus justifying the maintenance of section 175(3)(b) of the ERA. In these circumstances, the Committee must once again recall that although a ballot requirement does not, in principle, raise problems of compatibility with the Convention, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult, or even impossible in practice. If a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend section 175(3)(b) of the ERA so as to ensure that only a simple majority of the votes cast in a secret ballot is required.

Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 180 of the ERA, which allowed the Government to declare the illegality of a strike, in order to grant that power to an independent body which has the confidence of the parties involved. It takes note of the Government's statement that the criteria to determine the legality of a strike are stated by the law, but that the Minister still has a discretionary, but not mandatory, power, after considering other factors, to declare strikes or lockouts unlawful. It further notes that such decision may be appealed to the courts, by means of section 241 of the ERA. The Committee recalls once again that responsibility for declaring a strike illegal should not be with the Government. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 180 of the ERA, so that responsibility for declaring a strike illegal lies with an independent body which has the confidence of the parties involved.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 169 and 170 of the ERA, which enable each party to a dispute to refer it to the Permanent Secretary, who must refer it to mediation, and sections 181(c) and 191(1)(c) of the ERA, which enable the Minister to apply to the Court for an injunction to discontinue a strike if satisfied that the strike is not in the public interest or will jeopardize or is likely to jeopardize, inter alia, the economy. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the said laws are necessary for the preservation of the fragile economy during industrial disputes. Nevertheless, the Committee must recall once again that a very serious prohibition may also result in practice from the cumulative effect of the provisions relating to collective labour disputes under which, at the request of one of the parties or at the discretion of the public authorities, disputes must be referred to a compulsory arbitration procedure leading to a final award which is binding on the parties concerned. These systems make it possible to prohibit virtually all strikes or to end them quickly: such a prohibition seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes, and is not compatible with Article 3 of the Convention (See General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 153). Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend sections 169, 170, 181(c) and 191(1)(c) of the ERA so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration can only be imposed at the request of both parties to a dispute, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term or for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 204, 206 and 207 of the ERA, which stated the composition, appointment (seemingly without predetermined criteria), term of office and vacation of members of the Employment Tribunal, so as to reinforce the independence and the appearance of impartiality of its members. It takes note of the Government's statement that mediators operate under a code of ethics, that their conduct can be reviewed by a judge and that one key criterion for the qualification of members of the Employment Tribunal is the acquisition of a recognized professional mediation accreditation. The Committee notes in this regard that the said code of ethics for mediators sets minimum standards to guide mediators in performing their duties and functions, that it provides that parties should come to a voluntary, uncoerced decision in which each party makes free and informed choices, and that a mediator must conduct mediation in an impartial manner and avoid conduct that gives the appearance of partiality.

Penalties against the staging of an unlawful strike. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 256(a) of the ERA, which, when read with section 250 of the ERA, provides for a possible penalty of imprisonment in case of the staging of an unlawful strike. The Committee notes the Government's statement in this regard, including that the said clause's purpose is to encourage good faith in employment relationships, that all prison sentences must be justified, and that all defendants are accorded sufficient judicial safeguards. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take measures to amend section 256(a) of the ERA, taking into account the abovementioned principle.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention and requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee had previously referred to the dispute in the Vatukoula Mining Company (concerning the refusal to recognize a union and the dismissal of striking workers 15 years ago), and had requested the Government to give consideration to the recommendation of the Senate Select Committee for assistance to help the remaining workers re-establish themselves. It takes note of the Government's statement that there has been a change of ownership in the mines, that a significant number of these strikers and their children have been employed by the new employer in the mines and that the Government has also provided those still unemployed with alternative means of livelihood through a small business scheme subsidized by the Government since the beginning of 2007.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to amend section 10 of the Counter-Inflation (Remuneration) Act which envisages, if need be, the restriction or regulation of remuneration of any kind by order of the Prices and Incomes Boards and stipulates that any agreement or arrangement which does not respect these limitations will be illegal and deemed to be an offence. While noting the Government's statements that section 10 restricts bargaining on wages only, that it would be activated only in the event of an economic crisis, taking into account the economy's vulnerability to external shocks, and that it had been used only twice in the past 30 years, the Committee must once again recall that the possibility of reactivating this provision at any time is not in conformity with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining. Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to amend section 10 of the Counter-Inflation (Remuneration) Act and bring it into full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention.

Gabon

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 2007 reporting the arrest and arbitrary detention of representatives of the Free Trade Union Confederation of Gabon (CGSL) over recent years. It notes that, in a communication dated 26 August 2009, the ITUC once again reports cases of the arrest and harassment of members of the CGSL. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that replies to the issues raised by the ITUC have been provided to the Committee on Freedom of Association and that the dispute which gave rise to the arrests has been resolved. The Committee recalls that the arrest and detention, even if only briefly, of trade union leaders and trade unionists for exercising legitimate activities without any charges being laid or court warrants being issued constitutes a serious violation of the principles of freedom of association. The Committee urges the Government to guarantee the representatives of the CGSL the unimpeded exercise of their trade union rights.

Furthermore, the Committee noted the 2007 observations of the Trade Union Congress of Gabon (CSG) reporting the Government's refusal to consider the issue of the representativeness of trade unions and calling for the organization of trade union elections. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the designation of the most representative trade union confederations in the country is not the result of a unilateral decision by the Government, but the outcome of an agreement concluded on 27 March 2007 between six trade union confederations (COSYGA, CGSL, USAP, UTG, CONSINEQ and Intersyndicale), which designated the four most representative organizations to participate in the consultative bodies envisaged by the Labour Code, prior to their subsequent determination through trade union elections. In this respect, the Government, confirming that the issue of the representativeness of trade union confederations raised by the CSG remains topical, once again requests the assistance of the Office for the organization of trade union elections. The Committee recalls that the determination of the most representative organizations must be based on objective, pre-established and precise criteria so as to avoid any possibility of bias or abuse (see the 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 97). The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to resolve the problem of the representativeness of trade union organizations, which it acknowledges, and hopes that it will be able to benefit from ILO technical assistance. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress achieved in this respect in its next report.

Gambia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Labour Act No. 5 of 2007, which replaces the Labour Act No. 12 of 1990, and wishes to raise in this respect, the following points.

Scope of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to guarantee that the rights afforded by the Convention were ensured for workers engaged in the prison service, domestic service and civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee regrets that the new Labour Act does not apply to the abovementioned categories of workers (section 3(2)). The Committee recalls that only the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State can be excluded from the guarantees of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the rights afforded by the Convention are guaranteed to prison service workers, domestic service workers and civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to ensure that all workers were guaranteed protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, regardless of whether their employment relationship was based or not on a written contract. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the new Labour Act applies to all employment relationships (section 3(1)). The Committee further notes with satisfaction section 50 providing for nullity of contractual provisions prohibiting trade union membership in a contract of employment, and section 83(2)(e) prohibiting dismissals and disciplinary actions on account of trade union membership and activities. The Committee also notes with satisfaction that the new Act provides remedies of reinstatement and/or compensation for anti-union dismissals (section 92(2)).

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to ensure sufficient protection against acts of interference by workers' and employers' organizations (or their agents) in each other's affairs. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 109(1) of the new Act prohibits an employer from promoting the establishment of workers' organizations under its domination and provides for a sanction of not less than 50,000 dalasis in case of non-compliance with this provision. The Committee further notes that a court can order the cancellation of the registration of a workers' association dominated by an employer or any other adequate remedy (section 109(3) and (4)).

Article 4. Measures to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or their organizations and workers' organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had expressed its concern at the discretionary power of the authorities to deny registration of collective agreements. The Committee notes with satisfaction that under section 123 of the Act, the commissioner responsible for registering a collective agreement has an obligation to register such an agreement upon the application of both parties.

The Committee notes that according to section 130 of the Act, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union should represent a certain percentage of employees under a contract of service (30 per cent in the case of a single union and at least 45 per cent if the establishment in question employs at least 100 people; in this case, the bargaining agent could be composed of two or more trade unions). The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should not be denied to other unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee further notes that section 131 of the Act provides that an employer may, if he or she wishes, organize a secret ballot to establish a sole bargaining agent. The Committee considers that the organization of a ballot for determining representativeness should be carried out by the authorities or an independent party upon a request presented by a union. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 131 of the Act in accordance with the principle above.

Georgia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2008, the observations made thereon by the Georgian Employers' Association (GEA), as well as the Government's reply. The Committee also notes that the GTUC submitted allegations referring to the same matters to the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the Law on trade unions and the Labour Code of 2006. It notes that, in its report, the Government indicates that a memorandum was signed between the Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Affairs (MoHLSA), the GTUC and the GEA with a view to institutionalizing social dialogue in the country. Since then, the social partners have been regularly holding sessions to discuss issues concerning the labour legislation with an emphasis on the issues of compliance with Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee further notes with interest that, in line with the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, over the course of 2009, the ILO has been providing technical support to the tripartite constituents to advance the process of dialogue and the review of the labour legislation. The Committee further notes with interest the holding in October 2009 of an ILO tripartite round table in Tbilisi which discussed the current status of national labour legislation, application of Convention No. 87 and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), and promotion of tripartism in Georgia. The Committee also notes with interest Decree No. 335 of 12 November 2009 issued by the Prime Minister of Georgia, which formalized and institutionalized the National Social Dialogue Commission, as well as the creation of a tripartite working group to review and analyse the conformity of the national legislation with the findings and recommendations of the Committee and to propose the necessary amendments. The Committee hopes that any proposed amendments will take into account its comments and requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard.

Law on trade unions. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 2(9) of the Law on trade unions so as to lower the minimum trade union membership requirement set at 100. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this requirement concerns establishment of trade union confederations and not of primary trade unions. The Government provides examples of primary trade unions with a membership below 100 persons. The Committee notes that, according to section 2(3) of the Law, trade unions can be established at any enterprise, institution, organization and other places of work, and that, according to section 2(6), "a trade union should be formed on a sectoral, territorial and other basis of the occupational nature". According to section 2(7), "trade unions are entitled to form primary trade unions at the enterprises, institutions and other places of work", and "nation-wide trade union organizations and associations (federations) ... regional, district, town trade union organizations and associations, as well as trade union organizations and associations and the enterprises and institutions". The Committee understands that section 2(9) refers to trade unions and not primary trade unions, which are regulated under section 3(9) and indeed require 15 members for their establishment. The Committee further notes that section 2(9) refers expressly to "trade unions", that is trade unions established on a sectoral, industrial, occupational and other levels pursuant to section 2(6) and not to "confederations of trade unions". The Committee considers that the minimum requirement of 100 workers to establish unions by branch of activity, occupation or for various occupations is too high and should be reduced. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information with its next report on the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 2(9) of the Law on trade unions so as to lower the minimum trade union membership requirement and, in the meantime, to indicate the impact of this provision on the establishment of trade unions at the branch or sectoral levels, including information on the number of such trade unions and their respective membership.

Labour Code. The Committee had previously noted section 49(5) of the Code providing that, after the warning strike, the parties shall participate in the amicable settlement procedures pursuant to the Labour Code. The Committee had noted, however, that the Labour Code did not provide for such a procedure and requested the Government to give consideration to appropriate mechanisms of conciliation, mediation or voluntary arbitration instead. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, amicable settlement procedures are provided for in section 48 of the Code. The Committee notes that, under this section, such procedures involve: (1) a written notice of commencement of the amicable procedure reflecting the grounds of dispute and claims by one party; (2) a review of the notice by the other party and its reply; and (3) written decision by the representatives of the parties, which would become a part of the existing contract of employment. If no agreement has been reached within 14 days, the "other party is entitled to apply to court or arbitration" (section 48(5)). The Committee considers that the legislation could establish specific mechanisms to facilitate dispute settlement between the parties. Such procedures could involve a neutral and independent third party, in whom the parties have confidence, and who could facilitate breaking a stalemate which the parties are unable to resolve themselves. Noting that in its report the Government recognizes the need to develop mechanisms of conciliation and mediation to help reduce the incidence of disputes, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the concrete measures taken to that end.

With regard to section 48(5) of the Code, according to which, if an agreement is not reached within 14 days, one of the parties is entitled to submit the dispute to the court or arbitration, the Committee had recalled that a provision which permitted either party unilaterally to submit the dispute for compulsory arbitration effectively undermined the right of workers to call a strike. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend this provision so as to ensure that recourse to arbitration is limited only to situations where the right to strike can be restricted or banned, that is in: (1) essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population); (2) the public services only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; or (3) in the event of an acute national emergency. The Committee notes the Government's indication that recourse to the court of arbitration is not compulsory and an employee can declare a strike regardless of whether an appeal was filed or not. The Committee understands that, under section 48(5), the results of the arbitration (or court) procedure are compulsory and would therefore render meaningless the right to strike. The Committee therefore reiterates its previous request and asks the Government to indicate measures taken or envisaged to amend section 48(5) of the Code.

The Committee had also noted section 49(8) of the Code, which provided that a strike could not continue for more than 90 calendar days. The Committee notes that, in the Government's opinion, this provision is in conformity with the Convention, as the latter does not provide for the right to hold strikes of unlimited duration. With regard to the duration of the strike, the Committee considers that a legislation limiting duration of the strike to 90 days seriously undermines one of the essential means through which workers and their organizations may promote and defend their economic and social interests. The Committee considers that the right to strike should not be restricted though predetermined limitation on the duration imposed by the legislation and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal this provision. The Government may wish to consider, however, establishing a system of negotiated minimum services when dealing with a strike in non-essential services, which due to its extent and duration endangers the normal living conditions of the population.

The Committee had further requested the Government to amend section 51(2) of the Code, which prohibited strikes in sectors where "work is impossible to suspend due to the technological mode of work". Instead of prohibition of strikes in such services, the Committee suggested establishing a system of minimum services. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 51(2) sets the minimum services requirement. The Committee points out, however, that this provision refers to the prohibition of strikes, without any reference to the system of minimum services and conditions thereof. With regard to the minimum service, the Committee recalls that such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. It would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 51(2) of the Code taking into account the above principle and to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Finally, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 51(4) and (5) of the Code providing that a strike by employees informed about termination of their contract before the dispute arises is illegal and that, if the right to strike arises before the termination of the time-based contract, the strike is considered illegal after the expiration of the term of the contract. The Committee notes that the Government confirms that after the termination of the labour contract the strike is considered illegal and indicates that there is no need for an amendment of the Code in this regard. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the situations (mentioned above) when the right to strike can be restricted or prohibited. It notes furthermore that the prohibition imposed on workers in section 51(4) and (5) would run counter to the workers' right to go on sympathy and protest strikes, which, according to the Government's indication, are legal under the national legislation. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend section 51(4) and (5) so as to bring it in line with the above principle and to indicate measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2008, the observations made thereon by the Georgian Employers' Association (GEA), as well as the Government's reply. The Committee also notes that the GTUC submitted allegations referring to the same matters to the Committee on Freedom of Association. It further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitted in a communication dated 26 August 2009 referring to the same issues as well as to the matters previously raised by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that it had previously expressed its concern at the several provisions of the Labour Code adopted in 2006. In particular, the Committee considered that the Labour Code did not provide for an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination and meaningful promotion of collective bargaining. It notes in this respect, the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008, which considered that a tripartite round table to address these issues in a context of full dialogue together with ILO technical assistance, could facilitate further progress on matters relating to the promotion of collective bargaining and the protection of the right to organize, both in law and in practice.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that a memorandum was signed between the Ministry of Health, Labour and Social Affairs (MoHLSA), the GTUC and the GEA with a view to institutionalizing social dialogue in the country. Since then, the social partners have been regularly holding sessions to discuss issues concerning the labour legislation with an emphasis on the issues of compliance with the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and Convention No. 98. The Committee further notes with interest that, in line with the conclusions of the Conference Committee, over the course of 2009, the ILO has been providing technical support to the tripartite constituents to advance the process of dialogue and the review of the labour legislation. The Committee further notes with interest the holding in October 2009 of an ILO tripartite round table in Tbilisi which discussed the current status of the national labour legislation, application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and promotion of tripartism in Georgia. The Committee also notes with interest Decree No. 335 of 12 November 2009 issued by the Prime Minister of Georgia, which formalized and institutionalized the National Social Dialogue Commission, as well as the creation of a tripartite working group to review and analyse the conformity of the national legislation with the findings and recommendations of the Committee and to propose the necessary amendments. The Committee hopes that any proposed amendments will take into account its following comments and requests the Government to provide information on the developments in this regard.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had previously noted that section 11(6) of the Law on trade unions and section 2(3) of the Labour Code prohibited, in very general terms, anti-union discrimination, and did not appear to constitute sufficient protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment of workers and at the time of termination of their employment. In particular, the Committee had noted that, pursuant to section 5(8) of the Labour Code, an employer was not required to substantiate his/her decision for not recruiting an applicant and considered that the application of this section in practice might result in placing on a worker an insurmountable obstacle when proving that he/she was not recruited because of his/her trade union activities. The Committee had also noted that, according to sections 37(d) and 38(3) of the Code, the employer had a right to terminate a contract at his/her initiative with an employee, provided that the employee was given one month's pay, unless otherwise envisaged by the contract. The Committee considered that, in light of the absence of explicit provisions banning dismissals by reason of union membership or participating in union activities, as well as the absence of provisions regulating cases of anti-union dismissals, the Labour Code did not offer sufficient protection against anti-union dismissals. The Committee notes that the Government refers to the general prohibition of anti-union discrimination provided for in article 26 of the Constitution, section 11(6) of the Law on trade unions and section 2(3) of the Labour Code and considers that the legislation is in compliance with the Convention. The Government indicates nevertheless that the tripartite working group will review the legislation as necessary. With regard to the protection at the time of recruitment, the Committee is of the opinion that, since it may often be difficult, if not impossible, for a worker to prove that he/she has been the victim of an act of anti-union discrimination, legislation could provide ways to remedy these difficulties, for instance by stipulating that grounds for the decision of non-recruitment should be made available upon request. With regard to the termination of employment, the Committee considers that legislation which allows the employer in practice to terminate the employment of a worker on condition that he/she pay the compensation provided for by law in all cases of unjustified dismissal, without any specific protection aimed at preventing anti-union discrimination, is insufficient under the terms of Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee therefore trusts that the necessary measures to revise sections 5(8), 37(d) and 38(3) of the Labour Code will soon be taken so as to ensure that the Labour Code provides for an adequate protection against anti-union discrimination taking into account the principles above. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes article 42 of the Code of Administrative Breaches and section 142 of the Criminal Code imposing penalties for violation of the labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the form of compensation available to workers, victims of acts of anti-union discrimination, including dismissals, transfers, downgrading, etc.

Article 2. Protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers. With regard to the Committee's previous request to provide for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, the Committee notes the Government's statement that section 42 of the Code of Administrative Violations punishes violations of labour legislation and labour protection rules by a penalty equivalent to a minimum of 100 times the labour remuneration and that the same violation committed within one year following the imposition of an administrative penalty is punishable by a penalty equivalent to 200 times the labour remuneration.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 13 of the Labour Code, the employer (unilaterally) is authorized to specify the duration of a business week, the daily schedule, shifts, the duration of breaks, the time and place of remuneration payment, the duration of and the procedure for granting a leave and unpaid leave, the rules for complying with labour conditions, the type and the procedure for work-related incentives and responsibilities, the procedures for consideration of complaints/applications and other special rules subject to the specifics of the business of the organization. The Committee notes the Government's indication that an employer is authorized to introduce internal operation rules only if working conditions are not regulated by a labour agreement (either individual or collective) and that if working conditions are regulated by a labour agreement, such an agreement prevails over any other internal rules.

The Committee had previously noted that sections 41–43 of the Labour Code seemed to put in the same position collective agreements concluded with trade union organizations and agreements between an employer and non-unionized workers, including as few as two workers. The Committee notes that the Government points out that Convention No. 98 does not stipulate that collective agreements must prevail over individual agreements and confirms that, under the national legislation, agreements concluded with trade unions and agreements with non-unionized workers are treated equally. The Government emphasizes that, under the national legislation, the right to bargain collectively is not solely a trade union prerogative; other groupings of employees can also engage in negotiations with an employer. The Committee finds it difficult to reconcile the equal status given in the law to these two types of agreement with the ILO principles on collective bargaining, according to which the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations should be encouraged and promoted, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. If, in the course of collective bargaining with the trade union, the enterprise offers better working conditions to non-unionized workers under individual agreements, there is a serious risk that this might undermine the negotiating capacity of the trade union and give rise to discriminatory situations in favour of the non-unionized staff; furthermore, it might encourage unionized workers to withdraw from the union. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the Collective Agreements Recommendation, 1951 (No. 91), which emphasizes the role of workers' organizations as one of the parties in collective bargaining. Considering that direct negotiation between the undertaking and its employees, bypassing representative organizations where these exist, runs counter to the principle that negotiation between employers and organizations of workers should be encouraged and promoted, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to ensure that the position of trade unions is not undermined by the existence of other employees' representatives or discriminatory situations in favour of the non-unionized staff. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which most of the Georgian state institutions and companies have collective agreements with trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded in the country within the next reporting period and to provide statistics in this regard in relation to the private sector.

Germany

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it has been requesting for a number of years the adoption of measures so as to recognize the right of public servants ("Beamte" including postal workers, railway employees and teachers among others) who are not exercising authority in the name of the State, to have recourse to strike action. In this respect, the Committee had noted in several of its previous comments that innovative developments took place with a view to devising draft legislation on the comprehensive modernization of the law governing civil servants, in collaboration with the trade unions concerned, in order to gain broad support for the considerable changes in conditions of employment involved in the new draft legislation. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that there have been no changes since the previous report.

The Committee once again recalls that it has always considered that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to workers and their organizations for the promotion and protection of their economic and social interests. While accepting that the right to strike may be restricted or even prohibited in the public service, the Committee has clearly established that such a limitation may be applied only in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. In the Committee's view, postal workers, railway employees and teachers among others are not included in this category and should therefore have the right to strike, although the maintenance of a minimum service may be foreseen in the event of strikes in these sectors.

In light of the foregoing, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State can have recourse to strike action in defence of their economic, social and occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any concrete measures adopted in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee takes note of the comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention.

Several of the Committee's previous comments concerned the procedures through which the conditions of employment of civil servants, including teachers, are determined. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the lack of further progress on the modernization of the civil service legislation under the present Government. The Committee notes that the Government, in its report, indicates that it is the responsibility of the Länder and not of the federal Government to employ teachers and to decide whether they should be hired as civil servants or under a collective agreement and that to compensate for civil servants' lack of strike rights and inability to enter into wage negotiations, the umbrella organizations of the civil servants' unions take part in the initial preparation of the general regulations pertaining to civil servant law, at the federal level under section 118 of the federal law on civil servants (BBG), and in the Länder under section 53 of the law on the status of civil servants. The Committee also notes that the Government indicates that in the case of the recent reform laws (the law reforming the public service law (Dienstrechtsneuordnungsgesetz) and the law on the status of civil servants (Beamtenstatusgesetz)) the consultative procedure was respected and umbrella organizations were involved in the legislative process at an early stage.

The Committee once again recalls that it is contrary to the Convention to exclude from the right to collective bargaining those categories of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. In this respect, the Committee considers that teachers carry out different duties from officials engaged in the administration of the State, and therefore of the "BUND" and should enjoy the guarantees provided for under Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that negotiations need not necessarily lead to legally binding instruments so long as account is taken in good faith of the results of the negotiations in question.

In the light of the above comments, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to study, together with the trade union organizations concerned, ways in which the current system could be developed so as to ensure a proper application of the Convention.

Ghana

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009, particularly concerning the persistent refusal of some employers to the unionization of their employees in export processing zones, a current dispute concerning unionization in the export processing zones pending before the National Labour Commission and instances of anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to respond to the comments of the ITUC.

Prison staff. In several of its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to ensure that prison service staff enjoy the right to organize and bargain collectively. The Committee notes that the Government's report indicates that the Ghana Prison Service is a state agency classified under the security and intelligence agencies which derived its mandate from the Security and Intelligence Agencies Act, 1996 (Act 526). The Committee notes that the Government's report once again indicates that the concerns raised by the Committee have been communicated to the competent authorities. Recalling once again that the Convention's guarantees apply to prison service staff, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Act, so as to ensure that prison service staff expressly enjoy the right to organize and to collective bargaining, and to provide information on any measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

Collective bargaining certification. The Committee had previously noted that sections 99–100 of the Labour Act, 2003, regulate the issue of trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes by providing that the Chief Labour Officer shall issue, upon request by a trade union, a certificate appointing that trade union as the appropriate representative to conduct negotiations on behalf of the class of workers specified in the collective bargaining certificate. The Committee further noted that under section 99(4), the Chief Labour Officer appeared to have full discretion to decide which trade union to grant recognition to, in situations where more than one trade union existed at the workplace, and that the criteria upon which this decision should be based were not specified. The Committee notes that the Government, in its report, indicates that in this situation, the Chief Labour Officer will consult with both trade unions to undertake verification to determine which union is to be issued a bargaining certificate. In these circumstances, the Committee once again recalls that when national legislation provides for a compulsory procedure for recognizing unions as exclusive bargaining agents, certain safeguards should be attached, such as: (a) the certification to be made by an independent body; (b) the representative organization to be chosen by a majority vote of the employees in the unit concerned; (c) the right of an organization, which in a previous trade union election failed to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, to request a new election after a stipulated period; and (d) the right of any new organization other than the certified organization to demand a new election after a reasonable period has elapsed (see the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 240). The Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to adopt the appropriate regulations establishing procedures and objective criteria concerning the Chief Labour Officer's competence to determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate, in keeping with the abovementioned principle, and to provide information on developments in this regard.

Greece

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes the observations dated 20 February 2009 from the Greek Federation of Bank Employee Unions (OTOE) on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to Case No. 2502. The Committee notes that its attention has been drawn by the Committee on Freedom of Association and the OTOE to two legislative aspects:

Intervention by the authorities concerning the provisions of collective agreements relating to supplementary pension funds. The Committee notes that the OTOE's observations relate to Act No. 3371/2005, which permits the unilateral denunciation of collective agreements concerning the supplementary pension funds of bank employees and provides that the private funds in question established under collective agreements will be automatically transferred to a single public fund. The Committee notes the 2007 conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, according to which "state bodies should refrain from intervening to alter the content of freely-concluded collective agreements. Giving by law a special incentive encouraging one of the parties to these agreements to denounce or cancel collective agreements by which pension funds were set up constitutes interference with the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining. ... Nothing in Convention No. 98 enables the Government to step in and unilaterally determine these issues, much less to unilaterally determine that the assets of a private pension fund, established by collective agreement, can be automatically transferred to a public pension scheme. The establishment of the funds through collective bargaining as well as trade union participation in the administration of these funds constituted a trade union activity with which the Government unduly interfered". The Committee further notes that a number of court decisions have been issued concerning the application of Act No. 3371/2005, and these have reiterated that the unilateral denunciation of collective agreements was null and void. The Committee observes that, in the light of the above, it has been asking the Government for a number of years to hold full consultations on the future of the supplementary pension funds of bank employees and of their assets so that the related issues are resolved by mutual agreement of the parties to the collective agreements by which the supplementary pension funds were set up (the banks and the representatives of the bank employees), and to amend Act No. 3371/2005 in the light of any agreement reached.

Exclusion of retirement-related matters from the scope of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that Act No. 1876/1990 on free collective bargaining and other provisions states, in section 2(3), that retirement-related matters are excluded from the scope of collective agreements. The Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2502, which emphasize that supplementary pension schemes can legitimately be considered as benefits that may be the subject of collective bargaining, and asks the Government to take all the necessary measures as soon as possible to amend section 2(3) of Act No. 1876/1990 so as to ensure that supplementary pension schemes are not excluded from collective bargaining. The Committee fully endorses this recommendation.

The Committee notes with interest the recent communication from the Government dated 6 November 2009 indicating that, owing to a change of majority following the legislative elections of October 2009, its position now coincides with that of the OTOE and new consultations are planned with the OTOE and the Hellenic Bank Association with a view to finding an acceptable solution for all parties regarding the problems posed by Act No. 3371/2005 and Act No. 1876/1990. The Committee encourages the Government to make every possible effort to settle this dispute, which goes back to 2005, and hopes that it will soon be able to report on progress made with regard to the requested legislative amendments. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any new developments in this respect.

Observations from the ITUC. The Committee notes the communication from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009 denouncing the violent assault on trade union leader Constantina Kuneva, general secretary of the Cleaning Industry Union of the Athens Region (PEKOP). Noting the ITUC's allegation that this assault was directly linked to her trade union activities, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any investigation made into the assault on the PEKOP general secretary and the results thereof.

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009 and the ten cases that are before the Committee on Freedom of Association (Cases Nos 2203, 2241, 2341, 2361, 2445, 2609, 2673, 2700, 2708 and 2709). In its previous observation, the Committee noted the report of the high-level mission which visited the country in April 2008 and the tripartite agreement signed during the mission with a view to improving the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the high-level mission undertaken from 16 to 20 February 2009 and the technical assistance missions of 3 January 2009, as well as a final mission to provide assistance to the Tripartite Committee for the Formulation of the Road Map on the measures requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards (this mission took place from 16 to 20 November 2009). The Committee notes that in the end there was no consensus between the social partners and the Road Map was prepared solely by the Government.

The Committee also notes the detailed comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2008 and by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala for the Defence Workers' Rights (MSICG) in defence of the rights of workers in a communication dated 28 August 2009 which relate to issues already raised by the Committee, as well as serious acts of violence against trade union members and leaders, obstacles to the process of registering trade union organizations, difficulties in the exercise of the right of assembly of trade unions and other alleged violations of the Convention. The Committee hopes that in the context of the tripartite agreement concluded during the high-level mission all of the matters raised, as well as the comments of the ITUC, the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA) and the MSICG will be examined and addressed in a tripartite context by the Government and the social partners in the framework of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, as well as the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases.

Acts of violence and impunity against trade unionists

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been noting in its observations acts of violence against trade unionists and impunity in this respect, and that it had asked the Government to indicate developments in this respect.

The Committee notes that, at the proposal of the high-level mission in 2008, the Tripartite Commission approved an agreement to eradicate violence, under the terms of which evaluations will be carried out of: "(1) institutional action, including the most recent activities, and in particular the special protection measures to prevent acts of violence against trade unionists who are under threat; and (2) of the measures that are being taken (increases in the budget and in the number of investigators) to guarantee that effective investigations are conducted with sufficient resources so as to be able to elucidate the crimes committed against trade unionists and to identify those responsible".

The Committee notes that both the ITUC and the MSICG in their comments place emphasis on grave acts of violence against trade union leaders and members during the period 2008–09 and report a climate of fear and intimidation with a view to undermining existing trade unions and preventing the establishment of new ones. Both trade union organizations also emphasize the deficiencies in the labour inspectorate and the crisis of the judicial system.

The Committee notes that in its statements to the Conference Committee and its report the Government indicates that: (1) the State of Guatemala expresses special interest in guaranteeing full respect for the human rights of trade unionists, and of all Guatemalan nationals in general, as well as reiterating the Government's commitment to combating impunity through the improvement of the judicial system and the labour administration system within the executive authority; (2) the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs met the Public Prosecutor and the Attorney-General with a view to requesting the establishment of a public prosecution service for crimes against journalists and trade unionists, with support being expressed for this request by each of the representatives of all sides; it had also met the Council of the Office of the Attorney-General, together with the Public Prosecutor, to discuss the subject of violence not only against trade unionists, but also against the lawyers representing trade unionists and against workers in general; (3) as a strategy of inter-institutional coordination and with a view to supporting the conduct of investigations, in November 2008 two meetings had been held with representatives of the Office of the Attorney-General, the Ministry of the Economy, the Ministry of Government, the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Supreme Court of Justice. The meetings had concluded that, in view of the existence of the Multi-institutional Commission for Industrial Relations in Guatemala, established in 2003, by Government Decision No. 430-2003, it was adequate to reactivate the Multi-institutional Commission to follow up cases of violence against trade unionists and other matters relating to industrial relations in the country, and accordingly to collaborate with the Office of the Attorney-General, and particularly with the Office of the Prosecutor General for the investigation and resolution of the cases; (4) during 2009, the Multi-institutional Commission for Industrial Relations in Guatemala had met regularly, holding four meetings between 1 January and 30 July 2009; (5) progress has been made in the criminal investigations of certain murders; for example, on 10 January 2009, a person was apprehended who had been charged with committing the murder of the trade union leader, Pedro Zamora, and on 15 April 2009 the public prosecutor lodged criminal charges with the judiciary, with the requirement to hold a trial; during the hearing on 4 June 2009, the magistrate found that there was sufficient evidence against the trade union member to conclude the preparatory stage and begin court proceedings; in the upcoming months, the accused will be tried in the criminal courts; and (6) there is no criminalization or stigmatization of trade union activity. The Government attaches a copy of the records of the meetings of the National Tripartite Commission. In a recent additional report, the Government indicates that the accused was not convicted by the court of the murder of the trade union leader Pedro Zamora and that the Office of the Attorney-General will appeal against the ruling.

The Committee refers to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, in which it noted with concern numerous and serious acts of violence against trade unionists, as well as the inefficiency of the criminal proceedings related to these violent acts, giving rise to a grave situation of impunity and the excessive delays in legal proceedings. It also noted the allegations concerning the lack of independence of the judiciary. The Committee on the Application of Standards noted the high-level mission which visited the country in 2009, which had emphasized that, while additional resources had been allocated to the investigatory mechanisms to combat impunity, further measures and resources were clearly necessary to that effect. In this connection, it observed with deep concern that the situation in relation to violence and impunity appeared to be worsening and it recalled with urgency the importance of ensuring that workers are able to carry out their trade union activities in a climate free from violence, threats and fear. The Committee on the Application of Standards highlighted the need to make meaningful progress in sentencing in relation to crimes of violence against trade unionists and in ensuring that, not only the direct authors of the crime, but also the instigators were punished. The Committee on the Application of Standards observed in this respect the need for the continued strengthening of and specific training for those responsible for investigating violence against trade unionists, as well as an improved collaboration of the various bodies mandated in this regard. The Committee on the Application of Standards hoped that concerted efforts in this regard would finally permit meaningful progress to be made in bringing an end to impunity.

Further noting with concern the important allegations of an anti-union climate in the country and the stigmatization of trade unions, the Committee on the Application of Standards recalled the intrinsic link between freedom of association and democracy. It further noted that, beyond the question of impunity, the conclusions of the high-level mission focused on the need for concerted action in relation to the effectiveness of the judicial system, the effective respect for freedom of association by all parties and the effective functioning of the National Tripartite Commission. In particular, the slowness and lack of independence of the judiciary has given rise to significant challenges to the development of the trade union movement. The Committee of Experts shares the opinion of the high-level mission of 2009 concerning the importance of adopting the necessary measures to ensure that awareness is raised to an adequate level concerning the fundamental role of trade unions in the social and economic development of society and their close links with the consolidation of democracy. For this reason, it is important for measures to be taken to actively prevent any stigmatization of trade unions and the trade union movement.

The Committee on the Application of Standards observed that, despite the seriousness of the problems, there had been no significant progress in the application of the Convention, in legislation or in practice. It urged the Government to redouble its efforts with respect to all the above matters and to adopt a complete, concrete and innovative strategy for the full implementation of the Convention, including through the necessary legal reforms, the strengthening of the programme for the protection of trade unionists and witnesses, and of the measures to combat impunity and the provision of the financial and human resources necessary for the labour inspectorate and the investigative bodies, such as the Office of the Public Prosecutor. The Committee on the Application of Standards expected, with the assistance and necessary technical cooperation of the Office, that the Government and the social partners would be in a position to agree upon a road map with clearly determined time frames for the necessary action in respect of all the above points. The implementation of this road map and any progress made should be reviewed periodically by the ILO. More tangibly, the Committee on the Application of Standards requested the Government to provide a detailed report to the Committee of Experts containing information on the tangible progress made in legislative reforms, the measures taken to combat impunity and the creation of a conducive environment for trade union movement and it expressed the firm hope that it would be in a position next year to note substantial improvements in the application of the Convention.

The Committee of Experts observes that many of the allegations in the MSICG's communication were submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association at its meeting in November 2009. In its conclusions, the Committee on Freedom of Association noted with concern that the allegations presented in this case were extremely serious and included numerous murders of union leaders and members (16), one disappearance, acts of violence (sometimes also against the relatives of union members), threats, physical harassment, intimidation, the rape of a family member of a trade unionist, obstacles to granting legal status to unions, the dissolution of a trade union, criminal proceedings for carrying out trade union activities, and major institutional failings with regard to labour inspection and the functioning of the judicial authorities, creating a situation of impunity in labour matters (for example, excessive delays, a lack of independence, failures to comply with reinstatement orders issued by the courts), and in criminal matters (see 355th Report, Case No. 2609, paras 858 et seq.).

The Committee on Freedom of Association regretted the very limited information provided by the Government on a very small number of allegations and concluded that these replies by the Government were an illustration of the excessive slowness of the procedures outlined by the complainant organizations and the resulting climate of impunity.

The Committee of Experts, in the same way as the Committee on Freedom of Association, once again draws the Government's attention to the principle that a genuinely free trade union movement cannot develop in a climate of violence and uncertainty; freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights, and in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed; the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations, and it is for governments to ensure that this principle is respected. The Committee also recalls that excessive delays in proceedings and the absence of judgements against the guilty parties creates in practice a situation of impunity, which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity, and which is extremely damaging to the exercise of trade union rights.

In view of all of the above, the Committee concludes that the Government has not demonstrated sufficient political will to combat violence against trade union leaders and members and to combat impunity and that the conclusion of the Committee on the Application of Standards continues to be globally valid concerning the lack of significant progress despite the repeated ILO missions and the very clear and firm recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies. In the first place, the Committee emphasizes that the Government has only replied to a very small number of allegations of violence submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2609, despite their extreme gravity. Secondly, the Road Map on all the measures requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009 was only prepared in the third week of November 2009, days before the meeting of the Committee of Experts. Thirdly, the Government emphasizes in its report the recent reactivation of the Multi-institutional Commission (which until recently dealt with issues of anti-union violence), the request for a special unit of the public prosecution service dedicated particularly to trade unionists (without indicating the decision that was adopted), although very little progress has been made in a very low number of cases of violence against trade unionists.

The Committee is bound to note that the situation of violence against trade unionists, the shortcomings in the operation of the criminal justice system and the situation of impunity have been further aggravated. The high-level mission of February 2009 noted that in recent years, despite the higher level of violence committed against trade unionists (according to information from Government officials), there have not been effective prosecutions or convictions. The high-level mission received testimony of the general lack of independence of the judicial authorities and Government bodies in relation to criminal cases. The Government indicated to the high-level mission that the situation of violence was generalized and denied the existence of a state policy against the trade union movement.

The Committee notes that the high-level mission of February 2009 determined that a significant increase is required in the capacity and budget of the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Nation, with a view to increasing the number of prosecutors and investigators. The mission proposed that additional resources should be allocated to existing programmes for the protection of trade unionists (there are currently 44 trade unionists benefiting from protection measures) and witnesses, and that these programmes should be appropriately coordinated. The high-level mission considered that measures need to be taken to actively combat any stigmatization of trade unions and the trade union movement implied by the association of trade union activities with criminal acts. The high-level mission indicates that the trade union membership rate and the number of collective agreements is very low.

The Committee notes the Road Map formulated by the Government after holding consultations in the National Tripartite Commission, in which it was emphasized that consensus was not reached between workers' and employers' organizations. The Road Map and the Government's introduction are summarized below:

Introduction and background

In June 2009, when the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference was held, the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance (MTPS) of Guatemala undertook to prepare a road map to address the observations of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations of the ILO.

On 2 July 2009, the MTPS requested technical assistance from the ILO for the preparation of a time-bound road map for the adoption of the necessary measures to achieve effective compliance with ILO Convention No. 87 in Guatemala.

In a response to this request, the first outline of the road map was received from the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO, which was submitted for consideration by the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs in Guatemala in the context of five meetings. It was only examined in three sessions, without the road map being formulated and approved because, although the representatives of workers and employers expressed their viewpoints, they did not reach consensus. They were also convened to a meeting on 19 November at which the sole item on the agenda was the road map.

In view of this situation, the High Office of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance of Guatemala took the decision to formulate the road map through which the State of Guatemala undertakes to implement the activities set out therein.

Strategic Objective I: Provide an effective response to all the cases submitted to the ILO Committee on Freedom of Association

The State of Guatemala, in the same way as many countries in the region, has historically been singled out on many occasions concerning the violation of the right to organize and freedom of association, which are protected by ILO Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

In view of this situation, the current Government of the Republic of Guatemala considers it a priority to address the observations, recommendations and complaints relating to freedom of association which have been referred to the ILO supervisory bodies, particularly those relating to the legal status of persons who due to the exercise of their right to organize are subject to persecution, violence or intimidation.

We are aware of the need for greater attention to be paid to the follow-up investigation and conclusion of cases of violence against trade unionists, and we therefore consider it necessary to begin with affirmative action involving an effective and periodic report to the Committee on Freedom of Association (CFA), including measures of inter-institutional coordination with a view to the exchange of pertinent and relevant information, thereby ensuring that it is brought to the knowledge of the ILO supervisory bodies.

Accordingly, we propose the strengthening of the prosecution unit of the Directorate of International Affairs, through the assignment of qualified personnel devoted exclusively to this subject, with the necessary resources to carry out their activities and provide an immediate response to the specific situation of each of the cases under investigation.

It is also our wish to formulate an annual schedule of meetings between the Ministry of Labour (International Labour Affairs Unit) and the Office of the Attorney-General, with a view to establishing a permanent framework for action between the two institutions.

The Directorate of International Labour Affairs will also undertake an assessment of the cases which have been concluded to bring them to the knowledge of the CFA, as well as of specific cases of violence against trade unionists, with a view to the establishment of a mechanism for their appropriate follow up in the relevant procedural bodies and to provide relevant and regular responses to the CFA of the ILO.

Strategic Objective II: Strengthening inter-institutional coordination machinery

Based on experience, we consider it necessary to maintain constant and permanent communication in a flexible and effective manner with Government institutions that are closely involved in labour matters. For this purpose, the Multi-institutional Labour Commission for Labour Matters in Guatemala is being reactivated and a list will be drawn up of the bodies which are not yet included in the above Commission, but which are closely related to the subject matter.

Through this new system, the intention is to improve coordination between this Ministry and the related Government institutions, as a basis for addressing labour disputes appropriately and the strengthening of industrial relations in the country.

By way of illustration, it should be noted that recent separate meetings have been held with the Advocate-General of the Nation, the Public Prosecutor and the Attorney-General, the President of the Supreme Court of Justice, accompanied by the four magistrates of the Chamber for the Protection of Constitutional Rights, whose remit includes labour courts, and a magistrate from the Civil Chamber, officials who on 13 October 2009 took office for a period of five years and the Minister of Government. All of these officials were informed of the intention to address the observations, recommendations and complaints submitted against the State of Guatemala in labour matters, and they offered full cooperation.

Strategic Objective III: Addressing the recommendations of the CEACR for legislative reforms

A Lawyers' Commission of the MTPS has been appointed with a view to analysing the feasibility of the recommendations for legislative reforms proposed by the CEACR. The opinion of the Lawyers' Commission was communicated to the former ILO technical assistance mission.

We have in our possession a list of legislative initiatives proposing the adoption of reforms to Decree No. 1441 of the Congress of the Republic and the Labour Code, which are currently being examined by the Congress of the Republic. This shows the political will of the State of Guatemala to resolve gradually the problems deriving from the application of Guatemalan labour law.

In addition to the above, an analysis has also been undertaken of the manner in which the Penal Code penalizes the right to strike of workers and, taking into account the CEACR's recommendations, there is now a study to be submitted to the state bodies for decision.

The strategy that will be applied to achieve the expected objectives has also been planned.

Attached is a matrix containing the Road Map to address the observations and recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies with regard to Conventions Nos 87 and 98 on the right to organize, freedom of association and collective bargaining.

The Committee observes that the measures outlined in the Road Map are either to be implemented on a constant basis or are subject to time limits, which mainly expire on 31 December 2009, or before that date, except for the submission of draft legal reforms to the state bodies (the time limit for which is set at 28 February 2010) and certain aspects of the measures for the coordination of state bodies in relation to combating violence.

The mission which provided assistance for the formulation of the Road Map emphasizes in its report with regard to the issue of anti-trade union violence: (1) the commitment of the Office of the Attorney-General to reinforce measures for the investigation of the complaints received, and in general of any complaint relating to punishable offences against trade unions, and to submit regularly to the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance the available information concerning such complaints, so that it is able to reply to the supervisory bodies and particularly the Committee on Freedom of Association; the public prosecution service indicates difficulties relating to the lack of cooperation of those lodging complaints; (2) the offer of cooperation from the Ministry of Government, both for the protection of persons under threat and in support of the action of the labour inspectorate; (3) the offer of cooperation of the new magistrates in the Supreme Court of Justice to alleviate the expenditure and efforts of the Ministry (inspectors) particularly in procedures to penalize offences; (4) the new meeting of the Multi-institutional Commission established by the Ministry to strengthen the links between the officials represented on the Commission. The meeting was attended by the new magistrate in the Supreme Court of Justice who is responsible for labour matters, the training of judges and the modernization of labour procedures; and (5) the prosecutors provided the following figures for cases concerning crimes against trade unionists: 31 in 2007, 32 in 2008 and 48 in 2009. The Ministry of Government indicated that a series of trade unionists are currently receiving personal or zoned police protection and indicated its readiness to provide support through the police for action by inspectors, when so requested.

With regard to the problem of impunity, the report of the mission indicates that the problem of impunity in Guatemala is seen as a worrying national problem that is more practical than legislative in its nature. The press frequently reports murders, particularly of bus drivers, without those who committed them being arrested and brought to trial. This is due, on the one hand, to the precarious nature of the system of investigation and, on the other, the situation of the judiciary. The International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG) indicated in its report that "Currently in Guatemala the conditions do not favour the existence of independent and impartial judges". Nevertheless, steps have recently been taken which could be significant: (a) the resignation of the Prosecutor-General of the Republic and the Attorney-General, at the request of the President of the Republic, and the appointment of a new Prosecutor-General and Attorney-General, who is a career official in the public prosecution service, on 30 July 2009, after first consulting the CICIG; and (b) the renewal of the magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice on 13 October 2009, following a rigorous selection process, on which, among other bodies, views were expressed by the Commissioner of the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG).

The Committee requests the Government to: (1) ensure the protection of trade unionists who are under threat of death; (2) convey to the public prosecutors and the Supreme Court of Justice its deep concern at the slowness and ineffectiveness of the judicial system and its recommendation concerning the need to elucidate murders and crimes committed against trade unionists with a view to penalizing those responsible; (3) allocate sufficient resources for these objectives, and consequently increase human and material resources, ensure coordination between the various state bodies who may be called upon to intervene in the judicial system and train investigators; and (4) give priority to these matters in Government policy. The Committee invites the Government to have recourse to ILO technical assistance to resolve the grave problem of criminal impunity with regard to crimes against trade unionists.

The Committee requests the Government to provide regular information on the attainment of the objectives of the Road Map and the administrative, judicial and legal reforms set out therein. The Committee trusts that the objectives and measures envisaged in the Road Map will result within a reasonable period of time in crucial improvements with regard to the serious problems raised.

Finally, the Committee once again expresses its deep concern at the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members and recalls that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free of violence. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will continue to take measures to guarantee full respect for the human rights of trade unionists and will continue providing protection measures to all trade unionists who so request. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to conduct the necessary investigations with a view to identifying those responsible for acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, so that they are prosecuted and punished in accordance with the law. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect. The Committee nevertheless expresses its concern that the information provided by the Government only exceptionally reports cases in which those responsible have been identified and punished, and emphasizes the need to considerably reinforce the criminal justice system.

Legislative problems

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following provisions which raise problems of conformity with the Convention:

- restrictions on the establishment of organizations in full freedom (the need to have half plus one of those working in the occupation to establish industry trade unions, under section 215(c) of the Labour Code) and delays in the registration of trade unions or the refusal to register them;
- restrictions on the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom (they need to be of Guatemalan origin and to be a worker in the enterprise or economic activity in order to be elected as a trade union leader, under sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code);
- restrictions on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities freely (under section 241 of the Labour Code, strikes are declared not by the majority of those casting votes, but by a majority of the workers); the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration in the event of a dispute in the public transport sector and in services related to fuel, and the need to determine whether strikes for the purpose of inter-union solidarity are still prohibited (section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996); labour, civil and penal sanctions applicable to strikes involving public officials or workers in specific enterprises (sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86);
- the Civil Service Bill; in its previous observation, the Committee noted a Civil Service Bill which, according to the UNSITRAGUA and the National Federation of State Workers' Unions (FENASTEG), requires a percentage that is too high to establish unions and restricts the right to strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Bill was withdrawn and that in July 2008 an inter-sectoral consultation committee was established to prepare a Bill that is consistent with the needs of the sectors involved; and
- the situation of many workers in the public sector who do not benefit from trade union rights. These workers, who are under contract under item 029 and others of the budget, should have been recruited for specific or temporary tasks, but are engaged in ordinary and permanent functions and often do not benefit from trade union rights or other employment benefits, other than wages, and are not covered by social security or by collective bargaining, where it exists. The Committee notes that the members of the Supreme Court of Justice indicated to the high-level mission that, in accordance with case law, these workers enjoy the right to organize. Nevertheless, this principle in case law has not been given effect in national practice according to technical assistance reports.

With regard to these matters, the Committee notes that, at the proposal of the 2008 high-level mission, the Tripartite Commission approved an agreement to modernize the legislation and give better effect to Conventions Nos 87 and 98. This agreement provides for "an examination of the dysfunctions of the current system of industrial relations" (excessive delays and procedural abuses, lack of effective enforcement of the law and of sentences, etc.), and particularly of the machinery for the protection of the right to collective bargaining and the rights of workers' and employers' organizations and their members, as laid down in Conventions Nos 87 and 98, in the light of technical considerations and the comments of a substantive and procedural nature of the ILO Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations. The Committee observes that the high-level mission undertook to provide appropriate technical assistance in relation to these matters and notes with interest that this assistance has already started.

The Committee has received the report of the first technical assistance mission (November 2008) and of a second technical assistance mission (January 2009), following up the high-level mission (April 2008), and of a technical assistance mission carried out in November 2009 to prepare the Road Map of measures to give effect to the Convention called for by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. It observes that the Road Map includes deadlines for the submission of draft legislation covering the legislative reforms requested by the Committee of Experts. It recalls in this respect that a series of proposals to address the legislative problems raised were prepared by the National Tripartite Commission along with the ILO technical assistance missions in the first quarter of 2009.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this matter and hopes to be able to note progress in the near future. The Committee firmly hopes that with the technical assistance that it is receiving, the Government will be able to provide information in its next report offering a positive assessment with regard to the various points mentioned.

Other matters

Export processing sector (maquilas). For many years, the Committee has been noting the comments made by trade union organizations on significant problems of application of the Convention in relation to trade union rights in export processing zones (maquilas). In its 2008 observation, the Committee noted the Government's indications that: (1) the General Labour Inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance was addressing complaints made in connection with the export processing sector, as well as developing routine inspections through the Export Processing Inspection Unit; (2) in 2007, 19 enterprises in the sector were closed and ten were closed in 2008; (3) in 2008, a procedure of administrative conciliation allowed the payment of benefits to workers affected by the closures in the case of ten export processing enterprises, and the workers who decided not to make use of the conciliation procedure and opted instead to take legal action received assistance free of charge from the Office of the Labour Ombudsman; (4) there are ten trade unions in the sector, with a total membership of 258 workers; (5) in 2007, ten complaints were dealt with relating to violations of freedom of association rights and in six cases a settlement was reached through conciliation, and in 2008, 17 complaints were dealt with relating to violations of Convention No. 87, and 16 are being processed; and (6) the training activities will continue on the rights established in Conventions Nos 87 and 98 for the export processing sector, for which the Government is relying upon technical support from the ILO.

The Committee notes that the Government confines itself in its report to indicating that, during the last half of 2008 and up to now (December 2009) 61 trade unions have been registered, together with 29 collective accords, but that it does not provide information on training activities in the field of trade union rights.

The Committee notes the recent comments of the ITUC according to which it is impossible to exercise the right to organize in export processing zones in view of the determined opposition of the employers. Only three unions have been established in the 200 export processing zones that exist, and the labour authorities are incapable of exercising control over the failure to comply with and the violations of the legislation in this sector.

The MSICG considers that the fact that it is impossible to establish organizations in export processing zones is a result of anti-union practices.

The Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the high-level mission of 2008 indicated that: "according to the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, there are seven collective accords in the export processing sector, but only two of them date from 2007. The remainder date from 2003 and before. With regard to trade union membership, according to the administrative authorities, there are six unions with 562 members in export processing zones, in a context of around 200,000 workers. In the view of the executive committee of the trade union movement, there are only two unions in this sector. Whatever the correct figure, there is clearly only a minimum level of trade union activity and collective bargaining in the export processing sector, thereby constituting a problem in the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98". The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the exercise of trade union rights in practice in export processing zones (number of trade unions, number of Worker members, number of collective agreements and their coverage, complaints of violations of trade union rights, decisions adopted by the authorities and the number of inspections).

Under these conditions, the Committee hopes that the Government will continue benefiting from technical assistance from the Office, so that the Convention is given full effect in the export processing sector, and that it will continue providing information on this matter. The Committee requests the Government to refer to the National Tripartite Commission problems which arise in relation to the exercise of trade union rights in the export processing sector and to provide information on any developments.

National Tripartite Commission. The Committee has received the reports on the work of the National Tripartite Commission between August 2008 and July 2009. The Committee notes that, according to technical assistance reports, this Commission is a valuable tool, although there are currently problems relating to the recognition by all concerned of the workers' representatives due to a division in UNSITRAGUA. Assistance needs to be provided to the Tripartite Commission for the preparation of the documents to be discussed and the management of meetings to facilitate the adoption of decisions or firm conclusions. The Committee endorses the opinion expressed in the technical assistance report and invites the Government to request technical assistance on this matter, as well as for the works of the Legal Reform Subcommittee, which has prepared the documents setting out the reforms requested by the Committee of Experts, and the functioning of the mechanisms for rapid intervention in cases of violations of trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the work of the National Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, and that of the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases. The Committee expresses the firm hope that in the near future it will be able to note that significant progress has been made in the application of the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009 and the ten cases that are before the Committee of Freedom of Association (Cases Nos 2203, 2241, 2341, 2361, 2445, 2609, 2673, 2700, 2708 and 2709). In its previous observation, the Committee noted the report of the high-level mission which visited the country in April 2008 and the tripartite agreement signed during the mission with a view to improving the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the reports of the high-level mission undertaken from 16 to 20 February 2009 and the technical assistance missions of 3 January 2009, as well as a final mission to provide assistance to the Tripartite Committee for the Formulation of the Road Map on the Measures Requested by the Committee of the Application of Standards (this mission took place from 16 to 20 November 2009). The Committee also notes the detailed comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2008 and by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala for the Defence of Workers' Rights (MSICG) in defence of the rights of workers in a communication dated 28 August 2009 which relate to issues already raised by the Committee, as well as further anti-union dismissals, the formulation of "blacklists", acts of interference, violations of the right to collective bargaining and other alleged violations of the Convention. The Committee hopes that, in the context of the tripartite agreement concluded during the high-level mission, all of the issues raised, as well as the comments of the ITUC, the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA) and the MSICG will be examined and addressed in a tripartite context by the Government and the social partners in the framework of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs, as well as the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to the following problems relating to restrictions on the exercise of trade union rights in practice:

- the excessive delays in procedures for the reinstatement of trade unions in accordance with rulings by judicial bodies and the utilization of amparo procedures (for the protection of constitutional rights); this is a general problem and the Committee has received information concerning an average of three years between the preliminary hearing and the trial, which may last for between six and seven years;
- the failure to comply with orders for the reinstatement of dismissed trade unionists;
- the slowness and ineffectiveness of procedures to impose penalties for breaches of labour legislation;
- the need to promote collective bargaining, especially in export processing zones;
- the need for the draft Code of Labour Procedures to be subject to in-depth consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers; and
- the Bill on Civil Service Reform (the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Bill had been delayed, but that in July 2008 an intersectoral dialogue forum was established with a view to obtaining a bill that is adapted to the specific needs of the sectors concerned).

The Committee notes that the communications of the ITUC and the MSICG confirm the persistence of these problems. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the subjects raised by the Committee have been discussed by the National Tripartite Commission for several years and that tripartite consensus has been achieved on some of them.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report: (1) of its will to undertake and reinforce affirmative action to seek effective machinery for the protection of the interests and rights of active subjects of industrial relations in Guatemala; (2) that the Tripartite Commission has undertaken an analysis of the cases brought against the State of Guatemala in the Committee on Freedom of Association and has agreed to seek technical assistance with a view to reducing the list of cases; and (3) that the Tripartite Commission has examined the draft texts of legal reforms based on the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies, denunciations of cases, etc.

Furthermore, in relation to these matters, the Committee noted previously that, under the auspices of the high-level mission in 2008, the Tripartite Commission concluded an agreement to modernize the legislation and give better effect to Conventions Nos 87 and 98, with the agreement calling for an examination to be carried out of the dysfunctions of the current labour relations system (excessive delays and procedural abuses, lack of effective application of the law and of penalties, etc.), and in particular of the machinery for the protection of the right to collective bargaining and the rights of workers' and employers' organizations and their members, as set forth in Conventions Nos 87 and 98, in the light of the technical considerations and substantive and procedural comments of the Committee of Experts. In this respect, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance appointed a commission of lawyers under the Ministry of Labour with a view to formulating proposals for legislative reforms to the Labour Code, the Penal Code and the Act regulating the right to strike of State employees. The results of the work of this commission of lawyers have been forwarded to the members of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs for analysis and discussion.

The Committee has received the report of the first technical assistance mission (November 2008) following up the high-level mission (April 2008) and of a second technical assistance mission (January 2009), to which are attached the proposed legislative reforms that are before the National Tripartite Commission. The Committee firmly hopes that, with the technical assistance that it is receiving, the Government will be in a position to provide information in its next report on progress in relation to the various points referred to above.

Finally, the Committee notes the report of the high-level mission which visited Guatemala in February 2009, following the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008 of the application of Convention No. 87. The Committee welcomes the fact that the Government extended the terms of reference of the mission to problems relating to the application of Convention No. 98.

The Committee notes that in its report the high-level mission of 2009 reached the following conclusions:

Effectiveness of the judicial system

The issue of the effectiveness and finality of judicial procedures and compliance with court rulings constitutes the central issue of the frustration related to the effective protection of freedom of association, which affects all parties. A broad range of aspects needs to be addressed appropriately and adequately without delay. This includes the abuse of amparo proceedings and appeals (the revision of amparo proceedings is currently under examination), failure to comply with court rulings without fines or judicial penalties being applied and the incapacity of the courts to enforce the implementation of court rulings.

Effective implementation of freedom of association

Under these circumstances, the mission is bound to note the very low level of membership and of collective agreements and it notes the concerns expressed by workers' organizations concerning the existence of difficulties in practice for the establishment of trade union organizations at the enterprise level and greater obstacles in export processing zones. All the social partners raised the question of the need to improve labour inspection, including through an undertaking to increase its budget significantly so as to allow the recruitment of new labour inspectors and the payment of appropriate wages, as well as the need for capacity-building and other training activities.

Futhermore, there is a general consensus on the need to provide information to all the social partners in relation to collective bargaining in which the participants have an equivalent level of decision-making power with a view to promoting the effective recognition of this right.

The Committee expresses its concern at the very high number of allegations of anti-union dismissals and acts in violation of the right to collective bargaining made by the ITUC and the MSICG. The Committee appreciates the information provided by the Government concerning the establishment of eight further labour courts in the city of Guatemala, thereby increasing their number by 100 per cent.

Recalling that all of the problems raised are very serious, the Committee requests the Government, in consultation with the most representative organizations of workers and employers: to undertake the necessary procedural and substantive reforms to resolve cases of anti-union discrimination and the slowness of the labour courts (including more effective and rapid proceedings and more dissuasive penalties); to promote collective bargaining in view of the worrying figures for the collective accords that are in force (according to the Government, 58 collective accords were concluded between 2008 and 2009, as in Guatemala collective bargaining takes place at the level of the enterprise or government institution); and the adoption of measures to improve labour inspection and to enable the courts to enforce rulings without delay. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect and hopes to be able to note significant progress in the near future.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that 64 new unions and 33 new collective labour accords have been registered. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of unions and of collective accords, the number of members and the complaints made in 2008 and 2009 to the labour inspection services concerning violations of trade union rights.

Finally, the Committee notes the Road Map formulated by the Government to improve the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, the content of which is covered by the observation on Convention No. 87, and which includes objectives for legislative reforms and improvements in judicial procedures.

In view of the delicate situation relating to the application of the Convention, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government and the authorities in general will include compliance with the Convention among their highest priorities.

Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments the Committee raised a number of points about the national legislation as follows:

- the need for measures to set up an independent body that has the trust of the parties and is able to rule promptly on difficulties encountered in defining the minimum service where the parties are unable to agree as to the minimum service in transport and communications (which are not deemed essential in the strict sense of the term); and

- the need for measures to ensure that compulsory arbitration (established in sections 342, 350 and 351 of the Labour Code) is restricted to cases where the two parties agree to request it, in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the event of acute national crisis.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the measures requested very shortly, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and asks it to provide information on any developments in the situation.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009. The Committee recalls that the 2008 ITUC comments reported assaults, by the security forces, on demonstrators and strikers, as a result of which around 40 people died and nearly 300 others were injured, arrests of trade unionists and the destruction of the headquarters of the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea (CNTG). The Committee recalls that a climate of violence in which murders and disappearances of trade union leaders go unpunished, constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of trade union rights and that such acts require severe measures to be taken by the authorities. When disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injury, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on all the comments made by the ITUC.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning in particular any anti-union dismissals.

Article 1 of the Convention. Need to include in the national legislation specific provisions: (a) to protect all workers, and not only trade union delegates as provided in the Labour Code, against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment; (b) to provide expressly for appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; (c) to provide for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for violations of section 3 of the draft new Labour Code, which provides that no employer may take into consideration membership of a trade union and trade union activities of workers in making decisions about recruitment, performance and distribution of work, termination of the employment contract, etc.

Article 2. Need to include in the draft Labour Code specific provisions on protection against acts of interference in the internal affairs of workers' and employers' organizations, accompanied by efficient and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the provisions of the new Labour Code, which have been under preparation for many years, are fully consistent with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate all progress towards this end in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Guinea-Bissau

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to the issues examined by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the following matters.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it intended to pursue the process of revision of the General Labour Act, Title XI of which contains provisions on collective bargaining, and to take steps so that this text would guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights envisaged in the Convention. The Committee notes that it previously noted the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code provided for the adaptation of the application of its provisions to the specific characteristics of the work performed by agricultural workers and dockworkers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments relating to this draft legislation and hopes that this draft will guarantee agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights provided for by the Convention.

The Committee previously asked the Government to send information on the measures taken to adopt the special legislation which, under section 2(2) of Act No. 08/41 on freedom of association, was to regulate the right to collective bargaining of public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee once again requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

Finally, the Committee previously asked the Government to keep it informed of any developments with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors (training and information activities, seminars with the social partners, etc.), and to send statistics on the collective agreements concluded (by sector) and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes that the comments made by the ITUC show that the situation with regard to collective bargaining is unsatisfactory. It reminds the Government once again that Article 4 of the Convention provides that “measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilisation of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers’ organisations and workers’ organisations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements”. The Committee requests the Government to take concrete measures to promote greater use in practice of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors, and to indicate any developments concerning this situation, including the number of new agreements signed and the number of workers covered by such agreements. The Committee hopes that a detailed report will be provided for examination next year in the context of the regular report examination cycle and that it will contain full information on the points raised as well as on the comments made by the ITUC.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Guyana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

- The Committee recalls that its previous observation referred to the following questions:
- the need to amend the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act (Chapter 54:01) in respect to: (1) conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer a dispute in the services listed in the schedule to a tribunal for compulsory arbitration and the sanction (fine or imprisonment) imposed on workers who take part in an illegal strike (section 19); (2) the schedule listing the essential services (which may be revised at the discretion of the Minister) that contains some services that go beyond those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (dockage, wharfage, discharging, loading or unloading of vessels, the services provided by the Transport and Harbours Department and the National Drainage and Irrigation Board cannot be considered essential services in the strict sense of the term). The Committee recalled that the authorities may establish, with the participation of workers’ and employers’ organizations, a system of minimum service in those services considered to be of public utility; and
 - section 19 of the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration (Amendment) Bill 2006 that sets higher fines than those provided for in the previous Act and maintains the imprisonment for those workers who take part in an illegal strike.

The Committee had noted the Government’s statement to the effect that there is no restriction on the right to strike and that workers who choose to strike are protected by the law. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer to compulsory arbitration disputes in services, not all of which are essential, and by providing for sanctions (fine or imprisonment) in the event of an illegal strike, the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act and the Bill introduced to amend it compromise the workers’ right to strike which the Committee considers to be one of the essential means available to them to protect their interests.

The Committee expresses the hope that necessary measures will be taken to amend the legislation so as to bring it in conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the recognition of only those unions claiming 40 per cent support of the workers, as set out in the Trade Union Recognition Act. The Committee takes note of the Government’s statement that, at the request of the Trades Union Congress, the Trade Union Recognition Act provided for the recognition of unions that were recognized prior to the Act without having to prove that they had majority support (section 32). All unions benefited from this provision which the Government says is no longer applicable as all certificates applicable under this section have been issued. Given that the representativeness of unions might change, the Committee recalls once again that, if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers in the bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee hopes that significant progress respecting this issue will be made in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on the results of the consultative process.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Haiti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 29 August 2008 and 26 August 2009, concerning matters already raised by the Committee in its previous observation, in particular the difficulties in exercising trade union rights in the context of an economic and social crisis, ineffective dispute resolution mechanisms and difficulties in exercising the right to strike. In general, the Committee recalls that, while the State has a duty to promote and defend a social climate where respect of the law reigns as the only way of guaranteeing respect for and protection of life, the development of free and independent organizations and negotiation with all those involved in social dialogue is at the same time indispensable to enable a government to confront its social and economic problems and resolve them in the best interests of the workers and the nation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the matters raised by the ITUC.

Amendment of the legislation. The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for many years to amend the national legislation to bring it into conformity with the requirements of the Convention through:

- the amendment of section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 which gives the Government broad powers of supervision over trade unions;
- the amendment of sections 185, 190, 199, 200 and 206 of the Labour Code, which allow for compulsory arbitration at the request of only one party to a labour dispute;
- the amendment of sections 233 and 239 of the Labour Code so as to remove the impediments to the right of association of minors and to allow foreign workers to have access to trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country; and
- the repeal or amendment of section 236 of the Penal Code, under which government consent is required for the establishment of an association of over 20 members. In this regard, the Committee previously recalled that, under Article 2 of the Convention, workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. Consequently, any legislation which requires prior approval at the discretion of the authorities of the statutes and by-laws of representative organizations of workers or employers is incompatible with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government's report mentions the establishment of a committee to consider a reform of the Labour Code with a view to amending the legal framework. The Government also indicates that the revision of the Labour Code will take into account the Committee's comments on the various matters raised and that, to that end, it is already benefiting from technical assistance from the Office. Finally, the Government indicates that the right of association of minors is in fact now recognized since the ratification by Haiti of the international Convention on the Rights of the Child and will be incorporated into law and that section 236 of the Penal Code is not in fact applied but the Secretariat of State responsible for judicial reform will amend this section of the Penal Code in the context of modernizing the legal texts. The Committee notes the Government's statements concerning the legislative amendments currently being made. While it is aware of the difficulties that the country is currently facing, the Committee hopes that the Government's next report will indicate tangible progress in the revision of the national legislation to bring it into full conformity with the Convention on all the points raised. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to benefit from the technical assistance provided by the Office in this regard and requests it to send a copy of any new text adopted.

The Committee previously requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that domestic workers and rural workers explicitly benefit from the right to organize. In its report, the Government indicates that workers in the rural sector benefit from the same trade union rights as those in the commercial sector and industry under section 383 of the Labour Code. With regard to domestic workers, a law on the improvement of the living conditions of this category of workers has already been approved by parliament and will be promulgated soon. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to send a copy of the new law concerning domestic workers once promulgated and to indicate the provisions which recognize the right of these workers to exercise trade union rights in accordance with the Convention.

Finally, the Committee repeats its request to the Government to provide a copy of the Decree of 17 July 2005 amending the 1982 Act issuing the conditions of service in the public service.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to indicate any developments concerning: (i) the adoption of a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination in hiring practices; (ii) the adoption of provisions generally affording adequate protection for workers against acts of anti-union discrimination (on the basis of union membership or activity), accompanied by effective and expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive penalties; (iii) the revision of section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 empowering the Social Organizations Branch of the Department of Labour and Social Welfare to intervene in the drafting of collective agreements, without specifying the nature of such intervention or the cases concerned. The Committee trusts that these issues will be taken into account in the context of the work of the “think-tank” for the reform of the Labour Code relating to a new legal framework and the judicial reform mentioned by the Government, and trusts that the Government will refer in its next report to real progress made in the adoption of national legislation which is in full conformity with the Convention.

Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the observations from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 and 26 August 2009, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee in its previous observation, particularly acts of discrimination against trade unionists and interference by certain enterprises in trade union activities – acts which have not been penalized – and reiterate the necessity of carrying out legislative reforms. The Committee also notes the observations from the ITUC concerning the weakness of the labour inspectorate and judicial system with regard to violations of trade union rights. The Committee notes that the Government confirms this weakness in stating that the administrative examination of cases may take several weeks owing to the large number of cases and the lack of resources within the administration. However, the Government declares that no formal complaints have been lodged with the labour inspectorate with regard to any violation of union rights. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the violations of trade union rights referred to by the ITUC in its communication of 2008 and to examine with the social partners the measures to be taken with a view to the adoption of rapid and effective mechanisms for the protection of trade union rights.

The Committee previously asked the Government to supply information on the number of collective agreements in force for rural workers, workers in the informal economy, self-employed workers and domestic workers, and also the coverage provided by these agreements. The Committee notes the Government’s reply that no collective agreements exist in the abovementioned sectors. The Committee requests the Government to examine, in conjunction with the social partners concerned, ways of promoting collective bargaining for rural workers, self-employed workers, domestic workers and workers in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

The Committee is aware of the difficulties faced by the country and trusts that the Government will continue to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office with regard to all the matters raised.

Honduras

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments sent by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 concerning the drawing up of a draft Act to reform the Code of Criminal Procedure, which establishes harsher penalties for actions on public thoroughfares (blockages of roads, bridges and streets, for example), which may affect the activities of trade unions, and concerning the detention of trade union members in the banking sector when they wished to participate in a wage claim. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that no reforms are under way to introduce tougher penalties for illicit meetings or demonstrations and that section 331 of the Penal Code concerning “street actions”, incorporated in the legislation by means of Decree No. 59-97 of 8 May 1997, remains in force. As regards the alleged detention of union members of the Banking Association for participating in a pay claim, the Government has no knowledge of the existence of that trade union and therefore considers it unlikely that the complaint referred to in the comment was brought before the Honduran courts. The Committee also notes the comments from the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP) of 22 May 2008 on the application of the Convention. The COHEP also refers to the comments of the ITUC of 2007 and in particular the Committee notes its indication that it had no knowledge of the detention of union members belonging to the banking sector and gives the assurance that the Honduran Association of Banking Institutions (AHIBA) is unaware of and rejects such allegations.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009 referring to pending legislative issues and also to the murder of the general secretary and another official of the Workers’ Confederation of Honduras (CTH) on 24 April 2008, the murder of an official of the National Peasant Farmers’ Association of Honduras (ANACH) in May 2008, armed attacks against the president and vice-president of the AFL Workers’ Union of Honduras (SITRAFLH) and the raiding of the headquarters of the Single Workers’ Confederation of Honduras (CUTH) in September 2008. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in a situation in which fundamental human rights are respected and fully guaranteed, particularly with regard to human life and safety, and where there have been attacks on physical or psychological integrity, an independent judicial inquiry should be conducted without delay, as this is a particularly suitable method for fully determining the facts, attributing responsibility, penalizing the perpetrators and preventing the repetition of such actions. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

The Committee also notes the comments from COHEP dated 6 October 2009. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it has been referring for a number of years to the need to reform various sections of the Labour Code in order to bring them into conformity with the Convention. The Committee's comments refer to:

- the exclusion from the scope of the Labour Code, and consequently from the rights and guarantees of the Convention, of workers in agricultural and stock-raising enterprises which do not permanently employ more than ten workers (section 2(1));
- the prohibition of more than one trade union in a single enterprise, institution or establishment (section 472 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement of more than 30 workers to establish a trade union (section 475 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that the officers of a trade union, federation or confederation must be of Honduran nationality (sections 510(a) and 541(a) of the Labour Code), be engaged in the corresponding activity (sections 510(c) and 541(c) of the Labour Code) and be able to read and write (sections 510(d) and 541(d) of the Labour Code);
- the following restrictions on the right to strike:
 - the ban on strikes being called by federations and confederations (section 537 of the Labour Code). The Committee however notes the Government's indication that in practice the CUTH, the General Federation of Workers (CGT) and the CTH have repeatedly called for collective suspension of work;
 - the requirement of a two-thirds majority of the votes of the total membership of the trade union organization in order to call a strike (sections 495 and 563 of the Labour Code);
 - the power of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to end disputes in oil production, refining, transport and distribution services (section 555(2) of the Labour Code);
 - the need for Government authorization or a six-month period of notice for any suspension or stoppage of work in public services that do not depend directly or indirectly on the State (section 558 of the Labour Code);
 - the submission to compulsory arbitration, without the possibility of calling a strike for as long as the arbitration award is in force (two years), of collective disputes in public services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term, that is those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (sections 554(2) and (7), 820 and 826 of the Labour Code).

The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it noted the drawing up of a draft Act to reform the Labour Code, which incorporated various amendments requested by the Committee. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has been impossible to hold discussions on the reform of the Labour Code because of the strong opposition of the three major workers' federations operating in the country. The Committee further notes the statement by COHEP that, although a preliminary draft reform of the Labour Code was drawn up in 1995 and was the product of social dialogue, it was not adopted and various preliminary drafts were drawn up without agreement being reached in the stricter tripartite context and are due to be discussed in the National Congress.

The Committee reminds the Government that it is responsible for ensuring the application of freely ratified international labour Conventions relating to freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to bring the Labour Code into conformity with the Convention and trusts that all the issues highlighted by the Committee will be taken into account. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all measures taken in this respect and reminds it that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of discrimination and interference. The Committee recalls that its comments have referred for many years to:

- the lack of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, since the penalties provided for in section 469 of the Labour Code for persons who interfere with the right to freedom of association, ranging from 200 to 10,000 lempiras (HNL) (200 lempiras being roughly equivalent to US$12), were deemed inadequate. The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 321 of Decree No. 191-96 of 31 October 1996 establishes penalties for cases of discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to indicate specific cases in which this provision has been used to impose penalties for acts of anti-union discrimination; and
- the lack of adequate and full protection against any acts of interference, and of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for such acts. The Committee notes the comments from the Honduran National Business Council (COHEP) of 22 May 2008, according to which the Secretariat of State decided, by means of a decision of 2 July 2002, to prohibit any opposition by employers to the recognition and registration of the legal personality of workers' organizations, or from workers with regard to employers' organizations, in order to guarantee adequate protection against acts of interference.

The Committee notes that the Government, in reply to the comments from the ITUC of 28 August 2005 concerning the dismissal of numerous trade union officials and members following the founding of a trade union, indicates that the mass dismissal of the members of a union executive committee is a rare and isolated measure and has not been the subject of complaints to the competent institutions. The Government adds that there have been no legislative amendments in connection with the application of the Convention which relate to anti-union discrimination and interference. The Government points out that it has been impossible to hold discussions on the reform of the Labour Code because of the strong opposition of the three major workers' federations operating in the country. The Government adds that the Directorate of Labour of the Secretariat of Labour and Social Security has held various training workshops in the major cities of the country for leaders of workers' organizations, aimed at informing and educating them with regard to the legal framework for collective bargaining. This body also undertakes activities to promote and disseminate the rights contained in the Convention through the publication of a "Guide to the exercise of freedom of association and collective bargaining", and also flyers and leaflets on the exercise of those rights. The Committee recalls that the Government has the responsibility to ensure the application of freely ratified international labour Conventions relating to freedom of association. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to include provisions in the national legislation for adequate and full protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination or interference, establishing sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties for such acts.

The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the observation from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009 concerning alleged anti-union practices in export processing zones, delays in the administration of justice in cases of anti-union practices (the Government indicates the possibility of a summary judgement in cases of unfair dismissals but the Committee considers that more information is needed), failure to comply with court orders for the reinstatement of trade unionists (according to the Government, reinstatement is only requested by the worker in isolated cases in practice) and the creation of parallel trade unions by employers (the Government merely states that these are not specific allegations). The Committee requests the Government to hold tripartite discussions on this matter and keep it informed in this respect.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee also notes the new comments from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009 which refer to the application of the Convention and, in particular, the drawing up of a draft Act which could limit collective bargaining only to unions which represent more than 50 per cent of the total number of employees in the enterprise, the setting up of parallel organizations by employers with which they undertake collective bargaining, and numerous anti-union dismissals in various enterprises in the export processing (maquila), cement and bakery industries. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect.

Article 6. Right of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State to bargain collectively. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from the ITUC dated 28 August 2007 (many of them similar to those sent in previous years), alleging that public employees are forbidden to sign collective labour agreements. The Government points out that public officials have legally imposed limits on their duties (section 534 of the Labour Code), including the right to submit "respectful statements" containing requests of interest to all members in general. Section 536 states that unions of public employees may not submit lists of claims or sign collective agreements, but other official workers' unions have the same powers as any others to deal with claims on equal terms. The Government refers to a number of state enterprises and municipalities with high population density which have signed collective agreements and points out that official workers do have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that a system in which public employees may only submit to the authorities "respectful statements" which will not be the subject of any negotiation, particularly with regard to conditions of employment, is not in conformity with the Convention. The Committee recalls that, even though Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope of application, other categories of workers must be able to enjoy the guarantees provided for by the Convention, and therefore be able to undertake collective bargaining with respect to their conditions of employment, including pay. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary legislative measures to guarantee the full application of the Convention.

The Committee reminds the Government that the problems referred to above have persisted for many years and that it can seek technical assistance from the Office.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the comments made by the COHEP dated 6 October 2009 (including information on protection against anti-union dismissals in the public sector and the corresponding legislation).

Iceland

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective Bargaining. The Committee recalls that several of its previous comments concerned the issue of compulsory arbitration which has been repeatedly imposed through legislative intervention (Acts Nos 10/1998 and 34/2001) into the collective bargaining process for the determination of the terms and conditions of employment of fishermen. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that this was incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining set out in Article 4 of the Convention and requested the Government: (i) to avoid having recourse to legislative intervention to impose on the parties a solution which should be the result of free and voluntary collective bargaining; and (ii) noting the Government's indications that it would consult the social partners on actions to be taken, to take concrete steps so as to re-examine thoroughly its current machinery and procedures. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the renegotiation of the collective agreements which come up for review in 2007 and 2008, including in the fishing sector. The Committee again recalls that the Conference Committee had expressed the hope in June 2004 that the Government would carry out, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, a review of the implementation in practice in the fishing sector of the mechanisms and procedures in the area of collective bargaining in order to improve those mechanisms. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the collective agreements originally reached in the fishing sector in October 2004 were renewed in December 2008 and will be in effect until 1 January 2011. The Committee once again requests the Government to continue to provide information on any progress made in adopting measures, in consultation with the social partners concerned, with a view to improving the current machinery and procedures for collective bargaining so as to promote free and voluntary collective bargaining and ensure that the introduction of compulsory arbitration is avoided in the future.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on collective bargaining in practice in 2007 and 2008 and on the meetings held in 2008 by the State Conciliation and Mediation Service to facilitate collective bargaining.

Indonesia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009 with regard to arrests and violence by the police, dismissals and acts of retaliation against strike actions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Trade union rights and civil liberties. In its previous comments, concerning allegations of excessive violence and arrests in relation to demonstrations and police involvement in strike situations, including the interrogation of trade union leaders pursuant to an old colonial law prohibiting vague and unspecified “unpleasant acts” against employers, the Committee requested the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken, including specific instructions given to the police so as to ensure that the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations is avoided, that arrests are made only where serious violence or other criminal acts have been committed, and that the police are called in a strike situation only where there is a genuine and imminent threat to public order.

In this regard, the Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to Case No. 2585 (see 353rd Report, March 2009, paragraphs 120–123) concerning allegations of human rights abuses and notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association trusted that the Government would: (i) issue appropriate instructions to prevent the danger of trade unionists being arrested by the police for normal trade union activities; (ii) repeal or amend sections 160 and 335 of the Criminal Code on “instigation” and “unpleasant acts” so as to ensure that these provisions cannot be used abusively as a pretext for the arbitrary arrest and detention of trade unionists; and (iii) continue to take all the necessary measures to educate the police in relation to its action in industrial relations contexts.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the police role in strikes has been established in Kapolri Regulation No. 1/2005. Recalling that legitimate trade union activities should not be used as a pretext for arbitrary arrest or detention, the Committee requests the Government to provide the information requested in its previous observation and to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend sections 160 and 335 of the Criminal Code.

Right to organize of civil servants. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee the exercise of the right to organize to civil servants, and to indicate the manner in which civil servants organize in practice, including statistics on the number of civil servants’ organizations at various levels. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it has not specifically regulated the right to organize for civil servants but that their right to organize and express opinions is covered by the Corps of Indonesian Civil Servants (KORPRI), which is a neutral organization that does not take sides for a certain political party. Recalling the conclusions of the Committee of Freedom of Association in Case No. 1431 (see 265th Report, May 1989, paragraphs 104–137) that “KORPRI does not meet the requirements of the principle that all workers should have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing to defend their occupations’ interests”, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will adopt an Act guaranteeing the exercise of the right to organize to civil servants, pursuant to section 4 of Act No. 21 of 2000, which proclaims that civil servants shall enjoy freedom of association and that the implementation of this right shall be regulated in a separate act, so as to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to indicate progress made in this regard.

Right to organize of employers. The Committee had requested that the Government provide a copy of Act No. 1 of 1987, as well as the internal regulation of the Indonesian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (KADIN), and specify whether other employers’ organizations could be established independently of the KADIN. The Committee notes Act No. 1/1987 transmitted by the Government and its indication that there is no stipulation in regulation proscribing employers from establishing organizations other than the KADIN. The Committee will examine Act No. 1/1987 once it is translated and requests the Government to provide information on any other employers' organizations that exist in addition to the KADIN.

Conditions for the exercise of the right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 4 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 so that a finding as to whether negotiations have failed, which is a condition for the lawful staging of strikes, can be made either by an independent body or be left to the unilateral determination of the parties to the dispute. The Committee notes the Government's comments that section 4 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 has not been amended because it is not an obstacle to the execution of strikes, as is illustrated by the many strikes that have taken place. The Government explains that the purpose of the Ministerial Decree is not to prohibit strike actions, but to regulate the procedure for strikes according to section 140 of Act No. 13/2003. The Committee notes the Government's statement that trade unions and workers themselves could determine when strikes would start and end and that, thus, strikes will be carried out according to their expectations.

Noting that the Government did not comment in detail on the legislative conditions for the calling of a strike, the Committee once again recalls that the conditions stipulated in the law for the exercise of the right to strike should not be such that the exercise of this right becomes very difficult or even impossible in practice. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to ensure that the legislation is in conformity with the Convention by repealing or amending the various conditions included in the strike procedure set out in Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003.

Exhaustion of mediation/conciliation procedures. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation to ensure that mediation/conciliation proceedings, that currently took more than 60 days, did not operate as a precondition for the lawful exercise of the right to strike. The Committee notes the Government's information that it has not amended sections 3(2), 4(4), 15 and 25 of the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004. Recalling that a requirement to exhaust procedures that extends beyond 60 working days (three months), as a precondition for a lawful strike, would render the exercise of the right to strike very difficult or even impossible in practice, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 3(2), 4(4), 15 and 25 of the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004 in a way that: (i) reduces the time period accorded to mediation/conciliation proceedings in cases where the exhaustion of mediation/conciliation constitutes a condition for the lawful exercise of the right to strike; or (ii) ensures that the exhaustion of mediation/conciliation is not a precondition for the lawful exercise of the right to strike.

Objectives of strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps so as to allow trade union federations and confederations to engage in industrial action linked to questions of general social and economic policy. The Committee notes the comments of the Government that strikes can be conducted as long as they are related to employment matters as regulated by rules and regulations concerning employment. The Committee notes once again that this appears to exclude the possibility of staging strikes on general social and economic policy, and recalls that organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed to major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to ensure that trade union federations and confederations may engage in industrial action linked to questions of general social and economic policy.

Restrictions on the right to strike in the railway service. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that railway service workers may fully exercise the right to strike without penalty. The Committee notes the Government's comment that section 139 of Manpower Act No. 13 is not only related to railway workers but also to workers in hospitals, fire brigades, watergate controllers, air traffic control and flare men, as strikes of these workers would endanger human safety. Recalling once again that railway services generally cannot be considered as an essential service, the Committee requests the Government to indicate steps taken or contemplated to ensure that the only railway workers encompassed by section 139 of Manpower Act No. 13, and so with a limited right to strike, are railway intersection workers.

Sanctions for strike action. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sanctions for illegal strike action were not disproportionate to the seriousness of the offence. The Committee notes the Government's comment that section 185 of the Manpower Act does not regulate criminal conviction for violation of section 139 of the Manpower Act but applies only to specified sections. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the principle above.

The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that striking workers were not considered to resign by virtue of not having responded to back-to-work orders from employers, prior to a finding by an independent body that the strike in question is illegal. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the implementation of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 relating to back-to-work orders allows for recourse to the industrial cooperation court, which avoids any possible arbitrariness on the part of employers. Recalling that the practice in the Ministerial Decree results in the situation that workers run the risk of dismissal while the legality of a strike is not settled, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 6(2) and (3) of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 to ensure that employers can only issue back-to-work orders to workers after an independent body has determined that the strike is illegal.

Dissolution and suspension of organizations by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps so as to provide for means other than loss or suspension of trade union rights for delays in notification of changes in the union's constitution or by-laws, or failure to report overseas financial assistance. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has no plans to repeal sections 21 and 31 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act (Law No. 21 of 2000) in the context of complexities in drafting and amending employment legislation. Recalling that the sanction of suspension for failure to report changes in a union's constitution or by-laws (pursuant to sections 21 and 42 of the Act) is clearly disproportionate and that the result of sections 31(1) and 42 is tantamount to requiring previous authorization for the receipt of overseas funds, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal the reference to sections 21 and 31 in section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act.

The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that administrative dissolution or suspension of trade unions do not take effect until a final decision has been handed down by the Administrative Court in case of appeal. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that, if trade unions, federations or confederations do not fulfil the minimal requirements which are regulated in sections 5(2), 6(2) and 7(2) of Law No. 21 of 2000, they will not have the right to be recorded by the governmental institution responsible for manpower. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that, by not fulfilling the minimal requirements, there is no base to initiate a case to the State Administrative Court (PTUN). The Committee once again recalls that measures of dissolution and suspension of trade unions by administrative authority involve serious risk of interference in the very existence of organizations and should therefore be accompanied by all the necessary guarantees, in particular due judicial safeguards, to avoid the risk of arbitrary action. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that organizations affected by measures of dissolution or suspension by the administrative authority have a right of appeal to an independent and impartial judicial body, and that such administrative decisions do not take effect until that body issues a final decision.

The Committee reminds the Government that if it so wished it may take advantage of technical assistance from the International Labour Office in relation to the issues raised in these comments.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report and regrets to note that it has provided no reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2007. The Committee notes comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 26 August 2009.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to ensure effective and rapid protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference in practice, having noted a stark contrast between laws which appear to conform to the Convention and a suggested failure to provide protection against anti-union discrimination and interference in practice. In particular, the Committee requested the Government to indicate concrete measures taken, after discussions with workers' and employers' organizations, in this regard; and to provide data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination filed with the labour inspectorate and the courts, and the steps taken to investigate these complaints and impose remedies where appropriate, as well as the average duration of proceedings.

The Committee notes the Government's comments that protection against discrimination is regulated by Act No. 21 of 2000 concerning trade unions and that alleged violations were always handled by consultation and law enforcement, with most cases solved in bipartite consultations. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that the time taken to process the law (investigations) is regulated by the law on criminal procedure.

The Committee regrets that the Government has not provided detailed information on complaints of anti-union discrimination filed with the labour inspectorate and courts. It observes once again that a lack of findings of anti-union discrimination by the labour inspectorate and the courts, combined with the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in a series of cases (Cases Nos 2236, 2336, 2441, 2451, 2472 and 2494), cause a certain concern. In this regard, the Committee further notes that the ITUC in its comments of 2007 and 2009 refers to cases of anti-union discrimination. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report concrete measures taken, after discussions with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations, to ensure effective and rapid protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference in practice. It also requests the Government to provide data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination filed with the labour inspectorate and the courts, and the steps taken to investigate these complaints and impose remedies where appropriate, as well as the average duration of proceedings. The Committee invites the Government to make full use of ILO technical assistance in this regard, as well as training for the authorities competent to deal with cases of anti-union discrimination and employer interference.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to amend section 122 of the Manpower Act so as to discontinue the presence of the employer during a voting procedure held in order to determine which trade union shall have the right to represent the workers in an enterprise. The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that it has not amended section 122 of the Manpower Act and that it considers that employers and the Government are present only as witnesses during voting and have no effect on the voting by trade unions and workers. Recalling the need to ensure adequate protection against acts of interference in practice, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken to amend section 122 of the Manpower Act so as to suppress the presence of the employer during voting procedures.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 5, 14 and 25 of Act No. 2/2004 concerning Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement, which enable either of the parties to an industrial dispute to file a legal petition to the Industrial Relations Court for final settlement of the dispute if conciliation or mediation failed. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that in order to strengthen sections 5, 14 and 25 of Act No. 2/2004, it published Minister of Manpower and Transmigration Regulation No. 31/MEN/XII/2008 concerning guidance of industrial relations dispute settlement through bipartite consultation. According to the Government, this Regulation clarifies that bipartite consultation is consultation between workers/labour unions/labour organizations with employers to settle industrial relations disputes in a company. The Government further states that, therefore, in cases of industrial relations disputes, bipartite consultation must be conducted before mediation, conciliation and arbitration. The Committee notes the Government's information that Act No. 2/2004 only defines the existence of voluntary arbitration, rather than compulsory arbitration, as arbitration can only be conducted if it is agreed by the parties to the dispute.

The Committee observes, however, that Act No. 2 refers both to voluntary arbitration and, in sections 5, 14 and 25, to compulsory arbitration by allowing one of the parties to a dispute to file a petition to the Industrial Relations Court. Noting that the ability of one or other of the parties to a dispute to refer the dispute to the Court constitutes compulsory arbitration, the Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration at the initiative of one party to the dispute cannot be considered to promote voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 5, 14 and 25 of Act No. 2/2004 concerning industrial relations dispute settlement so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may be imposed only where it is agreed upon by both parties to the dispute.

Requirements for the exercise of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the comments submitted by the ITUC indicate that, under section 119 of the Manpower Act, in order to negotiate a collective agreement, a union must have membership equal to more than 50 per cent of the total workforce in the enterprise or receive more than 50 per cent support in a vote of all the enterprise's workers on its demands. The Committee notes that unions not attaining 50 per cent support in such a vote could only engage in collective bargaining after a period of six months is passed since the vote. The Committee considers that these provisions render the exercise of collective bargaining difficult for these unions and requests the Government to repeal the requirement for a delay of six months before which minority unions may bargain collectively.

The Committee further notes that the ITUC indicates, without specifying the legislative provision, that collective agreements must be concluded within 30 days after the beginning of negotiations or must be submitted to the Manpower Ministry for mediation, conciliation or arbitration. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in response.

Federations and confederations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations had the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes the Government's indication that section 25(1) of Act No. 21/2000 states that trade unions, federations and confederations with a record number have the right to: negotiate a collective labour agreement with the management; represent workers in industrial dispute settlements; represent workers in manpower institutions; establish an institution or carry out activities related to efforts to improve workers' welfare; and carry out other manpower or employment-related activities that are in conformity with prevailing law. It further notes that section 27 of Act No. 21 regulates the obligations of trade unions, federations and confederations. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, as a result, there is no rule or regulation prohibiting federations and confederations from engaging in collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report data concerning the number and type of current collective agreements that were signed by federations or confederations of trade unions.

Export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government, pursuant to allegations of violent intimidation and assault of union organizers, and dismissals of union activists in the EPZs, to provide information thereon as well as on the number of collective agreements in force in the EPZs and the percentage of workers covered. The Committee notes the collective labour agreement between a pharmaceuticals enterprise and what appears to be an enterprise-level trade union transmitted by the Government, and notes with regret that the Government has not provided further information concerning allegations of intimidation and assault of union organizers, dismissals of union activists, the number of collective agreements in force in EPZs and the percentage of workers covered. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to collect statistical information on collective bargaining in EPZs and to provide data concerning the number of collective agreements and workers covered. It further requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination and employer interference in EPZs and the relevant investigation/remediation measures.

Iraq

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, which primarily refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

Violence against trade unionists. Previously the Committee, noting the ITUC's 2008 comments on the persistence of serious violations of freedom of association, had requested the Government to provide information on the ITUC's allegations of arrests, detentions and acts of violence committed against trade unionists. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that it has never sanctioned or committed arrests and acts of violence against trade unionists, and that it was cooperating with the representatives of trade unions in order to submit detailed information respecting this matter. Further noting that in its most recent comments the ITUC refers to further acts of violence, the Committee once again expresses the hope that it will be possible in the near future for trade union rights and the right to collective bargaining to be exercised normally and in observance of fundamental rights, and in a climate free from violence, duress, fear and any kind of threat. It requests the Government to provide information with respect to the ITUC's allegations concerning these serious matters.

Articles 1, 3 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the Government, a draft Labour Code had been referred to the Consultative Council (Majlis Al-Shura) so that Parliament could examine and adopt the said legislation. It further noted that the guarantees laid down in the draft Labour Code for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination applied to trade union founders and chairpersons and to trade union officers but not to trade union members; nor did the draft establish adequate guarantees against discrimination at the time of recruitment. The Committee also noted that, although it covered anti-union dismissals, the draft did not address other adverse measures affecting trade union membership or activities.

The Committee had pointed out that protection against acts of anti-union discrimination must apply to trade union members as well as union officers, and must cover not only dismissal but any other measure amounting to anti-union discrimination (transfer, demotion and other measures that have adverse effects). Furthermore, the protection provided for by the Convention applied upon recruitment, in the course of employment and at the time of separation. The Committee also recalled that general provisions of the law prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination are not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice; protection against acts of anti-union discrimination should therefore be ensured by various means adapted to national law and practice that prevent or effectively redress such acts, in particular through sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee had accordingly requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the draft Labour Code so as to ensure adequate protection for members of trade unions and trade union officers against acts of anti-union discrimination, in accordance with the principles noted above.

Previously the Committee had noted that section 142 of the draft Labour Code establishes a duty to bargain in good faith when a request to open collective negotiations has been submitted by a registered union representing no less than 50 per cent of the workers employed at the establishment or enterprise, or where such a request has been submitted jointly by several registered unions representing no less than 50 per cent of the workers to whom the collective agreement is to apply. The Committee pointed out that problems may arise where it is established by law that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent: a union that fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. It noted that if no union – or group of unions, as provided for in section 142 – covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should not be denied to the unions in the unit concerned, at least on behalf of their own members, and had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 142 of the draft Labour Code accordingly.

In respect of the matters noted above, the Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that its comments concerning adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination are addressed in the draft Labour Code's chapter concerning trade union organizations, that section 142 of the draft Code has been amended to bring it into conformity with the Convention, and that a new section 143 has been included to address the Committee's comments on minimum membership requirements for the acquisition of bargaining agent status.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee had previously referred to the absence, in Act No. 52 of 1987 on trade union organizations, of any provisions to promote collective bargaining and thus give effect to Article 4 of the Convention. The Government indicates in this regard that the draft Labour Code repeals Act No. 52 of 1987 on trade union organizations. The Government further states that section 147 of the draft Labour Code defines a collective labour contract as an agreement between the trade union, on behalf of the workers of the occupations and industries it represents, and the employers concerned. Additionally, such a contract has to be established within one occupation, one industry or one project or for similar, interlinked or common projects in order to regulate reciprocal legal and contractual obligations between the parties concerned. Noting this information, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether, under the draft Labour Code, collective bargaining at the enterprise level is also recognized. The Committee further invites the Government to take appropriate measures to promote collective bargaining, through publications, seminars and other activities designed to increase awareness of its utility.

Articles 1, 4 and 6. The Committee had been noting for many years that Act No. 150 of 1987 on public servants, which the Government was planning to repeal, contains no provisions affording the guarantees established in the Convention to public servants and public sector employees engaged in the administration of the State, and had further observed that the draft Labour Code excludes employees of the public service from its scope. The Committee had previously noted that the Government, in consultation with the social partners and experts from the Office, was drafting a recommendation with a view to including in the new Labour Code provisions on the trade union rights of public sector workers, which would give them the rights provided for in Articles 1, 3 and 6 of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code repeals Act No. 150 of 1987 on public servants, so that public servants will be covered by its provisions. The Committee expresses the hope that public servants will enjoy all the rights and guarantees enshrined in the Convention and requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made with respect to the draft Labour Code's adoption.

Trade union monopoly and interference in trade union activities. The Committee had noted that, according to a statement made by the Government representative to the 2008 Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, Act No. 52 of 1987 established a de facto monopoly of the Confederation of Iraqi Workers' Unions by forbidding the establishment of other unions or federations. The Government representative also indicated that the Act was in force only on paper, in that since April 2003 other unions have been set up in several sectors notwithstanding the lack of a proper legal framework. The Committee noted that the Conference Committee's discussions also addressed the need to repeal Decision No. 8750 of 8 August 2005, the provisions of which had been used by the Government to freeze the trade union's bank assets. It considered that texts which have not yet been formally repealed, such as Decision No. 8750, can generate uncertainty in law and hinder the development of collective bargaining within the meaning of the Convention and of other trade union activities. The Committee trusted that the Government would shortly indicate that Act No. 52 of 1987 and Decision No. 8750 of 2005 had been formally repealed. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft Labour Code repeals Act No. 52 of 1987, and that the repeal of Decision No. 8750 will be considered once workers' elections have been held and the financial liability for keeping the assets of the Confederation defined. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will shortly indicate the repeal of Decision No. 8750 of 2005, so as to ensure trade union multiplicity, and requests the Government to indicate in its next report any developments in this regard.

Jamaica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which refer to matters already raised by the Committee, as well as allegations concerning acts of anti-union discrimination. These allegations are examined under the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98).

Article 3 of the Convention. The right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it referred to the extensive power of the minister to refer an industrial dispute to arbitration (sections 9, 10, and 11(A) of the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act). The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that the amendments to the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act only permit the minister to exercise the powers vested in his office to require compulsory arbitration in specific essential circumstances and only after all efforts to come to an amicable settlement through dialogue and negotiations have failed. The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act and its corresponding regulations are constantly under review by the ministry and that the ministry will examine concerns raised with a view to making any amendments necessary to make it more compliant with the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that sections 9, 10 and 11(A) of the Act will be amended, taking into account that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute is acceptable only at the request of both parties or in instances where a strike may be restricted or even banned, i.e. in the event of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely services the interruption of which could endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report does not contain observations in relation to the ITUC's 2007 comments. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to send its observations in relation to the ITUC's comments of 2008 on acts of anti-union discrimination and the refusal to recognize a trade union, and also on the fact that there are no trade unions in the export processing zones. It also requests the Government to investigate these allegations, to ensure in the export processing zones the trade union rights provided for in the Convention and to provide information on any measures taken in this regard.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that several of its previous comments referred to the following matters:

- the denial of the right to negotiate collectively in the case of workers in a bargaining unit when these workers do not amount to more than 40 per cent of the workers in the unit or when, if the former condition is satisfied, a single union that is engaged in the procedure of obtaining recognition does not obtain 50 per cent of the votes of the workers in a ballot that the minister has caused to be taken (section 5(5) of Act No. 14 of 1975 and section 3(1)(d) of its regulations); and
- the need to take measures to amend the legislation so that a ballot is made possible when one or more trade unions are already established as bargaining agents and another trade union claims that it has more affiliated members in the bargaining unit than the other trade unions, and therefore invokes its most representative status in the unit in order to be considered as a bargaining agent.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security indicates that notwithstanding these apparent stumbling blocks, the current provisions are necessary to maintain industrial harmony in the local context. The Committee, however, recalls once again that by ratifying the Convention, the State undertook to promote collective bargaining and that this implied granting collective bargaining rights to the most representative trade union or (jointly) trade unions. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the very near future to amend its legislation, lowering the percentage mentioned and allowing a ballot in cases of disputes concerning representativeness, so as to bring it into full conformity with the Convention as soon as possible. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

Japan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the comments of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO) dated 22 October 2008 and 5 October 2009 and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009 on the application of the Convention and in relation to the restrictions on check-off procedures in Osaka city. The Committee notes the 2008 observations of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

Denial of the right to organize of firefighting personnel and prison officers. The Committee recalls its long-standing comments concerning the need to recognize the right to organize for firefighting personnel.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it has revised the Order of the Organization and Operation of the Fire Defence Personnel Committee to include the establishment of a system of liaison facilitation. The Government also indicates in its report that it has made efforts to operate the Fire Defence Personnel Committee system appropriately by: announcing the operational conditions of the Fire Defence Personnel Committee in the previous year and the points of concern on the operational conditions through the notification to all fire defence headquarters at the beginning of the fiscal year; distributing brochures on the Fire Defence Personnel Committee system to all fire defence personnel across the country; and explaining the purpose of the Fire Defence Personnel Committee system points and the warning points of its operation at the nationwide training meetings of fire chiefs. While the JTUC-RENGO has indicated in its comments that the Fire Defence Personnel Committee system has played an important role in improving the working conditions and environment of firefighters, it recalls that the main concern of ensuring the right to organize to firefighters has yet to be granted.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that as of 31 March 2009 the Fire Defence Personnel Committee meetings were held in 804 fire defence headquarters out of 806 across the country. In addition, 748 headquarters made available to all fire defence personnel the summary of their deliberation including a Committee's opinion to the fire chief. The number of the opinions submitted through the liaison facilitators rose to 4,131 (82.5 per cent) in the fiscal year 2008, from 2,833 (52.9 per cent) in the fiscal year 2005 when the system was introduced. In addition, the number of headquarters notifying the result and the reasons of a deliberation to the personnel and the liaison facilities who submitted the opinion rose from 393 (48.4 per cent) in the fiscal year 2005 to 604 (75.1 per cent) in the fiscal year 2008.

The Committee notes that the JTUC–RENGO also indicates that there has been no progress on the issue of granting the right to organize to prison staff. The Committee recalls that the functions exercised by prison staff should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize and further refers to the examination of the Committee on Freedom of Association with regard to this matter (Cases Nos 2177 and 2183, 329th Report).

The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to the right of all workers, including firefighters and prison officers, to form and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the additional legislative measures taken or contemplated in order to ensure the right to organize to these categories of workers and in the meantime to permit their de facto organization without penalty.

Prohibition of the right to strike of public servants. The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2177 and 2183 (354th Report, paragraph 992) to the effect that public sector employees, like their private sector counterparts, should enjoy the right to strike, with the possible exceptions of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and workers employed in essential services in the strict sense of the term. Moreover, public employees who may be deprived of this right should be afforded appropriate compensatory guarantees.

The Committee recalls that it has expressed concern in the past at the lack of progress in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that public employees benefit from the National Personnel Authority recommendation system and other compensatory measures, in compensation for restrictions on the right to strike and that the Supreme Court has maintained throughout its judgements that the prohibition of acts of dispute by public employees is constitutional. The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the right to strike is guaranteed to public servants who are not exercising authority in the name of the State and to workers who are not working in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and that the others (e.g. hospital workers) benefit from sufficient compensatory guarantees in order to safeguard their interests namely, adequate, impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures, in which the parties have confidence and can participate at all stages, and in which the awards, once made, are binding and fully and promptly implemented.

Reform of the civil service. The Committee notes that in Cases Nos 2177 and 2183 the Committee on Freedom of Association requested that the Government continue to take steps to ensure without delay the promotion of full social dialogue aimed at effectively addressing the measures necessary for the implementation of the freedom of association principles embodied by Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee previously noted the establishment of a “Special Examination Committee” consisting of 17 members including three representatives from trade unions, in addition to representatives from private enterprises, academia and the mass media. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that after having held 15 meetings and having deliberated in four simulation group meetings, the Special Examination Committee completed the final report in October 2007. The report states that as main points of the reform the following: (1) establishment of autonomy in employee/employer relations by giving a certain range of non-industrial public service employees the right to conclude collective agreements and abolishing the system in which the third party institutions recommend labour conditions of public service employees; (2) establishment of a governmental employers’ organization; and (3) enhancement of accountability to the public. The Committee also notes the Progress Schedule for Civil Service Reform. In addition, in the process of establishing the Progress Schedule, the Japanese Government held a number of meetings with JTUC–RENGO and RENGO–PSLC at various levels formally and informally between November 2008 and the end of March 2009.

The Committee takes note of this information and wishes to stress once again that the reform process which will establish the legislative framework of industrial relations in the public sector for many years to come is a particularly appropriate opportunity to hold full, frank and meaningful consultations with all interested parties on all the issues which create difficulties with the application of the Convention and whose legal and practical problems have been raised by workers’ organizations over the years. The Committee trusts that the Government will vigorously pursue these consultations within the framework of the labour–employer relations system examining the committee or other appropriate bodies, in order to find mutually acceptable solutions to all the issues raised and to bring the law and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and asks it to provide information on the progress made in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the comments of the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) dated 22 October 2008 and 5 October 2009 and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009, on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the most recent comments made by the JTUC–RENGO and the ITUC.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted the long-standing dispute and court proceedings arising out of the privatization of the Japanese National Railways (JNR) which were taken over by the Japan Railway Companies (JR); they concern in particular, the decision of the JR not to rehire workers belonging to certain organizations which opposed the privatization plan. The Committee additionally noted that the last major pending issue concerned outstanding claims for the reinstatement of the 1,047 Kokuro workers. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that this issue is still being dealt with in the framework of the relevant recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and that the Government will continue to inform the Committee of any progress made in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to communicate any determination of the abovementioned issue in its next report and, in particular, the results of any appeals from the remaining workers or any other developments.

Article 4. Collective bargaining rights of public service employees not engaged in the administration of the State in the context of the civil service reform. Several of the Committee's previous comments concerned the need for measures to ensure the promotion of collective bargaining for public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State in the framework of ongoing consultations on the reform of the civil service. The Committee notes that the JTUC-RENGO states that the Headquarters for Promoting Civil Service Reform was established pursuant to the Basic Law on Reform of National Public Officers' Systems (Civil Service Reform Law) and, in order to develop an autonomous labour management relation system for public employees, the Labour Employer Relations System Examining Committee was set up and began its examination process. A working group was established in the committee and began discussions in April 2009 in order to work out a system for granting the right to conclude collective agreements, but it is still unclear whether that group's conclusions will be in line with the ILO recommendations.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that in some local governments, there are cases where there is no choice but to implement the revision of salaries in accordance with the recommendations of Personnel Commissions in view of the current social and economic circumstances, critical fiscal conditions and progress of administrative and fiscal reform. In addition, the Government indicates that the Supreme Court has ruled that, even if a revision of remuneration has not been made in accordance with the Personnel Commission, it should not be immediately interpreted as the Personnel Commission not playing its proper compensatory functions if it is due to the really unavoidable reasons of the Prefecture's fiscal conditions. The Committee also notes that the Government held a number of meetings with JTUC-RENGO and RENGOPSLC at various levels formally and informally between November 2008 and March 2009.

Additionally, in 2008 the Government held a total of 35 official meetings with employees' organizations concerning issues including remunerations. Four of these meetings were with the Minister of Internal Affairs and Communications and based on the resulting findings, the Amendment Bill of the Law Concerning the Remuneration of Regular Service Employees was submitted to the Diet to revise the remunerations exactly as recommended by the National Personnel Authority.

Taking note of this information, the Committee once again recalls from previous comments that the capacity of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State to participate in the determination of wages remains substantially limited and once again requests the Government to examine measures in the context of the current dialogue over the civil service reform, aimed at giving a primary role to collective bargaining so that workers and their organizations may be able to participate fully and meaningfully in designing the overall bargaining framework. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will be in a position to report on concrete progress made in this respect in its next report.

Jordan

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, which refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

Scope of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee had referred to the exclusion of migrant workers, domestic workers and certain classes of agricultural worker from the provisions of the Labour Code, and had noted with interest the Government's statement that it had formulated amendments to the Jordanian Labour Code so as to include migrant workers, domestic workers, and all categories of agricultural workers within the scope of the Labour Code's provisions, and that the draft amendments had been referred to the Council of Ministers in order to initiate the process of adoption. In this respect, the Committee notes that according to the Government the draft amendments to the Labour Code were still undergoing constitutional procedures for approval, and that pending their adoption the Government had undertaken such measures as increasing the number of labour inspectors in export processing zones and aiding in the establishment of migrant worker trade union committees.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to adopt legislative provisions providing for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference. The Government indicates, in this regard, that this matter has been taken into consideration in the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

Noting this information, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the amendments to the Labour Code will, upon adoption: (1) ensure the guarantees of the Convention to the categories of worker mentioned above; and (2) make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, together with sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, against all acts of interference by workers' and employers' organizations by each other in their establishment, functioning or administration. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the amendments as soon as they are adopted.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1979)

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the only facility granted by law to workers' representatives was paid leave of 14 days to attend courses and requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that trade union representatives are granted facilities enabling them to carry out their trade union duties rapidly and efficiently. The Committee had also noted that the Ministry of Labour was endeavouring to encourage workers' and employers' organizations to include most of the provisions of the Convention in their collective agreements. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that its comments would be taken into account when a legislative modification was adopted. It requested the Government to keep it informed of any measures adopted in that regard, and recalled that the Workers' Representatives Recommendation, 1971 (No. 143), lists examples of such facilities: time off from work to attend trade union meetings, congresses, etc.; access to all workplaces in the undertaking, where necessary; access to the management of the undertaking, as may be necessary; distribution to workers of publications and other written documents of the union; access to such material facilities and information as may be necessary to carry out their duties, etc.

The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government, the measures requested in its previous observation have been incorporated into the draft amendments to the Labour Code, which would be transmitted to the Committee following their adoption. In these circumstances the Committee expresses the hope that the amendments to the Labour Code would ensure for trade union representatives, facilities enabling them to carry out their trade union duties rapidly and efficiently and requests the Government to provide information on developments respecting the amendments' adoption.

Liberia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 29 August 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee had previously taken note of the labour law reform process, being facilitated by the ILO, under which consultations with stakeholders were to be held until December 2008. The recommendations emanating from these consultations were to be analysed and reviewed at the January 2009 National Labour Conference, with a view to drafting a final revision of the law. In this connection, the Committee had expressed the hope that this reform process will take into full consideration the matters the Committee has been commenting upon for many years, which concern the need for:

- legislation guaranteeing to workers adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions;
- legislation guaranteeing to workers' organizations adequate protection against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and
- legislation guaranteeing the right to collective bargaining to employees in state-owned enterprises and public servants who are not public officials engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the Decent Work Bill will fully protect the workers and their organizations against anti-union discrimination both at the time of recruitment and during employment relationship as well as against acts of interference by the employers and their organizations. It will further ensure the right to collective bargaining of state-owned enterprise employees. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Decent Work Bill will give full effect to the Convention in line with its comments above, including that concerning the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State, and requests the Government to provide a copy of the latter following its adoption.

Malawi

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) communication dated 26 August 2009, which refers to matters previously raised.

The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's allegation concerning the exclusion of the informal sector from the guarantees of the Convention. In this respect, the Government states that the ITUC's allegation is incorrect. The Government further indicates that there is even an organization entitled the Malawi Union for the Informal Sector, which was registered in June 2004. The Committee notes the Government's information.

Mali

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1995)

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the exceptions from the scope of the General Civil Service Regulations, 2002, were too broad and asked the Government to indicate which of the rights and guarantees established in the Convention apply to certain categories of public employees. It also asked the Government to clarify whether, in respect of personnel of designated public bodies governed by their own regulations, those regulations establish the guarantees provided for by the Convention. The Committee observes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this respect. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate the various existing regulations which govern the personnel of public bodies, to clarify whether, under these regulations, such personnel enjoy the guarantees established in the Convention, and to send a copy of them.

Articles 4 and 5. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the General Civil Service Regulations contain no specific provisions on protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. It therefore asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the legislation includes explicit provisions to protect workers against acts of anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and in the course of employment and against acts of interference by the public authorities, together with rapid and effective remedies and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. The Committee notes with regret the Government's indication that no measures are contemplated in this respect. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to take steps to ensure that the legislation includes explicit provisions providing adequate protection against anti-union discrimination for public employees and against all acts of interference by the public authorities in the formation, functioning and administration of public employees' organizations.

Article 7. Procedures for determining terms and conditions of employment. With regard to joint administrative committees and their role as dispute settlement bodies, the Committee previously observed that, under Decree No. 5-164 of 6 April 2005 establishing arrangements for the implementation of the General Civil Service Regulations, the competence of the joint committees is confined to individual issues and it was not established that public employees' organizations may participate in the determination of their terms and conditions of employment through negotiation or other methods. The Committee notices that the legislation permits the exercise of the right to strike but does not establish negotiating procedures or other methods for determining the terms and conditions of employment in the public service, since the Higher Civil Service Council referred to by the Government is a consultative body under the terms of Decree No. 5-164. Since Mali has also ratified the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98), the Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the legislation gives full effect to Article 7 of the Convention and at least recognizes the right to collective bargaining of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

Article 8. Dispute settlement. With regard to dispute settlement, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its last report that the legislation does not establish any provisions on the settlement of disputes connected with the determination of terms and conditions of employment between the public authorities and the representative organizations of public employees, but in practice there is a Committee on Social Dialogue which exists within the Cabinet of the Prime Minister and the Ministry of Labour, the Public Service and State Reform, which intervenes as a mediator whenever notice of strike action is given by the public employees' representative organizations. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the text establishing the powers, composition and functioning of the Committee on Social Dialogue referred to in its report and to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of provisions laying down procedures for the settlement of disputes, other than those taking the form of a strike, arising from negotiations between the public authorities and public employees' representative organizations in the determination of terms and conditions of employment.

Malta

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes with regret that no observation was provided by the Government on the comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in 2006, presently known as the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), particularly on account of some allegations reference to death threats against leaders of the General Workers Union (GWU). In this respect, the Committee recalls the Government that death threats against trade unionists create an environment of fear and have inevitable repercussions on the exercise of trade union activities, and that it should carry out inquiries into allegations of this kind.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to freely organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether, under the terms of sections 74 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA), compulsory arbitration before the Industrial Tribunal could still be imposed over disputes of interest. The Committee had also requested information on the number of strikes and the incidents of recourse to the Minister's power to refer disputes to the Industrial Tribunal at the request of only one party. The Committee notes the Government's explanation to the effect that, where a trade dispute exists or is apprehended, the parties to the dispute may agree to refer the dispute to the Director of Industrial and Employment Relations or to a conciliator chosen by the parties themselves or by the Director; thus the mechanism is purely voluntary. It is only where the parties choose to resort to conciliation, and the conciliator reports a deadlock, that the Director refers the matter to the Minister for eventual referral to the Industrial Tribunal. Furthermore, the Government indicates that in 2007, five strikes were resolved through mediation and not through recourse to the Industrial Tribunal.

While noting this information, the Committee observes, nevertheless, that under section 74(1) and (3) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act, where conciliation fails, any of the parties to the dispute may notify the Minister who in turn may refer the dispute to the Tribunal for settlement.

Further noting the information given by the Government that the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 will be under review for possible amendment, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that due consideration is given, within this exercise, to amending section 74(1) and (3) of that law so that arbitration may not be imposed unless both parties agree. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers given that those categories are excluded from the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal pursuant to section 75(1) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA). The Committee notes from the Government's report that public officers have the right to appeal to the Public Service Commission, an independent body (the members are appointed by the President of Malta acting on the advice of the Prime Minister given after a consultation with the Leader of the Opposition and they cannot be removed except for inability or misbehaviour causes) established under section 109 of the Constitution of Malta. The Committee also notes from the Government's report that the Public Service Commission's primary role is to ensure that disciplinary action taken against public officers is fair, prompt and effective. The Committee requests the Government to indicate, with regard to cases of anti-union dismissal, whether the Public Service Commission is empowered to grant such compensatory relief – including reinstatement and back pay awards – as to constitute sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee also once again requests the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals of port workers and public transport workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts given that the EIRA does not expressly protect employers' and workers' organizations from acts of interference by one another, in each other's affairs. Noting with regret that no observation is provided on this matter in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report, the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act, so as to ensure that this provision: (i) does not render automatically null and void any provisions in existing collective agreements which grant workers the right to recover public holidays falling on a Saturday or Sunday; and (ii) does not preclude voluntary negotiations in the future over the issue of granting workers the right to recover national or public holidays which fall on a Saturday or Sunday on the basis of a collective agreement (see 342nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, Case No. 2447, paragraph 752). The Committee, noting with regret that no information is provided in this respect, once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act.

Myanmar

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009. It also notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2268 and 2591 (354th Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 305th Session, June 2009, paragraphs 154–168), and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 26 August 2009 which refer to grave matters noted by the Committee in its previous comments.

The Committee recalls the ITUC's previous reference to the arrest, heavy-handed interrogation and long prison sentences imposed on six workers (Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win and Myo Min). The six workers were sentenced on 7 September 2007 to 20 years' imprisonment for sedition and Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Kyaw Win, and Myo Min were sentenced to an additional five years in prison for association with the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) under section 17(1) of the Unlawful Associations Act and to three years for illegally crossing a border, as a result of which their jail time amounted to 28 years in total. The Committee notes that in its 2009 comments the ITUC indicates that the six workers appealed their convictions to the divisional court, which dismissed them, prompting them to file their appeals to the Supreme Court – which reviewed the cases on 4 April 2008 and let the original court rulings stand.

The Committee recalls the previous allegations concerning Burma Railway Union leader U Tin Hla. According to the ITUC, U Tin Hla had been arrested along with his entire family on 20 November 2007, and – while his family was later released – was charged and sentenced to seven years in prison under section 19(a) of the Penal Code for possession of explosives which were, in fact, electric wires and tools in his toolbox. The ITUC had indicated that U Tin Hla's crime was apparently his very active efforts to organize workers from the railways and other sectors to support the popular uprising of the Buddhist monks and people in late September 2007. In its 2009 comments, the ITUC adds that U Tin Hla remains in prison, suffering from tuberculosis and diabetes.

In respect of Su Su Nway, who allegedly had been arrested for her actions in supporting workers' participation in the September 2007 uprising, the Committee notes that in its 2009 comments the ITUC states that in November 2008 Su Su Nway was convicted of encouraging assembly of persons disturbing state tranquillity, obstructing the work of officials, and issuing communications that interfere with Myanmar's relations with other nations. She was sentenced to 12 years and 6 months in prison. The ITUC also indicates that at the end of 2008 three workers – Khin Maung Cho (aka. Pho Toke), Nyo Win, and Kan Myint – employed at the A21 Soap Factory in Hlaing Thayar Industrial Zone, were sentenced to long jail terms for involvement with exiled groups, sedition and other charges. Khin Maung Cho was sentenced to 19 years, while Kan Myint received ten years in jail and Nyo Win was given a five-year sentence.

The Committee recalls that the ITUC had previously referred to numerous other grave violations of the Convention, including:

- the imprisonment of Myo Aung Thant, member of the All Burma Petro-Chemical Corporation Union, who has now been in jail for over 12 years after having been convicted for high treason for maintaining contacts with the FTUB (under section 122(1) of the Penal Code);
- the killing of Saw Mya Than, FTUB member and official of the Kawthoolei Education Workers' Union (KEWU), who was allegedly murdered by the army in retaliation for a rebel attack, and in respect of whose murder the Committee on Freedom of Association had requested the Government to institute an independent inquiry in the framework of Case No. 2268;
- the disappearance on 22 September 2007 of Lay Lay Mon, a female labour activist who is a former political prisoner, after helping organize workers to support protesting monks and citizens in the uprising in Yangon; she was believed to be incarcerated in Insein prison but there was no news of if, or when, she would be brought to trial;
- the disappearance of labour activist Myint Soe during the last week of September 2007 after being active in engaging with workers to increase their involvement in the September uprising;
- the arrest by the military authorities on 8 and 9 August 2006 of seven members of the family of the FTUB member and activist Thein Win at their house in the Kyun Tharyar section of Pegu city. While in detention, several male members of the family were tortured while being interrogated. On 3 and 4 September 2006, the authorities released four of the family members. But three of Thein Win's siblings (Tin Oo, Kyi Thein and Chaw Su Hlaing) were sentenced to 18 years in jail under sections 17(1) and (2) of the Unlawful Associations Act. Tin Oo suffered such intensive torture during detention that he has now become mentally unstable and there are fears for his health;
- the arrest in March 2006 of five underground democracy and labour activists for a variety of offences connected to efforts to provide information to the FTUB and other organizations considered as illegal by the regime, and to organize peaceful anti-SPDC demonstrations. All five were sentenced to long prison terms and four were serving those terms in Insein prison (U Aung Thein, 76 years old, sentenced to 20 years; Khin Maung Win, sentenced to 17 years; Ma Khin Mar Soe, 17 years; Ma Thein Thein Aye, 11 years; and U Aung Moe, 78 years old, sentenced to 20 years);
- the intimidation by the army of the 934 workers at Hae Wae Garment, located in South Okkapala Township in Yangon, who went on strike on 2 May 2006 to demand better terms and conditions of work. The 48 workers allowed to meet with the authorities were forced to sign a written statement that indicated that there were no problems at the factory;

- the arrest and sentencing to a four-year prison term with hard labour of Naw Bey Bey, an activist member of the Karen Health Workers' Union (KHWU); she was supposedly held in Toungoo;
- the arrest, torture and killing of Saw Thoo Di, aka. Saw Ther Paw, a Karen Agricultural Workers' Union (KAWU) committee member from Kya-Inn township, Karen State, by an armed column of Infantry Battalion 83 outside his village on 28 April 2006;
- the shelling of the Pha village with mortars and rocket propelled grenades by Light Infantry Battalion 308 which had been sent by the SPDC military upon learning that, on 30 April 2006, the FTUB and Federation of Trade Unions – Kawthoolei (FTUK) were preparing a May Day workers' rights commemoration; and
- the arrest, torture, and sentencing by a special court established in prison of ten FTUB activists to prison sentences, from three to 25 years, for having used satellite phones to convey information to the ILO and to the international trade union movement through an intermediation by the FTUB.

As concerns the six workers arrested for allegedly participating in a May Day 2007 event, the Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee repeats the Government's previous indication that they had not been arrested for holding a May Day event, but for breach of existing laws and for their involvement in unlawful activities and attempted terrorist acts in the country. There was solid evidence that those persons had been receiving instructions, training and financial assistance from the FTUB, a terrorist group in exile and unlawful association which masterminded bombings and terrorist acts to incite public unrest in the country. The Government representative further stated that any request to release them immediately constituted an infringement upon national sovereignty and was contradictory to the basic principles of public international law and Article 8 of the Convention, which stipulates that the law of the land should be respected.

With respect to U Tin Hla, the Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee reiterates the Government's previous indication that U Tin Hla was neither a leader nor a member of a labour union, but had worked as a supervisor for Myanmar Railways, which had no union. He had been caught by the police when committing the crime of possessing ammunition and had been subsequently charged and sentenced. As regards the ITUC's other allegations of the murder, detention, torture, arrest and sentencing of trade unionists, the Government states that the persons referred to were not arrested and convicted for having engaged in trade union activity but for having incited hatred of and contempt for the Government.

The Committee can only deplore the fact that the Government in its report largely confines itself to its previous observations – referring to the FTUB as a terrorist organization and indicating peremptorily that the numerous persons referred to were convicted for breaches of existing laws and inciting hatred of the Government – while failing to provide any evidence of measures taken to implement the Committee's previous requests. Once again, the Committee deeply regrets the dismissive tone of the Government's reply and the paucity of the information provided, which is in stark contrast to the extreme gravity of the issues raised by ITUC. The Committee once again strongly condemns the view expressed by the Government that comments made by workers' organizations under article 23 of the ILO Constitution and recommendations made by the ILO supervisory bodies to remedy violations of the fundamental rights of workers constitute interference in internal affairs, emphasizing in this regard that the membership of a State in the International Labour Organization carries with it the obligation to respect in national legislation freedom of association principles and the Conventions which the State has freely ratified including Convention No. 87.

The Committee once again stresses that respect for the right to life and other civil liberties is a fundamental prerequisite for the exercise of the rights contained in the Convention and workers and employers should be able to exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate of complete freedom and security, free from violence and threats. Furthermore, as regards the reported torture, cruelty and ill-treatment, the Committee once again points out that trade unionists, like all other individuals, should enjoy the safeguards provided by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and governments should give the necessary instructions to ensure that no detainee suffers such treatment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 30).

Finally, recalling that there is currently no legal basis to the respect for, and realization of, freedom of association in Myanmar, the Committee once again recalls that while trade unions are expected under Article 8 of the Convention to respect the law of the land, "[t]he law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention". The authorities should not interfere with legitimate trade union activities through arbitrary arrest or detention and allegations of criminal conduct should not be used to harass trade unionists by reason of their union membership or activities.

The Committee therefore once again most strongly deplores the serious alleged acts of murder, arrest, detention, torture and sentencing to many years of imprisonment of trade unionists for the exercise of ordinary trade union activities, including the mere sending of information to the FTUB and participation in May Day activities. The Committee once again urges the Government to provide information on measures adopted and instructions issued without delay so as to ensure respect for the fundamental civil liberties of trade union members and officers and to take all necessary measures to secure the immediate release of Thurein Aung, Wai Lin, Nyi Nyi Zaw, Kyaw Kyaw, Kyaw Win, Myo Min, and all those who have been imprisoned for the exercise of trade union activities immediately and to ensure that no worker is sanctioned for the exercise of such activities, in particular for having contacts with workers' organizations of their own choosing. Furthermore, recalling that the right of workers and employers to freely establish and join organizations of their own choosing cannot exist unless such freedom is established and recognized both in law and in practice, the Committee once again urges the Government to indicate all measures taken, including instructions issued, to ensure the free operation of any form of organization of collective representation of workers, freely chosen by them to defend and promote their economic and social interests, including organizations which operate in exile.

The Committee recalls the issues it has been raising over the years with respect to the legislative framework, including the prohibition of trade unions and the absence of any legal basis for freedom of association in Myanmar (repressive anti-union legislation, obscure legislative framework, military orders and decrees further limiting freedom of association, a single trade union system established in the 1964 Law and an unclear constitutional framework); the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) forced to work underground and accused of terrorism; "workers' committees" organized by the authorities; and the repression of seafarers even overseas and the denial of their right to be represented by the Seafarers' Union of Burma (SUB) which is affiliated to the FTUB and the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF).

The Committee further recalls that, for several years, it has indicated that there exist some pieces of legislation containing important restrictions to freedom of association or provisions which, although not directly aimed at freedom of association, can be applied in a manner that seriously impairs the exercise of the right to organize. More specifically: (1) Order No. 6/88 of 30 September 1988 provides that the "organizations shall apply for permission to form to the Ministry of Home and Religious Affairs" (section 3(a)), and states that any person found guilty of being a member of, or aiding and abetting, or using the paraphernalia of, organizations that are not permitted, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years (section 7); (2) Order No. 2/88 prohibits the gathering, walking or marching in procession by a group of five or more people regardless of whether the act is with the intention of creating a disturbance or of committing a crime; (3) the Unlawful Association Act of 1908 provides that whoever is a member of an unlawful association, or takes part in meetings of any such association, or contributes or receives or solicits any contribution for the purpose of any such association, or in any way assists the operations of any such association, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than two years and more than three years and shall also be liable to a fine (section 17.1); (4) the 1926 Trade Union Act requires that 50 per cent of workers must belong to a trade union for it to be legally recognized; (5) the 1964 Law Defining the Fundamental Rights and Responsibilities of the People's Workers establishes a compulsory system for the organization and representation of workers and imposes a single trade union; and (6) the 1929 Trade Disputes Act contains numerous prohibitions of the right to strike and empowers the President to refer trade disputes to courts of inquiry or to industrial courts.

Recalling that it had previously requested a detailed report on the measures taken to address the above-noted legislative matters, the Committee deeply regrets that the Government limits itself to repeating previously submitted information on the adoption of the Constitution and upcoming legal reforms. The Government reiterates that several sections of the Constitution would give effect to the provisions of the Convention (paragraph 96 of Chapter IV, paragraphs 353, 354 and 355 of Chapter VIII, and Schedule One, Union Legislative List, in Chapter XV) and repeats that, once the Constitution comes into force, pursuant to its provisions, national legislation would be reviewed and new laws drafted, including the Trade Union Law, and that they would be in line with Convention No. 87. In respect of the legislation, the Committee also notes that according to the Government the FTUB had been declared a terrorist organization by the Ministry of Home Affairs in Declaration No. 1/2006, and was also an unlawful association under the Unlawful Associations Act, 1908.

With regard to the Government's indications, the Committee further notes that in its conclusions the Conference Committee, wishing to highlight the intrinsic link between freedom of association and democracy, observed with regret that the Government had undertaken a road map for the latter without ensuring the basic requisites for the former. The Conference Committee also called upon the Government to take concrete steps urgently, with the full and genuine participation of all sectors of society regardless of their political views, to ensure that the Constitution, the legislation and the practice were fully brought into line with the Convention.

Finally, the Committee recalls its previous observation that there was currently no legal basis for the respect for, and realization of, freedom of association in Myanmar and that the broad exclusionary clause of article 354 of the Constitution subjects the exercise of this right "to the laws enacted for State security, prevalence of law and order, community peace and tranquillity or public order and morality". In this respect the Committee had noted with deep regret that the drafting of article 354 of the Constitution may continue to give rise to continued violations of freedom of association in law and practice. Recalling the particularly serious and urgent issues that it has been raising for nearly 20 years now, the Committee must once again deplore the Government's persistent failure to take any measures to remedy the legislative situation which constitutes a serious and ongoing breach by the Government of its obligations flowing from its voluntary ratification of the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee once again deeply regrets the exclusion from any meaningful consultation of the social partners and civil society as a whole, which would be a necessary foundation for the establishment of a legislative framework on the particularly serious and urgent issues raised in relation to the application of the Convention.

In these circumstances, the Committee once again urges the Government to furnish without delay a detailed report on the concrete measures taken, with the full and genuine participation of all sectors of society regardless of their political views, to enact legislation guaranteeing to all workers and employers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as the rights of these organizations to exercise their activities and formulate their programmes and to affiliate with federations, confederations and international organizations of their own choosing without interference from the public authorities. It further urges the Government in the strongest terms to immediately repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, the Unlawful Association Act, and Declaration No. 1/2006 of the Ministry of Home Affairs, so that they cannot be applied in a manner that would infringe upon the rights of workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to communicate any steps taken towards the adoption of draft laws, orders or instructions to guarantee freedom of association so that it may examine their conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, recalling its previous conclusion that the persistence of forced labour could not be disassociated from the prevailing situation of a complete absence of freedom of association and the systematic persecution of those who tried to organize, called upon the Government to accept an extension of the ILO presence to cover the matters relating to Convention No. 87. Noting the indication in the Government's report that an extension of the ILO presence to cover the matters related to the Convention was under consideration, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to accept such an extension in the very near future.

Namibia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1995)

The Committee notes that according to the Government the Labour Act. No. 11 of 2007 entered into force on 1 November 2008.

Article 6 of the Convention. Rights of prison staff. The Committee had previously noted that section 2(2)(d) of the Labour Act excludes members of the Namibian prison service from the Labour Act's provisions, unless the Prisons Service Act provides otherwise, and had also noted that the Prisons Service Act does not provide for the extension of the new Labour Act's guarantees to the Namibian prison service. Noting that the Government provides no information respecting this matter, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the necessary legislative amendments to guarantee, to the prisons services, the rights provided under the Convention will be adopted in the near future and once again requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any developments in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Netherlands

Aruba

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135)

Article 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to formalize some facilities concerning the access of the trade union leaders to the workplace of the employer and the distribution of union materials in the private sector. The Committee notes the Government's indication that no measures have been taken to seek advice of the Department of Labour for the formalization of these facilities. Recalling that according to Article 2 of the Convention facilities in the undertakings shall be afforded to workers' representatives as may be appropriate in order to enable them to carry out their functions promptly and efficiently, the Committee requests the Government to take measures in this respect.

Articles 1 and 2. The Committee further notes the declaration of the Government according to which the labour legislation review is still under way. The Committee expresses the hope that the future legislation will be in accordance with the provisions of the Convention concerning the protection of workers' representatives (which now is let to the collective agreements) and the facilities to be afforded to them to enable them to carry out their functions properly and efficiently.

Nicaragua

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the new comments from the ITUC dated 26 August 2009, claiming that enterprises recruit workers for short periods or by the day, which prevents them from joining trade unions, and there are problems concerning the exercise of trade union rights in the maquila (export processing) industry. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this respect. Furthermore, in view of the Government's indication that it is unaware of the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – presently known as the ITUC – in 2005 and 2006 concerning the criminal proceedings against seven trade union officials, obstacles to the registration of a trade union executive committee and the declaration by the administrative authority that a work stoppage in the education sector was illegal, the Committee notes that the Office has sent these comments once more to the Government. The Committee requests the Government to carry out an investigation and provide its response in this respect.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes in full freedom. The Committee recalls that it has been referring for a number of years to the need for measures to be taken to amend sections 389 and 390 of the Labour Code, which provide for compulsory arbitration of a dispute where 30 days have elapsed since the calling of a strike. The Committee notes the Government's reply, in which it requests clarification regarding the legal basis of the Committee's claims that these provisions need to be amended. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the right to strike is one of the essential means at the disposal of workers and their organizations to promote and defend their economic and social interests. This right is based on the recognized right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes for the purpose of furthering and defending the interests of their members (Articles 3, 8 and 10 of the Convention). The Committee has also pointed out that the right to strike is an intrinsic corollary of the right to association protected by the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee has considered that arbitration imposed by the authorities on their own initiative is difficult to reconcile with the principle of the voluntary nature of negotiation (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 145, 179 and 258). Accordingly, in so far as compulsory arbitration obstructs the exercise of the right to strike, such arbitration violates the right of trade unions to organize their activities in full freedom and could only be justified in the context of the public service, or essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), or in the case of an acute national crisis. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information in its next report on the measures taken or contemplated to amend these sections as indicated.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 29 August 2008 referring to the imposition of compulsory arbitration and anti-union dismissals in export processing zones (EPZs) and various enterprises. The Committee notes the Government's indication that compulsory arbitration in EPZs is provided for in the Foreign Investment Promotion Act and that it refers to commercial and not labour matters. The Committee requests the Government to undertake an investigation into the comment alleging anti-union dismissals in EPZs and various enterprises. The Committee also requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC comments dated 26 August 2009 which also refer to this matter.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee duly notes that section 316 of the Penal Code, as amended in 2008, reinforces protection against acts of anti-union discrimination by providing that any termination of an employment relationship or modification thereof to the detriment of the worker by way of reprisal for the exercise of a labour right recognized in the Constitution, international instruments, laws, regulations or collective agreements shall be liable to a fine ranging from 90 to 300 days.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the need for the legislation to provide sanctions that are a sufficiently effective deterrent against acts of interference by employers or their organizations in trade union affairs. In this respect, the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication that section 316 of the Penal Code, as amended in 2008, imposes a fine ranging from 90 to 300 days on any employer, manager or administrator who finances or promotes organizations intended to restrict or impede the full freedom and autonomy of trade unions which are established in the Political Constitution of the Republic of Nicaragua, international instruments, laws, regulations or collective agreements.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee previously requested the Government to take steps to encourage collective bargaining in EPZs and to keep it informed of any measures taken in this respect. The Committee notes the Government's statement that in the first half of 2008 a total of 20 collective agreements were signed in the EPZs, covering a total of 54,054 workers.

Nigeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, it had noted the Trade Union (Amendment) Act (2005) and draws the attention of the Government to the following points.

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislatively imposed trade union monopoly. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised its concern over the legislatively imposed trade union monopoly and in this respect, it requested the Government to amend section 3(2) of the Trade Union Act, which restricts the possibility of other trade unions from being registered where a trade union already exists. The Committee noted that there is no such amendment in the language of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee reiterates that under Article 2 of the Convention, workers have the right to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing without distinction whatsoever (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 45). It therefore urges the Government to amend section 3(2) of the principal Trade Union Act so as to ensure that workers have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing even if another organization already exists.

Organizing in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee had noted the Government's statement that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion with the EPZ authority on the issues of unionization and entry for inspection in the export processing zones. The Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 13(1) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) makes it difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the EPZs. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure that EPZ workers are guaranteed the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing, as provided by the Convention, and to transmit a copy of any new laws adopted in this respect. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that representatives of workers' organizations have reasonable access to EPZs in order to appraise the workers in the zones of the potential advantages of unionization.

Organizing in various government departments and services. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which denied the right to organize to employees in the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Prison Services, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, the Central Bank of Nigeria, and Nigeria Telecommunications. The Committee notes that this section was not amended by the Trade Union (Amendment) Act. The Committee had noted that according to the Government's statement, the Collective Labour Relations Bill, pending before the lower chamber of Parliament will address this issue. The Committee recalls that workers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and to join organizations of their choosing and that the only exceptions authorized by the Convention are members of the police and armed forces, who should be defined in a restrictive manner and should not include, for example, civilian workers in the manufacturing establishments of the armed forces. Furthermore, the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 55 and 56). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act, which is still in force, and indicate the progress made towards the adoption of the Collective Labour Relations Bill and send a copy of the legislation, once it is adopted.

Minimum membership requirement. The Committee had previously expressed its concern over section 3(1) of the Trade Union Act requiring 50 workers to form a trade union. The Committee considers that even though this minimum membership would be permissible for industry trade unions, it could have the effect of hindering the establishment of enterprise organizations, particularly in small enterprises. In these circumstances, the Committee is therefore bound to reiterate that this number is too high and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reduce the minimum membership requirement, particularly in respect of enterprise trade unions, and thus ensure the right of workers to form organizations of their own choosing.

Article 3. The right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate programmes without interference from the public authorities. Export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers in EPZs have the right to freely organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities, including through the exercise of industrial action. Noting the Government's indication that the EPZ authority is not opposed to trade union activities and that the Federal Ministry of Labour and Productivity is still in discussion on this issue, the Committee reiterates its previous request and expects that the necessary measures will be taken without delay so as to ensure that workers in EPZs enjoy the rights under the Convention.

Administration of organizations. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to amend sections 39 and 40 of the Trade Union Act in order to limit the broad powers of the registrar to supervise the union accounts at any time and to ensure that such a power was limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports, or in order to investigate a complaint. The Committee notes that these sections were not amended under the new legislation and that the Government refers to the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee trusts that the new legislation to which the Government refers will address this matter.

Right to strike. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had noted that section 30, as amended by subsection (6)(d) of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act, continues to rely on the Trade Disputes Act to restrict strike action through the imposition of a compulsory arbitration procedure leading to a final award. The Committee has already pointed out on several occasions that such a restriction, which is binding on the parties concerned, constitutes a prohibition which seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interest of their members, as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. Furthermore, the Committee notes the ITUC's comments, according to which section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) impedes trade unions from handling the resolution of disputes between employers and employees by granting this responsibility to the authorities managing these zones. The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 7 of Decree No. 7 of 1976, amending the Trade Disputes Act in order to limit the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration to only essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in the case of acute national crisis. Also, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 4(e) of the Nigeria Export Processing Zones Authority Decree (1992) in order to guarantee the autonomy of the bargaining partners without giving the right to the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration.

Majority required to declare a strike. The Committee had noted that section 6 of the Trade Union (Amendment) Act amends section 30 of the principal Act by inserting subsection (6)(e), which requires the observance of a simple majority of all registered trade union members for the calling of a strike. The Committee considers that if a member State deems it appropriate to establish in its legislation provisions which require a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the new section 30(6)(e) accordingly, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Restrictions relating to essential services. The Committee had noted with concern that section 6 of the new Act relies on the definition of “essential services” provided for in the Trade Disputes Act (1990) to restrict participation in a strike. Specifically, the Trade Disputes Act defines “essential services” in an overly broad manner so as to include, among others, services for or in connection with: the Central Bank of Nigeria, the Nigerian Security Printing and Minting Company Limited, any corporate body licensed to carry out banking business under the Banking Act, the postal service, sound broadcasting, maintaining ports, harbours, docks or aerodromes, transportation of persons, goods or livestock by road, rail, sea or river, road cleaning, and refuse collection. The Committee recalls that essential services are only those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 159). It once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Trade Disputes Act’s definition of “essential services”.

The Committee reminds the Government that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to the third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 160).

Restrictions relating to the objectives of a strike. The Committee had noted with concern section 30 of the Trade Union Act as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, limiting legal strikes to disputes constituting a dispute of rights, defined as “a labour dispute arising from the negotiation, application, interpretation or implementation of a contract of employment or collective agreement under the Act or any other enactment of law governing matters relating to terms and conditions of employment”, as well as to a dispute arising from a collective and fundamental breach of employment or collective agreement on the part of the employee, trade union or employer. The Committee considers that the legislation appears to exclude any possibility of a legitimate strike action to protest against the Government’s social and economic policy affecting workers’ interests. The Committee recalls that organizations responsible for defending workers’ socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection, and the standard of living (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). Therefore, it requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 6 of the new Act so as to ensure that workers enjoy the full right to strike and, in particular, to ensure that workers’ organizations may have recourse to protest strikes aimed at criticizing the Government’s economic and social policies without sanctions.

Other restrictions. The Committee had noted that section 42(1)(B) of the Trade Union Act, as amended, requires that “no trade union or registered federation of trade unions or any member thereof shall in the course of any action compel any person who is not a member of its union to join and strike or in any manner whatsoever, prevent aircraft from flying or obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike”. The Committee observes that this section appears to provide for two prohibitions: firstly, with regard to compelling non-union members to participate in a strike action and, secondly, the prohibition to obstruct public highways, institutions or premises of any kind for the purpose of giving effect to the strike. The Committee recalls that taking part in picketing and firmly but peacefully inciting other workers to keep away from their workplace should not be considered unlawful. The case is different, however, when picketing is accompanied by violence or coercion of non-strikers. As to the second prohibition, the broad wording of this section could potentially outlaw any gathering or strike picket. The Committee recalls that the conditions that have to be fulfilled under the law in order to render a strike lawful should be reasonable and, in any event, not such as to place substantial limitation on the means of action open to trade union organizations. In addition, given that aircraft-related services, with the exception of air traffic controllers, are not in themselves considered to be essential services in the strict sense of the term, a strike of workers in that sector or related services should not be the subject of an overall ban, as could be implied from the wording of this section. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 42(1)(B) so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and the above principles, so as to ensure that any restrictions placed on strike actions aimed at guaranteeing the maintenance of public order are not such as to render any such action relatively impossible or ban it for certain workers beyond those in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

Sanctions against strikes. The Committee had noted that section 30 of the Trade Union Act, as amended by section 6(d) of the new Act, makes strikers liable to the possibility of both paying a fine and being imprisoned up to six months, which might lead to a penalty which is disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the principle above.

Article 4. Dissolution by administrative authority. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 7(9) of the Trade Union Act by repealing the broad authority of the Minister to cancel the registration of workers’ and employers’ organizations, as the possibility of administrative dissolution under this provision involved a serious risk of interference by the public authority in the very existence of organizations. The Committee had noted the Government’s statement that this matter will be addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. Noting that section 7(9) of the principal Act is still in force, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend it and to provide a copy of the new legislative Act once it is adopted.

Articles 5 and 6. The right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations and the application of the provisions of Articles 2, 3 and 4 of the Convention to federations and confederations of employers’ and workers’ organizations. The Committee had noted that section 8(a)(1)(b) and (g) of the new Act requires federations to consist of 12 or more trade unions in order to be registered. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of this requirement and, in particular, the level at which federations are established.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the very near future to make necessary amendments to the laws referred to above in order to bring them into full conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2009. The Committee recalls that the 2008 ITUC comments concerned violations of the right to strike, arrest and detention of strikers, police repression during demonstrations and the refusal to recognize a trade union. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations on all comments submitted by the ITUC.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009. The ITUC states that in the private sector collective bargaining rights are restricted by the requirement of government approval: collective agreements on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Councils Act. The ITUC also refers to acts of anti-union discrimination, including threats of dismissal made to trade unionists in several companies in the banking sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations respecting these matters.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 29 August 2008, concerning refusals to negotiate with trade unions, acts of interference by employers, anti-union practices against workers' representatives, including dismissals. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon and to reply to the matters raised by the Committee's previous comment.

Bill on collective labour relations. The Committee notes the Government's statement, according to which the National Assembly has not yet passed the bill on collective labour relations. The Committee recalls that ILO technical assistance has been provided to the authorities and hopes that the future legislation will be in full conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send the new law once adopted.

Comments made by the Organization of African Trade Union Unity (OATUU) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the comments made by the OATUU in a communication dated 20 August 2004, as well as the ICFTU, in communications dated 31 August 2005 and 10 August 2006. The comments concern in particular the fact that: (1) certain categories of worker are denied the right to organize (such as employees of the Customs and Excise Department, the Immigration Department, the Nigerian Security Printing and Mining Company Limited, the prison service and the Central Bank of Nigeria) and therefore are deprived of the right to collective bargaining; (2) only unskilled workers are protected by the Labour Act against anti-union discrimination by their employer; (3) every agreement on wages must be registered with the Ministry of Labour, which decides whether the agreement becomes binding according to the Wages Board and Industrial Council Acts according to the Trade Dispute Act (it is an offence for an employer to grant a general or percentage increase in wages without the approval of the Minister); (4) section 4(e) of the 1992 Decree on Export Processing Zones states that "employer-employee" disputes are not matters to be handled by trade unions but rather by the authorities managing these zones; and (5) section 3(1) of the same Decree makes it very difficult for workers to form or join trade unions as it is almost impossible for worker representatives to gain free access to the export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee requests the Government to send its reply on these comments.

Concerning the abovementioned point (1), the Committee observes that the Committee on Freedom of Association has underlined that the functions exercised by employees of customs and excise, immigration, prisons and preventive services should not justify their exclusion from the right to organize on the basis of Article 9 of Convention No. 87 (see 343rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 1027). The Committee requests the Government to amend section 11 of the Trade Union Act (1973) so that these categories of workers are granted the right to organize and to bargain collectively, as well as for all public employees not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee underlines the seriousness of the matters previously raised and requests the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency to ensure full respect for the rights enshrined in the Convention.

Pakistan

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1923)

The Committee notes with regret that it has not received the Government's report. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat parts of its previous observation, which are set out below:

The Committee previously noted the comments submitted by the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) in a communication dated 21 September 2008 to the effect that agricultural workers are excluded from the application of the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002 and that they have no right to freedom of association.

In its last observation, the Committee observed that small agricultural holdings which do not run an establishment or farmers working on their own or with their family appeared to be excluded from the IRO 2002 and therefore from the provisions on freedom of association. The Committee noted that the Industrial Relations Act, amending the IRO 2002, was adopted in November 2008 and that it will be an interim law which will lapse on 30 April 2010. During this period, a tripartite conference will be held to draft a new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders.

Furthermore, the Committee noted that while no trade union of agriculture was registered, there were numerous agricultural workers' associations in place in the country to safeguard their interests.

The Committee again requests the Government to indicate whether these associations enjoy bargaining rights under Pakistani legislation. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any progress made on the work of the tripartite conference referred to by the Government in the drawing up of new legislation on labour relations. The Committee trusts that the new legislation will ensure specifically that those engaged in agriculture, who appear to be excluded from the provisions on freedom of association of the IRO 2002, enjoy the same rights of association and combination as industrial workers. It also requests information on the number of trade unions and associations of agricultural workers.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the comments made by the Pakistan Workers' Federation (PWF) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in communications dated 2 and 26 August 2009 respectively. The Committee further notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2096, 2399, 2520 (see 353rd Report) and 2229 (see 354th Report), dealing with the same issues.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on important restrictions to the right to organize of certain categories of workers and to the right of trade unions to formulate their programmes, elect their officers and carry out their activities without interference by the public authorities. At its 2008 session, the Committee took note of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), adopted in November 2008, which amended the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002. It further noted that the IRA was an interim law due to lapse on 30 April 2010. The Committee noted that during this period, a tripartite conference would be held to draft new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders.

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009. It further notes that the Conference Committee expressed the firm hope that new legislation would be adopted in the very near future with the full consultation of the social partners concerned and that it would guarantee the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to form and join organization to defend their social and occupational interests and to organize their activities and elect their officers freely and without interference.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had requested the Government to ensure full freedom of association at the Karachi Electric Supply Company (KESC) and the Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC). The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that trade union activities were restored at both undertakings. With regard to the PIAC, the Government indicated that Chief Executive Order No. 6 was repealed by Parliament.

The Committee notes that the IRA excludes the following categories of workers from its scope of application:

- workers employed in services or installations exclusively connected with or incidental to the armed forces of Pakistan, including the Ordnance Factory maintained by the federal Government (section 1(3)(a));
- workers employed in the administration of the State (section 1(3)(b));
- members of the security staff of the PIAC (section 1(3)(b));
- workers employed by the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or the Security Papers Limited (section 1(3)(d));
- workers employed by an establishment or institution for the treatment or care of sick, infirm, destitute and mentally unfit persons excluding those run on a commercial basis (section 1(3)(e));
- members of the watch and ward, security or fire service staff of an oil refinery, an airport or a seaport (section 1(3)(f));
- members of the security or fire service staff of an establishment engaged in the production, transmission or distribution of natural gas or liquefied petroleum gas (section 1(3)(g));
- agricultural workers (section 1(3) read together with 2(ix) and (xiv)); and
- workers of charitable organizations (section 1(3) read together with 2(ix) and (xiv)).

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the new legislation guarantees the abovementioned categories of employees the right to form and join organizations to defend their own social and occupational interests. The Committee further requests the Government to indicate whether self-employed workers enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention.

With regard to the right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs), the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Export Processing Zones (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009 had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and will be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. The Committee hopes that the Rules will guarantee freedom of association rights to workers in EPZs and requests the Government to provide a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted.

The Committee notes that according to section 6(2) of the IRA, only trade unions of workers engaged or employed in the same industry may be registered. In the view of the Committee, such restrictions may be applied to first-level organizations, on condition that these organizations are free to establish inter-professional organizations, and to join federations and confederations in the form and manner deemed most appropriate by the workers or employers concerned (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 84). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that under the new legislation, trade unions affiliating workers of different professions and/or enterprises could be established.

The Committee further notes section 30(3) of the IRA according to which, after the certification of a collective bargaining unit, no trade union shall be registered in respect of that unit except for the whole of such unit. The Committee recalls that the right to establish and join unions implies the free determination of the structure and composition of unions. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that under the new legislation, workers can themselves determine the composition of their unions.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to lower the requirement of the minimum trade union membership set at 25 per cent of workers employed at the respective establishment or industry. The Committee notes that under the IRA, this requirement is lowered to 20 per cent (section 6(2)(b)). Considering that this minimum membership requirement is still too high, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that it is further reduced to a reasonable level.

The Committee notes that under the IRA, the right to represent workers in any proceedings, the right to check-off facilities and the right to call a strike are granted only to collective bargaining agents, i.e. the most representative trade unions (sections 24(13)(b) and (c), 32, 41, 42 and 68(1)). The Committee considers that workers' freedom of choice would be jeopardized if the distinction between most representative and minority unions results, in law or in practice, in the granting of privileges extending beyond that of priority in representation for such purposes as collective bargaining or consultation by the Government or for the purpose of nominating delegations to international bodies. In other words, this distinction should not have the effect of unduly influencing the choice of organization by workers and of depriving those trade unions that are not recognized as being amongst the most representative of the essential means for defending the occupational interests of their members. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that under the new legislation, the abovementioned rights are extended to all trade unions.

Article 3. Right to elect representatives freely. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, which restricted the possibility of becoming an officer of a bank union only to employees of the bank in question, under penalty of up to three years' imprisonment, either by exempting from the occupational requirement a reasonable proportion of the officers of an organization, or by admitting, as candidates, persons who have been previously employed in the banking company. The Committee notes the Government's statement that a bill to repeal section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962 was submitted to the Senate. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will repeal these restrictions in the near future and requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated in this respect.

The Committee notes that the IRA contains several sections concerning disqualification from being an officer of a trade union. First, under section 7, a person who has been convicted of an offence under section 78 shall be disqualified from being elected as, or from being, an officer of a trade union. According to section 78, whoever contravenes, or fails to comply with, any provisions of the IRA, shall, if no other penalty is provided, be punishable with a fine which may extend to 5,000 rupees. The Committee recalls in this respect that conviction for an act, the nature of which is not such as to be prejudicial to the performance of trade union duties, should not constitute grounds for disqualification from trade union office (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 120).

Second, under section 64(7), the labour court has the power to disqualify a trade union office bearer from holding any trade union office for the unexpired term of his or her office and for the term immediately following, for violation of its order to stop a strike. The Committee considers that such a sanction imposed for involvement in a strike should only be possible where the strike prohibition in question is in conformity with the principle of freedom of association and in any case, should not be imposed if the action in question is peaceful.

Third, the same sanction is also provided for in section 72(4) and (5) of the IRA for committing an unfair labour practice under section 18(1)(a)–(c) and (e). The Committee notes that the provisions of section 18 list a wide range of actions, which include acts by a worker to persuade other workers to join or refrain from joining a trade union during working hours; induce any person to refrain from becoming members or officers of a trade union by conferring or offering to confer any advantage for such person; commence, continue, instigate or incite others to take part on, or expend or supply money or otherwise act in furtherance or support of, an illegal strike or a work slowdown, etc. The Committee recalls that legislation which establishes excessively broad ineligibility criteria by means of a long list, including acts, which have no real connection with the qualities of integrity required for the exercise of trade union office, is incompatible with the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 120).

In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the new legislation takes into account the principles above and effectively guarantees the right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom.

Right of workers' organizations to organize their administration and to formulate their programmes. The Committee notes that section 15(d) of the IRA confers on the registrar the power to inspect the accounts and records of a registered trade union, or investigate or hold such inquiry into the affairs of a trade union as he or she deemed fit. The Committee considers that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when the administrative authority has the power to audit the trade union's accounts, to inspect their accounts and records and demand information at any time (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 126). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the supervision of internal administration of organizations is limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or if there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law, which itself should not infringe the principles of freedom of association.

The Committee notes that, according to section 68(2) and (3) of the IRA, "no party to an industrial dispute should be entitled to be represented by a legal practitioner in any conciliation proceedings under this Act" and that representation is possible in the proceedings before the labour court, or arbitrator, only with the permission of the court or the arbitrator, as the case may be. Considering that legislation which prevents workers' and/or employers' organizations from using the services of experts such as lawyers and agents to represent them in administrative or judicial proceedings is not in conformity with Article 3 of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that under the new legislation, these organizations are allowed to be represented by lawyers in administrative or judicial proceedings should they so desire.

Right to strike. The Committee notes that under section 18(1)(e) of the IRA, a work slowdown appears to be an unfair labour practice punishable by a fine which may extend up to 20,000 rupees and, in case of an office bearer, by disqualifying him or her from holding any office in any trade union during the term immediately following his or her term, in addition to any other punishment which the court might award (section 72(4) and (5)). The Committee recalls that any work stoppage, however brief and limited, may generally be considered as a strike. It is of the opinion that restrictions as to the forms of strike action can only be justified if the action ceases to be peaceful and that sanctions for strike action should be possible only where the prohibitions in question are in conformity with the principles of freedom of association (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 173 and 177). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that under the new legislation, a peaceful work slowdown is not considered to be a prohibited unfair labour practice and that no sanction could be imposed for participating in such an action.

The Committee notes that, according to section 48(3) of the IRA, where a strike lasts for more than 30 days, the federal or provincial government may, by an order, prohibit such a strike, provided that a strike can also be prohibited at any time before the expiry of 30 days if the Government, "is satisfied that the continuance of such strike is causing serious hardship to the community or is prejudicial to the national interests". Under section 48(4), following prohibition of the strike, the dispute is referred to the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) or the labour court for adjudication. The Committee further notes that under section 49 of the IRA, the federal or provincial government can prohibit a strike related to an industrial dispute of national importance (subsection (1)(a)) or in respect of any public utility services (subsection (1)(b)) at any time before or after its commencement, and refer the dispute to the NIRC or the labour court for adjudication. A strike carried out in contravention of an order made under this section is deemed illegal by virtue of section 63(1)(c). The Committee notes that Schedule I setting out the list of public utility services includes services such as oil production, postal services, railways, airways and ports. The Committee recalls that a prohibition of strikes can only be justified: (1) in the public services only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (2) in the event of an acute national emergency; or (3) in the essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). The Committee considers that the wording of sections 48(3) and 49 (1)(a) is too broad and vague to be limited to such cases and that the abovementioned services listed in Schedule I cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that any restriction or prohibition of the right to strike is in conformity with the principles above.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it had been requesting the Government to amend the Essential Services Act, which included services beyond those which can be considered essential in the strict sense of the term and sanctioned persons acting in violation of the Act with imprisonment for up to one year. The Committee recalls that no penal sanction should be imposed against a worker for having carried out a peaceful strike and therefore measures of imprisonment should not be imposed on any account. Such sanctions could be envisaged only where during a strike, violence against persons or property or other serious infringements of rights have been committed, and can be imposed pursuant to legislation punishing such acts. Nevertheless, even in the absence of violence, if the strike modalities had the effect of making the strike illegitimate, proportionate disciplinary sanctions may be imposed against strikers. The Committee once again asks the Government to amend this Act so as to bring it into conformity with the abovementioned principle and that its scope is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. It requests the Government to indicate any progress in this respect.

The Committee notes that section 48(2) of the IRA authorizes a “party raising a dispute”, either before or after the commencement of a strike, to apply to the labour court for adjudication of the dispute. During this time, the labour court (or tribunal) can prohibit the continuation of the existing strike action (section 62). The Committee recalls that a provision, which permits either party to unilaterally request the settlement of a dispute through compulsory arbitration leading to a final award, effectively undermines the right to strike by making it possible to prohibit virtually all strikes or to end them quickly. Such system seriously limits the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes and is not compatible with Article 3 of the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 153). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that under the new legislation, referral of the dispute to the courts is possible only in cases where the exercise of the strike can be restricted or even prohibited (see above) or at the request of both parties to the dispute.

The Committee notes that section 64(7) of the IRA provides for the following sanctions for contravening a labour court’s order to call off a strike: dismissal of the striking workers; cancellation of the registration of a trade union; debarring of trade union officers from holding office in that or any other trade union for the unexpired term of their offices and for the term immediately following. The Committee recalls in this respect that sanctions for strike action should be possible only where the prohibitions in question are in conformity with the principles of freedom of association. Even in such cases, existence of heavy and disproportionate sanctions for strike action may create more problems than they resolve. Since the application of disproportionate sanctions does not favour the development of harmonious and stable industrial relations, the sanctions should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 177 and 178). Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that under the new legislation, sanctions for strike action could only be imposed where the prohibition of the strike is in conformity with the Convention and that, even in those cases, the sanctions imposed are not disproportionate to the seriousness of the violation.

Furthermore, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate whether Presidential Ordinance No. IV of 1999, which amends the Anti-Terrorism Act by penalizing the creation of civil commotion, including illegal strikes or slowdowns, with up to seven years’ imprisonment, is still in force.

Article 4. The Committee notes that the registration of a trade union shall be cancelled if the labour court so directs, following a complaint made by the registrar that the trade union has contravened any of the provisions of the Act or its constitution (section 12(1) of the IRA). The Committee also notes that under section 64(7) of the IRA, the registration of a trade union can be cancelled for contravening a labour court’s order to call off a strike. The Committee recalls that the cancellation of registration of an organization and its dissolution is a measure which should occur only in extremely serious cases. The Committee considers that the cancellation of trade union registration, in view of the serious and far-reaching consequences which dissolution of a union involves for the representation of workers’ interests, would be disproportionate even if the prohibitions in question were in conformity with the principles of freedom of association. While noting that under the IRA, the registration can be cancelled only upon an order by the judicial authorities, the Committee emphasizes that judges should be able to deal with the substance of a case to enable them to decide whether or not the measure of dissolution would not be in violation of the rights accorded to occupational organizations by Convention No. 87. Furthermore, the Committee notes that under section 12(2) of the IRA, if a person who is disqualified under section 7 (a person who has been convicted of an offence under section 78 or heinous offence under the Pakistan Penal Code) is elected as an officer of a registered trade union, the registration of such a union shall be cancelled if the labour court so directs. The Committee considers that, although the conviction for an act, the nature of which calls into question the integrity of the person concerned may represent grounds for disqualification for trade union office, that should not constitute a reason for cancellation of trade union registration, which is tantamount to dissolution of the union. To deprive workers of their trade union organization because of illegal activities previously carried out by one of its leaders is, in the Committee’s opinion, a disproportionate sanction which violates the rights of workers to organize under Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the new legislation takes into account the principles above.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that new legislation would be adopted in the very near future with the full consultation of the social partners concerned and will take into account its comments above. The Committee requests the Government to provide it with a copy of the new legislation once it is adopted.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office if it so wishes.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Pakistan Workers’ Federation (PWF) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice in communications dated 2 and 26 August 2009 respectively. The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2096, 2399, 2520 (see 353rd Report) and 2229 (see 354th Report), dealing with the same issues.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been commenting on serious discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. At its 2008 session, the Committee took note of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), adopted in November 2008, which amended the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002. It further noted that the IRA was an interim law due to lapse on 30 April 2010. During this period, a tripartite conference would be held to draft a new legislation in consultation with all stakeholders. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the new legislation will take into account the comments set forth.

Scope of application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the IRA excludes the following categories of workers from its scope of application:

- workers employed in services or installations exclusively connected with or incidental to the armed forces of Pakistan, including the Ordnance Factory maintained by the federal Government (section 1(3)(a));
- members of the security staff of the Pakistan International Airlines Corporation (PIAC) (section 1(3)(b));
- workers employed by the Pakistan Security Printing Corporation or the Security Papers Limited (section 1(3)(d));
- workers employed by an establishment or institution for the treatment or care of sick, infirm, destitute and mentally unfit persons excluding those run on a commercial basis (section 1(3)(e));
- members of the watch and ward, security or fire service staff of an oil refinery, an airport or a seaport (section 1(3)(f));
- members of the security or fire service staff of an establishment engaged in the production, transmission or distribution of natural gas or liquefied petroleum gas (section 1(3)(g));
- agricultural workers (section 1(3) read together with 2(ix) and (xiv)); and
- workers of charitable organizations (section 1(3) read together with 2(ix) and (xiv)).

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the new legislation guarantees the abovementioned categories of employees the rights enshrined in the Convention.

The Committee notes that persons employed in the administration of the State are excluded from the scope of application of the IRA by virtue of its section 1(3)(b). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the new industrial relations legislation will grant to this category of workers collective bargaining rights.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to guarantee the right to organize of workers employed in EPZs, PIAC and in the Karachi Electric Supply Company (KESC). The Committee notes the Government's indication that trade unions are free to operate at the KESC and that trade union activities have been restored and a collective bargaining agent was determined through a referendum at the PIAC. With regard to the latter undertaking, the Government indicated that Chief Executive Order No. 6 was repealed. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the Export Processing Zones (EPZs) (Employment and Service Conditions) Rules, 2009 had been finalized in consultation with the stakeholders and will be submitted to the Cabinet for approval. The Committee hopes that the Rules will guarantee the right to organize to workers in EPZs and requests the Government to provide a copy thereof as soon as they are adopted.

Article 1 of the Convention. (a) Sanctions for trade union activities. The Committee had previously requested the Government to repeal section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance of 1962, which imposed sanctions of imprisonment and/or fines for carrying out trade union activities during office hours. The Committee notes the bill to amend the Banking Companies Ordinance which would repeal section 27-B and the Government's indication that the bill has been moved to the Senate. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 27-B of the Banking Companies Ordinance will be repealed in the near future and requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

(b) Lack of sufficient legislative protection for certain categories of workers dismissed for their trade union membership or activities. The Committee had previously noted the statement of the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), according to which the newly imposed section 2-A of the Services Tribunal Act had debarred workers engaged in autonomous bodies and corporations such as the Pakistan Water and Power Development Authority (WAPDA), railway, telecommunication, gas, banks, the Pakistan Agricultural Storage and Supply Corporation (PASSCO), etc., from seeking redress for their grievances from the labour courts, labour appellate tribunals and the National Industrial Relations Commission (NIRC) in the case of unfair labour practices committed by the employer. In this respect, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to reform section 2-A of the Services Tribunal Act. The Committee notes the Government's indication that a Bill for amendment of this provision has been moved to the Senate. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 2-A of the Services Tribunals Act will be repealed in the near future so as to ensure that appropriate means of redress are available to workers concerned. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee had previously requested the Government to indicate the specific provisions of the legislation which prohibited and penalized acts of interference by employers and their organizations in internal affairs of workers' organizations. The Committee notes with interest section 17 of the IRA which lists actions constituting unfair labour practices on the part of employer (such as participation in the promotion, formation and activities of a trade union, inducing any person to refrain from becoming or ceasing to be a member or officer of a trade union, by conferring or offering any advantage, etc.) and section 72(10) of the IRA punishing such acts by fine of up to 30,000 rupees.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes that it results from section 24(1) of the IRA that if the trade union is the only trade union at the enterprise and does not have at least one third of the employees as its members, no collective bargaining is possible at a given establishment. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to amend similar section which existed under the IRO 2002. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that if there is no union representing the required percentage to be designated as a collective bargaining agent, collective bargaining rights are granted to the existing unions, at least on behalf of their own members.

The Committee notes sections 31(1) and (2)(b) and 34(1) of the IRA according to which the NIRC may determine or modify a collective bargaining unit on an application made by a workers' organization or reference made by the federal Government. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that under the new industrial relations legislation, the choice of collective bargaining unit can be made only by the social partners themselves, since they are in the best position to decide the most appropriate bargaining level.

The Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that while trade unions are free to operate at the KESC, a referendum to determine a collective bargaining agent cannot be held as the management of the KESC filed a writ petition before the High Court appealing the decision of the NIRC granting voting right to contract employees. The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure that the KESC workers and the trade union existing at the enterprise enjoy the rights afforded by the Convention in practice. It requests the Government to provide information on the situation with regard to the determination of a collective bargaining agent.

Panama

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the comments of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to matters already examined by the Committee; to the murder of a leader of the Single Union of Construction and Allied Industries Workers (SUNTRACS); the denial of the right to strike by the Panama Canal Authority; and the referral of all collective disputes in the export processing zones to compulsory arbitration. The Committee also notes the comments of 23 July by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) referring to matters examined by the Committee. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can be exercised only in a climate that is free of violence in which fundamental human rights are respected and fully guaranteed, particularly the right to life and personal safety, and points out that the murder of a trade union leader requires that a judicial investigation be held in order fully to ascertain the facts, punish those responsible and prevent any recurrence. The Committee urges the Government to carry out an investigation thereon and to send its observations on this matter.

Lastly, the Committee notes the comments of 29 May 2009 by the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama (CONEP) on the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in response.

The Committee likewise notes the discussions that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009 on the application of this Convention. It notes that a Government representative reported on: (1) the adoption of various executive decrees regulating certain provisions of the Labour Code (for example, Legislative Decree No. 26 on the determination of minimum services in the event of strike; and Executive Decree No. 27 adopting measures to maintain the independence and autonomy of workers' organizations); and (2) the submission to the National Assembly of two bills, one to reduce the minimum number of workers required to form a union, and the other to guarantee fully the right to organize in export processing zones. The Committee notes that the Government representative also stated that the Government is not able to impose legislative reforms when there is disagreement between the social partners, as to do so would be contrary to tripartism. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Conference Committee regretted that it was unable to note significant progress in the requested amendment of the legislation and considered that the Government ought to seek technical assistance from the ILO in evaluating the scope of the new provisions referred to by the Government and to complete the reforms so as to ensure full consistency with the Convention.

The Committee recalls that, for many years, it has been commenting on the following matters, which raise problems of consistency with the Convention.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations.

- sections 174 and 178, last paragraph, of Act No. 9 of 1994 ("establishing and regulating administrative careers" – the "Administrative Careers Act"), (as amended by Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007), establishing, respectively, that there may not be more than one association in an institution, and that associations may have provincial or regional chapters, but not more than one chapter per province. The Committee recalls that according to Article 2 of the Convention, the legislation should envisage the possibility of workers being allowed to establish more than one organization if they so wish. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 174 and 178 of the Administrative Careers Act as indicated above;

- requirement of too large a membership (ten) for the establishment of an employers' organization and an even larger membership (40) for the establishment of a workers' organization at enterprise level, by virtue of section 41 of Act No. 44 of 1995 (amending section 344 of the Labour Code), and the requirement of a large number (40) of public servants to establish an organization of public servants under section 177 of the Administrative Careers Act. The Committee notes in this connection the information from the Government to the effect that the National Assembly has before it a bill to amend section 344 of the Labour Code by reducing from 40 to 20 the minimum number of workers or professionals needed to form a union. The Committee observes, however, that the abovementioned Decree does not amend the requirement of ten members in order to establish an organization of employers. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that the bill to amend section 344 of the Labour Code will be adopted in the near future and that it will reduce not only the minimum membership required to establish workers' organizations but also the minimum membership required to establish employers' organizations. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 177 of the Administrative Careers Act so as to reduce the minimum membership required for the establishment of organizations of public servants to a reasonable level. It asks the Government to indicate in its next report on any developments in this regard;
- denial to public servants of the right to establish unions. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to send its observations on the comments by FENASEP indicating that under the Administrative Careers Act, non-career public servants as well as those holding appointments governed by the Constitution and those who are elected and serving may not freely establish organizations of their choosing. The Committee notes that in its comments of 2009, FENASEP states that it is not deemed to be a workers' organization and so may not participate in the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO). The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in response.

Article 3. Right of organizations to elect their representatives in full freedom. Requirement to be of Panamanian nationality in order to serve on the executive board of a trade union (article 64 of the Constitution). The Committee pointed out in earlier comments that provisions on nationality that are too stringent could deprive some workers of the right to elect their representatives in full freedom; for example, migrant workers could be adversely affected in sectors in which they account for a significant share of the membership. In the Committee's view, the national legislation should allow foreign workers to take up trade union office at least after a reasonable period of residence in the host country (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 118). The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the necessary steps to have the legislation amended to take account of the aforementioned principle.

Right of organizations to organize their administration. Deduction of ordinary and extraordinary dues from the salaries of public servants who are not affiliated to the association of public servants and benefit from the improvements in conditions of work achieved in a collective agreement. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 180A of Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 amending Administrative Careers Act No. 9, provides that public servants who are not affiliated to the association of public servants and enjoy the improvements obtained in conditions of work by a collective agreement, shall have the ordinary and extraordinary trade union dues agreed by the association deducted from their wages for as long as the agreement is in force. In the Committee's view, to require by law that non-affiliated public servants shall pay ordinary dues to the association which obtained improvements in labour conditions raises problems of consistency with the Convention to the extent that such a requirement may influence the right of public servants freely to choose the association to which they wish to be affiliated. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to have section 180A of Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 amended so as to abolish the requirement for public servants who are not affiliated to associations to pay ordinary trade union dues, with the possibility of providing instead for the payment of a lesser amount than the ordinary trade union contribution for the benefits derived from collective bargaining.

Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes without interference.

- denial of the right to strike in export processing zones (Act No. 25). In this connection the Committee notes that the Government informed the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that a bill had been submitted to amend section 49B of Act No. 25 so as to allow workers or their social organizations to exercise the right to strike once conciliation is over. The Committee hopes that the bill will be adopted in the near future and asks the Government to report on progress in the enactment process;
- denial of the right to strike in enterprises of less than two years' standing pursuant to Act No. 8 of 1981. CONATO pointed out previously that since section 12 of the abovementioned Act establishes that no enterprise shall be compelled to conclude a collective agreement during the first two years of operations and since the general legislation allows strikes only in pursuance of collective bargaining or in other limited cases, the right to strike is in practice prohibited during the first two years of the enterprise's operations. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that workers and their organizations in the enterprises in question have the right to strike;

- denial of the right to strike of public servants. The Government indicated previously that the Constitution allows special restrictions in cases determined by law. The Committee recalls that the banning of strikes in the public service should be restricted to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 158). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to guarantee the right to strike of public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State;
- ban on federations and confederations from calling strikes and on strikes against the Government's economic and social policy, and unlawfulness of strikes that are unrelated to an enterprise collective agreement. The Committee points out that federations and confederations should have the right to strike and that organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, as a rule, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 165). The Committee requests the Government to take steps to have the legislation amended so as to align it with the abovementioned principles and so as not to restrict the right to strike to strikes related to a collective agreement;
- authority of the Regional or General Labour Directorate to refer labour disputes to compulsory arbitration in order to stop a strike in private transport enterprises (sections 452 and 486 of the Labour Code) which do not provide a service that is essential in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation to provide that compulsory arbitration shall be possible in the transport sector only at the request of both parties.

The Committee notes in this respect that the Government informed the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards about the adoption of Executive Decree No. 26 establishing parameters to be taken into account in determining the percentage of workers to be assigned to shift work in public services during a strike in the private sector (minimum services). The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the abovementioned Decree;

- obligation to provide minimum services with 50 per cent of the staff in the transport sector and penalty of summary dismissal for failure to comply with minimum services in the event of a strike (sections 152.14 and 185 of Administrative Careers Act No. 9 of 1994). The Committee recalls in this respect that minimum services should be limited to activities that are strictly necessary to cover the basic needs of the population or satisfy the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that these minimum services provided in public services which go beyond essential services in the strict sense of the term, are reduced to a reasonable level and that organizations of the workers concerned may participate in determining them;
- legislation interfering with the activities of employers' and workers' organizations (sections 452.2, 493.1 and 494 of the Labour Code) (closure of the enterprise in the event of a strike and compulsory arbitration at the request of one party). The Committee notes that in its comments of 2009, CONEP refers to the matter of closure of the enterprise in the event of a strike and indicates that such decisions may not be challenged by the employers concerned. The Committee notes that, according to CONEP, closure of an enterprise is not a symbolic act; the administrative authorities for labour with the collaboration of the police, place plastic seals on the entrances to the industrial and commercial facilities and the offices of enterprises thus barring access to the work centres by administrative staff or workers who do not support the strike, including access to computer equipment, archives and facilities that are necessary not only to the conduct of business but also to an informed approach (costs and other data) to negotiation with the union. According to CONEP, it is likewise impossible to undertake banking transactions or other activities to ensure the survival of the enterprise and, hence, the source of work. This leaves the employers defenceless in the face of the unions' demands – which are granted, as is permission to use the facades of the buildings and access roads for painting and displaying posters and union propaganda. As a result, says CONEP, employers have to work "underground", using hotels or their own homes to organize, administrate and coordinate negotiations for settlement of the dispute and to conduct all business necessary to the survival of the enterprise, taking care to leave no trace of their efforts, which might otherwise later be cited as proof that the employer has violated the closure order.

The Committee further notes that in its conclusions, the Conference Committee noted with concern the adverse effects of legislative provisions ordering the closure of an enterprise and barring the entrance of management staff to the facilities. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to have the legislation amended so that: (1) in the event of a strike, management staff and non-striking workers are guaranteed the right to enter the facilities; and (2) compulsory arbitration is possible only at the request of both parties to the dispute, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term in the case of public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State.

Observing that for many years there have been discrepancies between law and practice and the Convention, and bearing in mind the gravity of some of the restrictions mentioned, the Committee again urges the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation so as to make it fully consistent with the provisions of the Convention and the principles of freedom of association. In view of the Government's statement that although there is not as yet agreement with the social partners on amending the Labour Code, it is willing to harmonize law and practice with the Convention and is preparing a bill for the purpose, the Committee urges the Government to seek technical assistance from the ILO in this process, and in its next report to provide information on all progress made.

The Committee notes the comments of 23 July 2009 by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) referring to matters examined by the Committee, and the comments of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, and indicating that labour disputes in export processing zones are subject to compulsory arbitration (on this point, the Government informed the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that a Bill has been submitted to resolve the matter). The Committee requests the Government to send comments in response.

The Committee also notes the comments of 29 May 2009 by the National Council of Private Enterprise of Panama (CONEP). The Committee asks the Government to send its observations in response.

Articles 1, 4 and 6 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Act No. 24 of 2 July 2007 to amend the Administrative Careers Act contains provisions to protect public servants against acts of anti-union discrimination, and establishes the right of associations of public servants to collective bargaining. In view of FENASEP's assertion that the right to collective bargaining has been regulated, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether municipal workers and workers in decentralized institutions enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following provisions:

Article 4

- (a) section 12 of Act No. 8 of 1981 provides that no enterprises (other than building enterprises) shall be required to conclude a collective labour agreement in the first two years of operations, which could in practice imply denial of the right to collective bargaining;
- (b) the need to amend the legislation so that in the event of a strike attributable to the employer, the payment of wages for strike days is not imposed by law (section 514 of the Labour Code) but is a matter for collective bargaining between the parties involved; in this context, CONEP points out that the legislation does not require any proof, prior to the strike, that a collective agreement was breached or legal provisions repeatedly violated;
- (c) the requirement that the number of representatives of the parties in negotiations shall be from two to five (section 427 of the Labour Code).

Bargaining with non-unionized groups. In its previous comments the Committee referred to collective bargaining in the private sector with groups of non-unionized workers (section 431 of the Labour Code), and asked the Government to look into the matter with a view to ensuring that there is no collective bargaining with groups of workers where there is a trade union in the bargaining unit. The Committee notes with satisfaction that in its report the Government states that on 20 May 2009 Executive Decree No. 18 was adopted to regulate sections 398, 400, 401, 403 and 431 of the Labour Code. This Decree establishes that the right to negotiate and sign a collective labour agreement belongs to properly established social organizations and that, consequently, the Ministry of Labour will not entertain claims submitted by a non-organized group of workers (section 1). Furthermore, the employer may not negotiate with a non-organized group of workers the conclusion of a collective labour agreement or the claims for a collective labour agreement where there is a properly constituted trade union in the enterprise (section 2). Non-organized groups may apply for the registration of claims or a collective agreement, but the Ministry of Labour must first ascertain that there is no trade union in the enterprise and that there is no breach of trade union rights. Furthermore, such claims shall not preclude later submission of claims by an organization of workers, and the employer may not refuse to bargain.

Restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector. In its earlier comments, the Committee took note of restrictions on collective bargaining in the maritime sector under section 75 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 1998, establishing the conclusion of collective agreements as an option, which in practice leads to the denial of workers' claims by employers and about which an application had been filed for this legislation to be found unconstitutional. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that a draft of a new Shipping Code was to be submitted to the Legislative Assembly. The Committee requests the Government to report on this matter.

Lastly, the Committee notes that CONEP seeks the regulation of legal disputes and asks the possibility for employers to submit claims and initiate conciliation proceedings. The Committee invites the Government to address these matters through tripartite dialogue.

Noting that the discrepancies between legislation and practice and the Convention have existed for many years, and bearing in mind the seriousness of some of the restrictions mentioned, the Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps, in consultation with the social partners, to amend the legislation to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and the principles of freedom of association. In view of the Government's statement that although there is no agreement with the social partners for amendment of the Labour Code, it is ready to harmonize law and practice with the Convention and is formulating a Bill for this purpose, the Committee urges the Government to seek ILO technical assistance in this process and to provide information in its next report on all progress made.

Paraguay

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of 29 August 2008 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to acts of violence by police against workers in the sugar and steel sectors who took part in demonstrations, and to arrests of trade unionists. With regard to incidents that took place in a sugar plant, the Committee notes that according to the Government, in May 2007 a number of workers in the Tebicuary area blocked the access roads to the sugar plant and played a leading part in violence that prompted the police to intervene to restore the peace, protect private property and ensure workers' free access to the plant. According to the Government, negotiations at the initiative of the enterprise put an end to the dispute. As to the comments regarding the steel enterprise, the Committee notes the Government's statement that trade unionists initiated a strike and used violence and weapons to prevent the workers from entering or leaving the enterprise, even blocking the way of an ambulance that was transporting a member of the anti-riot squad who was seriously hurt, which prompted the police authority to arrest three people; the strikers went to the police station to object the arrest and assaulted the police officers present and the latter reacted. The Committee also notes the ITUC's comments of 26 August 2009 referring to these matters. Lastly, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent its observations on the comments of 2005 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – presently known as ITUC – referring to numerous acts of violence, including the murder of trade unionists. The Committee emphasizes in this respect that in the event of assaults on the physical or moral integrity of individuals, an independent judicial inquiry should be instituted immediately with a view to fully clarifying the facts, determining responsibility, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such acts. The Committee urges the Government to conduct such an inquiry.

The Committee reminds the Government that for many years it has been pointing out that the following provisions of the law are incompatible with the Convention:

- the requirement of an unduly high number of workers (300) to establish a branch trade union (section 292 of the Labour Code);
- the prohibition on joining more than one union even if the worker has more than one part-time employment contract, whether at the level of the enterprise, industry, occupation or trade, or institution (section 293(c) of the Labour Code);
- imposition of unduly demanding conditions of eligibility for office on the executive body of a trade union: the need to be an employee in the enterprise, industry, occupation or institution, whether active or on leave (section 298(a) of the Labour Code), to have reached the age of majority and to be an active member of the union (section 293(d) of the Labour Code);
- the requirement for trade unions to respond to all requests from the labour authorities for consultations or reports (sections 290(f) and 304(c) of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that, for a strike to be called, its sole purpose must be directly and exclusively linked to the workers' occupational interests (sections 358 and 376(a) of the Labour Code);
- the obligation to provide a minimum service in the event of a strike in public services that are essential to the community without any requirement to consult the employers' and workers' organizations concerned (section 362 of the Labour Code);
- the referral of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration (sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure).

The Committee notes with interest that the Government has sent information on the drafting of a Bill to amend certain provisions of the Labour Code and Amending Act No. 496/94 which was submitted to the President of the Republic on 5 June 2009 for consideration. The Committee observes that various provisions have been amended to take account of the comments made by the Committee of Experts. Specifically: section 290(f), which limits the information the labour authorities may require to annual financial statements; section 293(c), allowing every worker to belong to several unions corresponding to the categories of work they perform; section 293(d) extending to non-active members of the union the possibility of standing for membership of the executive body; section 298(a), establishing that the general meeting shall decide as to the appointment to and removal from offices to be filled by workers who are employed in or are independent of the enterprise, industry or occupation, whether active or on leave; sections 358 and 376, extending the purposes of lawful strikes to economic and social protection interests as well as occupational ones.

Furthermore, the Committee is of the view that other amendments proposed in the Bill could be better drafted to bring them fully into line with the freedom of association, in particular:

- the amendment proposed to section 292 reducing the minimum requirement for establishing a branch union from 300 to 100. Although this is a significant reduction, the Committee is of the view that a membership of 100 workers could be difficult to reach and that the number should therefore be reduced to 50. Likewise, the minimum number of workers needed for trade unions in the public sector should be reduced by one half;
- the amendment to section 304(c), restricting the obligation to provide information and data “in the event of complaints raised by trade unionists”. The Committee is of the view that in order to avoid interference in trade union activities, there should be a requirement for a percentage of the membership (for example 10 per cent) in order to request administrative intervention;
- the amendment to section 362 on minimum services introducing a final sentence that reads “The decision shall be notified to the organization of workers and employers to allow them to participate in the determination of the services and, in the event of disagreement, shall be referred to the competent authority.” In the Committee’s view, any disagreement in the determination of minimum services should be settled by an independent body – such as the judicial authority – that has the trust of all the parties.

The Committee further observes that the abovementioned Bill does not provide for any amendment of sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure regarding the referral of collective disputes to compulsory arbitration. The Committee points out that in an earlier observation it noted that according to the Government, these provisions had been tacitly repealed by article 97 of the Constitution of the Republic promulgated in 1992 which states that “the State shall facilitate conciliatory solutions to labour disputes and social dialogue. Arbitration shall be optional.” The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary steps, in accordance with the Constitution and in order to avoid all confusion, expressly to repeal sections 284–320 of the Code of Labour Procedure.

The Committee hopes that in the near future it will be able to note progress in the legislation and asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this respect in its next report. Lastly, noting that the Government has requested technical assistance from the Office in addressing the matter of the abovementioned legislative amendments within the National Congress, the Committee expresses the hope that this will be forthcoming in the near future.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of discrimination and anti-union interference. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on:

- the absence of legal provisions affording protection to workers who are not trade union leaders against all acts of anti-union discrimination (article 88 of the Constitution only affords protection against discrimination based on trade union preferences);
- the absence of adequate penalties for non-observance of the provisions relating to the employment stability of trade unionists and to acts of interference in workers’ and employers’ organizations by each other (the Committee indicated previously that the penalties laid down in the Labour Code for failure to comply with the legal provisions on this point in sections 385, 393 and 395 are not sufficiently dissuasive, except in the case of a repeat offence by the employer, when the fine is doubled). In this respect, the Government refers in general terms to section 286 of the Labour Code, which provides that workers’ and employers’ organizations shall enjoy adequate protection against any acts of interference by each other; and
- the delays in the application of justice in relation to acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

The Committee notes the Governments reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 29 August 2008, in relation to the application of the Convention, and also to comments made in previous years concerning the dismissal of trade union leaders and members, as well as acts of anti-union interference. The Committee also notes the new comments of the ITUC of 26 August 2009 referring to further dismissals of trade union leaders and members. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

The Committee also notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association requested the Government, in consultation with the social partners, to ensure effective national procedures for the prevention and sanctioning of anti-union discrimination (see Case No. 2648, 355th Report, paragraph 953(a)).

The Committee further recalls that the Convention guarantees to workers adequate protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination during recruitment and employment, and in respect of termination of employment, and that this protection encompasses all measures that are discriminatory in nature (dismissals, transfers, demotion). The Committee emphasizes the importance of rapid protection procedures accompanied by effective and dissuasive penalties. Furthermore, the Convention provides that workers' and employers' organizations shall enjoy adequate protection against any acts of interference by each other. The Committee also emphasizes that legislative provisions are inadequate if they are not accompanied by effective and prompt procedures and sufficiently dissuasive penalties to ensure their enforcement in cases of anti-union discrimination or interference. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to resolve these matters, for example through the draft partial reform of the Labour Code that is under examination.

Article 6. Public officials not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it considered that sections 49 and 124 of the Public Service Act do not afford adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention (which not only covers dismissal, but also transfers and other prejudicial measure). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to establish in the legislation adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination against public servants and public employees, including those who are not trade union leaders, and also sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for those who commit violations.

Finally, while appreciating the fact that the Government has requested technical assistance from the Office with a view to resolving the pending problems and to address the issue of the legislative amendments requested in the previous paragraphs in the context of the National Congress, the Committee hopes that this assistance will be provided in the near future.

The Committee hopes that it will be able to note progress at the legislative level (particularly in relation to the forthcoming reform of the Labour Code) in the near future and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Philippines

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the 2009 Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Government's indication therein that it would accept an ILO High-level mission as requested by the Conference Committee in 2007. The Committee notes with interest that the High-level mission took place from 22 to 29 September 2009 and that the Government fully cooperated with the mission and facilitated its access to all relevant parties.

The Committee observes in particular the recommendations by the High-level mission in relation to the need for capacity building, awareness raising and training in relation to freedom of association and collective bargaining throughout the country. In particular, it notes the suggestion that: the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) and the Philippine National Police (PNP) be trained in the respect of the basic civil liberties of trade unionists; targeted training should be undertaken to focus on freedom of association rights in the special economic zones, including for the officers of the Philippine Economic Zone Authority, employers and workers; training to be carried out of judges and lawyers on international labour standards and their use by the judiciary, with a special focus on freedom of association; and continuing training be provided to the officials of the Department of Labour and Employment, the Civil Service Commission and the Public Service Labour-Management Commission. The Committee notes with interest the commitment expressed by the Government to embark upon a comprehensive technical cooperation programme on freedom of association and the efforts made thus far to concretize the details of such a programme in collaboration with the Office. In this regard, it welcomes the communication just received from the Government in which it reports upon the National Tripartite Conference on Principles of Freedom of Association: Toward Fair Globalization and Decent Work which was held from 2 to 4 December 2009 in order to maintain the momentum created by the ILO High-level Mission.

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), particularly in relation to violence against trade unionists and impunity in the country, and requests the Government to reply to these comments in its next report. The Committee once again recalls the importance it attaches to the Government making all efforts to ensure that workers may exercise their trade union rights in a climate free from violence, threat and fear. It notes with interest from the Government's latest report that, in keeping with the High-level Mission's recommendations, the Executive Secretary, speaking on behalf of the President, confirmed the Government's commitment to create a high-level tripartite monitoring body to review the progress made in investigating and prosecuting the cases of violence brought to the attention of the ILO supervisory machinery. It further notes the Executive Secretary's statement that, with the repeal of the anti-subversion law, those opposing the Government are no longer regarded as subversive or targeted in this regard and any such persecution will not be tolerated. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress made in establishing the high-level tripartite monitoring body, and on its mandate and functioning.

The Committee will examine all of the outstanding points in relation to the application of the Convention in both law and in practice next year when it will have at its disposal the detailed mission report and any comments which the Government and the workers' and employers' organizations may wish to make. It requests the Government to provide a detailed report in reply to its previous comments for examination next year.

The Committee notes with interest that an ILO High-level Mission took place from 22 to 29 September 2009 with a mandate to review its comments in relation to the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), as well as the pending cases before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee observes that the matters considered by the High-level Mission touch also upon those matters it has been raising in previous years under this Convention. The Committee will thus examine all of the outstanding points in relation to the application of the Convention in both law and in practice next year when it will have at its disposal the detailed mission report and any comments which the Government and the workers' and employers' organizations may wish to make. It requests the Government to provide a detailed report in reply to its previous comments for examination next year.

The Committee further notes the detailed information provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in relation to the application of the Convention and requests the Government to reply to these comments in its next report.

Rwanda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received in 2008, concerning matters already raised by the Committee relating to the status of public servants and the exercise of the right to strike.

The Committee also notes the adoption of Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009, issuing the new Labour Code.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that: (1) articles 11, 33, 35, 36, 38 and 39 of the Constitution of 4 June 2003 guarantee freedom of expression and association for State employees, as for all other citizens; (2) Law No. 22/2002 of 9 July 2002, on the General Statute for the Rwanda public service, is silent on the right of public servants to organize and to collective bargaining, although section 73 of the Law provides that public servants and the staff of public enterprises enjoy rights and freedoms on the same basis as other citizens; (3) the procedures for the implementation of section 73 of Law No. 22/2002 are still to be determined, and the scope of the relevant provisions of the Labour Code respecting occupational organizations need to be extended to state officials; and (4) although the Government indicated that there are unions of public servants in Rwanda, the legal void as regards the right to organize of this category of workers could give rise to problems in practice. The Committee notes that, under the terms of section 3 of the new Labour Code, "every person employed under the general statutes for the Rwanda public service or every person under specific statutes shall not be subject to the provisions of this law, except for matters that may be provided for by Prime Minister's orders". It further notes that, according to the Government's report, the process is under way of revising the General Statute governing public civil servants. The Committee recalls that public servants shall enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing to further and defend their interests. The Committee trusts that the revision of the General Statute governing public civil servants will be completed in the near future and that it will take duly into account the above principle so as to ensure that public servants enjoy the guarantees laid down in the Convention. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Law once it has been adopted.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes in full freedom. The Committee notes that section 155(2) of the new Labour Code refers to an order of the Minister responsible for labour to determine "indispensable services" and the conditions of exercising the right to strike in these services. In its report, the Government indicates that the order is prepared following consultations with the National Labour Council and that the text is still at the draft stage. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the order once it has been adopted.

The Committee observes that, under the terms of section 124 of the Labour Code, any organization requesting recognition as the most representative organization has to authorize the labour administration to check the register of its members and property. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the control exercised by the public authorities over trade union finances should not go beyond the requirement for the organizations to submit periodic reports. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend section 124 of the Labour Code taking into account the above principle.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 26 August 2009. It requests the Government to send its observations on this matter.

The Committee also notes the adoption of Act No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 issuing the new Labour Code.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to take steps to establish sufficiently dissuasive penalties for acts of anti-union interference and discrimination. The Committee notes that, according to the provisions of section 114 of the new Labour Code, any act which infringes the provisions providing protection against acts of discrimination and interference shall constitute an offence and incur the payment of damages. The Committee notes that the amount of damages has not been fixed, except for wrongful termination of an unemployment contract, as laid down by section 33 of the Code. In the latter case, the damages vary from three to six months' wages, and may amount to as much as nine months' pay where the worker has more than ten years' service with the same employer, or where staff delegates or union representatives are concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the amount of damages applicable for acts of discrimination against trade union members or officials, other than the dismissal of trade union representatives.

Article 4. With reference to its previous comments concerning compulsory arbitration in the context of collective bargaining, the Committee notes with regret that the collective dispute settlement procedure provided for in section 143 ff. of the new Code culminates, in cases of non-conciliation, in referral to an arbitration committee whose decisions may be the subject of an appeal to the competent jurisdiction, whose decision shall be binding. The Committee recalls that, except for the cases of public servants engaged in the administration of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term, arbitration imposed by the authorities or at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established by the Convention, and thus the autonomy of bargaining partners (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in such a way that, except in the circumstances referred to above, a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted to the competent legal authority only with the agreement of both parties.

Moreover, with reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 121 of the Code provides that, at the request of a representative organization of workers or employers, the collective agreement shall be negotiated within a joint committee convened by the Minister of Labour or his delegate or the competent labour inspector. The Committee recalls that such a provision may well restrict the principle of free and voluntary negotiation of the parties within the meaning of the Convention, and even of being applied where one party wishes to have a new collective agreement even before the existing agreement has expired. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend section 121 of the Labour Code so that recourse to a joint committee for negotiating a collective agreement is possible only with the agreement of both parties.

With regard to the question of the extension of collective agreements, the Committee notes that, under section 133 of the Labour Code, at the request of a representative workers' or employers' organization, whether or not it is a party to the agreement or on its own initiative, the Minister of Labour may make all or some of the provisions of a collective agreement binding on all employers and workers covered by the occupational and territorial scope of the agreement. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation so that the extension of collective agreements is the subject of in-depth tripartite consultations (even where provision is made, as is the case in section 136 of the Code, for the parties affected by the application of an extended collective agreement to file a request for an exemption with the Minister of Labour).

Article 6. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, under section 3 of the Code, any person governed by the general or individual public service regulations is not subject to the provisions of the Code other than for matters determined by an Order of the Prime Minister. The Committee regrets that the national authorities have not taken the opportunity afforded by the reform of the Labour Code to guarantee the right to collective bargaining for public servants covered by the Convention and requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to this end.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on the activities of the National Labour Council with regard to collective bargaining, on the number of collective agreements concluded, and on the sectors and numbers of workers covered.

Saint Lucia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1980)

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever, to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing and without previous authorization. Requirements for the establishment of an organization. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that in a draft Labour Code the minimum founding membership for a trade union and for an employers' organization had been reduced from 30 to 20 and from ten to six, respectively. It had requested the Government to keep it informed of new developments concerning the draft and to submit a copy of the Code. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the draft Labour Code had passed into law but has been placed on hold by the new Government and that it is currently with the Attorney-General. The Committee again hopes that the new legislation will soon be applicable and requests the Government to submit a copy of the legislation with its next report.

Sao Tome and Principe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of organizations to organize their activities and formulate their programmes. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need for the Government to take steps to amend the provisions of Act No. 4/92, which refer to the following issues:

- the majority required for calling a strike is too high (section 4 of Act No. 4/92);
- with regard to minimum services, it is important, in the event of disagreement in determining such services, that the matter be settled by an independent body and not by the employer (section 10(4) of Act No. 4/92);
- the hiring of workers without consultation with the trade unions concerned to perform services essential to maintain the economic and financial viability of the enterprise should it be seriously threatened by a strike (section 9 of Act No. 4/92); and
- compulsory arbitration for services which are not essential in the strict sense (services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) (postal, banking and loan services; section 11 of Act No. 4/92).

The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention and to indicate, in its next report, any measures adopted in this respect. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations are able to exercise the right to strike.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee had asked the Government to indicate what sanctions may be imposed against acts of discrimination which undermine freedom of association and acts of interference by employers and their organizations in workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee noted the Government's indication that there is no appropriate legislation providing for sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee therefore asks the Government, once again, to take the necessary steps to adopt appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference committed by employers against trade union organizations, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

The Committee is addressing a request on other points directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Sierra Leone

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that for several years the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers and workers' organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the revision of the labour laws, prepared with ILO technical assistance, had already been submitted to tripartite meetings, that the comments of the tripartite body had been received and that the document had just been forwarded to the Law Officers' Department. The Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed of any further progress made in the preparation of the final draft document and to provide a copy of the revised legislation as soon as it had been adopted. Noting that, according to the information previously sent by the Government, the revision of the labour laws was submitted to the Law Officers' Department in 1995, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort to take the necessary action for the adoption of the new legislation in the very near future and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Article 4. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the collective agreements in force in the education sector and in other sectors.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Swaziland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the comments of 26 August 2009 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning issues under examination, as well as to serious acts of brutality from the security forces against peaceful demonstrations and threats of dismissal against trade unionists who took strike action in the textile sector, to the repeated arrests of union leaders, particularly of the Secretary General of the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU), and to the refusal from the public authorities to recognize trade unions. The Committee notes the reply of the Government dated 30 October 2009 contesting in particular the allegations made by the ITUC on arrests of union leaders for participating in protest actions. In reply to the alleged detention of the Secretary-General of the SFTU, the Government indicates that he was not arrested but questioned by the police and his fundamental constitutional rights were not violated. While noting the contradictory nature of the statements from the ITUC and the Government, the Committee wishes to recall, along with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the importance it attaches to the full respect of basic civil liberties such as freedom of expression, of assembly and of the press, and to emphasize once again that freedom of assembly constitutes a fundamental aspect of trade union rights and that the authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede the lawful exercise thereof, provided that the exercise of these rights does not cause a serious and imminent threat to public order (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 35).

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Conference Committee in June 2009. The Committee observes that in its conclusions the Conference Committee regretted that, although the Government had benefited from ILO technical assistance for some time now, including through a high-level mission, the legislative amendments requested for many years have yet to be adopted. The Conference Committee urged the Government to take the necessary measures so that the amendments requested by the Committee of Experts would finally be adopted. It further highlighted its outstanding calls to the Government to repeal the 1973 Decree, to amend the 1963 Public Order Act, as well as the Industrial Relations Act (IRA), and expressed the firm hope that meaningful and expedited progress would be made in the review of the Constitution before the Steering Committee on Social Dialogue, as well as in respect of other contested legislation and bills.

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to certain provisions of the law that are inconsistent with those of the Convention and asked the Government:

- to amend the legislation or enact other laws to ensure that domestic workers (section 2 of the IRA) have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests;
- to amend section 29(1)(i) of the IRA placing statutory restrictions on the nomination of candidates and eligibility for union office, to enable such matters to be dealt with in the statutes of the organizations concerned;
- to amend section 86(4) of the IRA to ensure that the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) does not supervise strike ballots unless the organizations so request in accordance with their own statutes;
- to recognize the right to strike in sanitary services (at present banned by IRA section 93(9)), and establish only a minimum service with the participation of workers and employers in the definition of such a service; and
- to amend the legislation in order to shorten the compulsory dispute settlement procedures laid down in IRA sections 85 and 86, read in conjunction with sections 70 and 82.

The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government on 22 May and 9 September 2009 on steps taken so far to amend the legislation on the abovementioned issues. In this regard, the Government indicates that the Labour Advisory Board has agreed in May 2009 on a finalized consensus document of proposed amendments to the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) of 2000, a copy of which was communicated to the Committee. As of September 2009, the Cabinet had received the draft bill scrutinized by the Attorney-General and would be passed into a bill. While taking note of the progress made in this regard, the Committee firmly hopes that the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill will be adopted without delay and expects that the Government will provide copy of the new Industrial Relations Act as amended in the near future.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to other legislative issues and provisions that are inconsistent with those of the Convention, as well as a request for information on the effect given to some provisions in practice:

- The repeal of the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations concerning trade union rights, and the amendment of the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes. On these matters, the Committee notes from the Government's report that it was decided that constitutional review issues raised by the Committee be referred to the Legal and Institutional Affairs Subcommittee of the High-level Steering Committee on Social Dialogue. Concerning measures envisaged with regard to the 1973 Decree and the 1963 Public Order Act, the Committee notes the Government's statement according to which it is in the process of reviewing, repealing and harmonizing all laws that may be in conflict with the Constitution of 2005.
- The amendment of the legislation to ensure that prison staffs have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests. The Committee notes from the Government's report that it has been recommended that the issue of the right to organize of prison staff should be addressed under the law governing the Prison Service (Correctional Services) and that consultations have already been initiated to review the Prisons' Act.
- Information on any practical application of section 40 of the IRA with regard to the civil liability of trade union leaders and, in particular the charges that may be brought under section 40(13); as well as information on the effect given in practice to section 97(1) (criminal liability of trade union leaders) of the IRA by ensuring that penalties applying to strikers do not in practice impair the right to strike. In this regard, the Government indicates that it would keep the Office informed of any development.

Recalling that the Conference Committee noted with concern that the Special Consultative Tripartite Subcommittee of the High-level Steering Committee on Social Dialogue had not met for several months, the Committee urges the Government to tackle all pending issues mentioned above in full consultation with the social partners as a matter of urgency. Consequently, the Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take without delay the necessary steps: (1) to abrogate the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations concerning union rights; (2) to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes; (3) to amend the Prisons' Act so as to guarantee that prison staff have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests; (4) to keep the Office informed of the practical application of section 40 of the IRA with regard to the civil liability of trade union leaders and section 97(1) of the IRA concerning criminal liability of trade union leaders, while ensuring their conformity with the principles enshrined in the Convention.

Taking into account that freedom of association and the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining are particularly important to enable the attainment of the four strategic objectives of the Organization (see ILO Declaration on Social Justice for a Fair Globalization, 2008), the Committee encourages the Government as a matter of priority to engage with the Office, including through its technical assistance, so as to ensure the full application of the Convention.

United Republic of Tanzania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a communication dated 26 August 2009, which primarily concern matters previously raised by the Committee and also refer to the denial of freedom of association rights to employees in privatized industries; to the difficulties in organizing legal strikes for teachers, 2,000 bank employees and railway workers; to the locking up by employers of fish processing plant workers during an official visit; and to the dismissal of 350 strikers in the textile sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. The Committee had previously requested that the Government amend section 2(1)(iii) of the Employment and Labour Relations Act (ELRA) so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. In this respect, the Committee notes with regret that the Government reiterates that prison guards were part of the armed forces, and were thus governed by their respective sets of law. The Committee must once again recall that the only admissible exceptions to the right to organize are those explicitly provided for under Article 9 of the Convention, i.e. the armed forces and the police. All other categories of workers, without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee considers that the functions exercised by prison guards are different from the regular functions of the army and the police and do not justify their exclusion from the right to organize (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 56). Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 2(1)(iii) of the ELRA so that prison guards enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide adequate information on the types of workers included in the category of the national service, which is excluded from the provisions of the ELRA, so that it may assess whether they qualify for the exceptions of Article 9 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Youth Development is at a preparatory stage of formulating rules which will set the definition of the category of workers included in the national service. The Committee recalls that only the armed forces and the police may be deprived of the rights provided in the Convention, and requests the Government to provide a copy of the said rules and regulations once they are finalized.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 48 of the ELRA, which provides for the process of registration, does not set forth a time period in which the registrar must either approve or refuse an organization's application, and had requested the Government to consider amending the ELRA so as to provide for a reasonable time period for the processing of applications for registration. Noting the Government's statement that the rules and regulations referred to above would address this matter, the Committee, recalling once again that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise where the registration procedure is long and complicated, expresses the hope that the rules and regulations being prepared by the Ministry would, once finalized, provide for a reasonable time period for the processing of applications for registration.

Article 3. Right of organizations freely to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes. The Committee had previously noted that sections 4 and 85 of the ELRA allow for protest action, i.e. strikes in disputes that are not interest disputes, but that, under section 4, such action is apparently not lawful when taking place in relation to "a dispute in respect of which there is a legal remedy". The Committee notes the Government's statement that it covers any dispute in which a party to the dispute may apply for relief in any authority with competent jurisdiction. In this connection, the Committee recalls again that the solution to legal conflicts arising as a result of a difference in the interpretation of a legal text should be left to the competent courts, and that the prohibition of strikes in such situations does not constitute a breach of freedom of association rights. However, prohibiting protest action in respect of all disputes possessing a legal remedy may unduly infringe upon the right to strike. The Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 4 of the ELRA so as to limit the restriction on strikes to those taking place in relation to a dispute of rights.

The Committee had also previously requested the Government to amend section 76(3)(a) of the ELRA, which prohibits picketing in support of a strike, or in opposition to a lawful lockout. In this regard, the Committee regrets that the Government confines itself to stating that the Committee would be notified if and when any progress is made respecting this matter. Recalling once again that it considers that restrictions on strike pickets should be limited to cases where the action ceases to be peaceful (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 174), the Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 76(3)(a) of the ELRA accordingly.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to modify sections 12, 13(b), 15, 17(1) and (2), 19 and 22 of the draft Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Bill so as to ensure that restrictions on the right to strike in the public sector were limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. It takes note of the Government's answer that the restrictions on the right to strike in the public sector are limited to those holding paid public office in the United Republic, charged with the formulation of government policy and delivery of public services, and to any office declared by or under any other law to be a public office. While noting this information, the Committee must once again recall that a too broad definition of the concept of public servant is likely to result in a very wide restriction or even a prohibition of the right to strike for these workers (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 158). Accordingly, the Committee once again requests the Government to modify sections 12, 13(b), 15, 17(1) and (2), 19 and 22 of the draft Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Bill so as to ensure that restrictions on the right to strike in the public sector are strictly limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee had also previously requested the Government to provide information in respect of the designations of essential services that the Essential Services Committee has made under section 77 of the ELRA. It notes the Government's answer that no designation had yet been made by the Committee to that effect. Recalling that essential services should be defined in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), the Committee requests the Government to inform it of any designations of essential services that the Essential Services Committee has made under section 77 of the ELRA.

Zanzibar

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to review and amend section 2(2) of the Labour Relations Act (LRA), which excluded the following categories of employee from the LRA's provisions: (a) judges and all judiciary officers; (b) members of special departments; and (c) employees of the House of Representatives. Noting the Government's indication that the relevant authorities will be advised accordingly and to take appropriate measures to address the matter, the Committee once again recalls that the only admissible exceptions to the right to organize are those explicitly provided for under Article 9 of the Convention, i.e. the armed forces and the police. Recalling once again that other categories of workers, without distinction whatsoever, should enjoy the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, the Committee trusts that the Government will soon review and amend section 2(2) of the LRA in accordance with this principle.

Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 4(1) of the LRA in order to bring it into conformity with the principle that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right to organize to employers and workers, including those who are not in contractual employment relationships. It takes due note of the Government's answer that when read together with sections 43, 44 and 45(1) of the Employment Act, (which provide for the definition and different types of services), section 3(1) of the LRA includes even workers and employers who are not in contractual employment relationships and therefore grants them the right to organize.

Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide further information on section 21(1)(c) of the LRA, particularly on the criteria employed by the Registrar for determining whether an organization's constitution contains suitable provisions to protect its members' interests, and on the expeditiousness of the registration procedure, including the average time period, from the submission to the application, for an organization to be registered. The Committee recalls that the competent authority must not be given discretionary power to refuse registration, as it could amount in practice to a system of previous authorization, contrary to the principles of the Convention; it also recalls that the registration procedure must not be too long and complicated, so as to comply with the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 73–75). Noting the Government's report to the effect that the intended Rules and Regulations for the implementation of the Act will address the matter, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the said rules and regulations once they are finalized.

Article 3. Right of organizations to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether, under section 42 of the LRA, trade union's funds could be applied to pay any fines or penalties incurred by a trade union official in the discharge of his or her duties on behalf of the Organization. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply concerning section 42 of the LRA, confirming that this provision forbids the union to use, directly or indirectly, its funds for the abovementioned purpose. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that trade unions should have the power to manage their funds without undue restrictions from the legislation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 124). Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 42 of the LRA so that the trade unions may use their funds if they wish to, inter alia, pay fines or penalties incurred by trade union officials in the discharge of their duties.

Political activities. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the definition of political affiliation under section 8(2) of the LRA, and to indicate in particular whether under this provision trade unions may still pursue certain political activities, including the expression of opinions on economic and social policy. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that section 8(2) of the LRA forbids trade unions from being affiliated to political parties. While further noting the Government's statement that section 8(2) emphasizes trade unions' independence from political influences, the Committee nevertheless recalls that the legislative provisions which prohibit all political activities for trade unions give rise to serious difficulties with regard to the principles of the Convention: workers' organizations must be able to voice their opinions on political issues in the broad sense of the term and, in particular, to express their views publicly on a government's economic and social policy (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 131 and 133). Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 8(2) of the LRA in accordance with the principle cited above.

The right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 64(1) of the LRA, which sets forth categories of employees, namely (a) employees of any public authority who are actually engaged in the management of such authority; and (b) employees actually engaged in the management of a business of the employer for which such an employee is engaged, that may not participate in a strike, without any additional indication, and section 64(2) of the LRA, which lists several services that are deemed essential, including sanitation services, and in which strikes are forbidden. The Committee regrets that the Government confines itself to stating that the relevant authorities would be advised accordingly. Recalling once again that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited: (1) in the public service only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; or (2) in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), the Committee requests the Government to amend sections 64(1) and 64(2) of the LRA accordingly.

Protests. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA, which determines that before resorting to protest action, the trade union must give the mediation authority at least 30 days to resolve it and subsequently give 14 days' advance notice explaining the purpose, nature and place and date of the protest action; it requested the Government to shorten this 44-day period (to a maximum of 30 days, for example). In this respect, the Committee regrets that the Government confines itself to stating that the relevant authorities would be advised accordingly. The Committee recalls once again that the period of advance notice should not be an additional obstacle to bargaining, with workers in practice simply waiting for its expiry in order to be able to exercise their right to strike (see General Survey, op. cit. paragraph 172). The Committee requests the Government to amend sections 63(2)(b) and 69(2) of the LRA accordingly.

Finally, with respect to Zanzibar, the Committee regrets that the Government still provides no information about section 41(2)(j) of the LRA, which concerns restrictions on the use of trade unions' funds. Accordingly, it once again requests the Government to take the steps necessary to amend section 41(2)(j) of the LRA so that the institutions a trade union may wish to contribute to are not subject to the Registrar's approval.

The Committee again expresses the hope that the Government will make every effort to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention and provide detailed information on the abovementioned points in its next report. Further recalling that it has been commenting upon the abovementioned legislative matters for a period of several years, the Committee invites the Government to seek the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009. The ITUC alleges that collective agreements must be submitted to the Industrial Court for approval and may be refused registration if they do not conform to the Government's economic policy. It further alleges employees in privatized industries are denied freedom of association and the right to collective bargaining, despite difficult working conditions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in respect of these matters.

The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Bill is now an Act of Parliament and is referred to as the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, 2003. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the said Act in its next report.

In respect of the Public Service (Negotiating Machinery) Act, 2003, the Committee notes that according to the Government section 4 of the said Act establishes the service joint staff councils as negotiating and consultation mechanisms for the civil service, the teachers' service, the local civil service and the health service, and section 9 of the Act provides for the establishment of the public service joint staff council as the highest participatory negotiating and consultative body in the public service. The Government also indicates that section 17(1) of the Act provides that the minister, upon receipt of an agreement reached by the public service joint staff council, may either accept the agreement or remand the matter to the council if he considers further negotiations necessary. In light of these indications, the Committee requests the Government: (1) to indicate whether the Act covers all civil servants, without exception; (2) to indicate whether the Act makes express provision for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, including through the use of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions; (3) to provide information on the subjects that may be negotiated under the Act, particularly wages, as well as on those matters that may only be the object of consultation; (4) to indicate whether all agreements and decisions of the public service joint staff council require the approval of the minister or another authority; (5) to indicate whether the Act contains any provisions respecting the duration of collective agreements; (6) to indicate in which cases compulsory arbitration may be imposed under the Act; and (7) to indicate whether all the individual public services each have the right to conclude collective agreements.

Zanzibar

Article 4 of the Convention. Trade union recognition for purposes of collective bargaining. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 57(2) of the Labour Relations Act of 2005 (LRA), which provides that in order to be designated as representative (and thus be accorded exclusive bargaining agent status), the union concerned must be registered and represent "the majority of employees at the appropriate bargaining level", which corresponds in fact to 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit. While noting the Government's indication that the Committee's comments have been noted and will be taken on board in the Rules and Regulations for the implementation of the Act, the Committee must once again recall that such a system denies the possibility of bargaining to a majority union which fails to secure this absolute majority (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 57(2) of the LRA so that if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, the minority unions in the bargaining unit are not denied collective bargaining rights, at least on behalf of their members.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to provide full information on the procedures and criteria by which the disputes resolution authority, in cases brought before it under section 57(4) of the LRA, determines representative trade union status when the employer does not recognize the trade union or when there is an objection from another trade union. Noting the Government's statement that the rules and regulations referred to above would address this matter, the Committee expresses the hope that the rules and regulations will provide for objective procedures and criteria for the determination of representative trade union status and requests the Government to provide a copy of the rules and regulations once finalized.

Article 6. Public servants. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 54(2)(b) of the LRA, so as to guarantee to managerial employees the right to bargain collectively, and to indicate the categories of employee excluded from the right to bargain collectively by the minister under section 54(2)(c) of the LRA. Noting the Government's statement that the rules and regulations referred to above would address this matter, the Committee, recalling once again that only the armed forces and the police, public servants directly engaged in the administration of the State, and workers in essential services in the strict sense of the term may be denied the right to bargain collectively, once again requests the Government to amend section 54(2)(b) of the LRA so as to guarantee to managerial employees the right to bargain collectively, and to indicate the categories of employee excluded from the right to bargain collectively by the minister under section 54(2)(c).

Togo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Article 2 of the Convention. Export processing zones. The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for several years to recognize the trade union rights of workers in export processing zones. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, under the terms of the new Labour Code (Act No. 2006-010 of 13 December 2006), this category of workers benefits from the guarantees afforded by the Convention. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on any trade union organization that has requested the legal capacity to defend workers in export processing zones.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not reply to the comments made in 2006, 2008 and 2009 by the International National Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the right to collective bargaining is confined to a single agreement that has to be negotiated at the national level and needs to obtain the approval of Government representatives, as well as of trade unions and employers. The ITUC further indicate that workers in export processing zones do not benefit from the same protection against anti-union discrimination as other workers. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention, and to submit these points to tripartite discussion. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect as well as on the exercise of collective bargaining in practice (the number of workers and sectors covered, including the public service, and promotional measures undertaken by the authorities).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Turkey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 26 August 2009, by the Confederation of Public Employees' Trade Unions (KESK) in a communication dated 20 August 2009, by the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK), in a communication dated 14 May 2009, and by the Turkish Confederation of Public Workers Associations (Türkiye Kamu-Sen) in a communication dated 15 September 2009. The Committee further notes the comments made by the Turkish Confederation of Employers' Associations (TISK) in a communication dated 2 September 2009. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these comments.

The Committee notes the discussions in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009 on the application of the Convention. The Committee notes in particular that the Committee on the Application of Standards requested the Government to accept a high-level bipartite mission with the aim of assisting the Government in making meaningful progress in relation to the long outstanding issues raised by the Committee.

The Committee notes the Government's indication according to which a group of six persons, under the presidency of the Director-General of Labour, has been established in order to re-examine draft Act No. 2821 on trade unions and draft Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts.

Civil liberties

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 29 August 2008 that referred to: (1) violent detention and arrest by the police force of trade union leaders and union members of the TÜMTİS trade union for legitimate exercise of trade union rights; (2) violent attacks on trade union members of the TÜMTİS trade union by security forces of a private enterprise; (3) violent repression during a teachers demonstration on 26 November 2005, arrest and prison sentences against ten trade union leaders of unions affiliated to KESK; (4) setting on fire of the trade union premises of Egitim-Sen's branch office on 4 March 2007; (5) public authorities interference on the statutes of public sector confederation KESK and its affiliates; and (6) closing down of the Turkish trade union of retirees (EMEKLİ-Sen) on 19 September 2007. Concerning the allegations of violence against trade unionists and prison sentences, the Government indicates that according to article 34 of the Constitution, everyone has the right to organize meetings and demonstrations without permission provided that they are non-violent. Moreover, it refers once more to Law No. 2911 on Meetings and Demonstrations that provides for the right of meetings and demonstrations, responsibilities, circumstances of prohibition and penalties. Besides, Circular No. 2005/14 of the Prime Minister, already referred to by the Government, states that press statements made by union leaders are not subject to disciplinary proceedings and provides for facilities for meetings and demonstrations organized according to Law No. 2911. The Committee observes that the Government provides general indications as to the allegations concerning violence exercised by the police force. In this regard, while appreciating the important step taken by the Government in 2008 to declare May Day a public holiday, the Committee notes that the recent comments from the ITUC, DISK and KESK refer to new cases of recourse to violence by the police force during May Day celebrations in 2009. The Committee recalls that in previous comments it had taken note of similar allegations and it had raised the issue of measures to give the police adequate instructions so as to ensure that police intervention is limited to cases where there is a genuine threat to public order and to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations. The Committee wishes to refer to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2009, when it took note of the Government's indication that it was determined to take all necessary disciplinary and judicial measures against the members of the security forces who used disproportionate and excessive force, but that it was important that those demonstrating respected the relevant provisions of national legislation. The Committee on the Application of Standards emphasized in this regard, that respect for basic civil liberties was an essential prerequisite to the exercise of freedom of association and urged the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind so that workers and employers could fully and freely exercise their rights under the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect. Moreover, the Committee requests once again the Government to respond to the comment formulated by the ITUC in 2007 that trade unions must allow the police to attend their meetings and record the proceedings. The Committee also requests the Government to carry out an investigation on the allegations concerning all the cases of use of violence during police or other security force interventions and to indicate any developments in this respect.

With respect to the allegations concerning the interference by the Government on the statutes of public sector confederations and trade unions, the Government indicates that these confederation and trade unions refer in their statutes to "collective bargaining", "collective dispute" and "strike", which are not applicable to public sector trade unions because of a Constitutional restriction; they should instead refer, according to the Government, to "collective negotiations". The Committee recalls that Article 3 of the Convention provides for the right of workers' organizations to draw up their constitutions (statutes) and rules. In order for this right to be fully guaranteed, the Committee believes that two basic conditions must be met: firstly, national legislation should only lay down formal requirements as regards trade union constitutions; and secondly, the constitutions and rules should not be subject to prior approval at the discretion of the public authorities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 109). The Committee further recalls that the prohibition of strikes is only acceptable in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term and that trade unions representing public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State should be able to engage in collective bargaining on behalf of their members, as one of the fundamental activities in which trade unions are involved. The Committee recalls that under Article 8 of the Convention, while trade unions are expected to respect the law of the land, this law should not be such as to impair the guarantees provided for in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to refrain itself from all intervention with respect to the right of trade unions to draw their own statutes, especially when, like in the present case, they provide for trade union rights that are in conformity with the principles enshrined in Conventions Nos 87 and 98 ratified by Turkey. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in this regard.

With respect to the alleged closing down of the EMELKLI-Sen on 19 September 2007, the Government indicates that only employees and employers have the right to establish unions and senior organizations without permission and that there is no provision in Acts Nos 2821 and 2822 concerning the retired persons in these laws, who may, however, organize in the form of an association. The Committee recalls that the legislation should not prevent the trade union organizations and associations from affiliating retirees if they so wish, particularly when they belong to the activity represented by the union.

The Committee further notes that the Government does not provide any information concerning the setting on fire of the premises of Egitim-Sen's branch office. The Committee recalls that attacks against trade unionists and trade union premises and property constitute serious interference with trade union rights. Criminal activities of this nature create a climate of fear which is extremely prejudicial to the exercise of trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to carry out an appropriate investigation on these events and to provide information in this respect.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been commenting upon several provisions of Act No. 2821 on trade unions, Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts and Act No. 4688 on Public Employees' Trade Unions. The Committee notes the copies of draft bills amending Acts Nos 2821, 2822 and 4688 submitted by the Government. The Committee had taken note in its previous observation that the Bills amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822, after having been consulted with the social partners who reached consensus on some issues, were submitted to the Turkish Grand National Assembly on 27 May 2008. In this regard, the Committee on the Applications of Standards took note of the Government's indication that the Tripartite Consultation Board had conducted intensive work in this regard. The Committee notes, that these Bills contain some improvements in the application of the Convention with respect to the following provisions (some of which the Committee had already taken note of in previous comments):

- The condition of the Turkish citizenship to be a founding member and for the election of trade union officers (sections 5 and 14 of Act No. 2821) has been removed.
- The possibility for the governor to appoint an observer at the General Congress of a trade union (section 14(1), of Act No. 2821) has been removed.
- The condition of the certification of the notary public for the membership registration form and for the notice of resignation (sections 22(2) and 25(2) of Act No. 2821) has been removed.
- The definition of public servant includes those occupied in a post or in a contractual employee position other than that of a worker in the public establishments and institutions, including public servants under probation (section 3(a) of Act No. 4688).

Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply to the Committee on the Application of Standards, that the Constitutional Court found that section 73(3), of Act No. 2822 was in breach of the Constitution and had therefore repealed it.

However, a reading of the draft bills reveals that a number of concerns raised by the Committee remain valid with respect to their conformity with:

Article 2 of the Convention

- The need to ensure that the self-employed workers, homeworkers and apprentices enjoy the right to organize as section 2 of Act No. 2821 and section 18 of Act No. 3308 (Apprenticeship and Vocational Training) lead to the exclusion either explicitly or in practice of these categories of workers.
- The exclusion from the right to organize of a number of public employees (such as senior public employees, magistrates, civilian personnel in military institutions and prison guards, section 15 of Act No. 4688). According to the ITUC and KESK, almost 450,000 public employees are deprived of their right to organize due to this provision.
- The prohibition concerning the establishment of trade unions on an occupational or workplace basis (section 3 of Act No. 2821 and section 4 of Act No. 4688).
- The criteria under which the Ministry of Labour determines the branch of activity covering a worksite (as unions must be constituted on a branch of activity basis) and the implications of such determinations on the workers' right to form and join organizations of their own choosing (section 4 of Act No. 2821).
- The criteria under which the Ministry of Labour determines the branch of activity in the public sector and the implications of such determination on the workers' right to form and join organizations of their own choosing taking into account that unions have to be constituted on a branch of activity basis (section 5 of Act No. 4688 as well as the Regulation on the Determination of Branch of Activity of Organizations and Agencies). In this respect, the Committee has already taken note of Case No. 2537 based in a complaint from Yapi Yol Sen in which the trade union alleged that due to the closure of an administrative unit (General Directorate of village affairs) which belonged to the branch of "Public works, construction and village services" its personnel was transferred to the local administration and therefore to the branch of "local governments" which meant that Yapi Yol Sen automatically lost its membership and had to face financial difficulties as well as the fact that trade union officers lost their office pursuant to section 16 of Act No. 4688.

Article 3 of the Convention

- The detailed provisions of Acts Nos 2821, 2822 and 4688 in respect to the internal functioning of unions and their activities that lead to repeated interference by the authorities.
- The provision under which trade union officers' mandates are suspended in case of candidacy in local or general elections and terminated in case of election (Act No. 2821, section 37(3)).
- The removal of union executive bodies in case of non-respect of requirements set out in the law (section 10 of Act No. 4688).
- The termination of trade union office by reason of the transfer of a trade union leader to another branch of activity, or his/her dismissal or simply the fact that a trade union leader leaves the work (section 16 of Act No. 4688, this issue was also dealt with by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2537 concerning Yapi Yol Sen, mentioned above).

Severe limitations to right to strike

- Prohibition of strikes for political reasons, general strikes and sympathy strikes (section 25 of Act No. 2822 and article 54 of the Constitution). The Government had indicated that this issue was not included in the reform as it required a constitutional revision. In this regard, the Committee calls upon the Government to rapidly put forward and ensure the necessary legal and constitutional reforms for the application of the Convention.

- Prohibition of strike in many services which cannot be considered to be essential in the strict sense of the term (production of coal for water, electricity, gas and coal power plants, exploration, production and distribution of natural gas and petroleum; petrochemical works, banking and public notaries, land, sea, railway urban public transportation and other public transportation on rail, chemists shops, pharmacies, educational and training institutions) and compulsory arbitration in services where strikes are prohibited (sections 29, 30 and 32 of Act No. 2822). The Committee recalls that in these services, rather than a prohibition, the establishment of a minimum service could satisfy both the workers and the public interest.
- The possibility for the Council of Ministers to suspend for 60 days a lawful strike for public health and national security reasons and then to refer the matter to compulsory arbitration, if the parties have not been able to reach a settlement upon the expiry of the suspension period (section 33 of Act No. 2822). The draft Bill provides for the advisory opinion of the High Board of Arbitration (a tripartite body), however, the Committee considers that the responsibility for suspending a strike should lie with an independent body which has the confidence of all the parties concerned.
- Excessively long waiting period before a strike can be called (section 27 – referring to section 23 – and section 35 of Act No. 2822).
- Minimum services are determined by the regional directorate of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Committee considers, however, that minimum services should be determined with the participation of workers' and employers' associations involved and, in case of disagreement, the question should be settled by an independent body and not by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (section 40 of Act No. 2822).
- Severe limitations on picketing (section 48 of Act No. 2822); although the draft Bill has eliminated the prohibition for the trade unions to provide shelter to those workers in the picket, other restrictions subsist.
- Heavy sanctions, including imprisonment for participating in unlawful strikes, the prohibition of certain of which however, is contrary to the principles of freedom of association (sections 70, 71, 72, 73 (except for paragraph 3 repealed by the Constitutional Court), 77 and 79 of Act No. 2822 (although section 79 has been modified in the draft, it still provides for fines to those who write posters or signs in workplaces on strike)). KESK refers to concrete cases of trade unions and union members sanctioned for having participated in a strike.
- Section 35 of Act No. 4688 that provides for the determination and settlement of disputes by the conciliation board, makes no mention of the circumstances in which strike action may be exercised in the public service. The Committee recalls that restrictions on the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants who are exercising authority in the name of the State and those working in essential services in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the current situation of the Bills amending Acts Nos 2821, 2822 and 4688 and the extent to which consensus has been reached with the social partners in this regard. The Committee expresses the hope that the final texts will take fully into account its comments and that it will be in a position of noting progress.

Associations Act (supervision of organizations' accounts)

The Committee had already observed that section 35 of Associations Act No. 5253 of 4 November 2004 provides that certain specific sections of this Act apply to trade unions, employers' organizations, as well as federations and confederations, if there are no specific provisions in special laws concerning these organizations. In this respect, section 19 enables the Minister of Internal Affairs or the civil administration authority to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time, with 24 hours' notice. Once again, the Committee recalls that the supervision of accounts should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where serious grounds exist for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention), or if there is a need to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of the members of the employers' or workers' organizations; both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 125). The Committee requests the Government once again to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 19 and 35 of Act No. 5253 of 2004 so as to exclude workers' and employers' organizations from the scope of application of these provisions or ensure that verification of trade union accounts beyond the submission of periodic financial reports takes place only where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention) or in order to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of members.

The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not provided any information with respect to the elaboration of the plan of action with clear time lines (requested by the Committee on the Application of Standards) that would allow the Committee to note significant progress in bringing the law and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to accept the high-level bipartite mission suggested by the Conference Committee with the aim of assisting the Government in making meaningful progress on these long outstanding issues. The Committee considers that this kind of mission would be particularly useful taking into consideration the Government's indication to the Conference Committee that some legislative changes required a constitutional amendment.

Uganda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

The Committee had noted with interest the ITUC's indication that the recently amended legislation and efforts undertaken by the authorities have contributed to a significant improvement in respect of trade union rights, and that in most sectors employers that had traditionally been hostile towards trade unions have agreed to recognize and negotiate with them. Further noting that the ITUC refers to the absence of collective bargaining in the public service sector, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon and to reply to the other matters raised in its previous observation.

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 7 of the Labour Union Act (LUA) sets forth the lawful purposes for which trade union federations may be established. The said purposes include, inter alia: the formulation of policy relating to the proper management of labour unions and the general welfare of employees; the planning and administration of workers' education programmes; and consulting on all matters relating to labour union affairs. Noting that the lawful purposes delineated under section 7 of the LUA does not include collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining should also be granted to federations and confederations of trade unions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 249). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether the right of trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining is assured, in the LUA or in other legislation.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that, under section 5(3) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act of 2006, in cases where a labour dispute reported to a labour officer is not referred to the Industrial Court within eight weeks from the time the report is made, any of the parties or both the parties to the dispute may refer the dispute to the Industrial Court. Section 27 of the Act, the Committee further notes, empowers the minister to refer disputes to the Industrial Court where one or both parties to a dispute refuse to comply with the recommendations of the report issued by a board of inquiry. In this connection, the Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration is acceptable only for: (1) workers in essential services, in the strict sense of the term; and (2) public employees engaged in the administration of the State. Otherwise, provisions that permit the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration, or allow one party unilaterally to submit a dispute to the authorities for arbitration, run counter to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the above legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

United Kingdom

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1949)

The Committee notes the comments made by the British Airline Pilots' Association (BALPA) dated 22 October 2008, supported by the International Transport Federation (ITF) and Unite the Union, and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee notes in particular that BALPA refers to two recent decisions of the European Court of Justice (ECJ), International Transport Workers' Federation and the Finnish Seaman's Union v. Viking Line ABP (Viking) and Laval un Partneri v. Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet (Laval) which held that the right to strike was subject to restrictions under the European Union law where its effect may disproportionately impede an employer's freedom of establishment or freedom to provide services. BALPA asserts that these judgements have negatively impacted upon their rights under the Convention.

In particular, BALPA explains that it decided to go on strike, following a decision by its employer, British Airways (BA), to set up a subsidiary company in other EU States. While efforts were made to negotiate this matter, in particular the impact that the decision would have upon their terms and conditions of employment, all attempts were unsuccessful and BALPA members overwhelmingly voted to go on strike. The strike action was, however, effectively hindered by BA's decision to request an injunction, based upon the argument that the action would be illegal under Viking and Laval. In addition, BA claimed that, should the work stoppage take place, it would claim damages estimated at £100 million per day. Under these circumstances, BALPA did not follow through with the strike, stating that it would risk bankruptcy if it were required to pay the damages claimed by BA. BALPA expresses its deep concern that the application of Viking and Laval by the UK courts will result in injunctions against industrial action (and dismissal of workers) if a strike's impact on the employer is judicially determined to outweigh the benefit to workers.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply that BALPA's application is misdirected and misconceived because any adverse impact of Viking and Laval would be a consequence of the European Union law, to which the United Kingdom is obliged to give effect, rather than of any unilateral action by the United Kingdom itself. The Government further asserts that BALPA's application is premature because it remains unclear what, if any, impact the Viking and Laval judgements would have on the application of trade union legislation in the United Kingdom. The Government adds that these judgements would not likely have much effect on trade union rights because they are only applicable where the freedom of establishment and free movement of services between Member States are at issue. Moreover, the impact of the principles they set forth may differ considerably depending upon the facts of the case. There have been no subsequent analogous cases at the ECJ level, nor have there been any decisions by the UK domestic courts as to whether and to what extent the new principles might represent an additional restriction on the freedom of trade unions to organize industrial action in the United Kingdom. Finally, the Government indicates that it is not obvious that the current limit on damages in tort would be bypassed or overridden in a Viking-based claim since that limit has a sound basis in the protection of the freedoms of trade unions which would be taken into consideration if the limit were challenged as contrary to the European Union law.

The Committee first wishes to recall more generally its previous comments, in which it has noted the limitations on industrial action in the United Kingdom, including that it remains a breach of contract at common law for workers to take part in strike action and that trade union members are protected from the common law consequences (dismissal) only when the trade union has immunity from liability, i.e. when the strikes are in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, which would not include secondary action or sympathy strikes (section 224 of the Trade Unions and Labour Relations (Consolidation) Act, 1992 (TULRA)). The Committee has asked the Government in this regard to indicate the measures taken or envisaged so as to amend the TULRA, with a view to broadening the scope of protection available to workers who stage official and lawfully organized industrial action.

With respect to the matter raised by BALPA, the Committee wishes to make clear that its task is not to judge the correctness of the ECJ's holdings in Viking and Laval as they set out an interpretation of the European Union law, based on varying and distinct rights in the Treaty of the European Community, but rather to examine whether the impact of these decisions at national level are such as to deny workers' freedom of association rights under Convention No. 87.

The Committee observes that when elaborating its position in relation to the permissible restrictions that may be placed upon the right to strike, it has never included the need to assess the proportionality of interests bearing in mind a notion of freedom of establishment or freedom to provide services. The Committee has only suggested that, in certain cases, the notion of a negotiated minimum service in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to third parties, may be considered and if agreement is not possible the issue should be referred to an independent body (see 1994 General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 160). The Committee is of the opinion that there is no basis for revising its position in this regard.

The Committee observes with serious concern the practical limitations on the effective exercise of the right to strike of the BALPA workers in this case. The Committee takes the view that the omnipresent threat of an action for damages that could bankrupt the union, possible now in the light of the Viking and Laval judgements, creates a situation where the rights under the Convention cannot be exercised. While taking due note of the Government's statement that it is premature at this stage to presume what the impact would have been had the court been able to render its judgement in this case given that BALPA withdrew its application, the Committee considers, to the contrary, that there was indeed a real threat to the union's existence and that the request for the injunction and the delays that would necessarily ensue throughout the legal process would likely render the action irrelevant and meaningless. Finally, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the impact of the ECJ judgements is limited as it would only concern cases where freedom of establishment and free movement of services between Member States are at issue, whereas the vast majority of trade disputes in the United Kingdom are purely domestic and do not raise any cross-border issues. The Committee would observe in this regard that, in the current context of globalization, such cases are likely to be ever more common, particularly with respect to certain sectors of employment, like the airline sector, and thus the impact upon the possibility of the workers in these sectors of being able to meaningfully negotiate with their employers on matters affecting the terms and conditions of employment may indeed be devastating. The Committee thus considers that the doctrine that is being articulated in these ECJ judgements is likely to have a significant restrictive effect on the exercise of the right to strike in practice in a manner contrary to the Convention.

In light of the observations that it has been making for many years concerning the need to ensure fuller protection of the right of workers to exercise legitimate industrial action in practice, and bearing in mind the new challenges to this protection as analysed above, the Committee requests the Government to review the TULRA and consider appropriate measures for the protection of workers and their organizations to engage in industrial action and to indicate the steps taken in this regard.

Bermuda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

Protection against employer interference. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to further protect against any possible employer intimidation or interference in respect of union certification or decertification. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the number of Labour Relations Officers has been doubled from two to four, a measure which it believes will assist the labour relations environment and play some part in protecting against any possible employer intimidation or interference in respect of union certification or decertification. The Committee requests the Government to provide information, in its next report, in this regard and to consider other ways of ensuring protection against acts of interference.

Coverage of management personnel. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to include management personnel within the scope of the Trade Union Act so as to guarantee them the rights established by the Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that the Labour Advisory Council is in the process of finalizing a process of consideration of specific amendments to the Act which will help to protect employees generally and, specifically, will include management personnel within the scope of the Trade Union Act. The Committee requests the Government to transmit, with its next report, the amended Trade Union Act.

The Committee appreciates the information contained in the Government's report and hopes that it will soon be able to note progress on these two issues.

Isle of Man

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151)

The Committee notes that the Government's report indicates that the Employment Act 2006 has been adopted into law. In addition, referring to its previous observation, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the Act provides for: enhanced protection against discrimination on trade union grounds at recruitment, during employment and at termination of employment; the right of workers to make use of trade union services; a prohibition on employer offers to workers designed to induce them to alter their union membership, activities, or bargained-for terms and conditions of employment; empowering the Employment Tribunal to order reinstatement of unfairly dismissed employees; and greater protections for workers taking industrial action, including the ability of the employee to file a complaint with the Employment Tribunal if they are subject to dismissal or other adverse action for taking lawfully organized, official industrial action.

Uruguay

Labour Relations (Public Service) Convention, 1978 (No. 151) (ratification: 1989)

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation, after noting that the trade union confederation Inter-Union Assembly of Workers – Workers' National Convention (PIT–CNT) had referred to the absence of machinery for collective bargaining in the public administration, the judicial authorities and education, it invited the Government to examine with the most representative organizations the possible machinery for the promotion of collective bargaining in the public administration and requested it to provide information in the next report on any developments in this respect.

In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's indication in its report that, following the entry into office of a new administration in 2005, a bargaining framework was convened in the public sector. The Government indicates that the bargaining worked and a framework agreement was established which provides for three different levels of bargaining and that several agreements have been concluded (one of which covers the wages of workers in the public administration). Finally, the Committee also notes the adoption of Act No. 18508 of 26 June 2009 on collective bargaining in the framework of labour relations in the public sector.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 26 August 2009, the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS), dated 3 June 2009, and the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV), dated 28 August 2009. Finally, the Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to the cases presented by national and international organizations of workers (Cases Nos 2422 and 2674) and employers (Case No. 2254), and observes that three other cases are under examination (Nos 2711, 2727 and 2736). In its previous observations, the Committee noted the conclusions of the high-level mission which visited the country in January 2006; the Government has provided a report to follow up the mission. Finally, the Committee notes the discussion in June 2009 on the application of the Convention by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference.

Murders of trade union leaders and members and issues relating to compliance with the human rights of trade unionists and employers' leaders

The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, four trade union leaders were murdered in December 2008 in the State of Aragua, for whom it supplies the names. According to the ITUC, the murders were also committed of 19 trade unionists and 10 workers in the construction and petroleum sectors in the context of disputes relating to the negotiation and sale of jobs (there were 48 homicides in 2007), but no investigations have been conducted. According to the ITUC, new sections 357 and 360 of the reformed text of the Penal Code repress and punish with sanctions the right of peaceful demonstration and the right to strike, while the Special People's Defence Act against hoarding, speculation and boycotts restrict labour protest action and other forms of social mobilization. According to the ITUC, the authorities have made use on 70 occasions of sections 357 and 360 of the Penal Code and section 56 of the Basic Security Act in the context of strikes and demonstrations. The CTV indicates that hundreds of workers and trade union leaders have been the victims of murders in the construction sector, without any arrests being made up to now. The CTV states that over 2,000 workers, including trade union leaders, have been brought before the criminal courts under a "probationary system" in accordance with which they have to report regularly to the judicial authorities. They are then released, but are prevented from engaging in any protest activities. Eleven workers in the metropolitan town hall were detained for engaging in protests against the Special Act respecting municipal authorities.

FEDECAMARAS indicates that employers who, in the context of their sectorial representative activities, protest against the kidnapping of their members or the fall in national production as a result of government policies are the victims of threats by the authorities (such as in the case of the President of FEDENAGA) and of the occupation and expropriation of land or interference with their enterprises and property. Various important enterprises have been the victims of harassment and fines and the closure has been ordered of television enterprises which gave air time to employers. The food and agricultural sectors are subject to discretionary practices by the authorities. Furthermore, the investigations by the authorities into the attack on the premises of FEDECAMARAS on 26 May 2007 and the attempted bomb attack on 24 February 2008 (carried out by an inspector of the metropolitan police, whose explosive device blew up and killed him) on its headquarters have not produced any results (according to the Government, arrest warrants have been issued against two persons).

The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not replied to the comments on the application of the Convention made by the above workers' and employers' organizations in relation to violations of human rights. In his statement, the Government representative of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in the Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that in certain cases of the murder of trade union leaders the investigations had identified those responsible, including police officers.

The Committee expresses deep concern, particularly taking into account the high number of assassinations of trade union leaders and members, the apparent impunity of those responsible and the persistence of such deaths in the cement and construction sectors. The Committee wishes to refer to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, which read as follows:

Concerning the alleged acts of violence, detentions and attacks on the FEDECAMARAS headquarters, the Committee highlighted the seriousness of these allegations that urgently needed thorough investigation. The Committee further noted with concern the allegations of violence against trade unionists and the expropriation of private properties. The Committee recalled that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can only be enjoyed in a climate of absolute respect for human rights, without exception. Recalling that freedom of association cannot exist in the absence of full guarantees of civil liberties, in particular freedom of speech, assembly and movement, the Committee highlighted that respect for these rights implied that both workers' and employers' organizations are able to exercise their activities in a climate free of fear, threats and violence and that the ultimate responsibility in this regard lies with the Government.

The Committee also notes with concern the various provisions of the Penal Code and other legislation which tend to restrict the exercise of the right to demonstrate and the right to strike and which criminalize legitimate trade union activities, as well as the allegations that a climate of intimidation is being intensified towards workers' and employers' organizations and their leaders which do not support the Government.

The Committee requests the Government to reply in detail to the allegations made by the workers' and employers' organizations and to carry out investigations into them with a view to addressing the worrying situation of impunity alleged by these organizations. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any progress in the investigations. The Committee also requests the Government to examine together with the workers' and employers' organizations the penal provisions that they criticize and to ensure that their application is not incompatible with the requirements of the Convention.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that it previously raised the following issues:

- the need to adopt the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act so as to eliminate the restrictions placed on the exercise of the rights granted by the Convention to workers' and employers' organizations. On this issue, the Committee previously made the following comments:

The Committee previously noted that a Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act took account of the requests for amendment that it had made on the following points: (1) it deletes sections 408 and 409 (over-detailed enumeration of the mandatory functions and purposes of workers' and employers' organizations); (2) it reduces from ten to five years the required period of residence before a foreign worker may hold office in an executive body of a trade union organization (it should be noted that the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act establish that trade union statutes may provide for the election of foreign nationals as trade union leaders); (3) it reduces from 100 to 40 the number of workers required to establish a trade union of independent workers; (4) it reduces from ten to four the number of employers required to establish an employers' organization; (5) it provides that the technical cooperation and logistical support of the electoral authority (the National Electoral Council) for the organization of elections to executive bodies of trade unions shall be provided only where so requested by the trade union organizations in accordance with the provisions of their statutes, and that elections held without the participation of the National Electoral Council and which comply with the statutes of the trade unions concerned shall have full legal effect once the corresponding reports are submitted to the appropriate labour inspectorate.

The Committee also noted that the Bill provided that "in accordance with the constitutional principle of democratic changeover, the executive board of a trade union organization shall discharge its functions during the period established by the statutes of the organization, but in no case may a period in excess of three years be established". Although the Government provided information indicating that trade union leaders are re-elected in practice, the Committee hoped that the legislative authority would include in the Bill a provision explicitly allowing the re-election of trade union leaders;

- the need for the National Electoral Council (CNE), which is not a judicial body, to cease interfering in trade union elections and to no longer be empowered to annul them, and the need for the statute for the election of the executive bodies of national (trade union) organizations, which accords a preponderate role to the CNE in the various stages of such elections, to be amended or repelled;
- the need to amend section 152 of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act, dated 25 April 2006, which provide for the possibility of compulsory arbitration in non-essential public services;
- the Committee also noted the criticisms made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – presently known as ITUC – concerning Resolution No. 3538 of 3 February 2005 giving trade union organizations 30 days to provide information on their administration and register of members in a form that includes each worker's full identify, their place of residence and signature. The Committee requested the Government to adopt measures to guarantee their confidentiality.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee, after hearing the Government representative indicate that in May 2009 a new process of public consultations had been initiated on the draft text of the Basic Labour Act, adopted the following conclusion:

The Committee on the Application of Standards observed with deep concern that the Committee of Experts had, for ten years, been requesting legislative amendments to bring the law into conformity with the Convention and that the Bill submitted to the Legislative Assembly several years ago has not been adopted. The Committee regretted the Government's apparent lack of political will to pursue the adoption of the Bill in question and the lack of progress despite visits by several ILO missions to the country. The Committee considered that the National Electoral Council's interference in the elections of occupational organizations seriously violated freedom of association.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that a public consultation has encompassed numerous trade union federations, workers and branch associations (including through a virtual forum) and that the observations of the ILO supervisory bodies have been forwarded to the competent committee of the Legislative Assembly. The draft text should be examined in plenary in the month of September or when this phase of broad consultations has been completed.

With regard to the interference by the CNE in trade union elections, the Committee notes the Government's statement that, in accordance with section 33 of the Basic Act on the Electoral Authority, the CNE has the following functions: "To organize trade union elections in compliance with their autonomy and independence, in accordance with the international treaties to which the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela has subscribed in this respect, and providing the necessary technical and logistical support". The Government concludes that, based on an interpretation of article 293(6) of the Constitution of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in conjunction with section 33 of the Basic Act on the Electoral Authority, it may be understood that trade union organizations, whether they are first, second or third level, are independent and autonomous organizations for the organization of their internal electoral processes, and that the intervention of CNE is therefore only possible when so requested by the respective trade union organization.

With regard to the CNE standards for the election of the authorities of trade union organizations, the Government indicates that by Resolution No. 090528-0264, of 28 May 2009, the CNE issued standards on technical advice and logistical support for trade union elections (once these standards have entered into force, the standards for the election of the authorities of trade union organizations, issued by the CNE in Resolution No. 041220-1710, will be repealed). The Government adds that the CNE, through Resolution No. 090528-0265 of the same date as the previous Resolution, and published in the Gaceta Electoral No. 488, issued standards to guarantee the human rights of workers in trade union elections, the objective of which is to safeguard the principles and human rights of active participation, trade union democracy, suffrage, free election and the alternation of representatives of trade union organizations.

The Committee observes that these standards regulate very closely trade union elections and give an important role to the CNE, once again empowering it to examine appeals made by workers or "the worker concerned". The Committee concludes that the new standards governing trade union elections are not only in violation of Article 3 of the Convention (under which, the regulation of elections is a matter for trade union rules), but also allows an appeal by one worker to paralyse the proclamation of election results, which is open to anti-union interference of every type.

Under these circumstances, the Committee regrets that for over nine years the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act has still not been adopted by the National Assembly despite the fact that it had tripartite consensus support. Taking into account the significance of the restrictions which remain in the legislation with regard to freedom of association and the freedom to organize, the Committee once again urges the Government to take measures to accelerate the examination by the Legislative Assembly of the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act and to ensure that the CNE ceases to interfere in trade union elections. The Committee emphasizes the need to reform the standards adopted in 2009 respecting trade union elections and recalls that the Committee on Freedom of Association has repeatedly found cases of interference by the CNE that are incompatible with the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the scope of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act in relation to compulsory arbitration in basic or strategic services.

Shortcomings in social dialogue

In successive observations in recent years, the Committee has identified considerable shortcomings in social dialogue. The ITUC, the CTV, the General Confederation of Venezuelan Workers (CGT) and FEDECAMARAS have indicated that the authorities only hold formal consultations without the intention of taking into account the views of the parties consulted and that there is no authentic dialogue. The Committee notes that in its most recent comments the ITUC states that the absence of dialogue between the Government and trade union organizations meant that workers had little or no participation in the nationalization of enterprises in the steel and cement sectors. According to the ITUC, the Government is promoting “parallel” trade unionism at all levels, with emphasis on the establishment of a new trade union confederation (the Bolivarian Socialist Workers’ Force) as a counterweight to organizations that are not close to the policies of the Ministry of Labour or which oppose the Government. This “parallelism” has given rise to a high number of trade unions with a low number of workers covered by collective agreements, with the result that the proportion of workers covered by collective bargaining has continued to decline in relation to previous years. The lack of social dialogue and tripartite meetings in the public sector is a recurrent practice and 243 collective contracts in the sector have not been signed.

The CTV indicates that national executive authorities do not recognize trade union organizations which are not close to them and disregard federations in the health and education sectors, thereby creating an obstacle to collective bargaining or interfering in it.

FEDECAMARAS emphasizes the absence of social dialogue and of bipartite or tripartite consultations with the Government and the adoption without previous consultation of important laws which affect the interests of workers and employers, despite the principle of participatory democracy enshrined in the law. In its view, this is giving rise to numerous controls, legal barriers for the productive sector and new taxes which are endangering production and employers’ organizations. It adds that the Government has still not convened the National Tripartite Commission envisaged in the Basic Labour Act for the determination of minimum wages, which are established by the Government without due consultation with any sector. With reference to the employers’ delegation to the Conference, FEDECAMARAS confirms that the Government imposed the inclusion as employers’ technical advisers of representatives of CONFAGAN, FEDEINDUSTRIA and EMPREVEN, which follow Government policy and are not representative (see, in this respect, the report of the Credentials Committee of the International Labour Conference in 2009, objection concerning the nomination of the Employers’ delegation of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela).

The Committee notes the Government’s indications that: (1) social dialogue has been broad and inclusive; the national, regional and local governments have held innumerable meetings and discussions with the participation of various members and leaders of the different employers’ and workers’ organizations which form part of the life in the country; the confederations and federations of employers and workers of the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela have been convened to national dialogue round tables and their comments and observations have been sought on different types of subjects, which has given rise to an inclusive, participative and productive exchange with all the social actors; (2) the various types of action undertaken by the Government have shown its interest, unequivocal action and will to promote dialogue and seek agreement with employers, workers and the productive sectors of the population, without the exclusion of or discrimination against any organization or sectorial association, through dialogue that has been broad and inclusive; (3) in addition, the Government has maintained and continues to maintain dialogue and negotiations with the sectors of small and medium-sized enterprises, which have traditionally been excluded from political, economic and social decisions, which were previously undertaken only by a group of employers or organizations within a highly monopolistic and oligarchic structure subordinated to transnational interests; (4) emphasis needs to be placed on the innumerable attempts by the national, regional and local executive authorities to establish discussion round tables for economic and social decision-making, which have been repeatedly rejected in view of the lack of readiness and will of certain employers’ sectors; (5) as a result of this social dialogue, in the first half of 2009, a total of 255 collective labour agreements were approved, covering 537,332 workers in various sectors; (6) similarly, in 2008, over 600 new trade union organizations were established freely and democratically, while in the first half of 2009 a total of 152 have been established, thereby rebutting any argument claiming to insinuate violations of freedom of association in the context of Convention No. 87; (7) the existence of isolated cases, which have been presented as generalized and inappropriate conduct by the Government, of alleged violations of freedom of association are fabrications presented out of context, and fail to take a comprehensive view of all the respective information; (8) it is necessary to reiterate that the Venezuelan State guarantees, respects and protects the exercise of freedom of association at both the individual and collective levels, and consequently guarantees political and ideological freedom; (9) the national Government, on 26 May 2009, following the recommendations of the ILO supervisory bodies in relation to the determination of objective and verifiable criteria with regard to representativeness, convened a meeting which was attended by representatives of FEDECAMARAS, EMPREVEN, CONFAGAN and FEDEINDUSTRIA, with a view to the adoption of positive measures to determine the level of representativeness and the membership of employers' organizations, chambers of commerce, industry, agriculture and any other branch; (10) subsequently, on 30 June 2009, a second meeting was held with the representatives of the Ministry and of the employers' organizations referred to above with a view to continuing the discussions of aspects relating to the determination of criteria of representativeness; no representative of FEDECAMARAS attended this meeting; (11) the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security is currently engaged in a process of broad consultation with a view to the amendment of section 11 of the Social Security Act, with a view to extending maternity and paternity benefits, and invitations were sent to the employers' organizations referred to above with a view to their commenting on the leave provisions of the above Act; during these meetings, the organizations referred to above engaged in an open dialogue in a cordial atmosphere, thereby illustrating the will of the national Government and of the most representative employers' organizations in the country to develop broad, inclusive and participatory social dialogue as a principle based on an international mandate. The Committee also notes the Government's information concerning recent legislation establishing the Occupational Safety and Health Committee as a tripartite, collegial and joint body and providing for the inclusion in the Directorate of the National Occupational Prevention, Health and Safety Institute of a representative of the most representative organizations of employers and workers.

The Committee expresses appreciation at the invitation made by the Government to FEDECAMARAS to two meetings for the determination of criteria of representativeness and to meetings on the Social Security Act, but emphasizes that the Government has not specified or provided details concerning other meetings held with the most representative trade union organizations and with FEDECAMARAS.

The Committee regrets to note, with reference to certain of its previous requests and those of the Conference Committee and the Committee on Freedom of Association, that the national tripartite commission on minimum wages envisaged in the Basic Labour Act has not been established and that a national forum for social dialogue has not been created in accordance with ILO principles with a tripartite composition and which complies in its composition with the representative status of workers' organizations. The Committee further observes that the Government has repeatedly disregarded the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in relation to the important problems encountered by employers and their organizations, in which it requested direct dialogue with this organization, and more specifically its recommendation urging the Government to establish in the country a high-level joint national commission (Government–FEDECAMARAS) assisted by the ILO to examine each and every one of the allegations and matters that are pending so that such problems can be resolved through direct dialogue. As it is not a complex or costly measure, the Committee concludes that the Government has not promoted the conditions for social dialogue in the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela with the most representative organization of employers. The Committee emphasizes the conclusions of the Conference Committee on in which it observed that the Government was continuing to ignore its urgent calls to promote meaningful dialogue with the post representative social partners and called on the Government to intensify social dialogue with the representative organizations of workers and employers, including FEDECAMARAS, and to ensure that this organization was not marginalized in respect of all matters of concern to it. The Conference Committee requested a follow up to the 2006 high-level mission to assist the Government and the social partners to improve social dialogue, including through the creation of a national tripartite committee, and to resolve all of the outstanding matters brought before the supervisory bodies. The Committee deplores the fact that there has been no follow-up to the high-level mission of 2006, as requested by the Conference Committee.

The Committee, noting that there are still no structured bodies for tripartite social dialogue, once again emphasizes the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation taking place on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights and that it is essential that the introduction of draft legislation affecting collective bargaining or conditions of employment should be proceeded by full and detailed consultations with the independent and most representative workers' and employers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to ensure that any legislation adopted concerning labour, social and economic issues which affect workers, employers and their organizations should first be the subject of real in-depth consultations with the independent and most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and that sufficient efforts are made in so far as possible to reach joint solutions, since this is the cornerstone of dialogue.

The Committee once again invites the Government to request the technical assistance of the ILO for the establishment of the dialogue bodies mentioned above. In this context, the Committee emphasizes once again that it is important, taking into account the allegations of discrimination against FEDECAMARAS, the CTV and their member organizations, including the establishment or promotion of organizations or enterprises close to the regime, that the Government is guided exclusively by criteria of representativeness in its dialogue and relations with workers' and employers' organizations and that it refrains from any form of interference and complies with Article 3 of the Convention.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate any developments in social dialogue and their outcome, and it strongly hopes that it will be in a position to note progress in the near future.

In this respect, it is important to determine with precision the representativeness of workers' and employers' organizations, and particularly of confederations. The Committee notes the Government's indication that these confederations do not comply with their legal obligation to provide the registers of their members. The Committee emphasizes that in 2008 it received allegations that the CNE did not give authorization for the holding of many of the respective elections. The Committee recalls that the ILO's assistance for the determination of criteria of representativeness in accordance with the principles of the Convention remains at the Government's disposal.

In the view of the Committee it is also important, in relation to social dialogue, for an independent investigation to be conducted into the allegations concerning the promotion by the authorities of parallel organizations of workers and employers that are close to the Government, and of favouritism and partiality in relation to such organizations (the Government maintains that these may be erroneous perceptions by those who benefited from exclusive rights in the past).

The Committee requests the Government to take steps for this investigation to be conducted and to provide information on this matter.

The Committee also regrets that the former President of FEDECAMARAS, Carlos Fernández, is still covered by an arrest warrant which prevents his return to the country without fear of reprisals.

The Committee notes the Government's statements on certain legislative matters (section 115 of the Basic Labour Act and the single paragraph of the Regulations, respecting the majorities required to engage in collective bargaining, and the possibility of compulsory arbitration in certain essential public services (section 152)). The Committee requests it to supply further information on the application of these provisions in practice and on cases in which they have been applied.

Finally, with regard to the decision of the Ministry of Labour of 3 February 2005, which requires trade union organizations to present within 30 days the data concerning their administration and the list of members in a format which includes the full identification of each worker, their address and signature, the Committee reiterates that the confidentiality of trade union membership should be ensured and recalls the importance of developing a code of conduct between trade union organizations covering the conditions under which membership data may be furnished, with the use of appropriate techniques respecting personal data which guarantee absolute confidentiality. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the confidentiality of the data has been guaranteed, that it has received no information of cases of abuse and that there have not been denunciations. The Committee also raises this comment with regard to the obligation for trade union organizations to supply the lists of their members to the Ministry and requests the Government to take measures in this respect.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 11 (Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Uganda); Convention No. 87 (Albania, Angola, Australia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, Central African Republic, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Croatia, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Djibouti, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, El Salvador, Eritrea, France, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Grenada, Kyrgyzstan, Papua New Guinea, Rwanda, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, Togo, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 98 (Algeria, Angola, Armenia, Australia, Belgium, Benin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Central African Republic, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, El Salvador, Estonia, France, Gabon, Ireland, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Namibia, Niger, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Tajikistan, Togo, United Kingdom: Anguilla); Convention No. 135 (Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Austria, Cameroon, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, El Salvador, Finland, Kazakhstan, Mongolia, Montenegro, Netherlands, Niger, Rwanda, Serbia, Sri Lanka, Uzbekistan, Yemen); Convention No. 151 (Antigua and Barbuda, Chad, Mali, Republic of Moldova, Peru, Poland, Seychelles, United Kingdom); Convention No. 154 (Albania, Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Belize, Brazil, Guatemala, Kyrgyzstan, Niger, Romania, Saint Lucia, United Republic of Tanzania, Uganda).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 87 (Colombia, Israel); Convention No. 98 (Indonesia); Convention No. 135 (Gabon, Lithuania); Convention No. 151 (Chile, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region); Convention No. 154 (Spain, Suriname).

Forced labour

Afghanistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions of the Penal Code, under which prison sentences involving an obligation to perform labour may be imposed:

- (a) sections 184(3), 197(1)(a) and 240 concerning, inter alia, the publication and propagation of news, information, false or self-interested statements, biased or inciting propaganda concerning internal affairs of the country which reduces the prestige and standing of the State, or for the purpose of harming public interest and goods;
- (b) section 221(1), (4) and (5) concerning a person who creates, establishes, organizes or administers an organization under the name of a party, society, union or group with the aim of disturbing and nullifying one of the basic and accepted national values in the political, social, economic or cultural spheres of the State, or makes propaganda for its extension or attraction to it, by whatever means it may be, or who joins such an organization or establishes relations, himself or through someone else with such an organization or one of its branches.

While having noted the Government's earlier indication concerning the special status given to prisoners convicted under the abovementioned sections of the Penal Code, the Committee pointed out that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour on these persons remains contrary to the Convention, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee also refers in this connection to paragraphs 154 and 163 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. A similar situation arises where certain political views are prohibited, subject to penalties involving compulsory labour, as a consequence of the prohibition of political parties or associations.

The Committee has noted the Government's intention to prepare and supply to the ILO a separate report related to the penal law provisions, as well as the Government's indications concerning the adoption of the new Prisons Law of 2005, which replaced the previous law of 1982, and the adoption in 2004 of the law related to the freedom of media. The Committee asks the Government to communicate copies of these laws with its next report and hopes that the abovementioned penal provisions will be re-examined in the light of the Convention with a view to ensuring that no sanctions involving forced or compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment for holding or expressing political or ideological views and that the Government will indicate the measures taken to this end.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Algeria

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Civic service. Since 1986, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of sections 32, 33, 34 and 38 of Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 on civic service, as amended and supplemented by Act No. 86-11 of 19 August 1986 and by Act No. 06-15 of 14 November 2006, under which it is possible to require persons who have completed a course of higher education or training to perform a period of civic service ranging from one to four years before being able to exercise an occupation or obtain employment.

The Government indicated in a previous report that civic service is a statutory period of work performed for a public administration, body or enterprise in local communities by persons to whom such an obligation applies. It represents a contribution of such persons to the economic, social and cultural development of the country. According to the Government, persons liable to perform civic service have the same rights and obligations as the workers governed by the legislation respecting the general conditions of service of workers, including the right to receive remuneration from the employing entity in accordance with the law. Furthermore, the years of civic service performed are taken into account for purposes of seniority, promotion and retirement, and also in the contract period during which the person concerned is bound to a public body by a training contract. The Government further indicated that persons obliged to perform civic service are assigned exclusively to the specialized branch or discipline in which they were trained.

The Committee noted these explanations. However, it also pointed out that, under sections 32 and 38 of the Act, any refusal to perform civic service and the resignation of the person concerned without valid reason results in the prohibition on their exercising an activity on their own account, and that any infringement will incur the penalties laid down in section 243 of the Penal Code (imprisonment ranging from three months to two years and/or a fine of between 500 and 5,000 DA). Similarly, under sections 33 and 34 of the Act, all private employers are required to satisfy themselves before engaging any workers that applicants are not subject to civic service or can produce documentation proving that they have completed it. Furthermore, any private employer knowingly employing a citizen who has evaded civic service is liable to imprisonment and a fine. Hence, even though persons liable to civic service benefit from conditions of work (remuneration, seniority, promotion, retirement, etc.) similar to those of regular public sector workers, they discharge this service under threat because, in the event of any refusal, they are denied access to any self-employed occupational activity or employment in the private sector. This means that civic service falls within the concept of compulsory labour within the meaning of Article 2(1) of the Convention. Furthermore, since it consists of a contribution by the persons concerned to the economic development of the country, this compulsory service violates Article 1(b) of Convention No. 105, which has also been ratified by Algeria.

In its report of 2008, the Government explains that civic service currently in force in Algeria may be regarded as an opportunity, given in particular to persons who have completed higher education, to familiarize themselves with the world of work and facilitate their integration into working life. While noting the willingness expressed by the Government in its report to take account of the Committee's comments, until the removal of the ambiguities resulting from the application of the law has been achieved, the Committee reiterates the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to repeal or amend the provisions concerned in the light of Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee further noted that under section 2 of Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, civic service may be performed in private-sector health establishments in accordance with arrangements set forth by regulation. The Committee reminds the Government that, according to Paragraph 3(3) of the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), the services of participants should not be used for the advantage of private persons or undertakings. Since the Government has not supplied any information on this point, the Committee reaffirms the hope that the Government will take this into account and again requests it to indicate whether regulations have been adopted to specify arrangements under which civic service may be performed in private-sector health establishments and, if so, to provide a copy. It also again requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, persons subject to the civic service obligation perform such service in private-sector health establishments, and to supply any other information allowing the extent of this practice to be assessed (number of persons and establishments concerned, length of service, etc.), together with information on the conditions of work of the persons concerned.

Article 2, paragraph 2(a). National service. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to Ordinance No. 74-103 of 15 November 1974 issuing the National Service Code and the Order of 1 July 1987, under which conscripts are required to take part in the running of various sectors of the economy and administration. The Committee noted that they are further required to perform civic service for a period ranging from one to four years, as referred to above. The Committee recalled that, under the terms of Article 2(2)(a), of the Convention, compulsory military service is excluded from the scope of the Convention only where conscripts are assigned to work of a purely military character.

The Government indicated in a previous report that the civic form of national service had not been used since 2001. The Government explained that this de facto suspension would be reflected in law as soon as the reform of the National Service Code was placed on the agenda. As the Government has not provided any information on this point, the Committee again requests it to provide information on any developments in this matter showing that the national legislation has been aligned with practice and hence with the provisions of the Convention, and to provide copies of the relevant texts.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

In the communication received in November 2009, the Government indicates that, according to the national legislation, prison labour is a voluntary activity based on the prisoners' consent and performed in accordance with the prisoners' state of health and their physical and psychological abilities. According to the Government, a personal file shall be constituted in regard to each prisoner called on to perform prison work, which necessarily contains a medical certificate and a document confirming the prisoner's explicit acceptance to work. The Committee takes note of this information, but observes, however, that voluntary character of prison labour does not follow from the legislation, which stipulates that "prisoners shall be given useful work" (section 2 of Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983 on the modalities of the use of a prison workforce by the National Office of Educational Works) and that "a prisoner may be assigned useful work by the director of the penitentiary establishment" (section 96 of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005 establishing the Code on Penal Institutions and Social Integration of Inmates).

The Committee asks the Government to supply sample copies of personal files of prisoners called on to perform prison work, and in particular, copies of documents confirming the prisoner's explicit acceptance to work. The Committee also considers that, if in practice prison labour is voluntary, it would be appropriate to amend legislation accordingly, in order to avoid any legal ambiguity. It hopes that the Government will supply, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard. The Committee also repeats its previous comments, to which the Government has not replied in its report.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penalties for expressing political views. For many years the Committee has referred to Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 concerning associations, certain provisions of which allow the imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work in circumstances which are covered by the Convention. The Committee previously noted that, under section 5 of the Act, an association's legal status is automatically invalidated if its objectives are contrary to the established institutional system or public order or offend morals or the laws and regulations in force. It further noted that, under section 45 of the Act, anyone who manages, administers or actively participates in an association that has not been approved or which has been suspended or dissolved, or facilitates meetings of the members of such an association, shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from three months to two years involving the obligation to work.

The Committee noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that the penalty laid down by section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 concerns persons breaching the legal provisions regarding the establishment of associations and not persons holding certain political views, which could be expressed in full freedom subject to the legislation in force. In its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee indicated that the range of activities which must be protected, under the present provisions of the Convention, from punishment involving forced or compulsory labour, includes the freedom to express political or ideological views, and also various other generally recognized rights. The latter include the rights of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views and the adoption of policies and laws reflecting them, and which may also be affected by measures of political coercion (see paragraph 152 of the General Survey). The provisions imposing the penalty of imprisonment involving the obligation to work on any infringement of the rules governing the establishment, dissolution or approval of an association are therefore contrary to the Convention. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention, either by amending section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 or by explicitly exempting the persons convicted under this section from the obligation to work.

The Committee previously asked the Government to supply information on the practical application of section 87bis of the Penal Code (Ordinance No. 95-11 of 25 February 1995) on "terrorist or subversive acts", which permits imprisonment involving compulsory labour for anyone convicted of committing a number of very broadly defined acts. It noted the information sent by the Government to the effect that section 87bis of the Penal Code deals with acts affecting the security of the State, territorial integrity, national unity, stability and the normal working of institutions, through use of violence. The Government indicated that acts having a peaceful objective do not come under the scope of section 87bis.

The Committee observed, however, that the very general terms of section 87bis of the Penal Code – obstructing traffic or freedom of movement on public thoroughfares and occupying public places with gatherings, damaging means of communication and transport, public and private property, taking possession thereof or unduly occupying it, obstructing the actions of the public authorities or the free exercise of worship or public freedoms and also the functioning of public service establishments, hindering the operation of public institutions – might enable peaceful acts to be penalized. The Committee underlines the fact that, although anti-terrorist legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the safety of the population against the use of violence, it can still become a means of political coercion and of repression of the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as freedom of expression and freedom of association. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression which is exercised by means of penalties involving an obligation to work, and the limits which the law may impose on them must be strictly defined.

The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will soon take the necessary steps to limit the scope of section 87bis of the Penal Code so that persons who peacefully express ideological opposition to the established political, social or economic system cannot be sentenced to a term of imprisonment which includes the obligation to work.

Article 1(d). Penalties for participating in strikes. For a number of years the Committee has referred to section 41 of Act No. 90-02 of 6 February 1990 on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike, which states that requisition orders may be issued pursuant to the legislation in force for workers on strike who hold posts in public institutions or administrations, or in enterprises, that are essential for the safety of persons, plant and property and for the continuity of public services which are essential to the vital needs of the country, or who carry on activities essential to supplying the public. Section 42 states that, without prejudice to the penalties laid down in the Penal Code, refusal to execute a requisition order constitutes serious professional misconduct.

The Committee previously noted that sections 37 and 38 of Act No. 90-02 establish a list of essential services in which the right to strike is limited and for which a compulsory minimum service must be organized. It observed that the list is very broad and includes services such as banking and radio/television services, which, according to the Committee on Freedom of Association, do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term (see Digest of decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee, 2006, paragraph 587, and also the General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 159–160). The list in sections 37 and 38 of Act No. 90-02 also includes court registry services.

The Committee also referred to section 43 of Act No. 90-02 prohibiting strikes in certain sectors of public institutions and administrations, such as the judiciary and customs. Furthermore, section 55(1) of Act No. 90-02 provides that anyone who causes or seeks to cause, or maintains or seeks to maintain, a concerted collective stoppage of work in conflict with the provisions of this Act, but without violence or assault against persons or property, shall be liable to imprisonment ranging from eight days to two months and/or a fine.

The Committee noted the Government's information in a previous report that the imposition of any penalty on workers taking part in a strike is prohibited. It also noted the Government's statement that the organization of a minimum service provided for by Act No. 90-02 does not constitute forced labour, the objective being to ensure the functioning of public institutions. While noting these indications, the Committee recalled that penalizing participation in strikes through imprisonment including the obligation to work is contrary to the present provisions of the Convention. It also recalled that as an exception to the general principle of the right to strike, the essential services in which this principle may be entirely or partly waived should be defined restrictively, and therefore should include only those services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (see General Surveys on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 159, and on the eradication of forced labour, paragraph 185). The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that no worker may be sentenced to imprisonment including the obligation to work for going on strike and also to supply information on the practical application of sections 41, 43 and 55(1) of Act No. 90-02, stating in particular the number of persons convicted and supplying copies of any court decisions issued.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Argentina

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. In its previous observation, the Committee took detailed note of the comments on the application of the Convention made by the General Confederation of Labour of the Republic of Argentina (CGT) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) relating to the trafficking of persons for labour and sexual exploitation, the direct involvement of public officials in trafficking, the slowness and ineffectiveness of the judicial system and the absence of specific legislation on trafficking. The Committee observed that trafficking in persons constitutes a serious violation of the Convention and requested the Government, while awaiting the rapid adoption of measures specifically classifying trafficking as a crime in respect of which penal sanctions may be imposed, in accordance with the provisions of Article 25 of the Convention, to provide information on current prosecutions under existing penal provisions. In this respect, the Committee recalls the Government's obligation to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced.

Domestic and transnational trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments of the ITUC on the issue of transnational trafficking, according to which Argentina is a destination for the trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation from the Dominican Republic, Paraguay and Brazil. The ITUC referred to a report published by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) documenting the trafficking of 259 Paraguayan women to Argentina for prostitution, of whom 90 were under the age of majority, as well as the information provided by the Paraguayan Vice-Consul concerning over 100 reports from parents of daughters who were believed to have disappeared in cases of trafficking. According to the ITUC, Argentinian women and girls are also trafficked for sexual exploitation abroad, most of whom are from Misiones, Tucumán, La Rioja, Chaco and Buenos Aires. Spain and Brazil are the principal destinations. Intimidation and deception are the means normally used, although an unusually high number of kidnappings have been carried out by gangs involved in the trafficking of persons. In such cases, overt violence and physical confinement of the women are used to prevent them from escaping. An example is the case of a young woman kidnapped in 2002 in San Miguel de Tucumán. The investigation carried out by her mother uncovered evidence of trafficking networks operating in the provinces of La Rioja, Tucumán, Buenos Aires, Córdoba and Santa Cruz, and it was possible to rescue 17 Argentinean women from prostitution in Bilbao, Burgos and Vigo in Spain. The Committee also noted that around 70 cases had been filed in Tucumán over the past five years relating to women and girls who have disappeared and are presumed trafficked.

The Committee noted that the Government's reply to the allegations made by the trade union organizations did not address these specific and serious allegations of the trafficking of women and girls from the Dominican Republic, Paraguay and Brazil, nor the allegations concerning the trafficking networks of Argentinian women and girls abroad. The Committee requested the Government to indicate the investigations carried out and the measures taken against the perpetrators.

Trafficking in persons for labour exploitation. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments made by the National Apparel and Allied Workers' Federation (FONIVA) and the Apparel and Allied Workers' Union (SOIVA), which are member organizations of the CGT, as well as the comments of the ITUC, concerning the existence of practices in the apparel sector consisting of subjecting workers, mainly of Bolivian nationality, to forced labour conditions. These include the retention of their identity documents, locking in workers and in some cases their families in illegal workshops, excessive working hours of up to 17 hours a day and a lack of food. The Committee noted that, as a result of the fire which broke out in Buenos Aires on 30 March 2006 in an apparel factory where 60 Bolivian nationals were working under forced labour conditions, six persons were killed, including four children. A series of inspections were ordered which resulted in the closure within a week of 30 of the 54 workshops inspected because of the appalling working conditions. According to the Minister for Human and Social Rights of the city of Buenos Aires, there are around 1,600 clandestine sweatshops in the city, some 200 of which employ persons under conditions of slavery. The Committee noted the Government's indications concerning the inspections that had been carried out and the charges brought in one case for the offence of reduction to a condition of slavery. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged in this respect, particularly with a view to reinforcing the inspection system.

Legislative measures. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Act No. 26364 of 9 April 2008 on the prevention and punishment of trafficking in persons and assistance to victims. The Committee notes that the Act makes a distinction between trafficking in adults and in persons under 18 years of age. Under the terms of section 2 of the Act, trafficking in adults over 18 years of age means the capture, transport and/or transfer, either within the country or abroad, the taking in or receipt of persons over 18 years of age for the purposes of exploitation. For persons of 18 years of age and over, the means used have to include deception, fraud, violence, threats or any means of intimidation or coercion, abuse of authority or of a situation of vulnerability, the offering or receipt of payment or benefits to obtain the consent the person. In the case of persons under 18 years of age, under the terms of section 3 of the Act, trafficking exists even without the use of any of the means referred to above and the consent of the victim shall be null and void. Section 4 enumerates the constituent elements of exploitation, namely: (a) where a person is reduced to or maintained in conditions of slavery or servitude or is subject to analogous practices; (b) where a person is compelled to engage in forced work or services; or (c) where any form of advantage is sought, facilitated, developed or obtained from the sex trade.

The Committee also notes that the Penal Code has been amended to include provisions establishing penalties for the offence of trafficking in persons. The penalties envisaged are terms of imprisonment of from three to six years for trafficking in adults who are 18 years of age or over and between four and ten years for trafficking in young persons, which is increased from six to 15 years where the victims are under 13 years of age.

Article 25. Application of effective penalties. The Committee notes the information provided by the Crime Office for the investigation of offences against sexual integrity, trafficking in persons and prostitution of the General Prosecution Service of the Nation, concerning the investigations initiated in 2007 and 2008. The Committee notes the indication that charges were brought in nine cases, including charges of reduction to slavery, the facilitation or promotion of the prostitution of adults or young persons; 18 cases are undergoing preliminary investigation, nine of which relate to labour exploitation and reduction to slavery, and five concern the prostitution of young persons. The Committee observes that, according to the information received, prosecutions are being carried out in only two cases, one of which was initiated in March 2007 when charges were brought by the Office of the Attorney-General of the Republic of Bolivia for the exploitation of the labour of a young person and the other was initiated in February 2008 on grounds of reduction to slavery and prostitution. In both cases, the magistrates declared that they were not competent and the cases were referred to other instances. The Committee observes that in none of the cases has information been provided on the penalties imposed. The Committee further notes that the investigations were carried out under penal provisions which allowed for judicial action prior to the adoption of Act No. 26364 of 9 April 2008. The Committee takes due note of the Government's indication in its last report that it was difficult to obtain convictions and impose penalties prior to the adoption of Act No. 26364.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information in its next report on the effect given to Act No. 26364 and the provisions of the Penal Code establishing penalties for the offence of trafficking in persons for purposes of labour or sexual exploitation, including information on the charges brought, the prosecutions initiated and the penalties imposed on those found guilty. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide copies of the relevant rulings.

Corruption of the police forces. Involvement of public officials in trafficking. The ITUC made allegations concerning corruption in the police forces and the direct involvement of police officers in criminal activities related to trafficking in persons. It provided the example of the case in Mar del Plata, in the province of Buenos Aires, of 13 deaths and disappearances of women which were attributed to an organization of police officers involved in prostitution; the case of the police station in the Cuartel Quinto in Moreno, where the complaint made by three women who had managed to escape was not filed and the owner of the brothel was informed of what was happening; and the case of two minors who were rescued from a brothel in the port of Quequén run by a municipal employee and a police officer from the province of Buenos Aires.

In the case of the 17 Bolivian workers who were victims of trafficking for labour exploitation, referred to above, witnesses stated that the police came to the factory to take a percentage of the profits and that four of the workers were threatened before the judge (identified in the comments) set the owner of the factory free on the grounds that there was insufficient proof to show that the workers had been subjected to servitude. According to the ITUC, the involvement of the police is one of the pivotal factors in explaining the rise in domestic and transnational trafficking in recent years and the lack of effective prosecutions of those accused of trafficking.

The Committee noted the gravity of the allegations made and emphasized the key role of the police in enforcing the law and the Convention, which is undermined in the event of the corruption of the police forces. The Committee urged the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to conduct full investigations into all allegations of complicity or the direct involvement of public officials in the trafficking of persons and on the penalties imposed, if the allegations were found to be true.

In its report, the Government indicates that, under the terms of Act No. 26364, the offence of trafficking in persons lies within the competence of the federal authorities and that Resolution No. 1679/2008 provides for the establishment of specific units in the four national security forces to engage in action to prevent and investigate the offence of trafficking in persons, as well as the intelligence work required for this purpose.

The Committee observes that the Government's report does not contain information on the cases reported in the ITUC's allegations and, consequently, reiterates its previous request that the Government provide information on measures adopted or envisaged to conduct full investigations of all allegations of complicity or the direct involvement of public officials in the trafficking in persons. It hopes that the Government will indicate in its next report whether the establishment of specific units in the federal security forces has made it possible to combat the phenomenon of police corruption and the involvement of public officials in the crime of trafficking in persons, and the manner in which this has been done.

Other measures. Human Rights Observatory. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the Human Rights Observatory established by Resolution No. 019/06 of the Secretariat for Human Rights of the Ministry of Justice with a view to promoting the rights of migrants of Bolivian origin and preparing reports with recommendations on their situation. Among the activities carried out by the Observatory, the Committee notes the training course on human rights and migration, for which support was provided by UNDP, which lasted four months, and the preparation of an information brochure for migrant families containing information on trafficking in persons for labour and sexual exploitation. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the activities that the Observatory is continuing to undertake with a view to protecting migrant Bolivian workers against the imposition of forced labour.

International cooperation. The Committee requested the Government in its previous observation to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged for the coordination of the action taken with all the countries that in one way or another are involved in the trafficking in persons within or outside the country.

The Committee notes the information provided concerning the measures adopted in the context of cooperation between the Member States of MERCOSUR related exclusively to the protection of boys, girls and young persons who are victims of crimes related to trafficking. The Committee will note this information in the context of the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). The Committee observes that the report does not contain information on the measures adopted with a view to international cooperation in relation to trafficking in adults. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures for the indispensable international cooperation in combating the trafficking in persons, including adults, taking into account the comments of the trade union organizations which referred specifically to countries of origin and of destination of the victims and to the existence of organized networks for trafficking in persons.

Assistance to victims. The Committee notes with interest the National Programme for the Prevention and Eradication of Trafficking in Persons and Assistance to Victims. It hopes that the Government will provide information on the activities undertaken in the context of the Programme, as well as data on the number of victims who have received the comprehensive assistance envisaged in the Programme.

The Committee observes that trafficking in persons for labour and sexual exploitation constitutes a serious violation of the Convention and requires action that is energetic, effective and proportional to the gravity and magnitude of the phenomenon. The Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary measures for the eradication of this practice, and that the Government will provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Australia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

The Committee has noted the Government's report. It has also noted the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 1 September 2008, in which ACTU expressed concern about the vulnerable situation of temporary overseas skilled workers, who are not adequately protected from exploitation and sometimes subjected to forced labour. According to ACTU, Australian trade unions and the media have reported numerous cases, in which workers on temporary visas (under the 457 visa scheme) have been denied wages or had their wages illegally reduced to pay for recruitment or migration agent fees and airfares, have been forced to work long hours without adequate meals or rest breaks, have been forced to work in unsafe workplaces and have been threatened with deportation if they seek to enforce their rights. The Committee has noted that this communication was forwarded to the Government, on 18 September 2008, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government will supply its comments with its next report.

Article 1, paragraph 1, and Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 2(c), of the Convention. Privatization of prisons and prison labour. Work of prisoners for private companies. In comments it has been making for a number of years concerning the privatization of prisons and prison labour in Australia, the Committee pointed out that the privatization of prison labour transcends the express conditions provided in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention for exempting compulsory prison labour from the scope of the Convention. The Committee recalled that compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to, or placed at, the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as, for example, to provide that any prisoners working for private enterprises offer themselves voluntarily without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved.

The Committee notes with regret that the position of the Government remains unchanged and that the report repeats the statements by the Government already noted in its previous comments. The Committee observes that there appears again from the Government's report to be little change in national law and practice, during the reporting period 2006–08, with regard to the work of prisoners for private enterprises. The Government reiterates its view that its law and practice comply with the Convention, given that privately managed prisons remain under the supervision and control of public authorities, and that the private sector has no rights in relation to establishing conditions for the work of prison inmates, such conditions being established by the public authorities. It follows from the report that no Australian jurisdiction is currently considering amending its law and practice.

In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that private prisons existed in Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia and Western Australia, while there were no prisons administered by private concerns under the Tasmanian, Northern Territory and Australian Capital Territory jurisdictions. In its latest report, the Government again refers to prison labour in private prison facilities in New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia, Victoria and Western Australia, laying special emphasis upon the fact that prisoners accommodated in privately operated facilities are under the supervision and control of a public authority, as required by the exemption in Article 2(2)(c). The Government reiterates the view that prisoners are not “hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations”, since the “legal custody” of prisoners has not been transferred to a private provider of prison services, and sentenced prisoners remain in the legal custody of the Secretary to the Department of Justice until they are released from prison (Victoria). However, as the Committee noted previously, the Government recognized in its earlier report that “prisoners are at the ‘disposal’ of the private contractor only in a very literal sense”.

In this connection, the Committee again draws the Government's attention to the explanations concerning the scope of the terms “hired to or placed at the disposal of” contained in paragraphs 56–58 and 109–111 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour and observes that these terms cover not only situations where prisoners are “employed” by the private company or placed in a position of servitude in relation to the private company, but also situations where the companies do not have absolute discretion over the type of work they can request the prisoner to do, since they are limited by the rules set by the public authority, and where the performance of work is “merely one of the conditions of imprisonment imposed by the State”. The Committee also refers to paragraph 106 of its 2007 General Survey, where it considered that the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments, but applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons; consequently, it applies to all work organized by privately run prisons.

Referring also to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its 2007 General Survey referred to above, the Committee points out once again that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. The Committee has considered that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain the prisoners' formal consent to work for private enterprises in state-run prisons or in privatized prisons and that it should be provided in writing. Further, given that such consent is required in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there should be indicators which authenticate or satisfy the giving of the free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health.

As regards the question of voluntariness, the Committee previously noted that in privately operated prisons in Victoria, New South Wales and South Australia the formal consent of prisoners to work does not appear, so far, to be asked for. It notes, however, that the Government confirms its previous indication that, in New South Wales, employment of inmates in correctional centres (including Junee Correctional Centre, the only privately operated facility) is voluntary on the part of the inmate and there are no incidents of forced labour. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that, in South Australia, where prison labour is compulsory both inside and outside the correctional institution (section 29(1) of the Correctional Services Act 1982, division 6), prisoners at Mt Gambier Prison (South Australia's only privately operated prison) apply in writing to undertake work programmes.

The Committee has also noted the Government's repeated indications that, in Queensland, prisoners are not forced to participate in approved work activities: though no formal consent of prisoners is required, the work programme is a voluntary initiative and there are no ramifications or negative effects for a prisoner for refusal to participate in such a programme. As regards Western Australia, where the legislation requires prisoners to work (section 95(4) of the Prisons Act, as amended in 2006), the Government indicates that the relevant provision has not been enforced, and the prisoners are not forced to participate in work programmes (even in privately run prisons, like the Acacia Prison), though they are encouraged to participate.

While noting these indications concerning positive trends of practical application of existing legislation in certain Australian jurisdictions referred to above, the Committee reiterates its hope that measures will be taken to ensure that freely given and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons, as well as for all work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises, so that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty in the wide sense of Article 2(1) of the Convention, such as loss of privileges or an unfavourable assessment of behaviour taken into account for reduction of sentence. Furthermore, in the context of a captive labour force, having no alternative access to the free labour market, such “free” and “informed” consent needs to be authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as regards wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health.

In the light of the above considerations, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken in all Australian jurisdictions, both in law and in practice, to grant prisoners working in privately operated facilities and other prisoners working for private enterprises a legal status with rights and conditions of employment that are compatible with this basic human rights instrument, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

As regards those jurisdictions where, according to the report, prisoners are not forced to participate in work programmes, the Committee asks the Government to indicate how “informed” consent of prisoners to work for private companies is achieved in practice, what measures are taken to ensure that such consent is freely given and what remedies are available to a prisoner if the consent is alleged not to be freely given.

Please also provide information on the practical impact of the recommendation of the Australasian Correctional Industries Association’s Code of Practice to establish an independent consultative body which includes representatives of industry, unions and the community to monitor the development and operation of correctional industries, which was referred to by the Government in its report, as well as information on any other measures taken or envisaged to ensure compliance with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Belize

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1983)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes. In comments it has been making for a number of years, the Committee has referred to section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act, under which a penalty of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour, by virtue of section 66 of the Prison Rules) may be imposed on any person employed by the Government, municipal authority or any employer in charge of supplying electricity, water, railway, health, sanitary or medical services or communications or any other service that may by proclamation be declared by the Governor to be a public service, if such person wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences will be to cause injury or danger or grave inconvenience to the community. The Committee has also noted that section 2 of the Settlement of Disputes (Essential Services) Act, Statutory Instrument No. 92 of 1981, declared the national fire service, postal service, monetary and financial services (banks, treasury, monetary authority), airports (civil aviation and airport security services) and the port authority (pilots and security services) to be essential services, and Statutory Instrument No. 51 of 1988 declared the Social Security Scheme administered by the Social Security Branch an essential service.

The Committee pointed out that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes is incompatible with the Convention. It noted that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act refers not only to injury or danger but, alternatively, to grave inconvenience to the community, and applies not only to essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), but also to other services, such as most employment under the Government or a municipal authority and most banking, postal and transport services.

The Committee notes from the Government’s report that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act has not been amended. It also notes the Government’s repeated indication that there have been no recorded penalties of imprisonment imposed under this section. The Government states that the comments made by the Committee will be submitted to the Labour Advisory Board, which was reactivated in March 2009, and that one of its main duties is to review national legislation. According to the report, the Ministry is currently in the process of identifying a consultant that will work along with the Labour Advisory Board to conduct the revision of the labour legislation.

While having noted these indications, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken to bring section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will report the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Benin

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Work of a purely military character performed in virtue of compulsory military service laws. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to review the provisions of section 35 of Act No. 63-5 respecting recruitment of 26 June 1963 and to provide information on their application in practice. Under the terms of these provisions, the purpose of active military service is, first, to provide conscripts with military instruction and also education intended to develop their civic sense and, second, to further their training and employ them, inter alia, in specialized army units to participate in the work of national construction. Under these provisions therefore, and contrary to the terms of Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, the work exacted from conscripts may not be of a purely military character and shall consequently be considered as forced or compulsory labour within the meaning of the Convention. In its 2006 report, the Government indicated that information on the effect given in practice to section 35 of the Act would be provided in the near future. However, the Committee notes that the Government's latest report does not contain information on this matter. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of section 35 of Act No. 63-5 into conformity with those of the Convention.

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 2007-27 of 23 October 2007 establishing the military service of national interest, issued under Act No. 63-5 respecting recruitment of 26 June 1963, on which the Committee has commented (see point 1 of this observation), and the adoption of Decree No. 2007-486 of 31 October 2007 establishing general conditions for the organization and performance of military service in the national interest. It notes that under the terms of sections 2 and 5 of Act No. 2007-27, the military service of national interest, to which all nationals of Benin of both sexes aged between 18 and 35 years are subject, consists of compulsory service for 12 months and supplements active military service. By virtue of section 3, the purpose of military service of national interest is the mobilization of the citizens with a view to their participation in work for the development of the country. Section 4 provides that, after a first stage of instruction, recruits are then assigned to administrative units, production units, institutions and bodies with a view to participating in the performance of relevant work of national interest that is of a social or economic nature. The Committee further notes that section 18 of Decree No. 2007-486 specifies that, following two months of military, civic and moral training, the conscripts are engaged in work for socio-economic development for nine months. The Committee recalls that under the terms of Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws is only excluded from the scope of the Convention on condition that it is of a purely military character. The Committee notes that the provisions of Act No. 2007-27 and of Decree No. 2007-486 are not in compliance with this condition as those conscripted for military service of national interest are assigned to work for socio-economic development that is not of a purely military character. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend or repeal Act No. 2007-27 and Decree No. 2007-486 so as to ensure conformity with the Convention.

For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend Act No. 83-007 of 17 May 1983 governing civic, patriotic, ideological and military service. The Committee observed that this Act is in contradiction with this provision of the Convention as persons subject to this compulsory civic and military service are assigned to a production unit in accordance with their occupational aptitudes and may be compelled to perform work that is not of a purely military character. As the Government indicated in this respect that the Act is no longer applied in practice, the Committee requested it to confirm that the Act had been formally repealed. In its report received in November 2006, the Government indicated that information on this matter would be provided to the ILO. However, the Government's latest report does not contain any information on this matter. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate whether Act No. 83-007 of 17 May 1983 has actually been repealed and, if so, to provide a copy of the repealing Act.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced labour as punishment for expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It emphasized, in particular, that when they involve compulsory labour, sentences of imprisonment fall within the scope of the Convention if they may be imposed for the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It observed that, by virtue of section

67 of Decree No. 73-293 of 15 September 1973, issuing the prison regulations, as amended by Decree No. 78-161 of 23 June 1978, convicted prisoners may be assigned to social rehabilitation work.

In view of the foregoing, the Committee has for many years been drawing the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 60-12 of 30 June 1960 on the freedom of the press under which various acts or activities relating to the exercise of freedom of expression are punishable by a prison sentence. The Committee referred more particularly to the following provisions of the Act: section 8 (deposit of a publication with the authorities before its release to the public); section 12 (ban on publications of foreign origin in French or the vernacular, printed within or outside the country); section 20 (incitement to commit an act classified as an offence); section 23 (causing offence to the Prime Minister); section 25 (publishing false reports); and sections 26 and 27 (slander and insults).

The Committee also referred to Act No. 97-010 of 20 August 1997 liberalizing audiovisual communication and establishing special penal provisions relating to offences relating to the press and audiovisual communications. While noting that the provisions of Act No. 97-010 prevail should they conflict with those of the Act on the freedom of the press, the Committee pointed out that the two Acts are different in scope, since Act No. 97-010 covers audiovisual communications and the Act on the freedom of the press covers printing, books and periodicals. For the above reasons, the Committee also drew the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 97-010: section 79(3), under which "any seditious shouting or chanting against the lawfully established authorities in public places or meetings" is punishable by a sentence of imprisonment of from six months to two years; section 81, under which causing offence to the President of the Republic is punishable by imprisonment of from one to five years; and section 80, which punishes by imprisonment of from two to five years any provocation against the public security forces aimed at distracting them from their duty of defending security or of obeying the orders given by their chiefs for the enforcement of military laws and regulations.

In its last two reports, received in October 2008 and November 2006, the Government indicates that it intends to bring national laws into line with ratified Conventions. In this context, a department to promote fundamental rights at work was established in November 2005 with responsibility, inter alia, for ensuring that laws and regulations are consistent with Conventions. The Government adds in its latest report that a study of their conformity was carried out by the Ministry of Labour and the Public Service and validated in 2007, and that it takes into account the Committee's observations. The report indicates that draft texts to repeal or amend the provisions in question will soon be submitted to the National Assembly and will be communicated to the Office once they have been adopted. The Committee notes the renewed will of the Government to amend the provisions of the national legislation which may be incompatible with the Convention and it hopes that these provisions will be reviewed so as to ensure that the normal exercise of freedom of expression and peacefully expressed opposition to the established political, social or economic system cannot be punished by imprisonment involving an obligation to work. The Committee once again requests the Government to specify whether the courts have had recourse to the above provisions of Acts Nos. 60-12 and 97-010 and, if so, to send copies of court decisions clarifying their scope.

Article 1(c). Imposition of forced labour as a means of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend sections 215, 235 and 238 of the Merchant Shipping Code of 1968. Under these provisions, certain breaches of labour discipline by seafarers are punishable by imprisonment which, pursuant to section 67 of Decree No. 73-293 of 15 September 1973, involves the obligation to work. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its last two reports that the draft Merchant Shipping Code that has been submitted to the National Assembly for adoption takes into account the Committee's comments.

The Committee trusts that the new Merchant Shipping Code will be adopted very shortly and that it will make no provision for prison sentences involving the obligation to work to be imposed for breaches of labour discipline where they do not endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. Please send a copy of the new Merchant Shipping Code as soon as it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bolivia

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1990)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Punishment for having participated in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 234 of the Penal Code, under which advocacy of lockouts, strikes or stoppages declared illegal by the labour authorities is punishable by imprisonment of from one to five years. Sentences of imprisonment involve an obligation to work under sections 48 and 50 of the Penal Code. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice of these provisions in order to enable it to evaluate their scope and to provide copies of court decisions made under them, with an indication of the number of convictions. The Committee also referred to sections 2, 9 and 10 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of 6 June 1951 establishing penal sanctions for participation in general strikes and sympathy strikes, and to other restrictions set out in the legislation in relation to strikes, including the requirement for a majority of three-quarters of the workers of the enterprise to call a strike (section 114 of the General Labour Act and section 159 of its Regulations), and the possibility to impose compulsory arbitration by decision of the executive authorities (section 113 of the General Labour Act).

The Committee emphasizes that no worker on strike who has acted peacefully should be subject to criminal sanctions and observes once again that the excessive restrictions imposed on the exercise of the right to strike have an impact on the application of the Convention. This is the case with the requirement of a qualified majority to call a strike and the existence of compulsory arbitration systems when such restrictions result in a declaration that the strike is illegal with the consequent penal sanctions and the imposition of compulsory prison labour.

The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the draft text drawn up on the basis of a tripartite agreement resulting from negotiations between the representatives of the Bolivian Central Workers' Organization (COB), the Bolivian National Confederation of Private Sector Employers (CEPB) and the Ministry of Labour, who agreed on the amendment of various legal provisions, including sections 2, 9 and 10 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of 6 June 1951 establishing penal sanctions for sympathy strikes and section 234 of the Penal Code.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government's indications in its report, during the period 2005–07 there were no cases of the application of section 234 of the Labour Code nor of Legislative Decree No. 2565. It further notes that the Government is taking measures with a view to amending the penal legislation and giving effect to the tripartite agreement that was concluded on the need to amend the provisions referred to above.

The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that penalties involving compulsory labour cannot be imposed for participation in strikes by amending or repealing the legislative provisions which establish such penalties and since, according to the Government's indications, these provisions are not applied in practice, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and with existing practice, as described by the Government.

Brazil

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the comments made by the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Government's reply to these comments, which were received in October 2008, September 2008 and March 2009, respectively.

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Slave labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, despite the series of measures adopted by the Government to combat "slave labour", many workers continue to be victims of inhumane and degrading conditions of work, debt bondage or internal trafficking for the exploitation of their labour. The Committee emphasized in particular: the adaptation of the legislation to national circumstances with section 149 of the Penal Code, which defines the elements that constitute the crime of "reducing a person to a condition akin to that of slavery"; the activities undertaken by specialized institutions to combat this phenomenon; the action of the labour inspectorate, and particularly the Special Mobile Inspection Group, which has each year removed an increasing number of workers from these situations of exploitation; and the action by the labour courts, which have convicted persons engaging in such exploitation to substantial fines and compensation. Noting that all of these actions have failed to be sufficiently dissuasive to prevent certain employers from having recourse to this practice, which remains lucrative, the Committee requested the Government to continue taking action without respite against persons who exact forced labour by adopting measures in the fields of legislation, labour inspection and the judicial authorities.

(a). Strengthening of the legal framework. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that several Bills had been tabled with the objective of undermining the economic and financial interests of those exploiting slave labour and it requested the Government to take all possible measures to accelerate their adoption. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report and the comments made by the CUT, these legislative initiatives have still not been completed and that, despite the mobilization of the Government and civil society, certain members of Parliament continue to block the adoption of these texts. The Committee recalls its view that, if they are adopted, these bills would constitute significant additional tools in combating slave labour. In particular, the Bill to provide a legal basis for the prohibition of persons recognized to have used slave labour from obtaining fiscal benefits and credits or from participating in public contracts, and the Bill to increase the penalties applicable to the crime of reducing a person to a condition akin to slavery. The draft amendment to article 243 of the Constitution (PEC No. 438/2001) is also a significant initiative intended to authorize the expropriation, without compensation, of establishments in which the use of slave labour has been identified. The amendment also provides that the expropriated lands will be consigned to the agrarian reform and reserved as a priority for the persons who fell victim to slave labour at those locations.

Status and use of the list of persons who use or have used slave labour. Since 2003, the names of individuals or entities convicted by a final decision of a court of law for having used labour under conditions akin to slavery appear on a list drawn up by the Ministry of Labour and Employment. The list, which is updated every six months, is sent to various public administration bodies and to banks administering constitutional and regional financing funds so that no financial assistance, grants or public credits are granted to those included on the list. For two years following the inclusion of a name on the list, the labour inspectorate verifies the conditions of work in the establishments concerned. If there is no recidivism and if the fines and the debts to the workers have been acquitted, the name may be removed from the list (Decree No. 540 of the Ministry of Labour and Employment of 15 October 2004). The Committee notes that in the latest revision of the list, in July 2009, 34 names were removed from the list, while a further 13 were added, bringing the total number of individuals or entities on the list to 175 (compared to 192 in 2007).

In its previous comments, the Committee noted with concern that the lawfulness and constitutional nature of the list had been contested, and that the courts had upheld appeals by certain employers demanding the removal of their names from the list while awaiting a final decision. The Government indicated that, with a view to bringing an end to this controversy, a Bill establishing the list of employers which have maintained workers in conditions akin to slavery had been tabled with a view to giving legal force to the list, which has up to now been drawn up by means of a Ministerial Order (PLS No. 25/05). The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on the progress made in relation to this Bill, although it indicates that the dominant case law in regional labour courts recognizes the lawful nature of the list.

The Committee further notes, according to the information provided by the Government, that the list serves as a basis for the examination of the ownership and registration of the assets of persons who are on the list. Where an instance of unlawful occupation is noted, the assets can be immobilized with a view to agrarian reform projects. The Committee has already observed that inclusion on the list is used as a basis for considering that an establishment is not fulfilling its social purpose. In this respect, in 2004, the President of the Republic ordered the expropriation of an establishment declared of social interest for agrarian reform purposes. The Committee notes the Government's indication that an appeal was lodged against this expropriation with the Federal Supreme Court, which has still not ruled on the appeal.

The Committee considers that the establishment of the list of persons who use or have used slave labour and the resulting measures constitute effective tools in combating slave labour. In this respect, it expresses concern at the attacks on the measures adopted by the executive authorities, both in terms of the establishment of the list itself and the penalties imposed on the basis of the list against persons whose names are on the list.

The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take every measure to expedite the adoption of the Bills referred to above and, in particular, those intended to guarantee greater legal security, with a view to preventing the questioning of the legality of the list by offenders who want to see their names removed and so that expropriation of lands is not contested. The Committee once again emphasizes in this respect the importance of adopting the proposed amendment to the Constitution (PEC No. 438/2001) intended to authorize the expropriation, without compensation, of establishments in which the use of slave labour has been identified. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the President of the Republic has ordered further expropriation measures and whether the Federal Supreme Court has ruled on the expropriation ordered in 2004 by the President of the Republic.

(b). Strengthening of the labour inspectorate. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized the central role of labour inspection, and particularly of the Special Mobile Inspection Group (GEFM), in combating slave labour. Observing that the GEFM is a vital link in the action to combat slave labour, the Committee expressed concern at the pressure that it has to face and asked the Government to continue to take measures to allow the GEFM to carry out its activities in a serene climate free from threats or political pressure, and to strengthen its capacity for intervention and reaction.

In its comments, the CUT recognizes the praiseworthy work carried out by the GEFM. However, the CUT notes that the labour inspectorate lacks human and material resources, and emphasizes in particular the difference between the number of complaints lodged with the Secretariat of the Labour Inspectorate (SIT) and the number of interventions carried out in practice by the inspectorate, as well as the climate of violence confronting the inspection services. In its reply, the Government indicates that it cannot be completely in disagreement with this assessment. However, measures are being taken to strengthen the labour inspection services, including training and capacity building for the staff and the improvement of the infrastructure and logistical support. The Government adds that in 2008 the GEFM was composed of nine teams, compared with four up to 2003. The primary purpose of the GEFM's interventions is to remove enslaved workers from their working environment and the figures show that the action carried out by the GEFM has continued to be intensified with an ever greater number of establishments inspected and workers released (158 operations carried out in 2008, with 301 establishments inspected and 5,016 workers released). With regard to the reinforcement of the labour inspection services, the Government indicates that public competitions are regularly organized to recruit new labour inspectors and controllers; 192 candidates were appointed in November 2007, and the administration has called for the organization of a new public competition. From a logistical viewpoint, additional vehicles have been acquired, as well as computer and technological equipment (GPS, etc.). With regard to the difference between the number of denunciations made to the SIT and the number of interventions by the inspection services, the Government explains that the denunciations pass through a process of "filtering" to ensure the optimal use of resources and the effectiveness of inspections. Denunciations are examined on the basis of certain criteria; how recent the events are, their location, and the serious nature and precision of the allegations. The GEFM's interventions, involving the mobilization of a high number of officials from various institutions and significant material resources, have a high financial cost and it is therefore indispensable to "filter" denunciations to ensure the success of the inspections that are carried out. Finally, the Government indicates that, despite the threats and pressure exerted by certain sectors, particularly the sugar industry, the number of inspections has remained high. It also recalls that the federal police and officials of the Office of the Attorney-General accompany labour inspectors on each intervention.

The Committee notes all the measures adopted by the Government to strengthen the labour inspection services. It encourages the Government to continue to pursue its efforts and to take every measure to ensure that the GEFM has at its disposal adequate human and material resources to move rapidly, effectively and safely throughout the national territory. The inspections carried out by the GEFM result not only in the release of workers from situations of forced labour, but also provide the judicial system with documents which serve as a basis for civil and criminal prosecutions against those responsible for these practices and are essential for the proper imposition of sanctions on perpetrators.

(c). Imposition of effective penalties. The Committee recalls that the effective imposition of penalties for violations of labour legislation is an essential element in combating slave labour, as slave labour is characterized by the accumulation of a number of violations of labour legislation which must be punished as such. Moreover, taken as a whole, these violations constitute the criminal offence of “reduction of a person to a condition akin to slavery”, which in itself gives rise to specific penalties. The Committee notes that the CUT emphasized in its comments that, to bring an end to the practice of slave labour, it is essential to recognize the inadequacy of the procedures for imposing penalties and the need to increase civil and penal sanctions.

Administrative sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to continue to ensure that the administrative penalties imposed are dissuasive and effectively applied. In its report, the Government recalls that each violation of the labour legislation identified by the GEFM during inspections gives rise to the imposition of fines. Furthermore, the Office of the Attorney-General for Labour, in the context of the civil action initiated, in addition to fines, calls for the payment of compensation for material damages for the prejudice suffered by the worker and for collective moral damages. The Government considers that the fines and compensation damages that are sought, combined with the establishment of the list of persons who have used slave labour, constitute effective and dissuasive instruments in the action to combat slave labour, as they make the exploitation of slave labour economically unviable. The Committee notes this information and requests the Government to continue ensuring that the fines and compensation imposed are collected in practice. It encourages the Government to take every measure available to it and to provide support for the measures adopted by the judicial authorities and civil society to continue to exert economic pressure on those who exploit the labour of others, including: the payment of dissuasive fines and compensation, the removal of access to public subsidies and financing, prevention of the sale of the goods produced, and the expropriation of lands.

Penal sanctions. For many years, the Committee has been concerned with the very low number of convictions by the criminal courts under section 149 of the Penal Code for the reduction of a person to a condition akin to slavery. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, by deciding that competence for examining and trying the crime of the reduction of a person to a condition akin to slavery lies with the federal courts, the ruling of the Federal Supreme Court (STF) of 30 November 2006 brought an end to the conflicts concerning jurisdiction which had prevented or delayed the trial of those responsible for such crimes. In its report, the Government indicates that the ruling by the STF opens the way to an increase in the number of convictions for this crime. During 2008, the Government refers to two convictions; one involving a sentence of five years of imprisonment by the Federal Court of Marabá and another sentence of 14 years of imprisonment by the Federal Court of Maranhão. The Government adds that, despite the controversy relating to jurisdiction, the Office of the Federal Attorney-General has never stopped bringing charges for these crimes. The Committee notes this information and hopes that the Government will be able to report other criminal convictions in its next report. In view of the number of situations of slave labour identified by the labour inspectorate in recent years and the practice followed by the Office of the Federal Attorney-General of requesting the competent jurisdiction to examine the charges (denunciations) with a view to starting a criminal trial, the Committee trusts that these cases will finally be resolved so that those who have imposed forced labour are convicted and really effective penalties imposed, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. The Committee considers that, in order to reduce the incidence of slave labour, it is indispensable, on the one hand, to undermine the economic interests of those who exploit the labour of others and, on the other hand, to impose the sentences of imprisonment envisaged in section 149 of the Labour Code in view of their dissuasive nature and their symbolic value.

(d). Reintegration of victims. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the workers released following the GEFM’s inspections were entitled to an unemployment benefit in the form of three payments each corresponding to a minimum wage. It notes that the Government refers in its report to a series of measures to facilitate the integration of released workers: (a) the priority inclusion of these workers in the federal programme for the redistribution of income “Bolsa -família”; if they are not eligible, the workers receive the minimum integration income; in 2007, the beneficiaries included 1,453 released workers; (b) inclusion of the workers in the “literate Brazil” programme; (c) the launching in November 2008 in the context of the national employment system of a pilot project for the placement in employment of rural workers in zones particularly affected by slave labour. This project is intended to replace the role of the middlemen (gatos), who are the first link in the chain of slave labour. In the first place, the workers are informed of their rights and conditions of work and are offered training. Secondly, employers are put into contact with workers with various profiles. The project will also enable the Ministry of Labour and Employment to understand the specific characteristics of employment placement for rural workers. The Committee notes these initiatives and requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted for the reintegration of victims and the results achieved. The provision of material and financial support for victims is key in order to prevent them from returning to a situation of vulnerability in which they would once again be exploited for their labour. Please also provide information on the measures adopted to raise the awareness of workers of the risks involved in the regions concerned.

Burundi

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It further notes with regret that the Government has not provided its comments on the observations presented by the Trade Union Confederation of Burundi (COSYBU), which were transmitted to it in September 2008. In its observations the COSYBU underlined that, contrary to what is required by the Convention, community work is decided on without popular consultation. It adds that the persons who participate in this work are confined to their workplace, since the Government prohibits the movement of persons during the performance of this work. The Committee insists all the more that the Government provide its comments on this subject, considering that the question of community development work has been the subject of its comments for a number of years (see below as well as the direct request addressed to the Government).

In the absence of the Government's report, the Committee must repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Compulsory community development work. Compulsory agricultural work. Compulsory labour resulting from a sentence handed down for the offences of begging and vagrancy. For many years, the Committee has drawn the Government's attention to the need to take measures to bring certain provisions of the national legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government in its report that the provisions in question still appear to be in force.

With regard to Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979, which establishes the obligation, under penalty of sanctions (one month of penal labour performed on one half-day a week), to perform community development work, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 organizing municipal administration, provides for voluntary participation in municipal development activities within the framework of national reconstruction. The Committee does not, however, note any provision to this effect in the version of the text annexed to the Government's report. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Legislative Decree of 29 May 1979 has been repealed. The Committee notes, however, that Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 does not expressly repeal the abovementioned Legislative Decree. The Committee would therefore be grateful if the Government would indicate, firstly, whether Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 was amended following its promulgation in the sense indicated by the Government and, secondly, the provisions which expressly repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following matters:

- the need to set out in the legislation the voluntary nature of agricultural work resulting from obligations relating to the conservation and utilization of the land and the obligation to create and maintain minimum areas of food crops (Ordinances Nos 710/275 and 710/276 of 25 October 1979);
- the need to repeal formally certain texts on compulsory cultivation, portage and public works (Decree of 14 July 1952, Ordinance No. 1286 of 10 July 1953, and Decree of 10 May 1957);
- the need to amend sections 340 and 341 of the Penal Code, pursuant to which, in the event of begging or vagrancy, a person may be placed at the disposal of the Government for a period of between one and five years, during which time he may be forced to perform work in a prison institution.

Recalling the Government's statement, according to which the national legislation considered contrary to the Convention and dealing with matters covered by the Ministry responsible for agriculture was to be submitted for repeal at one of the subsequent meetings of the Council of Ministers, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will make every effort to take concrete measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in the very near future.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Cameroon

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2, paragraph 2(c), of the Convention. Hiring of prison labour to private entities. For many years, the Committee has been asking the Government to take the necessary measures to supplement the legislation respecting the prison system (first, Decree No. 73-774 of 11 December 1973, and then Decree No. 92-052 of 27 March 1992) with a provision requiring the formal consent of detainees who are hired to private enterprises and individuals. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government confirming that Order No. 213/A/MINAT/DAPEN of 28 July 1988 was still in force. It noted that this Order establishes a number of conditions respecting the use and rates for the hiring of prison labour, including the cost of the daily allowance for a manual worker and a technician, and the surveillance costs. The Government indicated that no text had yet been adopted issuing regulations under Decree No. 92-052 respecting the prison system and that it would provide an opinion in writing by the Directorate of Prison Affairs at a later date. The Committee notes that the Government's latest report does not refer to such opinion. It notes the commitment expressed by the Government in its report to ensure that the texts giving effect to the Decree respecting the prison system establish the requirement of formal consent of convicts before performing any work for private entities and to inform the Office as soon as they have been adopted. It also notes a communication dated 20 October 2008 from the General Confederation of Labour–Liberty of Cameroon (CGT–Liberté) in which it referred to the evasive nature of the Government's reply concerning the date on which the implementing texts are to be adopted. The CGT–Liberté also regrets the fact that these draft texts have not been submitted to the National Labour Advisory Commission. The Committee further notes the Government's reply, dated 12 February 2009, to this communication. The Government indicates that the text in question was examined with the Ministry for Territorial Administration and Decentralization at the last session of the National Labour Advisory Commission.

The Committee once again recalls that, in a captive environment, it is necessary to obtain the formal consent of prisoners for work in cases where such work is performed for private individuals, enterprises or associations. The Committee further considers that certain factors are required in order to authenticate or confirm the giving of free and informed consent, and that the most reliable indicator of the voluntary nature of labour is that the work is performed under conditions which approximate a free labour relationship. The Committee once again hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures for the adoption in the very near future of texts to give effect to the Decree respecting the prison system, by explicitly setting out the requirement for convicted persons to give their formal consent to any work performed for private individuals, enterprises or associations, and to ensure conditions which approximate a free labour relationship in terms of remuneration and occupational safety and health. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In the comments that it has been making for many years, the Committee has drawn the Government's attention to certain provisions of the Penal Code and of Act No. 90-53 of 19 December 1990 on freedom of association, which provide for sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work in situations covered by these provisions of the Convention.

The Committee noted in its previous comments that the Penal Code, as amended by Act No. 90-61 of 19 December 1990, no longer exempts from the obligation to work persons sentenced to imprisonment for political offences or crimes. Under section 24 of the Penal Code and section 49 of Decree No. 92-052 establishing the prison regime, sentences of imprisonment involve the obligation to work. The Committee emphasized that where an individual is, in any manner whatsoever, compelled to perform prison labour as punishment for expressing certain political views or opposition to the established political, social or economic system, this falls within the scope of the Convention. Penalties of imprisonment that involve compulsory labour are covered by the Convention when imposed as punishment for the expression of views or opposition. To enable the Committee to ascertain that the application of the provisions mentioned below is restricted to activities falling outside the protection of the Convention, it requested the Government to provide all available information on their application in practice, including copies of court decisions handed down under these provisions which define or illustrate their scope. The Committee referred to the following provisions:

- section 113 of the Penal Code, under which the issuing or propagation of false information liable to injure the public authorities or national unity is punishable by a prison term of from three months to three years;
- section 154(2) of the Penal Code, under which incitement, whether in speech or in writings intended for the public, to revolt against the Government and the institutions of the Republic, is punishable by imprisonment of from three months to three years;
- section 157(1)(a) of the Penal Code, under which incitement to obstruction of the execution of any law, regulation or lawfully issued order of the public authority is punishable by imprisonment of from three months to four years;
- section 33(1) and (3) of Act No. 90-53 on freedom of association, which provides for a sentence of imprisonment from three months to one year for board members or founders of an association which continues operations or which is re-established unlawfully after a judgement or decision has been issued for its dissolution, and for persons who have encouraged the assembly of members of the dissolved association by allowing continued use of the association's premises. Section 4 of the Act declares null and void associations founded in support of a cause or in view of a purpose contrary to the Constitution, and associations whose purpose is to undermine, inter alia, security, territorial integrity, national unity, national integration or the republican nature of the State. Furthermore, section 14 provides that the dissolution of an association does not bar any legal proceedings from being instituted against the officials of such an association.

The Committee notes that, in its last report received in September 2008, the Government indicates that it has not been notified of court rulings issued in relation to offences relating to the expression of opinions and adds that these cases are likely to be rare, or non-existent, in view of the multipartite system that has been in force in Cameroon for over 18 years, and the system of trade union pluralism. While taking due note of this information, the Committee emphasizes the need to examine the manner in which the above provisions are applied in practice. In the absence of any information on this subject, the Committee is bound once again to draw the Government's attention to the fact that these provisions may give rise to violations of the Convention if they provide the basis for convictions to sentences of imprisonment as punishment for persons who express a political view or ideological opposition to the established political, social or economic system, without having recourse to or calling for violent methods.

In view of the explanations provided above, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the judicial decisions handed down under the above provisions of the Penal Code and the Act on freedom of association (number of convictions and copies of the court decisions) that illustrate their scope. It once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, the persons protected by the Convention may not be subjected to penalties involving an obligation to work.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report to the effect that, with reference to the disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers, the provisions of the new Merchant Shipping Code of the Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa (CEMAC) apply. It notes that section 554 of the Code, respecting the penalties applicable for faults relating to disciplinary matters, does not provide for sentences of imprisonment, as the penalties incurred for the most serious faults are dismissal and removal from the national seafarers' register. Under the terms of section 607 of the Code, it replaces the Merchant Shipping Code of Custom and Economic Union of Central Africa (UDEAC) of 22 December 1994 and repeals any previous provisions that are contrary to it. The Committee understands that these provisions apply, inter alia, to Ordinance No. 62/DF/30 of 1962, on which it commented previously. The Committee notes that under the new provisions, breaches of labour discipline committed by seafarers are no longer punishable by sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Central African Republic

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of imprisonment involving an obligation to work as a sanction for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social and economic system. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the Convention prohibits to impose sanctions involving an obligation to perform labour, including compulsory prison labour, on persons who, without having recourse to violence, hold or express political views, or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. Considering that section 62 of Order No. 2772, of 18 August 1955, regulating the functioning of penal institutions and the work of detainees, provides for the obligation to work in prison, prison sentences imposed on persons who express certain political opinions or their opposition to the established system will have an impact on the application of the Convention.

In this context, the Committee has been drawing for many years the Government's attention to the need to amend or repeal the provisions of Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 (dissemination of prohibited publications liable to prejudice the development of the Central African nation) and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969 (dissemination of periodicals or news of foreign origin not approved by the censorship authority), which provide for sentences of imprisonment that involve compulsory labour. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee on the Application of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights by Central African Republic, Order No. 05.002 of 22 February 2005, promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act, is likely to decriminalize press offences. The Committee notes that the "Committee nevertheless observes with concern that many journalists have been subjected to pressure, intimidation or acts of aggression, and even imprisonment" (Document CCPR/C/CAF/CO/2 of 27 July 2006). The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 05.002 promulgating the Freedom of the Press and Communication (Organization) Act and to indicate whether this new legislation has repealed Act No. 60/169 of 12 December 1960 and Order No. 3-MI of 25 April 1969. If not, please indicate the progress made in the process of repealing of these texts, to which the Government has been referring for a long time. Finally, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the legal provisions under which journalists have been imprisoned and the charges.

2. In order to ascertain that no sentences involving the obligation to work are imposed on persons who, without having recourse to violence, express political opinions or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system, the Committee needs to be able to assess the scope of the provisions mentioned below and to this end it would be grateful if the Government would provide copies of any court decisions handed down under these provisions.

- (i) Section 77 of the Penal Code (dissemination of propaganda for certain purposes; acts jeopardizing public safety, etc.) and sections 130–135 and 137–139 of the Penal Code (offences against persons occupying various public offices), which provide for prison sentences involving the obligation to work.
- (ii) Section 3 of Act No. 61/233 governing associations in the Central African Republic read in conjunction with section 12. Under section 12, the "founders, directors, administrators or members of any association that is unlawfully maintained or reconstituted after the act of dissolution" shall be liable to imprisonment. Under section 3 of this Act, any association which is "of such a nature as to give rise to political disturbances or cast discredit on political institutions and their functioning" shall be null and void.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Chad

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It observes that the Government, referring to the technical assistance received by Government officials and representatives of workers' and employers' organizations, hopes that it will be able to overcome the difficulties previously encountered in the submission of reports. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to benefit from this assistance and that its next report will contain answers to the following points raised in the Committee's previous observation:

Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Work in the general interest imposed in the context of compulsory military service. The Committee notes Ordinance No. 001/PCE/CEDNACVG/91 organizing the armed forces, that according to military service is compulsory for every citizen of Chad. Under section 14 of the Ordinance, conscripts who are fit for service are classified into two categories: the first, the size of which is determined each year by decree, is incorporated and compelled to perform active service; the second remains at the disposal of the military authorities for two years and may be called up to perform work in the general interest by order of the Government. The Committee notes that similar provisions were contained in Ordinance No. 2 of 1961 on the organization and recruitment of the armed forces of the Republic, on which it commented for many years. Indeed, such provisions are not compatible with Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention, under which, to be excluded from the scope of the Convention, any work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws must be of a purely military character. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of section 14 of the Ordinance of 1991 reorganizing the armed forces and, as appropriate, any decrees issued thereunder, into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2, paragraph 2(c). For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 authorizing the Government to take administrative measures for the relocation, internment or expulsion of persons whose activities constitute a danger for public order and security, under which persons convicted of penal offences involving prohibition of residence may be used for work in the public interest for a period, the duration of which is to be determined by order of the Prime Minister. This provision would allow the administrative authorities to impose work on persons subject to a prohibition of residence once they have completed their sentence. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures without further delay to amend or repeal section 2 of Act No. 14 of 13 November 1959 referred to above.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee recalls that, in its previous comments, it drew attention to the need to amend or repeal a number of texts that were inconsistent with the Convention – some of which were fairly old and were deemed by the Government to be obsolete. The Committee reminds the Government that it may call on the Office for technical assistance, and trusts that in its next report the Government will be in a position to inform that specific measures have been taken in response to the comments the Committee has been making for many years.

Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. 1. Work exacted under compulsory military service laws. The Committee has on several occasions stressed the need to amend Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 establishing compulsory military service. According to section 1 of the Act, national service is instituted for the purpose of enabling every citizen to participate in the defence and construction of the nation and has two components: military service and civic service. The Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that work exacted from recruits as part of compulsory national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature and is therefore contrary to Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention. Noting the Government's earlier statement that the practice of imposing on recruits work which is not purely military in nature has fallen into disuse and that it intended to repeal Act No. 16 of 1981 on compulsory national service, the Committee trusts that the necessary steps will be taken very shortly to amend or repeal this Act so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. The Committee observes that the Government has never provided information on the practical effect given to Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth under which the party and mass organizations were gradually to create all the conditions for the formation of youth brigades and the organization of youth workshops (type of tasks performed, number of persons involved, duration and conditions of their participation, etc.). However, the Government did indicate earlier that since 1991 such practices had fallen into disuse. The Committee points out that this Act has never been formally repealed and asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to repeal it.

Article 2, paragraph 2(d). Requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than emergencies. In the comments it has been making for very many years, the Committee has pointed out that Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 is inconsistent with the Convention in that it allows the requisitioning of persons to perform community work in instances other than the emergencies provided for under Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, and provides that persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to a penalty of imprisonment of from one month to one year. The Committee notes the Government's earlier statement that this Act has fallen into disuse, and once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to have it repealed formally so as to avoid any uncertainty in law.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. 1. Work exacted for national development purposes. For several years the Committee has been requesting the Government to repeal Act No. 76-011 of 21 May 1976 concerning national development efforts and its Implementing Order No. 00748/BCE/AGRI/76 of 11 June 1976 concerning the performance of civic tasks in the context of the national food production programme. These legal texts, which aim to increase productivity in all sectors of national life, are contrary to the Convention inasmuch as they require, on pain of penal sanctions, every able-bodied adult person who is not already considered to be making his contribution by reason of his employment to carry out agricultural and other development work as decided by the Government. The legal texts also deem certain persons to be making their contribution, namely political representatives, wage earners and apprentices, public servants, tradesmen, members of the liberal professions, the clergy, students and pupils. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government reiterates its previous declarations to the effect that these texts have lapsed and therefore, in effect, have been repealed. The Committee stresses the importance of formally repealing texts which are contrary to the Convention, out of a concern for legal finality. It again expresses the hope that the Government will soon be in a position to communicate information on the measures taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned texts so as to ensure their conformity with the Convention in fact as well as in law.

2. Work exacted as a means of levying taxes. In its previous comments the Committee drew the Government's attention to sections 18 to 21 of Legislative Ordinance No. 71/087 of 14 September 1971 on minimum personal contributions, which provide for imprisonment involving compulsory labour, upon decision of the chief of the local community or the area commissioner, of taxpayers who have defaulted on their minimum personal contributions. The Committee notes that, contrary to the information provided in its previous reports, according to which draft amendments to the provisions in question were under consideration, the Government, in its latest report, indicates that these provisions have lapsed and have therefore been effectively repealed. Recalling that this matter has been the subject of its comments for many years, the Committee again expresses the firm hope that the Government will shortly adopt the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of the legislation with the Convention.

Article 2, paragraph 2(c). Work exacted from detainees in preventive detention. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts, which allows work to be exacted from detainees who have not been convicted. The Government stated that, under section 64.3 of the Ordinance of 1965 governing prison labour, detainees who have not been convicted are not subject to the obligation to work. The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government again indicates that Ordinance No. 15/APAJ has lapsed and therefore has, in effect, been repealed. It again expresses the hope that the next time the legislation in this field is revised, the Government will adopt the necessary measures to repeal formally Ordinance No. 15/APAJ, so as to avoid any legal ambiguity.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee stressed the need to include a provision in national legislation establishing penal sanctions for persons who unlawfully exact forced or compulsory labour, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. It noted that, under section 323 of the Labour Code adopted in 2002, any infringement of section 2.3, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, shall be punished by a maximum of six months' penal servitude plus a fine or by only one of these penalties, without prejudice to criminal legislation laying down more severe penalties. In this regard, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would indicate the penal provisions which prohibit and sanction recourse to forced labour. Since the Government has not replied to its previous observation on this matter, the Committee would be grateful if it would provide the requested information in its next report. Furthermore, it once again requests the Government to send an updated copy of the Penal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominica

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), and 2 (paragraphs 1, 2(a) and (d)), of the Convention. National service obligations. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to repeal or amend the National Service Act, 1977, under which persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are required to perform service with the national service, including participation in development and self-help projects concerning housing, school, construction, agriculture and road building, failure to do so being punishable with a fine and imprisonment (section 35(2)). The Committee observed that, contrary to the Government's repeated statement that the national service was created to respond to national disasters, the Act contained no reference to natural disasters, but specified the objectives of the national service, which "shall be to mobilize the energies of the people of Dominica to the fullest possible level of efficiency, to shape and direct those energies to promoting the growth and economic development of the State". The Committee also referred to Article 1(b) of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), likewise ratified by Dominica, which specifically prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour "as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development".

While noting the Government's previous indication that the National Service Act, 1977, has been omitted from the Revised Laws of Dominica, 1990, as well as the Government's repeated indications in its previous reports that section 35(2) of the Act has not been applied in practice, the Committee expresses firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal the above Act so as to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Ecuador

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Imprisonment involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In the comments that the Committee has been making for many years, it has urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that Article 1(d), of the Convention is applied.

(a). Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967. The Committee has previously referred to Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967 which allows a prison sentence of two to five years to be imposed on any person fomenting or taking a leading part in a collective work stoppage. The penalty laid down in the Decree for anyone who participates in such a stoppage without fomenting or taking a leading part in it is correctional imprisonment of three months to one year. For the purposes of this provision, “there is a work stoppage when there is a collective stoppage of work or the imposition of a lockout except in the cases permitted by law, the paralysing of the means of communication and similar antisocial acts”. Prison sentences involve compulsory labour under sections 55 and 66 of the Penal Code. The Committee has repeatedly insisted that, in accordance with the Convention, prison sentences involving compulsory labour should not be imposed for participation in peaceful strikes.

The Government has repeatedly indicated that it is making every effort to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention and that, to this end, it has taken measures for the Congress of the Republic to amend the provisions contained in Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967. It indicated previously that, to this end, the Committee’s observation had been submitted to the relevant commissions of the National Congress. The Committee noted this information and expressed the hope that Decree No. 105 would be repealed without delay.

The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government indicates that Decree No. 105 of 1967 is not in force but does not mention its repeal. The Committee notes with regret that it has been commenting for many years on the repeal of Decree No. 105 and that its repeal is also requested in its observations concerning the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Noting the most recent information provided by the Government, according to which Decree No. 105 is not in force, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide a copy of the text repealing that Decree and, in the event that the Decree concerned has not been formally repealed, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to repeal it, thereby bringing the national legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

(b). Article 326(15) of the 2008 Constitution. The Committee notes that the new Constitution promulgated in September 2008 entered into force on 20 October 2008. The Committee notes that article 326(15) of the Constitution prohibits the stoppage of public services which are not essential services in the strict sense of the term, such as education, transport, processing, public transport and the postal services, and notes with regret that the Committee has been commenting on this prohibition in relation to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the penalties applicable in the case of a stoppage in public services are those set out in the Penal Code.

Noting with regret that the new Constitution prohibits strikes in services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term and that such interruption may be punished as a penal offence, the Committee hopes that the Government will review this situation in the light of Convention No. 87 and Convention No. 105 which protects against prison sentences involving compulsory labour as a punishment for participation in peaceful strikes, and that it will provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure compliance with the Convention.

Article 1(c). Sentence of imprisonment imposed as a means of labour discipline. Under the terms of section 165 of the Maritime Police Code, crew members are prohibited from disembarking in a port other than the port of embarkation, except with the agreement of the ship’s master. Section 165 further provides that crew members who desert shall forfeit their pay and belongings to the vessel and, if recaptured, shall pay the cost of arrest and be punished in accordance with the naval regulations in force.

The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication in its reports that it was making every effort to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. In its latest report, the Government merely indicates that the Committee’s observation has been forwarded to the Directorate of the Merchant Navy.

Given that the Committee has been commenting on this matter for many years, it hopes that the Government will be able to provide information without delay on the amendment or repeal of section 165 of the Maritime Police Code.

Article 1(a). Imprisonment involving compulsory labour for offences related to freedom of expression and expression of political views. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the application of the following sections of the Penal Code: 230 and 231 (disrespect or insult towards public officials); 130, 133, 134, 148, 153 and 155 (internal security of the State), in order to ascertain the scope of these provisions in relation to Article 1(a), of the Convention. The Committee recalled the implications for the application of the Convention of provisions that restrict the right to express peacefully a political opinion that is contrary to the established political system and requested the Government to provide information on the application of the above provisions of the Penal Code, including the number of sentences handed down, with copies of them, so that the Committee could assess their scope. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide the information requested and will indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that prison sentences involving compulsory labour are not imposed for the peaceful expression of political views.

Gabon

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Imposition of a sentence of imprisonment involving the obligation to work as a means of labour discipline. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Code (Act No. 10/63 of 12 January 1963), under which breaches of discipline were punishable by imprisonment even where they did not endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. In its last report, the Government indicates that the Community Merchant Shipping Code, adopted by the Economic and Monetary Community of Central African States (CEMAC) and in force in Gabon, repeals all national and community provisions that are inconsistent, thereby cancelling the provisions of the 1963 Merchant Shipping Code of Gabon. The Committee takes note of this information and notes with satisfaction that under the Community Merchant Shipping Code, breaches of discipline are not punishable by imprisonment.

Ghana

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. In comments made for a considerable number of years, the Committee has referred to provisions of the Criminal Code, the Newspaper Licensing Decree, 1973, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1963, the Protection of Property (Trade Disputes) Ordinance and the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, under which imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed as a punishment for non-observance of restrictions imposed by discretionary decision of the executive on the publication of newspapers and the carrying on of associations, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes. Having requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures in regard to these provisions to ensure that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) might be exacted in circumstances falling within Article 1(a), (c) or (d) of the Convention, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the National Advisory Committee on Labour was discussing the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it was the wish of the Government to bring the legislation concerned into conformity with the Convention. The Government also indicated in its report received in 1996 that the National Advisory Committee on Labour concluded discussions on the Committee of Experts' comments and submitted recommendations to the Minister in March 1994 designed to bring domestic legislation into conformity with ILO standards, and the comments of the Committee of Experts had been submitted to the Attorney-General for a closer study and expert comments.

In its reports received in 1999 and 2001, the Government has indicated that the action of the Attorney-General to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Labour has been halted in view of the proposed review and codification of the labour laws. It has also indicated that the tripartite National Forum that includes representatives of the Attorney-General's Office, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and the employers' and workers' organizations, would consider the comments made by the Committee of Experts regarding the application of the Convention.

The Government indicates in its latest report that the National Forum has already codified all the country's labour laws into a single labour bill, which is being considered by the Cabinet and will be forwarded to Parliament to be passed into law. The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary action will at last be taken on the various points which are once again recalled in detail in a request addressed directly to the Government.

2. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Political Parties Law, 1992, the Emergency Powers Act, 1994, and the Public Order Act, 1994, which gave rise to a number of questions under the Convention that are also reiterated in the request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Greece

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1952)

Article 2, paragraph 2(d), of the Convention. Recourse to compulsory labour under emergency powers. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that, following the amendment introduced by Act No. 3536/2007 concerning "Special Regulations of Migration Policy Issues and other issues under the competence of the Ministry of the Interior, Public Administration and Decentralization" (section 41(7)), Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 on “civil emergency planning”, under which the full or partial mobilization of civilians may be proclaimed, shall be applicable only in times of war. As regards requisition in times of peace, the Committee noted previously that, under section 41 of the new Act, the requisition of personal services is possible only in case of emergency, i.e. in a “sudden situation requiring the taking of immediate measures to face the country’s defensive needs or a social emergency against any type of imminent natural disaster or emergency that might endanger the public health”.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. 1. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 239 of the Code of Public Maritime Law, 1973, as amended by Act No. 2987 of 2002, which provides that the sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) laid down in sections 205, 207(1) and 222 of the Code of Public Maritime Law and in section 4(1) of Act No. 3276 of 26 June 1944 respecting collective agreements shall be imposed in the following situations:

- (a) where the safety of the vessel, the persons on board or other persons, the cargo or property are endangered;
- (b) where pollution or other damage to the maritime environment is caused; or
- (c) where order is disturbed or public health is endangered.

The Committee recalled that Article 1(c) expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. The Committee pointed out, referring also to the explanations in paragraphs 179–181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that only acts which endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are excluded from the scope of the Convention. The Committee observed that the situations where “order is disturbed” or where “pollution or other damage to the maritime environment is caused” or “the cargo or property are endangered” do not seem to satisfy these criteria. It also pointed out that endangering cargo or other assets may be punishable by sanctions involving compulsory labour only in cases of wilful acts (which would amount to criminal offences), and not where they are caused by negligence.

The Committee has noted the Government’s repeated statement in its reports that the protection of the cargo or property or of the maritime environment and the avoidance of disturbance of order constitute elements of major importance for sea transport. In its latest report, the Government stresses once again the significance of these elements, which has been recognized by the international maritime community and for the safeguarding of which special international maritime instruments have been developed. The Government also reiterates its view that the imposition of sanctions cannot be associated with forced labour, since all cases of fraud or negligence are investigated by competent courts, which decide whether to impose a sanction or not. The Government considers that the existence of the contested provisions is necessary due to failure of ensuring in advance that any “risk against safety of a cargo or property” or “pollution or other damage to the maritime environment” or “disturbance of order” shall not endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of individuals.

The Committee has duly noted the Government’s views on this matter expressed in its reports. The Committee is fully aware of the importance for sea transport of the factors referred to above, but wishes to draw the Government’s attention once again to the fact that neither “pollution of the maritime environment”, nor “endangering cargo or other assets” do not necessarily jeopardize the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons, which follows also from the wording of section 239 of the Code of Public Maritime Law, which makes a clear distinction between these two situations and a situation where the safety of the vessel, the persons on board or other persons are endangered. As regards the expression “order is disturbed”, it seems broad enough to cover various kinds of situations, including those which do not necessarily endanger the ship or the life or health of persons. On the other hand, it seems clear that the offences connected with the disturbance of order, pollution of the maritime environment and endangering cargo or other assets may be made punishable by other kinds of sanctions (e.g. not involving compulsory labour), which lay outside the scope of the Convention.

As regards the Government’s repeated statement that the imposition of sanctions by the court cannot be associated with forced labour, the Committee points out once again, referring also to the explanations in paragraphs 144 to 146 of its 2007 General Survey, that labour imposed on persons as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law, in most cases, has no relevance to the application of the Convention. However, it is covered by the Convention in so far as it is exacted in the five cases specified in Article 1 of the Convention, including punishment for breaches of labour discipline or participation in strikes.

The Committee therefore trusts that, in the light of the above considerations, the Government will reconsider its position and will take the necessary measures with a view to bringing legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point, e.g. by clearly limiting the application of sanctions involving compulsory labour to the situations where the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons are endangered. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

2. The Committee previously referred to section 213(1) and (2) of the Code of Public Maritime Law, 1973, under which collective insubordination by seafarers to a ship’s master, even in the absence of acts of violence or acts endangering the vessel or the life or health of persons, is punishable by deprivation of liberty (which involves compulsory labour). The Committee noted the Government’s indication in its previous report that the above section provides for the imposition of penal sanctions on seafarers only in case of mutiny against the master. The Government reiterates in its latest report that such a mutiny may endanger the safety of the vessel, as well as the persons on board, not only when the vessel is in the open sea, but also when it is in the port.

The Committee has duly noted this indication, but recalls again that the prohibition established by the Convention from imposing sanctions involving compulsory labour in the event of the violation of labour discipline covers the punishment of acts of disobedience (including collective disobedience, which may be also connected with strikes) in relation to the master of the vessel, except for cases of acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons (e.g. acts of violence). The Committee previously observed in this connection that offences punishable under section 213(1) and (2) do not necessarily jeopardize the safety of the vessel in certain cases (e.g. when the ship is not at sea, but securely moored in a safe berth) and may be made punishable by other kinds of sanctions (e.g. not involving compulsory labour).

The Committee therefore trusts that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the Code of Public Maritime Law, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by clearly restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered.

3. In its earlier comments concerning section 15 of Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 on the settlement of collective disputes in the merchant marine, which relates to violations of executory decisions concerning pay punishable with sanctions of imprisonment (which involves compulsory labour), the Committee expressed the hope that, in the context of modernization of the legislative framework in the area of seafarers' freedom of association, this provision would be repealed or amended, so that no penalties involving compulsory labour could be imposed as a means of labour discipline. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 should not be considered to be in force, as a consequence of the adoption of Act No. 3276 of 26 June 1944, which provides in section 1(2) that collective labour agreements determine, inter alia, the manner in which disputes among the crew members, the master and the shipowner are settled through arbitration committees. The Government states in its latest report that the consultation with the social partners constitutes a standards policy, especially in shipping, and refers in this context to joint committees considering various issues, such as the Merchant Marine Council, the Administrative Board of Maritime Employment Agency and the Administrative Boards of social insurance bodies of seafarers, in which representatives of the social partners participate.

While having noted this indication, the Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or envisaged to formally repeal Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 referred to above, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Article 1(a). Punishment for expressing political views. For many years, the Committee has been making comments calling for the repeal of Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970, which contains provisions allowing the imposition of restrictions on freedom of assembly and expression, in private as well as in public, and give the police discretionary powers to forbid or disperse meetings, such restrictions being enforceable with sanctions of deprivation of liberty. The Committee noted that under sections 40 and 41 of the Penitentiary Code (Act No. 2776 of 1999) persons sentenced to imprisonment have an obligation to work. The Committee also noted that sections 131 and 132 of Presidential Decree No. 141/91 relating to assemblies and meetings give the police discretionary powers allowing it to prohibit and disperse meetings and assemblies, in accordance with the Regulations relating to the dispersion of public assemblies approved by Royal Decree No. 269 of 15/29.94.1979 (O.G.59A). Paragraph 1(a) of these Regulations refers to the sanctions provided for in the above Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that the provisions of Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970 are opposed to articles 9 and 11 of the Constitution and consequently do not apply in practice. In its latest report, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Interior, on its own initiative and in cooperation with the competent bodies, intends to proceed to the amendment or repeal of the said Legislative Decree.

While noting these indications with interest, the Committee takes note of the Government's commitment to formally repeal or amend Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970 in the near future, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Guatemala

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1989)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Obligation to work overtime under threat of a penalty. The Committee notes the comments made by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala, dated August 2008, containing information on the obligation to work overtime under the threat of a penalty in certain cases raised in its previous observations, as well as new allegations on the same subject in cases in the Office of the Attorney-General, the Directorate of Criminal Investigations and the National Forensic Science Institute (INACIF).

In its previous observation, the Committee indicated that, for the purposes of the Convention, the expression "forced or compulsory labour" means all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered her or himself voluntarily. The Committee observed, in relation to the allegations made previously by the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA), that in certain cases refusal by workers in the public sector to work hours in excess of the normal working day can result in the loss of their job and that in the private sector there are cases of enterprises which set production targets for workers who have to work in excess of the ordinary hours of the working day in order to earn a survival wage. The Committee observed that in both cases the common denominator is the imposition of work or a service and the worker has the possibility to “free her or himself” from such imposition only by leaving the job or accepting dismissal as a sanction for refusing to perform such work. In theory, workers have the choice of not working beyond normal working hours, but their choice is not real in practice in view of their need to earn at least the minimal wage and to retain their employment, or for both reasons. The Committee considered that in such cases the work or service is imposed under the menace of a penalty. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure compliance with the Convention in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government’s report in reply to the various questions raised and the Committee’s requests, which are addressed below.

1. Public sector: Justices of the peace – judicial bodies; national civil police; municipal water company (EMPAGUA) – municipality of the capital City of Guatemala.

(a). Justices of the peace. According to UNSITRAGUA, “in most of the towns of the country, there is only one justice of the peace who has to be on duty 24 hours a day, every day of the year. The auxiliary staff of justices of the peace have to cover shifts by rotation as additional work supplementing their ordinary day. The shifts worked on public holidays, Saturdays and Sundays are compensated with time off, but the shifts worked after the completion of the ordinary working day are not compensated in time off, nor are they paid. Failure to perform such shifts constitutes an offence liable to be punished by dismissal”.

The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the case, cited by UNSITRAGUA by way of illustration, of a worker dismissed for refusing to work 24 hours continuously (ruling No. 25-04, which found against the Supreme Court of Justice). The Committee also requested information on the other case cited by UNSITRAGUA (ruling identified as No. 566-2003, which found against the Ministry of Public Health and Social Assistance). In this latter case, the worker was dismissed for failure to turn up on three complete working days in the same month. The Fifth Chamber of the Labour and Social Insurance Court found that the worker had incurred dismissal “by failing to turn up for work on 23 September 2001 when he was due to work 24 hours in the day consecutively, with such failure being equivalent to three full working days”. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that both cases were awaiting a final ruling. The Committee requested the Government to provide copies of the rulings when they have been issued.

The Government indicates that it has requested the relevant information from the Supreme Court of Justice and will send it in due time. However, the Committee notes the information provided by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala according to which, in the case of ruling No. 25-04, the Constitutional Court set aside the claim for the reinstatement of the worker and for payment of the overtime hours worked.

The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the requirement is not imposed to perform work in excess of the limits imposed by the legislation, with refusal being punished by the loss of employment. Such conditions constitute forced labour under the terms of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the progress achieved in ensuring compliance with the Convention.

(b). Employees of EMPAGUA. According to UNSITRAGUA, employees of EMPAGUA have to work for 24 consecutive hours, followed by 48 hours rest, with this work arrangement avoiding the payment of hours worked in excess of the normal working hours. Refusal to work under these conditions may give rise to dismissal and penal prosecution in view of the status of these workers as public employees. The Committee noted the comments made by the Union of Operators of Plants and Wells, Guardians of the Municipal Water Company and Allied Workers (SITOPGEMA) and requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in this respect.

The Government indicates that in June 2008 an arbitration award was handed down by the Sixth Labour and Social Insurance Court establishing a working week of 48 hours and that overtime hours shall be paid in accordance with the law. The Government adds that EMPAGUA has been warned that “working days may not exceed 12 hours in the day”.

In relation to this case, the Committee notes the information provided by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala according to which the demand made by 103 EMPAGUA employees for failure to pay overtime hours was set aside in a ruling issued on 16 April 2008 by the Fifth Labour Court, and that an appeal was lodged against this ruling with the Third Chamber of the Labour and Social Appeal Court, under case No. J-371-2008.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on developments relating to the case that is before the Court of Appeal and on the application of the working conditions envisaged in the arbitration award so that the performance may not be required of overtime hours under the threat of dismissal or penal persecution.

(c). Office of the Attorney-General, Directorate of Criminal Investigations and National Forensic Science Institute (INACIF).

The Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement referred in its comments to cases of the imposition of shifts of 32 continuous hours of work. Furthermore, according to the organization, in view of the volume of work, workers are required to work during rest days to be able to meet requirements to hand in reports. The workers are placed under pressure through the threat of dismissal in order to work shifts and complete tasks that it would be impossible to carry out within normal working hours. The Government has not replied to these new allegations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to protect this category of workers against the imposition of compulsory work outside normal working hours.

2. Private sector: Plantations. In its previous observations, the Committee noted UNSITRAGUA's comments relating to cases of enterprises which set production targets for workers who, to earn a minimum wage, have to work in excess of the ordinary hours of the working day, with the additional hours being unpaid.

In its report, the Government indicates that the objective of fixing the minimum wage on the basis of productivity is to give enterprises an incentive to pay more than the minimum wage. It adds that in banana plantations as a result the minimum wage is broadly exceeded and that the General Labour Inspectorate has intervened in banana ranches in cases denounced by the workers.

The Committee notes the statistics on the denunciations made to the labour inspectorate concerning the payment of the minimum wage. The Committee observes that all of the 11 denunciations made in 2007 were set aside. It further notes the effect that can be produced in terms of the application of the Convention by the relationship between the extension and duration of the working day, the payment of the minimum wage based on productivity and the threat of dismissal. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the outcome of the denunciations made in 2008 (which were under examination when the report was sent) and that the Government will continue to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure that in the plantations sector work is not imposed in excess of normal working hours under the threat of dismissal.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1959)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour imposed for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that some provisions of the Penal Code that may affect the application of the Convention, particularly Article 1(a), (c) and (d), are still in force but are not applied. The provisions in question are the following sections of the Penal Code: "Any person who seeks to organize or operate, or who participates in, associations which act in collaboration with, or in obedience to, international bodies that promote the communist ideology or advocate any other totalitarian system, or associations whose purposes offend against the law, shall be punished with imprisonment of from two to six years" (section 396); "Any public servant or employee who fails or refuses to carry out, or delays carrying out, any duty pertaining to his position or office, shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to three years" (section 419); "Anyone committing an act intended to paralyze or disrupt an enterprise that contributes to the economic development of the country shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to five years" (section 390(2)); and "Public servants, public employees and other employees or members of the staff of public service enterprises who collectively abandon their jobs, work or service, shall be punished with imprisonment of from six months to two years. The penalty shall be doubled where such stoppage harms the public interest, and in the case of leaders, promoters or organizers of a collective stoppage" (section 430). The Committee also noted that under section 47 of the Penal Code labour is compulsory for prisoners.

The Committee has pointed out repeatedly that, in breach of the Convention, these provisions allow the imposition of prison sentences involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of certain political opinions, as a means of labour discipline or for participation in a strike, and it requested the Government to repeal them. In its report, the Government indicates that, according to the opinion issued by the Technical and Legal Advisory Council of the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, sections 396, 419, 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code can be applied without involving the violation of any ILO Convention, and furthermore prison labour is voluntary and there is no initiative to amend the above provisions of the Penal Code. Nevertheless, the Government indicates that, irrespective of these considerations, this subject will be placed on the agenda of the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the outcome of this issue in the Tripartite Commission on International Labour Affairs and that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend the provisions referred to above. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the above provisions of the Penal Code, including copies of any rulings handed down under these provisions.

With reference to the participation in strikes of public employees and in public services that are declared essential, the Committee refers to its comments on the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), in which it has also called for these provisions to be repealed.

Guyana

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to observations concerning the application of the Convention by Guyana received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2003 and forwarded to the Government on 13 January 2004, which contained allegations that there was evidence of trafficking for forced prostitution and reports of child prostitution in cities and remote gold mining areas.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, 2005, as well as the Government's indication in the report that 300 volunteers have been trained to identify cases of trafficking. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the following matters:

- the activities of the task force to develop and implement a national plan for the prevention of trafficking in persons, to which reference is made in section 30 of the above Act, supplying copies of any relevant reports, studies and inquiries, as well as a copy of the National Plan;
- statistical data on trafficking which is collected and published by the Ministry of Home Affairs in virtue of section 31 of the Act;
- any legal proceedings which have been instituted as a consequence of the application of section 3(1) of the 2005 Act on penalties, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as well as the information on measures taken to ensure that this provision is strictly enforced against perpetrators, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Haiti

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1958)

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Exploitation of children employed as domestic servants known as “restaveks” in conditions of forced labour. For many years, the Committee has been commenting on the situation of hundreds of thousands of child domestic workers (300,000 according to the estimates provided in 2002 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)), who are known in Creole as “restaveks”, who are often exploited in conditions of forced labour within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee's comments are based on concordant information originating from various sources, which has been confirmed by the Government in its reports. These sources include a report of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, communications received from the ICFTU and the Coordination Syndicale Haïtienne (CSH), as well as the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child concerning Haiti. According to this information, “restaveks” who are from poor families, are placed with families that are generally more affluent to work as domestic servants, in theory in exchange for room and board, and education. In reality, many of these children, some of whom are only 4 or 5 years old, are victims of exploitation, forced to work long hours without remuneration, discriminated against and subjected to all forms of bullying, poorly housed, poorly fed, and often victims of physical, psychological and sexual violence. Very few of them receive any schooling (according to the ICFTU, only 20 per cent of “restaveks” go to school and less than 1 per cent reach secondary school level).

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Government reaffirmed its commitment to protect vulnerable children, in particular those working as domestic servants. It also noted the action undertaken by the Government, such as the validation of a national protection plan in October 2006, the implementation of training activities for officials of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour and the development of the “Education for All” programme which aims to ensure the school attendance of vulnerable children. Furthermore, the Committee noted the repeal of Chapter IX of Title V of the Labour Code on children in service by the Act on the Prohibition and Elimination of All Forms of Abuse, Violence, Ill-treatment or Inhuman Treatment Against Children of 2003. It noted that this Act prohibits the exploitation of children, including servitude, forced or compulsory labour, forced services, as well as work which by its very nature or because of the conditions in which it is carried out is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of the child. The Committee noted that the repealed provisions include those of section 341 of the Labour Code, which allowed a child from the age of 12 onwards to be entrusted to a family for the purposes of carrying out domestic work. The Act has also repealed the provisions relating to the host family's obligation to obtain a permit and comply with the conditions required by the Social Welfare and Research Institute (IBESR).

With regard to the provisions of the Act of 2003, the Committee noted that under section 4 of the Act, any report of an abused or ill-treated child shall be addressed to the Ministry of Social Affairs which may refer the matter to the competent judicial authority. Noting that the Act of 2003 did not provide for penalties against persons responsible for the abuse, violence or ill-treatment that it prohibits, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to ensure that penalties are imposed in the case of exploitation of children working in domestic services. It recalled that under Article 25 of the Convention, the penalties imposed for the illegal exaction of forced labour shall be really adequate and strictly enforced.

The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government indicates that the national protection plan, which the Committee understood had been adopted in 2006, is still awaiting validation by the Council of Ministers. According to the Government, this national protection plan for children in vulnerable situations, once validated, will bind the State and serve as a basis for drawing up a national policy on children.

The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government concerning the reintegration programmes for child “restaveks” established by the IBESR in conjunction with various international and non-governmental organizations. The Committee notes that these programmes favour reintegration into the family environment in order to promote the psychological and social development of the children concerned. The Committee also notes the information concerning the measures taken to ensure that children placed in host families are properly monitored. The Government refers to a university training course designed to enable young graduates to help children who have been victims of abuse. Social workers have also been recruited to intervene directly to assist children placed with host families and establish a system of regular monitoring.

With regard to the steps taken to ensure that penalties are imposed in the event of the exploitation of child domestic workers, the Committee notes that the Government merely indicates that the IBESR is constantly working to admonish all persons accused of abusing children. Furthermore, the Government indicates that crackdowns have been carried out by the Youth Protection Unit with a view to apprehending persons who have been reported for exploiting child domestic workers and subjecting them to ill-treatment. According to the Government’s report, the children concerned have been returned to their families, who have in turn benefited from assistance from the IBESR and from various associations.

The Committee once again reiterates its concern at the exploitative conditions of which children employed as domestic servants within the framework of a relationship of total dependency are victims. Taking into account the conditions in which such work may be carried out, their young age and the fact that it is impossible to leave their work and the family in which they have been placed, the Committee once again draws the Government’s attention to the fact that this work comes under the definition of forced labour given in the Convention. The Committee considers that, in view of the extent and gravity of the situation, the prohibition of the exploitation of children, established by the Act of 2003, should be accompanied by adequate penalties that are strictly enforced. In these circumstances, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps as a matter of urgency so that the prohibition of the exploitation of child domestic workers, which often amounts in reality to forced labour within the meaning of the Convention, is accompanied by adequate penalties, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the steps taken to combat the exploitation of which many child domestic workers are victims, as well as on the national plan on the protection of children in vulnerable situations, which is awaiting validation by the Council of Ministers. Please provide a copy of the plan as soon as it has been adopted. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information concerning the steps taken or envisaged to protect, assist and reintegrate children who have been the victim of exploitation.

Furthermore, given that the Government has not provided information on the following points raised in its last observation, the Committee requests it to provide the following information in its next report:

- measures taken to assess the extent and characteristics of the phenomenon (indicating the estimated number of child domestic workers placed in host families and their ages);
- measures taken to ensure that, in practice, host families do not exploit the children entrusted to them (besides visits from social workers and denunciations); and
- measures taken to ensure that penalties are imposed in the event of the exploitation of child domestic workers. The Committee would like the Government to specify the extent to which the violations observed result in an investigation being carried out and whether the persons suspected of these violations are brought before the competent judicial authority as required under section 4 of the Act of 2003. If applicable, the Committee would like the Government to provide information on the penalties imposed and the provisions of the criminal legislation on which these penalties are based.

Trafficking in persons, including children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Act of 2003 on the Prohibition and Elimination of All Forms of Abuse, Violence, Ill-treatment or Inhuman Treatment Against Children refers, among other examples of ill-treatment, the inhuman treatment or exploitation, sale and trafficking of children and the offering, recruitment, transfer, harbouring, receipt or use of children for the purposes of sexual exploitation, prostitution or pornography. It noted that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child had expressed deep concern at the high incidence of trafficking in children from Haiti to the Dominican Republic. The UN Committee noted that these children, once separated from their families, are forced to beg or work in the Dominican Republic (see document CRC/C/15/Add.202, 18 March 2003, concluding observations, paragraph 60). The Committee requested the Government to provide information on this phenomenon and on the steps taken to combat it. The Committee also noted the report by the Research Mission of the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States (OAS) on the situation regarding the trafficking in persons in Haiti, dated September 2006, which emphasized a trend towards the systematic organization of trafficking in persons in Haiti, which can be explained by the deterioration of the socioeconomic and political situation in the country over recent years which precludes an effective response to the basic needs of the population and paves the way for an increase in all forms of human exploitation and unlawful economic activity.

In its latest report, the Government mentions the implementation of a plan which includes increasing the number of police officers at the border with the Dominican Republic with a view to preventing illegal crossings and at the same time reducing the trafficking of children and persons in general. The Government also mentions the drafting of two bills aimed at protecting the victims of trafficking, in particular children. The Government indicates that the National Migration Office assists Haitians who have been turned away at the border in returning to their community with the help of public aid. Finally, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour, together with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, is currently studying the problem of the exploitation of persons in the Dominican Republic on sugar cane plantations and the reduction of children to begging in that country and intends to hold bilateral talks aimed at solving this problem.

The Committee notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (see document CEDAW/C/HTI/CO/7, 10 February 2009, paragraph 27) urging the Government “to intensify its efforts to combat all forms of trafficking in women and girls”. It notes that the UN Committee also asks the Government “to expedite adoption of the draft bill on all forms of trafficking and to ensure that the new law allows prosecution and punishment of perpetrators, effective protection of victims and adequate redress”. Finally, it notes that the UN Committee encourages the Government “to conduct research on the root causes of trafficking and to enhance bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic, to prevent trafficking and bring perpetrators to justice”.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the draft laws mentioned in the Government’s report, in particular the draft law on trafficking. Please provide a copy of the texts concerned as soon as they have been adopted. In addition to the legislative measures taken, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on other measures taken to combat the trafficking in persons, in particular: repressive measures (including statistics on the number of cases of trafficking examined by the authorities and the number of sentences imposed by the courts); public awareness raising, with a special emphasis on those most vulnerable; and assistance for victims. Please also provide information concerning the measures taken and results achieved with regard to bilateral and multilateral cooperation with neighbouring countries, in particular the Dominican Republic. Given that the Government has not provided substantial information on this matter, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to find a solution to the specific problem of child trafficking to the Dominican Republic which involves children being separated from their families and forced to beg or work in the Dominican Republic.

Hungary

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to previous comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 2(c), of the Convention. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the national provisions allowing the law enforcement authorities to conclude agreements concerning the employment of prisoners not only with public bodies or institutions, but also with private companies (section 101(3) of Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12) of the Ministry of Justice on the implementation of provisions concerning prison sentences and detention). It noted that Law-Decree No. 11 of 1979 on the execution of prison sentences provides for an obligation of convicts to work (section 33(1)(d)). The Committee also noted that the employment-related rights of prisoners are governed by the general provisions of labour law (subject to certain deviations), but their minimum remuneration corresponds only to one third of the general minimum wage (section 124(2) of the above Order No. 6/1996 (VII 12)) and they do not acquire pension rights under the existing legislation.

The Committee noted the Government’s repeated statement in its reports that prisoners are in a legal relationship with a penitentiary institution and are not directly employed by a third party, and perform labour under the supervision and control of the law enforcement bodies. It also noted the Government’s statement that the principal goal of employing inmates is to promote their rehabilitation and reintegration into society, as well as the Government’s view (also reiterated in its latest report) that the work performed by convicts (including the “public utility labour”) is covered by the exception provided for in Article 2(2)(c), and therefore should not be considered as forced or compulsory labour.

The Committee recalled, however, that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, in a sense that the exception from the scope of the Convention provided for in this Article for compulsory prison labour does not extend to work of prisoners for private companies, even under public supervision and control. Under this provision of the Convention, work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is excluded from the scope of the Convention only if two conditions are met, namely: (i) that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority; and (ii) that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee has always made it clear that the two conditions are applied cumulatively; i.e. the fact that the prisoner remains at all times under the supervision and control of a public authority does not in itself dispense the Government from fulfilling the second condition, namely that the person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee therefore asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as, for example, to provide that any prisoners working for private companies offer themselves voluntarily without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Government reiterates in its report that, in national law and practice, contracts exist only between the economic organizations of penal authorities and private companies, while prisoners, who are under an obligation to perform prison labour, are in relation solely with the economic organizations of penal authorities; however, general labour legislation is applicable with regard to their conditions of work (with certain differences). It follows from the sample contracts concluded between the economic organizations of penal authorities and private companies, supplied by the Government, that the economic organization of penal authorities is responsible for providing prison workforce for the production, which will be organized under the job description and instructions as well as regular quality control of the private company, which will also supply all the necessary raw materials and tools and provide training for the workers; the private company will also pay a rental fee for the premises provided for the production and the “fee for the leased work”. It is specifically mentioned that the private company shall continuously control the production through its technical specialists, that the economic organization of penal authorities shall obey the instructions given by the private company, and that the contracting parties agree that they will cooperate during the term of the “lease work agreement”. The Government reiterates, however, that prisoners remain at all times under the supervision and control of the staff of the economic organization of penal authorities, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

In this connection, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the explanations concerning the scope of the terms “hired to or placed at the disposal of” in paragraphs 56–58 and 109–111 of the Committee’s 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour and observes that these terms cover not only situations where prisoners are “employed” by the private company or placed in a position of servitude in relation to the private company, but also situations where the companies do not have absolute discretion over the work performed by the prisoner, since they are limited by the rules set by the public authority. The Committee also refers to paragraph 106 of its 2007 General Survey, where it considered that the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments, but applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons.

While noting the Government’s indication that, in conformity with the first condition set out in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention, the work is carried out “under the supervision and control of a public authority”, the Committee observes that, as regards the second condition, namely, that the person “is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations”, contracts for the use of prison labour concluded with private companies in Hungary correspond in all respects to what is expressly prohibited by Article 2(2)(c), namely, that a person is “hired to” a private company. It is in the very nature of such hiring agreements (or “lease work agreements”, as they are called in the sample contracts supplied by the Government) to include mutual obligations between the prison authorities (or their economic branches) and the private company.

Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its 2007 General Survey referred to above, the Committee points out once again that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. In such a situation, work of prisoners for private companies does not come under the scope of the Convention, since no compulsion is involved. The Committee has considered that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain prisoners’ formal consent to work for private enterprises both inside and outside prisons. Further, since such consent is given in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there should be indicators which authenticate this free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may also be other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether consent was freely given and informed (such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released; the offer of continuing the work of the same type upon their release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills).

Noting the Government’s indication in the report that, in the course of the preparation of the comprehensive amendment of Law-Decree No. 11 of 1979 on the execution of prison sentences, the provisions of the Convention are being taken into account, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners for private companies both inside and outside prison premises, so that such consent is free from the menace of any penalty and authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as well as by other objective and measurable factors referred to above. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the revised penitentiary legislation, as soon as it is adopted.

“Public utility labour” performed by convicted persons placed at the disposal of private parties. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Penal Code provisions concerning “public utility labour”, which shall be performed, as a penal sanction, without deprivation of a person’s freedom and without remuneration, but may be replaced by confinement in prison, if the convicted person fails to fulfil his or her labour obligations (sections 49 and 50 of the Penal Code). The Committee noted the Government’s indications that the work to be performed as public utility labour must be of public interest and that the employer (which may not only be a public institution, but also a private business organization) shall observe the safety provisions and ensure the same working conditions as those enjoyed by workers employed on the basis of a contract.

The Committee notes the Government’s indications concerning the National Strategy of Civil Crime Prevention and the adoption of Government decision No. 1036/2005 (IV.21) on tasks to be implemented in 2005–06 in this connection, including the organization of special programmes for persons sentenced to public utility labour.

The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication in its report that convicted persons comply with their working obligations voluntarily and can choose freely between the two kinds of punishment. Referring to the above considerations in point 1 of the present observation concerning the prohibition contained in Article 2, paragraph 2(c), as well as to the explanations in paragraphs 123–128 in its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee hopes that the Government will indicate, in its next report, how free choice between the two kinds of punishment is guaranteed and whether, in the course of drafting the new penitentiary legislation, a requirement of the voluntary consent of convicts to work for a private employer is taken into account. Please also provide information on the practical implementation of special programmes for carrying out public utility labour referred to above, including a list of authorized associations or institutions using such labour and giving examples of the type of work involved.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee has noted the Government's reports received in September 2008 and August 2009. It has also noted the communication dated 29 August 2008 received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), as well as the Government's response to this communication. The Committee has also noted the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 97th Session of the Conference in June 2008.

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1) and 25 of the Convention. Bonded labour; magnitude of the problem. In its 2008 report, the Government indicated that, since the enactment of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976 (BLSA), 287,555 bonded labourers had been identified, of whom 267,593 had been rehabilitated. The Government also stated that it would "reserve comment" about estimates of the total number of bonded labourers reported by other sources. However, the Committee notes, from the ITUC communication referred to above, the findings from survey research studies that bonded labour in agriculture and in industries like mining, brick kilns, silk and cotton production, and bidi making, was likely to be affecting millions of workers across the country. The Committee, in its previous observation, urged the Government to undertake a comprehensive national survey on bonded labour as a matter of priority, using appropriate statistical methods. The Government, in its report and through the statements by the Government representative during the discussion in the Conference Committee, reiterated its previous indications that statistical tools or methodologies used to collect macro or aggregated data were inappropriate for a survey of bonded labour. The Government also reiterated that it had provided grants to state governments for conducting district-level surveys of bonded labour, and that a large number of such surveys had been conducted by the state governments. Given the wide disparities in assessments of the overall prevalence of bonded labour in the national economy and the importance of this question to the process of supervision by the Committee of the application of the Convention in India, the Committee once again urges the Government to explore ways to undertake a national survey of bonded labour with the involvement of the social partners and stakeholder organizations, using any appropriate statistical methods and, as far as practicable, all existing data from the district-level surveys referred to above. The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will contain information on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard. In the meantime, it asks the Government to provide copies of all available reports of the district-level surveys conducted by State governments.

Vigilance committees

With regard to the functioning and effectiveness of the vigilance committees established under the BLSA, inter alia, to assist the courts in monitoring and ensuring the proper implementation of the Act, the Government reiterates that all state governments have confirmed that vigilance committees have been constituted at the district and subdivisional levels and that the meetings are being held regularly. However, the Committee notes, from the ITUC communication referred to above, the research findings by the Centre for Education and Communication (CEC) and the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC), which indicate that in many states the committees remain ineffective bodies; do not meet regularly; have not been functional; and are improperly constituted, and thereby the occurrence of bonded labour goes undetected. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to address the shortcomings in the vigilance committees, with a view to ensuring their proper functioning and effectiveness. It hopes the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress of such measures, including copies of any relevant reports, studies and enquiries.

Release and rehabilitation

With regard to the Government's policies and programmes for the release and rehabilitation of identified bonded labourers, the Committee notes, from the Government's reports, the indications that a special group chaired by the Union Labour and Employment Secretary has been monitoring implementation of the BLSA and the Centrally Sponsored Scheme (CSS) for the rehabilitation of bonded labourers, and had held a series of 15 region-level meetings with state government participation between 2004 and 2009; that the Ministry of Labour and Employment has taken concrete measures to improve the planning process and strengthen the monitoring mechanism; and that state governments have been issued detailed guidelines for implementing the CSS and advised to integrate the scheme into other ongoing poverty alleviation schemes.

While noting these positive developments, the Committee also notes, however, from the ITUC communication, the research findings of the NHRC, which has a court-ordered mandate to monitor the implementation of the BLSA, that some state governments are an obstacle to the eradication of bonded labour; that many continue to deny the existence of bonded labour; that state officials often have a poor understanding of how bonded labour is legally defined; that state governments are failing to compile data on the number of bonded labourers; and that consequently the identification and release of bonded labourers in recent years has been extremely low. The Committee also notes the research findings by the CEC that bonded labourers who are rehabilitated do not always receive the full rehabilitation amount; that corruption and delays in the issuing of rehabilitation packages are prevalent; that delays occur that can effectively force families back into debt bondage; and that rehabilitation assistance has not proved to be very effective.

The Committee hopes that the Government will ensure that the measures noted above to implement release and rehabilitation programmes at the state level have as their central focus the serious problems identified in the communication of the ITUC and are effectively implemented, and that the monitoring mechanisms it has put into place are fully functional and serving their intended purpose. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, detailed information in this regard, as well as the most recent information the NHRC has called for on identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers.

Law enforcement

With regard to the issue of enforcement of the penalty provisions of the BLSA and the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act 1986 (CLPRA), the Committee notes the statement of the Government representative during the discussion in the Conference Committee that the Government's main priority was the identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers, but that nevertheless, 5,893 cases of prosecution and 1,289 convictions had been reported by the states so far under the BLSA, and that the NHRC had organized state-level sensitization workshops in collaboration with the Ministry of Labour and Employment. However, the Committee notes with concern the findings by the NHRC, referred to in the ITUC communication, that state governments were neglecting to prosecute offenders under the bonded labour system, and that it was clear from statistical evidence that the law was poorly enforced and employers were rarely prosecuted successfully.

The Committee urges the Government to take effective measures to further strengthen its law enforcement mechanisms, including measures recommended by the NHRC or other official bodies, and that such measures address the problems identified in the communication of the ITUC. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide, in its next report, detailed information in this regard and repeats its request for statistical data and other information that indicate, not only numbers of prosecutions and convictions, but the specific criminal penalties which have actually been imposed on employers of bonded labourers convicted under the BLSA, as well as copies of any relevant court judgements.

Child labour

With regard to implementation of the CLPRA, which was amended in October 2006 to encompass a series of additional occupations, the Committee notes the Government's indications that it has carried out awareness-raising meetings and media campaigns and has also initiated and issued guidance to state governments on the effective implementation of this prohibition and on the preparation of state-level action plans. The Committee notes that, while the annex to the Government's report includes state-level statistics on inspections, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and acquittals in relation to enforcement of the CLPRA, the information supplied does not include any statistics on the nature of the sanctions or sentences imposed in cases of convictions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will continue and further expand its efforts to raise public awareness about the CLPRA, and that the act will be fully implemented through the state-level action plans. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, detailed information in this regard, as well as statistics and other information on the specific penalties and sentences imposed in cases of convictions under the CLPRA, including copies of any relevant court judgements. Please also provide information on the status of the Draft Offences against Children Bill, 2006.

With regard to the National Child Labour Project (NCLP), an action programme under which working children are withdrawn from employment in hazardous occupations and placed into special schools for a maximum period of three years, the Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government concerning the schools involved and the student enrolments. It hopes that the Government will expand and strengthen this programme under the Eleventh Plan (2007–12), and that it will provide information in this regard, including information from the monitoring committees set up to supervise, monitor and evaluate the NCLP.

Prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation

The Committee notes the indications of the Government that the Immoral Traffic Prevention Bill, 2006, amends the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act, 1956 (ITPA), by, inter alia, increasing the age of majority from 16 to 18; repealing section 8, which penalizes solicitation for purposes of prostitution, and section 20, which concerns removal of prostitutes from any public place; redefines the offence of "trafficking in persons" to align it with the definition of trafficking contained in the optional protocols on trafficking in the UN Convention against Transnational Organized Crime; and criminalizes conduct of persons who frequent brothels for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The Committee hopes that the Bill will soon be adopted and requests the Government to supply a copy of the new legislation, as soon as it is promulgated.

The Committee notes the reference to Ujjawala, a "Comprehensive Scheme for Prevention of Trafficking and Rescue, Rehabilitation and Reintegration of Victims of Trafficking and Commercial Sexual Exploitation", a federal scheme launched on 4 December 2007 which comprises five components: prevention, rescue, rehabilitation, reintegration, and repatriation. The Government also refers to the Central Advisory Committee (CAC) for preventing and combating trafficking of women and children for commercial sexual exploitation, which was established by the Ministry of Women and Child Development, and to the proposed establishment of central and state-level nodal authorities. The Committee considers that these measures represent positive developments and hopes they will continue to evolve and be effective. It hopes the Government will supply updated information about the work of Ujjawala, the CAC and nodal authorities, including any official reports assessing the effectiveness of their work and its impact in practice on trafficking in women and children for purposes of commercial sexual exploitation.

Kenya

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Compulsory labour in connection with the conservation of natural resources. For many years, the Committee has been referring to sections 13 to 18 of the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128), as amended by Act No. 10 of 1997, according to which able-bodied male persons between 18 and 50 years of age may be required to perform any work or service in connection with the conservation of natural resources for up to 60 days in any year. The Committee expressed the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend these provisions, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the task force on the review of labour laws had addressed the issue of compulsory labour required by the Chief's Authority Act (Cap. 128). The Government also indicated that the Chief's Authority Act was to be replaced by the Administrative Authority Act. In its latest report, the Government undertakes to send a copy of the Administrative Authority Act, as soon as it is adopted.

While noting this information, the Committee trusts that the Administrative Authority Act, which is intended to replace the Chief's Authority Act, will be adopted in the near future and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the Administrative Authority Act as soon as it is adopted.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for the participation in strikes. Since many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Public Order Act, the Prohibited Publications Order, 1968, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1967, and the Trade Disputes Act (Cap. 234), under which sentences of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed as a punishment for the display of emblems or the distribution of publications signifying association with a political object or political organization, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that it is committed to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It notes from the Government's latest report that the Merchant Shipping Act, 1967, has been reviewed and is looking forward to receiving a copy of the revised legislation. The Committee expresses the firm hope that all the abovementioned provisions will soon be brought into conformity with the Convention and that the Government will report on the progress achieved in this regard. It also asks the Government to provide information on various points raised in a more detailed request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Liberia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Forced labour and captivity practices in connection with armed conflict. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the allegations concerning forced labour and captivity practices which took place in the south-eastern part of the country in connection with armed conflict, where children were allegedly held hostage by adults and used as a source of forced and captive labour. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the special investigation committee sent by the Government to investigate the alleged forced labour practices in the south-eastern region recommended that a national committee be established to trace and reunite displaced women and children taken captive during the war and that, in order to enhance the National Reconciliation and Reunification Programmes, "local authorities should be directed to encourage their citizens to report any acts of alleged forced labour, intimidation, harassment, maltreatment for appropriate investigation and corrective measures".

While having noted that the south-eastern part of the country was in a grave humanitarian crisis and an extreme state of poverty and that any reported situations of forced labour exploitation were due to the consequences of the war, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would encourage joint efforts and cooperation between governmental bodies and non-governmental organizations at all levels with a view to the effective elimination of all forms of compulsory labour, including that of children, and requested the Government to supply full information on measures taken to this end.

The Committee notes the Government's brief indication in its report supplied in May 2008 that a tripartite national committee is being considered to investigate the complaints of forced labour and hostage situation in the south-eastern region, that consultations for this investigation have already begun and the committee is expected to start its work in the near future. The Committee reiterates the firm hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, full information on the activities of the abovementioned tripartite national committee and on the specific action taken to investigate the situation in the South-East as regards the alleged practices of forced labour, as well as on the measures taken to eliminate such practices. The Committee also hopes that the Government will supply information on the results achieved in this regard by the Liberian Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), which was set up to investigate human rights violations and was empowered to recommend for prosecution the most serious offenders, as well as information on the progress achieved in the establishment of an Independent National Human Rights Commission and drawing up of a national human rights action plan.

Recalling also that, under Article 25 of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced labour shall be punishable as a penal offence and it shall be an obligation of the State to ensure that the penalties imposed are really adequate and are strictly enforced, the Committee hopes that the necessary action to give effect to this Article will be taken in the near future, by imposing penal sanctions on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted for that purpose and on any penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work as a punishment for expressing political views. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the Electoral Reform Law of 2004, which amended certain provisions of the Elections Law, 1986, has repealed provisions punishing the participation in certain activities related to political parties (such as, e.g., activities that seek to continue or revive certain political parties) with penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour.

In its earlier comments, the Committee observed that prison sentences (involving an obligation to work by virtue of Chapter 34, section 34-14, paragraph 1, of the Liberian Code of Laws) might be imposed in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention under section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law, punishing certain forms of criticism of the Government. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate whether section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law is still in force and, if so, to indicate the measures taken with a view to ensuring observance of the Convention.

Article 1(c). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that, under section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law, local authorities shall apprehend and deliver a seafarer who deserts from a vessel with the intention of not returning to duty and who remains unlawfully in a foreign country. Referring to paragraph 171 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee pointed out that measures to ensure the due performance by a worker of his service under compulsion of law (in the form of physical constraint or the menace of a penalty) constitute forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline and are thus incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that section 347 has not been repealed, but due consideration is being given to this section. The Committee trusts that section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law will soon be repealed and that the Government will supply, in its next report, information on the measures taken to this end.

The Committee also noted that under section 348 of the Maritime Law various other offences against labour discipline by seafarers such as incitement to neglect duty, assembling with others in a tumultuous manner, may be punished with imprisonment of up to five years (involving an obligation to work). The Committee referred to paragraph 179 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour where it pointed out that sanctions relating to acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons on board do not fall within the scope of the Convention. However, as regards more generally breaches of labour discipline, such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, all sanctions involving compulsory labour should be abolished under the Convention. In a great number of maritime nations, similar penal provisions have been repealed, restricted in scope to cases involving a danger to the ship or the life or health of persons, or otherwise amended so as to provide for a fine or some other penalty not falling within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that section 348 has not been repealed, but due consideration is being given to this section. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that measures will soon be taken to bring section 348 of the Maritime Law into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide information on the action taken to this end.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline or participation in strikes. Since many years, the Committee has been referring to various provisions of the Publications Act of 1972, under which persons expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system may be punished with penalties of imprisonment (involving, under section 24(1) of the Penal Code, an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also referred to sections 237 and 238 of the Penal Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on public servants or employees of public institutions as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for participation in strikes, even in services the interruption of which would not endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the abovementioned Publications Act No. 76 of 1972 will be amended and the Committee's comments have been taken into account in the draft new Act under consideration. The Government also indicates that the draft amended Act has been submitted to the 2008 session of the Basic People's Congresses. The Committee notes, however, that no new information has been supplied as regards the amendment of sections 237 and 238 of the Penal Code referred to above, though the Government has repeatedly expressed its intention to amend them in its earlier reports.

The Committee trusts that Publications Act No. 76 of 1972, as well as the provisions of the Penal Code referred to above, will be amended in the near future, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, so as to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment on persons who have expressed certain political or ideological opinions or who have committed breaches of labour discipline or participated in strikes. The Committee asks the Government to supply copies of the amended texts, as soon as they are adopted.

Supply of legislation. The Committee asks the Government once again to provide copies of the legislative texts governing the establishment, functioning and dissolution of associations and political parties and hopes that the Government will not fail to supply such copies with its next report.

Mauritania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Slavery and slave-like practices. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the fact-finding mission which visited Mauritania in 2006, at the request of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference, had noted a number of positive measures which illustrated the Government's commitment to combat slavery and its vestiges. It observed that the Government had undertaken to take into account the recommendations made by the fact-finding mission in the formulation of the national strategy to combat slave-like practices. In this respect, the Committee noted the adoption, on 9 August 2007, of Act No. 2007/48 criminalizing and penalizing slave-like practices. It requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the effective application of the Act and the implementation of the national strategy to combat slave-like practices.

Effective application of the legislation. The Committee recalls that Act No. 2007/48 defines, criminalizes and penalizes slave-like practices and makes a distinction between the crime of slavery and offences of slavery. Such offences include "any person who appropriates the goods, products and earnings resulting from the labour of any person claimed to be a slave or who forcibly takes that person's monies who shall be punished by a sentence of imprisonment of from six months to two years and a fine of from 50,000 to 200,000 ouguiyas" (section 6). Offences of slavery also include prejudicing the physical integrity of a person claimed to be a slave and denying a child claimed to be a slave access to education (sections 5 and 7). Furthermore, the Walis, Hakems, local chiefs and officers of the criminal investigation police who do not follow up cases of slave-like practices that are brought to their knowledge shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment and a fine (section 12). Finally, human rights associations are empowered to denounce violations of the Act and to assist victims, with the latter benefiting from free judicial proceedings (section 15).

The Committee considered that the adoption of the Act constituted an important first step in combating slavery and that the challenge would henceforth lie in the effective application of the legislation so that victims can assert their rights effectively and those responsible for the persistence of slavery are convicted and punished. It requested the Government to take steps to publicize the new Act among the forces of order and the judicial authorities, as well as the population at large, and to ensure that investigations are conducted rapidly and are effective and impartial when cases are brought to the knowledge of the authorities.

With regard to the first point, the Government indicates in its report that the Act criminalizing slavery and penalizing slave-like practices has been the subject of intense awareness-raising activity and that every measure has been taken to ensure that publicity is given to the provisions of the Act with a view to promoting an understanding of the criminal nature of slavery. The Committee notes this national awareness-raising campaign on the contents of the Act, which was carried out in February 2008. It notes that it was undertaken in many regions of the country. Missions to supervise the campaign at the regional level organized meetings and assemblies during which the provisions of the Act were explained to the population. These missions were generally composed of representatives of the Government, the local authorities, the religious authorities, the National Human Rights Commission and NGOs active in this field. The Committee observes that this campaign, which was carried out immediately following the entry into force of the Act, certainly provided an important signal to civil society as it benefited from the presence of members of the Government and of various authorities who were able to proclaim their will to combat slavery. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the appropriate measures to continue carrying out awareness-raising activities on the Act and on the problem of slavery in general, targeting more particularly the most vulnerable groups and those who are in the first line of contact with victims.

The Committee stresses the particular importance of following up and further enhancing the process of awareness raising since, according to the information available, it would not appear that victims are able to assert their rights effectively. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the complaints lodged by victims or the NGOs representing them, the investigations carried out or the commencement of judicial proceedings. The Committee is also concerned about the absence of information on the measures adopted by the Government to encourage and assist victims in their action. It had already expressed concern in the past about the fact that victims encountered difficulties in being heard and in asserting their rights, both with regard to the authorities responsible for the forces of order and the judicial authorities. In this respect, it considered that sections 12 and 15 of the Act (assistance to victims, the prosecution of authorities which do not follow up cases of slave-like practices that are brought to their knowledge) could contribute to removing the obstacles preventing access to justice.

The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 25 of the Convention, States which ratify the Convention are under the obligation to ensure that the penalties imposed by law for the exaction of forced labour are really adequate and strictly enforced. It considers that the absence of court action by victims may reveal ignorance of the recourse procedures available, the fear of social reprobation or reprisals, or a lack of will by the authorities responsible for taking legal action. The Committee requests the Government to take the appropriate measures to ensure that victims are effectively in a position to turn to the police and the judicial authorities with a view to asserting their rights and that investigations are conducted in a rapid, effective and impartial manner. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the number of cases of slavery reported to the authorities, the number of cases in which an investigation has been conducted and the number of cases which have resulted in judicial action. Please indicate whether prosecutions have been initiated as a result of action by the victim or the Office of the Attorney-General and provide copies of any judgements handed down.

The Committee notes that a technical assistance mission visited Mauritania in February 2008, in the course of which the follow-up to the recommendations of the fact-finding mission was discussed. The Committee notes that the mission was informed that the National Human Rights Commission (CNDH) which has as its mandate to examine situations of the violation of human rights that are reported or brought to its knowledge and to take all appropriate action, has received allegations of slavery. In such cases, the CNDH sends one of its members to the scene and, following investigation, sends a report with recommendations to the President of the Republic. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the cases referred to the CNDH, the recommendations made and the action taken as a result of these recommendations.

National strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery. Recalling that in 2006 the Council of Ministers adopted the principle of formulating a national strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery and that an inter-ministerial committee was established for that purpose, the Committee previously requested the Government to indicate whether such strategy had effectively been adopted and to provide detailed information on the measures taken in this context.

In its report, the Government indicates that the national strategy to combat slave-like practices has not been adopted. However, the Commissariat for Human Rights, Humanitarian Action and Relations with Civil Society has established a national plan to combat the vestiges of slavery, with a budget of 1 billion ouguiyas, covering the fields of education, health and income-generating activities in the area known as “the triangle of poverty”. The Government adds that it has still not reached agreement with the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) and the European Union (EU) concerning the terms of reference for the study on slavery that these institutions were proposing to finance.

The Committee notes the budgetary allocation for the national plan to combat the vestiges of slavery and observes that the plan, by focusing on education and income-generating activities, is designed to act on poverty in the region identified by the Government as being the “geographical zone concerned”. The Committee nevertheless observes that the Government still does not have at its disposal reliable data enabling it to evaluate the extent of the phenomenon of slavery and to identify its characteristics (social, geographical, etc.). Consequently, certain victims or populations at risk could be excluded from the measures envisaged in the context of the national plan. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the national plan to combat slavery and to supply further information on the practical action adopted in the context of the plan. The Committee also draws the Government’s attention to the importance of a global strategy to combat slavery. By addressing poverty, the national plan covers one of the aspects of the action required to combat slavery, although it should also encompass other measures, such as those outlined above, namely raising the awareness of society, the police and the judicial authorities, and measures to combat the impunity of those responsible for these practices. In this context, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged with a view to the adoption of a global strategy to combat slavery and to indicate whether it intends, to that effect, to carry out a quantitative and qualitative study of the issue of slavery in Mauritania.

The Committee also considers that, once they have been identified, it is important to envisage measures to support and reintegrate victims. It is necessary to provide material and financial support to victims so that they can lodge complaints, on the one hand, and to avoid them reverting to a situation of vulnerability in which their labour would once again be exploited. The objective is for the victims to be in a position to reconstruct their lives outside the household of their masters. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the national plan of action envisages the creation of structures intended to facilitate the social and economic reintegration of victims. The Committee asks the Government to indicate whether victims have access to compensation procedures for the personal and material damages suffered.

Mauritius

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(d). Sanctions for participation in strikes. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Employment Relations Act, 2008, has repealed the Industrial Relations Act, 1973, which contained provisions which punished the participation in strikes that violated compulsory arbitration procedures with sentences of imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1986, under which certain breaches of discipline by seafarers (such as desertion, neglect or refusal to join the ship, absence without leave, neglect of duty) were punishable by imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour), and seafarers could be forcibly conveyed on board ship for the purpose of proceeding to sea. Referring to paragraph 180 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee recalled that, in order to be compatible with the Convention, provisions imposing penalties of imprisonment on seafarers for breaches of labour discipline should be restricted to actions that endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons on board.

The Committee notes the adoption of the Merchant Shipping Act, No. 26 of 2007, which has repealed the Merchant Shipping Act of 1986. The Committee notes that the Act no longer contains a separate provision on offenses by seafarers, nor does it contain any provision making explicit reference to such breaches of discipline by seafarers as desertion, neglect or refusal to join the ship, or absence without leave. It notes, however, that under section 217(16)(n), the Act continues to treat disobedience as a criminal offence, punishable by imprisonment (involving the imposition of compulsory labour), in penalizing a seafarer who refuses to obey the master's order or neglects his duty.

The Committee hopes that the Government will take measures to further amend the Merchant Shipping Act, 2007, e.g., by limiting the scope of section 217(16)(n) to situations where the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons is endangered, so as to bring its provisions into conformity with the Convention, and that in its next report it will provide information about the progress made in this regard.

Mexico

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1934)

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. Further to its previous comments on the trafficking of persons both in and outside the country for the purpose of forced prostitution, the Committee notes with interest the promulgation of the Act of November 2007 to prevent and punish the trafficking of persons, and its Regulations of February 2009.

The Committee notes that the Act has established an Inter-Ministerial Committee for the purpose of coordinating and following up the National Programme to prevent and punish the trafficking of persons and the standing programmes drawn up to combat such trafficking. The Inter-Ministerial Committee is a standing body and its members are the Ministers of the Interior, Communications and Transport, External Relations, Public Security, Labour and Social Security, Health and Social Development, Public Education, Tourism and Public Prosecution. Other institutions also participate, such as the National Institute for Women and the Committee for the Development of Indigenous Peoples.

The Committee hopes that the application of the Act will enable human trafficking to be combated effectively, since it constitutes a grave violation of the Convention. It hopes that the Government will provide information on the application of the Act and on any other measures taken with a view to the eradication of human trafficking. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the National Programme and the standing programmes created by the Inter-Ministerial Committee.

Adequate and strictly enforced penalties

In view of the fact that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a criminal offence by penalties that are adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee sought information on the penalties imposed on persons condemned for human trafficking.

The Committee takes note of section 6 of the Act to prevent and punish human trafficking which lays down prison sentences ranging from 9 to 18 years for persons committing the offence of human trafficking. It also notes that pursuant to section 12(IX) of the Act, the Inter-Ministerial Committee shall compile statistical data on human-trafficking offences with a view to publishing them periodically. Statistics must include disaggregated information on the number of arrests, judicial proceedings, number of convictions of human traffickers and persons guilty of offences relating to human trafficking in its various forms; the number victims, their sex, age, nationality, the type of victimization, their migratory status.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide a copy of the report containing these statistics, together with a copy of relevant court decisions indicating the sentences imposed.

Participation of public employees in human trafficking

The Committee previously asked the Government for information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure exhaustive investigation of complaints of complicity or direct participation by public employees in the trafficking of persons and on the penalties imposed.

The Committee notes that section 6 of the Act to prevent and punish the trafficking of persons establishes that the penalty of 9 to 18 years' imprisonment for trafficking in persons shall be increased by half where the offender is a public employee.

The Committee notes that in 2006, in its Concluding Observations, the United Nations Committee on the Protection of the Rights of all Migrant Workers and Their Families expressed concern at the cases of trafficking that involved public employees. The Committee observes that the key role played by the forces of order in enforcing the law and the Convention is distorted in the event of corruption among their members, and hopes that the provisions of the new Act will allow the effective punishment of the intimidation of victims, complicity and direct participation of members of the forces of order in human trafficking. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to investigate properly the cases in which law enforcement personnel have been involved and that it will provide relevant statistical data.

Protection of victims

The Committee takes note of sections 17 and 18 of the Act to prevent and punish human trafficking which concern protection and assistance for victims. Under these provisions, victims must be provided with facilities to remain in the country for the duration of the judicial proceedings. Advance programmes for immediate assistance must also be drawn up during and after the proceedings and they are to include training, guidance and, in the case of nationals, assistance in seeking employment.

The Committee notes section 9 of the Act which provides that when someone condemned for committing the offence of human trafficking is held penally responsible, the court's sentence shall include payment of compensation for damage to the victim to cover inter alia, medical treatment, transport including return to the place of origin, loss of income, and material and moral damages. Section 32 of the Regulations to the Act provides that the public prosecutor shall seek and compile sufficient evidence to justify and quantify the compensation referred to in section 9 of the Act. The Committee observes that this provision is important for the protection of victims since it establishes that the courts shall also decide on the compensation for which the offender is liable.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application of these provisions indicating the number of victims who have benefited from the protection and compensation measures provided for therein.

Republic of Moldova

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to previous comments. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilizing of labour for purposes of economic development. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted a communication received in February 2004 from the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Moldova (CSRM), which contains observations concerning the application of the forced labour Conventions Nos 105 and 29, ratified by the Republic of Moldova. The CSRM referred, in particular, to certain provisions of the Law on mobilization, No. 1192-XV of 4 July 2002, the Law on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest, No. 1352-XV of 11 October 2002, and the government decision to approve regulations on the mobilization at the workplace, No. 751 of 24 June 2003, under which the central and local authorities, as well as military bodies, can exact compulsory labour from the population under certain conditions as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of the development of the national economy. Thus, section 3(b) of the Law on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest referred to above stipulates that one of the aims of such requisitioning is to create conditions for the good functioning of the national economy and public institutions.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(b) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour "as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development" and expresses the hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or envisaged in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Myanmar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Historical background

1. In its previous comments the Committee has discussed in detail the history of this extremely serious case, which has involved gross, methodical and pervasive breaches of the Convention enduring for many years, and which is also manifested by the long-standing failure of the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the Governing Body in March 1997 under article 26 of the Constitution.

2. The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry concluded that the obligation under the Convention to suppress the use of forced or compulsory labour was being violated in Myanmar in national law as well as in actual practice in a widespread and systematic manner. In its recommendations (paragraph 539(a) of the Commission's report of 2 July 1998), the Commission urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure:

- that the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention;
- that in actual practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military, an outcome which required concrete action to be taken immediately for each and every of the many fields of forced labour and to be accomplished through public acts of the Executive, promulgated and made known to all levels of the military and to the whole population; and
- that the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced, which required thorough investigation, prosecution and adequate punishment of those found guilty.

Developments since the Committee's previous observation

3. There have been numerous discussions and conclusions reached by ILO bodies, as well as further documentation received by the ILO, which have been considered by the Committee. These include the following:

- the report of the ILO Liaison Officer (ILC, 98th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three, Doc. D.5.C) submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2009, as well as the discussions and conclusions of that Committee (ILC, 98th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three, A and Doc. D.5.B);
- the documents submitted to the Governing Body at its 304th and 306th Sessions (March and November 2009), as well as the discussions and conclusions of the Governing Body during those sessions;
- the communication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received in September 2009 which includes an appendix of 74 documents amounting to more than 1,000 pages, a copy of which was transmitted to the Government for comments on the matters raised therein;
- the Agreement of 26 February 2009 to extend the trial period of the Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007; and
- the reports of the Government of Myanmar received on 10 and 24 March, 1 and 4 June, 27 August, 6 and 21 October 2009.

4. The Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007 – extension of the complaints mechanism. The Committee notes that the trial period of the complaints mechanism under the Supplementary Understanding (SU) of 26 February 2007 between the Government and the ILO was extended on 26 February 2009 for one year, until 25 February 2010 (ILC, 98th Session, Provisional Record No. 16, Part Three, Doc. D.5.F., Appendix II). The SU supplements the Understanding of 19 March 2002 concerning the appointment of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar and has as its object to “formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints of forced labour through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation and in accordance with the Convention”. Information about the functioning of this important mechanism is discussed below in the sections on monitoring and enforcement.

5. Discussion and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee on the Application of Standards once again discussed this case in a special sitting during the 98th Session of the Conference in June 2009. The Conference Committee, inter alia, acknowledged some limited steps on the part of the Government of Myanmar: the further extension of the SU for another year; certain activities concerning awareness raising of the complaints mechanism established by the SU; certain improvements in dealing with under-age recruitment by the military; and the distribution of publications relating to the SU. The Committee was however of the view that those steps were totally inadequate, and it strongly urged the Government to fully implement without delay the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

6. Discussions in the Governing Body. The Governing Body also continued its discussions of this case during its 303rd and 306th Sessions in March and November of 2009 (GB.304/5(Rev.), GB.306/6). Following the discussion in November 2009 the Governing Body, inter alia, reconfirmed the continuing validity of its previous conclusions and those of the International Labour Conference. It noted the Government's cooperation regarding complaints of forced labour submitted under the SU, as well as the joint Government–ILO awareness-raising activities. However, it called on the Government to strengthen the capacity of the ILO in the framework of the SU to deal with complaints throughout the country and, in particular, to facilitate adjustments to the staff capacity of the Office of the Liaison Officer, as provided for in article 8 of the SU, so that an increased workload could be met. It also called for the immediate release of all persons currently detained being complainants, facilitators and others associated with the SU complaints mechanism. It further called for particularly accessible material in local languages for awareness raising, and it reiterated the need for an authoritative statement by the senior leadership against the continued use of forced labour and the need to respect freedom of association.

7. Communication received from the International Trade Union Confederation. The information contained in the communication from the ITUC received in September 2009, referred to in paragraph 3, is discussed below in the section on current practice.

8. The Government's reports. The reports received from the Government, referred to in paragraph 3, include replies to the Committee's previous observation. They include information, inter alia, about joint ILO–Ministry of Labour (MOL) publicity, awareness-raising and training activities on forced labour; the Government's continued cooperation with the various functions of the ILO Liaison Officer including monitoring and investigating the forced labour situation, the operation of the SU complaints mechanism, and the implementation of technical projects; and ongoing efforts the Government is making to enforce the prohibitions of forced labour. The reports also include a reply to the ITUC communication of September 2008 by way of a categorical dismissal of the allegations of forced labour contained therein. The Government also indicates that no action was being contemplated to amend or repeal the Village Act and Towns Act or to amend section 359 of the New State Constitution. Further references to the Government's reports are made in the discussion below.

Assessment of the situation

9. Assessment of the information available on the situation of forced labour in Myanmar in 2009 and in relation to the implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and compliance with the Convention by the Government will be discussed in three parts, dealing with: (i) amendment of legislation; (ii) measures to stop the exaction of forced or compulsory labour in practice; and (iii) enforcement of penalties prescribed under the Penal Code and other relevant provisions of law.

I. Amendment of legislation

10. With regard to the Village Act and the Towns Act, referred to in paragraph 2, the Committee notes the statement of the Government in its report received on 27 August 2009 that these laws “have been put into dormant [sic] effectively and legally” by Order No. 1/99 (Order Directing Not to Exercise Powers Under Certain Provisions of the Town Act, 1907, and the Village Act, 1907) as supplemented by the Order of 27 October 2000. In its previous comments, the Committee has observed that the latter orders have yet to be given bona fide effect and do not dispense with the separate need to eliminate the legislative basis for the exaction of forced labour. Noting the indication of the Government representative, during the discussion in the Governing Body at its 306th Session in November 2009, that these Acts were under review by the Ministry of Home Affairs, the Committee urges the Government to take the long overdue steps to amend or repeal them and thereby to bring its law into conformity with the Convention. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide information confirming that such steps have been taken.

11. In its previous observation the Committee noted that the Government has included in section 359 of the New State Constitution (Chapter VIII – Citizenship, Fundamental Rights and Duties of Citizens) a prohibition of forced labour containing an exception for “duties assigned by the Union in accordance with the law in the interest of the public”. The Committee observed that the exception encompasses permissible forms of forced labour that exceed the scope of the specifically defined exceptions in Article 2(2) of the Convention and could be interpreted in such a way as to allow a generalized exaction of forced labour from the population. The Committee notes with regret the statement of the Government in its report received on 27 August 2009, that section 359 of the New State Constitution “adequately captures the spirit” of the Convention. The Committee once again urges the Government to take steps to amend section 359 of Chapter VIII of the new Constitution, in order to bring its law into conformity with the Convention.

II. Measures to stop the exaction of forced or compulsory labour in practice

12. Information available on current practice. The Committee notes from the ITUC's communication referred to above, the well-documented allegations that forced and compulsory labour continued to be exacted from local villagers in 2009 by military and civil authorities and to have occurred in all but one of the country's states and divisions. The information in the appendices refers to specific dates, locations and circumstances of the occurrences, and to specific civil bodies, military units and individual officials responsible for them. According to these reports, forced labour has been requisitioned both by military personnel and civil authorities such as village heads, and has taken a wide variety of forms and involved a variety of tasks, including: construction of bridges and roads; forced portering for military personnel; prison labour, construction and maintenance of army camps; confiscation of food supplies and extortion of money; forced recruitment of child soldiers; forced sentry duty; and human minesweeping. The appendices also include translated copies of more than 100 Order documents and Order “letters” for the requisition of forced (and uncompensated) labour issued between December 2008 and June 2009 to villagers and village heads in Chin, Karen, Mon, and Rakhaing States and in Irrawaddy, Pegu, and Tenasserim Divisions. The tasks and services demanded by these call-up orders involved, inter alia, portering for the military; road repair and other infrastructure projects, and on paddy plantations; production and delivery of thatch shingles and bamboo poles; recruitment of children as soldiers; attendance at meetings; provision of money and alcohol; provision of information on individuals and households; registration of villagers in State-controlled NGOs; and restrictions on travel and use of muskets. Noting the conspicuous absence of any comment from the Government on such Order letters forwarded by the ITUC in previous years, the Committee requests that in its next report the Government respond in detail to the entirety of the September 2009 communication of the ITUC, and in particular to the Order letters referred to above which constitute conclusive evidence of the continued systematic imposition of forced labour by military and civil authorities throughout the country in 2009.

13. The Committee notes the observations of the ILO Liaison Officer that the SU mechanism continues to function, yet “the overall forced labour situation remains serious in the country”. (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 2). Victims of under-age military recruitment with substantiated complaints are regularly discharged from the military, yet the “continued and repeated illegal recruitment of children by military personnel” is also confirmed (GB.306/6, paragraphs 5 and 7). In terms of the experience with the SU complaints mechanism, the Liaison Officer refers to action taken by the authorities “to ensure that the practice of forced labour does not continue and further complaints are not received from that area” from which they originate (GB.306/6, paragraph 10). However, he also refers to the behaviour of local authorities, both civil and military, as well as judicial, who refuse to accept the validity of settlement agreements reached under the SU process, continue traditional forced labour practices, and harass those who attempt to exercise their rights under the law (GB.306/6, paragraph 15).

14. In its previous observations the Committee, recalling the Commission’s recommendation that concrete action needed to be taken immediately for each and every of the many fields of forced labour, identified four types of “concrete action” the Government needed to take, without which an end to imposition of forced labour in practice could not be achieved: issuing specific and concrete instructions on forced labour and on its prohibitions to civilian and military authorities; giving wide publicity to the prohibitions on forced labour; making adequate budgetary provisions for replacing forced labour with free wage labour; and monitoring the practice of forced labour and efforts to enforce its prohibitions.

15. Issuing specific and concrete instructions. In its previous observations the Committee has emphasized that specific, effectively conveyed instructions to civil and military authorities, and to the population at large, are required which identify each and every field of forced labour, and which explain concretely for each field the means and manner by which the tasks or services involved are to be carried out without recourse to forced labour. The Committee has noted that, with one exception (namely, the “Additional Instruction” issued by the Department of General Administration of the Ministry of Home Affairs, No. 200/108/Oo, dated 2 June 2005 and noted by the Committee in its 2005 observation), the series of instructions and letters issued by Government authorities in 2000, 2004 and 2005, which were intended to secure compliance with the prohibition of forced labour under Order No. 1/99 and its supplementing Order of 27 October 2000, were not shown to have met these criteria.

16. The Committee notes that in its report received on 1 June 2009 the Government states only that “the various levels of administrative authority are well aware of the orders and instructions related to forced labour prohibition issued by the higher levels”. The document submitted to the Governing Body in March 2009 (GB.304/5/1(Rev.)) includes an indication, without a date specified, that the General Administration Department had issued instructions through the state and divisional administrative structures reconfirming the prohibition of forced labour; and that this instruction had been transmitted to township and village tract levels (paragraph 6). The Government indicates in its report received on 27 August 2009 that all instructions and directives “contain the details [sic] necessary measures for the implementation of the Orders”. The Committee also notes the observation of the ILO Liaison Officer that a number of forced labour complaints, particularly involving confiscation of farmers’ croplands, result from the improper application of economic and agricultural policies not directly concerned with the practice of forced labour, yet the Government has not agreed to consider policy-application training designed to stop the application of such policies in a way that leads to the imposition of forced labour (Report to the Conference Committee, paragraph 14; GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 9). The Committee notes that once again the information provided by the Government is grossly deficient. It reiterates the need for concrete instructions to be issued to all levels of the military and to the whole population, which identify all fields and practices of forced labour and provide concrete guidance as to the means and manner by which tasks or services in each field are to be carried out, and by which any other relevant government policies are to be implemented, without recourse to forced labour or forced contributions from the population, and for steps taken to ensure that such instructions are fully publicized and effectively supervised. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information about the measures of this nature it is taking, including a translated and dated copy of the text of the instructions it states have been issued reconfirming the prohibition of forced labour and of the “necessary details” it states are contained in its directives and instructions.

17. Making adequate budgetary provisions for the replacement of forced and unpaid labour. The Committee recalls that in its recommendations the Commission of Inquiry drew attention to the need to make adequate budgetary provisions to hire free wage labour for the public activities which are today based on forced and unpaid labour. In its report received on 27 August 2009, the Government has reiterated previous indications in stating that it “provides the budget allotment including labour costs for all Ministries to implement their respective projects”. In previous observations the Committee, noting the information available on actual practice which shows that forced labour continues to be imposed in many parts of the country, particularly in those areas with a heavy military presence, has considered it obvious that any budgetary allocations that are specifically designated for the recruitment of free wage labour have not been adequate or adequately utilized. The Committee once again urges the Government to use state budget allotments to provide civil and military authorities at all levels the financial means for utilizing voluntary paid labour for needed tasks and services, and which are adequate enough to eliminate the material incentives for recourse to forced and unpaid labour, and that it report in detail on the steps taken to that end and on the effect of such measures in actual practice.

18. Giving publicity to and raising awareness about forced labour and its prohibitions. The Committee notes from the Government’s reports and the documents submitted to the Governing Body and to the Conference Committee, the indications that a number of activities to give publicity to and raise awareness about the forced labour situation, the legal prohibitions of forced labour and existing avenues of recourse for victims were carried out in 2009. These included, inter alia, a joint ILO–MOL awareness-raising seminar for civil and military personnel held in Karen State and Northern Shan State in April and May of 2009; a joint seminar held in Rhakine State with participants representing both the civil and military authorities; and a joint presentation to a refresher training programme for senior township judges. A booklet comprised of the texts of the SU and related documents and translated into the Myanmar language, was prepared (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 4) and distributed to civilian and military authorities nationwide, to civil society groups, and the general public for awareness-raising purposes (Report to the Conference Committee, paragraph 18). Some 16,000 copies had been circulated as of November 2009; however, the Government had yet to agree to the production of a simply-worded brochure, translated into local languages, which outlined the law against forced labour and the procedures available to victims to exercise rights under the law (GB.306/6, paragraph 10). The Government, in its reports received on 6 and 21 October 2009, refers to a number of activities carried out in May and August of 2009 by the Committee for the Prevention of Military Recruitment of Under-Age Children, including law lectures for officer trainees at military camps; supervision of training on recruitment procedures at military training schools and basic training units; and informational visits to numerous regiments and recruitment centres. A rural infrastructure project in the cyclone-affected area of the Irrawaddy Delta implemented by the Office of the ILO Liaison Officer with cooperation from the MOL, a second phase of which was carried out through September of 2009 but with a further extension declined by the Government, included awareness-raising seminars (GB.306/6, paragraph 22) and was reported to have played a valuable role in raising awareness in the cyclone-affected area as to the rights and responsibilities in employment, in particular those relating to the prohibition of forced labour (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 23). The Committee notes the indication of the Liaison Officer in November 2009 of an increase in new complaints filed under the SU complaints mechanism during the five-and-a-half-month period from mid-May through 28 October 2009, which he considered to be due to heightened awareness generally of citizens’ rights, the maturing and expansion of the facilitators’ network, and an increased readiness to present complaints. The Liaison Officer further observed, however, that awareness levels, particularly in rural areas, remained low (GB.306/6, paragraph 4). The Government had also yet to issue an authoritative public statement at the highest level, as called for by ILO supervisory organs, to clearly reconfirm its policy prohibiting all forms of forced labour throughout the country and its intention to prosecute perpetrators, both civilian and military (Report to the Conference Committee, paragraph 24, GB.306/6, Conclusions).

19. The Committee considers the publicity and awareness-raising activities noted above to represent a step forward, and the recent increase in new complaints received under the SU and partly attributed to such activities to be a positive sign; however, these measures continue to be largely ad hoc, partial and piecemeal in nature. The Committee reiterates the need for the Government to commit itself more fully to publicity and awareness-raising activities, to conceive and undertake them in a more coherent and systematic way, and with a view to the tangible effect they have on the observance in practice by civil and military authorities and personnel at all levels, and in all areas of the country, of their legal obligation not to exact forced labour, and on the efforts of victims of forced labour throughout the country to seek legal recourse. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will supply information on measures of this nature being taken or contemplated, including information about their practical effect, observed or anticipated.

20. Monitoring the situation of forced labour including efforts to enforce its prohibitions. The Committee notes the important role in assisting the Government with monitoring and investigating the situation of forced labour in Myanmar, including enforcement of rights and obligations arising out of the prohibitions of forced labour, which has been accorded to the ILO Liaison Officer, both under the broad mandate of the Understanding of 2002 and in the framework of the SU complaints mechanism. The Committee notes that several ad hoc investigation missions and inspection tours were carried out by the Liaison Officer and the Ministry of Labour in late 2008 and early 2009, and that presentations were made to NGOs and civil society groupings, in part, to seek their support in forced labour observation and reporting (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraphs 5 and 6). A small sub-unit of the Office of the Liaison Officer has been established for dealing with under-age recruitment complaints and for monitoring and reporting on the child soldier situation nationwide (GB.306/6, paragraph 21). The Committee considers these to be positive steps. At the same time, however, the reach of the SU mechanism in a country the size of Myanmar is still very limited (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 10); the ILO Liaison Officer is based in Yangon and is provided meagre facilities and a small staff (paragraph 12); he does not have the authority to initiate complaints on the basis of his own observation or information (GB.306/6, paragraph 6) or his own investigations of under-age military recruitment (GB.304/5/1(Rev.), paragraph 7); and there are continuing practical impediments to the physical ability of victims of forced labour or their families to complain, such that a network of complaints facilitators remains a necessity (Report to the Conference Committee, paragraph 12). The complaints mechanism of the SU is being undermined (GB.306/6, paragraph 4) by the continued imprisonment of labour activists with a record of support in the facilitation of complaints under the SU (GB.306/6, paragraphs 14 and 16), by serious cases of apparent harassment and judicial retaliation against complaining victims, facilitators and other persons associated with complaints filed with the ILO (GB.306/6, paragraphs 11–14; Report to Conference Committee, paragraph 10), and by the refusal of local civil and military authorities, as well as local courts, to respect the terms of formal complaint settlements, notably the agreements in several land-confiscation cases that resulted from joint ILO–MOL investigative missions carried out in Magwe Division in December 2008 and March 2009 (GB.306/6, paragraphs 13 and 15). In this regard notations in the Register of cases under the SU mechanism indicate a number of cases, including Cases Nos 149, 150, 151, 204, 205 and 206, in which complainants chose not to pursue their claims out of fear of reprisals (GB.306/6, Appendix IV). A formal proposal of the ILO Liaison Officer to the Working Group for joint action to address these issues with a view to achieving lasting solutions has not been accepted by the Government (GB.306/6, paragraph 15). Noting the obligation of the Government under the 2002 Understanding and the 2007 SU to take appropriate steps to enable the ILO Liaison Officer to effectively discharge the work and responsibilities arising therein, including extending to his Office the requisite facilities and support, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take immediate steps to address the serious problems noted above, and it requests information from the Government in its next report on the progress of those steps. More generally, the Committee urges the Government to take necessary measures to ensure that a climate exists for a monitoring and investigation process that is effective, national in its reach and scope, and fully respected by all elements and all levels of society. It requests that in its next report the Government supply information on the progress of measures so taken or contemplated.

III. Enforcement of penalties

21. The Committee recalls that section 374 of the Penal Code provides for the punishment, by a term of imprisonment of up to one year, of anyone who unlawfully compels any person to labour against his or her will, and that Order No. 1/99 and its supplementing Order of 27 October 2000, as well as the series of instructions and letters, issued by Government authorities in 2000, 2004 and 2005 with a view to securing the enforcement of those orders, provide for persons “responsible” for forced labour, including members of the armed forces, to be referred for prosecution under section 374 of the Penal Code or other applicable provisions of law. The Committee notes that none of the complaints under the SU mechanism assessed and forwarded by the ILO Liaison Officer to the Working Group for investigation and appropriate action resulted, in 2009, in a decision to prosecute perpetrators of forced labour. The notations in the Register of cases under the SU mechanism (as of 23 October 2009) indicate that in at least 14 of the closed cases, the Liaison Officer considered the penalties or punishment imposed or disciplinary actions taken to be inadequate, and that the Working Group has routinely rejected recommendations made for more serious sanctions to be applied (GB.306/6, Appendix IV). Recent cases involving complaints of under-age military recruitment have resulted in the discharge of the child victims but with only administrative sanctions, if any, imposed on the perpetrators; there have been no prosecutions under criminal law (GB.304/5/1, paragraph 7). In Case No. 127 an explicit recommendation by the Liaison Officer for criminal prosecution was rejected. The Committee notes the observation of the Liaison Officer that the need for the imposition of meaningful penalties on perpetrators “continues to be a concern, particularly in respect of cases involving military personnel” (GB.306/6, paragraph 7), and that in the most serious cases of under-age military recruitment the penalties remained inadequate (Report to the Conference Committee, paragraph 15). The Committee urges the Government once again to take measures to ensure that the penalties imposed by law for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour are adequate and strictly enforced, as required by Article 25 of the Convention, and it requests the Government to supply information in its next report on the progress of measures taken to that end. The Committee hopes that fulfilment of the Government’s commitments as a party to the SU will be better reflected in the processing of cases forwarded to the Working Group by the ILO Liaison Officer, in terms of greater weight being accorded to the preliminary assessments of the Liaison Officer and a greater number of investigations leading to prosecutions, convictions and the imposition of criminal penalties rather than to case closures, and it requests information on progress being made in that vein.

Concluding comments

22. In summary, the Committee observes that the Government has yet to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry; to wit: it has failed to amend or repeal the Towns Act and the Village Act; it has taken no concrete actions shown to have brought about in any significant and lasting way an end to the exaction of forced labour in practice; and it has failed to ensure that penalties for the exaction of forced labour under the Penal Code or other relevant provisions of law have been strictly enforced against civil and military authorities and personnel who are responsible for it. While the Office of the ILO Liaison Officer, by virtue of the broad mandate set forth under the Understanding of 19 March 2002, and the procedures and mechanisms provided for under the SU, has been accorded a critical role in assisting the Government in its efforts to bring about the elimination of forced labour, the robust and fully fledged cooperation of the Government that is vital to the fulfilment of that role, including the cooperation needed in extending the requisite facilities and support and in engendering full respect for, and trust in, these special organs by the society at large, leaves much room for improvement. The Committee once again urges the Government to give credence to its expressed commitment to eliminate the use of forced labour in Myanmar and take the long overdue steps that are required to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and achieve compliance with the Convention in law and in practice.

Nicaragua

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1967)

Article 1, paragraphs (a) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions for expressing political views and participating in strikes. In its previous comments the Committee referred to sections 522 and 523 of the Penal Code, by virtue of which penalties of imprisonment, which involve the obligation to work, could be imposed as punishment for the expression of political views (inciting non-observance of the Constitution, organizing or joining communist parties or parties with another name that support the same or similar ideas), or participation in strikes declared illegal.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the provisions mentioned are not contained in the new Penal Code promulgated in May of 2008.

Nigeria

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, Laws of the Federation of Nigeria, 1990, which contains provisions imposing certain restrictions on the organization of public assemblies, meetings and processions (sections 1–4), offences being punishable with imprisonment (sections 3 and 4(5)), which involves compulsory prison labour. The Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system.

The Committee also refers in this connection to paragraphs 154 and 162 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, restrictions affecting the organization of such meetings and assemblies may give rise to similar problems of the application of the Convention, if such restrictions are enforceable with penalties involving compulsory labour.

While noting the Government's statement in the report that the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, does not impose restrictions on the organization of public assemblies by workers for trade union activities and there is therefore no conviction for violation, the Committee observes, however, that the above Act still imposes restrictions on the freedom of expression enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, which is incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring the provisions of the Public Order Act into conformity with the Convention. While having noted the Government's indication in its previous report that there was no record of the violation of the provisions of the Act, the Committee reiterates its hope that, pending the amendment, the Government will continue to provide information on its application in practice, including information on convictions for violation of its provisions and on penalties imposed.

In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, which imposes certain restrictions on journalists' activities enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (section 19(1) and (5)(a)), which involves compulsory prison labour. While having noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that no conviction has been made under the Act, and referring also to the explanations in point 1 of this observation, the Committee reiterates its hope that measures will be taken to repeal or amend these provisions in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. Pending the amendment, the Government is requested to continue to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, indicating, in particular, any convictions under the above Act and penalties imposed.

Article 1(c) and (d). Punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (which involves compulsory prison labour):

- section 81(1)(b) and (c) of the Labour Decree, 1974, under which a court may direct fulfilment of a contract of employment and posting of security for the due performance of so much of the contract as remains unperformed, and a person failing to comply with such direction may be committed to prison;
- section 117(b), (c) and (e) of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which seafarers are liable to imprisonment for breaches of labour discipline even in the absence of a danger to the safety of the ship or of persons;
- section 17(2)(a) of the Trade Disputes Act, Cap. 432, of 1990, under which participation in strikes may be punished with imprisonment.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications that all these provisions were under consideration by the National Labour Advisory Council. It also noted the Government's indication in its 2005 report that the review of the labour laws had been completed and submitted to the federal Government for further action. In its latest report, the Government states that the provisions referred to above have been addressed in the Collective Labour Relations Bill. The Committee expresses the firm hope that all of the legislative provisions referred to above will soon be amended, so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will indicate, in its next report, the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes with regret that no comments have been received from the Government in reply to the following communications received from the organizations of workers, which contain observations concerning the application of the Convention by Pakistan: communications dated 31 August and 19 September 2006 received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now – the International Trade Unions Confederation (ITUC)), communication dated 30 March 2007 received from the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFUTU) and communication dated 2 May 2007 received from the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF). The Committee previously noted that the above communications were sent to the Government, in September and October 2006 and in May and June 2007, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee also notes two new communications received from the ITUC (dated 29 August 2008) and PWF (dated 21 September 2008), which were sent to the Government, in September and October 2008, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government will not fail to supply its comments in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

I. Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention

A. Debt bondage

In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the difficulties in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992. The Committee notes the communications from the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) and the All Pakistan Trade Union Federation (APTUF) dated 26 April 2005 and 14 May 2005, respectively, which contain comments on the observance of the Convention and which were forwarded to the Government in June and July 2005 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. Among other things, the APTUF observed that the BLSA was not being implemented, and the APTUF similarly observed that laws, including those concerning bonded labour, were not being enforced due to the absence of adequate labour inspection machinery. Since no comments from the Government on these communications have been received to date, the Committee hopes the Government will provide them in its next report.

The Committee notes the National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers of 2001, which the Government communicated in its latest report. The Committee notes that under the plan of action, a National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour was to be established to coordinate the implementation of the plan, with the specific functions of:

- reviewing the implementation of the BLSA and of the action plan;
- monitoring the work of the district-level vigilance committees set up under section 15 of the BLSA and the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Rules, 1995; and
- addressing concerns of national and international bodies on bonded and forced labour issues.

The Committee notes the statement by the Ministry of Labour in its 2005 draft Labour Protection Policy, that the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action “clearly establishes the intentions and commitment of Government to implement in full” the Convention. The Committee further notes, however, the statement of the Ministry of Labour in its document, “Labour Policy, 2002”, dated 23 September 2002, that the targets and activities set out in the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action “need to be actively implemented”.

Implementation of National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour

The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government specifies recent initiatives against bonded labour it is taking or contemplating, apparently within the framework of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, including:

- establishment of a Legal Aid Service Unit in the Labour Departments of Punjab and NWFP with a toll free help line to provide legal advice and assistance to needy bonded labourers, with a plan envisaged to hire legal experts to provide legal assistance;
- launching a scheme to construct low-cost housing for freed bonded labour families in the agricultural sector of Sindh, which will provide shelter to these families and contribute to their rehabilitation;
- organizing training workshops for key district government officials and other concerned stakeholders to enhance their capacity and enable them to draw up district-level plans to identify bonded labourers and activate the district vigilance committees; and
- incorporating the issue of bonded labour into the syllabi of judicial, police and civil service academies, in order to help sensitize judicial, law enforcement, and civil service officials to the problem, and holding capacity-building seminars.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, under the BLSA, inspection functions in the area of bonded labour have been assigned to the regular labour inspectorate, as well as to local government heads/officials and police departments. The Committee also notes from the 2001 action plan document, that the fund mandated by the BLSA Rules had been established and an initial deposit of 100 million rupees had been made. The Government, in its report received in January 2005 (on the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)), indicates that work has started on making the Bonded Labour Fund functional, and that a project manual was being prepared to provide guidelines to executing agencies for preparing project proposals for financing.

While recognizing these government initiatives to try and combat bonded labour, the Committee hopes that necessary measures are being taken or envisaged to ensure the effective implementation of the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide detailed information on progress made and practical results achieved, including copies of relevant reports on all of the activities, projects, institutions and mandates referred to in the action plan. The Committee further asks that the Government provide information clarifying the present status of the district vigilance committees as well as their role in, and relationship to, the labour inspection process, and that it supply information about actions that both the district magistrates and vigilance committees are taking to ensure the effective implementation of the BLSA and the fulfilment of their other functions as mandated under the BLSA and the 1995 rules, such information to include copies of monitoring/evaluation reports prepared by the National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour.

Special programme of action to combat forced/bonded labour

The Committee in its report (on the application of Convention No. 105), received in January 2005, the Government indicates that since mid-2002 it has been carrying out a special Programme of Action to Combat Forced/Bonded Labour with technical assistance from the ILO. The Government indicates that under the programme the ILO was, among other things, to provide training on human rights and bonded labour concerns to the District Nazims, members of the vigilance committees, and judicial and law enforcement officials; to assist the Government in developing partnerships with stakeholders, employers, and workers; to provide advice on the creation of a high-level national body to combat forced labour; and to assist it in launching demonstration projects to test the feasibility of approaches adopted to tackle the problem. The Committee asks that, in its next report, the Government provide more detailed and comprehensive information concerning this programme and its implementation, including copies of the most recent reports evaluating programme activities and outcomes.

Debt bondage: Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem

The Committee notes that under the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action a national survey to ascertain the extent of bonded labour was to have been undertaken by January 2002, yet it notes the Government's indication in its latest report that no such quantitative survey has yet been carried out to measure the quantum of the problem in the country.

The Committee notes a 2004 report of an initiative of the Ministry of Labour and the ILO, entitled "Rapid Assessment Studies of Bonded Labour in Different Sectors in Pakistan", which contains findings and conclusions from a series of rapid assessment studies conducted from October 2002 to January 2003 by teams of social scientists and researchers under the auspices of the Bonded Labour Research Forum (BLRF), the aim of which was to explore the existence and nature of bonded labour in ten sectors – namely, agriculture, construction, carpet weaving, brick making, marine fisheries, mining, glass bangles, tanneries, domestic work, and begging – and to seek preliminary conclusions. The project represented the first phase of a larger research programme and was intended to lay the groundwork for detailed sector studies and a national survey to determine the incidence of bonded labour across the country, as foreseen in the Government's National Plan of Action. The rapid assessment studies focused primarily on debt bondage but also explored other forms of bonded and forced labour without debt.

The Committee notes the conclusion in the report that the findings in "the sectors covered ... yield fresh insights into the workings of the peshgi (advance payments) system and its possible relationship with bonded labour and other coercive labour arrangements". The correlation was found to be "relatively weak" in some sectors but present in others. The report also emphasizes the findings that there exist "other forms of labour bonding and coercion ... not clearly associated with the peshgi system".

The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government, as a follow-up to the preliminary part of the research programme noted above and in accordance with the mandate of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, will undertake a statistical survey on bonded labour throughout the country, using a valid methodology in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Bonded labour in agriculture

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's view that there are built-in deficiencies in its labour laws on dealing with labour engaged in the agricultural sector. The Committee asks once again that the Government supply further information on the issue, as well as information on measures taken or envisaged to remedy the situation, in the context of the eradication of bonded labour in agriculture.

B. Trafficking in persons

The Committee notes the promulgation of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), which entered into force in October 2002. Among other things, the ordinance criminalizes "human trafficking", which it defines, in part, as trafficking that entails the use of coercion for the purpose of attaining any benefit or for the purpose of exploitative entertainment, slavery or forced labour (sections 2(h) and 3); makes trafficking offences punishable by sanctions involving sentences of imprisonment of up to seven years and, in cases of trafficking of women, of up to ten years, as well as fines (section 3); provides for special sentences for trafficking offences committed by organized criminal groups (section 4) and for repeated offences (section 5); provides for the payment of compensation and expenses to victims (section 6); and makes trafficking in persons cognizable by the courts as a prosecutable offence (sections 8 and 10). The Committee asks that in its next report the Government supply a copy of the most recent rules and regulations that have been promulgated to implement the PCHTO.

Trafficking in persons. Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem

The Committee notes the 2005 report of the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) entitled, "Data and research on human trafficking: A global survey", which indicates that Pakistan continues to be a major destination country for trafficked women as well as a major transit country of persons trafficked from Bangladesh to Middle Eastern countries, where women are exploited for sexual exploitation. The report indicates that men are seldom viewed as "victims of trafficking" and more often in the context of irregular migration, and that this shortcoming has limited the availability of knowledge and data on trafficking in men in South Asia. The report emphasizes that, while available studies contribute to an understanding of the causes, sources, destinations, and consequences of trafficking, current statistics on trafficking in persons are outdated or anecdotal, and there is an urgent need to carry out comprehensive national baseline surveys with the aim of developing a South Asian database on trafficking in persons. In light of these indications, the Committee hopes that the Government will undertake a national baseline survey on trafficking in persons, in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations as well as other societal organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Practical measures aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons

The Committee notes the information concerning the Government's collaboration with the IOM in an action programme on migration issues which includes, as a significant component, the problem of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes that, at the 12th Summit of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) in Islamabad in January 2004, the Government agreed to the Islamabad Declaration, which among other things calls on member States to "move towards an early ratification" of the SAARC Convention on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Women and Children for Prostitution, adopted in 2002 (paragraph 19). The Committee also notes that in May 2005, representatives of the Government and other participants at the Fifth South Asia Ministerial Conference adopted the "Islamabad Declaration: Review and Future Action", in which, among other things, they "recognize the gaps and challenges in implementation" in a number of areas, including an inadequate commitment, awareness, measures, and resources to combat violence against women (paragraph 5(g)); and the lack of regional cooperation and partnership initiatives to address problems of regional concerns such as trafficking in women (paragraph 5(q)). The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to develop policies and take measures that are aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons in both law and practice, in conformity with the Convention, and that in its next report it will supply detailed information in this connection.

II. Restrictions on voluntary termination of employment

In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the information supplied by the Government representative to the Conference Committee in June 1999, according to which an amendment to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act of 1952, under which government employees who unilaterally terminate their employment without consent from the employer are subject to a term of imprisonment, was to be considered by the tripartite Commission on the Consolidation, Simplification and Rationalization of Labour Laws. The Government indicated in its report of 2000 that the Commission's final report was expected at the end of September 2000. As the Government's latest report contains no new information on this subject, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the Commission's report. The Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to bring the federal and provincial essential services Acts into conformity with the Convention and will report on the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee also repeats its request for copies of the full texts of the following Ordinances enacted in 2000: the Removal from Service (Special Powers) Ordinance, No. XVII of 27 May 2000; the Civil Servants (Amendment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1 June 2000; and the Compulsory Service in the Armed Forces (Amendment) Ordinance, No. LXIII of 6 December 2000.

III. Article 25. Adequacy and enforcement of penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour. Enforcement of Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992

The Committee previously noted the allegations of the ICFTU, contained in its communications of 2001, according to which the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992 (BLSA) had not been applied in practice, as few officials were willing to implement it for fear of incurring the wrath of the landlords, thus allowing the latter to use forced labour with impunity. Recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee once again requests information on the number of inspections under the BLSA, as well as information about any legal actions taken against employers of bonded labourers, including copies of any court rulings in such cases.

Enforcement of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance

With regard to enforcement of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), the Committee notes a press statement by the Minister of the Interior in June 2005 that, during the period from 2003 to May 2005, 888 trafficking-related complaints under the PCHTO were registered with the Federal Investigation Agency; that as many as 737 suspected traffickers were arrested; that in 336 of these cases investigations subsequently led to court prosecutions; and that these prosecutions resulted in 85 convictions and four acquittals, with the remaining cases still pending in trial. The Committee also notes from the report of the Prime Minister Secretariat, "One year performance of the Government, August 2004 August 2005", dated 29 August 2005, a section on "Curbing human trafficking" in a chapter entitled "Improving law and order", which states:

The Government through the Federal Investigation Agency has adopted stringent measures to curb human trafficking ... For sustained action against human trafficking, Anti-Trafficking Units (ATUs) have been set up at FIA HQ and in zonal directorates. These outfits are dedicated units for the enforcement of laws relating to prevention of human trafficking to and from Pakistan. To solicit support from the Civil Society, leading NGOs have also been co-opted for information and assistance.

The Committee also notes the indication in the 2005 Annual Report of the Law Division of the Ministry of Law, Justice and Human Rights that, while the Government has promulgated an ordinance to criminalize human trafficking, "a lot needs to be done for effective implementation of that ordinance".

The Committee asks that in its next report the Government provide updated information on the enforcement of the PCHTO, including statistics concerning the numbers of trafficking-related complaints registered, individuals arrested, court proceedings initiated, convictions obtained, penalties imposed, and victim compensation awarded, including copies of all relevant court rulings. More generally, it hopes that the Government, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, will endeavour to both assess whether and ensure that the penalties provided under the PCHTO that punish trafficking are really adequate and will strive to ensure that the PCHTO is strictly enforced, and that it provide information in this connection, including updated information concerning the evolution of the system of anti-trafficking units and assessing its strengths and shortcomings.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

I. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not yet responded to the observations made in 2001 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now the International Trade Union Confederation, ITUC), and in 2005 by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) concerning the application of the Convention, which were forwarded to the Government in 2001 and 2005 respectively. The Committee also notes a new communication received from the Pakistan

Workers' Federation (dated 21 September 2008), which was sent to the Government in October 2008 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee hopes that the Government will not fail to supply its comments concerning all the abovementioned communications of workers' organizations in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

II. Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Forced or compulsory labour as punishment for breach of contract or participation in strikes in non-essential services. In earlier comments made under the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee has noted that the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act (ESA), 1952, and corresponding provincial Acts, prohibit employees from leaving their employment, even by giving notice, without the consent of the employer, as well as from striking, subject to penalties of imprisonment that may involve compulsory labour. The Committee has also noted previous comments, made under the Convention by the APFTU, according to which the Government has applied provisions of the ESA to workers employed in non-essential services, including various public utilities such as the Water and Power Distribution Authority (WAPDA), the Karachi Port Trust, and Sui Gas, as well as railways and telecommunications, and these workers cannot resign from their service and cannot go on strike.

The Committee notes the indication of the Worker member of Pakistan, in the Conference Committee at the 90th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2002, that management in the Karachi Electric Supply Corporation, and in the telecommunications and railway industries generally, had been making use of the provisions of the ESA to prevent workers from presenting their legitimate demands and to refuse any type of social dialogue. He referred in particular to workers in Quetta who had gone on strike and been arrested. The Committee also notes, from the APFTU communication dated 26 April 2005, the indication that the provisions of the ESA continue to be applied to ban strikes in non-essential services.

The Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that, while that the Act has remained on the books, that most public sector organizations to which the ESA was applied were undergoing privatization, including WAPDA and the telecommunications and oil and gas sectors, and that the Act would therefore no longer be applicable when those organizations had been fully privatized. The Committee notes from its latest report the Government's indication, which it has repeated for a number of years, that the provisions of the ESA are applied restrictively.

The Committee points out once again, with reference to the explanations provided in paragraphs 110 and 123 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, that the Convention does not protect persons responsible for breaches of labour discipline or strikes that impair the operation of essential services in the strict sense or in other circumstances where life and health are in danger; however, in such cases there must exist an effective danger, not mere inconvenience. Furthermore, all the workers concerned – whether in any employment under the federal and provincial governments and local authorities or in public utilities, including essential services – must remain free to terminate their employment by reasonable notice; otherwise, a contractual relationship based on the will of the parties is changed into service by compulsion of law, which is incompatible with both the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), likewise ratified by Pakistan. The Committee also recalls that, in its comments to the Government on its application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it has observed that the ESA includes services which cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, including, among others, oil production, postal services, railways, airways, and ports, and it has for some time requested that the Government amend the ESA so as to ensure that its scope is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Convention No. 87 on this point. It reiterates its firm hope that the ESA, and corresponding provincial Acts, will be repealed or amended in the near future so as to ensure the observance of the Convention, and that the Government will report on the action taken to this effect.

Forcible return of seafarers on board ship. The Committee has, from the time of the Government's ratification of the Convention in 1960, referred to sections 100 to 103 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in relation to various breaches of labour discipline by seafarers, and seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Ordinance (PMSO), 2001 (No. LII of 2001). It observes that the PMSO still contains provisions, particularly sections 204, 206, 207, and 208, which would permit, in respect of various breaches of labour discipline, such as absence without leave, wilful disobedience, or combining with the crew in "neglect" of duty, the imposition of sanctions involving the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship, as well as imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour by virtue, inter alia, of section 3(26) of the General Clauses Act, 1897). The Committee regrets that, after decades of comments addressed to the Government on this point, the Government has promulgated new legislation without eliminating the divergences between its national legislation and the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will amend or repeal without delay those provisions of the 2001 Ordinance that prescribe penalties for breaches of labour discipline under which seafarers may be imprisoned or forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. The Government is also asked to provide a copy of the implementing rules or regulations promulgated under section 603 of the 2001 Ordinance.

Article 1(a) and (e). Forced labour as a means of political coercion. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to certain provisions in the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 (sections 10–13), the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (sections 12, 23, 24, 27, 28, 30, 36, 56 and 59) and the Political Parties Act, 1962 (sections 2 and 7), which give the authorities wide discretionary powers to prohibit the publication of views and to order the dissolution of associations, subject to penalties of imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour.

The Committee notes the promulgation of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, which repeals the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (section 45). Under the registration provisions of the 2002 Ordinance, a District Coordination Officer must deny authentication of a declaration, which must be made as a prerequisite for publication of a newspaper, in cases where the declaration has been filed by a person convicted of a criminal offence involving moral turpitude or for wilful default of public dues (section 10(2)(c)). Where the District Coordination Officer fails to take action to authenticate or to pass an order denying authentication of a declaration within a period of 30 days, the declaration is deemed to be authenticated (section 10(4)). Anyone who, among other things, edits, prints, or publishes a newspaper in contravention of the Ordinance – for instance, without having made a declaration or without having a declaration authenticated – is liable to punishment involving a sanction of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to six months (sections 5 and 28). Referring to paragraph 133 of the General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, the Committee asks the Government in its next report to indicate in relation to the abovementioned provisions of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, the measures taken or envisaged to ensure, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including labour exacted as a consequence of a sentence of imprisonment) may be imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 5, 10(2)(c), 28 and 30 of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, including the number of persons arrested and convicted under these provisions, as well as the particulars of any judicial decisions which may serve to define or clarify the effect of the abovementioned provisions. The Government is also requested to supply a copy of the text of any rules promulgated under section 44 of the Ordinance to implement it.

As regards the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, the Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that the application of these statutes was extremely restrictive. The Committee also notes from the Annual Reports of 2003 and 2005 of the Government's Law and Justice Commission, as well as its Report No. 56, that the Commission, in response to a Supreme Court ruling, had approved and drafted legislative proposals for certain amendments to be made to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and that proposed reforms to other legislation, including the Political Parties Act, 1962, were under consideration. The Committee hopes that the concerns of the Committee will be taken into consideration in the work of the Law and Justice Commission. More generally, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon take the necessary measures to bring the abovementioned provisions of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Government is requested to supply updated information on their practical application, including the cases registered, the number of convictions, and copies of any relevant court decisions.

The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government has indicated, with reference to the non-conformity with the Convention of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, that "Pakistan is serving in the front line of the war against terrorism and in retaliation the unscrupulous elements off and on try to disrupt the supply chain of oil as well as natural gas to make stand still the whole economy of the country". It notes the similar indication by the representative of the Government in the Conference Committee in June 2002, with reference to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, that Pakistan "was in the forefront of the fight against terrorism and faced very difficult political circumstances", and that under the present circumstances any change to the existing laws might not be feasible, particularly those related to the security of the country. The Committee observes that these laws, as well as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, have been the subject of comments by the Committee ever since the Government ratified the Convention in 1960, and that they have also been the subject of numerous discussions in the Conference Committee. The Committee would also like to point out that, if counter-terrorism legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the security of the public against the use of violence, it can nevertheless become a means of political coercion and a means of punishing the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as the freedom of expression and the right to organize. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression by means of sanctions involving compulsory work, and the limits which may be imposed on them by law need to be properly addressed.

The Committee hopes that, as a matter of urgency, the Government will at long last take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of the national legislation mentioned above into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved.

The use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of religious discrimination. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 298B(1) and (2) and 298C of the Penal Code, inserted by the Anti-Islamic Activities of Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadi (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1984, under which any person of these groups who uses Islamic epithets, nomenclature and titles is subject to punishment with imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term that may extend to three years.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statements in its reports that religious discrimination does not exist and is forbidden under the Constitution, which guarantees equal citizenship and fundamental rights to minorities living in the country. The Government states that subject to law, public order and morality, the minorities have the right to profess, propagate their religion and establish, maintain and manage their religious institutions. In the Government's view, the Penal Code imposes equal obligations on all citizens, whatever their religion, to respect the religious sentiments of others, and an act that impinges upon the religious sentiments of other citizens is punishable under the Penal Code. The Government indicates that religious rituals referred to in Ordinance No. XX are prohibited only if exercised in public, whereas if they are performed in private without causing provocation to others, they do not fall under the prohibition.

While noting this information, the Committee points out once again, that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But where punishment involving compulsory labour is aimed at the peaceful expression of religious views, or where such punishment (for whatever offence) is meted out more severely, or even exclusively, to certain groups defined in social or religious terms, this falls within the scope of the Convention. The Committee therefore reiterates that it firmly hopes the necessary measures will be taken in relation to sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, so as to ensure the observance of the Convention. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Committee requests that in its next report the Government provide updated and detailed factual information on the practical application of the provisions of sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, including a record of cases registered, the number of persons convicted, and copies of court decisions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Papua New Guinea

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions applicable to seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline. In comments it has been making since 1978, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act, 1952, under which a seafarer belonging to a foreign ship who deserts or commits certain other disciplinary offences is liable to imprisonment which involves an obligation to perform labour (section 2(1), (3), (4) and (5)). The Committee also referred to section 1 of the same Act and section 161 of the revised Merchant Shipping Act (chapter 242) (consolidated to No. 67 of 1996), which stipulate that foreign seafarers deserting their ship may be forcibly returned on board ship.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, referring also to the explanations in paragraph 179 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) would only be compatible with the Convention where they are clearly limited to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the life or health of the persons, but not where they relate more generally to breaches of labour discipline, such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience; similarly, provisions under which seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship are not compatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that numerous requests concerning the Committee's comments have been communicated to the Department of Transport, which is responsible for administering and applying the above legislation, with a view to amending these provisions. It also notes the Government's renewed commitment to review these provisions in connection with the overall revision of the labour legislation being undertaken with ILO technical assistance, as well as the Government's indication that it is hopeful the amendment of these provisions will take place in 2005–06.

While noting these indications, the Committee expresses firm hope that the above provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act and the Merchant Shipping Act will soon be brought into conformity with the Convention and asks the Government to report the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Paraguay

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Debt bondage of indigenous communities in the Chaco. In its previous observation the Committee once again expressed its concern about the existence of cases of debt bondage in the indigenous communities of the Chaco. It noted the report Debt bondage and marginalization in the Chaco of Paraguay, carried out under the technical cooperation project called “Forced labour, discrimination and poverty reduction among indigenous peoples”, which is part of the Special Action Programme to combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL) of the ILO. The investigation summarized in the report confirms the existence of forced labour practices, specifying a number of factors that lead to situations of forced labour encountered by many indigenous workers on the estates of Chaco: the payment of wages to workers that are below the legal minimum; providing them with insufficient quantities of food; charging excessive prices for those provisions available for purchase, there being no access on the estates to other markets or means of subsistence (hunting and fishing); and the payment of partial or total wages in kind. All of these lead to the indebtedness of workers which obliges them, and in many cases their families as well, to work permanently on the estates. The report was confirmed during workshops conducted separately with organizations of employers and workers as well as for the inspection services.

The Committee also noted the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning violations of section 47 of the Labour Code, which provides that a contract will be void when it fixes a salary under the minimum wage or if it involves direct or indirect obligations to buy goods or food from shops, businesses or a place determined by the employer. Articles 231 and 176 of the Labour Code provide that only 30 per cent of wages can be paid in kind, and the value of these goods must be the same as those at the nearest urban settlement. The ITUC asserts that such provisions are not being enforced in practice, thus creating conditions of indebtedness leading the indigenous workers of the Chaco into situations of forced labour.

The Committee observed that debt bondage constituted forced labour within the meaning of the Convention and a serious violation of the same, and it hoped that in its next report the Government would communicate information on the various measures taken or envisaged to combat practices by which forced labour is imposed on the indigenous workers of Chaco.

The Committee notes the discussion which took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards of the Conference in 2008 and its conclusions, in which it manifested its concern about the consequences for the indigenous workers of their situation as landless peasants, as well as the vulnerability of these workers. The Conference Committee considered that measures of an urgent nature needed to be taken.

Measures taken by the Government

Decent Work Country Programme. The Committee notes that the Government, through a tripartite initiative, has concluded a Decent Work Country Programme with the ILO, of which the objectives include better compliance with labour standards, through programmes to eradicate forced labour and the worst forms of child labour as well as strengthening labour inspection and the adaptation of Paraguayan laws to the ILO Conventions ratified by the country.

Commission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour. Action plan concerning forced labour. The Committee notes that by Resolution of the Minister of Labour and Justice No. 230 of March 2009 a Commission on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour was established. The action plan developed by the Commission includes, besides actions of awareness raising among sectors of workers and employers, a radio campaign of one month to raise awareness among the society at large and a training activity for labour inspectors followed by a visit to rural establishments. An investigation concerning indigenous women and discrimination is also planned. In addition, an Office of Labour Administration in the locality Teniente Irala Fernández (Chaco) has been established.

The Committee takes due note of the actions undertaken by the Government with a view to the eradication of forced labour of the indigenous communities of Chaco; however, the measures taken so far, although they are a first step, must be reinforced and lead to systematic action which is commensurate with the dimensions and gravity of the problem, if the latter is to be solved.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information about the mandate and functioning of the Office of Teniente Irala Fernández (Chaco), and the mechanisms foreseen for reporting cases of forced labour (procedures, competent authorities, judicial assistance). Given the principal role in the fight against forced labour played by the inspection services, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide information about the activities of these services and the measures taken to reinforce them.

The Committee further hopes that the Government will provide information about the number of cases in which the inspection services have detected infringements of sections 47, 176, and 231 of the Labour Code and refers it to the comments made on the application of the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), and the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169).

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced labour. The Committee recalls that by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, criminal sanctions shall be imposed, and strictly enforced, upon those found guilty of having imposed forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to communicate information about the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of Article 25 of the Convention, including information about provisions of national legislation which prescribe penalties to those responsible for the exaction of forced labour and copies of relevant judgements.

Article 2, paragraph 2(c). Obligation to work imposed on non-convicted detainees. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided the information requested with regard to the amendment of section 39 of Act No. 210 of 1970, which provides that work shall be compulsory for detainees. Section 10 of the above Act defines detainees as not only convicted persons, but also persons subjected to security measures in a prison establishment. The Committee recalled that persons who have been detained but not convicted shall not be obliged to carry out any type of work.

The Committee had noted the Draft Code on the Execution of Sentences, communicated by the Government in its report of 2006. Sections 127, 68 and 69 of the Draft Code, read together, provide for the obligation to work of convicted persons, those sentenced to a term of imprisonment pursuant to a final judgement rendered by a competent court. If these provisions are adopted they would be in compliance with Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention under which work or service can only be imposed on an individual by virtue of a conviction in a court of law. The Committee noted, however, that section 34 of the Draft Code states: "Provided they are compatible with the status of persons as detainees, do not contradict the principle of presumption of innocence, and are more favourable and useful for protecting said persons, the provisions relating to the living conditions and standards of conduct of Title III shall apply". The Committee observed in this respect that Title III, Chapter 7, of the Draft Code contains provisions relating to compulsory work by convicted persons which, by virtue of section 34, could be applied to detainees. It would therefore be necessary, in order to eliminate the possibility of imposing work upon those who are in preventive detention, that this be explicitly prohibited, with the clarification that the detainee could work if he so requested.

The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will be able to indicate that the national legislation has been brought into conformity with the Convention, and that it will communicate a copy of the Code on the Execution of Sentences once it has been adopted.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Shipping Act, 2004, which has repealed the Merchant Shipping Act of 1982, which contained provisions punishing various breaches of discipline by seafarers with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour), even in circumstances where the ship or the life or health of persons were not endangered.

Saudi Arabia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

Article 25 of the Convention. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. In its previous comments, the Committee has expressed its concern about the application of Article 25 of the Convention, which requires that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour be punished with penal sanctions, and that these sanctions be really adequate and strictly enforced. The Committee notes that the Government refers in this connection to section 61 of the Labour Code, which prohibits employers from using workers to exact labour without the payment of wages. The Committee observes, however, that section 61 does not contain a general prohibition of forced labour but merely lays down an obligation to remunerate the performance of work within the framework of a normal employment relationship. While relevant to the protection of normal conditions of employment, it is insufficient for purposes of the Convention.

Furthermore, section 239 provides for penalties that are limited to monetary fines and, therefore, does not meet the requirements of Article 25.

The Committee hopes that the Government will take steps to adopt a provision which prohibits the exaction of forced labour more generally, so as to cover all situations of the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour, including the situations which do not relate to the normal employment relationship, and to make violations punishable with penal sanctions, which should be really adequate and strictly enforced, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1) and 25. Trafficking in persons. The Committee notes with interest the promulgation by the Council of Ministers of Order No. 244 of 20/7/1430 H (2009) prohibiting trafficking in persons, which was communicated by the Government with its report. The Committee notes that this law prohibits all forms of trafficking in persons, including trafficking that involves the imposition of forced labour and slavery-like practices (section 2), and that it provides for criminal penalties including a sentence of imprisonment of up to fifteen years and/or a fine of one million Rials (section 3).

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the application of this legislation in practice, including information about all cases in which perpetrators have been prosecuted, convicted and sentenced. Please also provide information on the various measures taken to combat trafficking, including measures of prevention and victim protection, as well as information on the work of any special bodies established to coordinate the implementation of such measures.

Articles 1 (paragraph 1) and 2 (paragraph 1). Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. The Committee previously referred to the vulnerable situation of migrant workers, particularly migrant domestic workers, who are often confronted with employment policies such as the visa “sponsorship” system and subjected to abusive employer practices, such as retention of passports, non-payment of wages, deprivation of liberty, and physical and sexual abuse, which cause their employment to be transformed into situations that could amount to forced labour. The Committee previously noted Council of Ministers Decision No. 166 of 12/7/1421 AH (2000) regulating relations between migrant workers and their employers, which stipulates, inter alia, that employers shall not retain the passports of migrant workers or the passports of members of their families, and which provides for the establishment of a special committee to resolve any problems arising from its application. However, the Committee notes the indications of the Government in its report that lawsuits brought in disputes arising under this regulation do not terminate within reasonable deadlines, and that there are no data as to any cases in which the penalties provided therein have been applied. The Committee also notes that section 7 of the Labour Code provides for regulations to be promulgated that pertain specifically to the employment conditions of migrant domestic workers.

The Committee hopes that the Government will take steps to promulgate new regulations under section 7 of the Labour Code, and that they will provide for a protective framework of employment relations that is specially tailored to the difficult circumstances faced by migrant domestic workers and in particular to the problems caused by the visa sponsorship system, and will ensure that domestic workers are fully protected from abusive practices and conditions that amount to the exaction of forced labour. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will be able to provide information to this effect and to supply the text of the regulations, once adopted.

Senegal

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving an obligation to work for breaches of labour discipline. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with regret that the Government had not taken the opportunity afforded by the adoption of the new Merchant Shipping Code (Act No. 2002-22 of 16 August 2002) to amend the provisions which it had been commenting on for many years. Under sections 624, 643 and 645 of the new Merchant Shipping Code, unapproved absence from the vessel, verbal insults, gestures or threats towards a superior and a formal refusal to obey a service order are still punishable by imprisonment, involving compulsory prison labour, in accordance with section 692 of the Code of Penal Procedure and section 32 of Decree No. 2001-362 of 4 May 2001 concerning the implementation and organization of penal sanctions. In view of the fact that the scope of these provisions of the Merchant Shipping Code is not confined to cases in which the breach of discipline would endanger the ship or the persons on board, the Committee considered these provisions to be contrary to the Convention, which prohibits recourse to forced labour, including in the form of compulsory prison labour, as a means of labour discipline.

In its last but one report, the Government recognized that these provisions were not in conformity with the Convention. It indicated that, in practice, no prison sentence involving compulsory labour was applied and that the merchant navy had itself considered as excessive the penalties provided for and the violations penalized. For this reason, according to the Government, penal sanctions were always discarded in cases of breaches of discipline. The merchant navy had received instructions to take steps to find a definitive solution to this situation. In view of this information, the Committee considered that the Government should have no difficulties in making the necessary changes to the Merchant Shipping Code so that the legislation reflects the practice already established and is in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government indicates that the measures announced are indeed being considered with a view to making the necessary changes to the Merchant Shipping Code. In view of the above, and considering that it has been commenting on this point for more than 40 years, the Committee trusts that the Government will be able to provide information, in its next report, on the steps taken to amend sections 624, 643 and 645 of the new Merchant Shipping Code and therefore ensure conformity with the Convention in law and practice.

Article 1(d). Imposition of prison sentences involving an obligation to work as a punishment for participation in strikes. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to section L.276 of the Labour Code which allows the administrative authority to requisition workers from private enterprises and public services and establishments who are engaged in jobs that are essential for the security of persons and property, the maintenance of public order, the continuity of public services and the satisfaction of the essential needs of the nation. Any worker who does not comply with the requisition order is liable to a fine and/or imprisonment ranging from three months to one year (section L.279(m)). The Committee requested the Government to supply a copy of the decree implementing section L.276 containing the list of jobs concerned as well as information on the cases in which the competent administrative authority had had recourse to section L.276. In reply, the Government indicated that the requisition of workers is certainly justified in essential services, that it is a measure of public security and that it is on no account designed to constitute a penalty. The Government pointed out that the decree implementing section L.276 was in the process of being adopted and that, pending this, it was Decree No. 72-017 of 11 March 1972 establishing the list of posts, jobs and functions of which the occupants may be subject to requisition which continued to apply. The Committee noted this information, as well as the comments of the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS), sent in November 2006 by the Government, that the requisition of certain workers in certain situations constituted an abuse of authority intended to break strikes initiated by workers. According to the CNTS, certain employers in the private sector used this process to force workers to remain in their posts when there was no need to do so.

The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government merely indicates that the requisition only concerns jobs that are essential for the security of persons and property, the maintenance of public order, the continuity of public services or the satisfaction of the essential needs of the nation. The Committee refers to the comments that it has been making on this matter since 1998 in relation to the application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87). In these comments, the Committee has recalled on many occasions that recourse to this type of measure should be limited exclusively to the maintenance of essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population), to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or to acute national crises.

Noting that, firstly, workers who do not comply with a requisition order are liable to imprisonment involving the obligation to work (section L.279(m) of the Labour Code) and, secondly, powers of requisitioning may be exercised with regard to workers whose posts, jobs or functions are not essential services in the strict sense of the term, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the Decree implementing section L.276 of the Labour Code, which is in the process of being adopted, is in conformity with the Convention. To that end, the list of posts, jobs and functions whose occupants may be subject to requisitioning should be limited to the posts, jobs and functions which are strictly necessary to ensure the operation of essential services in the strict sense of the term, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and to acute national crises, and workers who do not comply with a requisitioning order should not be liable to imprisonment involving the obligation to work.

In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the need to amend the provisions of the last paragraph of section L.276 of the Labour Code, which states that any exercise of the right to strike accompanied by occupation of the workplace or its immediate surroundings is liable to the penalties provided for by sections L.275 and L.279, namely: loss of entitlement to the payments and benefits provided for in the event of termination of the contract (section L.275); and imprisonment ranging from three months to one year and/or a fine (section L.279). The Government indicated that the restrictions concerning the occupation of workplaces in the event of a strike were actually limited to cases in which strikes cease to be non-violent and that the penalties provided for had never been applied, such situations having always been settled by means of negotiation. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government indicates that it will take all the necessary steps to ensure that the legislation is in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee hopes that in its next report, the Government will be able to report on the steps taken to amend sections L.276, last paragraph, and L.279 of the Labour Code by removing the provisions imposing prison sentences involving the obligation to work on striking workers who occupy the workplace or its immediate surroundings and by ensuring that this right is guaranteed as long as the strike remains non-violent, therefore ensuring conformity with the Convention in law and practice.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Compulsory cultivation. Over many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on “natives”. On numerous occasions, it requested the Government to repeal or amend this provision. The Committee also noted the Government’s statement that the abovementioned section is not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution and would be held unenforceable.

The Committee takes due note of the Government’s repeated indication that section 8(h) is not applicable in practice and that information on any amendment of this section would be communicated to the ILO in the near future.

As the Government has repeatedly indicated since 1964 that this legislation would be amended, the Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Singapore

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1965)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Legislation concerning destitute persons. For many years the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Destitute Persons Act, 1989, under which destitute persons may be required, subject to penal sanctions, to reside in a welfare home (sections 3 and 16) and to engage in any suitable work for which the medical officer of the home certifies them to be capable, either with a view to fitting them for employment outside the welfare home or with a view to contributing to their maintenance in the welfare home (section 13).

The Committee points out once again that the imposition of labour under the Destitute Persons Act, 1989, comes under the definition of “forced or compulsory labour” in Article 2(1) of the Convention, and that the Convention makes no exception for labour imposed “in the context of rehabilitation” of destitute persons.

The Committee has noted the Government’s repeated indications in its reports that, in practice, residents in the welfare home are not compelled to work and are only assigned chores after they have given their written consent; they also receive payment for their participation. While noting these indications, the Committee drew the Government’s attention on several occasions to the necessity to bring the legislative provisions into conformity with the Convention, so as to ensure compliance both in law and in practice.

The Committee previously noted the Government’s statement in its 2006 report that it would be reviewing the necessity to amend section 13 of the Act to better articulate the voluntary nature of the activity, and that this exercise was expected to be completed in 2008. However, the Committee notes from the Government’s latest report that there has been no developments in this field during the reporting period.

The Committee reiterates the firm hope that section 13 of the Act will at last be amended so as to provide clearly that any work in a welfare home is to be performed voluntarily, thus bringing the abovementioned legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Sudan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee has noted the Government’s report dated 27 April 2008, received in May 2008, and the report of activities of the Committee for the Eradication of Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC) annexed to it, as well as the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008. It has also noted the observations dated 29 August 2008 received from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the application of the Convention by the Sudan, as well as the Government’s reply to these observations dated 2 November 2008, which was sent to the Office by means of communications dated 12 and 20 November 2008 and copied once again in a communication dated 9 January 2009.

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Abolition of forced labour practices. For many years, the Committee has been referring, in relation to the application of the Convention, to the continuing existence of the practices of abduction and forced labour exploitation, which affected thousands of women and children in the regions of the country where an armed conflict was under way. The Committee recalls that this case has been discussed repeatedly over the years in its own observations and on numerous occasions by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee has repeatedly pointed out that the situations concerned constitute gross violations of the Convention, since the victims are forced to perform work for which they have not offered themselves voluntarily, under extremely harsh conditions, and in combination with ill treatment which may include torture and death. The Committee has considered that the scope and gravity of the problem are such that it is necessary to take urgent action that is commensurate in scope and systematic. The Government has been therefore requested to provide detailed information on the measures taken to combat the practice of forced labour through abduction of women and children and to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators.

Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee has noted that, in its conclusions adopted in June 2008, the Conference Committee once again observed the convergence of allegations and the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in certain regions of the country. The Conference Committee noted the measures taken by the Government, such as the progress achieved by the CEAWC in the liberation of abductees, as well as the Government's efforts to improve the human rights situation in the country. However, it expressed the view that there was no verifiable evidence that forced labour was completely eradicated in practice and expressed concern at the reports relating to involuntary return of certain abductees, some of them being separated from their families, including cases of displaced and unaccompanied children. The Conference Committee also noted with concern that there was a lack of accountability of perpetrators. It urged the Government to pursue its efforts with vigour and to take effective and urgent action, including through the CEAWC, to completely eradicate the forced labour practices and to put an end to impunity by punishing perpetrators, particularly those unwilling to cooperate. The Conference Committee again invited the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO and other donors to achieve this goal, bearing in mind that only an independent verification of the situation in the country could make it possible to determine that forced labour practices had been completely eradicated.

United Nations bodies. The Committee notes that, in the UN Security Council resolution 1881 (2009), the Security Council expressed concern at the continued seriousness of the security situation and deterioration of the humanitarian situation in Darfur and reiterated its condemnation of all violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Darfur. The resolution emphasized the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of such crimes and urged the Government of Sudan to comply with its obligations in this respect. The Committee also notes a report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/11/14, June 2009), in which it is observed that, despite some positive steps in the area of law reform, improvement of the human rights situation on the ground continues to remain a significant challenge. Thus, in Darfur, human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law continued to be committed by all parties; in southern Sudan, several hundred civilians were killed in tribal conflicts and attacks by the Lords Resistance Army (LRA) and a number of women and children were abducted. According to the report, impunity remains an ongoing and serious concern in all areas of Sudan, allegations of violations of human rights are not duly investigated, many perpetrators of serious crimes have not been brought to justice and reparations have not been provided to victims. The Special Rapporteur reiterated all previously unimplemented human rights recommendations contained in her reports, and in particular, a recommendation to ensure that all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law are duly investigated and that the perpetrators are promptly brought to justice (paragraph 92(d)).

Comments from workers' organizations. In the observations dated 29 August 2008 referred to above, the ITUC pointed out that, despite the Government's statement at the Conference Committee in 2008 that there had been no further cases of abductions and forced labour in the country, information from various sources provided evidence that abductions had continued in Darfur in the context of the current conflict there, and the human rights violations taking place in Darfur showed a marked similarity to those that took place in southern Sudan during the 1983–2005 civil war, including many documented cases of abductions for sexual exploitation and forced labour. The ITUC referred, in particular, to the November 2007 report on the situation of human rights in Darfur by the UN group of experts, to the March 2008 report of the UN Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan and to the findings of the research conducted in 2006–07 by Anti-Slavery International. While welcoming the fact that the Government had finally recognized the scale of the problem and had successfully resolved 11,300 cases of abductions, the ITUC expressed concern about the release and reintegration process. It referred, in particular, to the findings by UNICEF, according to which some of those being rescued were not genuine former abductees, some returnees were not going voluntarily and some families were being split with children being moved on unaccompanied. The ITUC also noted that, although the Government described 11,300 of the 14,000 cases of abductions as "resolved", reunification with the family had only happened in 3,394 cases, which meant that less than one third of those involved had been reunited with their families. The ITUC continued to believe that the impunity that those responsible for abductions have enjoyed – illustrated by the absence of any prosecutions for abductions in the last 16 years – was responsible for the continuation of this practice throughout the civil war of 1983–2005 and for the current continued abductions in Darfur. The ITUC therefore strongly supported a recommendation made by the Conference Committee in 2008 that "only an independent verification of the situation in the country could make it possible to determine that forced labour practices had been completely eradicated". It stated that the Government should accept ILO technical assistance for a mission which should be given a mandate to review the extent to which former abductees have been successfully reintegrated into their communities.

Government's response. In its 2008 report, the Government repeated the information already supplied to the ILO in May 2007 and provided the updated information on the activities of the CEAWC up to the end of April 2008. The Government confirmed once again its strong and continued commitment to completely eradicate the phenomenon of abductions and to provide continued support to CEAWC. The Government indicated in its report, as well as in its reply to the observations by the ITUC referred to above, that out of 14,000 documented cases of abductions, CEAWC had been able to reunify abducted persons with their families in 6,000 cases. However, the Committee has noted from the report of activities of the CEAWC, dated 27 April 2008, annexed to the Government's report, that only in 3,708 cases abducted persons had been reunified with their families, including 310 new cases of reunification due to the recent funding by the Government of the Southern Sudan. The Government has confirmed once again its previous statement that abductions have stopped completely, which, according to the Government, has been confirmed also by the Dinka Chiefs Committee (DCC). For that reason, the Government has urged to dismiss this case and to stop its discussion in the ILO, since it has already been satisfactorily dealt with according to the reports of the UN specialized agencies. Concerning the situation in Darfur, the Government expressed the view that, since it was under examination by the UN Security Council and the African Union, the issues concerned should not be discussed in the ILO, in order to avoid duplication of work. Regarding the workers' concerns expressed by the ITUC in its observations referred to above about the release and reintegration process, and whether the return of abductees is voluntary, the Government stated that such concerns had no factual base. It referred to the above report of the CEAWC, which contained a reference to a letter by the UNICEF Representative in Sudan, according to which no cases of forced return had been identified and several cases of unaccompanied children had been dealt with effectively at field level in the North. The Government also indicated in its report that it committed itself to provide all funds required to complete the remaining work, despite the fact that many international agencies had claimed that the remaining abductees were no longer abductees in the strict sense of the word and called upon CEAWC to avoid forced returns. As regards the prosecution of perpetrators, the Government repeated its previous indications that CEAWC, which was initially of the view that legal action was the best measure to eradicate the abduction, had been requested by all the tribes concerned, including the DCC, not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful. The Government considered that legal action takes very long time and is very expensive, it could not build peace among the tribes concerned and did not correspond to the spirit of national reconciliation. The Government also stated that it was not in a position to force people to pursue legal action. It also rejected the recommendation that there should be an independent verification of the work of CEAWC.

While noting these views and comments, as well as the Government's renewed commitment to resolve the problem, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts in order to completely eradicate the forced labour practices which constitute a gross violation of the Convention and, in particular, to resolve the cases of abductions in all the regions of the country and to provide the means for victims to be reunified with their families. While noting the new achievements by CEAWC in the liberation of abductees, the Committee hopes that the Government would continue to provide detailed information on the liberation and reunification process, supplying accurate and reliable statistics supported by CEAWC reports. Noting also with concern that the Government's statement according to which abductions have stopped completely is in contradiction with other sources of information available, the Committee refers again to the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in certain regions of the country. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take urgent measures, in accordance with the recommendations of the relevant international bodies and agencies, to put an end to all human rights violations, which would help to create better conditions for the full observance of the forced labour Conventions. The Committee encourages the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO, in accordance with the proposal of the Conference Committee.

Article 25. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee previously noted the Criminal Code provisions punishing the offence of abduction with penalties of imprisonment, and requested the Government to take measures to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that CEAWC, which was initially of the view that legal action was the best measure to eradicate the abductions, has been requested by all the tribes concerned not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful. The Government reiterates its view that there is an argument for not pursuing prosecutions against those responsible for abductions and forced labour in the spirit of national reconciliation. The Committee recalls again in this connection that, under Article 25 of the Convention, "the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying this Convention to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced". The Committee therefore considers that the non-application of penal sanctions to perpetrators is contrary to this provision of the Convention and may have the effect of ensuring impunity for abductors who exploit forced labour.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to ensure that legal proceedings are instituted against perpetrators, particularly against those unwilling to cooperate, and penal sanctions are imposed on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, as required by the Convention. The Committee again requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the penal provision punishing the offence of abduction, as well as the provisions punishing kidnapping and the exaction of forced labour (sections 161, 162 and 163 of the Criminal Code), supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1970)

Article 1(a) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views and for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Criminal Act and the Labour Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to work under the Prison Regulations, Chapter IX, section 94, and the 1997 Regulations concerning the organization of work in prisons, Chapter XIII, section 38(6)) may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Interim National Constitution of 2005, which contains the Bill of Rights promoting the human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Committee also noted the Government's indication in its previous report that a draft Labour Law had been finalized and prepared for submission to the competent authorities for adoption. The Government indicates in its latest report that the Sudanese Parliament is engaged at present in revising the whole body of the Sudanese legislation in order to bring it into conformity with the spirit and the letter of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the Interim National Constitution. It also indicates that, should any law or practice be contrary to the spirit of ratified Conventions and the National Constitution, the latter shall constitute the reference to be consulted, while continuous and sustained efforts shall be made to amend such law or abolish such practice.

The Committee notes a report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan (A/HRC/11/14, June 2009), in which the Special Rapporteur expressed concern about reform of the Criminal Act, the Criminal Procedures Act and the Press and Printed Materials Bill and urged the Government to guarantee their full compatibility with Sudan's international human rights obligations, the Interim National Constitution and the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. Thus, the Special Rapporteur noted that one of the amendments to the 1991 Criminal Procedures Act, passed by the National Assembly on 20 May 2009, gives powers to State Governors or Commissioners to issue orders prohibiting or restricting the organization of public meetings, which is not in conformity with the guarantees of freedom of assembly and association enshrined in the Interim National Constitution and the Comprehensive Peace Agreement.

The Committee also takes note of the situation regarding human rights in the Sudan as described in the report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in the Sudan referred to above, in which the Special Rapporteur observed that, despite some positive steps in the area of law reform, improvement of the human rights situation on the ground continues to remain a significant challenge, particularly in Darfur, where human rights violations and breaches of international humanitarian law continued to be committed by all parties, but also in other parts of the country. The Special Rapporteur recommended, in particular, that the Government should ensure that human rights defenders, humanitarian workers, parliamentarians, members of political opposition, journalists and other civil society members were not arbitrarily detained or ill-treated by State agents on account of their work, opinions or peaceful assembly.

The Committee hopes that, as a result of the legislative reform, the national criminal and labour legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention and asks the Government to keep the ILO informed about the progress made in this regard and to supply a copy of the new legislative acts, as soon as they are adopted. The Committee observes the importance for the effective respect of the Convention of the legal guarantees regarding freedom of assembly, expression, demonstration and association; it expresses the firm hope that the Government will take urgent measures, in accordance with the recommendations of the relevant international bodies and agencies, to put an end to all human rights violations, which would help to create better conditions for the full observance of the forced labour Conventions.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Swaziland

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Legislation concerning compulsory public works or services. In its earlier comments, the Committee observed that the Swazi Administration Order, Act No. 6 of 1998, which provided for the duty of Swazis to obey orders requiring participation in compulsory works, such as, for example, compulsory cultivation, anti-soil erosion works and the making, maintenance and protection of roads, enforceable with severe penalties for non-compliance, was in serious breach of the Convention. The Committee previously noted that the Swazi Administration Order had been challenged before the High Court of Swaziland which declared the Order null and void, and that the Swaziland Government did not appeal against that judgement.

The Committee notes with interest the text of the above decision of the High Court of Swaziland (Case No. 2823/2000), provided by the Government with its report. It asks the Government to supply information on the practical consequences of this decision.

Syrian Arab Republic

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Freedom of persons in the service of the State to leave their employment. For many years, the Committee has been referring to section 364 of the Penal Code (as amended by Legislative Decree No. 46 of 23 July 1974), under which a term of imprisonment from three to five years may be imposed for leaving or interrupting work as a member of the staff of any public administration, establishment or body, or any authority of the public or mixed sector before resignation has been formally accepted by the competent authority; or evading obligations to serve the same authorities, whether the obligation derived from a mission, a scholarship or a study leave.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indications in its reports that, in practice, a worker's right to submit a request for resignation at any time is fully respected, and the competent authority is bound to accept the resignation, provided the continuity of the service is ensured. The Government also stated in its earlier reports that the Committee's comments had been taken into account in the course of elaboration of the amendment to the Penal Code, in order to ensure conformity with the Convention.

The Government indicates in its latest report that the draft new Penal Code is still under discussion and that its adoption must go through a number of phases. The Committee trusts that the new Penal Code will be adopted in the near future and that legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the new Penal Code, as soon as it is adopted.

Legislation on vagrancy. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 597 of the Penal Code, which provides for the punishment of any person who is reduced to seeking public assistance or charity as a result of idleness, drunkenness or gambling. The Committee recalled that while the punishment of gambling or the abuse of intoxicating liquor is outside the scope of the Convention, the possibility to impose penalties for mere refusal to work is contrary to the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its earlier report that the proposed amendments to the Penal Code would accommodate the Committee's request. However, the Government's latest report does not contain any new information to that effect, but the Government states that the punishment of idleness is aiming at preventing begging and vagrancy, with a view to assisting the persons concerned to find decent employment. The Committee refers in this connection to the explanations in paragraph 88 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it pointed out that provisions concerning vagrancy and similar offences, if defined in an unduly extensive manner, are liable to become a means of compulsion to work.

The Committee therefore reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken, in the context of the revision of the Penal Code, with a view to clearly excluding from the legislation any possibility of compulsion to work, e.g. by limiting the scope of the provisions of section 597 to persons engaging in illegal activities, so as to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2, paragraph 2(d). Work or services exacted in cases of emergency. In comments it has been making since 1964, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of Decree No. 133 of 1952, under which compulsory labour could be exacted from the population in circumstances that go beyond the exception authorized by the Convention. The Committee referred, in particular, to the provisions of Chapter I (compulsory labour for purposes of health, culture or construction) and sections 27 and 28 (national defence work, social services, road work, etc.).

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports that Legislative Decree No. 15 of 11 May 1971, concerning local administration, under which certain kinds of work or services (national defence work, social services, road work) may be exacted in the event of war, emergencies or natural disasters, has repealed sections 27 and 28 of Decree No. 133 referred to above.

The Committee again requests the Government to communicate a copy of Legislative Decree No. 15 of 11 May 1971 concerning local administration, which, according to the report, has been already sent to the ILO, but has not been received.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act, under which prison sentences involving compulsory labour can be imposed as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political system, as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes.

The Committee previously noted from the Government's earlier report that a draft legislative decree to amend the Penal Code had been prepared by the Ministry of Justice. The Government reaffirmed its commitment to bring legislation into conformity with the ratified ILO Conventions, taking due account of the Committee's comments, and indicated, in particular, that the draft legislative decree was aiming at the elimination of all obligation to perform prison labour by removing from the text of the Penal Code such terms as “imprisonment with labour”, “life imprisonment with hard labour” or “temporary hard labour”.

In its latest report, the Government indicates that it endeavours to resolve the problems identified in the Committee’s comments by way of the adoption of the new Penal Code, which is currently being discussed and is going through various legal channels and phases of adoption.

While noting this information, as well as the Government’s renewed commitment to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, the Committee expresses the firm hope that, following the adoption of the new Penal Code, persons convicted for activities coming under the purview of the Convention, and, in particular, persons convicted under the provisions referred to of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act, would no longer be under an obligation to perform labour, although they might be allowed to engage in work. The Committee hopes that the new Penal Code will be adopted in the near future and that the Government will supply a copy of the new Code, as soon as it is promulgated.

United Republic of Tanzania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Imposition of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. For many years the Committee has been commenting on serious discrepancies between national law and practice and the provisions of the Convention. The Committee has referred in this connection to the following national provisions:

- article 25(1) of the Constitution, which provides that every person has the duty to participate in lawful and productive work and to strive to attain the individual and group production targets required or set by law; article 25(3)(d), of the Constitution, which provides that no work shall be considered as forced labour if such work forms part of (ii) compulsory national service in accordance with the law, or (iii) the national endeavour at the mobilization of human resources for the enhancement of the society and the national economy and to ensure development and national productivity;
- the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, the Penal Code, the Resettlement of Offenders Act, 1969, the Ward Development Committees Act, 1969, and the Local Government Finances Act, 1982, under which compulsory labour may be imposed, inter alia, by the administrative authority for purposes of economic development;
- several by-laws adopted between 1988 and 1992 under section 148 of the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, entitled “self-help and community development”, “nation-building” and “enforcement of human resources deployment”, which provide for an obligation to work.

On numerous occasions the Committee expressed its concern at the institutionalized and systematic compulsion to work established in law at all levels, in the National Constitution, Acts of Parliament and District by-laws, in contradiction both with the present Convention and Convention No. 105, likewise ratified by the United Republic of Tanzania, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development.

The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Employment and Labour Relations Act, 2004, which introduced a provision prohibiting the exaction of forced labour (section 6(1)) and repealed the Employment Ordinance (Cap. 366), under which compulsory labour could be imposed for public purposes.

The Government indicates in its latest report that the Law Reform Commission is currently carrying out legal research on laws that need amendments or repeal to reflect the current economic, social and political arrangements, including laws which are not compatible with the Convention.

While noting these indications, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend the provisions incompatible with the Convention and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Merchant Shipping Act, 2003 (No. 21), which has repealed the Merchant Shipping Act of 1967, which contained provisions punishing various breaches of discipline by seafarers with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour), even in circumstances where the ship or the life or health of persons were not endangered, as well as provisions, under which deserting seafarers could be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties.

Article 1(a) and (b) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views and for failure to engage in socially useful work. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Newspaper Act and the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the amendment or repeal of the provisions of various legal instruments, to which it referred in its comments under Convention No. 29, likewise ratified by the United Republic of Tanzania, and which are contrary to Article 1(b) of this Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's repeated statements in its reports that the Committee's views and comments made on the provisions of the above laws had been duly taken into account, and that the identified laws had been addressed by the Task Force of the Labour Law Reform with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Government. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that the Law Reform Commission is currently carrying out legal research on laws that need amendments or repeal to reflect the current economic, social and political arrangements, including laws which are not compatible with the Convention, with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Minister responsible for Justice and Constitutional Affairs.

While noting these indications, the Committee trusts that the necessary action will at last be taken in order to repeal or amend all provisions incompatible with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be able to report the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Thailand

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking and sexual exploitation of children. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to eradicate the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploitation and to punish those responsible. The Committee recalls that the Government has ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). In so far as Article 3(a) of Convention No. 182 provides that the worst forms of child labour include "all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour", the Committee is of the view that the problem of trafficking of children for the purpose of exploitation may be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182. The protection of children is enhanced by the fact that Convention No. 182 requires States which ratify it to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to refer to its comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation – communication from an international workers' organization. The Committee has noted the comments on the application of the Convention by Thailand, made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – in its communication dated 31 August 2006. In this communication, the ICFTU expresses its concern about the persistence of the trafficking in persons from and into Thailand and refers to a report published by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (April 2006), in which Thailand has been listed in the group of countries which have a very high level of trafficking, as a country of destination, origin and transit. According to the report, Cambodian and Lao women and girls are trafficked into Thailand for factory and domestic work and the sex trade; Burmese, Cambodian and Lao men are trafficked into Thailand for forced labour in such sectors as construction, agriculture and in particular the fishing industry. The ICFTU refers in this connection to first-hand information concerning Burmese fishermen and, in particular, six members of the Seafarers' Union of Burma, who had been tricked into abusive working conditions on board Thai fishing vessels in situations similar to forced labour, which included allegations of brutality and injury. The ICFTU expressed concern about the lack of legal protection of men subjected to forced labour, which leaves the problem of male victims unaddressed.

The communication from the ICFTU was forwarded to the Government, on 28 September 2006, for such comments as might be considered appropriate. The Government acknowledged that the current legislation was limited in its scope and that human trafficking had become more severe and complicated. It indicated that the Government was in the process of adopting the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act and that it had been approved by the Cabinet and was now under the consideration of the National Assembly. However, the Committee notes that the Government's report contained no reference to the ICFTU communication referred to above. It requests the Government to respond to the allegations made by the ICFTU in its next report.

Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation – prevention and protection measures, law enforcement. The Committee has noted the Government's renewed commitment expressed in its reports to eradicate all manner of human trafficking. It has noted the positive steps taken by the Government, some of them in cooperation with ILO/IPEC and other international institutions, to adopt legislation and to put into place a coherent national policy framework for dealing with this problem.

The Committee has noted, in particular, the information on the application of the Prevention and Suppression of Prostitution Act 1996, including the information concerning the activities of welfare protection and vocational development centres set up under the Act, as well as statistical data with regard to the prosecution of offences under the Act. It has noted comprehensive information supplied by the Government on the activities of the Ministry of Labour concerning the promotion of employment opportunities among women and youth, including various training courses and specific projects for women. The Committee has also noted the information on the application of the Measures for the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act 1997, which covers offences both in Thailand and abroad and also provides protection for victims from foreign countries, ensuring that they are placed in shelter and provided with the necessary assistance before they are repatriated. It has noted with interest the information on the activities of various committees and subcommittees related to human trafficking and sexual exploitation of women and children, covering both domestic and cross-border trafficking, with regard to prevention, protection, recovery and reintegration measures. The Committee has further noted the second Memorandum of Understanding on Common Guidelines of Practices for Agencies Engaged in Addressing Trafficking in Women and Children B.E. 2546 (2003), according to which the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security is working in collaboration with other concerned agencies such as the Royal Thai Police, the Office of the National Commission on Women's Affairs, the Immigration Bureau and the International Organization for Migration (IOM), to assist trafficked women by providing them with temporary shelters before repatriating to their hometowns and by conducting recovery programmes which would enable them to reintegrate into society. The Committee has also noted the information concerning the Government's participation in multilateral cooperation in combating trafficking in the Mekong subregion.

The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts with vigour and to take effective action to implement the anti-trafficking policies it adopts. It hopes that the Government will continue to supply detailed information on the application in practice of the above Memorandum of Understanding, as well as the information on the practical application of the Measures for the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act 1997, including the information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted in connection with the offences related to human trafficking. In relation to the new draft Act on the prevention and suppression of human trafficking under consideration by the National Legislative Assembly, the Committee hopes that the Government will communicate a copy, as soon as it is adopted. Please also provide information on the activities of the Centre Against International Trafficking under the Office of the Attorney-General, to which reference is made in the report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(c) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on any employee who violates or fails to comply with an agreement on terms of employment or a decision on a labour dispute under sections 18, 22–24, 29 and 35(4) of the Labour Relations Act. The Committee pointed out that sections 131–133 of the Labour Relations Act were incompatible with the Convention, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline.

The Committee has noted the Government's statement that the above provisions have been applied in practice only in a few cases. It has also noted the Government's indication in its 2006 report that the Ministry of Labour is planning to conduct a study on the conformity of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) with the Convention and that the Committee on the national policy for legal reform has been established, with the Prime Minister as the Chairperson.

While having noted this information, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) into conformity with the Convention, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by limiting their scope to acts endangering the life or health of persons.

Article 1(d). Sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee previously referred to the following provisions of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975), under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed for participation in strikes:

- (i) section 140 read in conjunction with section 35(2), if the minister orders the strikers to return to work, being of the opinion that the strike may affect the national economy or cause hardship to the public or endanger national security or be contrary to public order;
- (ii) section 139 read in conjunction with section 34(5), if the matter is awaiting the decision of the Labour Relations Committee or a decision has been given by the minister under section 23(1), (2), (6) or (8) or by the Labour Relations Committee under section 24.

The Committee has noted the Government's statement that the provisions of section 140 are applied only in a situation where the strike may affect the national economy or endanger national security or be contrary to public order, and that they have been applied in practice only in a few cases. Having also noted the Government's indications in its 2006 report concerning a study to be conducted by the Ministry of Labour on the conformity of the Labour Relations Act B.E. 2518 (1975) with the Convention and the setting up of the Committee on the national policy for legal reform, the Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to bringing the above provisions of the Labour Relations Act into conformity with the Convention, by ensuring that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike.

Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 117 of the Criminal Code, under which participation in any strike with the purpose of changing the laws of the State, coercing the Government or intimidating the people is punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour). The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that section 117 is essential for national peace and security and does not deprive workers of their labour rights or of the right to strike under the labour law, having no objective to impose any sanctions against workers who participate in strikes pursuing economic and social objectives affecting their occupational interests. The Committee also noted previously the Government's indication that this section had never been applied in practice. While having noted these indications, the Committee refers to the explanations provided in paragraph 188 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour and reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will be taken, on the occasion of the next revision of the Criminal Code, to amend section 117 in such a way that it would be clear from the text itself that strikes pursuing economic and social objectives affecting the workers' occupational interests are removed from the scope of sanctions under this section, in order to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions under which workers of state enterprises were prohibited from striking, this prohibition being enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour). The Committee noted, in particular, that the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act B.E. 2543 (2000) prohibits strikes in state enterprises (section 33), violation of this prohibition being punishable with imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for a term of up to one year; this penalty is doubled in the case of a person who instigates this offence (section 77).

While having noted the Government's statement in its 2006 report concerning the role of state enterprises for the economic and social development of the country and the living standards of the population, the Committee recalls that a blanket prohibition of strikes in all state-owned enterprises, if enforced with penalties involving compulsory labour, is incompatible with the Convention. Having also noted the Government's indications in its report concerning a study to be conducted by the Ministry of Labour on the conformity of the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act B.E. 2543 (2000) with the Convention, the Committee reiterates its firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the State Enterprise Labour Relations Act, so that no sanctions involving compulsory labour can be imposed for the mere fact of participating in a peaceful strike, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Togo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that, for the fifth consecutive year, the Government has not provided a report on the application of the Convention. However, the Government provided information orally to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (98th Session, June 2009), which is noted by the Committee of Experts.

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Child labour in domestic service and apprenticeship under conditions similar to forced labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a communication dated 6 July 2006 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), and the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), containing observations on the existence of situations similar to forced labour affecting children in domestic service and in the context of apprenticeship. According to the information contained in this communication, many children from rural areas are employed as domestic workers in urban areas. These children work long days (often from 4 a.m. to 11 p.m.) seven days a week, and carry out their work under the constant threat of physical violence and dismissal. The communication also reported the exploitation of apprentices working in the informal economy under conditions amounting to debt bondage. The apprentices are entrusted by their parents to an employer with the objective of learning a trade. During their apprenticeship, they are subjected to the menial tasks of fetching water, washing and housework. In certain mechanical and woodworking workshops, they act as night guards under conditions described as being deplorable. The very high fee for apprenticeship demanded by certain employers prevent apprentices from freeing themselves at the end of their contracts, thereby obliging them to work for free for long periods. One year of free work is sometimes required from apprentices as a gesture of gratitude. During holiday periods, apprentices often work until the early hours of the morning without financial compensation, particularly in clothes-making workshops and hairdressing establishments.

The Committee notes that the Government has made no comment on this communication, which was forwarded to it on 20 July 2006. In the context of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009, the Government confined itself to indicating that two Bills were to be submitted to the National Council on Labour and Social Legislation in August 2009: a draft Code of apprenticeship clarifying the role, responsibilities and obligations of the various actors, and a draft order determining the conditions for the use of domestic work.

The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures in law and practice on an urgent basis to bring an end to the situations of exploitation experienced by certain children in domestic service and apprenticeship, which are similar to forced labour within the meaning of the Convention, as their work is imposed under the menace of a penalty (ill-treatment) and they cannot validly give their consent to the performance of such work as, in view of the conditions under which it is carried out, it is likely to harm their health, safety and development. It also requests the Government to provide information on the progress made concerning the two Bills respecting apprenticeship and domestic work and to provide a copy of these texts to the Office once they have been adopted.

The Committee refers to its comments concerning the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). Since the Government has not provided the information requested in reply to its comments made both under Convention No. 182 and under Convention No. 29, the Committee reiterates its comments on the application of Convention No. 29. In the future, these issues will be examined exclusively and more specifically under Convention No. 182, since the latter Convention provides that forced labour is one of the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Turkey

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 (paragraph 1), 2 (paragraph 1), and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted a communication received in December 2003 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now the International Trade Union Confederation). In that communication, the ICFTU focused its concern on the trafficking of women and children. It observed that:

- Turkey is both a transit and a destination country for trafficked persons;

- most women and girls whose destination is Turkey come from the Russian Federation, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Georgia, Ukraine, Armenia, Azerbaijan and Uzbekistan;
- Turkey provides transit mainly for women from Central Asia, Africa, the Middle East and former Yugoslavia to other countries in Europe; and
- most victims of trafficking find themselves forced into prostitution and some into debt bondage.

The Committee notes, under the new Penal Code (Act No. 5237 of 2004), that:

- trafficking in persons for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labour or to slave-like conditions is punishable with a sentence of imprisonment of eight to 12 years (section 80);
- the employment of homeless, helpless or dependent persons without payment or for substandard wages or forcibly subjecting them to inhumane working and living conditions is punishable by a term of imprisonment of six months to three years (section 117(2)); and
- trafficking for the purpose of prostitution is punishable by a term of two to four years' imprisonment (section 227(3)).

The Committee asks the Government in its next report to supply information concerning the application and enforcement of sections 80, 117(2), and 227(3) of the Penal Code, including statistical data and other information about investigations and prosecutions, as well as convictions and sentencing outcomes in cases of convictions.

The Committee notes the reference by the Government to other measures it has taken, including among other things:

- training and awareness-raising seminars for law enforcement officers, organized in collaboration with the International Organization for Migration (IOM);
- implementation, within the framework of financial cooperation between Turkey and the European Union and under the coordination of the General Directorate of Security, a "Project for enhancement of the institutional capacity with a view to combating trafficking in human beings";
- the conclusion on 24 September 2004 of a bilateral "Memorandum of Understanding for cooperation in the struggle against human trafficking and illegal migration" with the Republic of Belarus as a source country; and
- the launching of a national emergency hotline and call service for use by victims of trafficking, as well as initiatives to establish women's trafficking shelters in Ankara and other cities.

The Committee asks the Government to supply information in its next report on the progress of these measures and information on any more recent measures taken or contemplated to combat trafficking in persons for purposes of sexual exploitation or other forms of forced labour, including updated information on police training and other efforts to improve law enforcement capacity in relation to trafficking; as well as on efforts to strengthen intergovernmental cooperation on trafficking cases, particularly with source countries.

The Committee notes the indication of the Government that application of the regulations implementing the Work Permit for Foreign Workers Act (No. 4817 of 2003), particularly sections 7, 12, and 22 of the Act, has entailed the imposition of new obligations that are aimed at combating trafficking in persons. The Government indicated that copies of these provisions were attached to the report in an "Annex 2"; however, the annex does not appear to have been included, and the Committee asks the Government to supply a copy with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing views opposed to the established system. The Committee has previously noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour, under section 198 of the Regulations pertaining to the administration of penitentiaries and to the execution of sentences, adopted by decision of the Council of Ministers of 5 July 1967, No. 6/8517, as amended) may be imposed under various provisions of the Turkish Penal Code, including, among others, section 159 (insulting or vilifying, inter alia, "Turkism", various state authorities, the state laws or the decisions of the National Grand Assembly) and section 312 (publicly inciting hatred and enmity of the population with reference to distinctions of class, race, religion or region) and under section 8 (written or oral propaganda, assemblies, manifestations and demonstrations against the indivisibility of the State) of the Anti-Terrorism Law, No. 3713 of 12 April 1991, as amended on 13 November 1996, in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention.

The Committee noted that, while certain of the provisions might appear to be aimed at acts of violence or incitement to the use of violence, armed resistance or an uprising, their actual scope, as shown through their application in practice, is not limited to such acts, but provides for political coercion and the punishment of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of government policy and the established political system, with penalties involving compulsory labour.

The Committee notes that section 159 of the Penal Code was amended by Act No. 4771, of 3 August 2002, and that section 159 now corresponds to section 301 of the new Penal Code (Act No. 5237 of 2004). The Committee notes that this provision, under its fourth subsection, protects expression directed at "Turkishness", the Republic, or organs and institutions of government, if intended only to criticize, while the prior subsections continue to penalize such expression if it "publicly denigrates" those institutions. The Committee asks that the Government supply information about the application of this provision in practice, including information about any prosecutions, convictions and sentences under the various subclauses of section 301 of the Penal Code, so as to assure the Committee that the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system are not sanctioned with penalties that involve the use of forced or compulsory labour.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the amendment introduced in section 312 of the Penal Code by Act No. 4744 of 6 February 2002, which makes the inciting of hatred and enmity of the population punishable with imprisonment if such acts constitute a danger to public order, required further clarification. In its latest report the Government indicates that the new Penal Code replaced section 312 with sections 215–218. The Committee notes that, under section 215, a person who "praises a crime or a criminal" is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of up to two years; that under section 216 a person who “deliberately incites one section of the population to hatred and hostility against another through discrimination based on race, region, or religion, shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of one to three years”; and that under section 217 a person who commits the crime of “inciting people to disobey laws” is liable to a term of imprisonment of six months to two years. The Committee asks that the Government supply information about the application in practice of sections 215–217 of the new Penal Code, including information about any prosecutions, convictions and sentences under these provisions and copies of court decisions which construe and define their scope, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain whether they are applied in a manner compatible with the Convention.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted with regard to section 8 of the “Act on the Fight against Terrorism”, No. 3713 of 1991, that, by virtue of Act No. 4744 of 6 February 2002, a penalty of imprisonment in this section was replaced with fines, and it requested the Government to provide clarification of the phrase “unless such acts necessitate a heavier penalty” and to supply copies of the court decisions defining or illustrating the scope of this provision. The Committee notes that, in June 2006, the Grand National Assembly adopted amendments to the Act. The Committee asks that in its next report the Government clarify the provision for penalties in section 8 as earlier requested. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the 2006 amendments to the Act, including the relevant penalty provisions, and to supply updated information relating to the application in practice of the Act, as amended, including copies of all relevant court decisions and information about prosecutions, convictions and sentencing outcomes.

The Committee has previously referred to provisions of the 1965 Act concerning political parties, which prohibits political parties from asserting the existence in Turkey of any minorities based on nationality, culture, religion or language and from attempting to disturb national security by conserving, developing or propagating languages and cultures other than the Turkish language or culture. It noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) could be imposed under sections 80–82, read in conjunction with section 117, of the Political Parties Act (No. 2820 of 1983) and sections 5 and 76 of the Associations Act (No. 2908 of 1983). In its previous observation the Committee noted the Government’s indication in its 2003 report that changes were to be made in the Political Parties Act, in accordance with the Emergency Action Plan published on 3 January 2003, with a view to ensuring that the whole population would be able to participate in political parties and to make possible the establishment of equity and justice in political representation.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its 2005 report that the penalties applicable to prohibited activities under sections 80–82 have been “re-regulated” under the new Penal Code, Act No. 5237 of 2004. It further notes the Government’s indication that the new Associations Act, No. 5253, no longer includes provisions corresponding to sections 5 and 76 of the former Act. The Committee asks the Government in its next report to indicate the specific provisions of the new Penal Code which it states “re-regulate” sections 80–82 of the Political Parties Act. The Committee defers its comments on the new Associations Act pending a translation of the text of that Act.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee has previously noted, among other provisions, that section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, as amended by Act No. 3358, as well as section 5 of Council of Ministers resolution No. 87/11945 of 12 July 1987, adopted pursuant to section 10 of Act No. 1111, lay down procedures relating to the surplus reserves, including the procedures concerning the persons liable to perform military service who are assigned duties in public bodies and institutions. In its 2003 report, the Government confirmed its previous indication that Act No. 3358, which amended section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, was no longer applied after 1991, though no action has yet been taken to repeal its provisions. The Committee in previous comments asked that necessary measures be taken with a view to repealing the above provisions in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government provide information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply on this point in both its 2005 reports on the application of Conventions Nos 105 and 29. The Government indicates that a new draft Military Service Bill that would bring Military Service Act No. 1111 into conformity with “current conditions” has been examined by special expert committees of the Turkish Grand National Assembly, and that it further indicates that the Bill has been drawn up in a way that embodies a policy of protecting persons conscripted into military service from being assigned duties in public bodies or undertakings without their consent. The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed about the progress of the above Bill. The Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to repealing the provisions referred to above in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be able to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that, under section 1467 of the Commercial Code (Act No. 6762 of 29 June 1956), seafarers may be forcibly conveyed on board ship to perform their duties, and that, under section 1469 of the Commercial Code, various breaches of discipline by seafarers are punishable with imprisonment (involving, as previously noted, an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also noted that the Government had submitted to Parliament a Bill to amend section 1467 of the Commercial Code, which contains a provision limiting the powers of the master under section 1467 to circumstances jeopardizing the safety of the ship or endangering the lives of the passengers and the crew, and expressed the hope that section 1469 of the Commercial Code would likewise be amended to limit its scope to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the lives or health of persons.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that a draft Turkish Trade Act, which has the aim of bringing sections 1467 and 1469 of the Commercial Code into conformity with the Convention, is now under elaboration in the specialized committees of the Parliament, and that, once the Bill is adopted, the Government will supply copies of the text of the new legislation. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will very soon be in a position to report the progress achieved in this matter.

Article 1(d). Punishment for participation in strikes. The Committee has previously noted that Act No. 2822 of 1983, respecting collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts, provides in sections 70–73, 75, 77 and 79 for penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) as a punishment for the participation in unlawful strikes, in circumstances not limited in scope to those described in paragraphs 182–189 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour. The Government indicated in its 2003 report that a tripartite “Science Board”, established with the objective of bringing Act No. 2822 into conformity with relevant ILO Conventions, had completed its work and submitted its report for consideration by the social partners. The Committee refers the Government to its comments on this point under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and expresses the firm hope that amendments to Act No. 2822 addressing the Committee’s concerns under both Conventions will be adopted without further delay.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Uganda

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraph 1 of the Convention. Legislation concerning compulsory placement of unemployed persons on agricultural enterprises in rural areas. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 2(1) of the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, under which any unemployed able-bodied person may be settled on any farm settlement and required to render service; section 15 of the Decree makes it an offence punishable with a fine and imprisonment for any person to fail or refuse to live on any farm settlement or to desert or leave such settlement without authorization. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the abovementioned Decree was in the process of being repealed under the laws of Uganda revision exercise by the Uganda Law Reform Commission. The Committee has also noted from the statement of the Government representative before the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006, that the 1975 Decree is a "dead law" which is not applied in practice, and that the current Parliament intends to repeal it. While having noted these indications, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Community Farm Settlement Decree, 1975, will be repealed in the near future, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It asks the Government to supply a copy of the repealing text, as soon as it is adopted.

Freedom of career military officers to leave their service. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, 1969, were replaced by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations, No. 6 of 1993 (now the Uganda Peoples' Defence Forces (Conditions of Service) (Officers) Regulations). The Committee has noted that section 28(1) of these Regulations contains a provision (which is similar to a corresponding provision of the repealed Regulations) under which the Board may permit officers to resign their commission in writing at any stage during their service. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indication in its reports, which was also confirmed by the Government representative in his statement before the Conference Committee in June 2006, that the officer applying for the resignation must give his/her reasons for it, and the Board will consider these reasons and, if it finds them fit, will grant a permission to resign.

The Committee observes that it follows from the wording of section 28(1) that the application to resign may be either accepted or refused. It refers to the explanations provided in paragraphs 46 and 96–97 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it pointed out that career military servicemen who have voluntarily entered into an engagement cannot be deprived of the right to leave the service in peacetime within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals, or with previous notice, subject to the conditions which may normally be required to ensure the continuity of the service. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken with a view to amending section 28(1) of the above Regulations, so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. Pending such amendment, the Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the application of section 28(1) in practice, indicating in particular the criteria applied by the Board in accepting or rejecting a resignation, as well as the number of resignations accepted and refused.

Military service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the Armed Forces (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations, 1969, which provided that the term of service of persons enrolled below the age of 18 years might be extended until they are 30 years old, was repealed by the National Resistance Army (Conditions of Service) (Men) Regulations No. 7 of 1993. The Government indicated that section 5(4) of these Regulations prohibits a person below the age of 18 years or above 30 years to be employed in the armed forces. While having noted these indications, the Committee again requests the Government to supply a copy of Regulations No. 7, 1993, with its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the following legislation:

- (i) the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, empowering the executive to restrict an individual's association or communication with others, independently of the commission of any offence and subject to penalties involving compulsory labour;
- (ii) sections 54(2)(c), 55, 56 and 56A of the Penal Code, empowering the minister to declare any combination of two or more people an unlawful society and thus render any speech, publication or activity on behalf of, or in support of, such combination illegal and punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, any penal sanctions involving an obligation to perform prison labour are contrary to the Convention when imposed on persons convicted for expressing political views or views opposed to the established political system, or having contravened a widely discretionary administrative decision depriving them of the right to publish their views or suspending or dissolving certain associations (see, for example, paragraphs 152–166 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned provisions of the Public Order and Security Act, No. 20 of 1967, and of the Penal Code, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

United Kingdom

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

Articles 1, paragraph 1, and 2, paragraphs 1 and 2(c), of the Convention. Privatization of prisons and prison labour. Work of prisoners for private companies. In comments it has been making for a number of years concerning the privatization of prisons and work of prisoners for private companies in the United Kingdom, the Committee has pointed out that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, in the sense that the exception from the scope of the Convention provided for in this Article for compulsory prison labour does not extend to work of prisoners for private employers (including privatized prisons and prison workshops), even under public supervision and control. The Committee recalled that compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, “that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations”. Both these conditions are necessary for compliance with the Convention: if either of the two conditions is not observed, the situation is not excluded from the scope of the Convention, and compulsory labour exacted from convicted persons under these circumstances is thus prohibited. The Committee asked the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that, with regard to contracted-out prisons and prison industries, any work by prisoners for private companies be performed under the conditions of a freely consented upon labour relationship, without the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free labour relationship.

The Committee notes with regret from the Government’s report that there has been no change in the Government’s position and in national law and practice with regard to the work of prisoners for private entities. The Government reiterates its view that its approach to this issue is in line with the aims of the Convention. It states that both public and private sector prisons and workshops in the United Kingdom are subject to rigorous independent inspections, both domestically and internationally, and that the United Kingdom continues to have in place a robust set of rules and regulations to ensure that prison labour is not abused.

While noting these statements, the Committee points out once again that the privatization of prison labour transcends the express conditions provided in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention for exempting compulsory prison labour from the scope of the Convention. Consequently, it may be held compatible with the Convention only where it does not involve compulsory labour. Thus, in order to comply with the Convention, the work of prisoners for private companies requires the freely given consent of the persons concerned. The Committee has considered that, in the context of a captive labour force having no alternative access to the free labour market, the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health (see paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of the Committee’s 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour).

While noting the Government’s repeated suggestion to refer this matter for further consideration in conjunction with international labour practitioners, as well as the Government’s confirmed willingness to cooperate with the ILO on this matter, the Committee is of the opinion that, in spite of the express prohibition for prisoners to be hired to or placed at the disposal of private parties under the terms of the Convention, it is fully possible for ratifying States to apply the Convention when designing or implementing a system of privatized prison labour, once the abovementioned requirements are complied with. The Committee refers in this connection to paragraph 122 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that a certain number of countries have made progress towards full compliance with the Convention by taking measures, both in law and in practice, so that conditions of the private employment of prisoners progressively approach those of free workers.

The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that measures will be taken to ensure that freely given and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons, as well as for all work of prisoners for private companies, both inside and outside prison premises, such “free” and “informed” consent being authenticated by the conditions of work approximating a free labour relationship, as regards wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. The Committee trusts that such measures will be taken both in law and in practice, in order to grant prisoners working in privately operated facilities and other prisoners working for private enterprises a legal status with rights and conditions of employment that are compatible with this basic human rights instrument, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

United States

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1991)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In observations addressed to the Government since 2002, the Committee has noted that, under article 12, section 95-98.1, of the North Carolina General Statutes, strikes by public employees are declared illegal and against the public policy of the State. Under section 95-99, any violation of the provisions of article 12 is declared to be a Class 1 misdemeanour. Under section 15A-1340.23, read together with section 15A-1340.11 of Chapter 15A (Criminal Procedure Act), a person convicted of a Class 1 misdemeanour may be sentenced to “community punishment” and, upon a second conviction, to “active punishment”, that is, imprisonment. The Committee has noted the Compendium of Community Corrections Programs in North Carolina, published by the North Carolina Sentencing and Policy Advisory Commission, which explains that the imposition of community punishment may include assignment to the State’s Community Service Work Program (CSWP): “The CSWP is an alternative to incarceration imposed as part of a community punishment or Driving While Intoxicated (DWI) sentence, or in some cases as the sole condition of unsupervised probation.” The report states elsewhere: “CSWP is a community punishment. It is also used as a sanctioning tool at every stage of the criminal justice system ... CSWP requires the offender to work for free for public or non-profit agencies in an area that will benefit the greater community.” The Committee has also noted that article 3 (Labor of Prisoners), section 148-26, of Chapter 148 (State Prison System) declares it to be the public policy of the State of North Carolina that all able-bodied prison inmates shall be required to perform diligently all work assignments provided for them.

The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government repeats its indication that court records reveal no cases in which any worker has ever been convicted under these provisions for engaging in an illegal public sector strike. The Committee trusts that, given the Government’s indication that these provisions have lain dormant and never been applied in practice, appropriate measures will be taken to amend or repeal them, and the law will be brought into conformity with the Convention. Considering also the chilling effect that a general prohibition of strikes linked to criminal penalties involving compulsory labour may have on public sector workers who might otherwise decide to engage in strikes, the Committee urges the Government to take such measures without further delay. Noting also a communication dated 25 August 2009, sent by the Government to the North Carolina Department of Justice, in which it has forwarded the observations of the Committee to the State Government, the Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will be in a position to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

Uzbekistan

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1997)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production). In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the observations made by the Council of the Trade Unions Federation of Uzbekistan, communicated by the Government with its 2004 report, which contained allegations concerning practices of a mobilization and use of labour for purposes of economic development in agriculture (cotton production), in which public sector workers, schoolchildren and university students were involved. It also noted a communication dated 17 October 2008, received from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), which alleged that, despite the existence of the legal framework against the use of forced labour, there were continued non-governmental organizations and media reports denouncing the systematic and persistent use of forced labour, including forced child labour, in the cotton fields of Uzbekistan. The Committee notes the Government’s response to the above communication by the IOE, received in January 2009. It further notes a new communication from the IOE dated 26 August 2009, as well as a communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 31 August 2009, both of them concerning the above subject, which were sent to the Government in August and September 2009 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. Finally, the Committee notes the comments made by the Council of the Trade Unions Federation of Uzbekistan on the application of the Convention, in a communication dated 10 August 2009.

In the 2009 communication referred to above, the IOE reiterated its previous comments submitted in 2008 and stated that there were continued non-governmental organizations and media reports denouncing the systematic and persistent use of forced labour, including forced child labour, in the cotton fields of Uzbekistan. The above communication by the ITUC contains similar allegations, according to which the Government systematically mobilizes both school-age children and adults to work in the annual cotton harvest for purposes of economic development; it further alleges that, in addition to forcible nature of the work, persons concerned are working in extremely exploitative and harmful conditions. The ITUC refers in this connection to the report of the fact-finding mission to Central Asia undertaken by the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers’ Associations (IUF), in which the IUF reported that, during cotton harvesting, teachers and children are mobilized in many rural areas to help with the harvest that interrupts the study for several weeks. Both the IOE and the ITUC refer in their respective communications to the 2005 reports of the two non-governmental organizations: Environmental Justice Foundation (EJF) and the International Labour Rights Forum (ILRF), which contained allegations that every year hundreds of thousands of Uzbek schoolchildren are forced to work in the national cotton harvest for up to three months. The IOE further refers to the 2006 concluding observations of the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child concerning Uzbekistan (CRC/C/UZB/CO/2, 2 June 2006, 42nd Session), in which the UN Committee expressed its deep concern at the information about the involvement of the very many school-age children in the harvesting of cotton resulting in serious health problems and recommended to the Government to take all measures to comply with international child labour standards and establish mechanisms to monitor the situation. The IOE also refers to the concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights concerning Uzbekistan (E/C.12/UZB/CO/1, 24 January 2006, 35th Session), in which that Committee expressed concern about the persistent reports of the situation of school-age children who are obliged to participate in the cotton harvest every year and, for that reason, do not attend school during this period.

According to the allegations made by the IOE and the ITUC, adult persons are also subject to forced labour during the cotton harvest. The ITUC alleges, in particular, that local administration employees, teachers, factory workers and doctors are commonly forced to leave their jobs for weeks at a time and pick cotton with no additional compensation; in some instances refusal to cooperate can lead to dismissal from work; even elderly people and mothers of young babies have been reportedly ordered by local government officials to pick cotton or lose their pensions or child benefits. The ITUC concludes that, even if forced labour in the cotton field were not the result of the state policy, the Government still violates the Convention by failing to ensure its effective observance, since it systematically requires persons to work in the cotton fields against their will, under the threat of a penalty and in extremely perilous conditions for the purposes of economic development. The IOE states that, while the adoption in September 2008 of a decree prohibiting child labour in cotton plantations, as well as the approval of a National Action Plan to eradicate forced child labour, could be considered as positive steps, it still remains uncertain if the implementation of these measures will be sufficient to address these deeply rooted practices.

The Committee notes that, in its reply to the 2008 communication by the IOE, the Government denied the allegations about coercion of large numbers of people to participate in agricultural works and reiterated that under no circumstances may employers use compulsory labour for the production or harvesting of agricultural products in Uzbekistan, the exaction of forced labour being punishable with the penal and administrative sanctions and employers being liable for violation of labour legislation in respect of persons under the age of 18. The Government also states that practically all the country's cotton is produced by small undertakings that have no economic interest in employing additional labour, and the well-developed education system prevents the exaction of forced labour from children. The Government further states that state policy on the protection of children is implemented within the framework of the development goals set out in the Millennium Declaration, international obligations arising from ratification of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and the adoption of the National Plan of Action to Protect the Rights and Interests of Children. It indicates that, following the ratification by Uzbekistan of the ILO Conventions Nos 138 and 182, the Government has approved the National Plan of Action to implement the above Conventions, and a system of public monitoring ensuring that immediate action is taken to put an end to any violation of children's rights has been set up. The Government refers in this connection to the System for the Protection of the Family, Mothers and Children, headed by the Deputy Prime Minister, and to the Commission on the Affairs of Minors, headed by the Prosecutor General, as well as to the state legal inspectorates and safety and health inspectorates set up in every region of the country under the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection. The national labour legislation sets the minimum age for admission to employment at 16 years, and a list of occupations involving arduous working conditions in which employment of persons under 18 years old is prohibited was adopted in 2001. The Government reiterates that children's welfare is one of the top national priorities and refers in this connection to a large-scale social protection system and various state social programmes, as well as educational reform, which includes 12 years of compulsory schooling for all children.

While noting the Government's indications concerning the positive steps that have been taken to protect the children's rights and to prohibit child labour in occupations involving arduous working conditions, including the adoption in September 2008 of a decree prohibiting the use of child labour in cotton plantations, the Committee observes, however, that there is a convergence of views of the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of employers and workers, as well as non-governmental organizations concerning the large-scale use of child labour, including compulsory labour, in cotton production in Uzbekistan.

The Committee hopes that the Government will respond in detail to the latest observations of the employers' and workers' organizations referred to above and provide, in its next report, information on measures taken, both in law and in practice, in order to suppress and not to make use of compulsory labour, including both compulsory child labour and compulsory labour of adult persons, in the cotton production. The Committee requests the Government, in particular, to provide information on the application in practice of a decree prohibiting the use of child labour in cotton plantations, adopted in September 2008, as well as information on other measures, legislative or otherwise, that have been taken or envisaged to ensure the observance of the Convention, which expressly prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour for purposes of economic development.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 29 (Albania, Algeria, Australia, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Botswana, Brazil, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chad, Chile, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Comoros, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Ethiopia, France, Gabon, Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, India, Iraq, Ireland, Italy, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Latvia, Lesotho, Liberia, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Lithuania, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritius, Republic of Moldova, Mozambique, Nepal, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Nigeria, Panama, Papua New Guinea, Paraguay, Portugal, Qatar, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Senegal, Serbia, Solomon Islands, Spain, Switzerland, Syrian Arab Republic, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, Ukraine, United Kingdom, United Kingdom: Anguilla, United Kingdom: Montserrat, United Kingdom: St Helena, Uzbekistan, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Yemen, Zimbabwe); Convention No. 105 (Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Angola, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Botswana, Burundi, Cambodia, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chad, Chile, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Comoros, Congo, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea, Fiji, Gabon, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, India, Iraq, Italy, Kazakhstan, Kenya, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Lebanon, Lesotho, Liberia, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Mozambique, Pakistan, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Serbia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka, Sudan, Suriname, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, Thailand, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Turkey, Uganda, Ukraine, United Kingdom, United States, Uzbekistan, Yemen, Zimbabwe).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 29 (Mauritania, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Uruguay).

Elimination of child labour and protection of children and young persons

Bolivia

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Medical examination for fitness for employment. The Committee noted Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004, issued by the Ministers of Labour and of Health and Sports (SEDES), section 1 of which provides that the Ministry of Health and Sports, through its ministries and municipal authorities, shall allocate the necessary and adequate medical personnel so that, in coordination with the Ministry of Labour, free medical examinations are carried out of the fitness for employment of working boys, girls and young persons in the industrial and agricultural sectors and for own account work, in urban and rural areas, in application of section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999. In this respect, the Committee noted section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999, under the terms of which young workers shall periodically undergo medical examination. Noting that the medical examinations envisaged under section 1 of Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004 appear to refer solely to the periodical medical examinations of young persons to be carried out during employment, the Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with Article 2(1) of the Convention, no young persons under 18 years of age shall be admitted to employment unless they have been found to be fit for work by a thorough medical examination. Furthermore, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, with the technical assistance of the Bolivian Standardization and Quality Institute (IBNORCA), has formulated regulations under the General Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act on work by young persons in industry, commerce, mining and agriculture. These regulations are due to come into force shortly. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard and on the establishment of thorough medical examination before admission to employment.

With regard to the frequency of the periodical medical examinations (Article 3(2) and (3)), the medical examinations required until the age of 21 years in occupations which involve high health risks (Article 4) and the adoption of appropriate measures for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations (Article 6), the Committee noted the Government's indication that these subjects have not yet been covered. Nevertheless, the Government indicated that these and other matters envisaged by the Convention would be defined in the regulations on work by young persons issued under the General Occupational Health, Safety and Welfare Act. The Committee therefore hopes that these regulations will be adopted in the near future to give effect to these provisions of the Convention. It once again requests the Government to supply a copy of these regulations as soon as adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee noted that, due to economic constraints, there are certain shortcomings in the application of this Convention, particularly in the capitals of remote departments, such as Cobija and Trinidad, and in rural areas. Nevertheless, the Government was adopting measures, in accordance with the possibilities available to it, so that all young persons who work in the country will progressively be covered by the protection afforded by the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's statement with interest. It once again requests it to continue providing information on the progress achieved in the application of the Convention in practice in the country. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide, if such statistics are available, information concerning the number of children and young persons who are engaged in work and have undergone the periodical medical examinations envisaged in the Convention; extracts from the reports of the inspection services relating to any infringements reported and the penalties imposed; and any other information illustrating the application of the Convention in practice.

Work by young persons in agriculture. Even though the Convention does not cover agricultural work, the Committee noted with interest the draft Presidential Decree regulating the exercise of and compliance with rights and obligations arising out of agricultural employment. Section 28(IV) provides that, before being admitted to employment, young persons shall undergo a free medical examination of fitness for work, which shall be repeated periodically. This provision also requires employers to maintain at the disposal of labour inspectors the corresponding medical certificate of fitness for employment. The Committee considered that this provision reflects the principle set out in Articles 2, 3 and 7 of the Convention with regard to agricultural work. In this respect, the Committee noted that the draft Presidential Decree is currently in the process of being approved by the Economic Policy Analysis Unit (UDAPE), which is a government technical body responsible for preparing a preliminary report on the relevance of the approval of any legal provision by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee once again asks the Government to include provisions in the above draft relating to the intervals at which medical examinations shall be carried out (Article 3(2) of the Convention).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 7, paragraph 2, of the Convention. With regard to the methods of identification or other methods of supervision to be adopted for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets, the Committee requests the Government to take into consideration, when taking the legislative or regulatory measures on the basis of the analysis of the results obtained from the VALORA Plan, the indications contained in Recommendation No. 79 on the medical examination of young persons particularly Paragraph 14 on methods of supervision.

Moreover, the Committee invites the Government to refer to its comments under Convention No. 77.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Brazil

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments the Committee noted that the National Council for the Elimination of Child Labour (CONAETI) was analysing the reports of the organizations and agencies involved in implementing the National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour with a view to the adoption of a new plan. It also noted the implementation of the Time-bound Programme (TBP) and other programmes of action concerning hazardous agricultural activities, particularly in the context of a family-run enterprise, work in the informal economy and child domestic labour. The Committee further noted the statistics relating to a household survey carried out by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE) in 2004. These statistics revealed that between 2002 and 2004 the number of working children between 5 and 16 years of age fell by approximately 450,000. Although indicating a decrease in child labour, the statistics showed that 5.4 million children and young persons between 5 and 17 years of age were working during the reference week for the study. In this regard the Government indicated that the majority of children and young persons work in family enterprises where it is very difficult for inspectors to carry out their work. The Committee asked the Government to supply information on the way in which the Convention is applied in practice.

In its report the Government indicates that the “National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the protection of young workers” is currently being reviewed by a CONAETI subcommittee set up for the purpose and the National Council for Children’s Rights (CONANDA), in order to incorporate new policies and redefine the objectives and deadlines for implementation of the plan. Once it has been drawn up, the new plan will be submitted to public consultation. The Government also indicates that a subcommittee for international affairs relating to child labour and South–South cooperation has been set up in order to encourage international cooperation in the field of child labour.

The Committee duly notes that, according to the information contained in the last (December 2008) ILO–IPEC report on the TBP (2008 ILO–IPEC final evaluation report), between 2003 and 2008 a total of 10,807 children benefited from the programme, with 5,251 prevented from engaging in the worst forms of child labour and 5,556 removed from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the 2007 statistics of the national household survey (PNAD) available to ILO–IPEC, the number of working children and young persons between 5 and 17 years of age is 4,829,223, which indicates a reduction of more than 570,000 since 2004.

Moreover, the Committee duly notes that, according to the 2008 ILO–IPEC final evaluation report, the TBP has created a favourable environment for combating child labour. It also notes that the federal government and the state and municipal governments have been collaborating with ILO–IPEC since March 2008, to strengthen the national policy for the elimination of child labour and the worst forms thereof. Hence, in the context of the Bahia Decent Work Agenda, the Brazilian authorities and ILO–IPEC have implemented a national aid project to make Bahia the first state in the country without child labour. The project is in its early stages. Furthermore, other triangular South–South cooperation projects designed to prevent and eliminate child labour in the Americas are in the process of being approved.

The Committee welcomes the measures taken by the Government to abolish child labour, which it considers to be an affirmation of its political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. Nevertheless, it observes with concern the situation of children in Brazil who are forced to work out of necessity. Indeed, despite a reduction in child labour since the ratification of the Convention in 2001, abolition of child labour remains a major challenge for Brazil. It therefore strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation. In this respect, it requests the Government to supply information on the measures taken within the framework of the national aid project to make Bahia the first state in the country without child labour and the various triangular South–South cooperation projects designed to prevent and eliminate child labour in the Americas, particularly regarding the abolition of child labour, and also the results achieved. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to continue supplying information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistics disaggregated by sex and age relating to the nature, scope and trends in the labour of children and young persons working below the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratification, and extracts from the reports of the inspection services. Finally, it requests the Government to send a copy of the new “National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the protection of young workers”, once it has been drawn up and adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3(a) of the Convention and Part III of the report form. Sale and trafficking of children for economic and sexual exploitation, and court decisions. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the national legislation prohibits the sale and trafficking of children for economic exploitation (sections 206 and 207 of the Penal Code) and also prohibits incitement to prostitution (section 228 of the Penal Code). It further noted the adoption of Act No. 11.106 of 28 March 2005, which amended section 231 of the Penal Code by prohibiting and penalizing the international trafficking of persons for the purposes of prostitution. The Act also inserted section 231-A, which outlaws and penalizes the internal trafficking of persons. However, the Committee noted that, according to an ILO–IPEC report of 2003 on good practices in Brazil, the sexual exploitation of children and young persons was an increasing phenomenon. According to estimates, nearly 500,000 children between nine and 17 years of age were being sexually exploited in the country. The Committee also noted that, according to the 2006 ILO–IPEC report on the project to combat the trafficking of persons, Brazil is a country of transit, origin and destination for the international sale and trafficking of children for prostitution. Girls and boys are also victims of internal trafficking, particularly for exploitation of their work in agriculture, mining and charcoal production.

The Committee notes that the Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women, in its concluding comments of August 2007 on the sixth report of the Government (CEDAW/C/BRA/CO/6, paragraphs 7 and 23), noted with satisfaction the measures taken by the Government against the trafficking of persons but expressed concern at the scale of the phenomenon.

The Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the December 2008 ILO–IPEC report on the Time-bound Programme (TBP) [2008 ILO–IPEC report on the TBP], the Government adopted in 2006 a National Policy to combat the trafficking of persons and, in 2008, a National Plan to combat the trafficking of persons. The Committee notes that both the National Policy and the National Plan provide in particular for the adoption of measures to penalize the crime of trafficking of persons.

The February 2009 Global Report on Trafficking in Persons, published by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) [UNODC report on trafficking in persons], states that 530 investigations relating to the crime of trafficking of persons, both internally and across national boundaries, were conducted by the federal and state police between 2003 and 2007, leading to prosecutions in 75 cases. Between 2004 and February 2008, a total of 41 persons (20 men and 21 women) were convicted of this crime by the federal and state courts. According to the UNODC report on trafficking in persons, all the convictions handed down related to sexual exploitation. In 19 cases, the penalties imposed ranged from one to five years' imprisonment and, in 15 cases, from five to ten years' imprisonment.

The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government to combat the trafficking of persons. However, it is concerned at the information concerning the persistence of the problem on a substantial scale in the country. Furthermore, noting the statistics on the investigations conducted, the prosecutions launched and the convictions handed down for the crime of trafficking of persons in the country, the Committee notes that overall statistics are provided which do not show the situation with regard to children. It also notes that, even though children are the victims of sale and trafficking for both sexual and economic exploitation, the convictions relate only to trafficking for sexual exploitation. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the protection in practice of young persons under 18 years of age against the sale and trafficking of children for sexual and economic exploitation. In this respect, it requests the Government to supply information on the application in practice of the provisions of national legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of persons under 18 years of age, including, in particular, statistics relating to investigations, prosecutions and penalties imposed. Moreover, in view of the statement indicating the investigation and prosecution of persons, the Committee requests the Government to supply copies of any court decisions issued.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Reinforcement of labour inspection. The Government indicates in its report that the Ministry of Labour and Employment has modified the functions of the Special Mobile Inspection Group, extending the action taken by labour inspectors to combating child labour and to other related matters, including the commercial sexual exploitation of children. In the context of public information campaigns planned for the World Day Against Child Labour in June 2008, the Government states that the Ministry of Labour and Employment organized inspections targeting child labour throughout the country. These operations enabled 821 children to be removed from their work.

Furthermore, according to the Government's report, an information system on locations of child labour (SITI) has been established. This information system contains detailed information on locations where child labour, and the worst forms thereof, occurs, in both the formal and informal economies, including information concerning the commercial sexual exploitation of children. This database contributes to the planning of actions by the labour inspectorate, particularly by the regional superintendencies for labour and employment. Noting with interest the measures taken by the Government to strengthen the intervention capacity of the labour inspectorate throughout the country, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure the success of the labour inspectorate's activities.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assistance for their removal from these worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation. Time-bound Programme (TBP). With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that, according to the 2008 ILO–IPEC report on the TBP, a total of 723 children (54 boys and 669 girls) have either been prevented from engaging in commercial sexual exploitation or been removed from this worst form of child labour. It also notes that the Sentinel programme which provides psychological and social support to children and young persons who have been the victims of sexual exploitation, is now operating in more than 885 municipalities in the country. Moreover, the Committee notes that the 2006 National Policy for combating the trafficking of persons and the 2008 National Plan for combating the trafficking of persons state, in particular that measures to prevent trafficking and to assist the victims thereof must be adopted in order to reinforce those already in place. The Committee requests the Government to continue to adopt the necessary time-bound measures, in the context of the National Plan and National Policy for combating the trafficking of persons, to prevent young persons under 18 years of age from becoming the victims of commercial sexual exploitation, to remove them from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Child domestic workers. The Committee previously noted the indication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that, according to the 2004 ILO–IPEC study, there are over 500,000 child domestic workers in Brazil. Many of them are extremely vulnerable to exploitation and work under conditions prohibited by the Convention. These children, particularly the girls, do not attend school, and the school attendance rate for girls in general is very low. Over 88 per cent of child domestic workers begin working before the minimum age for admission to employment, normally at five or six years of age. The ITUC also pointed out that the national legislation contains provisions applicable to child domestic labour but a clear legal framework would be necessary to end this form of exploitation of children. It also underlined the fact that, since these children work in private houses, where it is very difficult to monitor them, it is important to change public attitudes to child domestic work. In this respect, the Committee noted the information from the Government to the effect that the characteristics of domestic work prevent the labour inspection services from carrying out inspections directly in private houses. The Committee further noted that discussions have been held concerning the inclusion of this form of child labour on the list of activities considered to be hazardous.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's statement that, under the terms of Decree No. 6.481 of 12 June 2008, child domestic labour is now regarded as one of the worst forms of child labour and is prohibited for any person under 18 years of age. The Government also indicates that it is impossible for labour inspectors to carry out inspections in private houses because this would amount to trespassing. The Committee notes that, according to the 2008 ILO–IPEC report on the TBP, a sectoral plan on domestic workers (Planseq) has been implemented to support this category of workers and inform them of their rights. In view of the Government's statements, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to implement Decree No. 6.481 of 12 June 2008, which prohibits the employment of young persons under 18 years of age as domestic workers, and in particular to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for their removal from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration.

Finally, with regard to the work to bring the national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 138 and 182, the Committee notes the Government's indication to the effect that this is still in progress. It expresses the hope that the issues raised above and also those contained in the direct request will be taken into account in the context of this work to bring the national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 138 and 182 and requests the Government to supply information on all progress made in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Burundi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour constitutes a serious problem in Burundi, particularly in agriculture and informal activities in urban areas. It also noted the statement by the Government that the socio-political crisis experienced by the country had aggravated the situation of children, some of whom were obliged to perform work "illegally" to support their families, very frequently in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee noted that section 3 of the Labour Code, in conjunction with section 14, prohibits work by young persons under 16 years of age in public and private enterprises, including farms, where such work is carried out on behalf of and under the supervision of an employer.

In its report, the Government confirmed that the country's regulations did not apply to the informal sector, which consequently escapes any control. Nevertheless, the question of extending the application of the labour legislation to this sector was to be discussed in a tripartite context on the occasion of the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts. The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, including own-account work. It once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Convention to work performed outside an employment relationship, particularly in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's indications that the war had weakened the education system due to the destruction of many schools and the death or abduction of a large number of teachers. According to the ITUC, the school attendance rate is lower and the illiteracy rate higher for girls. The Committee further noted that, according to a report of the International Bureau of Education (UNESCO) of 2004 relating to data on education, Legislative Decree No. 1/025 of 13 July 1989 reorganizing education in Burundi does not provide for free and compulsory primary education. Entry into primary education is around the age of 7 or 8 years and lasts six years. Children therefore complete primary education around the age of 13 or 14 years and then have to pass a competition to enter secondary education. The Committee further noted that in 1996 the Government had prepared a Global Plan of Action for Education designed to improve the education system, among other measures, by reducing inequalities and disparities in access to education and achieving a gross school attendance rate of 100 per cent by the year 2010.

The Committee duly noted the information provided by the Government in its report with regard to the various measures adopted in the field of education. It noted that, under article 53(2) of the Constitution of 2005, the State is under the obligation to organize public education and promote access to such education. It further noted that basic education is free of charge and that the number of children attending school tripled during the 2006 school year. In 2007, primary schools would be constructed and other mobile and temporary schools would be established. Furthermore, coordination units for girls' education had been established and over 1,000 teachers recruited. The Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education and to provide information on the impact of the above measures in terms of increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the drop-out rate, with special attention to the situation of girls. It also requests the Government to indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the provisions of the national legislation which determine this age.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee noted previously that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations on the initial report of the Government (CRC/C/15/Add.133, October 2000), expressed concern at the use of children by the State as soldiers or helpers in camps or in obtaining information. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed concern at the low minimum age for recruitment to the armed forces and at the widespread recruitment of children by opposition armed forces and the sexual exploitation of children by members of the armed forces. Moreover, the Committee of Experts noted that in March 2003 the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) made comments on the application of the Convention confirming the use of child soldiers by the armed forces.

The Committee noted that, in its comments, the COSYBU indicates that armed conflicts persist, maintained by the Partie pour la libération du peuple Hutu/Forces nationales pour la libération of Agathon Rwaswa (PALIPEHUTU/FNL) and that children continue to be enrolled. It also noted the information provided by the Government in reply to COSYBU's comments according to which, following the signature of the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement in August 2000 and the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement signed with the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie/Forces pour la défense de la démocratie (CNDD/FDD) of Pierre Nkurunziza, the phenomenon of children being used in armed conflict has almost ended and the integration of these children into social and economic life is continuing. The Government added that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is the worst form of child labour observed most commonly in Burundi. However, considering the relative calm that was being experienced over most of the national territory, it had launched the implementation of a vast programme for the demobilization and reintegration of former combatants through three organizations, namely: the National Commission for Demobilization, Reinsertion and Reintegration (CNDRR), the National Structure for Child Soldiers (SEN) and the ILO-IPEC project on the "Prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflicts: An interregional programme". Furthermore, according to the Government, all children had been demobilized except those used by the armed movement FNL (Front national de libération) of Agathon Rwaswa, which has not yet laid down its arms.

The Committee noted that, in his Report on Children and Armed Conflicts in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the United Nations Secretary-General indicated that, despite the substantial progress achieved in addressing the grave violations of children's rights, violations are still occurring and the competent authorities have not always conducted criminal investigations nor punished those responsible. During the period from August 2005 to September 2006, the United Nations Operation in Burundi (UNOB) identified over 300 cases of child victims of grave violations, perpetrated mainly by members of the FNL and FND troops, including the murder and mutilation of children, serious sexual violence and the recruitment and use of children in armed groups and forces, with an increase of this latter violation being noted (paragraph 25). The Secretary-General added that the authorities have not yet adopted national legislation to criminalize the recruitment and use of child soldiers (paragraph 36). Furthermore, according to the information contained in the Report of the Secretary-General of 27 October 2006, a ceasefire agreement was signed between the Government and Agathon Rwaswa's FNL, the last active rebel movement, on 7 September 2006 (paragraph 5). Nevertheless, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicated that the implementation of the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement had remained stalled since its signature (paragraphs 1 and 2).

The Committee noted that, in the information provided under Convention No. 29, the Government indicated that the minimum age for enrolment in the armed forces of Burundi has been increased from 16 to 18 years. It also noted that, according to the information contained on the Internet site of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict (www.un.org/children/conflict/english/home6.html), following her visit to the country, the Government of Burundi had made progress in the protection of children affected by conflict. In this respect, the Committee noted that the Penal Code had been amended to bring its provisions into harmony with the international instruments on human rights ratified by Burundi and that the proposed changes include provisions relating to the protection of children and against war crimes. The Penal Code now provides that the recruitment of children under 16 years of age in armed conflicts constitutes a war crime. The Committee reminds the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour. It therefore once again requests the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency to amend the national legislation and prohibit the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, either in the national armed forces or in rebel groups, and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee noted that, despite the measures adopted by the Government, the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflicts still occurs and that the situation in Burundi remains fragile. It expressed great concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as the murder and mutilation of children and sexual violence. In this respect, the Committee refers to the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi and once again requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to continue negotiations with a view to reaching a definitive peace agreement, putting an end unconditionally to the recruitment of children and undertaking the immediate and complete demobilization of all children. Finally, with reference to the Security Council which, in resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, recalls “the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children”, the Committee once again urges the Government to ensure that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on persons found guilty of enrolling or using young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. In its communication, the COSYBU indicated that the extreme poverty of the population encourages parents to allow their children to engage in prostitution. In its report, the Government indicated that cases of the use of children for prostitution have been reported in the popular districts of the municipality of Bujumbura (Bwiza and Buyenzi). However, the juvenile police reacted rapidly and eradicated this phenomenon, with penalties being imposed on persons who recruited children for prostitution. The Committee noted that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the United Nations independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicated that more and more children are victims of sexual violence (paragraph 82). The Committee noted that sections 372 and 373 of the Penal Code penalize the use, procuring or offering of children who are minors for prostitution, even with their consent. The Committee noted that, even though the national legislation prohibits this worst form of child labour, the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution remains a problem in practice. It once again requests the Government to renew its efforts to implement these provisions effectively in practice and to ensure the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against prostitution. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information in this respect, including reports on the number of convictions. It also requests the Government to indicate whether the national legislation contains provisions criminalizing the client in the event of prostitution.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities. Street children. In its communication, the COSYBU indicated that the extreme poverty of the population drives parents to allow their children to engage in begging. In his Report on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the Secretary-General indicated that UNOB and its partner child protection agencies have received information on the recruitment of from three to ten male children per month, including street children in Bujumbura Mairie Province (paragraph 25). As the national legislation does not appear to regulate this activity, the Committee expresses grave concern at the increase in street children who are exposed to numerous risks, including being used or recruited for armed conflict or other illicit activities. It reminds the Government that, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, it is under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to protect street children and to prohibit in the national legislation the use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities. It also requests the Government to establish penalties for this purpose.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these worst forms and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child soldiers. The Committee noted with interest that the Government is participating in the ILO-IPEC interregional project on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, which also includes the Congo, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Colombia. The objective of the programme is to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict, facilitate their removal and ensure their social integration. The Committee noted the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the measures that it has taken with organizations to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict or to remove them from this worst form of child labour. It noted that, in the context of the ILO-IPEC interregional project, over 15 programmes of action have been implemented and that around 1,440 children have been demobilized in the areas covered by the project. The Committee further noted that, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicates that, since November 2003, the United Nations project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of children associated with armed forces and groups has freed and reintegrated 3,015 children (paragraph 27). It further noted that the National Structure for Child Soldiers is a project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of child soldiers which has been in operation since 2003. In the context of this programme, 1,932 children had been demobilized.

The Committee noted that the Ministry of National Solidarity, Human Rights and Gender has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Executive Secretariat of the NCDRR. In the context of this agreement, measures are adopted at different levels to raise the awareness of the various target groups with regard to the problem of recruitment (members of military forces, combatants, parents, young persons, the civil administration, civil society, NGOs and politicians) and to institutionalize training on the rights and protection of the child in armed conflicts within the training structures of the national army. Furthermore, children who had been demobilized and were exposed to the risk of being recruited once again are monitored. The Committee encouraged the Government to continue collaborating with the various bodies involved in the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration with a view to removing children from armed forces and groups. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the ILO-IPEC interregional programme on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict with a view to preventing children from being enrolled in armed conflict and to remove them from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures adopted for the rehabilitation and social integration of children who are in practice removed from armed forces or groups.

Sexual exploitation. Considering that a number of children are the victims of sexual exploitation as noted under Article 3(b), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to remove young persons under 18 years of age from prostitution. It also requests the Government to envisage measures to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children removed from this worst form of child labour.

Clause (c). Ensuring access to free basic education and vocational training for all children removed from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee took note of the information provided by the Government to the effect that, during the 2004–05 school year, a total of 485 former child soldiers were reintegrated into primary school, 99 were oriented towards secondary school, 79 in technical training centres and 74 in training from craft workers. It once again strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to provide access to basic education or vocational training to children removed from armed conflict. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on this subject.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Street children. The Committee noted that in his report of 23 September 2005 (E/CN.4/2006/109), the United Nations independent expert on the human rights situation in Burundi indicates that the situation of children in the country remains extremely worrying. Children are affected not only by the continuing conflict, but also by the deteriorating economic situation (paragraph 55). According to some estimates, there are over 3,000 street children in the country. It also noted that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicates that the phenomenon of street children is on the rise in Bujumbura and that a programme aimed at curbing the trend has been elaborated and includes aspects relating to prevention, assistance and reintegration (paragraph 79). Recalling that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee once again encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to protect them from these worst forms. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the programme to bring an end to this phenomenon, particularly with regard to measures for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Central African Republic

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and the application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a study by the Ministry of the Economy, Planning and International Cooperation of 2003 on the situation of children in the country. According to this study, 5.2 per cent of boys and 5.6 per cent of girls between the ages of 6 and 9 years are engaged in work. The study also shows that boys work, in particular, in the private wage sector (boys account for 68.5 per cent of children working in this sector), the para-public wage sector (66.7 per cent), for an employer (72.7 per cent) and as apprentices (60.2 per cent), while the number of girls is greater in own-account work (girls account for 56.9 per cent of children working in this sector) or as family helpers (53.5 per cent). The Committee also noted the Government's indication that a study to identify and classify types of child labour, carried out in collaboration with UNICEF, was in the process of being validated.

The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2007, 57 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 years are engaged in work in the Central African Republic (44 per cent of boys and 49 per cent of girls). It notes the Government's indication that, in the context of the adoption of the new Act No. 09.004 issuing the Labour Code of the Central African Republic in January 2009 (Labour Code of 2009), the Labour Department has worked on the preparation of texts to implement the Code. The Government indicates that a national policy for the progressive abolition of child labour and to increase the minimum age for admission to employment or work will be prepared once the implementing texts have been issued. The Committee must, however, express once again its deep concern at the situation of young children who work in the country out of personal necessity. It therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the national policy for the progressive abolition of child labour is adopted in the very near future and that programmes of action are implemented in the sectors in which child labour is the most problematic. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect. It also once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the study to identify and classify child labour.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application and minimum age for admission to employment or work. Self-employed work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the Government that most children are used in the sectors of the informal economy, such as diamond workshops, portage or diving in search of diamonds. The Government indicated that the juvenile courts and the Children's Parliament guarantee the protection envisaged by the Convention with respect to children engaged in an economic activity on their own account. The Committee notes that the Labour Code of 2009 is not applicable to self-employed workers (section 2), but only governs professional relationships between workers and employers derived from labour contracts (section 1). Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject, the Committee requests it once again to provide information on the manner in which the juvenile courts and the Children's Parliament ensure the application of the protection envisaged by the Convention in respect of children who work without an employment relationship, in particular when they work on their own account or in the informal economy. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to envisage the possibility of adopting measures to adapt and strengthen the labour inspection services so as to secure this protection.

Family enterprises. The Committee noted previously that, under section 2 of Order No. 006 of 21 May 1986 determining the conditions of employment of young workers, the types of work and the categories of enterprises that are prohibited for young persons and the age limit up to which this prohibition applies (Order No. 006 of 1986), children under 14 years of age may be employed, even as apprentices, in establishments in which only family members are engaged. The Committee notes that section 166 of the Labour Code of 2009 provides that no one may be apprenticed who is not at least 14 years of age. Furthermore, section 259 provides that children may not be employed in any enterprise, even as apprentices, before the age of 14 years, unless an exception is issued by order of the minister responsible for labour taking into account the opinion of the National Standing Labour Council. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether exceptions have been authorized by the minister responsible for labour under section 259 of the Labour Code of 2009.

Domestic work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 3(a) of Order No. 006 of 1986 provides that children over 12 years of age may carry out light domestic work and that section 125 of the Labour Code respecting the minimum age for admission to employment only applies to work performed in an enterprise. The Committee observed previously that no text in the national legislation explicitly establishes a minimum age of 14 years for domestic workers. It therefore recalled that Article 2 of the Convention is applicable to domestic work and that the minimum age for admission to this type of work must not be less than 14 years, except for work considered to be light, in accordance with the conditions laid down in Article 7 of the Convention. In this respect, the Government indicated that measures to explicitly establish a minimum age for admission to employment for light domestic work were envisaged in the preliminary draft of the Labour Code. The Committee notes with interest that section 259 of the Labour Code of 2009 establishes the minimum age for admission to employment at 14 years and that the application of the Labour Code is now no longer limited to work performed in an enterprise (section 1).

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the age of completion of compulsory schooling is 14 years. It also noted the Government's indication to the Committee on the Rights of the Child that, pursuant to section 6 of Act No. 97/014 of 10 December 1997 respecting education policy, school attendance is compulsory from 5 to 15 years and that the texts to be issued under this Act are being prepared. The Committee also noted the adoption of the Plan of Action on Education for All (NPA-EFA) in 2005, the objective of which is to increase the school attendance rate, reduce the school drop-out rate and ensure the completion of the full cycle of primary education by all children. The Committee further noted that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2006, the net school enrolment rate for primary education was 44 per cent for boys and 37 per cent for girls, while the figures for secondary education were 13 per cent for boys and 9 per cent for girls. The Committee also noted that, according to the Education for All Global Monitoring Report 2008, published by UNESCO under the title "Education for All in 2015: Will we make it?", in view of the lack of data, it was impossible to make projections for the achievement of the goals established by the NPA-EFA for the Central African Republic for 2015. However, the study indicates that 20 per cent or more of primary school students are repeating their grade and that girls repeat grades more than boys.

The Committee observes that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2007, the school attendance rates at the primary and secondary levels remain a matter of great concern: the net enrolment rate at primary school is 53 per cent for boys and 38 per cent for girls, and the figures for secondary education are 13 per cent for boys and 9 per cent for girls. The Committee, however, notes that the Government has not provided any information on this subject in its report. The Committee therefore once again expresses its deep concern at the low rate of school enrolment in both primary and secondary education, and particularly at the disparity between the two sexes, to the detriment of girls, and the fairly high rate of repeating school years, which affects girls in particular. It once again observes that poverty is one of the primary causes of child labour and that, when combined with a deficient educational system, it prevents the development of the child. Considering that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to improve the functioning of the education system in the country so as to enable children to attend compulsory basic education or to be integrated into an informal school system. In this respect, it once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the NPA-EFA of 2005 to increase the school enrolment rate and reduce the school drop-out rate, so as to prevent children under 14 years of age from working. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved. Finally, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide a copy of Act No. 97/014 of 10 December 1997 on education policy.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to hazardous types of work and determination of these types of work. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, under the terms of section 263 of the Labour Code of 2009, the worst forms of child labour, that is work by any person under 18 years of age (section 3), are prohibited throughout the Central African Republic. Section 262 provides that the worst forms of child labour include work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that section 261 of the Labour Code of 2009 provides that a joint order of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Public Health, issued taking into account the opinion of the National Standing Labour Council, shall determine the nature of the types of work and the categories of enterprises prohibited for children and the age limit up to which this prohibition applies. The Committee however observes that no list of these hazardous types of employment or work appears to have been published up to now. The Committee reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the hazardous types of employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a list determining the hazardous types of employment or work that are prohibited for persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with section 261 of the Labour Code of 2009, is adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that Chapter II of the Labour Code of 2009 regulates the nature and conditions of apprenticeship contracts. Under section 166, no person may be apprenticed who is not at least 14 years of age. Furthermore, the provisions of sections III and IV of this chapter lay down the duties of masters and those of apprentices. Accordingly, masters have to teach apprentices progressively and completely the craft, trade or special occupation covered by the contract (section 172), while apprentices have to help the master through their work within the bounds of their capacities and strength (section 173).

Article 9, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee notes with interest that section 389 of the Labour Code of 2009 provides that any person who commits a violation of section 259 (minimum age for admission to work or employment of 14 years) is liable to a fine of between 100,000 and 1 million CFA francs. Under section 392, in the event of a repeat offence, including violations of section 259, liability may include terms of imprisonment of between one and six months. The Committee further notes that, under the terms of section 393, any person who has procured or endeavoured to procure a child for the worst forms of child labour shall be liable to a fine of between 500,000 and 5 million CFA francs and a term of imprisonment of between one and five years, or to only one of these penalties. In the event of a repeat offence, these penalties are doubled.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Keeping of registers by employers. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, under the terms of section 331 of the Labour Code of 2009, the employer shall always keep an up to date employment register, the first part of which shall contain data relating to the persons and the contracts of all workers engaged in the enterprise. The employment register has to be kept at the disposal of labour inspectors, who may require its production at any time. However, the Committee notes that section 331 also provides that certain enterprises or establishments, as well as certain categories of enterprises or establishments, may be exempted from the obligation to keep an employment register by reason of their situation, their small size or the nature of their activity, by order of the Ministry of Labour, issued taking into account the views of the National Standing Labour Council. The Committee once again reminds the Government that Article 9(3) of the Convention does not envisage such exceptions. Noting that the Labour Code of 2009 has not taken this issue into account, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all employers are required to keep a register indicating the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified wherever possible, of persons employed by them or working for them who are under 18 year of age. It requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 99th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2010.]

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee previously noted that the Secretary-General of the United Nations, in his report of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29–32), referred to many cases of the recruitment of children by the rebel group Union des forces démocratiques pour le rassemblement (UFDR), which controls parts of the north-east of the country. During UFDR attacks on the positions of the armed forces of the Central African Republic (FACA) and the French army in Birao in March 2007, former students of the Birao secondary school were identified among the rebels. Many of the children between the ages of 12 and 17 years who participated in these attacks lost their lives. Furthermore, according to the report, a UNICEF mission in June 2007 confirmed that there were approximately 400 to 500 children associated with the rebel groups of the Armée pour la restauration de la République et la démocratie (APRD) and the Front démocratique du peuple centrafricain (FDPC), which were participating in operations in the north-western region. The APRD and the FDPC are increasingly resorting to the forced recruitment of children in their areas of influence. The Committee noted in this respect that the national legislation does not appear to contain provisions prohibiting and penalizing the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict and it therefore requested the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency for the adoption of such legislation.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 262 and 263 of the new Act No. 09.004 issuing the Labour Code of the Central African Republic (Labour Code of 2009), adopted in January 2009, provide that all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery affecting young persons under 18 years of age, as well as forced or compulsory labour, including forced or compulsory recruitment for their use in armed conflict, are prohibited throughout the territory of the Central Africa Republic. The Committee further notes that fines and terms of imprisonment are envisaged in the event of violations of this provision (section 393).

However, the Committee notes that, according to more recent information provided by the Secretary-General of the United Nations in his Report of 3 February 2009 on children and armed conflict (S/2009/66, paragraphs 26 to 36), the APRD recently identified 250 children for release and reintegration, but it may well be that the children associated with the APRD are more numerous. In November 2008, 100 children had been identified, most of whom were between the ages of 12 to 17 years, with some cases of children of 9 and 10 years of age. The Secretary-General also reports that many children were abducted and recruited in the south-west of the country following the four attacks by the Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) in February and March 2008 on villages in the Obo area. A joint mission of the United Nations, the United Nations Peace Building Support Office in the Central African Republic, the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, the Department of Safety and Security and UNICEF found that some of the attackers were reportedly under the age of 15 years. According to 35 adults who had been abducted and were later released by the LRA, the 55 children who were abducted during the attacks are now used as soldiers or for auxiliary tasks, and the girls are used as sexual slaves. The Committee further notes that the Representative of the Secretary-General in his Report on the situation of human rights of internally displaced persons of 17 March 2008 (A/HRC/8/6/Add.1, paragraph 67), indicates that he observed children among the rebels patrolling the territories under their control and that something under 1,000 children are reported to be involved.

The Committee further notes the indication by the Secretary-General that an Amnesty Law was promulgated on 13 October 2008 covering violations committed by Government security and defence forces and rebels between March 2003 and October 2008 (S/2009/66, paragraph 6). The amnesty is subject to conditions, including the cantonment, demobilization and disarmament of fighting forces within 60 days of its promulgation. Considering this short timeframe, which was challenged in particular by the APRD, an incremental approach was adopted early in November 2008, with demobilization activities to begin early in 2009. On 25 October 2008, the Government of the Central African Republic released from detention 12 fighters from the APRD, the UFDR and the FDPC, in accordance with its obligations under the agreement (S/2009/66, paragraph 6).

The Committee accordingly observes that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict still exists in the country and that the situation remains fragile. It once again expresses deep concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as murders and sexual violence. It once again reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to bring an end to the practice of the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age by armed groups, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. With reference to the Security Council, which in resolution No. 1612 of 26 July 2005 recalls "the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to take immediate measures to secure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against forced recruitment for their use in armed conflict, and to ensure that investigations are undertaken and grave charges brought against those committing violations, and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed upon persons found guilty of having used young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and to ensure their access to free basic education and, wherever possible and appropriate, to vocational training. Child soldiers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to information from UNICEF, the Government, the UFDR and UNICEF signed an agreement on 16 June 2007 to reintegrate children connected with armed groups in the north-east of the country. In this respect, it noted that, according to the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations of 21 December 2007 on children and armed conflict (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 29 to 32), in the context of an agreement signed on 16 June 2007, a first group of approximately 200 children were released. In April and May 2007, over 450 children associated with the UFDR, 75 per cent of whom were boys aged between 13 and 17 years, were demobilized. According to the report, a last group of between 450 and 500 children are reported to have been released and to have returned to their communities since September 2007, although this information has not been verified. With regard to children associated with the APRD and FDPC rebel groups, which are both active in the north-western region, the report indicates that in March and June 2007 the APRD requested assistance from the United Nations Country Team to demobilize child soldiers. An informal dialogue was commenced with the APRD to prevent the recruitment of children and to demobilize and reintegrate those who are in its ranks with a view to their reintegration into society. However, formal negotiations are hampered by the insecurity in the north-western region of the country.

The Committee further noted that, according to the UNICEF Humanitarian Action Report 2008, the conflict has resulted in internal displacements, with over 610,000 suffering from the conflict. The Committee also noted that UNICEF intends to improve access to basic education for 113,000 conflict-affected children through an extensive back-to-school campaign across the country's northern prefectures. UNICEF also intends to facilitate the reintegration of 1,000 child soldiers into their families and communities.

The Committee notes that, according to the Report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations of 3 February 2009 on children and armed conflict (S/2009/66, paragraph 53), strategic partnerships for the prevention of the recruitment and for the release and reintegration of children in areas controlled by the APRD and the UFDR have recently been concluded with four humanitarian NGOs. This community-based programme envisages support for the release and reintegration of hundreds of children associated with armed groups in the northern areas. Three transit interim care centres are currently being built in the north-western districts and an emergency site to receive released children is already operational in the north-west. The Committee however notes the indication by the Secretary-General that, while there have been some positive developments regarding the anticipated release of children from the APRD and the UFDR, the deadlock in the peace negotiations and the withdrawal of the major parties to the conflict from the Comprehensive Peace Dialogue in August 2008 stalled the implementation of the commitments to release children. According to the Secretary-General, up to now, relatively few children have actually been released and there may also have been new recruitment.

The Committee therefore once again observes that, despite the Government's collaboration with UNICEF, the current situation of the country remains a cause of grave concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts and to continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations with a view to improving the situation of child victims of forced recruitment who are used in armed conflict. It hopes that the Government will negotiate an end to armed conflict so that all children used in armed conflict are demobilized and reintegrated, particularly in the north-east and north-west of the country. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the number of child soldiers removed from armed groups and reintegrated through appropriate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including through care centres. It requests the Government to provide information in this respect in its next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Chad

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, under section 14 of Ordinance No. 01/PCE/CEDNACVG of 16 January 1991 reorganizing the armed forces of Chad [Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991], the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts.

The Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532, for the period July 2007–June 2008), the political, military and security situation in the country remains highly volatile, owing to the continuation of armed conflict between the Chad armed forces and armed rebel groups, the presence in eastern Chad of foreign rebel groups, cross-border raids by the Janjaweed militia and continuing inter-ethnic tensions. The Committee notes that, according to the Secretary-General's report, the Government of Chad and the three main rebel groups, namely the Union des forces pour la démocratie et le développement (UFDD), the Rassemblement des forces pour le changement (RFC) and the Concorde nationale tchadienne (CNT), signed a peace agreement on 25 October 2007 which provided for an immediate cease-fire. However, despite the signature of this agreement, fighting has continued and all the parties concerned have continued to recruit and use children in the conflict.

The Committee notes that the Secretary-General's Report shows that the forced recruitment and use of child soldiers in the conflict in Chad is related to the regional dimension of the conflict. The Toroboro or Sudanese armed groups allied with the Government of Chad are recruiting children from two refugee camps, at Tréguine and Bredjing, during the rainy season. Furthermore, heavy recruitment also occurs on the basis of needs in Darfur. The Sudanese rebel movement Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) continues to recruit in and around refugee camps, notably Oure Cassoni (Bahai). According to information in the Secretary-General's report, between 7,000 and 10,000 children are associated with the armed forces and armed groups. The Committee notes that the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict, in its conclusions of December 2008 (S/AC.51/2008/15), expressed grave concern that all parties to the conflict continue to recruit and use children and called for measures to be taken to prosecute the perpetrators and put an end to impunity.

The Committee notes that the situation in Chad has been unstable for many years and that it remains fragile. The Committee also notes that, despite the fact that Ordinance No. 1 of 16 January 1991 provides that the age of recruitment is 18 years for volunteers and 20 years for conscripts, the recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is continuing in practice. In this regard, it notes that no penalties are laid down for violations of this prohibition. The Committee expresses deep concern at the current situation, especially as the persistence of the worst forms of child labour leads to other violations of the rights of the child, such as abduction, death and sexual violence. It reminds the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, members States must take immediate and effective measures to secure the elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to stop in practice the forced recruitment of children under 18 years of age by armed forces and groups and immediately undertake the full demobilization of all children. With reference to Security Council resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, which recalls the "responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to take immediate steps to ensure that perpetrators are investigated and prosecuted and that penalties which are sufficiently effective and dissuasive are imposed on persons found guilty of recruiting and using children under 18 years of age in armed conflict. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (b) and (c). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration, including access to free basic education and vocational training. Children who have been enlisted and used in armed conflict. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the report of the United Nations Secretary-General of 7 August 2008 on children and armed conflict in Chad (S/2008/532), the Government of Chad signed an agreement with UNICEF on 9 May 2007 to ensure the release and sustainable reintegration of all child soldiers associated with armed forces and groups in the country. According to the Secretary-General's report, since the agreement was signed, 512 child soldiers have been released to UNICEF, which has provided support at five transit centres. So far 265 children have voluntarily returned to or been reunited with their families, and 220 have been placed in schools and 85 in professional activities. Most of the demobilized children were associated with non-governmental armed groups. Very few children associated with the Chadian armed forces have been released. According to the Secretary-General's report, negotiations are under way for placing the demobilized children in vocational training institutions and providing them with gainful employment. Some NGOs which are partners of UNICEF are currently working on the reintegration programme. Moreover, the encouraging start of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration activities in Chad is likely to lead to the release of another estimated 2,500 children associated with armed forces and groups.

The Committee also notes that, according to the Secretary-General's report, Chad undertook to release as a matter of priority children associated with armed groups held in detention. Moreover, it decided that an inter-ministerial task force would be established to coordinate and ensure effective reintegration of children. The Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of February 2009 (CRC/C/TDC/CO/2, paragraph 71), urged the Government to take the necessary measures immediately to facilitate contact between armed groups operating in Chad and the United Nations in order to promote the demobilization of children and prevent the recruitment of children, particularly in refugee camps. In this regard, the Committee on the Rights of the Child urges the Government to extend the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programme, placing particular emphasis on the demobilization and reintegration of girls.

The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to demobilize and reintegrate child soldiers, particularly through collaboration with UNICEF. It notes, however, that the current situation in the country remains a source of concern. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts and continue its collaboration with UNICEF and other organizations in order to improve the situation of child victims of forced recruitment for use in armed conflict. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that child soldiers removed from armed forces and groups receive adequate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including reintegration into the school system or vocational training, wherever possible and appropriate. It requests the Government to supply information in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Congo

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar practices. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that there is child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work. According to the Government, the children are forced to work all day in harsh conditions by their host families, and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code lay down penalties for anyone found guilty of the forcible or fraudulent abduction of persons including young persons under 18 years of age. It requested the Government to indicate to what extent sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the application of sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code in practice, including, in particular, statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the Government's statement acknowledging that the trafficking of children between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading and domestic work is contrary to human rights. It also noted that the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including: (a) the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin of children who have either been picked up by the national police or removed from families; and (b) the requirement at borders (airport) for minors (young person under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave the territory of Benin. The Committee asked the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken with regard to the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour. It notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on this subject. The Committee requests the Government once again to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to remove young persons under 18 years of age from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to supply information on the impact of these measures.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the initial report of the Congo of October 2006 (CRC/C/COG/CO/1, paragraph 85), a study of the root causes and repercussions of trafficking is due to be conducted in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of this study and to supply a copy of it once it has been prepared.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Côte d'Ivoire

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

Article 3 and Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children, and penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that sections 370 and 371 of the Penal Code criminalize the abduction of minors. The Committee noted that, according to a study carried out by ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA in 2005 on the trafficking of children for the exploitation of their work in the informal sector in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, these provisions are inadequate for combating the trafficking of children for economic exploitation as they only cover cases of the abduction of minors, whereas the internal or cross-border trafficking of children in Côte d'Ivoire is based on traditional networks for the placement of children and therefore occurs with the consent of the children's parents or guardians. The Committee noted that a draft Act on the trafficking of children was adopted by the Council of Ministers in 2001 but had still not been put to the vote by the National Assembly.

The Committee notes that, according to a 2006 UNICEF report on the trafficking of persons, particularly women and children in West and Central Africa, Côte d'Ivoire is principally a country of destination. The vast majority of victims of trafficking in Côte d'Ivoire are exploited in plantations and gold mines. In Abidjan and Bouaké, girls originating in particular from Nigeria are subjected to sexual exploitation or are exploited as servants or street vendors. Moreover, according to UNICEF information for February 2007, approximately 200,000 children originating from Burkina Faso, Mali, Togo and also the north and centre of the country are working in cocoa plantations.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that steps will be taken to adopt the Act prohibiting the trafficking of children and the worst forms of child labour. It also notes that, according to the Government, 14 persons were arrested and imprisoned in 2008 for the trafficking of children. The Committee expresses its serious concern at the scale of the phenomenon and the lack of regulation, which is one of the factors which favours the economic or sexual exploitation of children in the country. It reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of young persons under 18 years of age for economic or sexual exploitation are considered as the worst forms of child labour and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures must be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft Act prohibiting the trafficking of children and the worst forms of child labour will be adopted as a matter of urgency and requests the Government to supply information on any new developments in this respect. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the protection in practice of young persons under 18 years of age against the sale and trafficking of children, including through the conviction of perpetrators and the imposition of penalties which act as a sufficient deterrent. In view of the indication that a number of persons were arrested and imprisoned in 2008 for the trafficking of children, the Committee requests the Government to send copies of any court decisions that are issued.

Article 3(a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, according to the report of United Nations Secretary-General of 9 February 2005 on children and armed conflict (A/59/695-S/2005/72, paragraphs 14 and 24), even though no precise information on the recruitment of children by armed groups had been obtained during the reporting period, children continued to be present in certain armed groups.

In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to the reports of the United Nations Secretary-General of 21 December 2007 (A/62/609-S/2007/757, paragraphs 18 and 33–37) and 26 March 2009 (A/63/785-S/2009/159, paragraphs 35–38) on children and armed conflict, there has been no substantiated evidence of new cases of recruitment or use of children by armed forces or groups since October 2006. Since action plans were signed in October 2005 and September 2006, the Forces armées des forces nouvelles (now Forces de défense et de sécurité des Forces nouvelles (FDS-FN) and the four armed militia in Côte d'Ivoire – namely, Front pour la libération du Grand Ouest (FLGO), Mouvement ivoirien de libération de l'Ouest de la Côte d'Ivoire (MILOCI), Alliance patriotique de l'ethnie Wé (APWé) and Union patriotique de résistance du Grand Ouest (UPRGO) – have stopped recruiting children. Moreover, the Committee welcomes the removal of the parties to the conflict in Côte d'Ivoire from the list of organizations that recruit or use children in armed conflict, as listed in the appendix to the Secretary-General's Report.

Article 3(d) and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work. Gold mines. The Committee previously noted that, according to the study carried out by ILO-IPEC-LUTRENA in 2005 on the trafficking of children for exploitation in gold mines in Issia, Côte d'Ivoire, children are the victims of internal and cross-border trafficking for economic exploitation in the gold mines of Issia. The Committee noted that child labour in mines is one of the 20 hazardous types of work covered by section 1 of Order No. 2250 of 14 March 2005 and is prohibited for young persons under 18 years of age. It also noted that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice.

The Government indicates in its report that awareness campaigns for parents and employers in mines in Issia, Bouaflé and Yamoussoukro have been conducted. While noting this information, the Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(d) of the Convention, work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children, is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and must be prohibited for persons under 18 years of age. The Committee therefore requests the Government to intensify its efforts to ensure the effective application of the legislation on the protection of children against hazardous work, particularly hazardous work in mines. The Committee also requests it to supply information on the application of the national legislation regulating hazardous work in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes with interest the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the project relating to a system for monitoring child labour (SSTE-Certification) has provided information for more than 7,000 people with regard to the worst forms of child labour and enabled the identification of some 1,300 who have been victims of child labour. These victims have been provided with school education.

Clause (b). Removing children from the worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the Government's information to the effect that, between 2004 and 2008, the project to combat the trafficking of children for the exploitation of their work in West and Central Africa (LUTRENA) has prevented more than 2,870 children falling victim to trafficking and enabled the removal of 642 children from this worst form of child labour. Furthermore, these children have been provided with schooling, either in the form of an apprenticeship or in informal schools. The Committee notes that the country is participating in phase V of the LUTRENA project. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts and requests it to provide information on the time-bound measures taken, as part of the implementation of phase V of LUTRENA, to remove children from sale and trafficking, indicating in particular the number of children actually removed from this worst form of child labour and the specific measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of these children.

Recruitment and use of children in armed conflict. The Committee notes that, according to the report of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict of 6 August 2008 (A/63/227, paragraph 7), the armed forces and groups have taken coordinated steps to identify and release children associated with them with a view to ensuring their reintegration. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the time-bound measures taken to ensure that child soldiers released from armed forces and groups receive appropriate assistance for their rehabilitation and social integration, including by reintegrating them in the school system or in vocational training.

Article 8. International cooperation. The Committee previously noted that Côte d'Ivoire signed the multilateral cooperation agreement of 27 July 2005 to combat the trafficking of children in West Africa. It notes that the country also signed the regional multilateral cooperation agreement to combat the trafficking of children in West and Central Africa in July 2006. In view of the scale of cross-border trafficking in the country, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the multilateral agreements signed in 2005 and 2006, indicating in particular whether the exchange of information has enabled child trafficking networks to be identified and persons working in such networks to be arrested. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to state whether steps have been taken to identify and intercept child victims of trafficking in border regions and whether transit centres have been established.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the statistics provided by the Government to the effect that, according to a national survey of child labour conducted in 2005, 1.1 per cent of children are victims of internal trafficking while 10.4 per cent are victims of cross-border trafficking, with 52 per cent originating from Burkina Faso and 31 per cent from Ghana. The cities most affected by trafficking are Bas Sassandra, NZI Comoé and Abidjan. In addition, 17 per cent of economically active children are involved in hazardous work. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing statistics on the number of child victims of trafficking as well as those involved in hazardous work.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Czech Republic

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted the ICFTU's indication that children are trafficked from Eastern European countries and the former Soviet Union to the Czech Republic for the purposes of prostitution, and Czech children are also trafficked to Western Europe. The Committee had also noted the following sections of the Penal Code which deal with trafficking: section 216a (trade in children); section 216b (definition of child as per section 216 and 216a); and section 246 (trade in women for sexual relations). The Committee had requested the Government to supply a copy of section 246 of the Penal Code as amended by Act No. 134/2002, which extends its application to boys and young men. The Committee noted with satisfaction the Government's information that a new provision under section 232a, which repeals and replaces section 246 of the Penal Code, has been introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 537/2004. According to this provision, a person who engages, arranges, hires, entraps, transports, hides or detains a person younger than 18 years, by force, threat, violence or otherwise, for the purposes of sexual exploitation, slavery or serfdom, forced labour or other forms of exploitation shall be punished with imprisonment from two to ten years.

Clause (b). Using, procuring or offering a child for prostitution. The Committee had previously noted the ICFTU's indication that the forced prostitution of children is a serious and increasing problem in the country. Following its previous comments on the matter, the Committee noted the Government's information that a new section 217a was introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 537/2004. The Committee noted that, according to this section, any person who offers, promises or provides payment or any other benefit for sexual intercourse or self-abuse, denudation or other similar acts to a person younger than 18 years, shall be punished with imprisonment for two years or by a fine.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The police. The Committee noted the Government's information that, within the framework of the National Plan of Action against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, the Criminality Prevention Department of the Ministry of Interior, in cooperation with the United Kingdom embassy, organized a two-day seminar in March 2005 for specialists from the criminal police and other professionals of the Czech Republic. This seminar focused on the commercial sexual exploitation and abuse of children, the offenders' typology and tactics for questioning them, understanding of the offender's behaviour when travelling abroad for sexual tourism, women as offenders and Internet criminality distributing child pornography. The Committee noted that the seminar continued in 2006 for the same group. The Committee also noted that various training programmes of police secondary schools were used to train policemen with regard to the legislation; the examination of witnesses; the psychology of persons younger than 15 years; and basic professional preparation to get acquainted with crimes related to the sexual abuse of children and youth, etc. The Committee once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the above measures taken within the framework of the National Plan of Action Against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children on increasing police effectiveness in combating the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18 years.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. National Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that a National Plan against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children was adopted in 2000 with a view to eliminating child prostitution and child pornography. The Committee noted the Government's information that within the framework of this national plan, the Criminality Prevention Department (CPD) of the Ministry of Interior provided, financially and organizationally, education to Roma social assistants and street workers in topics related to child prostitution. The Committee also noted that the CPD training plan included a two-day educational training by La Strada Organisation, on psychosocial care for threatened children and children exposed to sexual and commercial sexual abuse. The Committee noted the Government's indication that, in 2006, a training for the Roma assistants will be conducted by the Brno organization which has been realizing a pilot project called SASTIPEN-CR-Health and Social Assistants in Excluded Localities. The Committee further noted the Government's indication that a National Strategy to Combat Trafficking in Persons for the period 2005–07 was approved by government resolution No. 957/2005. The Committee also noted that a National Plan to Abolish Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children for the period 2006–08 is currently under preparation. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of these measures on the elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children under 18, particularly prostitution. The Committee further requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of the National Strategy to Combat Trafficking in Persons (2005–07) and the National Plan to Abolish the Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children (2006–08) as well as the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee noted that the new section 232a on trafficking in persons introduced in the Penal Code by Act No. 537/2004 and which replaces section 246 (trade in women for sexual relations) of the Penal Code carries penalties of imprisonment from two to ten years. Section 217a of the Penal Code states that any person who offers, promises or provides payment or any other benefit for sexual intercourse or self-abuse, denudation or other similar acts to a person younger than 18 years is liable to imprisonment for two years and a fine. The Committee noted the statistics provided in the Government's report on the crimes committed under sections 246, 232a and 217a of the Penal Code. According to these statistics, under section 246 for the year 2003: five crimes were committed and five people were sentenced; in 2004: 12 crimes committed and 12 people sentenced; in 2005: 20 crimes committed and 20 people sentenced. Under section 232a for the first quarter of 2006: two crimes were committed by two people for which the legal procedure is pending. With regard to section 217a: in 2004, three people were sentenced; in 2005, six people were sentenced; and in the first quarter of 2006, 11 crimes were committed, out of which eight people were sentenced. The Committee once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the above penalties in practice.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Time-bound measures. Clause (a). Measures taken to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted the Government's information that the problem of the commercial sexual abuse of children is included in the professional training of pedagogical staff, and that the Ministry of Education, Youth and Sports (MEYS) elaborated a strategy for the prevention of sociopathological effects in children and youth within schools, in relation to commercial sexual abuse. The Committee noted that the MEYS in cooperation with the Pedagogic Research Institute initiated two projects: the first was a training programme entitled "Reducing the incidence of child pornography"; and the second one was concerned with the creation of a methodological manual for teachers called "Sex education – child pornography and its prevention at school". The Committee also noted the Government's information that a pilot inquiry called "Prevention of Commercial Sexual Abuse of Children in Educational Institutions for Youth and Child Homes with Schools" conducted by MEYS in 2004 with a sample of pupils of an average age of 16.6 years revealed that most of the children had problems of truancy, including sexual abuse in the family which led them to run away from the family. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned measures in preventing the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee had previously noted that the programme on the implementation of measures to eliminate the worst forms of child labour of 2003 indicates that the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and the Ministry of Health shall support long-term therapeutic work with child victims of criminal offences and their families and ensure their protection from further victimization. The Committee noted the Government's information that institutions, such as centres of educational care, diagnostic institutions, children's homes with access to schools and educational institutions provide care for victims of the worst forms of child labour, children hailing from problematic families and children having problems with truancy. The Committee noted the Government's information that within the framework of the National Plan of Action against the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children, the Criminality Prevention Department of the Ministry of Interior established interrogation rooms for traumatized victims, especially children, with the aim of preventing secondary victimization of the commercial sexual abuse of such victims. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the abovementioned measures on removing children from commercial sexual exploitation and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee recalled that, under section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance, the minimum age of admission to employment was 12 years and that, under section 4, subsections (1) and (5), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance, the minimum age is 14 years. The Government, however, specified a minimum age of 15 years when it ratified the Convention. It once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to raise the statutory minimum age to 15 years, in accordance with this provision of the Convention.

The Committee further noted that the statutory provisions on minimum age applied only to persons employed under an employment relationship or under a contract of employment, whereas the Convention also covered work performed outside any employment relationship, including work performed by young persons on their own account. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the Convention on this point.

Article 3. Hazardous work. The Committee recalled that no higher minimum age had been fixed for work which is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young people, other than night work. It once again urges the Government to take measures so as to set such higher minimum age(s) in accordance with Article 3(1) of the Convention, and to determine the types of employment or work to which higher minimum age(s) should apply, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee noted that the national legislation allowed exceptions to the above minimum ages as regards the employment of children under the age of 12 years in domestic work or agricultural work of a light nature at home by the parents or guardian of such children (section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance) and the employment of children under the age of 14 years in an undertaking or on a ship where only members of the same family are employed (section 4, subsection 1 and section 5, of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance). The Committee recalled that under this Article of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13–15 years of age on light work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. Another condition is that the activities involved and the conditions of work and employment should be determined by the competent authority. It once again expresses the hope that the Government will take measures to restrict, in accordance with this provision, the possibility to employ children below the minimum age specified, and to determine the activities and conditions of their employment or work.

As regards the Government's reference to the work of family members as the category excluded under Article 4, the Committee pointed out that the exceptions under this provision must be listed in the first report after ratification, and that the Government declared in its first report, received in February 1988, that no use was made of this provision.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Keeping of registers. The Committee noted that section 8, subsection (1), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance provided for the keeping of registers or lists of young persons of less than 16 years of age, whereas the Convention describes the keeping of such registers of persons of less than 18 years of age. It noted the Government's indication that this provision is not applied in practice. The Committee nevertheless pointed out that the Government has an obligation to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in law and practice. It therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures so that registers or other documents are kept by the employer concerning workers younger than 18 years of age.

The Committee noted the Government's indication that the provisions of the Convention are upheld by custom and practice. Pending the necessary amendments to the legislative provisions as requested above, the Committee once again asks the Government to supply detailed information on how the Convention is applied in practice, as required under Part V of the report form, including, for instance, extracts from official reports, statistics, and information on inspection visits made and contraventions reported.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Egypt

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy on the effective abolition of child labour and the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted that, according to the 2005 report of the International Trade Union Confederation entitled “Internationally recognized core labour standards in Egypt” (ITUC report), 6 per cent of children aged 5–14 are involved in labour activities, 78 per cent of whom are in the agricultural sector (in commercial as well as subsistence agriculture). Moreover, the ITUC report indicated that children often work in repair and craft shops, in heavier industries such as brick making and textiles and in leather and carpet-making factories. The ITUC report stated that there is still clear evidence of employers who abuse, overwork and many times endanger many child workers. The ITUC report concluded that child labour is employed extensively in Egypt, in both the rural and the urban sectors and, despite some measures taken to tackle this issue, it remains a serious case for concern and further improvements are needed both in law and in practice. The Committee expressed serious concern at the situation of children working in Egypt, and urged the Government to redouble its efforts in this regard. Also, noting that the Government had drafted a national strategy to combat child labour, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the progress made towards its adoption, and on the results achieved following its implementation.

The Committee takes due note that the Government adopted a national strategy to eliminate child labour (National Child Labour Strategy) in 2006, which highlights the role of NGOs, trade unions and the private sector, in partnership with state agencies, for its implementation. In March 2008, within the framework of the National Child Labour Strategy, the Ministry of Manpower and Migration (MoMM) signed protocols of cooperation with the Chamber of Construction Material, the Chamber of Engineering Industries, the Chamber of Leather Industries and the Al-Fustat Association. In cooperation with numerous other governmental ministries, the MoMM took the following measures:

- the provision of trained personnel to deal with working children and the development of a capacity-building programme with a focus on children’s rights;
- the creation of a central database on child labour, taking gender into account in the classification and analysis of data;
- the implementation of a social mobilization and media awareness campaign on child rights and the importance of combating child labour;
- the implementation of the Children at Risk Programme, by the National Council for Childhood and Motherhood, including the “Red Card to Child Labour” initiative;
- the development of policies and legislation on the protection of working children and their harmonization with international standards in addition to strengthening their methods of implementation;
- the provision of direct services to improve the economic, health and educational status of working children and their families;
- the development of poverty-alleviation programmes to help prevent additional children from entering the labour force and to ensure that children return to school; and
- the modernization of hazardous industries to reduce the risk to children and the provision of alternatives to children, where possible.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the implementation of the National Child Labour Strategy focuses on protection (with an emphasis on reintegrating children into basic education and preventing them from dropping out and joining the labour market), and rehabilitation (with an emphasis on withdrawing children from hazardous types of work, and providing them with training opportunities and safe jobs). The Committee also notes the information in the Government’s report that it has set up advisory committees in the Directorates of Manpower and Migration in all governorates, focused on the elimination of child labour. As a result of the work of these committees, 694 children were reintegrated into basic education, 7,852 children were enrolled in literacy classes, 4,747 children were enrolled in one-room schools and 1,997 children were enrolled in training centres. In addition, 2,911 children received social services, 1,455 children received health services and 133 children received material assistance. The Committee also notes the information in the Government’s report that, in cooperation with the US Department of Labor, a project on the worst forms of child labour is currently being implemented in the Geni Sueif, Assiut and Sohag governorates, targeting working children and their families, in addition to enterprise owners. Through this programme, 1,474 children were removed from work, 6,477 children were enrolled in state schools, 1,061 children were enrolled in community schools and 503 children received occupational safety and health equipment.

The Committee welcomes the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour and facilitate access to education, though notes the information available from UNICEF that, for the period 1999–2007, approximately 7 per cent of all children aged 5–14 (approximately 1,067,000 children) were engaged in child labour. The Committee remains concerned at the high number of working children under the minimum age and therefore urges the Government to strengthen its efforts, within the framework of the national strategy to eliminate child labour, to address this issue. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the results obtained in this regard. In addition, noting that the national strategy to eliminate child labour includes the establishment of a central database on child labour, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the general application of the Convention from this database, as soon as this information is available.

Article 2, paragraph 2. Raising the initially specified minimum age for admission to work. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Children's Act No. 12 of 1996 (Children's Act) was amended by Law No. 126 of 2008, to raise the minimum age of employment to 15 years. Observing that, upon ratification the Government specified the minimum age of 14 years, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that Article 2(2) of the Convention provides for the possibility for a State which decides to raise the initially specified minimum age for admission to employment or work to inform the Director-General of the International Labour Office by means of a new declaration. This allows the age fixed by the national legislation to be harmonized with that provided for at international level.

Part III of the report form. Labour inspection. The Committee previously noted that, the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations, noted that 80 per cent of child labour is reportedly concentrated in the agricultural sector and that "many of these children work long hours in dusty environments, without masks or respirators, receiving little or no training on safety precautions for work with toxic pesticides and herbicides" (CRC/C/15/Add.145, paragraph 49, of 21 February 2000). The Committee also noted that, according to a 2007 report on findings on the worst forms of child labour in Egypt, available on the High Commissioner for Refugees web site (www.unhcr.org), a separate unit within the MoMM is responsible for child labour investigations in the agricultural sector. In this regard, it noted the Government's indication that inspections are conducted on commercial plantations with a large agricultural production and child labour inspectors endeavour to enforce the legislation regarding children working in agriculture. As a result, the MoMM reported that its 2,000 labour inspectors issued 72,000 citation violations between 2006 and the first nine months of 2007, though the Committee noted that the inspection reports communicated to the Office did not reference these citations.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report submitted under the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), that, although the Labour Code does not apply to children and women working in small family enterprises which produce for the sake of local consumption, inspections are still carried out in the agricultural sector to ensure that the working conditions conform to those prescribed under Order No. 118 of 2003, specifying that children under the age of 18 years may not be employed in several agricultural occupations, such as cotton baling (section 1(34)) and the preparation and spraying of pesticides (section 1(39)), and Order No. 1454 of 2001 of the Ministry of Agriculture on child labour in agriculture and cotton harvesting, which prohibits persons under the legal age from performing certain agricultural tasks. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the MoMM, through inspections, takes an active role in providing a safe working environment for children in agriculture and that the MoMM held 50 national workshops in the field of agricultural labour inspections. These workshops included awareness-raising activities on the issue of child labour in Egypt and on Order No. 1454 of 2001, and an explanation of the underlying causes of child labour.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that inspections were carried out in 4,361 enterprises, and a total of 3,677 children were found to be working (3,271 boys and 406 girls). The Committee also notes that comprehensive inspections were carried out in 398 enterprises, and a campaign to monitor rest and work hours included 2,657 enterprises. These inspections found wage violations concerning 254 children, leave violations concerning 169 children, hours of work and rest violations concerning 29 children and the failure of employers to meet their obligations regarding 277 children.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that, in response to the violations, inspectors issued minutes and applied the penalties prescribed in the Labour Code. However, the Committee observes that the Government's report does not indicate the number of these recourses taken with regard to child labour. The Committee also observes that the information in the Government's report on labour inspections does not indicate if these inspections include the agricultural sector. The Committee therefore requests the Government to clarify if these statistics on inspections refer to inspections in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sector. It also requests the Government to indicate the number of violations, including violations of the prohibition of hazardous work, detected by labour inspectors with regard to children working in the agricultural sector. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the number of fines issued, pursuant to the Labour Code, for violations involving persons under this minimum age. Lastly, the Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 1454 of 2001 of the Ministry of Agriculture on child labour in agriculture and cotton harvesting.

Ethiopia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that a new "National Plan of Action for Children 2003–10 and beyond" (NPA) had been drafted in 2004. One of the six main components of the NPA is reducing child labour. The Committee requested the Government to provide more detailed information on the implementation of the NPA and on the results attained. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, based on the priority areas identified by the NPA, it has begun to plan an awareness-raising programme concerning the problems associated with child labour, aimed at governmental and non-governmental bodies, although this programme has not yet been fully implemented. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the NPA, as well as results achieved in terms of the elimination of child labour.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. The Committee had previously observed that the provisions of the Labour Proclamation No. 377/2003 (Labour Proclamation) do not cover work performed outside an employment relationship. The Committee notes the Government's acknowledgement that the labour legislation does not cover children who work on their own account, and that measures will be taken. The Committee notes the information in National Labour Force Survey of 2004–05 (NFLS), produced by the Central Statistical Agency of Ethiopia (Ministry of Finance and Economic Development), that approximately 1.57 per cent of economically active children (approximately 139,404 children between the ages of 5 and 14) are self employed. The Committee recalls that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and that it covers all types of employment or work, whether under a labour relationship or contract of employment or not, and whether it is remunerated or not. It therefore again requests the Government to provide information in their next report on measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work, including work carried out by persons under 14 years of age who work on their own account.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes the information in the Government's National Report on the Development of Education submitted to the International Conference on Education in 2008, that the third five-year Education Sector Development Program was launched in 2005, with the goal of improving educational quality, relevance and efficiency and expanding access to education with special emphasis on primary education in rural areas and the promotion of education for girls, as a step to achieving universal primary education by 2015. The Committee further notes the data in the Government's report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that indicates that between 2001 and 2006, drop-out rates for primary school fell from 17.2 per cent to 12.4 per cent. The Committee also notes the information in this report that, over this period, there has been an increase in enrolment at the primary, secondary and higher education levels, as well as for technical and vocational education and training.

Nonetheless, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its 1 November 2006 concluding observations, expressed serious concern that primary education in Ethiopia is still not free nor compulsory, and that net enrolment is still very low. While the CRC welcomed the improved enrolment rate in primary school, the increased budgetary allocation for education, and the improved collection of statistics regarding school attendance, it nevertheless expressed concern at the large number of school drop-outs, the charging of fees in primary education, the overcrowding of schools, the limited provisions for vocational training, the low transition rate to secondary school, the insufficient number of trained teachers and available school facilities, the absence of budgetary allocations for pre-primary schools and the poor quality of education (CRC/C/ETH/CO/3, paragraph 63). In addition, the Committee notes the information in the UNESCO report on school attendance and enrolment issued in 2007, that the net primary school enrolment rate in 2006 was 68.2 per cent, and that the secondary net enrolment rate was 32.1 per cent. Finally, the Committee notes the information in the NFLS that 36.3 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 engage only in economic activity and do not attend school. The Committee is seriously concerned by the large numbers of children who, in practice, do not attend school, and in view of the fact that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, it urges the Government to take the necessary measures to set the age of completion of compulsory schooling at 14 years in the near future. The Committee also requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system, in particular by increasing school enrolment and attendance rates among children in rural areas and among children under 14 years of age, so as to prevent the engagement of these children in child labour. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 3. Hazardous Work. The Committee previously observed that the section 4(1) of the decree issued by the Minister of Labour and Social Affairs of 2 September 1997 concerning the prohibition of work for young workers, contained a list of types of hazardous work prohibited for young workers. The Committee also noted that, pursuant to section 4(2) of this decree, this prohibition did not apply to persons who carry out such activities in the course of professional education in vocational centres. The Committee further noted that the guidelines designed to facilitate the implementation of this decree are only available in Amharic. The Committee had asked the Government to specify what measures ensured that apprentices of 14 years of age and above do not engage in the hazardous work prohibited to young workers.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that pursuant to section 3(2)(b) of the Labour Proclamation, apprenticeships are covered by the Labour Proclamation. Section 89(4) of the Labour Proclamation prohibits young workers (which, pursuant to section 89(1), is defined as a person who has attained the age of 14 years, but is not over the age of 18 years) from engaging in work which endangers their life or health. However, the Committee notes that pursuant to section 89(5) of the Labour Proclamation, young workers following courses in vocational schools (that are approved and inspected by the competent authority) are expressly excluded from the prohibition in section 89(4). It therefore appears that workers between the ages of 14 and 18 are not prohibited from engaging in hazardous work while they are following courses in vocational schools which have been approved and inspected by the competent authority. The Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 3(1) of the Convention, the minimum age of admission to hazardous work shall not be less than 18 years. The Committee further recalls that the exception outlined in Article 3(3) of the Convention provides that national laws or regulations may authorize hazardous work for young persons over the age of 16 following consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, provided that their health, safety and morals are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that young persons under 16 years of age following courses in vocational schools will be not be authorized to carry out hazardous work that is prohibited for young workers. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the health, safety and morals of young persons engaged in vocational training aged 16 and 17 are fully protected, and to specify whether the employers' and workers' organizations have been consulted on the matter. Lastly, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the guidelines of the abovementioned decree concerning the prohibition of work for young workers once they have been translated into one of the official languages of the ILO.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. The Committee notes the data in the Government's report from the 2001 National Child Labour Survey and the 2006 analysis of this data. The Committee notes that this survey indicates that 15.5 million children (84.5 per cent of the child population) were engaged in economic activities, and 12.6 million of these children (81.2 per cent) were under the age of 15. The Committee also notes the information in the NLFS that 46.4 per cent of boys in rural areas, between the ages of 5 and 14, do not attend school, and are engaged only in economic activity. The Committee notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 1 November 2006, expressed deep concern at the prevalence of child labour among young children including those as young as 5 and that the Government had not taken comprehensive measures to prevent and combat this large-scale economic exploitation of children (CRC/C/ETH/CO/3, paragraph 71). The Committee must express its serious concern at the large percentage of children under the age of 14 who are engaged only in economic activity and do not attend school, particularly in rural areas. It therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that, in practice, children under the minimum age of 14 do not work. It strongly encourages the Government to take the necessary measures in the very near future to address this issue, including the allocation of additional resources to the child labour component of the NPA. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the implementation of measures taken in this regard.

Kenya

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted that, under section 7(2) of the Children's Act, every child shall be entitled to free basic education which shall be compulsory. It had also noted that, according to the Child labour report 1998–99 and the "Child labour policy", primary education is compulsory from 6 to 13 years of age. The Committee had further noted the Government's information that children in Kenya complete schooling at different ages and that the Government had not envisaged fixing the age of completion of compulsory schooling. In this respect, the Committee had noted the information provided by the Government of Kenya to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 concerning the application of the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), that it had appointed a committee to review the Education Act with a view to modifying, inter alia, the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Recalling that this Convention had been ratified by Kenya more than 25 years ago, the Conference Committee had urged the Government to ensure that legislation addressing the gap between the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the minimum age for admission to employment or work would be adopted shortly.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the average age for completing free primary education is 14–16 years. It also notes the Government's statement that in order to address the gap between the minimum age for admission to employment and the age of completion of compulsory schooling, the Government has waived the tuition fees for the first two years in secondary schooling. It further notes the Government's indication that it has not envisaged adopting any legislation fixing the age of completion of compulsory education. The Committee notes, however, that according to UNICEF statistics for 2007, the gross enrolment rate in primary education is 75 per cent for boys and 76 per cent for girls, and that the rate for secondary education is 52 per cent for boys and 49 per cent for girls. It also notes that according to the Global Monitoring Report 2009 on Education for All, published by UNESCO, there are about 0.9 million out-of-school children in Kenya. The Committee expresses concern at the relatively low enrolment rate for secondary education and the number of out-of-school children in Kenya. The Committee is of the view that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and it is important to emphasize the necessity of linking the age of admission to employment to the age limit of compulsory education. If the two ages do not coincide, various problems may arise. If compulsory schooling comes to an end before the young persons are legally entitled to work, there may be a period of enforced idleness (see ILO: Minimum age, General Survey of the reports relating to Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 concerning minimum age, report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Report III (Part 4(B)), ILC, 67th Session, Geneva, 1981, paragraph 140). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to set the age of completion of compulsory schooling at 16 years, as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide information on the developments made in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the operation of the education system, in particular by increasing school enrolment and attendance rates among children under 16 years of age at the primary as well as the secondary level.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted the Government's statement that the stakeholders had approved a list of the types of hazardous work which would be presented to the National Labour Board for final approval, before the minister assented to it as part of legislation. The Committee notes the Government's information that the list is still undergoing the process of approval by the National Labour Board and thereafter adoption by the minister. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the list of types of hazardous work will be adopted in the very near future. It requests the Government to supply a copy of the same as soon as it has been adopted.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work as from 16 years of age. The Committee had previously noted that section 10(4) of the Children's Act provides that the minister shall make regulations in respect of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may work, including hazardous work. It had also noted the Government's indication that the competent Minister had issued regulations referred to in section 10(4) of the Children's Act, which is an Act of Parliament. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Children's Act is currently being reviewed and that the copy thereof will be sent after adoption by the Parliament. The Committee hopes that the regulations issued under section 10(4) of the Children's Act will be adopted soon. It requests the Government to provide a copy thereof, as soon as it has been adopted.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. The Committee had previously noted the Government's indication that the Industrial Training Act was being amended to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention with regard to apprenticeship. It had noted that, according to section 58(1) of the Employment Act of 2007, no person shall employ a child of between 13 and 16 years of age, other than one serving under a contract of apprenticeship or indentured learnership in accordance with the provisions of the Industrial Training Act, in an industrial undertaking to attend to machinery. Similarly, section 57 of the Employment Act, which lays down the penalties for breach of the provisions of light work by children, exempts children between the ages of 13 and 16 years who are subject to the provisions of the Industrial Training Act relating to contracts of apprenticeship. The Committee had observed that, according to the Employment Act of 2007, children between 13 and 16 years of age are allowed to take part in apprenticeship programmes subject to the provisions of the Industrial Training Act. In this regard, the Committee had reminded the Government that Article 6 of the Convention fixes a minimum age of 14 years for work done in undertakings, where such work is carried out in accordance with conditions prescribed by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, and is an integral part of: (a) a course of education or training for which a school or training institution is primarily responsible; (b) a programme of training, mainly or entirely, in an undertaking, which programme has been approved by the competent authority; or (c) a programme of guidance or orientation designed to facilitate the choice of an occupation. The Committee once again notes the Government's information that the Industrial Training Act is being amended to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the amendments to the Industrial Training Act will be adopted in the near future with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 7, paragraph 3. Determination of light work. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 56(3) of the Employment Act, the minister may make rules prescribing light work in which a child of 13 years may be employed and the terms and conditions of that employment. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to determine the light work activities that may be undertaken by children of 13 years of age and to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such work may be undertaken. The Committee notes the Government's statement that while the reviewing of the rules and regulations has not yet been completed, these rules and regulations clearly stipulate the types of light work activities permitted to children under 13 years, and the hours and conditions of such employment. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the regulations determining the light work activities that may be undertaken by children of 13 years of age and the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such work may be undertaken, will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the regulations as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee had previously noted section 17 of the Children's Act, which provides that a child shall be entitled to leisure, play and participation in cultural and artistic activities. It had noted that the national legislation does not provide for permits to be granted to children participating in cultural artistic performances. The Committee once again notes the Government's information that no consultations with the social partners with regard to the granting of individual permits for artistic performances have been so far undertaken. It further notes the Government's indication that this matter will be addressed in the subsidiary legislation yet to be completed. The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that in its next report the Government will be in a position to provide information on the progress made in the revision of national legislation in order to ensure that approval for young persons below 16 years of age to take part in artistic performances is required in individual cases. It also reminds the Government that the permits so granted must prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work shall be permitted.

Article 1 and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's information that the incidence of child labour in Kenya has reduced tremendously from 1.9 million in 1998–99 to 951,273 in 2005. According to the Government's report this reduction is attributed to the following measures taken by the Government: free primary education; fee waiver for the first two years of secondary education; financial assistance to orphans and vulnerable children; policy development and legislation; social mobilization and awareness raising among the general population; enhanced capacity among stakeholders on child labour issues; expanded knowledge base through research; and strong partnerships with stakeholders among other interventions. The Committee notes, however, the Government's statement that it is also experiencing the following challenges in the fight against child labour:

- information on the employment of children is hard to obtain as most of the employers do not keep records of child employment or claim other reasons for keeping them as employees;
- serious unemployment problems coupled with high poverty and the HIV pandemic;
- enforcement of child labour legislation is weak due to lack of resources, transport, and manpower;
- lack of alternative placement such as vocational training institutions for children removed from child labour.

The Committee notes, however, the information provided by the Government in its report under Convention No. 182 that in order to face the above challenges the Government has adopted several measures including: strengthening and enhancing the monitoring capacity of the district child labour committees and the local child labour committees; reviewing and upgrading the child labour monitoring system under the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project in order to develop a central data system for children; and implementing a cash transfer programme for families having orphans and vulnerable children (OVC) including orphans of HIV/AIDS. The Committee encourages the Government to continue taking similar measures to face the abovementioned challenges experienced in the fight against child labour and to provide information in this regard. Moreover, while noting the improvement in reducing the incidence of child labour over the past few years, the Committee nevertheless urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and sanctioned imposed.

Kuwait

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. (a) Seasonal workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a draft Labour Law amending Act No. 38 of 1964 on labour in the private sector (Act No. 38 of 1964) was being discussed by the national authorities. The Committee observed that the Government had been referring to the enactment of the draft Labour Law for a number of years, and expressed the firm hope that it would be adopted in the near future. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft project of the Labour Law is before the legislative authority (Majlis al-Ummah). The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft project of the Labour Law was discussed in its entirety during the Majlis al-Ummah's first session and that it will soon be promulgated. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Labour Law, once it is adopted.

(b) Domestic workers. The Committee previously noted that Act No. 38 of 1964 excluded domestic workers from its scope of application, and requested the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 640 of 1978 taken by the Minister of the Interior (attached to the regulations putting into effect the Foreigners' Residence Act), in addition to a copy of the model contract for the employment of domestic workers. The Committee notes that these documents were submitted with the Government's report. The Committee also notes with interest that pursuant to section 5(3) of Order No. 640 of 1978, the minimum age for domestic workers is 20 years of age.

(c) Self-employment and street children. The Committee previously requested the Government to supply information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work outside of an employment relationship. It also requested the Government to provide information on the situation of street children, in particular with regard to their age, number and the types of work they undertake. The Committee notes the Government's statement that there are no street children in Kuwait. Nonetheless, the Committee notes that, according to the information in the summary record for the 1,301st meeting of the Committee of the Rights of the Child (CRC) on 24 January 2008, a member of the CRC noted that the numbers of street children and refugee children had recently increased significantly in Kuwait (CRC/C/SR.1301 paragraph 9).

The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and that it covers every kind of employment or work, including work performed by children and young persons performed on their own account. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work performed outside an employment relationship, such as street children and other self-employed children.

Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee previously noted that under the terms of section 18 of Act No. 38 of 1964, the minimum age for admission to employment or work is 14 years, although the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratifying the Convention is 15 years. The Committee noted the Government's information that section 18 of the draft Labour Law in the private sector has specified 15 years as the minimum age for admission to employment or work so as to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Labour Law is adopted in the near future.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Registers of employment. The Committee previously noted that, pursuant to section 3 of Ministerial Decree No. 148 of 2004 regulating the employment of young persons between 14 and 18 years of age, the employer of these young persons shall keep an up to date record of the names, ages and date of employment, as well as the type of work, of his/her employees. It requested the Government to provide a copy of the model register used by employers. Noting an absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests to the Government to provide a copy of the model register used by employers.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide the Office with a copy of the statistical compilation for employees in the private sector of 2006. The Committee notes the copies of statistics on labour inspections submitted with the Government's report, including the statistical compilation of 2006. The Committee notes that in 2006, the labour inspectorate recorded one violation (in the commercial, restaurant and hotel sector) of section 19 of Act No. 38 of 1964, which sets forth the terms under which persons between the ages of 14 and 18 may be employed. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the practical application of the Convention, including, for example, statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, as well as extracts from the reports of inspection services and information of the number and nature of contraventions reported.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in enacting the draft Labour Law. In this regard, it hopes that due consideration will be given to all the comments made by the Office on the draft Labour Law.

Lebanon

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2003)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code only applies to work performed under an employment relationship (by virtue of sections 1, 3 and 8 of the Code). The Committee reminded the Government that the Convention applies to all branches of economic activity and covers all types of employment or work, whether they are carried out on the basis of an employment relationship or not, and whether they are remunerated or not. It requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which children who are not bound by an employment relationship are covered by the protection provided for in the Convention. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that Chapter 2, section 15 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, prepared by a tripartite committee, provides for rules governing "the employment or work of young persons". The Committee notes the Government's statement that the principles in this amendment therefore include all young persons, and not solely those bound by an employment relationship. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption in the near future of the draft amendments to the Labour Code relating to self-employed children or children in the informal economy, and to provide a copy, once adopted.

Article 2, paragraph 2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, at the time of ratifying the Convention, Lebanon declared 14 years as the minimum age for admission to employment or work and that Act No. 536 of 24 July 1996, amending sections 21, 22 and 23 of the Labour Code, prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 13 years of age (i.e. beginning of 14 years). The Committee also noted the Government's information that it intended to amend the Labour Code, to prohibit the employment or work of young persons before they complete 14 years (i.e. beginning of 15 years). The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that section 19 of the draft amendment to the Labour Code prohibits the employment or work of persons under the age of 15 years. Noting that the Government specified a minimum age of 14 years at the time of ratification, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that Article 2(2) of the Convention establishes the possibility for a State which decides to raise the initially specified minimum age for admission to employment or work to notify the Director-General of the International Labour Office by means of a further declaration. This enables the age fixed by the national legislation to be aligned to that provided for at international level. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Compulsory education. The Committee previously noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC), in its concluding observations of 2002 (CRC/C/15/Add.169), while noting that basic education was free and compulsory until the age of 12, expressed concern about its implementation in practice. It noted the Government's indication that Act No. 686/1998 relating to free and compulsory education in the primary phase has not so far been applied, due to the economic conditions of the country and the insufficient educational facilities. The Committee also noted that, according to the 2004 ILO-IPEC survey that in Lebanon, 18.9 per cent of children drop out of school at the elementary level (6–11 years), 22.8 per cent at the intermediate level (12–15 years) and 10.6 per cent at the secondary level. According to this survey, dropping out of school was a major contributing factor to the early participation of boys and girls in the labour market.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that 250 children (in three schools), who were at risk of dropping out, were assisted and given additional lessons through a programme entitled "Strengthening courses in basic subjects". The Committee also notes the information in the November 2008 report of the Minister of Education and of Higher Education submitted to UNESCO for the 48th International Conference on Education entitled "The Development of Education in Lebanon", that the Government intends to raise the age at which compulsory education ends, from the current 12 years to 15 years of age. The Committee further notes that the CRC, in its concluding observations of 8 June 2006 expressed concern that in primary education, parents are still charged for some costs of education despite the legal guarantee of free education, and that dropout rates have increased at this level while enrolment in secondary education declined (CRC/C/LBN/CO/3, paragraph 63).

The Committee is of the view that compulsory education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and it is important to emphasize the necessity of linking the age of admission to employment to the age limit for compulsory education. If the two ages do not coincide, various problems may arise. If compulsory schooling comes to an end before the young persons are legally entitled to work, there may be a period of enforced idleness. However, if young persons are legally entitled to work before the end of completion of compulsory schooling, children from poor families might be tempted to drop out of education and work in order to earn money (see ILO: Minimum Age, General Survey of the reports relating to Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 concerning minimum age, Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Report III (Part 4(B)), ILC, 67th Session, Geneva, 1981, paragraph 140). Noting the Government's intention to raise the age of completion of compulsory schooling to 15 years, the Committee reminds the Government that pursuant to Article 2(3) of the Convention the minimum age for admission to employment (currently 14 years) should not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Therefore, the Committee urges the Government to intensify its efforts to provide for compulsory education up until the minimum age for admission to work (which is currently 14 years, and will be 15 years with the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any new developments on this point.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that section 1 of Decree No. 700 of 1999 prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 17 years of age (i.e. beginning of 18 years). The Committee also noted that Decree No. 700 of 1999 provides for a detailed list of the types of hazardous work in which it is prohibited to employ young persons. The Committee further noted the information in the Government's report that the National Committee to Combat Child Labour (NCCL) was formulating a statute on the worst forms of child labour which, in accordance with Article 3(1) and (2) of the Convention, prohibits the employment of children under 18 years in work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of children.

The Committee notes that section 20 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibits the employment or labour of children before they reach 18 years in work which, by its nature or the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to expose them to danger. The Committee also notes that the "Draft Decree on the prohibition of employing children before they complete 18 years of age in work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals" (Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work), was issued by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the State Council on 26 May 2009 and will be promulgated following approval by the Council of Ministers. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work was formulated by the NCCL following the study entitled "Worst Forms of Child Labour – under 18 years old in Lebanon". The Committee further notes that section one of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work provides for the annulment of Decree No. 700 of 1999, and that section two contains a list of the worst forms of child labour prohibited for children under 18, including work with physical, psychological and moral hazards, and work that would limit the young persons' access to education and training. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption by the Council of Ministers of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work (as issued by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the State Council on 26 May 2009).

Article 3, paragraph 3. Authorization to undertake hazardous work from 16 years. The Committee previously noted that section 23(1) of the Labour Code prohibits the employment of young persons under 15 years of age in industrial projects and activities which are physically demanding or detrimental to their health, as set out in Annexes 1 and 2. The Committee observed that section 23(1) of the Labour Code was not in conformity with Article 3(3) of the Convention, to the extent that it appeared to allow young persons from 15 to 16 years to perform hazardous work. The Committee noted the information in the Government's report that the draft amendment to the Labour Code includes the principles specified in Article 3(3) of the Convention.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that, by virtue of an order of the Ministry of Labour, section 20, paragraph 3 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code authorizes employment or work in hazardous types of employment as of 16 years of age, under certain conditions. The Committee also notes that section 3 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work contains a list of activities which may be authorized as of 16 years of age, on the condition that the health, safety and morals of young persons are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee observes that this list prohibits the employment of children under 16 years in work with chemical hazards, physical hazards, intellectual or social hazards, safety hazards (such as heights), some types of agricultural work, work in slaughterhouses, work in construction, work in transport, work in horse races, work in restaurants or hotels, or work in factories with more than 20 employees. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 3 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, concerning the authorization of some types of hazardous work for persons between the ages of 16 and 18, will be adopted shortly and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 4. Exclusion from the application of the Convention of limited categories of employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indication that section 7 of the Labour Code excludes from its application, and consequently from the scope of application of the Convention, the following categories of work: (a) workers in households in Beirut; (b) agricultural undertakings which are unrelated to trade and industry and which shall have their own legislation; (c) undertakings which only employ family members under the management of the father, mother or guardian; and (d) Government departments and municipal bodies with respect to daily and temporary workers not covered by the regulations governing officials. The Committee also noted the Government's reference to the draft amendments to the Labour Code which would regulate the first three of the abovementioned four excluded categories, by a decree issued by the Council of Ministers.

The Committee notes that section 2, paragraph 2 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, submitted with the Government's report, prohibits, for persons under the age of 18, work with psychological hazards, including domestic work and work where the young person sleeps outside of the home. The Committee also notes that section 3, paragraph 2 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, concerning work prohibited for children under the age of 16, prohibits the employment of a young person in agricultural work (including family undertakings) which requires a tractor, work involving sharp equipment, work involving high ladders or trees or the mixing or dispersal of pesticides and fertilizers and the picking or handling of poisonous plants (including tobacco). The Committee observes that, by virtue of these provisions in the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work, effect is given to the Convention with regard to the previously excluded categories of employment. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the provisions of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work relating to domestic workers and children employed in agricultural work (including family undertakings) will be adopted shortly and requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. The Committee previously noted the information in the Government's report that section 16 of the draft amendment to the Labour Code provides for the definition of "training contract" and states that the minimum age to receive vocational training under a contract is 14 years, provided that conditions to safeguard the health, safety or morals of the young persons in question are respected. The Committee notes the Government's statement that amendments are still ongoing to the proposed draft amendments. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in adopting section 16 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code, fixing a minimum age of 14 years for entry into an apprenticeship, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report that section 19 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code provides that employment or work of young persons in light work may be authorized when they complete 13 years of age (except in different types of industrial work in which the employment or work of young persons under the age of 15 years old is not authorized), on the condition that such employment or work, by its nature or the circumstance in which it is carried out, does not jeopardize their development, health, safety or morals. Section 19 further states that this work should not weaken their capacity to benefit from instruction received, nor should it impact on their participation in vocational orientation and training approved by the competent authority. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that light work activities shall be determined by virtue of an Order promulgated by the Ministry of Labour. The Committee further notes that the Ministry of Labour set up a committee, pursuant to Memorandum 58/1 of 20 June 2009, which in consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, shall formulate this statute, among other labour standards. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, in coordination with ILO-IPEC, is preparing a study on the classification of occupations undertaken by working children, within the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme "Supporting the national strategy for the elimination of child labour in Lebanon, third phase", so as to formulate this statute on light work. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the formulation and adoption of a statute determining light work activities, in conformity with Article 7 of the Convention, following the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the draft amendments to the Labour Code have reached an advanced stage and will be referred to the competent authority for its adoption in the shortest delay. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that some amendments are still ongoing to the draft amendments, to achieve additional conformity between its provisions and the provisions of Arab and international labour Conventions. Considering that the Government has been referring to the draft amendments to the Labour Code for a number of years, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments are adopted in the near future. Furthermore, the Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration, during the review of the relevant legislation, the Committee's comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention and invites it to consider technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or similar to slavery. Trafficking. The Committee previously noted that the relevant Lebanese legislation does not specifically prohibit the trafficking of women and children. The Committee noted that the cooperation project, the "Anti-trafficking project", had been agreed upon by the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC) and the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) to ensure the conformity of national legislation with the Protocol against the Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air and with the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons especially Women and Children. According to the project document annexed to the Government's report, the existing Lebanese legislation was reviewed to identify gaps and formulate specific recommendations regarding necessary amendments and adoption of specific anti-trafficking legislation. The Committee noted that this legal review was sent to the MoJ for comments and clearance.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that the amendments to the Labour Code, prepared by a tripartite committee (which was set up by virtue of Order No. 210/1 of 20 December 2000), include provisions relating to the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that section 33(a) of these amendments penalizes any person who participates, encourages or facilitates all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee observes that it has drawn the Government's attention to the lack of legislation prohibiting the sale and trafficking of children since 2005. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code relating to the prohibition of the sale and trafficking of all persons under the age of 18, as a matter of urgency.

Clauses (b) and (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that section 33(b) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code specifies that any person who participates, encourages, facilitates or incites anyone to use, procure or offer a child or young person for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances is liable to punishment under the Penal Code, in addition to the penalties imposed by the Labour Code. Furthermore, the Committee noted the Government's information that section 33(c) of the draft amendments to the Labour Code provides that any person who participates, encourages, facilitates or incites another to use, procure or offer a child or young person for illicit activities, especially for the production and trafficking of drugs, commits a penal crime under the Penal Code.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the amendments to the Labour Code are in their last stages and they shall be referred to the competent authorities for adoption within the shortest delay. However, the Committee also notes the Government's statement in its report submitted under Convention No. 138 that further revision to the draft amendment to the Labour Code are still necessary. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibiting the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, and the use, procuring or offering of persons under the age of 18 for illicit activities.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. The Committee previously noted the Government's information that Decree No. 700/1999 prohibits the employment of young persons before they complete 17 years of age (i.e. beginning of 18 years) in dangerous activities enumerated according to their nature. The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the National Committee to Combat Child Labour (NCCL) was formulating a statute on the worst forms of child labour to amend Decree No. 700 of 1999 and supplement section 23(1) of the Labour Code.

The Committee notes that section 20 of the draft amendments to the Labour Code prohibits the employment of children under 18 years in work which, by its nature or the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to expose them to danger. The Committee also notes that the "Draft Decree on the prohibition of employing children before they complete 18 years old in work which is likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals" (Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work), was approved by Advisory Opinion No. 239 of the shura on 26 May 2009, and will be promulgated following approval by the Council of Ministers. The Committee further notes the Government's statement that the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work was formulated by the NCCL following the study entitled "Worst Forms of Child Labour under 18 years old in Lebanon".

The Committee notes that section 1 of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work provides for the annulment of Decree No. 700/1999, and that section 2 provides a list of the worst forms of child labour prohibited for children under 18, including work with physical, psychological and moral hazards, and work that would limit the young persons' access to education and training. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the adoption by the Council of Ministers of the Draft Decree Prohibiting Hazardous Work for children under 18 as a matter of urgency and requests it to provide information on developments in this regard.

Considering that the Government has referred to these draft amendments to the Labour Code for a number of years and, given that Article 1 of the Convention obliges member States to take “immediate” measures to prohibit the worst forms of child labour, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that the amendments are adopted as a matter of urgency. Furthermore, the Committee encourages the Government to take into consideration, during the review of the relevant legislation, the Committee’s comments on discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention and invites it to consider technical assistance from the ILO.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Madagascar

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. National action plan to combat child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the National Plan of Action against Child Labour in Madagascar (PNA), and the six action plans covering the rural sector, mining and quarrying, manufacturing, domestic service, catering and trade, and miscellaneous activities. The Committee also noted the Government’s information concerning the positive outcomes of the activities carried out so far in Madagascar, including: (a) gradual assumption at national and regional level of the fight against child labour; (b) involvement of local decision-makers and the social partners (c) public awareness campaigns; (d) emergence of regional anti-child labour committees; (e) integration of anti-child labour activities in development plans at all levels, including the national “Madagascar Action Plan” (MAP).

The Committee notes, that according to the Government, the PNA is still under way and now at the end of phase one. It notes with interest that, according to the technical progress report of 13 March 2008 on the ILO–IPEC project “Combating the worst forms of child labour in Madagascar – IPEC support to the National Action Plan Against Child Labour”, 14,539 children at risk who attend primary school have been covered by the project and thus prevented from engaging prematurely in work. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the PNA in Madagascar, and on the results obtained in terms of the number of children under 15 years of age who are protected against premature work or employment

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. The Committee noted previously that the Labour Code applies only to employment relationships, thereby excluding children who work on their own account. It also noted the indication from the Government that the PNA was drawn up to protect children who are not bound by an employment relationship. The Government indicated that the PNA makes no distinction between children bound by an employment relationship and children who work on their own account. The Committee accordingly asked the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken in the context of the PNA to prevent children under 15 years of age from working on their own account and to remove from work those already doing so. The Committee notes, that according to the Government, the PNA targets all child workers and consequently provides for the same measures for all child workers, including their withdrawal from work and their guidance towards alternatives. The Government also states that Decree No. 2007-563 of 3 July 2007 on child labour, which sets the minimum age for admission to employment or work at 15 years, applies equally to children bound by a contractual relationship and children working on their own account.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Order No. 3949/87 raised the age of completion of compulsory schooling from 14 to 16 years. The Committee noted however that, according to a document published by the UNESCO International Bureau of Education, the age of completion of compulsory schooling is lower than the minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee pointed out that, according to this document, the official age for access to primary education is 6 years and the levels of compulsory schooling five years, thus making the age of completion of compulsory schooling 11 years. It further noted that, according to the Government, the Ministry of National Education is currently undertaking various legislative and regulatory reforms which will include provisions on specification of the age of completion of compulsory schooling. It reminded the Government that the condition set in Article 2(3) of the Convention was met to the extent that the minimum age for work, namely 15 years in Madagascar, was not lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling (11 years). The Committee nonetheless expressed the view that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour and that it is important to emphasize how necessary it is to link the age of admission to employment or work with the age of completion of compulsory schooling. Where these two ages do not coincide, a number of problems may arise. If schooling ends before young persons are legally authorized to work, there may be a period of enforced idleness (see the General Survey of 1981 on minimum age, ILC, 67th Session, Report III, part 4(B), paragraph 140).

The Committee notes the information sent by the Government to the effect that it is fully aware of the importance of compulsory schooling as a means of combating child labour. The Government states that several meetings have been held on this subject in order to give the matter of national education the place it deserves, but work remains to be done, in particular because of the political crisis currently affecting the country. The Committee trusts that its comments will be taken into consideration and that, in the context of the legislative and regulatory reforms mentioned above, the Government will ensure that the age of completion of compulsory schooling coincides with the age of admission to employment or work in Madagascar, in accordance with Paragraph 4 of ILO Recommendation No. 146. It requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the legislative and regulatory reforms are completed as soon as possible, and to provide information on all progress made in this regard.

Article 3. Hazardous work. The Committee noted previously the adoption of Decree No. 2007-563 of 3 July 2007 on child labour, the legislation now governing child labour. It observed that section 2 of Decree No. 2007-563 prohibits the recruitment of children 18 years of age and under in jobs that are a source of danger and work that is liable to harm their health or their physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development. It further observed that Chapter 2 of the Decree “Worst Forms of Child Labour” consists of three parts listing the forms of work which are prohibited to children under 18 years of age. The Committee nonetheless noted the Government’s statement that Decree No. 2007-563 would take effect following its publication in the Official Journal.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, according to the Government, Decree No. 2007-563 has been published in the Official Journal and applies throughout Madagascar.

Article 6. Vocational training and apprenticeship. In its previous comments the Committee noted the Government’s indication that a decree determining the conditions of work for vocational training and apprenticeships was to be examined by the National Labour Council (CNT), which is a tripartite body. It also noted that, according to the Government, the Ministry of Employment and Vocational Training was preparing various regulations on vocational training which were to be examined in 2006. The Committee further noted that the Ministry of Employment and Vocational Training was planning to submit to parliament a bill on the national employment policy, in which further vocational training and apprenticeships are a priority objective. The Committee noted the Government’s statement that the abovementioned draft texts were before the CNT and were due to be promulgated before the end of 2007. The Government states in its report, however, that these texts are still under examination by the CNT. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the bills on apprenticeship and vocational training are adopted at the earliest possible date. It again asks the Government to provide a copy of them once they have been adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Further to its previous comments the Committee notes that according to the National Survey on Child Labour (ENTE) of 2007, conducted by the National Bureau of Statistics in conjunction with ILO/IPEC/SIMPOC, in Madagascar more than one child out of four between 5 and 17 years of age (28 per cent) is economically active, that is 1,870,000 children. The participation rate in economic activity increases with age: while 12–15 per cent of children between 5 and 9 years of age are economically active, the rate rises to more than 30 per cent in the 10–14 age group, and to 55 per cent in the case of children between 15 and 17. The problem is more acute in rural areas, where 31 per cent of children engage in some form of economic activity as opposed to 19 per cent in urban areas. Most economically active children are found in agriculture and fishing and in most cases (two out of three) they work as home helpers. In the 5–14 age group, 22 per cent engage regularly in an economic activity and 70 per cent attend school. The ENTE also indicates that the great majority of Malagasy children (85 per cent) do household tasks, the most common of which are fetching water or wood, preparing meals and washing clothes. However, most children claim to devote less than two hours a day to such work. Furthermore, participation in household tasks is higher among schoolchildren than among non-schoolchildren, but the number of hours spent on household jobs is higher than among non-schoolchildren. Furthermore, economically active children in general, and those compelled to carry out harmful activities, that is work to be abolished according to the regulations on child labour in Madagascar, are very much exposed to the risk of illness and injury. Indeed, some 37 per cent of children employed in harmful activities state that they have been sick or injured because of their work, the most vulnerable being those employed in mining, manufacturing and agriculture.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report to the effect that it is working together with the international community to combat child labour in a context that requires much patience and responsibility. The Government indicates that although the results may appear insignificant given the extent of the problem, it is sparing no efforts, particularly now that all the necessary regional bodies are starting to take shape. The Committee expresses its appreciation of all the measures the Government has taken to abolish child labour. However, the Committee expresses its concern at the situation and the number of children who are forced to work in Madagascar, it urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation. It requests the Government to continue to provide detailed information on progress made in this regard.

Malawi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and practical application of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted its serious concern at the situation of the considerable number of children under 14 years of age who were compelled to work (according to the Malawi Child Labour Survey of 2002, more than 1 million children worked, of whom approximately half were less than 9 years of age). Moreover, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that a National Plan of Action for Orphans and Other Vulnerable Children 2005–09 (NPA for OVC) and a Childhood Development Policy were established. More particularly, it had noted that, according to the NPA for OVC, around 500,000 children were orphans due to HIV/AIDS in 2004 and more than 1 million children were orphans in Malawi in 2005. The Committee had noted that the Government was aware of the consequences of HIV/AIDS on orphans, such as increased child labour and children dropping out of school. It had also noted that the Strategic Objective No. 3 of the NPA for OVC was "to protect the most vulnerable children through improved policy and legislation, leadership, efficient coordination at all levels".

The Committee noted the Government's information that it was difficult to measure the impact of specific policies on child labour unless detailed scientific measurement studies are undertaken. However, according to the preliminary report of the Malawi Multiple Indicator Cluster Survey of 2006, the total child labour rate in Malawi dropped from 37 per cent in 2004 to 29 per cent in 2006. According to the same report, approximately 90 per cent of the total number of child orphans in Malawi is made up of children aged 0–14 years. The Committee therefore once again observed that HIV/AIDS has consequences for orphans, for whom there is an increased risk of being engaged in child labour.

The Committee noted the implementation of the ILO–IPEC Country Programme to combat child labour in Malawi, the objective of which is to contribute to the progressive elimination of child labour. According to the technical progress report of March 2007, two country projects were launched on 26 February 2007: the ILO HIV/AIDS Workplace Education Programme and the HIV/AIDS in the Transport Sector. The ILO–IPEC Country Programme also featured four action programmes, the objectives of which are to enhance community empowerment and awareness to prevent child labour and to train teachers to ensure an improvement in school retention rates and, consequently, contribute to the elimination of child labour. The Committee also noted the Government's information, in its report under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that a National Action Plan on Child Labour was being developed and that a Child Labour Network, comprising all key organizations involved in the fight against child labour, had been formed to strengthen and increase the impact of child labour programmes.

While noting the improvement made in reducing child labour rates, the Committee nevertheless urges the Government once again to redouble its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour. It also once again requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the elaboration of the National Action Plan on Child Labour and asks the Government to supply a copy of it as soon as it is adopted. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the other measures it has taken, such as the ILO–IPEC programmes and the HIV/AIDS country projects and their impact towards abolishing child labour. Finally, the Committee also once again requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspections services and information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and sanctions imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Malaysia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that the provisions of the Children and Young Persons (Employment) Act of 1966 (CYP Act), with regard to the minimum age for employment or work, were not in conformity with the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. Indeed, although the Government, at the time of ratifying the Convention, declared 15 years as the minimum age for admission to employment, section 2(1) of the CYP Act provides that no "child" – who is a person under 14 years of age, according to section 1(A) – shall be engaged in any employment. The Committee had also noted the Government's information that the CYP Act does not outlaw child labour, but rather governs and protects children who work. It had further noted the Government's information that a tripartite committee would review the labour legislation, taking into consideration the possibility of increasing the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee had recalled that, by virtue of Article 2(1) of the Convention, no one under the age specified by the Government, when ratifying the Convention, shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation.

The Committee notes that, according to a Government representative of Malaysia at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2009, the Government would set up a tripartite technical committee composed of employers' organizations, workers' organizations, government agencies and other relevant agencies. The tripartite technical committee is scheduled to meet in December 2009 to, among other things, review the CYP Act and give consideration to raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work from 14 to 15 years. Indeed, the Government indicates in its report that it is making a serious effort to raise the minimum age for employment or work in order to comply with the Convention. However, the Committee expresses its concern that, as the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards noted, while the Government had reviewed a series of labour laws to be tabled in Parliament in 2009, the Government had postponed the review of the CYP Act because it felt that child labour and abuses related to it were not critical or alarming in Malaysia. Noting once again that the Government has referred to the legislative review of the CYP Act for a number of years, the Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the tripartite technical committee seriously considers raising the minimum age for admission to employment or work to 15 years, as specified by the Government at the time of ratification, and that the relevant amendments are adopted as soon as possible. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard with its next report.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the relevant legislation does not contain any provisions prohibiting young people under 18 years of age from being employed in types of work likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals. It had noted the Government's referral to two prohibitions provided for in the CYP Act for children and young people: (i) managing or being in close proximity to machinery; and (ii) working underground. The Committee had observed that section 2(5) of the CYP Act provides that no child or young person shall be, or required or permitted to be, engaged in any employment contrary to the provisions of the Factories and Machinery Act, 1967, or the Electricity Act, 1949, or in any employment requiring them to work underground. It had noted, however, that section 1A(1) of the CYP Act defines a "child" as being any person who has not completed their fourteenth year of age, and a "young person" as being any person who has not completed their sixteenth year of age. The Committee had reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(1) of the Convention, the minimum age for hazardous work shall not be less than 18 years. The Committee had also reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the types of hazardous work to which paragraph 1 of this Article applies, shall be determined by national laws or by the competent authority after consultations with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

Referring to conclusions made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee notes that the Government indicated that it would make the necessary recommendations to the tripartite technical committee so as to ensure that no one under the age of 18 years is authorized to perform hazardous work and that those hazardous types of work are determined in national legislation. The Committee also notes the Government's information in its report that a proposal to include new provisions in the CYP Act to specify and determine the types of hazardous work and to prohibit the employment or work of persons under 18 years of age in these types of work is currently being reviewed by the Department of Labour. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the tripartite technical committee seriously considers the prohibition of the employment or work of persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3(1). Moreover, it firmly hopes that the determination of types of hazardous work to be prohibited to people below 18 years of age will be reviewed and adopted by the Department of Labour after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the relevant legislation is adopted as soon as possible and requests it to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work from 16 years. The Committee had previously noted that certain provisions of the CYP Act allow young people of 16 years and above to perform types of hazardous work under certain conditions. The Committee reminded the Government that, under the terms of Article 3(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, authorize the performance of types of hazardous work by young people between 16 and 18 years of age, on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young people concerned are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity.

The Committee notes that the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that the Government is aware that young people between 16 and 18 years of age are only allowed to perform hazardous work if authorized in accordance with the requirements of Article 3(3) of the Convention. The Government representative explained that the tripartite technical committee would review and take action on that recommendation. The Committee also notes the Government's information that the Department of Occupational Safety and Health is reviewing the Factories and Machinery Act, 1967, to raise the minimum age to perform hazardous work in occupations falling within the scope of that Act from 16 to 18 years of age. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the activities of the tripartite technical committee lead to the adoption of national legislation authorizing the performance of types of hazardous work done by young people between 16 and 18 years of age only in accordance with the requirements of Article 3(3) of the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee had previously noted that section 2(2)(a) of the CYP Act allows people under 14 years of age to be employed in light work which is adequate to their capacity, in any undertaking carried on by their family. It had, however, noted that the legislation does not specify a minimum age for admission to light work. The Committee had reminded the Government that Article 7(1) of the Convention, provides for the possibility of admitting young people of 13 years of age to light work. The Committee had also recalled that, according to Article 7(3) the competent authority shall determine and prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. With regard to the definition of light work, the Committee drew the Government's attention to Paragraph 13(b) of the Minimum Age Recommendation, 1973 (No. 146) which states that, in giving effect to Article 7(3) of the Convention, special attention should be given to the strict limitation of hours spent at work in a day and in a week, and the prohibition of overtime, so as to allow enough time for education and training (including the time needed for homework), for rest during the day and for leisure activities. The Committee had shared the concern of the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the provisions of the CYP Act concerning light work permit, among other things, employment involving light work without detailing the acceptable conditions of performing such work (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90).

The Committee notes that the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards explained that, in the framework of the revision of the CYP Act, the tripartite technical committee would consider whether the competent authority could authorize persons between 13 and 15 years of age to perform light work. This would include a definition of light work and a limitation of working time. The Committee also notes the Government's information, in its report, that it has agreed to define "light work activities" in the CYP Act so as to be in line with the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the CYP Act is reviewed and amended in conformity with the requirements of the Convention on the following points: (i) that the minimum age of 13 years for light work be established by legislation; and (ii) that, in the absence of a definition of light work in the legislation, the competent authority should determine what is light work and should prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Parts III and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee had previously noted that the responsibility of the enforcement of the CYP Act rests solely with the Ministry of Human Resources. It had noted, however, that the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the enforcement of Convention No. 138 remains weak (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 90). It had also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed its regret at the lack of a national data collection system and at the insufficient data on working children.

The Committee notes that the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that the Malaysia peninsula alone has 300 labour inspectors and every labour inspector carries out between 25 and 30 inspections per month. In 2008, the Department of Labour, under the Ministry of Human Resources, received a total of 30,084 complaints on various labour issues. The Government representative explained that all complaints and cases were scrutinized and that no cases relating to child labour occurred. However, the Committee notes that the Worker members at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that, while many rights were respected in Malaysia, many issues remained, particularly with regard to children working in the oil palm plantations, in the agricultural sector, but also those working in towns and cities. The Worker members further noted that, according to the National Commission for the Protection of Children in Indonesia, cases of the forced labour of migrant workers and their children on plantations in Sabah involve an estimated 72,000 children. The Committee reminds the Government that, so that the Committee can assess whether a member State that has ratified the Convention has complied with its obligations, and particularly whether all the necessary measures have been taken to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention (Article 9(1)), it needs certain information, including statistical data, as requested in Part V of the report form. In light of the indication of the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that Malaysia has one of the most effective labour inspectorates in the region, the Committee is of the view that Malaysia is in a position to ensure the effective enforcement of legislation giving effect to the Convention. The Committee once again strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the provisions giving effect to the Convention are effectively enforced. The Committee also urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that sufficient data on the situation of working children in Malaysia is available, in accordance with the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and once again asks the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young people and extracts from the reports of inspection services, as soon as this information becomes available.

The Committee also strongly urges the Government to redouble its efforts and take the necessary measures to ensure that, during its review of the CYP Act by the tripartite technical committee set up for this purpose, due consideration is given to the Committee's detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention, and amendments are made in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the review of the CYP Act in its next report.

Finally, in response to the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office, the Committee requests the Office to take the necessary measures to respond positively.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 17(1) and (2) of the Child Act of 2001 only refers indirectly to the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances and that there appear to be no specific provisions that explicitly prohibit and punish such acts committed by persons other than the child's parents, guardian or extended family. The Committee notes the Government's information that the provisions of the Child Act need to be read together with other acts and regulations such as the Penal Code (Act 574), in which section 377E prohibits any person from inciting a child under the age of 14 years to any act of gross indecency with him or another person. The Committee observes that section 377E only extends this prohibition to the case of children who are under 14 years of age. The Committee notes the Government's information that the Ministry of Women, Family and Community Development (MWFCDD) is currently in the process of amending the Child Act, in the course of which the Government indicates that the issue of the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances will be given due consideration. The Committee requests the Government to take immediate and effective measures to ensure that, in the framework of the amendments to the Child Act, legislation is adopted to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 years of age for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances, in accordance with Article 3(b) of the Convention, as a matter of urgency. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee had previously noted that section 32 of the Child Act of 2001 punishes anyone who causes or procures or allows any person under 18 years of age to be on any street, premises or place for the purposes of “carrying out illegal hawking, illegal lotteries or gambling, or other illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child”. However, the Committee had noted that there seem to be no specific provisions which explicitly prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production and trafficking of drugs. The Committee notes the Government’s information that the “other illegal activities detrimental to the health or welfare of the child” of section 32 of the Child Act include the use, procuring and offering of a child for illicit activities, including the production and trafficking of drugs. As the Committee needs further information to assess whether section 32 of the Child Act can be applied effectively to prohibit the use, procuring or offering of a child for the production and trafficking of drugs, it requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to this provision in practice, including statistics on the number of persons prosecuted and found guilty under section 32 of the Child Act of using, procuring or offering a child under 18 years for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs.

Clause (d) and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work and determination of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the relevant legislation does not contain any provisions prohibiting young people under 18 years of age from being employed in types of work likely to jeopardize their health, safety or morals. It had noted the Government’s referral to two prohibitions provided for in the CYP Act for children and young people: (i) managing or being in close proximity to machinery; and (ii) working underground. The Committee had observed that section 2(5) of the CYP Act provides that no child or young person shall be, or required or permitted to be, engaged in any employment contrary to the provisions of the Factories and Machinery Act, 1967, or the Electricity Act, 1949, or in any employment requiring them to work underground. It had noted, however, that section 1A(1) of the CYP Act defines a “child” as being any person who has not completed their fourteenth year of age, and a “young person” as being any person who has not completed their sixteenth year of age. The Committee had reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(d) of the Convention, hazardous work constitutes one of the worst forms of child labour and consequently shall be prohibited for children under 18 years of age. It had also recalled that Article 4(1) of the Convention states that the types of work referred to under Article 3(d) shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, taking into consideration relevant international standards, in particular Paragraph 3 of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Recommendation, 1999 (No. 190).

The Committee notes that, according to a Government representative of Malaysia at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 98th Session of the International Labour Conference of June 2009, the Government would set up a tripartite technical committee composed of employers’ organizations, workers’ organizations, government agencies and other relevant agencies. Referring to conclusions made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee notes that the Government indicated that it would make the necessary recommendations to the tripartite technical committee so as to ensure that no one under the age of 18 years is authorized to perform hazardous work and that those hazardous types of work are determined in national legislation. The Committee also notes the Government’s information in its report that a proposal to include new provisions in the CYP Act to specify and determine the types of hazardous work and to prohibit the employment or work of persons under 18 years of age in these types of work is currently being reviewed by the Department of Labour. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take effective and immediate measures to ensure that the tripartite technical committee seriously considers the prohibition of the employment or work of persons under 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3(d) of the Convention. Moreover, it firmly hopes that the determination of types of hazardous work to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age will be reviewed and adopted by the Department of Labour after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, in accordance with Article 4(1) of the Convention. It urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the relevant legislation is adopted as a matter of urgency and requests it to provide information on the progress made in this regard in its next report.

Article 5 and Article 7, paragraph 1. Monitoring mechanisms and effective enforcement of the Convention. Labour inspectorate. The Committee had previously noted the concern expressed by the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, that the enforcement of ILO Convention No. 182 remains weak. The Committee notes that the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that the Malaysia peninsula alone has 300 labour inspectors and every labour inspector carries out between 25 and 30 inspections per month. In 2008, the Department of Labour, under the Ministry of Human Resources, received a total of 30,084 complaints on various labour issues. The Government representative explained that all complaints and cases were scrutinized and that no cases relating to child labour occurred. However, the Committee notes that the Worker members at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that, while many rights were respected in Malaysia, many issues remained, particularly with regard to children working in the palm oil plantations, in the agricultural sector, but also those working in towns and cities. The Worker members further noted that, according to the National Commission for the Protection of Children in Indonesia, cases of forced labour of migrant workers and their children on plantations in Sabah involve an estimated 72,000 children. In light of the indication of the Government representative at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards that Malaysia has one of the most effective labour inspectorates in the region, the Committee is of the view that Malaysia is in a position to ensure the effective enforcement of legislation giving effect to the Convention. The Committee strongly urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the provisions giving effect to the Convention are effectively enforced. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied with regard to children engaged in the worst forms of child labour, particularly children working in the palm oil plantations, in the agricultural sector, and in the urban economy.

Article 6. Programmes of action. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that the National Policy on Children and its Plan of Action (NPAC) has been approved by the Government on 29 July 2009. The Government indicates that the NPAC will focus on children's survival, protection, development and social participation. A Technical Committee, chaired by the MWFC, will be established in order to coordinate and monitor the implementation of the NPAC. The Government further indicates that, although the NPAC is still in its infancy, its policy and plans are set to have considerable impact on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour by promoting and facilitating children's rights. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of the NPAC and on the results achieved with regard to the elimination of the worst forms of child labour in Malaysia.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevention of the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Access to free basic education. The Committee had previously noted that, in its concluding observations of 25 June 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed regret that, according to estimates, 200,000 children of primary-school age are not attending school. The Committee on the Rights of the Child had also expressed concern at the regional disparities in the dropout rates and that many children, in particular boys, drop out from secondary education (CRC/C/MYS/CO/1, paragraph 73).

The Committee notes the Government's information that it is committed to ensure adherence to compulsory primary education and that basic education is free at both the primary and secondary levels. The Government indicates that several factors explain the majority of dropout cases in Government and Government-assisted schools, which are mainly related to the students' backgrounds and include poverty, attitudes toward education and students' health. Lack of infrastructural amenities, such as poor methods of transportation, also make it difficult for students to attend school, thus contributing to the dropout rates. The Committee notes that, according to the National Report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 19 November 2008, Malaysia has formulated an Education Development Master Plan (EDMP) of 2006–10, which outlines Malaysia's initiatives in ensuring that all students receive fair and equal educational opportunities regardless of location, ability or ethnic background (A/HRC/WG.6/4/MYS/1/Rev.1, paragraph 34). Malaysia thus provides a comprehensive set of education support measures which include a textbook loan scheme, supplementary food plan, trust funds, scholarships, food assistance, transport assistance, monthly allowances for disabled students and tuition aid schemes. The Committee notes that, according to the UNESCO Education for All Global Monitoring Report of 2008 (UNESCO Report), Malaysia has made extraordinary progress in reducing the number of children not enrolled in education and universal primary education has been achieved. Indeed, the Committee notes that, according to the UNESCO Report, the net enrolment rate in primary education is 100 per cent. However, the Committee notes that, while the gross enrolment rate is 90 per cent at the lower secondary level, it is only 53 per cent at the upper secondary level. The Committee welcomes the efforts made by the Government and encourages it to pursue its efforts to improve the operation of the education system in the country, in particular by increasing school attendance at the secondary level and reducing school dropout rates. It requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard and the results achieved.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that the Trafficking in Women and Children Report of the Human Rights Commission of Malaysia of 2004 shows that Malaysia is considered primarily a destination country for victims of trafficking. The findings of the report showed that, even if the trafficking involved mostly women over 18 years of age, a number of girls between 14 and 17 years of age were also reported to be victims of trafficking.

The Committee notes that, according to the Universal Periodic Review of Malaysia of 3 March 2009, the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act came into force in 2008 (A/HRC/11/30, paragraph 58). It also notes that, according to the UNODC Global Report on Trafficking in Persons of 2009 (UNODC Report), a National Plan of Action to combat trafficking in persons was drafted in 2008. The UNODC Report further indicates that about 160 persons were convicted of "trafficking and abduction of children" between 2003 and 2006. Most of the persons convicted were involved in child trafficking for sexual exploitation, while two were exploiting children for forced labour. The Committee further notes that, according to the National Report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 19 November 2008, Malaysia has set up three shelter homes to provide assistance and counselling to victims of trafficking in persons and established an Inter-Agency Committee on Protection and Rehabilitation of Trafficked Victims (A/HRC/WG.6/4/MYS/1/Rev.1, paragraph 92). Finally, the Committee notes the Government's information that the shelter home for child victims of trafficking for exploitative purposes has been operational since March 2008 and has, thus far, received 13 rescued children. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who have been withdrawn from trafficking and rehabilitated through the shelters homes established for that purpose and through the action of the Inter-Agency Committee on Protection and Rehabilitation of Trafficked Victims. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken within the framework of the National Plan of Action to combat trafficking in persons to ensure that child victims of trafficking for labour or commercial sexual exploitation are withdrawn and then rehabilitated.

Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Migrant children, street children and child domestic workers. The Committee notes that the Worker member of Indonesia indicated, at the Conference Committee for the Application of Standards, that the Indonesian National Commission for Child Protection (INCCP) reported, after a 2008 fact-finding mission to the plantations in Sabah, Malaysia, that tens of thousands of migrant workers' children also worked in the plantations without regulated employment hours, which meant they worked all day long. Other sectors where migrant workers' children were often found were family food businesses, night markets, small-scale industries, fishing, agriculture and catering. The INCCP Secretary-General stated that the children of migrant workers born under these conditions were not provided with birth certificates or any other type of identity document, effectively denying their right to education. Furthermore, in Sabah, an unknown number of children begged in the streets; estimates ranged from a few hundred to as many as 15,000 children. The Worker members emphasized the need to devote particular attention to migrant children and to children employed as domestic workers. The Committee reminds the Government that migrant children, street children and child domestic workers are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour and requests the Government to take effective and time-bound measures to ensure that these children are protected from the worst forms of child labour by withdrawing them from these vulnerable situations and rehabilitating them. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. Regional cooperation. The Committee had previously noted that a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between Malaysia and Thailand was proposed as a beginning to reduce the flow of young girls into Malaysia and allow for an exchange of information in order to monitor traffickers' actions. The Committee notes the Government's information that the MOU between Malaysia and Thailand has been suspended. The Committee notes that the Worker member of Indonesia at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards indicated that, in 2006, the Confederation of Indonesian Trade Unions established a partnership with the Malaysian Trade Union Congress (MTUC). Both parties signed an MOU to inform migrants from Indonesia going to Malaysia on the risks of migration, including the risk of their children becoming labourers. However, the Worker members noted that unions alone could not solve this problem and this problem could only be solved in a regional context. The Committee further notes that according to the National Report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 19 November 2008, due to Malaysia's porous borders, the influx of migrants, trafficked victims and refugees is increasing despite pledges by source states that they have taken progressive measures (A/HRC/WG.6/4/MYS/1/Rev.1, paragraph 94). The Committee therefore urges the Government to take measures to cooperate with the neighbouring countries, particularly Indonesia and Thailand, and therefore strengthen security measures with a view to bringing an end to child trafficking for labour or commercial sexual exploitation and to the engagement of child migrants in the worst forms of child labour.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that the MWFC is conducting a pilot study to develop a database on street children in Sabah. The Government also indicates that it will initiate the creation of a database on the phenomena of child trafficking, the commercial sexual exploitation of children and street children in Malaysia. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the National Report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 19 November 2008, Malaysia is currently setting up a One Stop Information Centre on trafficking in persons which will provide comprehensive information on the statistics of traffickers and victims. The Committee requests the Government to provide the statistics compiled in the framework of the database on child trafficking, the commercial sexual exploitation of children and street children in Malaysia, as well as through the One Stop Information Centre on trafficking in persons. The Committee also requests the Government to take measures to ensure that data on the number of children engaged in domestic work is available.

The Committee also strongly urges the Government to redouble its efforts and take the necessary measures to ensure that, during its review of the CYP Act by the tripartite technical committee set up for this purpose, due consideration is given to the Committee's detailed comments on the discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention, and amendments are made in this regard. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in the review of the CYP Act in its next report.

Finally, in response to the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office, the Committee requests the Office to take the necessary measures to respond positively.

Mali

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that children from Mali were taken to Cote d'Ivoire to work on plantations or as domestic workers and that they were subjected to slavery and enforced labour and to deplorable conditions of work, often unpaid. Certain ethnic groups, such as the Bambara, Dogon and Sénoufo, are particularly vulnerable. The Committee noted that according to the UNICEF report published in 2006 on trafficking in human beings, particularly women and children, in West and Central Africa (2006 UNICEF report), Malian children are the victims of trafficking to the following countries: Cote d'Ivoire, Gambia, Guinea, Ghana and Nigeria. The Committee noted that, although the Government has taken several measures to combat the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour, the problem still exists in practice, despite its prohibition by section 244 of the Penal Code and section 63 of the Child Protection Code.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the only statistics available on the application of national provisions respecting trafficking of children cover children who have been intercepted and repatriated in the framework of measures taken to combat the trafficking of children during the period between 2000 and 2006. In this context, the Committee notes that 565 children (289 girls and 276 boys) were intercepted and 271 children (101 girls and 170 boys) were repatriated during that period. However, the Committee notes that, in the summary prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in accordance with paragraph 15(c) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 3 April 2008, the International Federation for Human Rights (FIDH) indicates that, even though no statistics are available, Mali is a transit country for the trafficking of women and children, and it therefore recommends that the Malian authorities strictly apply sections 240 et seq of the Penal Code penalizing the trafficking of children, and improve the assistance provided to children who have been the victims of trafficking (A/HRC/WG.6/2/MLI/3, paragraphs 13–14). The Committee therefore urges the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking and to ensure that thorough investigations and robust prosecutions of offenders are carried out and that effective and sufficiently dissuasive penalties are imposed. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to provisions respecting the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour through the provision of statistics on the number of convictions and the penal sanctions imposed.

Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the 2006 UNICEF report, talibé children originating from neighbouring countries, including Mali, are found on the streets of Dakar who have been brought to the city by Koranic teachers (marabouts). These children are kept in conditions of servitude and are obliged to beg daily. The Committee also noted that the 2006 UNICEF report refers to the involvement of marabouts in the trafficking of children for the exploitation of young talibé workers from Burkina Faso in the rice fields of Mali. The Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations of May 2007, expressed concern at the vulnerability of children living in the streets or who are engaged in begging, particularly to all forms of violence, sexual abuse and exploitation, and economic exploitation (CRC/C/MLI/CO/2, paragraph 62). The Committee noted that section 62 of the Child Protection Code defines begging as a sole or main activity of a dehumanizing nature and an obstacle to the rights of the child. It further noted that section 183 of the Penal Code provides that any person inciting a child to beg shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of from three months to one year.

In this respect, the Committee notes that in the Report of the Working group on the Universal Periodic Review of Mali of 13 June 2008, the representative of Mali indicated that begging by children in Koranic schools was an infringement of the law (A/HRC/8/50, paragraph 55). The Committee observes that, although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, the phenomenon of child talibés remains a cause for concern in practice. The Committee expresses serious concern at the use of these children for purely economic purposes. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to enforce the national legislation on begging and to punish marabouts who use children for purely economic purposes. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the effective and time-bound measures taken to prevent young persons under 18 years of age from becoming victims of forced or compulsory labour, including begging, and to protect these children against forced labour and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 5. Monitory mechanisms. Monitoring committees. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO–IPEC–LUTRENA project to prohibit and eliminate the sale and trafficking of children, local monitoring committees to combat child trafficking have been set up in the circles of Kangala, Bougouni, Kolondiéba and Koutiala. The Committee notes that, according to the final technical progress report of ILO–IPEC of March 2008 on the LUTRENA project, 344 monitoring committees are now operational in Mali. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the principal role of these committees is to identify potential victims of child trafficking, indicate cases in which children are the victims of trafficking and collect and disseminate data on the trafficking of children. The Committee notes with interest that, since 2005, monitoring committees have intercepted and repatriated 730 child victims of trafficking and apprehended four persons who are presumed to be guilty of the trafficking of children. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of children who are prevented from becoming victims of trafficking or are removed from trafficking for labour exploitation as a result of the activities of monitoring committees.

National Committee to Follow-up Programmes to Combat the Trafficking of Children. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Committee to Follow-up Programmes to Combat the Trafficking of Children in Mali (CNS) is responsible for evaluating the action taken in the context of the implementation of programmes to combat the trafficking of children, for following the implementation of cooperation agreements to combat the trafficking of children signed by Mali and for learning from the experience acquired in this field to take responsibility for child victims of trafficking. However, the Government indicates that, since it was established in 2006, the CNS has not been operational, thereby creating a gap in the coordination of action to combat the trafficking of children in Mali. To overcome this problem, three meetings have been planned between September and November 2009, at which the programme and action of the CNS will be determined and the annual work-plan for 2010 adopted. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that the CNS becomes operational and contributes to combating the trafficking of children in Mali. It requests the Government to provide information on the activities carried out by the CNS and their impact on the elimination of the trafficking of children for labour exploitation.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that, according to the ILO-IPEC final technical progress report of March 2008 on the LUTRENA project, a total of 36,160 children in West and Central Africa benefited from the activities carried out in the context of the project. The Committee notes that 26,576 children (11,791 girls and 14,785 boys) who were at risk were prevented from becoming victims of trafficking and 9,584 children (4,317 girls and 5,267 boys) were removed from trafficking. The Committee also notes that in Mali 21,195 children attended the model lessons provided by teachers on the issue of the trafficking of children.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assistance to remove them from these worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that, in the context of the implementation of the LUTRENA project, 37,532 children (13,151 girls and 24,381 boys) were covered by awareness-raising activities relating to the trafficking of children and its consequences. The Government adds that, through an information caravan carried out in 2007, 5,658 children were covered by awareness-raising activities on the trafficking of children for labour exploitation in agriculture. The Committee also notes with interest the information provided by the Government that 250 child victims of trafficking have been repatriated from Cote d'Ivoire and are now engaged in income-generating activities in Mali, and that 3,830 children (1,851 girls and 1,979 boys) who were victims of trafficking have been rehabilitated through formal and informal education services, vocational training and income-generating activities.

The Committee further notes that a sub-regional project to combat the trafficking of children for labour exploitation in West Africa was launched by ILO-IPEC in May 2008 (ILO-IPEC project to combat the trafficking of children). The objectives of the project include strengthening the capacity of the Government, employers and workers to replicate the activities of the LUTRENA project through which children at risk were prevented from becoming victims of trafficking and child victims were removed from trafficking, making use of the methods and good practices developed during the course of the LUTRENA project. The ILO-IPEC project is targeting 4,000 boys and girls, who will be prevented from becoming victims of or removed from trafficking involving hazardous or abusive conditions of work through the provision of educational and non-educational services. Another objective of the project is to establish a pilot information system on the trafficking of children and to improve the database of the trafficking of children through targeted research and by facilitating networking between sub-regional experts.

However, that Committee notes that, in the summary prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in accordance with paragraph 15(c) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 3 April 2008, the FIDH indicates that there are no institutional facilities available in Mali to shelter, offer guidance to or assist young women who have been the victims of trafficking or sexual exploitation (A/HRC/WG.6/2/MLI/3, paragraphs 13–14). The FIDH therefore recommends that the Malian authorities set up care and guidance facilities and provide assistance for the return of girls who are victims of trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the ILO-IPEC Project to combat the trafficking of children with a view to preventing young persons under 18 years of age from falling victim to sale and trafficking and to remove child victims from this worst form of child labour. It also requests the Government to envisage the establishment of care and guidance facilities and the provision of assistance for the return of child victims of trafficking, as recommended by the FIDH, with a view to ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Access to free basic education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report on the national survey of child labour carried out in 2005, 41 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 years were engaged in full-time economic activity, 25 per cent combined work and studies and 17 per cent went to school only. The net enrolment rate for primary school (7–12 years) in 2004–05 was 56.7 per cent (48.9 per cent for girls and 64.8 per cent for boys), compared with 20.6 per cent for secondary school (13–15 years) (15.4 per cent for girls and 26 per cent for boys).

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report under the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), according to which the National Education Statistical Yearbook indicates that, for the 2007–08 school year the gross enrolment rated in primary school (7–12 years) was 80 per cent, or 70.7 per cent for girls and 89.5 per cent for boys, while that for secondary school (13–15 years) was 46.8 per cent (36.6 per cent for girls and 57.3 per cent for boys). The Committee notes that Mali is one of the 11 countries involved in the implementation of the ILO–IPEC project “Tackle child labour through education” (ILO–IPEC TACKLE project), the principal objective of which is to contribute to poverty reduction in the least developed countries by providing equitable access to primary education and developing the knowledge of the most underprivileged categories of society. According to the activity report of the ILO–IPEC TACKLE project in Mali of October 2009, several measures and programmes of action have been implemented in support of the school attendance of children engaged in work at an early age. Furthermore, an integrated framework to cover the educational needs of the most vulnerable categories of children is currently being formulated with the objective of integrating these needs into Phase III of the Sectoral Investment Programme for the Education Sector (PISE).

The Committee takes due note of the measures adopted by the Government in the field of education. However, it notes that, according to the 2008 Education for All Global Monitoring Report published by UNESCO under the title “Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?”, although substantial progress has been made in the field of education, Mali still has little chance of the objective of universal primary education by 2015, and will probably not achieve gender parity in 2015 or 2025. The Committee also observes, that, according to the national report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 14 April 2008, despite the progress made over the past ten years with regard to the realization of the right to education, many problems and challenges still need to be addressed, including raising enrolment rates, inequality of opportunity between girls and boys and the uneven geographical distribution of schools (A/HCR/WG.6/2/MLI/1, paragraph 69). Considering that education contributes to preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the functioning of the education system in the country, particularly by increasing school attendance and reducing school drop-out rates, affording particular attention to girls so that they benefit from the same opportunities of access to education as boys. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved.

Article 8. Cooperation. Regional cooperation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government had signed bilateral cooperation agreements on the cross-border trafficking of children with Burkina Faso, Côte d’Ivoire, Guinea and Senegal. It also noted that in addition to the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Child Trafficking in West Africa, signed in July 2005, Mali also signed the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement in 2006. The Committee noted that mobile security brigades had carried out patrols in the border regions between Mali and Burkina Faso, Côte d’Ivoire and Senegal.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that, in the context of the bilateral treaty signed between Guinea and Mali, a Koranic master from Guinea was intercepted with children from Guinea, who were repatriated. It also notes that, in the context of the ILO–IPEC project to combat the trafficking of children, it is planned to reinforce the application of the bilateral and multilateral treaties signed by Mali. However, the Government indicates that, although the countries which have signed agreements with Mali meet periodically, they are more dynamic in their activities in the national territory than in terms of mutual international assistance. The Committee observes that, in the Report of the Working Group on the Universal Periodic Review of Mali of 13 June 2008, the representative of Mali noted that, with regard to trafficking in children, the main difficulties stemmed from the cross-border nature of the phenomenon (A/HRC/8/50, paragraph 54). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take measures to reinforce the application of the bilateral and multilateral treaties signed by Mali so as to contribute to the elimination of the trafficking of children for labour exploitation or for sexual exploitation. It expresses the firm hope that, in the context of these agreements, measures will be taken to increase the numbers of land, maritime and air border police officers, particularly through the establishment of joint frontier patrols and the opening of transit centres near these frontiers.

Poverty reduction. The Committee previously noted that a PRSP had been adopted, in the context of which the problem of child labour was taken into account as a cross-cutting issue and placed in the overall framework of improving the situation of children and the role of the family. The Committee notes that, according to the national report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(a) of the Annex to Human Rights Council Resolution 5/1 of 14 April 2008, the second generation of this framework, known as the Growth and Poverty Reduction Strategy Framework (GPRSF), covering the period 2007–11, is currently being implemented (A/HCR/WG.6/2/MLI/1, paragraph 58). It also notes that the first National Forum on Child Poverty and Social Security was held in Bamako from 12–14 May 2009. The Committee further notes that a National Action Programme for Employment to Reduce Poverty (PNA/ERP) has been formulated and that a Decent Work Country Programme (DWPC) is currently being prepared. Considering that poverty reduction programmes help to break the circle of poverty, the Committee requests the Government to take measures in the context of the implementation of the GPRSF, PNA/ERP and the DWCP to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, with particular reference to the effective reduction of poverty among children who are the victims of sale, trafficking and forced begging. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mauritania

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Compulsory schooling and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indications of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which the Ministry of Labour authorized, without exception, work by 13-year-old children in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sectors. The ITUC also indicated that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2000, the total number of child workers aged between 10 and 14 was 68,000, which represents a slight decrease over previous years. However, the Committee noted that, according to the study undertaken by the Government in 2004 in collaboration with UNICEF, entitled “Child Labour in Mauritania”, around 90,000 children under 14 years of age work in the country, signifying an increase of around one third over four years. The study shows that poverty is responsible for child labour. The Committee noted that, according to UNICEF information, the Government has implemented a ten-year development plan for education, the aim of which is to increase the school attendance rate of young persons in the first cycle of secondary education and to establish remedial courses for children who have never been to, or have dropped out of, school.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government to the effect that one of the methods to ensure the abolition of child labour is the adoption of Act No. 2001-054 of 19 July 2001, making basic education compulsory for children of both sexes from 6 to 14 years of age, signifying a minimum duration of schooling of six years. It also notes that, according to the Government, parents are now required, under penalty of penal sanctions, to send children aged between 6 and 14 years to school. The Committee also notes that, in its second periodic report submitted to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in July 2008 (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraphs 165–167), the Government indicates that there have been significant improvements over the past two decades in basic and secondary education as a result, among other measures, of the National Programme for the Development of the Education Sector, 2001–10 (National Ten-year Programme), the principal components of which include the reduction of regional disparities and the improvement of girls’ enrolment. Indeed, the Government’s total expenditure on education is increasing every year: between 2000 and 2004, there was a rise of one third in spending on education and basic education as a percentage of GDP, and an increase of 2.7 per cent in the investment budget for education (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraphs 184 and 185). However, despite these efforts, “the capacity of the education system to look after, educate and train children remains a concern” (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 174). In this respect, the Committee notes that the rate of transition from basic to secondary school is only 38.8 per cent for girls and 43.3 per cent for boys (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 177). In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government is “endeavouring to find responses to the demands of young people who have been unable to complete their general education by offering them alternative means to continue their studies, find jobs and avoid marginalization and a precarious existence” (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 194).

The Committee notes that, according to the Statistics in Brief 2006 of the UNESCO Institute for Statistics, 82 per cent of girls and 78 per cent of boys are in primary school, whereas only 15 per cent of girls and 16 per cent of boys are in secondary school. Despite the efforts and progress made by the Government, the Committee once again expresses deep concern at the persistence of low school attendance rates. It observes once again that poverty is one of the prime causes of child labour and, when combined with a deficient education system, hampers children’s development. Considering that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to renew its efforts to improve the working of the education system, particularly by increasing the secondary school attendance rate, especially among girls. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved. It also asks the Government to step up its efforts to combat child labour by reinforcing the measures to enable working children to be integrated into the school system, whether formal or informal, or in apprenticeships or vocational training, on condition that the minimum age requirements are respected, and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 on the suppression of the trafficking of persons. It also noted that, according to a UNICEF report on trafficking in persons, with particular reference to women and children in West and Central Africa, published in 2006, the information available on trafficking flows in Mauritania is very limited and it is very difficult to know whether Mauritanian children are victims of trafficking in the countries of the subregion or whether children are exploited in the territory of Mauritania. However, the UNICEF report indicates that, in the streets of Dakar, there are boy talibés from neighbouring countries, including Mauritania, who have been brought to the city by their Koranic masters (marabouts). These children are in conditions of servitude and are forced to beg on a daily basis. Also according to the UNICEF report, the internal trafficking of children also exists, including the phenomenon of child talibés from rural areas who beg on the streets of Nouakchott. The Committee observes that Mauritania appears to be a country of origin for the trafficking of children for labour exploitation. Noting the absence of information in the Government’s report, the Committee once again expresses concern at the situation of these children and requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age from sale and trafficking. The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 on the suppression of the trafficking of persons in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of the offences reported, the investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in its concluding observations on the Government's initial report in November 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.159, paragraph 49), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed its concern at the number of children working, particularly in the streets, including child talibés who are exploited by their marabouts. It also noted the indication, in a UNICEF study entitled "Child labour in Mauritania", that according to a July 2003 study by the National Children's Council (CNE) observations in the field suggested that street children tend to be beggars who give daily account of their begging activities to their marabouts. The Committee further noted that section 42(1) of Ordinance 2005-015 on the penal protection of the child provides that the act of causing a child to beg or directly employing a child to beg is punishable by imprisonment of one to six months or a fine of 100,000 ouguiyas. Section 42(2) provides that any person who, having authority over a child, hands the child over to individuals who incite or engage the child in begging shall be punishable by imprisonment for eight months or a fine of between 180,000 and 300,000 ouguiyas. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to the national legislation on begging.

Noting the absence of information in the Government's report on this matter, the Committee once again expresses concern at the use of children for purely economic purposes, namely the utilization of children as a source of labour by certain marabouts. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to the national legislation on begging and to punish marabouts who make use of children for purely economic purposes.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to UNICEF information, children who have been the victims of trafficking, particularly to the United Arab Emirates to work as camel jockeys, have recently been repatriated to Mauritania and are receiving education in a special school for former jockeys. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the results achieved. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the results are more than satisfactory as these children are receiving special attention, particularly through the special programme developed for them in collaboration with UNICEF. The Committee also notes from the second periodic report of Mauritania to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 30 July 2008 that "a plan of action has been adopted to attend to their reintegration in their families. A technical committee has been set up to monitor this matter" (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 263). The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of child victims of trafficking and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved. Finally, it requests it to provide information on the plan of action implemented for the rehabilitation and social integration of these children.

Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures adopted to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of forced labour, including begging. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that it has worked to identify beggars and other street children with a view to their integration into the country's economic and social fabric. It further notes that, according to the information contained in the second periodic report submitted by Mauritania to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in July 2008 (CRC/C/MRT/2, paragraph 88), a centre for the protection and social integration of children in difficult situations has been created, and is targeting street children, children forced to beg or children subject to economic exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the effective and time-bound measures adopted further to the survey to remove street children and victims of begging from their activities and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration, including through the centre for the protection and integration of children in difficult situations. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who are in practice removed from this worst form of child labour.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mauritius

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1990)

Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Authorization to undertake hazardous work as from 16 years. The Committee had previously noted that, according to sections 2 and 28 of the Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act No. 34 of 1988, no young person (aged 15–18 years) shall work at any machine specified in the third schedule, unless he/she has been fully instructed as to the dangers arising in connection with the machine and the protection to be observed, and (a) has received sufficient training in work at the machine or (b) is under adequate supervision by a person who has a thorough knowledge and experience of the machine. The Committee had urged the Government to take the necessary measures to raise to 16 years the minimum age from which young persons may be authorized to work on hazardous machines on condition that their health and safety are fully protected and that they have received adequate training in the relevant branch of activity. It had subsequently noted the Government's information that the provisions regarding the minimum age for admission to hazardous work were included in section 8 of the draft Occupational Safety and Health Bill of 2005. Noting that section 2 of this Bill defines a “young person” as a person between 16 and 18 years, the Committee had expressed the hope that this Bill would soon be adopted.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government’s information that Occupational Safety and Health Act No. 28 of 2005 was adopted and came into force on September 2007.

Article 9, paragraph 1, and Part III of the report form. Penalties. The Committee had previously observed that in the two cases of violations of child labour detected by the labour inspectorate during the period from June 2005 to May 2007, the employers who employed the children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention were not prosecuted or punished. Accordingly, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention is prosecuted and adequate penalties are imposed. The Committee notes with interest the Government’s information that the Labour and Industrial Relations Officers undertake systematic inspections at all places of work, including formal and informal sectors of employment, and whenever any case of child labour is detected, such employment is stopped and criminal action is taken against the offenders. It further notes the Government’s statement that among the four cases of child employment involving four children detected during the period from June 2007 to May 2009, criminal action was taken in two cases and a fine of 2,400 rupees (INR) each were imposed on the employers. The Committee finally notes that the penalty for employing children has been increased from INR2,000 (according to the Labour Act 1975) to INR10,000 according to the newly adopted Employment Rights Act 2008.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mongolia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2002)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that in 2002 the Government approved a National Programme of Action for the Development and Protection of Children for 2002–10 (NPA 2002–10). It noted that particular attention has been given to the issue of child labour in this document and that one of its objectives is to amend national legislation to ensure the protection of children. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the review and possible amendments to the Labour Code and the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child in order to better address the problem of child labour. The Committee notes in the Government’s report submitted under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), that the Labour Code has recently been amended. It also notes that the NPA 2002–10 is ongoing, as are a number of other projects and programmes, most of them dealing with the worst forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the recently amended Labour Code. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the NPA 2002–10, or any other such programmes, aimed at ensuring the effective abolition of child labour.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. The Committee previously noted that the Labour Code, according to its section 4, covers relations governed by a labour contract, defined as a mutual agreement on work for pay between an employee and an employer (section 3(1)(3)). The Committee therefore noted that the Labour Code appeared to exclude work performed outside the framework of a labour contract and self-employment from its scope of application. In this regard, the Committee noted the Government’s information that, according to the survey conducted by the Mongolian Employers’ Federation in 2003, 54.3 per cent of employers involved in the survey had been employing children without a labour contract. In this regard, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which protection is given to children carrying out an economic activity that is not covered by a labour contract, such as work on their own account.

The Committee notes the information in the Government’s report that, following an audit by the ILO on labour inspection in Mongolia, the Parliament approved a review of the Labour Code and state policy on informal employment. The Committee notes that the Government plans to revise the Labour Code to extend its scope of application in 2010. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that child protection is still weak in the informal sector. The Committee further notes the information in the Human Rights and Freedoms in Mongolia Status Report, issued in 2007 by the National Human Rights Commission of Mongolia, that approximately 6,950 children were working in the informal economy in urban areas (page 50). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, within the review of the Labour Code and the state policy on informal employment, protection is given to children carrying out work on their own account or in the informal economy. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on developments in this regard.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 109(2) of the Labour Code, a person aged 15 years may enter into a labour contract with the permission of parents or guardians. It noted however that, according to National Programme for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour in Mongolia (Phase II, ILO–IPEC Multi-bilateral Programme of Technical Cooperation of 9 April 2002, page 8), the new Law on Primary and Secondary Education was adopted on 3 May 2002. The Committee also noted that the Government indicated in its report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child (CRC) that “the Law on Education provides that a child shall be provided a compulsory basic education up to 17 years of age” (CRC/C/65/Add.32 of 15 November 2004, page 19). The Committee observed that the minimum age of 15 years specified by the Government seems to be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling.

The Committee notes, in its concluding observations, that the CRC expressed concern “about some contradictory provisions of the domestic laws leaving children without adequate protection, e.g. the compulsory school age is 17, whereas the labour law allows children aged 14 and 15 years old to work 30 hours per week” (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraph 9). The Committee further notes in the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 182, that the Law on Education was amended in December 2006, and notes the Government’s statement in its report to the CRC of 9 June 2009 that education is mandatory until the age of 16 (CRC/C/MNG/3-4 paragraph 280).

The Committee recalls that, pursuant to Article 2(3) of the Convention, the minimum age for admission to employment (currently 15 years) should not be lower than the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee also considers that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour. If the age of admission to employment and the age limit for compulsory education do not coincide, a number of problems may arise. For example, if the age of completion of compulsory education is higher than the minimum age for admission to work or employment, children who are required to attend school are at the same time legally competent to work and may be tempted to abandon their studies (see ILO: Minimum age, General Survey of the reports relating to Convention No. 138 and Recommendation No. 146 concerning minimum age, Report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, Report III (Part 4(B)), ILC, 67th Session, Geneva, 1981, paragraph 140). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the legislative provisions contained in the Law on Primary and Secondary Education, in the Law on Education or in any other legislation, fixing the actual age of completion of compulsory education and to supply a copy of the same. Noting that the minimum age for admission to employment appears to be less than the age of completion of compulsory schooling, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to raise the minimum age for admission to employment in order to link it with the age of completion of compulsory schooling in conformity with Article 2(3), of the Convention.

Providing education for school drop-outs. The Committee noted that, according to the National Programme for the Prevention and Elimination of Child Labour in Mongolia (Phase II, ILO–IPEC Multi-bilateral Programme of Technical Cooperation of 9 April 2002, page 9), since the mid-1990s, school enrolment has been gradually improving and the school drop-out rate has reversed.

The Committee notes in the Government’s report submitted under Convention No. 182 that the National Statistical Office with support from UNICEF carried out the “Random sampling research on groups with mixed indicators” in 2005–06. One finding of this research was that 90.2 per cent of children living in Ulaanbaatar are studying in secondary school versus only 76.1 per cent in the remote rural areas, mostly due to a high drop-out rate for children of herders, who need the assistance of their children in their family’s livestock herding activities. The CRC expressed similar findings (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraphs 51 and 52). The Committee notes that the Ministry of Education, Culture and Science, with financial support from UNICEF, is implementing the “Circular for alternative training of primary, basic and complete secondary education” (Circular). This Circular, as well as the newly amended Law on Education both make explicit provisions for providing working children and drop-out children with educational services, including informal education. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the Circular, and any other measures taken, on providing educational services to both working and drop-out children as well as in increasing school attendance rates, in particular in the remote areas. It also requests the Government to continue providing statistical information on school attendance and school drop-out rates, in particular in rural schools.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of types of hazardous work. The Committee previously noted that, the Minister of Health and Social Welfare issued Order No. A/204 of 1999 specifying a list of 340 types of work covering 17 workplaces prohibited to minors under Appendix 2.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that, pursuant to Order No. 107 of the Minister of Labour of 26 September 2008, a list of types of prohibited work for minors was adopted. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that this list was approved following consultation with workers’ and employers’ organizations. This list contains 39 jobs and services, seven labour conditions and 53 working positions in 11 economic sectors that are prohibited for minors, and intends to address child labour in both the formal and informal sectors. The Committee further notes that the Government plans on translating the list into other languages, raising public awareness about its existence and building capacity for the implementing parties.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee previously noted that, according to a national survey conducted by the National Statistical Office in 2000, quite a number of children under the specified minimum age for admission to employment are economically active in some way or another. The Committee recalled that Article 7(1) of the Convention provides that national laws or regulations may permit persons from the age of 13 to engage in light work, which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. The Committee also recalled that, according to Article 7(3) of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine what is light work and shall prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. Noting the absence of information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in respect of provisions to determine light work activities and the conditions in which such employment or work could be undertaken by young persons of 13 years or more.

Article 8. Artistic performances. The Committee previously noted that section 25(6) of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child provides that individuals and officials using a child in press and commercial advertising without the consent of the child or his/her parents, guardians, caregivers and conducting profit-oriented activities illegally using the name of the child will face a penalty of 20,000–30,000 tughris with confiscation of their income and profit. The Committee recalled that, according to Article 8 of the Convention, the competent authority may, by permits granted in individual cases, allow exceptions to the prohibition of employment under the general minimum age, for such purposes as participation in artistic performances. Permits so granted shall limit the number of hours during which, and prescribe the conditions in which, employment or work is allowed. It requested the Government to indicate whether in practice children under the age of 15 years participate in artistic performances and, if so, to provide information on provisions of the national legislation which determine conditions of such work. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report that, pursuant to section 8.1 of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child, a list of plays and performances which may adversely affect a child's health shall be developed and approved by Governmental officials responsible for health issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of this list, once approved.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 141(1)(6) of the Labour Code, if an employer forces minors to do work prohibited to them, or to lift or carry loads exceeding the prescribed limits, or has required employees under 18 years of age to work in a workplace that adversely affects their health and mental development, or in abnormal working conditions, or compels them to work overtime or during public holidays or weekends, the state labour inspector shall impose a fine on that officer of 15,000–30,000 tughris. It also noted that section 25(5) of the Law on the Protection of the Rights of the Child provides for penalties for engaging a child in hazardous work stating "individuals forcing the child to beg and officials engaging the child in a work harmful for his/her health will face a penalty of 10,000–20,000 tughris".

The Committee notes in the Government's report, submitted under Convention No. 182, that the penalties for breach of provisions found in the Criminal Code (such as human trafficking in children, involvement in pornography, sexual exploitation, drug trafficking) and other laws relating to children's rights are appropriate. However, the penalties imposed upon employers, parents and other representatives in connection with employment in hazardous work are weak. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the fine imposed upon someone employing minors in prohibited work is insufficiently small to deter employers from resorting to the labour exploitation of minors. The Government indicates that much still remains to be done in relation to updating the legislation by imposing penalties, by ordering injunctions and ameliorating the penalty mechanism imposed upon parents and family members who allow the employment of children in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee encourages the Government to continue updating the legislation in this regard and requests it to provide information on any developments thereof. The Committee also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, in particular those in respect of hazardous work, is prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. It asks the Government to provide information on the types of violations detected, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Registers of employment. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the national legislation does not appear to contain provisions on the obligation of an employer to keep and make available the registers of persons under the age of 18 whom he/she employs. The Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with Article 9(3) of the Convention, national laws or regulations or the competent authority shall prescribe the registers or other documents which shall be kept and made available by the employer containing the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified, wherever possible, of persons whom he/she employs or who work for him/her and who are less than 18 years of age. Noting the absence of information in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in which manner it ensures that employers shall keep and make available registers, which contain the names and ages or dates of birth, duly certified whenever possible, of persons under the age of 18 years employed or working for them.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes in the Government's report submitted under Convention No. 182 that the National Statistics Office recently conducted the second National Child Labour Survey (2006–07) (NCL Survey). The Committee notes 621,500 children, of which 60.3 per cent were boys and 39.7 per cent girls, were covered in the NCL Survey and that at least 11.5 per cent worked at least one hour a week or were economically active. Though the survey has some shortcomings as it did not include homeless children, as well as those living in correctional labour colonies, orphanages and childcare institutions, it is nevertheless significant in creating the official and objective database. The prevalent sectors of work for children were: 84.6 per cent in agriculture; 5.1 per cent in services; 3.5 per cent in trade and industry; and 5.8 per cent in sweatshops. In relation to the employment relationship, the NCL Survey indicates that 93.1 per cent of working children work in household enterprises and are not paid, 9.2 per cent are self-employed and 1.7 per cent have a contractual relationship.

Another survey, conducted by the Mongolian Employers Federation in 2003, (Employers' Survey), reveals that labour standards in relation to children working in the formal sector are not always adhered to: 59.5 per cent of employers hiring children aged 14–18 years of age did not conclude any contracts and 29.2 per cent were employing the children on a wage or work performance contract. The main motives for not concluding a contract were not wanting to pay the social insurance premiums and other deductions (36 per cent) and the temporary nature of the employment (52 per cent). According to the reports submitted by employers and used in the Employers' Survey, 46 per cent of the children's conditions at the workplace were deemed "normal", 11.7 per cent were too hot, 21 per cent too dusty or with poor air circulation and 10.6 per cent were too noisy.

In addition, the Committee notes that the Population Training and Research Centre of the National University of Mongolia also carried out a survey which focused mostly on children aged 16–18 years of age working in the gold- and coal mining sectors in the Selenge and Tuv aimags (provinces). This survey indicates that most children started mining at an average age of 12, work an average of four hours per day in the winter, and an average of eight to nine and 10–11 continuous hours in the summer for children aged below 16 and 16–18, respectively. A total of 37.7 per cent of the children mining gold used mercury and 66.7 per cent of them work at home. Of these, 22.5 per cent have been involved in an accident in which 92.6 per cent have injured their legs, arms or their organs. Half of all children mining gold experience some form of health problem: 43.3 per cent suffer regularly from respiratory diseases, 41.7 per cent suffer from kidney and urinary disorders, 25 per cent suffer from orthopaedic illnesses and 23.3 per cent suffer from ear, nose and throat diseases.

Finally, the Committee notes that the report "Understanding children's work and youth employment outcomes in Mongolia", issued in June 2009 by the ILO, UNICEF and the World Bank (through the Understanding Children's Work Project), indicates that 13.2 per cent of children between the ages of 5 and 14 are engaged in economic activity and that 7.5 per cent of children between the ages 15 and 17 are engaged in hazardous work. The Committee also notes that, in its concluding observations, the CRC expressed concern "at the high rate of working children in Mongolia and the various kinds of negative consequences resulting from the exploitation of child labour, including the school drop outs and negative impacts on health caused by the harmful and hazardous work. The high number of child domestic and rural workers and children working in very harmful conditions in gold and coal mines give cause for serious concerns" (CRC/C/15/Add.264, 21 September 2005, paragraph 59). While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expresses serious concern at the large number of children working under the age of 15, as well as the significant number of children engaged in hazardous occupations, and therefore strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation, including through the allocation of additional resources for the implementation of measures aimed at combating child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the situation of child labour in Mongolia and, in particular, to supply copies or extracts from official documents of inspection services. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and penalties imposed.

Morocco

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that a National Action Plan for Children (2006–15) (PANE) has been adopted, a major component of which is devoted to combating child labour. In this regard, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the activities under the PANE include support for NGOs working to combat child labour and the carrying out of a study on the working conditions of children. The Committee also notes that the PANE aims to remove working children under 15 years of age at the rate of 10 per cent per year until 2015 and to improve the situation of needy families at the rate of 5 per cent per year. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the final technical progress report (TPR) of 30 September 2008 on the ILO–IPEC project entitled "Combating child labour in Morocco by creating an enabling national environment and developing direct action against the worst forms of child labour in rural areas", the issue of combating child labour has been included in other national social development strategies in Morocco, including the Government Declaration for the period 2007–11 and the National Human Development Initiative. The Committee hopes that the study on the working conditions of children will be completed soon and requests the Government to provide a copy of that study with its next report. It also requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the National Action Plan for Children (2006–15), as well as on the results achieved in terms of the gradual abolition of child labour. Finally, it requests the Government to provide information on the steps taken in the context of the Government Declaration for 2007–11 and the National Human Development Initiative relating to combating child labour.

Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 3. Scope of application and compulsory schooling. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 143 of the Labour Code, minors may not be employed or admitted in enterprises or the premises of employers before the age of 15 years, and observed that the protection provided by the Labour Code does not apply to self-employed workers. It nonetheless noted that, according to the report entitled "Understanding children's work in Morocco", published in March 2003 as part of an interagency project involving the ILO, UNICEF and the World Bank (pages 2 and 22), 85 per cent of working children under 14 years of age were in agriculture, where they were working for free for their families. The commercial sector, which employs many children in urban areas, also included a large number of children working for their families without wages (59 per cent) and a high proportion of children working on a self-employed basis (around 26 per cent). The Committee also noted the Government's indication that the Labour Code does not protect children working on a self-employed basis, but that these children are protected by the Dahir of 13 November 1963 on compulsory schooling, as amended by Act No. 04.00 of 25 May 2000, under which parents are required to enrol their children in school, failing which they face penalties.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that labour inspectors are authorized by law to ensure the application of the labour legislation only once there is an employment relationship. Consequently, labour inspectors do not carry out any checks in the informal sector. The Committee notes, however, the information provided by the Government that an emergency plan has been adopted for the period 2009–12 which consists of ten projects aimed at giving effect to compulsory schooling up to the age of 15 years, including, in particular, the development of the preschool level, equality of opportunity with regard to access to compulsory education and measures to reduce repetition and drop-out rates. The Committee observes that, according to the consideration of the reports submitted by the States parties in accordance with Article 16 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights of 3 May 2006, the enrolment rate for children aged 6 years has increased from 90 to 91 per cent, the rate for children aged between 6 and 11 years has increased from 93 to 94 per cent, and the rate for children aged between 12 to 14 years has increased from 70.6 per cent to 73 per cent (E/C.12/MAR/Q/2/Add.2, page 42). Furthermore, according to this report, the enrolment rates in rural areas have also increased, rising from 46.5 per cent to 86.9 per cent for children aged 6 years, from 62.5 per cent to 89 per cent for children aged between 6 and 11 years, and from 31.5 per cent to 51.6 per cent for children aged between 12 and 14 years. Finally, the Committee notes that, according to the most recent data in the 2008 UNESCO report entitled "Education for All by 2015: Will we make it?", although the rate of school attendance has increased significantly in Morocco (20 per cent), it remains the case that the rate of repetition of the first year of primary school is one of the highest in the region and stands at 16 per cent. The Committee once again notes the progress made with regard to the enrolment rate, but once again notes that the enrolment rate of children aged between 12 and 14 years shows that a number of children leave school before reaching the minimum age for admission to employment and are found in the labour market. Considering that labour inspectors in Morocco do not supervise the informal sector and that education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to redouble its efforts to increase the enrolment rate, particularly among children aged between 12 and 14 years, in order to prevent them from working, particularly on their own account and in the informal sector. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 2, paragraph 1, and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), according to which child labour was common in the informal craft industry. It also noted that, according to the report entitled "Understanding children's work in Morocco" (see pages 19, 20, 22 and 23), some 372,000 children aged between 7 and 14 years, representing 7 per cent of the reference group, were working, while for the 12 to 14 age group, 18 per cent of children were economically active. According to this study, 87 per cent of working children were in rural areas where they were found in the agricultural sector. In urban areas, children were engaged in the textile, commercial, repairs and domestic service sectors.

The Committee notes the information contained in the TPR of 30 September 2008 on the ILO–IPEC project entitled "Combating child labour in Morocco by creating an enabling national environment and developing direct action against the worst forms of child labour in rural areas", according to which a national unit for combating child labour has been created and provincial focal points have been appointed. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government that the first activity report of the focal points responsible for combating child labour indicates that, in 2008, 870 violations were reported in 287 undertakings employing children. Furthermore, the Committee notes with interest the information provided by the Government that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO–IPEC project and since 2008, 11,714 children (6,244 boys and 5,470 girls) have been removed from child labour and 19,656 children (10,721 boys and 8,935 girls) have been prevented from becoming engaged in child labour. The Committee reiterates its appreciation of the efforts made and measures taken by the Government to abolish child labour, efforts which it considers to be a reflection of the political resolve to develop strategies to overcome these problems. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to continue providing information on the implementation of the above projects and any other relevant projects, as well as on the results achieved in terms of the gradual abolition of child labour. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice and, in particular, on the results of the activity reports of the focal points responsible for combating child labour.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee previously noted that section 151 of the Labour Code provides that the employment of a child under 15 years of age, in breach of section 143 of the Labour Code, is punishable by a fine of 25,000–30,000 dirhams (US$3,000–US$3,600), and a second offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of 50,000–60,000 dirhams (US$6,000–US$7,200). It nonetheless noted that sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code provide for a fine of 300–500 dirhams (US$36–US$60) for breaches of section 147 of the Labour Code (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work) or of section 179 (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in quarries and mines or in work likely to hamper their growth).

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that, before resorting to penalties, labour inspectors shall give advice and information to employers on the dangers to which child workers are exposed. Furthermore, the Government indicates that, under sections 542 and 543 of the Labour Code, a labour inspector who detects a violation of the legislative or regulatory provisions relating to health and safety, which poses an immediate risk to the health or safety of the workers, shall issue an order to the employer to take all the necessary measures immediately. If the employer refuses or fails to comply with the instructions contained in the order, the labour inspector will immediately refer the matter to the president of the court of first instance, who may give the employer a deadline for taking all the necessary measures to prevent the imminent danger and may order the closure of the undertaking and determine, if necessary, the necessary duration of that closure. While taking due note of this information, the Committee observes that persons who employ children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not generally prosecuted if such employment is brought to an end. The Committee considers it necessary to ensure the application of the Convention by applying the penalties provided for in the legislation. In this regard, it considers that the penalties established by sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code, relating to the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work, are still not adequate and dissuasive enough to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention concerning hazardous work in accordance with Article 9(1) of the Convention, particularly considering that the penalties established by section 151 of the Labour Code are much heavier. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that anyone who violates the provisions giving effect to the Convention is prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are applied. It requests the Government to provide information on the type of violations detected by the labour inspectorate, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

Article 3 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Worst forms of child labour and application of the Convention in practice. Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous work. Domestic work of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted information from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) to the effect that domestic work by children under conditions of servitude is common practice in the country, with parents selling their children, sometimes as young as six years of age, to work as domestic servants. The ITUC also stated that some 50,000 children, mainly girls, are working as domestic servants. Of these, about 13,000 girls under the age of 15 are employed as servants in Casablanca; 80 per cent of them come from rural areas and are illiterate; 70 per cent are under the age of 12; and 25 per cent under the age of 10. The Committee noted that section 10 of the Labour Code prohibits forced labour. It further noted that section 467-2 of the Penal Code prohibits the forced labour of children under 15 years of age. It also observed that a bill on domestic work had been adopted and was in the process of validation. The bill sets the minimum age for admission to this type of employment at 15 years, establishes the conditions of work, and provides for supervisory measures and penalties.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the bill on domestic work is still in the process of adoption. The Government also states that the Dahir of 24 December 2004 establishing a list of hazardous types of work is to be updated in the course of 2010 so as to reflect the intent of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the Ministry for Social Development, Family and Solidarity (MDFS), in collaboration with ILO-IPEC organized a training course in 2008 for NGOs involved in the protection of children in the towns of Tahanaout, Fez, Safi, Casablanca, Kenitra, Khouribga, Taza and Agadir, identified as key areas, focusing on the supply and demand of domestic work by children and geared to building institutional capacity for more effective action in combating domestic work by little girls. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the MDFS is planning to conduct an inquiry in the course of 2010 into the situation of little girls engaged in domestic work in Casablanca.

While taking due note of the steps taken by the Government, the Committee must again point out that according to Article 3(a) and (d) of the Convention, work or employment in conditions that approximate slavery or are hazardous are among the worst forms of child labour and are therefore to be eliminated as a matter of urgency, in accordance with Article 1. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the bill on domestic work is adopted as a matter of urgency. It expresses the hope that the Dahir of 24 December 2004 establishing a list of hazardous types of work will be updated to include domestic work by children under the age of 18 in conditions that approximate slavery or are hazardous. Furthermore, the Committee once again requests the Government to step up its efforts and take the necessary measures to ensure, as a matter of urgency, that the forced labour of children under 18 years of age in domestic work and the employment of such children in hazardous work shall be prosecuted and punished by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions. Lastly, it requests the Government to provide a copy of the inquiry into the situation of little girls engaged in domestic work in Casablanca and to send information on the application of the provisions governing these worst forms of child labour, including statistics on the number and nature of the infringements reported, the investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions imposed.
