In addition, the Committee notes from the Government's report under the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), that the budgeting and funding of labour inspection is decentralized in such a manner that each office is allocated funds directly by Treasury according to the latter's priorities. Consequently, offices with motorcycles or motor vehicles cover fuel and maintenance, while the Ministry only receives reports on the activities performed. Based on this information, the Committee observes that the very notion of a central labour inspection authority seems to have become devoid of all substance, as the Ministry's only residual role consists of receiving activity reports from labour inspection offices, without any power to determine the needs of the labour inspection services in terms of financial and material resources with a view to their proper operation. The objective of the ILO technical mission was to help the Government to anticipate the effects of globalization on working conditions and workers' rights, to secure the commitment of the social partners to the principle that an effective labour inspection service allows the twofold interests of social protection and improved productivity, and to raise the Government's awareness of the importance of the tripartite dimension of labour administration. Although it made no reference to a decentralized labour inspection system, the mission emphasized, on the contrary, that there were no inherent or structural barriers for the operation of an effective and efficient labour inspection service; and that there was considerable room for improvement, in particular in policy, planning, management procedures, communications, equipment and training, and that this could be done by rationalizing, streamlining and consolidating the inspection functions of the Labour Directorate in the field structure. The decentralized operation of the labour inspection system, as described by the Government in the report on the application of Convention No. 129, is not such as to meet the economic and social objectives of the labour inspection Conventions. The obligations deriving from the ratifications of a Convention in any event remain the responsibility of the State. Consequently, the Government is bound, among other obligations, to: (i) observe the principle of placing the labour inspection system under a central authority, pursuant to Article 1; (ii) ensure that the number of labour inspectors is determined on the basis of the criteria listed in Article 10; and (iii) make the necessary arrangements to equip labour inspectors with the material means and transport facilities, and to reimburse any travelling and incidental expenses necessary for the performance of their duties (Article 11). The Government is also bound under the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150), which has also been ratified by Malawi, to ensure that the staff of the labour administration system have the status, the material means and the financial resources necessary for the effective performance of their duties. Consequently, the allocation to labour inspectorates of material means and financial resources should be left to the discretion of the decentralized authorities, but should be determined by the Government at the central level in accordance with the priorities of labour inspection and national economic and financial possibilities. Only if the central labour inspection authority is entrusted with the powers laid down in the Convention can the Government's commitments, as reaffirmed in its report, be fulfilled and an annual report on labour inspection activities, as provided for in Articles 20 and 21, be published and serve as a basis for the assessment by the central authority of the respective needs and priorities. The technical assistance mission recommended the strengthening of the Office of the Chief Labour Officer in order to allow it to play a more important role in the setting of annual targets, the monitoring of performance by both the field and headquarters and the evaluation of the quality of inspections themselves. It added that more work is required in Malawi if the goals of decent work are to be achieved and expressed the view that as the country has embarked on a process of attracting foreign investment in agriculture and manufacturing, especially textiles, there is a need to strengthen institutions that will promote a good and fair labour market.

The Committee urges the Government, to provide details of the measures announced in its report as a follow-up to the recommendations of the ILO technical mission and to provide copies of all relevant texts or documents. It also urges it to adopt all the necessary measures to secure an inspection system operating under the supervision and control of a central authority (Article 4) that is provided with adequate human resources in terms of both numbers and skills (Articles 6, 7 and 10) and the material conditions necessary for the exercise of its functions in relation to labour inspections (Article 11), and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in law and in practice in this respect.

Articles 20 and 21. Annual report on labour inspection activities. The Committee notes with concern that the statistics of inspections covering all the sectors of the economy, as published in the Labour Statistics Yearbook, show a significant decrease from 3,043 in 2006 to 1,088 in 2007. Recalling that an annual report on labour inspection activities, which has to be published and communicated to the ILO in accordance with Article 20, shall contain information on each of the topics listed in Article 21, the Committee observes that the above statistics do not allow any appraisal of the effect of this decrease in inspections on compliance with the legislation covered by this Convention. It draws the Government's attention to Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), which provides guidance on the manner in which such information could be presented. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide the available statistics on the types of industrial and commercial workplaces and indications of the legal areas targeted by inspections and the results achieved during the period covered by the next report. It also asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the publication of an annual report, as provided for in Articles 20 and 21.

Labour inspection activities targeting child labour. According to the Government's report, 3,000 children were removed from employment in the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme, instead of the target of 1,500. Noting that the project mostly targets child labour in agriculture, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide the ILO with the latest statistics on labour inspection activities pertaining to child labour, specifically in industrial and commercial workplaces, and the action taken as a result.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee draws the Government's attention to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and asks it to provide the ILO with information relating to the points raised as far as they also concern the present Convention.

Article 7 of the Convention. Need to re-establish a central authority entrusted with control and supervisory powers over the labour inspection system in agriculture. With reference in particular to the indication by the Government that the budgeting and funding of labour inspection is decentralized in such manner that officers with motorcycles or motor vehicles take care of the fuel and maintenance, and the Ministry only receives reports on the activities performed, the Committee would like to emphasize the overall crucial importance for labour inspectors to have at their disposal appropriate transport facilities to be in a position to perform their duties in most undertakings liable to labour inspection. Taking into consideration that agriculture is the major economic sector of the country, the Committee notes with concern, according to the description by the Government of the way that decentralization operates, that it is not the obligation of the Government to provide for appropriate conditions of work for labour inspectors in agriculture, as this is left to the discretion of each district authority. As emphasized in the observation under Convention No. 81, the allocation to the labour inspectorates of material means and financial resources should not be determined by decentralized labour administration authorities, but by taking into account nationwide labour inspection priorities and national economic and financial possibilities. Only if the central labour inspection authority is entrusted with the powers laid down in the Convention can the Government fulfil its commitments, including the obligation to ensure the publication of an annual inspection report containing the information required by Article 27 in order to give the central authority the necessary basis for the identification of the priority actions to be undertaken. The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the specific recommendation made by the ILO technical assistance mission which visited the country in 2006 concerning the need to strengthen the labour inspection system in agricultural undertakings with a view to securing decent work in the most attractive sector in the country for foreign investments.

The Committee is bound to urge the Government, in the light of the above: to provide details of the progress achieved in the implementation of the measures announced in its report to follow up the recommendations of the ILO technical mission, in so far as they relate to labour inspection in agriculture; to provide copies of all relevant texts or documents and to adopt all measures that are essential to secure a labour inspection system in agriculture under the supervision and control of the central authority that is provided with human resources and material conditions of work adapted to the specific needs of the agricultural sector (Articles 8, 9, 14 and 15); and to keep the ILO informed of any developments in this regard. It also urges the Government to send a copy of any relevant legal texts and documents.

The Committee notes with concern that the statistics of inspection visits covering all sectors of the economy published in the Labour Statistics Yearbook show a significant decrease (from 3,043 in 2006 to 1,088 in 2007). The Committee recalls in this respect the requirements for the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on labour inspection activities, as provided for in Article 26, containing information on each of the topics listed in Article 27 relating to labour inspection in agricultural undertakings. The Committee observes that the above statistics do not allow any appraisal of the extent to which the decrease in inspection visits affects the application of the Convention. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide any available statistics on the types of agricultural undertakings and legal areas targeted by the inspections and the results achieved during the period covered by the next report.

Labour inspection activities targeting child labour. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, instead of the target of 1,500, a total of 3,000 children were removed from employment in the framework of the ILO-IPEC programme. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the role played by labour inspectors in this regard.

Mali

The Committee notes that the only report sent by the Government is the 2010 annual report of the National Labour Directorate. It requests the Government to send a report in accordance with article 22 of the Constitution of the ILO, containing in particular a full reply to the Committee's previous comments, which read as follows:

Article 5(a) of the Convention. Specific measures to encourage cooperation between the inspection services and the justice system. The Committee notes that trial magistrates, public prosecutors and labour inspection officials participated in the subregional seminar on cooperation between inspection services and judicial bodies held in Dakar from 8 to 10 May 2008 as part of a project to modernize labour administration and inspection (ADMITRA). It notes that the Minister of Justice addressed a circular letter to general prosecutors asking them to urge regional prosecutors to provide for action to be taken on reports of infringements drawn up by labour inspectors and to maintain healthy cooperation with inspectors in the interests of better compliance with the labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the practical action taken on this circular. It requests the Government to ensure that relevant statistics are published in future annual reports on the work of the labour inspection services.

Articles 6, 7 and 10. Status, conditions of service and composition of the labour inspection staff. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, contrary to what the Government has been announcing for years, the draft decree on bonuses and indemnities for labour inspectors has still not been promulgated. It also notes that despite the Government's statement that 12 labour inspectors were to be recruited in 2008, the list of labour personnel for Mali includes no inspectors, and that the staff of the inspectorate are all, without exception, in the category "controllers" (31).

In an earlier report on the application of this Convention (2003), the Government indicated that it would be utopian to expect training in labour inspection, and that training for labour inspectors was limited to a grounding in labour law at the National School of Administration, an internship in the services and participation in a training course at the African Regional Labour Administration Centre (CRADAT). The Committee notes, however, a training plan sent in 2008 intended for all labour services personnel and covering, inter alia, occupational risk prevention in the construction and public works sector (BTP); inspection methodology; penal action; and the preparation of various forms of inspection visit reports. Furthermore, the National Labour Directorate's annual report for 2008 indicates that a training workshop on ethics in inspection work, work contracts and hours of work was held for controllers from 14 to 25 April 2008 and that a training session for labour inspection trainers on occupational risks was also organized, under the guidance of two experts from GIP INTER.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on any developments in the area of initial training for inspection staff, and on the number and distribution by category and level of qualification of the staff currently performing inspection duties as prescribed in Article 3(1) of the Convention, specifying the criteria used to differentiate between these categories. It would be grateful if the Government would also explain why the 12 inspectors who were supposed to be recruited in 2008 are not on the list of central and regional labour administration staff sent to the Office.

The Committee again asks the Government to adopt the measures that are essential to the improvement of the conditions of service of labour inspection staff (remuneration, career plan, merit bonuses, etc.) so as to attract to, and retain in the profession persons who are sufficiently qualified and motivated, and hopes that in its next report the Government will be in a position to provide information showing real progress in this area.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would also continue to provide details of the training received by staff performing labour inspection duties and on the practical impact of such training.

Articles 11, 16 and 21(c). Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors, transport facilities and frequency of inspection visits. According to the abovementioned annual report for 2008, the duties of the inspection services consist not only of dispute settlement and conciliation, but also supervision of the application of the labour legislation, "which must ordinarily take up most of their time". The report even stresses that "they must make visits to workplaces their main occupation". The Committee notes from the same report that ten vehicles have been assigned to the National Labour Directorate and the regional directorates for labour, employment and vocational training. In the absence of any figures on the industrial and commercial workplaces subject to labour inspection, the statistics of inspections (306) and the workers they covered (16,613) in the course of 2008, are not sufficient for an assessment of the labour inspectorate's coverage rate in relation to the scope of its mandate. It nonetheless notes that in 2008, out of 1,482 individual complaints, 1,091 were settled through conciliation. The report also indicates that 11 collective labour disputes were recorded, 40 per cent of which were followed by work stoppages in which 2,935 workers took part, mostly in the mining (2,680 workers) and the hotel (208) sectors. The Committee would like to stress that conciliation is not among the duties of the labour inspectorate as defined in Article 3(1) of the Convention and that, furthermore, according to Paragraph 8 of Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), "the functions of labour inspectors should not include that of acting as conciliator or arbitrator in proceedings concerning labour disputes".

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would take measures to relieve labour inspection staff of conciliation duties so as to enable them to devote themselves more fully to supervising the legislation on working conditions and the protection of workers, making use, in particular, of the vehicles recently acquired by the labour administration. The Government is asked in its next report to provide information in this regard (number and distribution of vehicles made available to labour inspectors for travel to workplaces; measures taken to relieve labour inspectors from conciliation duties).

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the labour inspectorate has access to reliable data such as the number, categories and geographical distribution of workplaces and establishments subject to inspection, and the number of workers employed in them, so that the central inspection authority can plan inspection activities (supervision, advice, information) that ensure protection of the most vulnerable categories, and to ensure that this information is included in the annual report required by Articles 20 and 21.

Articles 17 and 18. Follow-up action taken by the labour inspectorate in relation to breaches of the legislation covered by the Convention. The Committee notes from the 2008 annual report the most frequent causes of the individual complaints submitted to the National Labour Directorate (claims for wages and accessories; notices of dismissal or resignation; overtime; paid leave; and dismissals), and the infringements noted in the course of inspections (concerning pay registers, employer registers and safety registers; labour contracts; wages; minimum wages; safety and hygiene; hours of work; staff representation; weekly rest; social contributions; and occupational medicine). It nonetheless notes that no information is provided as to the causes of the collective labour disputes, which affect the mining and hotel sectors in particular. According to information available at the ILO, the collective action affecting the mining sector is founded on an enterprise's violation of the provisions of a collective agreement on working conditions and the protection of certain rights at work. The miners' claims reportedly concern, in particular, the rate of output demanded of them, the length of the working day and the non-payment of overtime and other bonuses included in a collective agreement. It would appear that the enterprise dismissed en masse workers who were covered by this collective agreement only to re-employ them under new inferior contractual conditions. The Committee requests the Government to send to the Office detailed information on the role of the labour inspectorate in collective labour disputes, particularly in the mining sector, where these conflicts have affected 2,680 workers and consequently their families. Please also indicate whether, in the enterprises concerned by these disputes, the inspection staff noted any infringements of the labour legislation covered by the Convention and whether they recommended remedial measures or the application of penalties. Pointing out that according to Article 27 of the Convention, legal provisions consist not only of laws and regulations but of arbitration awards and collective agreements upon which the force of law is conferred and which are enforceable by inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to supplement the required information with relevant statistics and documents.

Articles 14 and 21. Notification of occupational accidents and cases of occupational diseases. The Committee notes that the annual reports for 2007 and 2008 contain information on reported industrial accidents and, in the case of the report for 2008, the inquiries conducted into these accidents. It observes, however, that no information at all is provided on cases of occupational disease, although information available at the ILO refers to pathologies linked to the handling and ingestion by workers of certain toxic substances in the course of extraction work in gold mines. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the preventive measures taken to reduce the number of accidents and mitigate their consequences in the mining and public works sectors, and to take measures to allow the diagnosis of cases of service-incurred diseases and the notification of such cases to the inspection services so that their most common causes can be identified and eliminated to the extent possible. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the measures taken for these purposes.

In addition, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the following point.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services. The Committee stresses once again that the annual report of the General Directorate of Labour does not meet the objectives assigned to the annual report requested under Articles 20 and 21. The Committee notes however with interest the information provided by the Government in September 2010 in reply to its general observation of 2009, as concerns measures taken in order to establish and update a register of industrial and commercial workplaces by virtue of the cooperation of the regional offices of the social security agency, the regional chambers of industry and commerce, as well as the tax authorities. The Government adds that since such activity is carried out on a permanent basis, the labour services will endeavour to establish a statistical database which is necessary for the assessment of the application of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps, with ILO assistance, in order to ensure the publication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services, separate from the annual report of the General Directorate of Labour, as provided for in Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request sent directly to the Government.

Mauritania

Continuous failure to apply the Convention. In observations it has been making for many years, the Committee has noted that there is no system of labour inspection within the meaning of the Convention (Article 1), and has asked the Government to take the necessary steps to establish such a system in order to give effect in law and in practice to the obligations deriving from ratification of this instrument. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government merely repeats the non-statistical information it supplied in its 2009 report regarding improvements in the material resources available to the inspection services (Article 11) and the junior staff of these services, and the training courses attended by labour inspectors, in particular in the context of the ADMITRA project (Article 7). The Committee is bound to note that the Government repeats its statement of 2009 to the effect that 40 labour inspectors were to be recruited shortly (Article 10) and that measures were to be taken to end the unequal treatment suffered by labour inspectors. Labour inspectors are the only public employees not to have been granted the allowance awarded by Decree in 2007 to all other administrative departments. The Government states for the third time that it will rectify the matter and that allowances will be granted to labour inspectors with regard to the specific nature of their duties and in light of their particular status.

The Committee notes that, contrary to what the report indicates, the results of the regional labour inspectorates' work have not been received by the Office, nor has any information been sent that would enable the Committee to assess the impact of the improvements in the inspectorate's material resources referred to in the last two reports, or the progress the Government asserts has been made in combating child labour. Furthermore, the Committee observes that the Government has still not sent either the provisional table of the finalized implementing texts of the Labour Code, or a copy of the Act on penalties, as further updated, referred to in the report received in 2009.

Referring to its observation of 2006, in which it took note of a proposal made by the ILO Fact-Finding Mission, that Mauritania call on other United Nations agencies and on interested donors, to mobilize the resources needed to reinforce the labour inspectorate, the Committee urges the Government to take steps, if necessary with financial assistance to be sought in the context of international cooperation and with technical support from the ILO, to establish a labour inspection service that operates on the basis of the provisions of the Convention as regards scope (Articles 1 and 2); duties (Article 3); organization under the supervision of a central authority (Article 4); cooperation with other bodies and with employers and workers or their organizations (Article 5); status and conditions of service of labour inspectors (Article 6); requisite qualifications for recruitment and training (Article 7); criteria for determining the strength of the inspectorate (Article 10); material and logistical resources needed for the performance of their duties (Article 11); inspectors' prerogatives (Article 12); their powers (Articles 13 and 17); and their obligations (Articles 15, 16 and 19); and also in terms of the central authority's obligation to publish and to communicate to the ILO an annual report on the work of the inspection services under its control (Article 21).

In order to establish a labour inspection system that meets the social and economic objectives pursued by the Convention, the Committee requests the Government also to ensure, as far as possible, the implementation of the measures described in the general observations the Committee made in 2007 (on the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and judicial bodies), in 2009 (on the availability of statistics concerning industrial and commercial establishments subject to labour inspection and the number of workers covered, as basic information for an evaluation of the application of the Convention in practice), and in 2010 (on the publication and content of an annual report on the operation of the labour inspection services).

Adoption and implementation of a labour inspection methodology guide. The Committee notes with interest from information available at the Office that the labour inspection methodology guide prepared in the context of the ADMITRA–ILO programme in cooperation with the GIP–INTER international public interest group and adopted in 2010, contains information which is valuable not only for inspectors but for other potential stakeholders in labour inspection (employers, workers and their representative organizations, other Government or private bodies, etc.). The Committee is sure that this is a useful tool for developing a labour inspection system that meets the social and economic objectives pursued by the Convention. While pointing out that the guide extends the role of the inspection services to cover enterprises in the informal economy, the Committee wishes to stress that such development will require significant additional input in terms of human, logistical and material resources.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the impact of the labour inspection methodology guide during the period covered by the next report.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to provide full particulars to the Conference at its 101st Session and to report in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Mauritius

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1969)

The committee notes with interest the detailed information provided in the Government's report, as well as the abundant documentation attached to it.

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Content and publication of an annual report. Referring to its General Observation of 2010 on this crucial issue, the Committee recalls that detailed and well prepared annual reports on the activities of the labour inspection system are of fundamental importance to assess its rate of coverage and to determine the resources that have to be allocated to this public function to achieve the objectives assigned to it. The Committee notes that the majority of information requested under Articles 20 and 21 are made available to the ILO either through hard copies transmitted by the Government with its report or statistics published via the website www.labour.gov.mu, and that, according to the Government, it has not been possible to finalize the publication of the annual report because the statistical unit of the Ministry is not yet fully operational. Therefore, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts with a view to the fulfilment by the central inspection authority of its obligation to publish an annual report in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, as well as the guidance given in Part IV of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of all the progress made in this regard.

Articles 9(2) and 10 of the Convention. Compilation of statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work, and statistics of wage structure and distribution. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the Continuous Multi Purpose Household Survey (CMPHS), conducted on a continuous basis, has started to collect data disaggregated by sex. The Committee also notes with satisfaction that statistics on the distribution of the employed population by hours of work, industry and occupation and on earnings by industry, occupation and sex, were published in June 2010 in the annual Economic and Social Indicators on Labour Force, Employment and Unemployment based on the 2009 CMPHS data. Moreover, data on the percentage distribution of the employed population and self-employed workers by sex and by weekly hours of work are available in a summary report of the CMPHS disseminated through the website of the Mauritius Central Statistics office (CMO). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue to regularly provide information on the publication of these statistics.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to Resolution I[1] concerning the measurement of working time adopted by the 18th International Conference of Labour Statisticians in November–December 2008, which defines new concepts and measures in this area of statistics.

Mexico

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report received on 14 September 2010. It also notes the comments from the National Union of Workers of "Camino y Puentes Federales de Ingresos y Servicios Conexos" dated 20 May 2010 and the Government's reply thereto dated 10 October 2011, as well as the new comments by the same trade union dated 30 August 2011, received at the Office on 2 September 2011 and sent to the Government on 27 September. The Committee requests the Government to make any comment it considers appropriate in relation to the last comments made by the trade union organization.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution). With reference to its comments under the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Committee notes that in the recommendations adopted on March 2009 by the Governing Body on the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution concerning an industrial accident that occurred at the Pasta de Conchos mine in February 2006, the Government was invited, in consultation with the social partners, to continue to take the necessary measures inter alia to monitor closely the organization and effective operation of its system of labour inspection taking due account of the Labour Administration Recommendation, 1978 (No. 158), including Paragraph 26(1) thereof, and to review the potential the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), affords in terms of support for the measures the Government is taking in order to improve the application of its laws and regulations in the area of occupational safety and health in mines (document GB.304/14/8 (Rev.), paragraph 99(6)(b)(iv) and (d)).

The Committee notes that the National Union of Workers of “Caminos y Puentes Federales de Ingresos y Servicios Conexos” alleges non-compliance by the Government of Mexico with the tripartite committee’s recommendations. It indicates that:

- (i) the Government has promoted through the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety and Health the transfer of its labour inspection responsibilities to enterprises through the Occupational Safety and Health Self-Management Programme, and the replacement of occupational safety and health inspection visits conducted by public servants, with external audits carried out by private enterprises;
- (ii) the Government has refused to include the organization of the families of the workers who died in the Pasta de Conchos mine in discussions on the measures to be implemented in order to comply with the tripartite committee’s recommendations;
- (iii) there is no reliable database to consult in order to ascertain the total number of legal, illegal and clandestine mines in the coalfield; this precludes the formulation of any suitable public policies and is a disincentive to proper application of the legislation on coalmining; although Mexican Official Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008 on safety in underground coalmines applies throughout the national territory to all underground mines carrying on activities relating to the extraction of coal, and hence to so-called pocitos (small mines), the oldest and most dangerous form of coalmine in the region, which operate in clandestinity, the Government makes no mention of them in the information supplied;
- (iv) the adoption of NOM-032-STPS-2008 has not secured any change in the region and the fines imposed are not sufficiently dissuasive. Furthermore, the measures taken by inspectors are frequently ignored (as examples the National Union cites the Ferber mine, where a miner died while the closure order was in force, and the Lulú mine, which was closed following the death of two miners but the workers were not so informed);
- (v) enterprises give false information to the STPS inspectors, who fail to verify it; the National Union advocates publishing inspectors’ reports, orders and verifications on the relevant official website;
- (vi) the workers receive no training for the work they perform and are unaware of the new NOM-032-STPS-2008.

The Government, for its part, states that:

- (i) the labour inspectorate has been strengthened through training, supervisory and control measures and dissemination of the inspectorate’s work; as well as the creation of a self-evaluation culture through the provision of advice and guidance to employers on the most effective means of complying with labour law especially the legislation on occupational safety and health, and the imposition of adequate penalties on offenders;
- (ii) the Directorate-General of the Federal Labour Inspectorate supervises the performance of inspection duties by the federal labour delegations as regards administrative and operational aspects of their work (running of databases, conduct of inspection visits, linkage with alternate inspection programmes, analysis and assessment of reports), through visits to labour delegations, subdelegations and federal officers for the purposes of technical assistance, supervision and monitoring and evaluation, to ensure that they perform their duties in accordance with the guidelines issued (between December 2006 and July 2010, 144 assistance visits were conducted);
- (iii) the Directorate-General of the Federal Labour Inspectorate and the federal labour delegations supervise the work of labour inspectors in order to reduce and avoid any corruption in the inspectorate (between December 2006 and July 2010, the Directorate-General of the Federal Labour Inspectorate carried out 164 such visits and the federal labour delegations, 4,242);
- (iv) the Federal Labour Inspectorate has implemented a strategy to ensure better monitoring of compliance with its recommendations, in order to secure compliance by all medium-sized and large mining enterprises engaged in the extraction of coal with the occupational safety and health regulations and thus avert risks; remedial measures are also applied. The strategy consists of two procedures, one of which applies if the federal labour inspector detects conditions hazardous to the health, physical integrity and life of the workers and the other, if the inspector detects shortcomings that involve no immediate risk but that must be remedied;
- (v) the Federal Government has held specific meetings with the Pasta de Conchos Family Organization and the families of the miners who were killed in the Pasta de Conchos mine during 2007 and 2011, in order to guarantee the respect of their rights and discuss and examine a possible recovery of the bodies of the victims;

- (vi) in agreement with the trade unions and organizations of employers, there have been efforts to strengthen the occupational safety and health committees in the workplaces covered by the Federal Inspectorate;
- (vii) in order to monitor and promote the application of Mexican Official Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008, awareness-raising action about safety in underground coalmines was carried out and a course organized for federal labour inspectors and coal producers.
- (viii) the differences in the number of mines recognized by various public institutions are due to the fact that each one of them has information depending on the functions it carries out. Thus, the information coming from the Secretariat of Labour and Social Security (STPS) refers to the number of workplaces and does not necessarily coincide with the information established by the Secretariat for the Economy which has at its disposal information mainly on the number of mining concessions. The database of the STPS contains data obtained through labour inspectors having carried out inspection visits, as well as information exchanged with institutions like the Secretariat for the Economy, the National Institute of Statistics and Geography (INEGI) and the Mexican Institute of Social Security (IMSS). The INEGI and the Secretariat of the Economy transmitted information to the Directorate-General for Inspection with regard to mining concessions in force in September 2010 in order to update the registries relevant to this economic sector;
- (ix) with regard to the registry of illegal mines, the labour authority has at its disposal, since March 2010, the so-called GeoInfoMex System of the Geological Service which through satellite images allows for the identification of any mine including the pocitos (small mines). This tool has allowed for the identification in May 2011 of the existence of 563 vertical drills, 297 of which were active and will be subsequently inspected;
- (x) the Consultative State Subcommittee for Occupational Safety and Health carried out important activities like the promotion of training of inspection staff on the basis of the NOM-032-STPS-2008, the elaboration of needs assessments in the area of occupational safety and health in the carbon producing region of Coahuila with a view to giving priority to implementation plans, programmes and actions, the promotion through the National Institution for Adult Education of basic education for miners in order to enable them to make the most of the training provided by employers and the support by the IMSS to mining enterprises in carrying out risk assessments including statistical analyses, etc.; and
- (xi) the issuance of the Mexican Official Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008 constitutes progress for the prevention of future accidents and the Government has taken measures in order to increase the amounts of pecuniary sanctions through the Bill on labour law reform of 18 March 2010, which is under examination by Congress.

Taking note of the measures adopted for the development, in collaboration with other organizations and public institutions, of reliable databases which allow, among other things, to calculate the total number of mines, including the pocitos (small mines), the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted or envisaged in order to strengthen the coordination of the labour inspection system as part of the labour administration system (Article 4 of the Convention) and ensure that the geographical distribution of the inspection services in relation to the needs of the various areas.

The Committee would be grateful, in particular, if the Government would provide statistical information (annual report) on the inspection activities conducted in the mining sector and especially in coalmines, for the purpose of monitoring application of the provisions set forth in NOM-032-STPS-2008, specifying the number of mines visited among the 297 identified as liable to inspection (indicating as far as possible the inspections carried out in the so-called "pocitos"), the number and nature of contraventions found and the penalties imposed as well as the preventive measures with immediate effect ordered by labour inspectors and finally, the number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease in the carbon mining sector (Paragraphs 20 and 25(2) of Recommendation No. 158).

The Committee also asks the Government to continue to take steps, in consultation with the social partners, including the organization of the families of the miners who lost their lives at the Pasta de Conchos mine, to monitor closely the organization and efficient running of the labour inspection system as part of the labour administration system (Article 5 of the Convention).

In particular, the Committee would also be grateful if the Government would send information on the measures adopted or envisaged to enhance the independence of inspectors as part of the staff of the labour administration system (Article 10) and to provide adequate human and material resources for the effective performance of inspectors' duties (Paragraph 26(1) and (2)(a) and (b) of Recommendation No. 158).

With regard to Article 5 of the Convention, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would give an account of how the consultations held in the National Advisory Committee on Occupational Safety and Health and the strengthening of the occupational safety and health committees in enterprises have affected the operation of the labour inspectorate, particularly in the coalmining sector. Taking note moreover of the carrying out by the Consultative State Subcommittee for Occupational Safety and Health of training activities for inspectors as well as needs assessments, the Committee requests the Government to communicate details on these activities and their effects as well as the annual report on the activities of this subcommittee, if available.

Lastly, observing that the Government provides no information at all on the possible ratification of Convention No. 81, in response to the request of the tripartite committee, the Committee urges the Government to examine, in consultation with the employers' organizations and trade unions, the potential of Convention No. 81 to support the measures being adopted to reinforce application of its legislation on occupational safety and health in mines. It trusts that the Government will take the necessary steps to carry out such consultations and that it will be in a position to provide information promptly on the results.

The Committee expects that the labour law reform will take into account the need to strengthen the labour inspection system in line with the recommendation of the tripartite committee and reminds the Government that it may avail itself of technical assistance from the Office.

The Committee also refers the Government to its comments under Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Montenegro

Article 5(b) of the Convention. Collaboration between labour inspectors and employers and workers. The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments previously made by the Union of Free Trade Unions of Montenegro (USSCG) in a communication dated 2 September 2009 concerning the lack of collaboration between the labour inspection and trade unions. The Government refers to the obligation of professional secrecy of labour inspectors under Article 15(b) of the Convention, as the reason for the non-association of trade union representatives in inspection visits and indicates that the labour inspectorate responds to all calls by trade unions to participate in round tables, if the workload and the limited number of labour inspectors allow for such participation.

The Committee recalls that, according to Article 5(b) of the Convention, appropriate arrangements should be made to promote collaboration between officials of the labour inspectorate and employers and workers or their organizations. The Committee refers in this regard to the guidance provided in Paragraphs 5–7 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81) with regard to various arrangements, including direct collaboration between representatives of workers and management and officials of the labour inspectorate, in the course of investigations and, in particular, inquiries into industrial accidents or occupational diseases (Paragraph 5) as well as the organization of conferences or joint committees or similar bodies, in which representatives of the labour inspectorate discuss with organizations of employers and workers questions concerning the enforcement of labour legislation and the health and safety of the workers (Paragraph 6). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on any measures taken or envisaged to promote such collaboration between the labour inspection services and the social partners, including through the tripartite Social Council (subcommittee on occupational safety and health and labour inspection), as well as awareness-raising campaigns on the role of the labour inspectorate and the development of leaflets and other media tools, as recommended in the 2009 labour inspection audit carried out by the ILO.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mozambique

Legislation and training of inspectors to monitor the new provisions. While noting the Government's indication of the adoption of Decree No. 45/2009 of 14 August 2009 regulating the general labour inspectorate, as well as the details provided on the content of its provisions in relation to those of the Convention, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would send the ILO a copy of this text, as well as any other statutory text adopted for its application. The Committee will examine this together with the handbook for labour inspection activities in the area of hygiene, occupational safety and health, annexed to the Government's report.

While also noting that, according to the Government, information on the impact of Act No. 12/2009 respecting the rights and duties of people living with the HIV/AIDS virus might be provided in its next reports, the Committee requests the Government to send this information accompanied by the implementing texts provided for under section 55 of this Act, as well as statistics on the labour inspectorate's activities in the area covered.

Article 7(3) of the Convention. The Committee notes with interest that a training programme on HIV/AIDS legislation, funded by the ILO and organized in partnership with ECoSIDA (private sector initiative in the fight against HIV/AIDS) was dispensed to 140 inspectors in 2010. The Government is requested to provide details on the professional qualifications of the trainers, as well as on the contents and duration of the training programme in question. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would also send information on the material resources and specific methodological tools provided to the labour inspectors for their particular needs in supervising this Act, accompanied by any relevant documents.

Article 10. Establishing a register of establishments liable to labour inspection. According to the Government, the list of establishments liable for labour inspection is not computerized, but it undertakes to send the relevant data available in its next reports. The Committee requests the Government to send in its next report the data available on the establishments liable to labour inspection and to take measures to ensure cooperation with the other Government bodies and entities possessing relevant data, with a view to elaborating and regularly updating a register of establishments liable to labour inspection. Drawing the Government's attention to its 2009 general observation under this Convention on the matter, the Committee asks the Government to keep the ILO informed of measures taken and results obtained.

Article 17. Role of labour inspectors in monitoring the working conditions of foreign workers found in an irregular situation. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Convention, the labour inspectorate should control the application of the legal provisions respecting conditions of work and the protection of workers, without considering the legal nature of the employment relationship or the status of the worker. It invited the Government to refer to this matter under paragraphs 75 et seq. of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, and to make sure that the labour inspection services are responsible for ensuring that workers whose employment relationship is suspended on the grounds of the illegality of their employment, obtain the social entitlements they acquired during the period of their employment.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the measures taken or envisaged to guarantee that labour inspectors ensure that employers fulfil their obligations to foreign workers in an irregular situation, for the period of their actual employment, with regards to their wages and benefits, and their rights to leave and linked to seniority etc., before these persons are expelled by the authorities responsible for applying the provisions relative to irregular immigration.

Articles 13 and 14. Occupational safety and health. Statistics of industrial accidents. According to the information provided by the Government in reply to the Committee's previous request, whenever an industrial accident occurs, an inquiry is immediately launched to ascertain the reasons in order to eliminate them and prevent the occurrence of similar accidents. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to facilitate cooperation between the inspection services, employers and workers (or their respective organizations) with a view to promoting an effective culture of prevention, particularly making use of the means advocated in Part II of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81). The Committee also asks the Government to send information on the application in practice of section 12(m) of Decree No. 45/2009, which, according to the Government, provides the labour inspector with the authority to take measures with immediate effect – such as the suspension of all operations under way in the event of serious and imminent danger for life, safety and health. Statistical information on the issue would be particularly appreciated.

Articles 10(b), 11(1)(b) and (2), and 16. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, transport facilities are available to labour inspectors. It points out that expenses incurred by labour inspectors when using their own vehicles are not reimbursed. The Committee requests the Government to provide specific information on the material means and transport facilities made available to labour inspectors to enable them to carry out inspection visits (number of vehicles per service and, with respect to the number of inspectors, the size of the establishments liable to inspection and distances to be covered). The Committee requests the Government once again to describe the measures taken to ensure that visits of establishments take place frequently enough to ensure the effective monitoring of the provisions relating to the working conditions and protection of workers.

Recalling that under Article 11(2) of the Convention, the competent authority shall make the necessary arrangements to reimburse to labour inspectors any travelling and incidental expenses which may be necessary for the performance of their duties, the Committee requests the Government to take measures to this effect in the very near future and to provide relevant information, as well as a copy of any bill or text adopted on the matter.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication to the ILO of an annual inspection report. The Committee notes that despite the Government's indication, the annual inspection report has not been received at the ILO. The Committee reminds the Government that the annual report must be published each year within the deadlines established under Article 20 and that a copy must be communicated to the Office with the same frequency. In its general observation of 2010, the Committee stressed the major importance it attached to the publication and communication to the ILO of the annual inspection report within the prescribed deadlines. When well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. In this respect, the Committee recalls that extremely valuable guidance on the presentation and analysis of this information is provided in the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81). The Committee requests the Government to ensure, in accordance with Article 20, that an annual report on labour inspection activities containing as much as possible information required for each of the clauses (a)–(g) of Article 21 will be published by the central labour inspectorate, and that a copy will be sent to the ILO within the time limits provided in Article 20.

Namibia

Article 4 of the Convention and Parts III and IV of the report form. Organization and effective operation of a system of labour administration. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Labour Act, 2007 which covers, under Chapter 9, the establishment and functioning of a number of labour institutions (Labour Advisory Council, Committee for Dispute Prevention and Resolution, Essential Services Committee, Wages Commission, Labour Commissioner, Labour Inspectorate). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would furnish extracts of reports or other periodical information provided by these bodies and information on any practical difficulties encountered in the application of the Labour Act in practice. Noting, moreover, that the Labour Court is also established under Chapter 9 of the Labour Act, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would forward to the ILO any decisions involving questions of principle in relation to the application of the Convention.

Articles 6 and 7. Preparation, administration, coordination, checking and review of national labour policy and progressive extension of the functions of the labour administration system to workers who are not, in law, employed persons. The Committee notes with interest the Labour Force Survey 2008, a copy of which was provided by the Government, and which provides a wealth of information on the state of the labour force in the country. The Committee notes that one of the policy findings of the Survey is that the country's economic and employment policies have not been sufficiently employment friendly to make a dent in the rate of unemployment which varies from 64.9 per cent in rural areas to 36.4 per cent in urban ones; the Survey therefore calls for more effective policies for job creation devised in collaboration with the social partners. The Committee also notes the other policy findings of the Survey which include the need for: (i) urgent government intervention to promote youth employment with special emphasis on entrepreneurial skills training; (ii) a concerted effort by all stakeholders to identify and/or introduce more developmental programmes in rural areas; (iii) special programmes like the establishment of regional development funds to provide support and facilitate entrepreneurial activities in disadvantaged regions; and (iv) the establishment of regional economic development planning services, which are intended to help communities develop the local economy and generate new employment and investment. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would furnish further information, including any available statistical data, on the measures taken or contemplated in the light of the policy findings and recommendations of the Labour Force Survey 2008. It would also be grateful if the Government would communicate a copy of the next Labour Force Survey which is periodically published. Noting moreover that, according to the preface of the Labour Force Survey 2008, a report on the characteristics of the informal sector will be published separately, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate a copy of this report as well as information on any measures taken or contemplated as a follow-up to its findings.

Article 10. Staff, material means and financial resources of the labour administration system. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government, the Division of the Labour Inspectorate has been restructured by adding 32 administration staff to bring the total to 81. Moreover, the Occupational Health and Safety Division has been restructured by adding seven posts to bring them up to a total of 25. The Committee also notes, however, that according to section 124(3) of the Labour Act 2007, the Minister may suspend or withdraw the appointment of a labour inspector. The Committee requests the Government to specify the grounds on which the Minister may suspend or withdraw the appointment of a labour inspector and to provide relevant examples. Moreover, noting that section 124 generally concerns the appointment of labour inspectors without specifying the relevant process and criteria, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide details on the process of appointment, the qualifications required for the selection of labour inspectors, as well as their status and conditions of service once appointed.

Finally, with reference to its previous comments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the revision of the structure of the Directorate for Labour Services and the number of administration staff (number, grade, field of specialization, geographical distribution, etc.) and to indicate, if possible, the proportion of the national budget allocated to the labour administration system.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Netherlands

The Committee takes note of the observations made by the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV), the National Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV) and the Trade Union Confederation of Middle and Higher Level Employees' Unions (MHP) in a communication dated 31 August 2011 which was communicated to the Government on 19 September 2011. It notes that in their comments, the three trade union organizations reiterate to a large extent observations already made in their communications of September and August 2007 with regard to the impact of the revised Working Conditions Act, 2007 (and the related Working Conditions Decree and Working Conditions Regulations) on the functioning of the labour inspection system. The Committee requests the Government to make any observation it deems appropriate in relation to these comments.

Articles 3, 5, 7, 9, 10, 13 and 16 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspection system in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee notes the information contained in the annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate to the effect that between 2008 and 2010, the number of labour inspectors was further reduced from 465 to 431 and that the number of inspection visits decreased from 35,000 to 31,849. It notes that according to the previous and current comments of the FNV, CNV and MHP, the chance for a company to be visited by an inspector is only once in every 30 years on average and that one inspector corresponds to about 30,000 workers.

The Committee notes that, in the view of the Government, this reduction has to be seen in the context of the new national occupational safety and health policy, introduced after the entry into force of the revised Working Conditions Act in 2007; this policy has resulted in efficiency gains in the deployment of inspectors and in very good conditions for workers (corroborated, according to the Government, by surveys affirming the high level of worker satisfaction, as well as a risk level of occupational accidents that is below the European average).

In the opinion of the Government, the differentiation made by the new OSH policy between the “public and private domains” allows for “self-activation”, meaning that the social partners have the opportunity to find appropriate ways of complying with targets in the various sectors, thus enabling labour inspectors to focus on sectors with substantial working environment problems. General rules and targets for the protection of workers are laid down by the Government in the “public domain”, while in the “private domain” the social partners agree on ways and methods to achieve and implement these public targets by means of “catalogues (or Arbocatalogues)” which, once approved by the labour inspectorate, are legally binding and taken into account by labour inspectors during inspections. Over 150 “catalogues” have been concluded between employers and workers, in the framework of a Government subsidy scheme covering over half of the workers in the country, and the social partners are taking measures to implement the “catalogues” in individual workplaces.

The Government adds that the function of providing technical information and advice to employers and workers on means of complying with legal provisions, in the context of the new national occupational health and safety (OSH) policy, is largely assumed by private occupational safety and health services (the so-called Arbodiensten), which provide advice on working conditions and occupational safety and health policy to companies in a way which is adapted to their specific situation. The Government further indicates that Arbodienst enterprises cover about 92 per cent of the workforce, are independent and required to comply with certain legal obligations, including sufficient expertise in industrial medicine, safety and hygiene and organizational science and, according to the Government, they help companies to convert legal commitments and scientific views into specific measures.

The Committee also notes the Government’s indication that measures are to be adopted in 2011 to help employers cope with the new requirements of the so-called “ARIE” Regulations on working with dangerous substances, which the Confederation of Netherlands Industry and Employers (VNO–NCW) had described in the past as too complex and creating a heavy administrative burden. These measures encompass the design and dissemination of relevant education as well as information measures taken following the feasibility studies carried out by the National Institute for Public Health and the Environment (RIVM) as well as tailor-made consultation and advice in individual workplaces, by means of: (i) the system of Arbodiensten; and (ii) several private institutions which provide information on OSH, training for employees, certification and monitoring of workplaces and machinery.

The Committee recalls that according to Article 10 of the Convention, the number of labour inspectors should be sufficient to secure the effective discharge of the duties of the inspectorate in the light of the number of the workplaces liable to inspection, the number of workers employed therein, the number and complexity of the legal provisions to be enforced as well as the material means placed at the disposal of the inspectors and the practical conditions under which visits of inspection must be carried out in order to be effective. Moreover, according to Article 16, workplaces should be inspected as often and as thoroughly as is necessary to ensure the effective application of the relevant legal provisions.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on:

- (i) the impact of the new OSH policy on levels of compliance with labour law and the prevention of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease including psychosocial aspects, which constitute one of the priorities mentioned in the Government’s previous report (Articles 3(1)(a) and (b));
- (ii) the evaluation of the needs of the labour inspection system in terms of human resources in the light of the number of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein in the context of the new OSH policy (Article 10);
- (iii) the powers given to the labour inspectors with a view to remedying defects observed in plant, layout or working methods which they may have reasonable cause to believe constitute a threat to the health and safety of the workers, including measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health and safety of the workers (Article 13);
- (iv) the impact of the collaboration with the social partners in the implementation of the “catalogues” on labour law compliance in workplaces in various sectors and branches (Article 5(b));
- (v) the operation in practice of the system of “Arbodiensten”, in particular, the procedure for the authorization of these enterprises, the manner in which they are supervised by the labour inspectorate, their functioning (scope of activity, safeguards of independence, whether the use of their services is voluntary or statutorily mandated, the costs associated with their services, their availability to small- and medium-enterprises, etc.) as well as their impact on compliance with labour legislation in individual workplaces (Articles 5(a) and 9);

- (vi) the measures adopted to facilitate compliance with the so-called “ARIE” Regulations and their impact (Articles 3(1)(b) and 5(b));
- (vii) the implementation of a pilot project mentioned in the Government’s report which includes training to inspectors with respect to nanotechnology risks (Articles 3(1)(b) and 7(3)).

Articles 3(1) and (2). Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes from the annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate that among 31,849 inspection visits in 2010, 10,500 related to the control of illegal employment (i.e. the Act on Employment of Foreigners Workers (WAV) and the Minimum Wage and Holiday Allowance Act (WML)). It understands that among the current inspectors, 171 have been charged with the control of illegal employment and wages in collaboration with the Social Security Investigation and Information Service (SIOD), a special department working together with the police and tax authorities. The Committee further notes that inspections were targeted at sectors where the risk of illegal employment was suspected to be very high. Such inspections were facilitated through research and joint actions with the Immigration and Naturalization Service (IND), the Employee Insurance Agency (UWV), the Tax Department, the Social Insurance Bank (SVB), the municipalities, the SIOD and the police, as well as through data exchange between the IND and the UWV.

The Committee would like to recall that the primary role of the labour inspectorate, pursuant to Article 3(1), is to secure the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers and to supply technical information and advice; any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors should not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of the primary duties or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers (paragraph 2 of the same Article). The Committee notes that, in view of the diminishing human resources available to the inspection services, calling upon inspectors to monitor the legality of the employment relationship will necessarily entail a proportionate reduction in inspection of conditions of work. With regard to workers from third countries (non-EU) in particular, the Committee recalls that according to paragraph 78 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the primary duty of labour inspectors should be to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law. The function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection.

The Committee requests the Government to specify the impact of the activities carried out by the labour inspectorate in the area of illegal employment on the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers including the outcomes of administrative decisions, court rulings, etc.

The Committee also asks the Government to specify the role of the labour inspectors in the framework of joint actions with the IND and the police and to indicate the manner in which the enforcement of employers’ obligations with regard to the rights of undocumented foreign workers is ensured for the period of their effective employment relationship, especially in cases where such workers are expelled from the country.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

New Zealand

The Committee notes the Government’s report and the comments of Business New Zealand annexed to the report.

Articles 3(1) and (2) and 5(a) of the Convention. Additional duties entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that, in reply to its previous comments, the Government indicates that the role and functions of occupational safety and health (OSH) inspectors and labour inspectors are limited to the enforcement of legislation on OSH and employment and do not extend to the combating of illegal immigration. The Government adds that labour inspectors do sometimes work with immigration officials but the focus of this work for labour inspectors relates to OSH or employment breaches – not immigration status.

The Government adds that the Recognized Seasonal Employer (RSE) scheme is a programme aimed at ensuring legal migrant employment with approved and audited employers. The RSE labour inspectors work very closely with immigration officials in ensuring that the high employment standards of the programme are maintained. The Committee also notes that, according to Business New Zealand, section 351 of the Immigration Act 2009 makes it an offence for an employer to exploit an undocumented migrant worker.

The Committee requests the Government to provide more information on the activities carried out by the labour inspectorate in the framework of the RSE in cooperation with immigration officials and to provide data on the impact of these activities in ensuring compliance with legal provisions concerning conditions of work and the protection of workers. The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would specify any action taken by labour inspectors if undocumented migrant workers are detected in the framework of the RSE, for instance, in order to sanction the employer and ensure the discharge of his/her obligations with regard to the statutory rights of these workers, such as the payment of wages and any other benefits owed for work accomplished in the framework of the employment relationship.

Articles 10, 16, 17, 18 and 21. Number of labour inspectors, inspection visits and effective enforcement. The Committee notes that the number of OSH inspectors has decreased (from 156 in 2008 to 145 in 2010), while the number of labour inspectors in employment matters has remained the same since 2008 (33 inspectors). It further notes that, over the last two years, the number of regular OSH inspections has decreased, while the number of labour inspections in employment matters has increased.

In reply to the Committee's previous comments in this regard, the Government indicates that, as the number of labour inspectors in employment matters was only 18 in 2004, it has increased significantly since then. The Government also indicates that it does not envisage an increase in the number of OSH or labour inspectors at present, due in part to constraints on Government spending. The Government indicates that to improve outcomes within the limits of current resources, labour inspectors are developing more sophisticated approaches to filtering and targeting of work so that current resources can be wielded to more effect.

The Committee also notes that, according to the statements made by the Government delegates to the 100th International Labour Conference (June 2011), a system-based model is being introduced in order to allow greater flexibility for inspectors, empower them to assist workplaces to improve their systems, while addressing individual concerns and provide proactive services targeted at clearly identified patterns of non-compliance in a more strategic manner. The objective is to promote increased voluntary compliance, and shift workplaces towards best practice. The Department of Labour has recently launched a Harm Reduction Programme in OSH which, rather than simply responding to incidents and notifications, focuses on trying to eliminate the harm or risk by working to change the underlying behaviour. According to the Government, targeting inspection services on areas or issues of highest risk is crucial, since, it could take up to five years for the Department of Labour to visit all workplaces.

The Committee also notes the information provided in the Government's report on the amendments introduced to the Employment Relations Act (ERA) in 2010, so as to ensure sustainable compliance and greater deterrence in cases where there is ongoing or severe non-compliance. In this regard, the Committee notes the introduction of two new instruments, the so-called "enforceable undertaking" and "improvement notice" which labour inspectors can apply in the cases of non-compliance and eventually enforce, if breaches persist. The Committee also notes the doubling of the maximum penalties (from 5,000 New Zealand dollars ($NZ) to $NZ10,000 for individual employers and from $NZ10,000 to $NZ20,000 for companies) in case of non-compliance, and the possibility to impose penalty interest rates in certain cases of long-standing and repeated non-compliance involving the recovery of money. It notes with interest that, according to the Government, a more structured approach to determining penalties by the district courts and a significant increase in the level of fines and reparations awarded in OSH prosecutions has resulted from the action of the Department of Labour which has repeatedly sought increased fines from judgments on OSH cases. It also notes with interest that by virtue of article 134A of the ERA as amended in 2010, the Employment Relations Authority is empowered to award a penalty against a person for obstructing or delaying an authority investigation.

The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the functioning of the new enforcement system in practice and to provide an assessment of its impact on levels of compliance with legal provisions on conditions of work and the protection of workers as well as on the number of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. It also requests the Government to indicate the impact of this system on staffing levels at the labour inspectorate given that the new system seems to require inspection visits by labour inspectors in order not only to provide information and advice but also to verify compliance with "enforceable undertakings" and "improvement notices" so as to ensure effective enforcement.

The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which labour inspectors exercise in practice the discretion provided for in Article 17 of the Convention to give warning and advice instead of instituting or recommending proceedings.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the manner in which it is ensured, through the implementation of the so-called "improvement notices" and "enforceable undertakings" that labour inspectors apply the appropriate measures to achieve compliance with labour legislation and strike a reasonable balance between their educational and enforcement functions. Please provide a copy of any relevant internal instructions, including the operational guidelines and business rules referred to in the Government's report.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and content of the annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that the Government, in reply to its previous comment, acknowledges that the annual reports on the work of the labour inspectorate which are published on the website of the Department of Labour do not compile all the information listed under Article 21(a)–(g), but indicates that information not contained in the annual reports, such as information on prosecutions, industrial accidents and relevant legislation, can be found in other parts of the website. The Committee reminds the Government that annual reports on the work of the labour inspection services are an invaluable source of practical information and data not only for the other public bodies and the ILO supervisory bodies, but also the employers' or workers' organizations who may make, on this basis, comments on ways to improve the functioning of the labour inspection system. Noting the Government's intention to take action to address this issue in the future, the Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of any progress in this regard.

Labour Statistics Convention, 1985 (No. 160) (ratification: 2001)

Article 14 of the Convention. Statistics of occupational injuries and diseases. The Committee notes with satisfaction that in reply to its previous comments, the Government indicates that statistics on work-related claims for injuries are now published on an annual basis on the website of Statistics New Zealand in summary form. Serious Injury Outcome Indicators have also been published annually by the New Zealand Industry Prevention Strategy Secretariat. The Government states that in 2011, Statistics New Zealand will publish and further develop these indicators that include work-related injury indicators. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of further developments in this regard.

Article 9(2). Statistics of time rates of wages and normal hours of work. Taking note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee draws its attention to Resolution I[1] concerning the measurement of working time adopted by the International Conference of Labour Statisticians in November–December 2008, which defines new concepts and measures in this area of statistics.

Niger

The Committee notes that the Government's report provides information on the provisions of the national legislation vis-à-vis the provisions of the Convention. It notes in particular that, under Article 11 of the Convention concerning working conditions as well as logistical and material resources of labour inspectors, the Government indicates that, in the event of labour inspectors incurring expenses as part of their displacement or the performance of their duties, the costs are reimbursed through the national budget. However, it states that some inspectors do not even have a vehicle to carry out visits and usually perform requisitions. In addition, under Part IV of the report form for the Convention, the Government states that the general difficulties related to the implementation of the Convention lie within the limited human, material and logistical resources available to labour inspectors and to the National Labour Directorate resulting in the impairment to effectively fulfil their mission.

In its previous comments, the Committee had referred on several occasions to the findings of the high-level investigation mission carried out by the Office from 10 to 20 January 2006 (in the context of controlling the implementation of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182)), which highlighted the fact that the Labour Inspectorate was "severely deprived of material and humane means necessary to accomplish its various missions", and recommended an audit of that institution to determine the exact nature and extent of needs in this area and considered that, once that was done, the Government would work with support from the ILO and that of other UN agencies and interested donors in order to mobilize resources.

In its report received in 2009, the Government committed itself to trying to make every effort to ensure that the audit would take place as soon as possible and to inform the Office of any developments in this regard. The Committee notes that the Government has not taken the measures in question but that, in response to the observation of 2010 on the need for an audit, while referring to the poor conditions within the labour inspection services, it has formally requested support and assistance from the ILO in order to strengthen the operational capabilities of its inspection services and address particular mining prospects.

The Committee must draw the Government's attention to the fact that the establishment of a labour inspection system meeting the socio-economic objectives covered by the Convention should take in due account the measures recommended by the Commission particularly in its General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection and in its general observations of 2007 (the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judiciary), of 2009 (the availability of statistics on industrial and commercial establishments liable to labour inspection and the number of workers covered as baseline information for assessing the implementation of the Convention in practice) and of 2010 (the publication and content of an annual report on the functioning of the labour inspection). In the absence of basic information on the functioning of the labour inspection (statistics on labour inspection activities and their results, geographical distribution of industrial and commercial undertakings covered by the Convention and workers occupied therein), the Committee is not in a position to assess the effect given in practice to the Convention or to the relevant national legislation.

Consequently, the Committee hopes that the Government's request for ILO support in order to establish, in law and in practice, a labour inspection system as prescribed by the Convention will be satisfied rapidly and requests the Government to take, in consultation with organizations of employers and workers and in cooperation with the ILO Office in the region, the necessary measures for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the progress achieved and any difficulties encountered.

Norway

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 19 of the Convention. Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. As in its observation on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee notes the establishment of a hospital accident register with a view to the registration in an electronic database of all accidents treated in Norwegian hospitals. The labour inspectorate participated in this process with a view to the establishment of a special module for the recording of industrial accidents. The Committee particularly appreciates the organization of such collaboration with a view to improving the notification and prevention of industrial accidents. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, cases of occupational disease are still under-declared despite the obligation for medical practitioners to notify them to the labour inspectorate. The Government explains this situation by the current notification procedure which involves a paper version, which is time-consuming for medical practitioners. The Committee notes a project carried out in collaboration with the Norwegian Medical Association for the establishment of an electronic notification procedure based on the electronic patient journal and the secure electronic portal known as "Health Net". The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of any progress achieved in terms of the provision to the labour inspectorate of data on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, the impact of this progress on activities for the prevention of occupational risks in workplaces and their results.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Pakistan

The Committee takes note of the comments made by the Pakistan Workers' Confederation in a communication dated 21 November 2011. The Committee requests the Government to make any comment it deems appropriate in this regard.

Labour inspection policy and revision of labour law legislation. According to the report sent by the Government in 2008, a new occupational safety and health bill, based on the approach in the 2006 document on labour inspection policy (LIP 2006) by the Ministry of Labour, Manpower and Overseas Pakistanis (MLMOP), was in the course of being drafted and was expected to be adopted by the end of 2010.

The LIP 2006 document foresees various measures such as the establishment of a central labour inspection authority; the establishment of a computerized register of enterprises; the improvement of material means allocated to labour inspectorates; the establishment of integrative inspections also referred to as "one inspector, one enterprise"; the strengthening of training of labour inspectors; the increase of preventive measures; the recruitment of qualified technical experts and specialists; the increase of protection for workers in the informal economy which constitute 80 per cent of the workforce of the country and which are not covered by labour legislation; the risk assessment of enterprises and workplaces among other things through self-declaration or self-reporting by enterprises and the involvement of private actors in inspection.

According to a 2010 document on labour policy (LP 2010) published on the website of the MLMOP, it is envisaged to revise and consolidate labour legislation, to establish a tripartite council on occupational safety and health (OSH) and tripartite monitoring committees at district, province and federal levels to monitor implementation of labour laws, particularly in the area of payment of wages, working environment and working time.

In relation to labour inspection policy, the Committee notes that, according to the APFTU, "The previous Government has imposed a ban on the inspection of industries by the Labour Department, Social Security Department and Old Age benefits officers, not allowing them to inspect any industrial workplaces or departments." The trade union adds that: "Accordingly, the Government has given open hand to employers to do whatever they want. Due to this, the previous Government has also given permission to employers to get labour from children and child labour has therefore increased in Pakistan."

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate any up-to-date documentation on national labour inspection policy and report on any steps taken to implement it.

Please provide information on any developments as regards the adoption of new labour law legislation and, if applicable, communicate a copy of any text thereof. Please also provide information on the intended establishment of the tripartite OSH council and the tripartite monitoring committees mentioned in the LP 2010 document and, if applicable, provide information on their activities and their impact on the operation and outcomes of labour inspection and provide a copy of any relevant document.

The Committee also requests the Government to make any comment deemed relevant on the issue raised by the APFTU.

Article 4 of the Convention. Supervision and control within the labour inspection system. The Government referred in its 2008 report to a review of inspection procedures at the provincial level, focusing particularly on the provincial government of Punjab. It further indicated that inspection visits continue to be under the control of provincial authorities. It indicates in its last report that it is envisaged to establish a national labour inspectorate as the central inspection authority to serve as the focal point for the nation's inspection activities. The Committee also notes in this regard that the PWF, like other trade unions in the past, regrets once more the persisting absence of a system for supervising application of the legislation in the provinces of Sindh and Punjab. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide the ILO with information on any steps taken following the abovementioned review of the inspection procedures in the provinces of the country.

Please provide detailed information on the structure and organization of the labour inspection system in Punjab and Sindh and on its functioning in practice and, if applicable, a copy of any relevant legal provisions.

Please also provide information as regards the establishment of a national inspection authority and, if applicable, a copy of any relevant legal provisions.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would also make any comment deemed relevant on the points raised by the PWF.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication of annual inspection reports. The Committee recalls that the last annual report has been communicated to the ILO in 1995. It would like to come back to the information contained in the 2006 LIP document which indicates the intention to eventually establish a computerized register of enterprises, by various means such as the conduct of awareness-raising campaigns concerning the registration of workplaces and enterprises, the adoption of penalties for the non-registration with the provincial labour inspectorates, the use of existing data (e.g. information available by tax authorities) and the intended collaboration with trade unions and employers' organizations to this end. The Committee has underlined, in its 2009 general observation, the essential character of the availability of statistics on industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein (Article 10(a)(i) and (ii) and Article 21(c)) and the usefulness of the availability of this data for the determination of the budgetary needs for the determination of the appropriate number of labour inspectors, the necessary material resources for the discharge of their functions (Articles 10, 11 and 16) or the provision of training (Article 7). The Committee asks the Government to endeavour to implement the abovementioned measures and, if applicable, additional measures with a view to establish a register of enterprises. It further asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that an annual report on the matters set out in Article 21 of the Convention is published and sent to the ILO. The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to the guidance provided in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), which may serve as a basis for the disaggregation of the information required as well as to the possibility of ILO technical assistance for the establishment of annual inspection reports.

Panama

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received and that the Government has not provided any response in reply to its Direct Requests of 2008 and 2009.

The Committee notes the comments made by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) on the application of the Convention, dated 25 August 2011, as well as the Government's reply dated 8 November 2011.

Articles 3(1), 6, 7, 10, 15(a), 16, 17 and 18 of the Convention. Comments of trade union organizations. According to the FENASEP, labour inspectors do not enjoy the stability or independence, which they should be assured of under the Convention in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention, as they are employees which are subject to free appointment and removal from office. The trade union indicates that, in view of their status, the Labour Ministry has dismissed more than 90 per cent of the labour inspectors appointed by the previous Government without providing any reasons, while the previous Government had in turn dismissed the labour inspectors appointed by the former Government. The FENASEP also alleges that the new labour inspectors were appointed on the basis of political affiliation and not for their competency or merit and that they do not have the required knowledge for the performance of their duties, but that they nevertheless receive higher wages than their predecessors. Furthermore, according to the FENASEP, labour inspectors do not receive adequate training and, although their number has been recently increased, they are not sufficient, in view of the number of complaints received and the number of enterprises registered. The trade union also reports the absence of manuals on inspection procedures and protocols and alleges that labour inspectors engage in practices that are not in line with ethical standards. In addition, the FENASEP indicates that higher authorities in the Ministry have the discretion to decide in each case on who will be inspected, warned or punished.

The Government, in reply to these allegations, indicates that the 134 inspectors currently working at the Ministry of Labour and Employment Development (MITRADEL) are all civil servants and that 25 per cent of them were appointed under past administrations. The grounds for termination of the staff is that 70 per cent of them did not meet expectations set for the performance of their functions, 5 per cent were dismissed for breach of internal rules or misconduct, whereas 20 per cent resigned and 5 per cent left office without justification. The Government adds that the selection of inspectors is carried out in conformity with the requirements prescribed in the handbook of procedures of the Ministry, denies that the new inspectors have higher wages than the previous ones and explains that the new appointments were made to fill vacant posts with the same wages. It also states that the Institutional Human Resources Office and the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate have carried out jointly national training days for their staff on topics such as drawing up of technical reports, the discharge of their duties, the organization of the public sector, alternative means of conflict resolution, reports intended for inspectors and security officers, among others. In addition, the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate, received technical assistance from specialists of the Spanish Labour Ministry with the support of the Programme for the Strengthening of Labour Institutions (FOIL) and the Spanish Cooperation Agency. According to the Government, the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate developed, in coordination with the Institutional Planning Office of the MITRADEL, a handbook on procedures, which describes the functions of the departments of the labour inspection services and the different steps to be followed for routine and scheduled inspections. In addition, labour inspectors, prior to taking up their functions, receive training on questions relating to ethical conduct in the public sector and the sanctions applicable for serious misconduct.

The Committee recalls that, in conformity with Article 6 of the Convention, the inspection staff shall be composed of civil servants whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences. It draws the Government's attention to paragraphs 202 to 204 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, where it emphasized that labour inspectors cannot act in full independence, as required by their functions, if their service or their career prospects depend on political considerations and that it is vital that the levels of remuneration and career prospects of inspectors are such that high-quality staff are attracted, retained and protected from any improper influence. It has emphasized, that as public servants, labour inspectors are generally appointed on a permanent basis and can only be dismissed for serious professional misconduct, which should be defined in terms that are as precise as possible to avoid arbitrary or improper interpretations. Therefore, a decision to dismiss an inspector, like any other decision to apply a sanction with serious consequences, should be taken, or confirmed, by a body offering the necessary guarantees of independence or autonomy with respect to the hierarchical authority and in accordance with a procedure guaranteeing the right of defence and appeal.

The Committee further draws the Government's attention to the fact that, in conformity with the requirements of Article 7 of the Convention, labour inspectors should be recruited with sole regard to their qualifications and should be adequately trained for the performance of their duties and that Article 15(a) of the Convention provides that labour inspectors are prohibited from having any direct or indirect interest in the enterprises under their supervision.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide clarifications on the reasons for the removal of 70 per cent of the civil servants, who were considered not to meet the performance expectations, and those 5 per cent, who were dismissed for breach of internal rules or misconduct, and to indicate the relevant legal provisions, whether any appeals have been lodged in this framework and their outcome.

The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide clarifications on the possible reasons for the resignation or departure of 25 per cent of labour inspection staff as well as on the measures taken or envisaged to retain qualified and experienced staff, (improvement of career prospects and their wage scales, notably in relation to other comparable categories of public officials) and on the safeguards of independence of labour inspectors.

The Committee also requests the Government to transmit the Code of conduct to be observed by inspectors in the discharge of their functions and the texts applicable in the event of non-compliance with this Code, and to indicate the relevant sanctions.

The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide information on the conditions and procedures for the recruitment of labour inspectors as well as the measures taken or envisaged in order to ensure that they are adequately trained on a regular basis, both when they enter the service as well as in the course of their employment, to enable them to perform their duties effectively (Article 7).

The Committee further requests the Government to communicate the text of the handbook on procedures developed by the National Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate in coordination with the Institutional Planning Office of the MITRADEL as well as to provide data on inspections (routine inspections and inspections as a result of a complaint, frequency of inspections performed in the same undertaking, scope of inspections), the violations detected by inspectors (and the legal provisions to which they relate) and the sanctions imposed, as well as the number of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Peru

The Committee notes the Government's report in response to its previous comments.

The Committee notes the comments made by the Union of Labour Inspectors of the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion (SI Peru) dated 30 May 2011, and the Government's response thereto, dated 15 September 2011. It also notes the comments made by the Autonomous Workers' Confederation of Peru (CATP), dated 9 September 2011. The Committee requests the Government to provide any comments or information it deems appropriate in this respect.

The Committee notes that a representation under article 24 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organisation was presented to the Governing Body by the CATP (document GB.312/INS/16/4). In the course of its 312th Session (November 2011), the Governing Body decided that the representation was receivable, and appointed a tripartite committee to examine it.

In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee decided to postpone its examination of the application of this Convention pending the decision of the Governing Body in respect of the representation. The Committee will therefore examine the information supplied by the Government in its report relating to the period 2009–11 as well as the comments of the trade unions and the Government's reply thereto, in the light of the decisions adopted in due course by the Governing Body in the framework of said representation.

Poland

The Committee notes the comments made by the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union “Solidarnosc”, in a communication dated 25 August 2011. The Committee requests the Government to make any observation it deems appropriate in relation to these comments.

Article 2 of the Convention. Scope of labour inspection. The Committee notes that Solidarnosc refers to the absence of effective inspection of workers who are not considered to be employees (civil law contracts or self-employed). In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, under article 13 of the Act on the National Labour Inspectorate, the scope of labour inspection has been extended to cover workers conducting economic activities on their own account, particularly with regard to safety and health. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the inspection activities carried out in industrial and commercial workplaces in relation to these workers (e.g. number of inspections, types of violations detected and penalties imposed), as well as the methods used to this end.

Article 3(2). Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes that according to the Government, since 1 July 2007 the National Labour Inspectorate has been entrusted with controlling the legality of employment of Polish citizens as well as foreigners (article 13 of the Act on the National Labour Inspectorate of 13 April 2007). The National Labour Inspectorate has taken over these functions from the employment legality services of the individual administrative regions (voivodes) and specialized divisions on the legality of employment have been set up in all District Labour Inspectorates.

According to the Government, the activities of the specialized divisions include the control of foreign nationals, from the point of view of both the legality of employment (legality of residence, holding of the required work permit, registration with the social security services etc.) and the observance of worker's rights (such as wages, working time, leave, occupational safety and health, etc.). The Committee recalls from its previous comments that, in this framework, cooperation is envisaged between the labour inspection and the police and border guards (article 14 of the Act) and that labour inspectors are required to notify the police and border guards of infringements of relevant regulations (article 37 of the Act). In 2007, 49 decisions to expel foreign nationals or oblige them to leave the territory had been pronounced by the Governor as a result of this cooperation.

The Committee recalls from paragraph 78 of the 2006 General Survey on Labour Inspection that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law. Given the potentially large proportion of inspection activities spent on verifying the legality of immigration status, the Committee has emphasized that additional duties that are not aimed at securing the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers should be assigned to labour inspectors only in so far as they do not interfere with their primary duties and do not prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers. The Committee has also emphasized that the association of the police and border guards in labour inspection is not conducive to the relationship of trust needed to create the climate of confidence that is essential to enlisting the cooperation of employers and workers with labour inspectors. It must be possible for inspectors to be respected for their authority to report offences, and at the same time to be approachable as preventers and advisers.

The Committee has therefore emphasized that the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task of the inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

In this regard, the Committee also notes with interest that the Government is in the process of transposing into national law the European Union Directive 2009/52/EC. Article 6(1), of the Directive provides that employers, who employ illegally staying third-country nationals shall be liable to pay: (a) any outstanding remuneration which shall be presumed to be at least as high as the wage provided for by the applicable laws on minimum wages, by collective agreements or in accordance with established practice in the relevant occupational branches (unless either the employer or the employee can prove otherwise, while respecting, where appropriate, the mandatory national provisions on wages); (b) an amount equal to any taxes and social security contributions that the employer would have paid had the third-country national been legally employed, including penalty payments for delays and relevant administrative fines; (c) where appropriate, any cost arising from sending back payments to the country to which the third-country national has returned or has been returned. Furthermore, in conformity with article 6(2) of the Directive, effective procedures should be ensured for the implementation of the abovementioned provisions and mechanisms should be enacted to ensure that illegally employed third-country nationals can claim and recover any outstanding remuneration. Pursuant to the same paragraph, illegally employed third-country nationals shall also be systematically and objectively informed about their rights under this paragraph and under article 13 (establishment of effective mechanisms through which third-country nationals in illegal employment may lodge complaints against their employers) before the enforcement of any return decision.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged, including the amendment of articles 14(1) and 37(2)(3) of the Act on the National Labour Inspectorate, so as to ensure that the functions of enforcing immigration law are dissociated from those of controlling the observance of workers' rights.

Please also specify the nature of the cooperation between the specialized divisions on the legality of employment and the border guards and police.

Noting that the annual labour inspection report for 2009 and 2010 has not been received by the Office, the Committee also asks the Government to indicate the proportion of inspectors and resources allocated to the specialized units for legality of employment, the numbers, scope and nature of controls carried out by these units, violations found, legal proceedings instituted, remedies and sanctions imposed for undeclared work, and the impact of these activities on the enforcement of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers.

The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the manner in which the labour inspection ensures the enforcement of employers' obligations with regard to the statutory rights of undocumented foreign workers for the period of their effective employment relationship, especially in cases where such workers are expelled from the country. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the manner in which effect will be given to EU Directive 2009/52/EC in national law and practice and to provide the ILO with a copy of any relevant legislative text once adopted.

Articles 5(a), 17 and 18. Sanctions and effective enforcement. Cooperation between the inspection services and the judiciary. The Committee notes the Government's reference to training provided to labour inspectors and public prosecutors including the discussion of practical problems of cooperation and investigation as well as meetings held between the National Labour Inspectorate and the offices of public prosecutors of all instances to resolve problems of cooperation. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the above cooperation activities, such as the number of cases reported to the office of the public prosecutor and the initiation of the respective criminal proceedings, as well as their outcome (fines, prison sentences or acquittals).

Noting the comments made by Solidarnosc in relation to the question of sanctions and effective enforcement, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the inclusion of statistics of violations and penalties imposed (Articles 17, 18 and 21(e) of the Convention) in the annual labour inspection reports.

Article 5(b). Collaboration between labour inspection officials and the social partners. The Solidarnosc refers to the lack of collaboration between the labour inspection services and representatives of trade unions in the course of inspections. Noting that section 29 of the Act of 2007 on the National Labour Inspectorate provides for collaboration between the labour inspection services and trade unions during inspection activities, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the application of this provision in practice. The Committee draws the Government's attention in this regard to the guidance provided in Part II of Recommendation No. 81.

Article 12(1). Right of inspectors to enter workplaces freely. The Committee notes that the Act on Freedom of Economic Activity (AFEA), which has not been submitted to the Office in its current version, appears to still require prior authorization for labour inspectors to carry out inspections. The Committee nevertheless notes that administrative courts have issued contradictory decisions on whether labour inspection has to be considered as a body of control of economic activities falling within the scope of the AFEA. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide the Office with a copy of the Act of 19 December 2008 amending the Act on freedom of economic activity. It once again asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in order to ensure clarity both in law and in practice on this important question and to remove any requirement for labour inspectors to seek authorization from their hierarchical superiors in order to exercise their right of entry into workplaces liable to inspection.

*Articles 5(a), 20 and 21 of the Convention. Data collection for the improvement of registers of workplaces in district labour inspectorates. Data exchange between the National Labour Inspectorate (NLI) and the Social Insurance Institution (ZUS). The Committee notes that no national register of undertakings exists and that while the registers of district labour inspectorates contain information on the location, type and scope of activity of undertakings, they do not indicate the size of undertakings, nor the number and category of workers employed therein, as there is no obligation in law to communicate this information to the labour inspectorate. However, the Committee notes with interest the cooperation between the NLI and the ZUS since 2010 so as to make data available to the NLI by electronic mail (e.g. individual data on those responsible for paying social security contributions, as well as on insured persons) and to enable the labour inspection services to have access the ZUS database for their everyday activities. The Committee asks the Government to keep the ILO informed of progress made in relation to data exchange between the NLI and the ZUS and, where applicable, to provide information on the impact of such cooperation on the improvement of the registers of workplaces in district labour inspectorates.*

Noting finally that annual reports for 2009 and 2010 on the work of the labour inspection services were not received at the ILO, the Committee asks the Government to communicate the annual labour inspection reports on a regular basis to the ILO.

Portugal

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b), 13, 17, 18, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Distribution of inspection activities between the objectives of prevention and punishment of violations. The Committee notes the comments of the General Workers'

Union (UGT) annexed to the Government's report. The Committee notes that these comments repeat, in large part, the questions raised in 2006 and 2009. The UGT believes that special attention should be placed on the violations related to the registration of temporary labour contracts, to false self- and temporary employment, to illegal overtime hours and to abusive layoffs. The UGT highlights the need to intensify all inspection activities and not merely those aimed at prevention, to increase the human and material resources of the inspection service and to strengthen the capacity of inspectors to interpret legislation. Although the Union acknowledges the efforts made to increase both the number of inspectors and the technical support staff through various competitions, it is concerned that the Authority for Conditions of Work (ACT) has not, for several years, satisfied its pledge to provide the social partners with periodic information on labour inspection activities related to child labour, security, hygiene and health at work, back wages, etc.

The Government indicates that, in 2009, it gave particular attention to the function of the ACT in the context of providing information and advice to workers, employers and their representatives by way of a permanent update on its website, which contains: clarifications on some important aspects of the law; the forms related to the obligations of communication of information to the ACT; the list of self-verifications to facilitate internal monitoring relating to security and health at work, in particular in small and medium-sized industries; information on the displacement of workers in the European Union countries; frequently asked questions; and, statistical figures regarding lethal work accidents that had been the subject of ACT investigations. The Government further highlights the publication of pamphlets and books and that, in regard to the activities of information and advice, 8,355 issues were treated through email. The Committee notes, however, that the Office last received the annual report on the activities of the labour inspection services back in 2008. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that the annual report is communicated to the Office without delay and becomes available to the social partners, and that it contain information on all of the questions listed in Article 21 of the Convention and, in particular, on the violations found by the labour inspectors, specifying the legal provisions concerned. The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would submit information on the impact of the activities of information, advice and enforcement carried out by the labour inspection services on the application of the provisions concerning the conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work in the establishments covered by the Convention.

Article 7. Capacity building of labour inspectors. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government relating to the capacity building provided to labour inspectors. It notes that, in 2008, the ACT carried out 46 continuous vocational trainings directed at labour inspectors, lasting 627 hours, and that, in 2009, there were 66 activities, lasting 2,586 hours. In 2008, these activities included topics like the information system for registering inspection activities, as well as the inspection of road transportation, the participation of minors in shows and other cultural and artistic activities, temporary work, occupational safety and health in the agro-forestry sector, the manual handling of cargo, working machinery and equipment, undeclared work and other forms of irregular work and finally, the exposure to asbestos, physical risks and chemicals. In 2009, the activities directed at trainee inspectors included, in particular, modules on industrial relations, occupational safety and health, professional ethics, the legal framework and information systems. The training also continues to include general conditions of work and occupational safety and health, as well as modules on information systems. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure the training of labour inspectors in the course of their employment and, where possible, specify by district or region the precise number of inspectors who participated in training activities. Furthermore, the Committee asks the Government once again to provide information specifying how the training activities have impacted on the methods of work of the labour inspectors and their capacity to detect labour law violations.

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments of the General Union of Workers (UGT), annexed to that report.

The Committee refers the Government to the comments made under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), in regard to those matters which apply equally to the Articles of the present Convention.

Articles 6(1)(a) and (b), 22, 23 and 24 of the Convention. Prevention, prosecution and penalties for infringements in labour. The Committee notes that, according to the UGT, there has been no significant modification in the agricultural sector, which continues to be characterized by a multitude of small enterprises, with many having a familial character and a seasonal market. According to the UGT, during the period covered by the report, an intensive inspection was advanced in the agricultural sector inasmuch as, in accordance with the data laid out in the annual inspection report for 2009, this sector held the third position for recorded lethal accidents in the workplace. Preventative actions and supervision were advanced with priority given to businesses that, in the past three years, had had grave or lethal work accidents, in conformity with a measure envisaged in the National Strategy for Security and Health at Work, 2008–12. The UGT further highlights the recent ratification of the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184).

The Committee notes that according to the Government, during the implementation of Stage I of the Inspection Action Plan for security and health at work 2008–10, 130 visits were undertaken in agriculture, the agricultural farming and forestry industries in 2009, leading to 64 statements of infringements and the imposition of pecuniary sanctions. A further 323 irregular situations were noted, which led to preventative measures and the immediate suspension of labour was ordered in one case threatening the life, integrity or health of the workers.

The Committee notes, in addition, the data provided in the Government's report relating to the supervisory activities of the labour inspectorate in agriculture between 2009 and 2010. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the implementation of the National Inspection Plan for security and health at work in the agricultural sector as regards the set objective and, in particular, on the number of work accidents and cases of professional disease.

Articles 9(3) and 14. Strengthening the inspection staff numbers and training in agriculture. The Committee refers the Government to its comments in connection with Articles 9 and 10 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and once more requests the Government to provide information on any further measures adopted to strengthen the capacities of the inspection services in agriculture, as well as information on the impact of the training courses that were referenced in the Government's previous report regarding the inspectors' working methods and their capacity for detecting violations and the prevention of accidents.

Articles 26 and 27. Content and communication of the annual inspection report. The Committee notes that the annual report on the work of the inspection services in the continent for 2009 and 2010 has not been received at the ILO. It notes the succinct figures provided on the activities of the Labour Inspection in agriculture in the Autonomous Region of the Azores and the absence of corresponding information relating to the Autonomous Region of Madeira. The Committee requests the Government to transmit to the Office copies of the annual inspection report in agriculture for the continent. The Committee would be grateful, once more, if the Government would take measures to ensure that annual reports on inspection activities in agriculture in the Autonomous Regions of the Azores and of Madeira, containing information on the questions contemplated in clauses (a) to (g) of Article 27, are published and transmitted to the Office in line with Article 26.

Qatar

Articles 4, 8, 10, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Reinforcement of the labour inspection system and publication of an annual labour inspection report. The Committee notes with interest that according to the Government's report, in view of the importance of the labour inspection system and its significant role, the previous labour inspection body has been upgraded into a Labour Inspection Department by virtue of the Emir's Order No. 35 of 2009 on the organizational structure of the Ministry of Labour. In accordance with section 10 of the abovementioned Order, the Labour Inspection Department is competent to: monitor the implementation of labour laws and the general plan for labour inspection; undertake periodic and surprise inspections to workplaces so as to verify the application of the Labour Code and its implementing orders; provide advice and guidance to employers on the manner of removing violations; address warnings and draft reports of violations and submit them to the competent bodies; carry out preventive supervision of private companies and undertakings in accordance with the Labour Code and its implementing orders; undertake an evaluation of the hazards resulting from the use of dangerous products at work in coordination with relevant public bodies; verify the observance of employers' obligations regarding the payment of wages; and verify and follow up on the adoption of occupational safety and health measures. The Committee also notes from the Government's report that the labour inspection department has, in addition to the main branch in Doha, four branches distributed in the various regions so as to cover the entire territory of the country and achieve a balance in the inspection staff across undertakings.

The Committee also notes, however, once again, that an annual labour inspection report has not been received at the ILO. While taking due note of the brief statistical data provided by the Government in the annex to its report, the Committee once again recalls the importance that it attaches to compliance with the obligation of the publication and communication by the central inspection authority, within the time limits set out in Article 20, of an annual report containing useful information on each of the items covered by Article 21. Indeed, assessment of the level of application of the Convention is only possible where, in addition to legislative information, the Committee also has access to precise information on the application of the legislation in practice. Presented as suggested in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), (inspection staff, workplaces liable to inspection, persons employed therein, statistics of inspection visits, violations, penalties imposed, industrial accidents and occupational diseases), such information would shed light on the operation of the labour inspection system in relation to the requirements of the Convention and would enable the central authority to determine priorities for action and the corresponding resources. The Committee also emphasized in its general observation of 2010 that when well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and, subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide an organizational chart of the new Labour Inspection Department and specify the number of labour inspectors and their geographical distribution as well as their technical area of competence. Please also indicate whether the labour inspectorate includes women inspectors, and if so, provide information as to any specific duties entrusted to them.

The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged so that the central labour inspection authority publishes and communicates to the ILO, within the time limits set out in Article 20, a report on the activities undertaken by the services placed under its control and supervision, containing the information required by Article 21, and presented in so far as possible in the manner indicated in Paragraph 9 of Recommendation No. 81. As long as such a report is not published, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the obstacles in this regard and measures taken to address them and to provide detailed information and statistical data necessary in order to enable the Committee to appraise the activities carried out by the Labour Inspection Department in practice.

With reference to its general observation of 2009 concerning the importance of establishing and updating a register of workplaces liable to labour inspection, containing information on the number and categories of workers employed therein (Article 21(c)), the Committee particularly requests the Government to ensure that measures are taken to ensure that such a register is set up through inter-institutional cooperation and that relevant information is published in the annual labour inspection report to allow for the assessment of effective coverage of the inspection system in relation to the industrial and commercial workplaces liable to inspection. It would be grateful if the Government would provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Articles 5(a) and 21(e). Effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system. With reference to its general observation of 2007 in which it emphasized the value of effective cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the justice system, the Committee recalls from the previous report of the Government that such cooperation is carried out through an exchange of information, statistics and other data between the inspectorate and the High Judicial Council. In its latest report, the Government provides statistical information on the number of cases referred to the judicial authorities, which amounted to 333 in 2010 and 100 during the first trimester of 2011, and concerned primarily delays in the payment of wages and benefits. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the results of these judicial proceedings and to indicate any further measures taken or envisaged to reinforce the cooperation between the labour inspection and the justice system, for instance, through the creation of a system for the recording of judicial decisions that is accessible to the labour inspectorate to enable the central authority to make use of this information in pursuance of its objectives and to include it in the annual report in accordance with Article 21(e).

Articles 5(a) and (b), 14 and 21(f) and (g). Cooperation and collaboration with other public entities and employers and workers in the area of OSH. Notification and statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and prevention of their recurrence. The Committee notes with interest section 1 of the Order of 2011 adopted by the Council of Ministers which establishes the National Committee for Occupational Safety and Health (OSH). It notes that this Committee is composed of representatives from the Ministry of Labour, the Ministry of the Interior (Public Department for Civil Defence), the Ministry of the Municipality and Urban Planning, the Ministry of the Environment, the General Secretariat of the Council of Ministers, the Supreme Council for Health, the Qatar Petroleum (Department for Health, Safety and Environment), the Public Authority for Public Works, representatives acting on behalf of employers selected by the Chamber of Industry and Trade and one or more representatives acting on behalf of workers. Pursuant to section 3 of the Order, the Committee is competent to: propose a national policy as well as a national programme and system for OSH; examine the reasons for industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and propose the means which could stop their occurrence in the future; propose and revise OSH regulations and rules; propose mechanisms for the implementation of laws and regulations related to OSH; provide advisory services in the field of OSH; review the requirements for insuring against industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease; undertake studies and research related to OSH; and examine the conventions and recommendations related to OSH and make recommendations in this regard.

The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of the work of the National Committee on OSH and its impact on the implementation of the objectives of the Convention. Please also indicate the way in which the labour inspectorate cooperates with the National Committee.

Recalling from the previous report of the Government that statistics of industrial accidents were presented under various criteria including the nationality of the victims, the age group, cause of the accident, part of the body injured and the resulting incapacity rate, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the conclusions drawn and follow-up action taken in relation to these criteria.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to provide any available statistics of cases of occupational diseases and to ensure that such statistics are included in the annual labour inspection report and are used with a view to developing a relevant prevention policy. It would be grateful if the Government would provide information in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect and on any measures adopted or envisaged to ensure the follow up, through cooperation with other receiving countries in the region, of cases of occupational diseases among migrant workers, who make up the majority of the workforce engaged in workplaces liable to inspection.

Article 12(1). Extent of the right of labour inspectors to enter freely premises and workplaces liable to inspection. In its previous comment, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 7 of Ministerial Order No. 13 of 2005 in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the spirit and letter of Article 12(1)(a) of the Convention. The Government indicates that section 7 of Ministerial Order No. 13 of 2005 provides that no prior notice of an inspection visit shall be authorized under any circumstances and that upon entering the undertaking to carry out inspection duties, a labour inspector is required to notify the employer or his representative unless the inspector is of the view that the notification may harm his duties. According to the Government, this provision is in full conformity with Article 12(1) and (2).

The Committee once again recalls that as indicated in paragraph 267 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the fact that the instruments provide that inspectors should be authorized to enter workplaces without previous notice does not mean that, where deemed useful or necessary by the inspector, the employer or his or her representative cannot be informed of the time and purpose of the inspection (i.e., in advance). The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures to amend section 7 of Ministerial Order No. 13 of 2005 in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the spirit and letter of the Convention on this point so that, while being authorized to carry out inspections freely and without notice, labour inspectors may also be able to inform the employer in advance of their inspection or its purpose where they consider that such notification is useful or necessary, for instance, in order to ensure his or her presence or have access to particular documents. Please keep the ILO informed of any progress made in this regard.

Article 15(c). Obligation to treat as confidential the existence of a complaint. The Committee notes once again the information provided by the Government on the legal provisions which require labour inspectors to maintain confidentiality in relation to the author of a complaint giving rise to an inspection. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that where an inspection is carried out in response to a complaint, the inspector is required not to give any intimation of the existence of such complaint and may proceed to carry out an investigation in full discretion. Such a provision would have the effect of ensuring the protection of those lodging complaints from any reprisals by the employer or his representative.

Romania

The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Democratic Trade Unions of Romania (CSDR), received on 23 August 2010; the Block of National Trade Unions (BNS), received on 18 January 2011 and 1 September 2011; and the National Confederation of Free Trade Unions of Romania (CNSLR Frățja), received on 25 August 2010. The Committee notes the Government's reply to these comments, as well as to the comments made by the National Trade Union Confederation (CNS Cartel Alfa) in June 2009. The Committee requests the Government to make any comment it deems appropriate in relation to the latest observations by CNSLR Frățja received on 2 September 2011 along with the Government's report.

Labour law reform. The Committee notes that the Government has embarked on a reform of labour legislation, including provisions relating to the structure and the functioning of the labour inspection system, in the context of an economic program supported by the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the European Union (EU), and the World Bank. The Committee requests the Government to transmit to the ILO copies of Act No. 108/1999 on the establishment and organization of the labour inspection, as amended, Act No. 188/1999 issuing the civil service regulations, and Government Decision (GD) No. 1377/2009 regulating the organization and functioning of the labour inspection (replacing GD No. 767/1999).

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Additional functions entrusted to labour inspectors. The Committee notes the comments of the CNSLR Frățja and the CSDR according to which, following the amendment of the Regulations on the organization and functioning of the labour inspection (GD No. 1377/2009), labour inspectors have been entrusted, among other things, with the functions of conciliation and arbitration in cases of conflicts of interest. The Committee refers in this regard to paragraphs 72–74 of the General Survey of 2006 on labour inspection, in which it emphasizes that conciliation should not be among the duties of the labour inspectorate, and to Paragraph 8 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), according to which “the functions of labour inspectors should not include that of acting as conciliator or arbitrator in proceedings concerning labour disputes”. Drawing the Government's attention to the provisions of Article 3(2) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary legislative and practical measures to relieve labour inspectors of conciliation duties so that they can devote themselves fully to ensuring the application of legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers, thereby contributing to the prevention of situations giving rise to labour disputes.

The Committee also notes that the Government's report refers to the adoption of GD No. 1024/2010 approving the national strategy to reduce the incidence of undeclared work in 2010–12 and the National Action Plan for its implementation. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide copies of these documents as well as information on the activities carried out by the labour inspectorate in the area of controlling undeclared work and in particular data on the number of inspections, the violations found, legal proceedings instituted and remedies and sanctions imposed for undeclared work. It also requests the Government to indicate the impact of these activities on the implementation of the objectives of the Convention with regard to the effective enforcement of legal provisions on the conditions of work and the protection of workers.

The Committee notes that the Government refers to Protocol No. 1107/803073/2827283/2009 concluded between the labour inspection, the National Agency for Fiscal Administration and the Romanian Office for Immigration in the framework of the strategy to reduce undeclared work. The Committee also notes from the annual labour inspection report for 2009, that both in 2008 and 2009, the labour inspectorate and the Immigration Office established a cooperation plan in order to combat illegal immigration and illegal work of foreign workers. In this regard, the Committee would like to recall that as indicated in paragraphs 76–78 of its 2006 General Survey on Labour Inspection with regard to the increasing tendency to link inspections of clandestine work and irregular migration and the practice of collaboration with other Government agencies in this regard, that the primary duty of labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law. Efforts to control the use of migrant workers in an irregular situation require the mobilization of considerable resources in terms of staff, time and material resources, which inspectorates can only provide to the detriment of their primary duties. Moreover, the function of verifying the legality of employment should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection. This objective can only be met if the workers covered are convinced that the primary task of the inspectorate is to enforce the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and protection of workers and not immigration law. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged so as to ensure that the functions of enforcing immigration law are dissociated from those of controlling the observance of workers' rights. Please also specify the scope and procedures of cooperation between the labour inspectorate and the Immigration Office.

Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the manner in which the labour inspectorate ensures the discharge of the employers' obligations with regard to the statutory rights of foreign workers in an irregular situation, such as the payment of wages and other benefits due for work accomplished in the framework of the employment relationship, particularly in cases where these workers are expelled from the country.

Articles 4, 6 and 7. Supervision and control by a central authority. Qualifications and conditions of service of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that, according to the BNS, the principle of the independence of labour inspectors of any change of government and any undue external influence is seriously affected by the politicization of the labour inspectorate, which results in practice in frequent staff movements, as well as inspections in enterprises that are sometimes targeted on the basis of criteria relating to the political affiliation of employers. The CNSLR Frătia and the CSDR also refer to staff instability at central and local levels in 2009 and 2010.

The Government refutes these allegations and refers to the existence of a uniform and coherent labour inspection strategy, independent of any change of government and of any external influence, guaranteed by the permanence of the position of General State Inspector. With regard to the changes in staff positions in 2009 and 2010, the Government indicates that they were decided upon in accordance with Act No. 188 of 1999 as sanctions against officials who had been guilty of violations of the obligation of confidentiality and discretion, or who had failed to comply strictly with legal provisions during inspections.

In response to the point raised by the CNS Cartel Alfa in June 2009 concerning staff changes and replacements in relation to the executive staff of various regional inspection offices, the Government adds that Emergency Ordinances Nos 37 of 22 April 2009 and 105 of 2009, under which these measures were adopted, have been declared unconstitutional and their effects void. Consequently, the appointments of the Directors and Deputy Directors of regional offices were suspended and officials have been appointed on a temporary basis to the previous posts of Chief Inspector and Deputy Chief Inspector while awaiting for the organization of a competition to fill these posts.

The Committee understands from the above that competitions have still not taken place with a view to ending the uncertainty as to the key positions of the heads of the labour inspectorates at the regional level and ensuring that the qualifications and competence of the persons who currently hold these posts are established in a transparent manner in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention. It emphasizes that the existence of a stable central authority at the highest level of the labour inspectorate is not in itself sufficient to ensure in practice the implementation of a unified and coherent strategy in all regions. The stability of inspection personnel and conditions of service which guarantee them independence from any change of Government and any external influence are a prerequisite for the operation of an inspection system that can help to achieve the eminently important socio-economic objective assigned to this public service. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures so that competitions for executive positions in local inspectorates take place without delay and to keep the Office informed of the results. It also requests the Government to describe the criteria and procedures followed for the recruitment of labour inspection staff including executive staff (Article 7(1) of the Convention). It would be grateful if the Government would provide further information on the reasons for the changes in personnel referred to by the trade unions (number of cases where misconduct was ascertained, indication of relevant provisions in Act No. 188/1999 and decisions taken, etc.).

The CSDR also raises the question of appropriate and continuous training of inspectors and calls for the development of an appropriate strategy in this respect, which the Committee considers to be a key issue for the development of labour inspection services adapted to developments in the world of work. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the steps taken or envisaged for the elaboration of a training strategy and the frequency, content and duration of training available to labour inspectors, as well as the number of participants and the practical impact of such training (Article 7(3) of the Convention).

With regard to the policy on the remuneration of labour inspectors, the CNSLR Frătja considers that it is totally inadequate in relation to their functions and responsibilities. Furthermore, according to the CSDR, the application of recent legal provisions has resulted in a reduction in their salaries by 25 per cent. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the BNS under the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95), to the effect that these reductions were found to be constitutional. Referring also to paragraph 209 of its 2006 General Survey on Labour Inspection, the Committee recalls that although it is aware of the severe budgetary restrictions governments often face, it is bound to emphasize the importance it places on the treatment of labour inspectors in a way that reflects the importance and specificities of their duties and that takes account of personal merit. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the recent reforms on the budget allocated to the labour inspection and to indicate any measures taken or envisaged in order to improve the conditions of service of labour inspectors.

Article 5(b) of the Convention. Collaboration with employers and workers and their organizations. According to the CNSLR Frătja, it was impossible to conclude a cooperation protocol with the labour inspectorate in 2009 and 2010 due to the many changes in senior inspection personnel. Furthermore, the standard inspection procedure requires labour inspectors to invite only employers' representatives to assist on the occasion of inspections, but not workers' representatives. The Government indicates in this regard that the labour inspectorate, irrespective of the authority in charge, has always been open to the social partners for the conclusion of cooperation protocols. The Government refers in this respect to the protocols concluded in recent years with the CNSLR Frătja, the CDSR and the BSN, namely Protocols Nos 1808/669/04.10.2010 and 1886/1420/18.10.2010. In this respect, the Committee notes the CSDR's view that the Labour Inspection Board should include, at the central and regional levels, representatives of both employers and trade unions in order to achieve effective collaboration. The Committee asks the Government to provide copies of the cooperation protocols concluded between the labour inspectorate and employers' and workers' representatives and to describe in greater detail the arrangements for collaboration between the labour inspectorate and the social partners. It also requests the Government to indicate the composition of the Labour Inspection Board and its activities during the period covered by the next report.

Articles 10, 11 and 16. Human resources and material means available to the labour inspection. According to the CNSLR Frătja and the CSDR, the total labour inspection staff (including public employees and contractual staff) now amounts to 3,236 persons, due to personnel reductions which took place in 2010 and the closure of the social inspection and social inclusion department within the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes that both trade unions deplore the inadequacy of the number of labour inspectors which, according to the CSDR, prevents them from carrying out their functions.

The Committee notes the tables provided by the Government on the general structure of the personnel and the distribution of labour inspectors by rank at central and local levels, including those engaged in supervision in the field of safety and health, disaggregated by economic sector. It also notes that with regard to the material means available to labour inspectors for the performance of their duties, the Government indicates that it spent a considerable amount in 2009 on equipment and transport facilities for the central and regional offices, but acknowledges that no additional resources were allocated for that purpose in 2010. Drawing attention to the socio-economic importance of the objectives assigned to the labour inspection services, the Committee urges the Government to endeavour to the fullest possible extent to ensure that the human resources allocated to the labour inspectorate are sufficient for the effective exercise of its functions (Article 10). The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of any measure taken or envisaged in this regard.

Article 15(c). Confidentiality of the source of complaints. The Committee notes the observation made by the CNSLR Frătja that labour inspectors carrying out inspections frequently reveal the authors of complaints, leading to dramatic consequences for the latter. The trade union ascribes this to the lack of a provision in the law sanctioning breaches of confidentiality by labour inspectors. Recalling that the issue of breaches of confidentiality was raised previously by the BNS in comments sent to the ILO in January 2004, the Government is requested to provide detailed information on the measures taken or envisaged, in order to ensure that labour inspectors comply with the confidentiality requirement set out in the law with respect to the existence and source of any complaint.

Articles 13, 17 and 18. Prevention and enforcement measures. The Committee notes that, according to the statistics on inspection activities provided by the Government in its report, the number of inspections, the number of enterprises inspected and the number of sanctions applied by the labour inspectorate continued to increase in 2009 and 2010. The Government indicates that the number of penalties applied increased because of the failure of employers to give effect to the measures ordered by labour inspectors. The Committee also notes an increase in the number of occasions on which work was stopped in cases of failure to comply with the measures ordered to protect the health and safety of workers. The Committee refers in this regard to the comment of the CSDR concerning the lack of preventive activities targeting safety and health at work before employment accidents actually occur. It also notes the acknowledgement by the Government that it has still not given full effect to Article 13(2) of the Convention, under the terms of which labour inspectors shall have the right to apply to the competent authority for the issuance of orders or for the initiation of measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers.

The Committee understands that stoppages of work and the shutting down of activities generally occur in situations where an accident has already occurred. It wishes to emphasize that the intention of Article 13 of the Convention is to empower labour inspectors to take steps with a view to remedying defects observed in plant, lay-out or working methods which they have reasonable cause to believe constitute a threat to the health and safety of the workers. The provisions of this Article are not intended to punish employers responsible for violations, but to ensure the elimination of the causes of risks with a view to preventing accidents.

The Committee also recalls that where an employer fails to comply with measures ordered on the occasion of an inspection, in accordance with Article 13, the labour inspector should be empowered to make use of Article 17, which is also applicable in areas other than occupational safety and health, and involves such measures as prompt legal proceedings without previous warning or, where appropriate, warnings and advice. The Committee emphasizes in this regard that routine inspections are indispensable to give full effect to Article 13, which would avoid or reduce the need to make use of the powers provided for in Article 17. The Committee requests the Government to take the opportunity of the ongoing legislative reforms in order to adopt all necessary measures giving full effect to Article 13 and to keep the ILO informed of the progress made to this end. In the light of the above explanations, the Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide statistics of routine inspections and verification inspections in industrial and commercial workplaces, as well as clarifications on the inspection actions falling under both Articles 13 and 17 of the Convention. With reference to its previous observation, the Committee also once again requests the Government to supply information on court decisions issued during the next reporting period following prosecutions instituted at the initiative of the labour inspectorate, with an indication of the branches of activity and the legal provisions concerned.

Rwanda

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 16, 19, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Application of the Convention in the framework of the decentralization of labour inspection. The Committee takes note of Act No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 on regulating labour in Rwanda which contains provisions on the functions and powers of labour inspectors.

In its previous comments, the Committee expressed concern at the risk of weakening the labour inspection system following the decentralization of its functions and responsibilities as long as the decentralization was not accompanied by the transfer of corresponding resources, as well as by measures ensuring equal protection for the workers concerned throughout the territory.

The Committee notes that according to the Government's report: (i) the state budget for labour inspectors has been decentralized at district level and is now determined at that level; (ii) labour inspectors at district level, currently in the number of one inspector per district, are placed under the supervision of the prefect or the mayor; (iii) the labour inspectorate is to remain "dependent" on the Labour Directorate at national level (section 157 of Act No. 13/2009) which is in fact composed of a single National Labour Inspector and has an obligation to assist labour inspectors through capacity building, technical supervision, training, transport, logistical facilities and communication; and (iv) the recruitment of labour inspectors is to take place at district level.

The Committee observes once again with concern that such a reform contravenes seriously the requirements of the Convention, in particular with regard to important provisions such as Articles 1, 4, 19, 20 and 21, since in each district a single labour inspector is placed under a local authority which does not have the specific competence necessary to supervise technically or ethically the performance of labour inspection activities.

With regard to Articles 10 and 11 of the Convention relating to human resources and material means to allow an efficient functioning of the labour inspection system, the Committee once again recalls that according to paragraph 140 of the 2006 General Survey, the decentralization of the labour inspection system (in the form of the designation of a central authority in each constituent unit of a federal State) may be acceptable under Article 4 only if these units have the budgetary resources necessary for implementing the functions of the labour inspectorate within their respective jurisdictions. In this case, the decentralization of labour inspection means its dismantlement as it happens in the framework of a situation characterized by a general and chronic inadequacy of resources, with the risk that available resources differ substantially from one province to another, thus influencing not only the volume and quality of inspection activities, but also the ability of inspectors and local inspection offices to fulfil their obligations to report to the Minister, as envisaged in Article 19, so as to allow for the exercise of his/her prerogatives in respect of supervision for the purposes of a general assessment through the annual report requested by Articles 20 and 21. Finally, any instruction of a policy or technical nature addressed by the Minister of Labour to the provincial labour inspectors with a view, among other things, to ensuring consistency among provinces, strongly risks remaining a dead letter in case the budget allocated to labour inspection depends on the decision of the local prefect or mayor.

The Committee also emphasizes that the provision of adequate budgetary resources is essential to ensuring that inspection staff is composed of public officials whose status and conditions of service are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences (Article 6).

The Committee requests the Government to take all necessary measures without delay for the establishment of a functioning system of labour inspection placed under the control of a central authority and endowed with resources determined on the basis of a needs assessment (number and geographical distribution of workplaces liable to labour inspection, numbers of the workforce occupied therein, major branches of activities, etc.) in the framework of the national budget and, where needed, by recourse to external cooperation. The Committee requests the Government to report in detail to the ILO on the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. Reporting obligations on the activities of the labour inspection services. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the Saint Vincent and the Grenadines Labour Market Information System has been established with technical assistance provided by the ILO Office in Port of Spain and contains statistics on labour inspection, such as the number and causes of complaints, the number of inspection visits per sector, employment injuries and decisions of the Hearing Officer and tribunal decisions.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the new system will allow the labour inspection central authority to publish and communicate to the ILO in the very near future and on an annual basis a report on the work of the services placed under its supervision and control, containing the information indicated in items (a)–(g) of Article 21. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate any progress made and any difficulties encountered in this regard. The Committee draws once again the Government's attention to the guidance provided in Paragraph 9 of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), as to the type of information that should be included in annual labour inspection reports.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Sao Tome and Principe

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 14 of the Convention. Information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes the Government's commitment, in response to its previous comments, to making every possible effort to ensure that the labour inspectorate is informed of industrial accidents and occupational diseases. It asks the Government to provide in its next report information on the procedures introduced and the specific measures taken to this effect.

Articles 19, 20 and 21. Inspection activity reports. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on measures taken to ensure the publication and communication to the ILO of an annual report on the work of the labour inspectorate. It therefore asks the Government to take, in the very near future and with ILO technical assistance if necessary, measures to ensure that the central inspection authority fulfils its obligations under Articles 20 and 21, on the basis of regular inspection reports submitted to it, in accordance with Article 19, by the services under its control. The Committee asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this respect and to provide in its next report any available information on inspection visits carried out during the period covered and on the results of these visits (including, in particular, details of the number and categories of inspected establishments, the contraventions reported, the measures prescribed, and the penalties imposed and effectively enforced).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Saudi Arabia

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

Articles 2, 3, 10 and 21 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspection system. The Committee takes note of the discussion held in the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2011), on the application of the Convention by Saudi Arabia. It notes that in its conclusions, the Conference Committee emphasized the importance of the statistical information requested under Article 21 of the Convention to enable an objective evaluation to be made of the extent to which the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers are respected (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). The Committee further stressed the importance of statistical information on the conditions of work of migrant workers, in view of the predominance of migrant workers in the labour market. Drawing the Government's attention to the vulnerability of migrant workers, the Conference Committee finally called on the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that the labour inspectorate was able to guarantee, through both promotional and enforcement action, that the rights of migrant workers were being effectively protected.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, and in accordance with what the Government representative stated before the Conference Committee, measures have been taken and others are envisaged to strengthen the efficiency, efficacy and coverage of the labour inspection system. It notes in particular with interest the information concerning: (i) the recent recruitment of 1,000 inspectors, now undergoing training; (ii) the establishment of a standardized electronic database making available detailed statistics on labour inspection matters; (iii) the strengthening of the labour inspectorate's power; and (iv) the 20 per cent wage increase of labour inspectors. Furthermore, pursuant to the recommendations of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Government submitted a request of technical assistance to the ILO for the organization of a tripartite seminar on international labour standards, particularly Convention No. 81, in which the labour inspectors will participate.

The Committee also takes note of the annual report on labour inspection activities for 2009–10, provided at the request of the Conference Committee. It notes that the infringements reported and the penalties imposed by the labour inspectorate seem mainly to concern provisions of the Labour Code dealing with the promotion of the employment of Saudi workers (the “Saoudization” of employment) and the validity of migrant workers’ work permits. Referring to paragraph 78 of its 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the Committee recalls that the primary duty of the labour inspectors is to protect workers and not to enforce immigration law. The fact that labour inspection in general has the power to enter establishments without prior authorization allows it more easily than other institutions to put an end to abusive working conditions of which foreign workers in an irregular situation are often the victim, and to ensure that workers benefit from recognized rights. The function of verifying the legality of employment should therefore have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers if it is to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the ILO informed of progress made during the period covered by the next report, thanks to the action undertaken to strengthen the labour inspectorate, including with the technical assistance of the ILO, in terms of the effective application of the statutory provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of all workers without distinction.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide in its next report detailed data, especially on the workplaces liable to labour inspection and the number of workers employed there, the number of visits, as well as the number of infringements and penalties imposed, while specifying the subject of the statutory provisions to which they refer. Finally, it asks the Government to provide information on the activities jointly carried out by the labour inspection services and other public authorities if applicable.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Senegal

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report does not reflect any tangible progress in the application of the Convention, and provides no precise information in response to the Committee’s previous comments on the measures requested with a view to:

- (i) bringing labour legislation into conformity with Article 12(1)(a) and (2) of the Convention, as regards the investigation powers of labour inspectors, and with Article 13(2)(b) concerning powers (direct or indirect) to adopt measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of workers;
- (ii) revising the fines applicable for contraventions of the law under the Convention (Articles 3(1)(a) and 18);
- (iii) effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the justice system in order to enhance the credibility of inspections (Article 5(b));
- (iv) improving the status of labour inspectors, their staffing levels, qualifications and the means of action available to them (Articles 6, 7, 10 and 11);
- (v) establishing and updating a register of industrial and commercial workplaces subject to labour inspection (Articles 2, 10 and 21(c));
- (vi) gradually creating the conditions for publication by the central inspection authority of an annual report on the activities of the services under its authority (Articles 19 and 20).

In addition, five years after the promulgation of Decree No. 2006-1253 of 15 November 2006 establishing an occupational medical inspection service, no such service has been set up and the necessary consultations between the public authorities concerned have not taken place.

The Committee also notes with concern the blatant discrepancy between the insignificant number of labour inspections carried out by labour inspectors and controllers and the multitude of other tasks which they have carried out in areas such as conciliation, employment or administrative services. According to data provided by the Directorate of Labour Statistics and Social Security and cited by the Government, during 2009, only 329 inspections were carried out at workplaces by the 57 inspectors and 63 controllers, or on average three inspections per official per year, which included inspection visits made in response to the 199 recorded workplace accidents and visits that may have been made at agricultural enterprises.

Over the same period, the inspectors and controllers conducted 866 conciliation proceedings, examined 48 collective disputes, and intervened to support the conclusion of 435 voluntary departure agreements, registered 2,833 applications for employment, carried out 362 placements of job seekers, and carried out other tasks unconnected with the function of inspection. As the subject of the 136 written consultations and 8,132 oral consultations was not indicated, it is not possible to state how many of those concerned issues pertaining to the scope of this Convention.

According to paragraph 69 of the Committee's 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, the labour inspection instruments do not rule out the possibility of labour inspectors being assigned other promotional tasks by legislation or national practice, in addition to those inherent in their primary duties, but any further duties which may be entrusted to labour inspectors must not be such as to interfere with the effective discharge of their primary duties or to prejudice in any way the authority and impartiality which are necessary to inspectors in their relations with employers and workers (Article 3(2)). That is because the primary duties as defined in paragraph 1 of the same Article are complex and require training, time, resources and a wide freedom of action and movement. Those functions all share the same objective: enforcement and improvement of the legislation relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers while engaged in their work (paragraph 70). The Committee has specifically expressed the view that "assigning conciliation and mediation in collective labour disputes to a specialized body or officials enables labour inspectors to carry out their supervisory function more consistently" and that this "should result in better enforcement of the legislation and hence a lower incidence of labour disputes" (paragraph 74).

Returning to the insignificant number of inspection activities carried out by inspectors in workplaces covered by the Convention, the Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to the fact that frequent and thorough inspection visits are the primary means of effectively enforcing the relevant legal provisions on working conditions and protection of workers (Article 16). Consequently, the staff and resources at the disposal of the inspection service should be devoted mainly to that activity, which also enables inspectors to supply technical information and advice to employers and workers and to bring to the notice of the competent authority defects or abuses not specifically covered by existing legal provisions (Article 3(1)(b) and (c)).

The Committee notes the Government's expression of willingness to fulfil its obligations under the Convention and hopes that it will be in a position soon to adopt specific measures to that end. The information contained in its report, because of its lack of precision, does not reflect any significant evolution in law or in practice as regards the labour inspection system.

For example, as regards a question as crucial as the staffing of the labour inspection service, the Government indicates that this has not changed since 2009, as there has been no new recruitment without providing any information on the measures envisaged in order to fill vacancies due to retirement. As regards the conditions of service of inspection staff, the Government indicates that their subsistence allowances have been increased but does not indicate by how much, and does not provide any relevant text so as to enable the Committee to assess the impact of the increase in relation to inflation. While noting that, according to the Government, all the labour inspection services are now provided with official vehicles, fuel and working computers, the Committee recalls that the Government provides no details that might shed light on the possible benefits accruing from those measures, in particular in terms of more frequent inspection visits and the use of computers to record the outcome of such visits.

The Committee therefore once again draws the Government's attention to the following points:

Article 13(2)(b). Measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend the legislation so that it is in full conformity with this provision, according to which labour inspectors should be able to order or apply for the issue of orders on measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers.

Articles 18 and 21(e). Adequate nature and effective enforcement of penalties for violations. The Committee requests the Government to refer to paragraphs 291–306 of the abovementioned General Survey and to take measures as a matter of urgency to ensure the establishment of an effective system of penalties taking into account the nature and seriousness of the violation committed, as well as, according to the circumstances, the employer's general attitude towards its legal obligations, so as to ensure that the penalties are sufficiently dissuasive and help to ensure more effective enforcement.

The Committee once again requests the Government to describe the measures taken and to provide the most detailed numerical data possible on any contraventions noted, penalties applied and their impact in terms of the implementation of legislation and of safety and health requirements.

Articles 6, 7, 9 and 10. Labour inspectorate staff, status and qualifications; cooperation with technical experts and specialists. Referring to the statement contained in the Government's report received in March 2010, to the effect that the question of remuneration and career prospects of labour inspectors was under study, the Committee once again requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of the process of adopting the status and conditions of service of labour inspectors, as well as of any measures taken in this regard. It also requests the Government to ensure that the provisions regarding the conditions of service of inspection staff (pay, subsistence allowances, and protection of staff) are at least equivalent to those applicable to other categories of public officials with comparable duties and responsibilities, that is, sufficiently appealing to attract and retain qualified and motivated persons. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate any relevant text or report.

The Government is also requested to provide more detailed information on the subject areas, type and duration of training given to inspectors and controllers in order to adapt their competences to the new labour market conditions, and to indicate the number of participants in such training. If no measures have been adopted in that regard, the Committee requests the Government to initiate a process for that purpose and to keep the ILO informed.

The Committee also requests the Government to communicate in its next report detailed replies including precise figures on the manner in which effect is given in practice to Articles 10 (as requested by the report form), 11, 16 and 19, and to indicate the measures adopted to set up the medical inspection service established by Decree No. 2006-1253 of 15 November 2006.

The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the possibility and benefits of obtaining technical assistance from the ILO in seeking solutions, including in the framework of international financial cooperation, with a view to establishing a labour inspection system that meets the social and economic objectives which come under its remit and the functioning of which would be reflected in the annual activity report required under Articles 20 and 21.

Serbia

The Committee notes the observations made by the Trade Union Confederation "NEZAVISNOST", which were annexed to the Government's report as well as by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 31 August 2011. It requests the Government to communicate any comment it deems relevant in this regard.

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments and that the annual reports of the labour inspectorate for the years 2008, 2009 and 2010, communicated by the Government, contain general information on some of the questions raised but do not allow for a full assessment of the effect given to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a detailed reply to the Committee's previous comments which read as follows:

Article 3(1)(a) and (c) and (2) of the Convention. Action against illegal employment, and monitoring of legislation relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the labour inspectorate's priority for a number of years had been the fight against illegal employment and emphasized that the exercise of such a function by the labour inspectorate should have as its corollary the reinstatement of the statutory rights of all the workers in order to be compatible with the objective of labour inspection. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its latest report to the effect that the fight against illegal labour is part of the European Union Accession Strategy and the Strategy on Poverty Reduction and focuses on industries where unregistered workers – mostly young and unqualified workers or older workers over 40 years – are most dominant (hotel/restaurant/cafe and tourism, trade, civil engineering and artisan and personal services). The Government adds that illegal employment is primarily due to a transition from public companies towards a huge number of small and medium-sized private enterprises, which has led to an aggravation of working conditions, often with regard to high-risk jobs (e.g. engineering). This is why the Government is of the view that it is important to carry out regular and intensified inspection. The Government specifies that, where illegal employment has been detected, the employer is ordered to sign employment contracts and charges are pressed against employers in cases where more than one irregular worker is hired; as a result, the number of signed employment contracts and workers reported for compulsory social security coverage usually increases after the inspection is carried out. In order to address key legislative obstacles in this regard, the labour inspectorate has, among other things, proposed amendments to applicable regulations that would require the registration of signed employment contracts and improve the procedure for registration of workers in compulsory social security schemes under section 144 of the Pension and Disability Insurance Act.

Taking due note of the Government's statement that the fight against illegal employment aims among other things at the "formalization" of employment relations so as to prevent a deterioration of conditions of work and that this has led to an increase of the number of signed employment contracts and workers reported for compulsory social security coverage, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide statistical data illustrating the improvements made in the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to conditions of work and the protection of workers through the activities of the labour inspectorate in the framework of the fight against illegal employment.

Article 3(1)(b). Preventive role of the labour inspectorate in the field of occupational safety and health. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government on various activities relative to cooperation with services and institutions dealing with prevention during the period under review, including the organization of 15 round tables on risk assessment throughout the country from 20 to 24 October 2008, with an active participation of representatives from trade unions, employers' organizations, chambers of commerce, and experts in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would continue to provide information on any action relative to cooperation with all the services and institutions dealing with prevention, including the social partners, the intensification of media campaigns, particularly in high-risk sectors, and the development of promotional material for public information.

Recalling that in its previous comments the Committee had welcomed the implementation of a new policy regarding health and safety in small and medium-sized enterprises, according to which regular inspection visits would focus on prevention through information and education, the Committee also requests the Government to indicate the part of regular inspection visits targeted at small and medium-sized enterprises, and to provide information on information and education campaigns addressed at such enterprises.

Articles 5(a) and 18. Effective cooperation of labour inspection services with government institutions and with the judicial system. Adequate penalties imposed and effectively enforced. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to comments by the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia, according to which the system of penalties against employers is not efficient. The Committee notes that the Government refers in its latest report to the pronouncement of sentences far below the minimum foreseen by the law which constitutes an obstacle to the proper and full application of the penal provisions envisaged under the Labour Law and the Law on Safety and Health at Work (OSH Law). The Government's report also refers to the need to accelerate judicial procedures so as to overcome related problems with regard to the statute of limitations.

According to the Government, the labour inspectorate organized expert meetings and consultations between the labour inspectorate and bodies responsible for criminal prosecution in Serbia, both at the first instance and at the level of the Council for Criminal Offences. The need to further intensify the cooperation between these bodies was underlined in these meetings with a view to overcoming problems in the duration of the criminal procedures and the amount of the penalties imposed. The importance of exchange of data between municipal bodies and prosecution councils on the collection of fines was also stressed so as to ensure the harmonization and alignment of databases and monitor the economic effects of inspections as well as the efficiency of penal policy. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide statistical data on the average duration of proceedings and the average amount of penalties imposed for violations of the Labour Law and the OSH Law as well as information on the impact of the steps taken in order to overcome problems in the duration of proceedings, the amount of fines and their effective enforcement. The Committee would also like to request the Government to continue to provide information on any further steps taken or envisaged in order to ensure effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the judicial authorities.

According to the Government, in 2008, 60 requests for the institution of criminal proceedings were filed by the labour inspectorate in relation to offences which apparently concerned only the area of OSH. Recalling that the functions of the labour inspectorate are not limited to the enforcement of the OSH legislation (the OSH Law) but also include the enforcement of legal provisions and advice relating to the conditions of work under the Labour Law, the Committee requests the Government to specify in its next report the manner in which the labour inspectorate addresses violations of legal provisions on hours of work, wages, the employment of children and young persons and other connected matters and the number of proceedings instituted for such violations.

Article 7(3). Adequate initial and further training of labour inspectors. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the comments of the Union of Employers of Serbia, according to which, following the restructuring of the labour inspectorate as a single body, labour inspectors were not provided with adequate training to perform both legal and technical supervision. According to the Government's report, the labour inspectorate launched in 2008 a modernization process to be delivered through internal training in three phases so as to enable labour inspectors to undertake integrated inspections. In this framework, an inspection methodology was designed and all inspectors gained adequate knowledge in areas in which they had not yet performed inspections (e.g. engineers in the field of labour relations, lawyers in the field of safety and health at work, etc.). The Committee would be grateful if the Government would communicate additional information as to the number of participants in the training sessions, their duration, the topics covered and the evaluation of the results. It also requests the Government to continue to furnish information on further periodical training for labour inspectors.

Articles 12(1) and 18. Penalties for obstructing labour inspectors in the performance of their duties, particularly with regard to their right of free entry in establishments. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of comments by the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia, according to which labour inspectors were occasionally denied the right to enter a workplace for inspection purposes, particularly in new private enterprises. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the 2005 Labour Law and the 2005 OSH Law contain an obligation for the employer to allow the labour inspector to access facilities and premises at any time when occupied by workers, and, should it occur that the labour inspector is prevented from undertaking inspections, the labour inspectorate should address the Ministry of the Interior, which will enable unobstructed inspection with the assistance of the police. Keeping in mind that section 273(10) of the Labour Law and section 69, paragraph 1(32), of the OSH Law set fines in cases where a labour inspector is prevented from conducting an inspection, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate if any acts of obstruction were reported by labour inspectors to the central inspection authority and, if so, to describe the penalties imposed and the proceedings followed to ensure their effective enforcement in conformity with Article 18 of the Convention.

Article 5(a), 14 and 21(f) and (g). Notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. In its previous comments the Committee took note of difficulties in the actual system of notification and registration of occupational accidents and diseases, despite the existence of a legal obligation for the employer to notify these under section 50 of the OSH Law. The Government's report contains a list of steps that are necessary to ensure effective prevention of occupational accidents and diseases, including coordination of all services, institutions and individuals who work on the prevention of occupational accidents; intensified media campaigns, brochures aimed at promoting a national prevention culture in the field of safety and health at work; the introduction of a continuous data processing practice in all departments and institutions working in the area of OSH; as well as an efficient national system for recording and collecting data on occupational accidents and diseases. With regard to the latter, the Government indicates that the Serbian Institution for Occupational Medicine and Radiology "Dr Dragomir Krajovic" (under the Ministry of Health) is implementing a project on the development of a register for occupational accidents and on the identification, reporting and registration of occupational diseases. Working groups, in which representatives of the labour inspectorate have taken active part, were established in order to consider proposals for a new list of occupational diseases and an efficient registration system for occupational accidents.

The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the 1996 ILO code of practice on the recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases which could offer guidance in this framework. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged in order to strengthen the efficiency of the system for recording and notifying occupational accidents and diseases, including through the adoption of a new list of occupational diseases and a better collaboration of all institutions concerned for that purpose.

Articles 20 and 21. Communication and content of the annual report. In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the detailed information contained in the annual report on the labour inspection activities for 2007 and requested additional information including on the total number of industrial and commercial establishments under the supervision of the labour inspectorate and the number of workers employed therein. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government as to the number of establishments subject to labour inspection (318,540 businesses of which 10,056 are legal entities and 33,592 are individual entrepreneurs engaged in industrial activities as well as 35,738 legal entities and 72,703 entrepreneurs engaged in the trade sector). Drawing the Government's attention to its 2009 general observation on the importance of statistics on workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers covered as a basis for assessing the effectiveness of the labour inspection system and its needs, the Committee takes due note of the Government's indication that, in its future annual reports, the labour inspectorate will provide statistical data on the number of registered companies engaged in industrial and commercial activities as well as on the number of workers employed therein.

The Committee also notes however, that no further annual report on the labour inspection activities was received. It recalls that, according to Article 20, the annual report should be published by the central authority and duly forwarded to the ILO within a reasonable time after its publication. The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that the annual report on the labour inspection activities is forwarded to the ILO on an ongoing basis in accordance with Article 20 and that it contains information on the items listed in Article 21. In particular, in order to assess the coverage of labour inspection, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would also indicate in its next report, in addition to the information usually provided in the annual report, the total number of industrial and commercial establishments under the supervision of the labour inspectorate and the number of workers employed therein (clause (c)), the statistics of inspections carried out (clause (d)), and statistics on the outcome of judicial procedures and penalties imposed (clause (e)).

Sri Lanka

Articles 3, 8, 10, 11, 16, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Functioning of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the impact of the restructuring of the labour inspection system on the effective discharge of the labour inspection functions has not been evaluated yet. Nevertheless, the Government provides information on the number of workplaces liable to inspection (a total of 86,619), including information on their distribution by economic sector, and the number of workers employed therein (a total of 345,730).

The Committee notes the Government's statement at the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference according to which further assistance is needed, particularly to help inspectors deal with the challenges of outsourcing, occupational safety and health (OSH), and working conditions in the informal economy. According to the Government, an intensive training programme for the numerous newly recruited labour inspectors is urgently needed. The Government also emphasized the need to use new technologies to assist labour inspection activities, especially in export processing zones (EPZs) (source: ILC 2011 Provisional Record No. 19, page 14). The Committee notes that ILO technical assistance is given in this framework for the training of labour inspectors.

The Committee also notes that according to the Government's report and the annual inspection report, the number of inspections in factories has slightly decreased (from 4,197 in 2008/2009 to 4,074 in 2010/2011) even though the number of the staff of the labour inspectorate has continued to increase (from 544 officers in 2009 to 608 officers in 2011). It also observes that the Government has not yet provided any information on inspection visits in EPZs or the number of inspection visits in the different economic sectors even though it indicates that initial steps have been taken for the collection of data on this question and that labour inspectors can enter freely workplaces, including in EPZs without prior approval or notice to the Board of Investment.

The Committee once again asks the Government to provide detailed information on the impact of the restructuring of the labour inspection system on the effective discharge of labour inspection functions, including in EPZs, as soon as it is available.

The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of progress made in the collection of data and once again reiterates its requests under Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention for the publication of an annual inspection report containing information and data on the number of inspection visits in different sectors, including in EPZs; the violations detected and the penalties imposed with reference to the legal provisions concerned; cases brought to the courts and outcomes of the proceedings; number and subject of complaints investigated and results obtained.

Noting the information provided by the Government on the training of labour inspectors, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide details in this regard and to indicate the impact of the technical assistance provided by the ILO in this area.

Recalling also from its previous comments that the Government had referred to the need for ILO technical assistance in relation to data collection, the Committee requests the Government to indicate any formal steps taken for the provision of such assistance and to indicate whether further assistance is needed in other areas.

Noting also that the number of female inspectors has further increased to 227 out of 608 labour inspectors (from 154 out of 544), the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the impact of the recruitment of female labour inspectors in terms of the effective discharge of labour inspection functions in sectors with a predominantly female workforce, such as the textile sector, and to keep the ILO informed of progress made in terms of the further recruitment of female staff.

Finally, recalling that the number of labour inspectors increased, among other things, through the absorption of 178 field officers entrusted with the enforcement of the Employees' Provident Fund Act (i.e. the social security law covering the private sector), the Committee notes with interest the figures provided on the number of cases filed and considerable amounts to be recovered for violations of the Act, and once again requests the Government to indicate the progress made in recovering social security contributions.

Article 11(1)(b). Travelling expenses. The Committee notes with interest that the travelling allowance for labour inspectors, previously criticized as being inadequate by the Lanka Jathika Estate Workers' Union (LJEWU) and the National Trade Union Federation (NTUF), has been increased from 10 Sri Lankan rupees (LKR) per mile (approximately US$0.09) to LKR12 per mile (approximately US$0.108) by Public Administration Circular (PAC) No. 9 of 2010. However, PAC No. 9 of 2010, attached to the Government's report, still provides for limitations on the mileage that is reimbursed, while it allows for exceptions in special cases to be decided upon by the Commissioner General of Labour. For example, the monthly reimbursement limit for a Labour Officer (District) is set at LKR5,750 (approximately US$52,17), which the Committee understands to mean that labour inspectors at that grade are reimbursed for travel for up to 483 miles per month. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the circumstances in which travel costs exceeding those set out in PAC No. 9 of 2010 are reimbursed. If available, please provide a copy of a reimbursement form and information on the average length of procedures for reimbursement.

Articles 3, 7, 9, 13, 14, 17, 21(f) and (g). Role of the labour inspectorate in the field of occupational safety and health. Statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. Recalling from its previous comments, the observations made by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) (WCL now merged into the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)) and the NTUF on the persistent shortage of factory inspecting engineers, medical officers and occupational hygienists to carry out routine inspections in industrial enterprises. With regard to the commitment made by the Government in previous reports to develop the prevention side of labour inspection in the framework of the restructuring of the labour inspection system, the Committee notes with interest that according to the Government, section 100 of the Factories Ordinance No. 45 of 1942 (FO) has been consolidated in order to make provision for the maintenance of health, safety and welfare of workers in factories and that the OSH staff has increased from 27 to 42, now encompassing 38 factory inspecting engineers, two medical officers and two research officers in order to carry out routine inspections in the various industrial sectors.

The Committee notes that the annual report of the labour inspection service for 2010 and 2011 provides no information on the activities of the labour inspectorate in the field of occupational safety and health, and indicates that no industrial accidents have been notified under the Factory Ordinance No. 45 of 1942, despite the fact that the same report also provides data on the total number of fatal accidents. The Committee notes from this data that fatal accidents have risen from 49 in 2008 to 62 in 2010 and non-fatal accidents have decreased from 1,525 in 2008 to 1,456 in 2010. It notes the Government's statement that both fatal and non-fatal accidents are likely to be much higher due to deficiencies in reporting as well as the lack of coverage of the informal sector. Finally, the Committee notes that no information has been provided on the number of cases of occupational disease.

The Committee would like to recall that the activities of the labour inspectorate in the area of occupational safety and health should focus both on securing the enforcement of the relevant legislation (Article 3(1)(a)) and preventing industrial accidents and occupational diseases including through the provision of technical information and advice (Article 3(1)(b)), as well as measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of workers (Article 13(2)(b)). The Committee would like to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the establishment of a system that ensures access of the labour inspectorate to information on industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease (Article 14) is essential to the development of the prevention policy to which the Government has committed itself in the framework of the restructuring of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that even though sections 61 and 63 of the FO clearly indicate the cases and circumstances in which such incidents are to be notified to the District Factory Inspecting Engineer, it is essential in order for such a system to function effectively in practice, that comprehensive regulations exist on the procedure for notification and the penalties that apply in the event of negligence. In this regard, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the ILO code of practice on the recording and notification of occupational accidents and diseases which offers guidance on the collection, recording and notification of reliable data and the effective use of such data for preventive action (available at www.ilo.org/safework/normative/codes/lang-en/docName--WCMS_107800/index.htm). The Committee also wishes to emphasize that labour inspectors can inform and sensitize employers and workers about the importance of notifying industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease so as to encourage compliance with the relevant legal provisions in pursuance of Article 3(1)(b) and of Paragraphs 6 and 7 of Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81).

The Committee once again requests the Government to provide detailed information on the labour inspection activities carried out in the area of OSH, including the adoption of measures with immediate executory force in the event of imminent danger to the health or safety of the workers. It also asks the Government, once again, to provide information on the difficulties encountered in enforcing OSH legislation vis-à-vis employers pursuant to the comments previously made by the NTUF.

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the labour inspectorate is duly informed of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and that relevant statistics are included in the annual labour inspection report, in accordance with Article 21(f) and (g), if possible in the manner indicated in Paragraph 9(f) and (g) of Recommendation No. 81.

The Committee finally requests the Government, once again, to provide information on any arrangement to associate technical experts and specialists from the National Institute of Occupational Safety and Health with the work of the labour inspectorate for the purpose of securing the enforcement of the legal provisions relating to the protection of the health and safety of workers and investigating the effects of processes, materials and methods of work on the health and safety of workers.

Articles 17 and 18. Amendments to legislative acts concerning enforcement procedures and dissuasive sanctions. The Committee previously noted that steps had been taken to update the fines and penal provisions in all legislative acts relating to conditions of work and had asked the Government to keep the ILO informed of the progress made in the adoption of the relevant bills. In this regard, it notes that amendments to the Industrial Disputes Act (IDA) have been approved by the Cabinet of Ministers and that the bill has been submitted to Parliament. Further, it notes the Government's indication that initial steps have been taken for the envisaged amendments to be introduced in the Wages Boards Ordinance so as to facilitate enforcement in cases of subcontracted work. The Committee asks the Government to continue to keep the ILO informed of any progress made in the adoption of the relevant bills, including with regard to the Shop and Office Employees' Act, the Maternity Benefits Ordinance, and the Termination of Employment of Workmen (Special Provisions) Act.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Suriname

Articles 3(1)(a) and (b) and 5(b) of the Convention. Labour inspection activities in the area of occupational safety and health. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it will analyse the reasons for the increase in the number of accidents and take the necessary measures. The labour inspectors have taken the necessary steps to begin the occupational safety and health training of contractors in mines, construction and the public service. The Committee would be grateful if the Government could provide information on the training programmes carried out and on any other measures taken to cope with the increasing number of serious or fatal occupational accidents, and on their impact on the reduction in the number of these accidents, by providing in particular statistical data and any other documents that might serve to assess the situation.

Article 7. Training of labour inspectors. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, a centre for the further training of labour inspectors has been operating since 2010, and a training programme for inspectors and employers was held on ways to combat AIDS at the workplace. Furthermore, a specific training programme on occupational safety and health is being prepared in cooperation with trainers from the Netherlands, which will be organized for the senior labour inspectors. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the training programmes dispensed to the labour inspectors since the establishment of this centre, and to report on their impact on the operations and results of the labour inspection services.

Article 14. Notification to the labour inspectorate of cases of occupational disease. In its previous report, the Government had stated that, in view of the crucial role of labour administration in administering and enforcing labour laws, the labour inspection legislation was to be reviewed in order to bring it more into line with the provisions of the Convention. In its report under review, the Government does not provide any information on the progress achieved in reviewing this legislation, merely stating that it will examine the recommendations of the Committee on the application of this provision of the Convention. However, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention, for many years, to the need to ensure that full effect is given to this Article of the Convention, specifically as regards cases of occupational disease. The Committee requests the Government once again to take advantage of the planned legislative revision in order to adopt provisions that supplement the national legislation, in accordance with this Article of the Convention, by defining the instances and the manner in which the labour inspectorate must be informed not only of industrial accidents, but also of cases of occupational disease. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of any progress in this respect and provide copies of any draft provisions or any adopted texts, together with all relevant documents (administrative orders, circulars, declaration forms, etc.).

Article 15(b). Scope of the obligation of labour inspectors to maintain professional secrecy. The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that efforts have been made, in the context of the planned revision of the labour legislation, to take account of the Committee's recommendations on this point, and that the provisions of section 15(b) of the decree have been amended to bring it more into line with the provisions of the Convention with respect to the obligation of labour inspectors to maintain professional secrecy, even once they have left the service. The Committee hopes that this labour legislation will be revised and implemented as soon as possible and requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this area, and to send the ILO a copy of the revised labour legislation once it has been adopted.

The Committee is raising other points in a request directly addressed to the Government.

Sweden

Following on from its previous comments on progress made in the operation of the labour inspection service in agricultural and forestry undertakings, the Committee once again notes with satisfaction the Government's constant efforts to provide the labour inspection services with the human and logistical resources they require to carry out their tasks of inspection, education and improving legislation (Article 6(1) of the Convention), in particular in the areas of health and safety of agricultural workers and their work environment.

Measures to improve occupational safety and health conditions in agricultural undertakings. Given that agricultural and forestry are among the areas of activity with the highest accident rates (on average 15 deaths and thousands of cases of injury every year), the Work Environment Authority is endeavouring to adapt its activities in the light of the results of labour inspections and advances in technical knowledge in order to reduce occupational risks specific to the areas of activity concerned. According to the Government, six occupational accident surveys carried out in the agricultural sector since 2010 and published on the Internet are to be followed up with a range of measures with that purpose in mind. The Committee notes that a detailed list of points for inspection and a glossary of terms used in labour inspection in the agricultural sector will shortly be made available to all inspectors.

Inspection of agricultural machinery and its use. The Committee notes that the competence of the labour inspection service in agriculture also includes preventive inspection of market products intended for small-scale forestry undertakings and their customers, with the aim of registering those products with regard to their safe use. With the same concern in mind, the labour inspection service provides manufacturers and purchasers of certain agricultural machinery with information on the assembly of that machinery by means of a brochure which focuses on conformity with European standards.

Inspection of livestock breeding activities. The Committee notes with interest that the activities of the labour inspection service in livestock breeding undertakings have prompted the Work Environment Authority, during the period of the report, to initiate a range of measures intended to improve safety and health conditions in the work environment, including: seeking alternative solutions for marking livestock; revising regulations on pesticide spreading machinery and the use of motorized saws and chainsaws; and Internet publication of information and recommendations concerning microbiological risks and protection of persons caring for horses, dogs or cats infected with certain serious infectious diseases. In addition, organic dust in livestock breeding establishments is the focus of a two-year national project. Dust concentrations are measured and recorded on poultry farms, in piggeries and other livestock breeding undertakings.

Measures to protect foreign workers employed in certain seasonal activities. Lastly, the Committee notes with interest the publication of a brochure available in several languages (English, Latvian, Lithuanian, Romanian, Russian and Polish) intended for foreign workers employed in seasonal work in forestry and berry picking. The brochure covers the social and legal aspects of seasonal work as well as issues of safety and health pertaining to particular activities of this kind.

Syrian Arab Republic

The Committee notes with interest the Government's favourable reception to the labour inspection audit carried out by the ILO in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme. Furthermore, it notes, according to information available to the ILO, that the Government has expressed its firm intention to continue the cooperation with a view to following up on the audit's recommendations, particularly the one concerning the establishment of a structure responsible for developing the training and human resources of the labour inspectorate.

The Committee notes with interest that some of the audit's recommendations were already taken into account with the adoption of the new Labour Code under Act No. 17/2010, inasmuch as the labour inspection services were strengthened by provisions ensuring that inspectors have the authority and credibility they need in the exercise of their functions, and guaranteeing that they will not be vested with any responsibilities liable to prejudice their mandate or prevent the exercise of this mandate (section 250). It particularly notes in this respect that labour inspectors will henceforth be recruited on the basis of skills criteria related to the functions they will have to assume: candidates for the post of labour inspectors dealing with general working conditions will be required to have a degree in law or economy, whereas those making a career as occupational safety and health inspectors will be obliged to have a degree in natural sciences, chemistry, pharmacy or engineering (section 245). The number of each category of inspectors will be determined by decree issued at the recommendation of the Minister of Labour. According to sections 253 and 254, labour inspectors will have legal protection from their ministry against anyone inflicting any physical or moral injuries on them in the course of their missions.

Subsequent implementing texts will determine the inspectors' remuneration scheme (issued in coordination with the Ministry of Finance (section 247(b))), the extent of their right of entry into establishments liable to inspection, as well as their supervisory prerogatives and powers to prosecute those having committed a violation (sections 247(a), 250(b) and 251).

The Committee also notes that the principle of absolute confidentiality as to the source of complaints has finally been set forth in the legislation (section 249(g)) and hopes that measures will be taken to ensure that this obligation of confidentiality extends to the existence of any link between the inspection visit and a complaint, as this is a prerequisite for the protection of employees against any risk of reprisals on the part of the employer.

The Committee trusts that this active cooperation between the Government and the ILO with a view to implementing the recommendations of the labour inspection audit will continue with due regard for the principles contained in the Convention, and taking into account the relevant guidelines of the Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81), as well as those contained in the general observations made by the Committee in 2007, on the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the justice system; in 2009 on the importance of having and updating a register of workplaces; and, in 2010, on the usefulness of publishing an annual report of the activities of the labour inspection services enabling them to evaluate the results of the work they have been assigned and subsequently, to determine the means necessary to improve their effectiveness.

The Committee requests the Government to inform the ILO of the progress made, as well as of any possible difficulties encountered in the implementation of the audit's recommendations, and to send it a copy of any relevant texts, in particular the implementing texts provided for under sections 245, 247, 250 and 251 of the new Labour Code.

The Committee refers to its observation on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), concerning the follow-up given to the ILO technical assistance in the context of the Decent Work Country Programme, the recommendations of the labour inspection audit and the adoption of the new Labour Code.

The Committee trusts that the active cooperation between the Government and the ILO for the implementation of the recommendations of the labour inspection audit will continue, with due regard for the provisions of this Convention and taking into account the relevant guidelines contained in the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Recommendation, 1969 (No. 133), as well as those contained in the general observations that the Committee addressed to the governments: in 2007, on the need for effective cooperation between the labour inspection services and the justice system; in 2009 on the importance of having and updating a register of establishments; and, in 2010, on the usefulness of publishing an annual report containing information on labour inspection activities in agriculture, enabling them to evaluate the results of the work they have been assigned and, subsequently, to determine the means necessary to improve their effectiveness.

The Committee requests the Government to inform the ILO of any progress achieved as well as of any difficulties it might have encountered in the implementation of the audit's recommendations concerning the organization and running of the labour inspection services in agriculture, and to send a copy of any relevant text, in particular the implementing texts provided for under sections 245, 247, 250 and 251 of the new Labour Code.

Articles 14 and 21 of the Convention. Establishing a register of agricultural enterprises and strengthening the labour inspection staff. The Committee notes with interest that, thanks to the cooperation between the Ministry of Agriculture and the provincial directorates of social and labour affairs, the plan to set up a database on agricultural enterprises has advanced to such an extent that it has been possible to establish a list of definitely approved establishments. These enterprises are mainly involved in cattle farming, chicken farming, fish farming and bee-keeping. The Committee notes with interest that other data, on the geographical distribution and type of workers employed in these enterprises, will soon be available. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate in its next report the progress made in this area and to send the ILO a copy of any documents or relevant reports.

The Committee also notes with interest, according to information provided by the Government, that several officials have been recruited and are at present undergoing training, and that they will fill the posts of labour inspectors in agriculture. Furthermore, the provincial directorates of social and labour affairs are being asked to state their needs in terms of inspectors, with a view to the budgetary planning for 2012. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the number of inspectors recruited and to provide details on the type and duration of their training before being assigned to their post of labour inspector in agriculture.

United Republic of Tanzania

Tanganyika

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 10, 20 and 21 of the Convention. Labour inspection staff and annual report on their work. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, despite the fact that the labour inspectorate had inadequate human resources owing to resignations, retirements and financial constraints regarding the recruitment and retention of staff, 26 new labour officers were appointed in 2009 to make a total of 92. The Government also indicates that steps have been taken to keep a register of workplaces in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations, ministries and public agencies, and also non-governmental organizations, but that it is nevertheless facing certain difficulties in determining the exact number of workers employed therein. The Government considers that technical assistance from the Office might be important in this sphere. The Committee notes the favourable reception from the Government with regard to its proposal for technical assistance in the context of preparation and publication of the labour inspectorate's annual report. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the steps taken to obtain the technical assistance of the Office and also on the results thereof once it has been provided, including with regard to determining the exact number of workers employed in these workplaces.

Article 12(1)(a). Right of inspectors to enter workplaces freely. Timing of inspections. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the expression "at any reasonable time" means at any time of the day or night that the inspector deems suitable for undertaking an inspection in view of the nature of the work and the conditions in which it is done. The Government gives the example of casinos and bars where it is not convenient to undertake an inspection during the day, which suggests that inspections generally take place during working hours. The Committee recalls that, as indicated in paragraph 270 of the 2006 General Survey, the protection of workers and the technical requirements of inspection should be the primordial criteria for determining the appropriate timing of visits, for example, to check for violations such as abusive night work conditions in a workplace officially operating during the daytime, or to carry out technical inspections requiring machinery or production processes to be stopped. It should be for the inspector to decide whether a visit is reasonable – obviously, inspections should only be carried out at night or outside working hours where this is warranted. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or contemplated to ensure that labour inspectors can enter freely at any hour of the day or night any workplace liable to inspection and that they have a clear entitlement to decide whether the timing of the visit is reasonable.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Tunisia

While noting that the Government replies to the general observation of 2010, by indicating that the Ministry of Social Affairs carries out the registration of workplaces liable to inspection in coordination with the National Fund of Social Security and the Ministry of Employment, the Committee also notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous individual observation. The Committee requests the Government to indicate any development in the application of the Convention in the light of the current events in the country. It also repeats its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 10, 21(b) and (c) of the Convention. Number of inspectors and geographical distribution. Statistics of workplaces liable to inspection and number of workers employed. The Committee notes from the labour inspection reports for 2006 and 2007 the composition and distribution by sex of the labour inspectorate staff (Article 21(b)). However, the reports contain no information on the number of workplaces subject to inspection and the number of workers employed therein (Article 21(c)). According to Article 10, the number of labour inspectors shall be determined according to the number, nature, size and situation of the workplaces. It is therefore important that the Government should ensure that such data are collected so that it is in a position to distribute the inspection staff appropriately throughout the territory in accordance with priorities to be defined on the basis of criteria such as the risk level of the main activities, worker categories (young workers, women, level of qualification, etc.) and available resources. Besides, such information is essential for the central authority in scheduling routine inspection visits, assessing the workplace coverage rate and establishing resource requirements in annual budgets with a view to better coverage. The Government may wish to refer in this connection to paragraphs 325 and 326 of the 2006 General Survey on labour inspection, and to Paragraph 9(c) of Labour Inspection Recommendation, 1947 (No. 81) regarding the level of detail to be given in the relevant information. The Committee asks the Government to provide figures showing the geographical distribution of labour inspectorate staff, so that it can assess the extent to which the abovementioned Articles of the Convention are observed, and to ensure that the annual labour inspection report contains, in the future, statistics of the workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein.

Articles 17 and 18. Information concerning action taken on unheeded warnings and on reports of violations. The Committee notes from the labour inspection reports that inspectors issued 3,386 warnings in 2007 and 3,318 in 2006, as well as 652 violation reports in 2007 and 402 in 2006. It notes, however, that no information has been sent on the action taken on these warnings and reports.

The Committee further notes that since the inspection report for 1998, received at the ILO in 2000, according to the Government, inspections of labour suppliers have been stepped up, the aim being to get employers to comply with the legislation in force. However, the Government provides no information on any follow-up to such inspections. To assess how effective such action has been, a record is needed of all the offences committed by labour suppliers and the action taken by labour inspectors to remedy them or punish the offenders.

The Committee invites the Government to refer to Chapter VIII of its General Survey of 2006 in which it points out that the provision of advice and information, the issuing of orders and the initiation of legal procedures are complementary approaches to achieving the Convention's objective. The credibility and effectiveness of a labour inspection system depend to a large extent on the action taken on contraventions reported. It is accordingly essential that penalties imposed by labour inspectors for violations should be visible enough to be dissuasive. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on the action taken on unheeded warnings and on violations notified to courts of law, and to ensure that in future relevant statistics are supplied in the annual report of the central labour inspection authority.

Articles 3(1)(b), 14, 21(f) and (g). Statistics of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The Committee notes from the labour inspection report for 2007 that employers too often neglect to notify industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and that this prevents the inspectorate from compiling complete and relevant data. In this connection, the report only refers to the statistics contained in the annual report of the Sickness Insurance Fund (CNAM), without providing the report in question. The Committee reminds the Government that according to Article 14 of the Convention, the labour inspectorate must be notified of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease. The inspectorate needs data of this kind, in particular so that it can fully assume its preventive role and so that in the annual inspection report it can include statistics of industrial accidents and of the case of occupational disease, as required by Article 21(f) and (g). In this connection, the Committee invites the Government to refer to paragraphs 118 to 132 of the abovementioned General Survey in which it points out the importance and scope of the labour inspectorate's preventive role. To enable the central authority to include in its annual report information regarding industrial accidents and instances of occupational disease, the competent authority is required by Article 5(a) of the Convention to promote cooperation between the two institutions to this end. Furthermore, such information is essential to the development of a relevant prevention policy.

In order to combat negligence of employers in notifying industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease, it would likewise be appropriate to ensure that laws and regulations are sufficiently clear as to the cases and circumstances in which such incidents are to be notified to the competent authorities, and as to the procedure for notification and the penalties that apply in the event of negligence. Informing and sensitizing employers and workers about this matter is an essential means of encouraging compliance with the relevant legal provisions. Labour inspectors can carry out such measures as part of the duties they perform in pursuance of Article 3(1)(b) and of Paragraphs 6 and 7 of Recommendation No. 81. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take steps to ensure that the labour inspectorate is informed of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease in the instances and circumstances laid down in the national legislation. If failure to notify is a result of gaps in the legislation, the Government is asked to take steps to complete the legislation accordingly so as to facilitate enforcement and supervision by the labour inspectorate. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would proceed at once to encourage cooperation between the labour inspection services and the CNAM so that, in future, available relevant statistics may be included in the annual labour inspection report, in accordance with Article 21(f) and (g), if possible in the manner indicated in Paragraph 9(f) and (g) of Recommendation No. 81.

Article 20. Publication and communication to the ILO of the annual inspection report. The Committee appreciates the Government's efforts to compile annual labour inspection reports. It notes, however, that there is no requirement for such reports to be published and that they are in any event not communicated to the Office within the deadline prescribed by Article 20 (the inspection report for 2007 was not received until March 2010). The Committee reminds the Government that according to Article 20, the annual report must be published at the latest within 12 months of the end of the period they cover. Consequently, the Committee asks the Government to ensure that full effect is given to the abovementioned Articles of the Convention and that, in future, the annual report of the central inspection authority on the work of the inspection services under its control is published and that a copy of it is sent to the International Labour Office within the period prescribed. It would be grateful if, in the meantime, the Government would ensure that the reports for 2007, 2008 and 2009 are published and sent to the Office promptly.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uganda

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report contains no reply to the Committee's previous comments on the application of the Convention in the country, and is confined to providing vague information in reply to the general observation of 2007, simply indicating that the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development works closely with the Office of the Inspector General of Government, the Human Rights Commission and the Director of Public Prosecution, seeking from time to time technical guidance on some difficult legal provisions, while the Solicitor General's office has been an important partner in the development of regulations on the labour laws.

Nevertheless, the Committee notes with interest that the Government has asked for the technical assistance of the Office in order to carry out a needs assessment of the labour inspection and labour administration system. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the results of this assessment and the follow-up measures taken or envisaged in this framework, with a view to giving full effect to the Convention and addressing the Committee's previous comments, which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government has not sent the report requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards concerning the measures taken to follow up its conclusions adopted at its session in May–June 2008. However, it notes the information received by the ILO on 11 November 2008 concerning the adoption in 2006 of Employment Act No. 6 and Occupational Safety and Health Act No. 9, and the views expressed by the Central Organization of Free Trade Unions (COFTU) and the National Organization of Trade Unions in Uganda (NOTU) at a tripartite workshop on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes that, as recommended by the Conference Committee in 2001, 2003 and 2008, an ILO technical assistance mission was received from 13 to 17 July 2009 and that, together with the Government and the social partners and various public bodies, it examined the reasons for the deterioration in the labour inspection system since the 1990s, with a view to remedying it.

Need to establish a labour inspection system that meets the requirements of the Convention

The ILO technical assistance mission noted that the dismantling of the labour inspection system that followed its decentralization observed by an earlier ILO mission in 1995, has progressively worsened. The many interviews it had with staff of the labour administration and other public departments and with the social partners provided the mission with information betraying a level of distress that demands the urgent re-establishment of a labour inspection system able to ensure the supervision of the legal provisions related to conditions of work and the protection of workers, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 1(a), of the Convention and to provide both employers and workers in industrial and commercial workplaces with useful information for their implementation, as required by Article 3(1)(b).

The field visits proposed to the mission were limited to two very large foreign-owned agro-food companies located in areas of very intense industrial activity (Kampala and Jinja) and the mission regretted that it had not been in a position in which it could assess working conditions in small and medium-sized Ugandan establishments. However, the gradual deterioration in the labour inspection situation can be discerned from the information contained in the annual inspection reports received at the ILO in 1994 and 1996. According to the report covering 1994, the Labour Department had 83 employees, of whom 62 worked in the districts. Despite limited resources, the inspection staff managed to carry out 280 fully fledged visits, 292 visits to monitor implementation and 436 visits for other purposes. As prescribed by Article 3(1)(a) of the Convention, these inspections focused on application of the provisions on working conditions (general conditions and occupational safety and health) and the protection of workers. Of the many complaints from workers that had reached it, the labour inspectorate was able to deal with 1,252 and refer 32 to the courts. The annual inspection report for 1994, as well as providing detailed information on the work of the inspectorate, supplied statistical data together with relevant analyses and comments, including on occupational accidents, placing special emphasis on the lack of general safety and health standards in small and medium-sized establishments.

In 1995, an ILO technical assistance mission found that the labour administration was only represented in 20 of the country's 39 districts and had lost over 75 per cent of its human resources. For example, of the 67 posts planned for the occupational safety and health department, only two existed, one in Jinja, the other in Mbala, notwithstanding the significant number of establishments covered by the 1964 Factories Act and the fact that they were located throughout the country.

The annual inspection report for 1996 referred to 17 collective labour disputes concerning trade union rights, the refusal by employers to pay wage arrears and retirement benefits, and unfair dismissals of unionized workers. With the restructuring of the country's administration, unemployment was compounded by the dismissals of public employees. During the period covered, supervision of working conditions appears to have been marginalized in relation to employment policy and to no longer have been a matter of concern for the Government. The central labour administration's resources had been so reduced that no vehicles were left for travel outside the capital to supervise the operation of district services, some of which were unattainable by telephone. During the year covered by the above report, only 13 of the 21 district labour services were able to communicate information on their work: in all, 1,151 inspection visits were carried out, for some of which transport was provided by the employers. In total, there were 19 occupational safety and health inspection staff. Out of the 104 occupational accidents notified, only eight were investigated. Records showed that 25 per cent of the accidents were in construction and 33 per cent in government services and private security bodies. The 26–30 age group accounted for 34.61 per cent of the accidents, but no legal proceedings had been initiated during the period covered. The industrial court nonetheless apparently played an important role in pacifying and harmonizing industrial relations and, in most of its decisions it found for the workers. Its impact was attributed to its functional and financial independence.

In the observations it made in the years that followed, the Committee repeatedly noted that the Convention was not applied and reminded the Government of the obligations arising out of ratification, asking it to take the necessary steps to remedy the situation of the labour inspection services. Such measures involve, in particular, placing the inspection services under the supervision and control of a central authority and recruiting qualified and properly trained personnel. Financial, material and logistical resources are also essential for the control of the industrial and commercial establishments covered by the Convention and of the relevant national legislation (suitably equipped offices, provision of appropriate technical equipment for inspections and transport facilities and repayment of duty travel expenses). The diversity and complexity of the labour inspection functions defined in the Convention also require labour inspectors to devote most of their time to these duties, in their capacity as public officials who are assured of stability of employment and are independent of improper external influences.

Nevertheless, due to the decentralization of the labour administration as a whole, the Ministry of Labour as such soon disappeared and its component parts were absorbed by a succession of ministries. The labour administration is now a department in the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development (MGLSD). Its resources have been significantly reduced, as has its authority over the decentralized services. While decentralization was designed as a response to the demands of a policy to encourage investment, both national and international, in the interests of developing the national economy and creating jobs, its implementation has become increasingly detrimental to workers because it has overlooked issues relating to conditions of work, which is in violation of the Convention.

The Local Governments Act, No. 1 of 1997, transferred labour issues to the districts, together with services and activities for social rehabilitation, probation and well-being of street children and orphans, the role of women in development, community development, youth, culture and information services. With this transfer of authority, the districts are now exercising powers formerly held by central government, such as formulating development plans on the basis of priorities defined at the local level including raising, levying, managing and assigning resources through separate budgets, and establishing or abolishing public service bodies. As labour administration issues were no longer given priority, district labour departments were consequently reduced to rudimentary structures, and in some instances disappeared altogether. Furthermore, the number of districts increased from 56 to 75 in 2005 and to 80 in 2009, and is likely to increase further in the near future. Only the district of Kampala, which has a special status, is administered by the country's central authorities. COFTU and NOTU have expressed concern at the fragmentation of the country's administration at a time of drastic reductions in labour administration personnel and have called for amendment of the Constitution so that labour inspection can be placed back under the control and supervision of a central authority in a fully fledged ministry of labour endowed with the necessary capacities to fulfil its functions effectively. Although a similar view was expressed by nearly all the political and administrative officials and other stakeholders it met, the mission concluded that there is no such prospect on the agenda.

On 15 September 2008, the Local Governments Act was again amended with a view to the further decentralization of the administration taking account of a distinction between rural and urban entities. In accordance with section 77 of the Act, local governments will have the right and duty to formulate, approve and execute their budgets and plans subject to compulsory budgetary equilibrium (paragraph 1). Subject to the obligation to give priority to the objectives set out in national programmes (paragraph 2), urban governments are given financial independence, provided that their plan is incorporated into the district plan (section 79). The Committee notes that, according to section 83 (paragraph 2), central Government allocates to local governments to finance the operation of decentralized services, an unconditional minimum amount calculated in accordance with Chapter 7 of the Constitution, equal in value to the amount of the previous tax year for the same item.

In its report received in November 2008, the Government stated that it was seeking funds within the framework of the Decent Work Country Programme adopted in May 2007, while pointing out that the enhancement of labour inspection is a key element of a strategy for improvement of industrial relations through the promotion of rights at work. It undertakes to address all the issues raised by the Committee in the report due in 2009, taking into account the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2008. However, the Government has not sent the report as announced, but documented information gathered by the ILO mission of July 2009 shows that, while the MGLSD received an additional budgetary allocation in the course of the year, the labour inspectorate had no place in the MGLSD's budgetary allocations for the current fiscal year and that, moreover, labour administration issues in general are not included in any of the projects or strategies developed for the short and medium term by the Ministry in charge of local governments.

The Committee nevertheless hopes that, as soon as possible, the labour inspectorate will be given a key role in the country's social and economic development strategy, in particular through the process for revising the Decent Work Country Programme adopted in 2007, through the enactment of the above new legislation on employment and occupational safety and health, and to ILO technical assistance in fulfilling the objectives of the Convention. The Committee recalls that labour inspection is a function of the public administration that needs its own operating budget allowing the recruitment of suitable personnel and adequate resources to be made available. It is for the ministry responsible for labour to define requirements for this purpose and to raise awareness among governmental authorities and the social partners, particularly employers, of the positive impact of efficient labour inspection on a country's economic development and enterprise financial results.

The Committee notes the re-establishment of an Industrial Court financed by the state budget. In accordance with Act No. 8 of 2006 on labour disputes (arbitration and settlement), the court hears disputes that the labour inspector has been unable to settle or appeals by one of the parties where there has been no decision within 90 days. However, if the Industrial Court is to play its role fully, it would be advisable for the legislation on the functioning and powers of the labour inspectorate to be revised so as to adapt it to developments in the world of work, and for the legislation on conditions of work to be supplemented by regulations to give it practical effect under the supervision of the labour inspectorate. The Committee notes the indication to the technical assistance mission that a parliamentary process is under way for this purpose. The Committee notes that the Employment Act, No. 6 of 2006, and the Occupational Safety and Health Act, No. 9 of 2006, contain provisions that are largely consistent with the Convention, and requests the Government to take measures promptly to give effect to them in practice. In particular, it requests it to ensure that effect is given in the near future to section 3(1) of the Occupational Safety and Health Act (No. 9) and section 9 of the Employment Act (No. 6), concerning the recruitment of the necessary inspection staff to ensure the implementation of these Acts, and that the number of inspectors will be determined in each district on the basis of the technical and geographical criteria referred to in Article 10 of the Convention. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure that the necessary conditions are created to establish effective cooperation between the labour administration and the other public services and private institutions that possess useful data (such as the ministries of finance, justice, tourism, commerce and industry, the Bureau of Statistics, the Investment Authority and the National Social Security Fund (NSSF)) for the establishment of a company's register providing the labour inspectorate with the necessary information to develop an inspection programme that takes into account the branches of activity in which workers are the most vulnerable in view of the general conditions of work and the risks for their safety and health.

The Committee notes that, in accordance with section 20 of the Employment Act (No. 6), an annual report containing information on labour inspection must be published by the labour commissioner at the ministry responsible for labour, which seems at least to suggest a return to the idea of a central labour inspection authority within the meaning of Article 4 of the Convention to supervise and control the work done by the district inspection services. An annual report, prepared in accordance with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention, will also enable the national authorities concerned, as well as the social partners and the ILO's supervisory bodies, to gain a sufficiently clear idea of the way the labour inspection system functions and hence to envisage or propose, as the case may be, the necessary means of improving it.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures taken in pursuit of the above objectives, together with any relevant documents. It would be grateful in particular for information on the manner in which it plans to give effect to Article 4 of the Convention in terms of organizing and running the labour inspection system in practice in the context of the application of the current version of the Local Governments Act. The Committee finally requests the Government to ensure that an annual inspection report, containing the information available on the subjects listed at Article 21 of the Convention and reflecting both progress made and the shortcomings of the labour inspection system, will be published and that a copy will be sent to the ILO.

Ukraine

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 2004)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on the issues raised in the Committee's previous comments pursuant to the observations made by the Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine (FTUU). The Committee recalls that these comments concerned discrepancies between the Convention and Act No. 877-V concerning the fundamental principles of state supervision in the area of economic activity adopted on 5 April 2007 by the Supreme Council as well as Order No. 502 concerning temporary restrictions on state supervision activities in the area of economic activity which was adopted by the Cabinet of Ministers of Ukraine on 23 May 2009 and was applicable until 31 December 2010. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken in order to ensure that Act No. 877-V, which it recognized to be in violation of Articles 12(1)(a) and (2), and 15(c) of the Convention, is amended with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. It also requests the Government to clarify whether Order No. 502, which it also recognized to be contrary to Articles 16 and 18 of the Convention, has ceased to be in force since 1 January 2011, and if that is not the case, to indicate the measures taken in order to repeal it.

Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129) (ratification: 2004)

Referring to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) and noting that the issues raised relate also to Articles 1(1)(a) and (2), 20(c), 21 and 24 of the present Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide the information requested under Convention No. 81 in so far as it also concerns the rights, powers and means of action of the labour inspection staff in agricultural enterprises.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uruguay

Article 6 of the Convention. Legal status and conditions of service of labour inspection staff. Stability of employment and independence. The Committee notes with interest the information that 33 persons under contract as occupational safety and health inspectors in the Working Environment Conditions (CAT) Division, who had not yet attained the status of public officials, entered the public service, in the same way as the other inspectors, after participating in a competitive and merit-based selection process. According to the Government, the conclusion of a public service contract without limit of time means that these officials enjoy the necessary guarantees and stability. The Government clarifies that the administration may assess their suitability for a specific period, before including them in the ranks of budgeted public officials, and that currently all labour inspectors are protected by the status of budgeted public officials.

The Committee also notes with interest that, according to the Government, as from the middle of 2007, and as a consequence of the application of their status of exclusive assignment, the earnings of inspectors rose by 100 per cent and, although there remains a small difference in relation to the number of working hours, inspectors receive salaries that are more than double those of other public officials. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the Government, there is currently only one labour inspector who has not been granted the status of exclusive assignment. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of developments regarding the number of inspectors who have attained the status of exclusive assignment. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the percentage of working hours for which an inspector may be dispensed from the status of exclusive assignment to labour inspection.

Allegations of discrimination. With regard to the allegations of discrimination against unionized inspectors previously made by the Ibero-American Confederation of Labour Inspectors (CIIT), the Government reaffirms that no type of discrimination occurs against unionized inspectors and that, on the contrary, trade union leave is facilitated and respected so that inspectors can undertake trade union activities. The text of the forms which inspectors have to complete daily on their activities was decided upon in a common agreement with inspectors, the directors of inspection services and supervisors, and those concerned were the ones that requested the inclusion of the item relating to trade union activities, which responds to the desire to clearly identify their various everyday activities. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government.

Conditions of service. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, the salaries determined for tax inspectors are similar to those of labour inspectors. The difference lies in the variable component of their remuneration which, in the case of tax inspectors, attached to the service which collects and administers taxes, is related to management and collection responsibilities. This difference can, on occasions, amount to 25 per cent of the salaries of labour inspectors, while on other occasions it may be lower or zero. The Committee notes with interest that the authorities of the Ministry and of the inspection services are analysing the possibility of revising these aspects of the remuneration of inspectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any measures envisaged or adopted with a view to improving the remuneration or benefits of labour inspectors in the light of the socio-economic importance of the objectives assigned to the labour inspection services.

Article 7. Retraining of inspectors. The Committee notes with interest the creation of communication and training teams, which include inspectors, with a view to defining, jointly with management, the necessary training courses for labour inspectors. It notes that during the course of 2010, training days were held, among other subjects, on vertical work techniques, that all inspection staff are currently participating in workshops relating to the installation of the electronic management system and that a workshop has been planned for 2011 on the interdisciplinary treatment of harassment, together with courses to update knowledge in the field of social security contributions and rulings on wages. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of the planning of future training activities for inspectors and their impact on the achievement of the objectives of the Convention.

Articles 10(a)(i) and (ii) and (b), 11, 16 and 21(c). Number of labour inspectors, working conditions of inspectors, and inspection visits. The Government indicates that the current number of inspectors is 147, of whom 63 are assigned to the CAT Division and 84 to the General Labour Conditions (CGT) Division (eight of these posts are currently vacant).

According to the Government, in view of the size of the country (the most distant point from the capital is only 600 km away) and the availability of appropriate vehicles to cover these distances rapidly and with sufficient ease, all of the inspection staff covers the interior of the country, and not only inspectors who are based outside the capital. Inspection activities in departments with few inhabitants are difficult for inspectors who live there. For these reasons, the Government considers it important to maintain the current system. Moreover, a draft agreement with other State bodies is under examination with a view to making air transport facilities available to labour inspectors, where necessary. The Government also reports the purchase in 2010 of four new 4x4 vehicles and indicates that, together with the remaining vehicles, they cover the needs of the inspection staff in this respect. The Government adds that it is in the process of implementing an electronic management system which will involve the total computerization of inspection functions. The Government indicates that in this framework, teams of inspectors have been set-up in order to introduce in the system statistics on inspection activities, and particularly on accidents. With reference to offices, the Government indicates that the work that is planned and budgeted will result in the doubling of the physical space currently available to both Divisions. The Committee takes note of this information with interest and requests the Government to keep the ILO informed of progress made in the establishment of the electronic management system and its impact on the effective discharge of the duties of the labour inspectorate. Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the ILO informed of progress in the recruitment of new labour inspectors to fill the vacant posts and specify the number of inspectors who are engaged in inspections of workplace.

Articles 20 and 21. Publication and communication of an annual report on the work of the labour inspection services. The Committee once again requests the Government to ensure that the relevant measures are taken with a view to ensuring that the annual inspection reports henceforth contain information on all of the issues envisaged in Article 21, and particularly on clause (c) (statistics of workplaces liable to inspection and the number of workers employed therein), (e) (statistics of violations and penalties imposed, including references to the respective legislative provisions) and (g) (statistics of occupational diseases).

Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150) (ratification: 1989)

The Committee notes the Government's report received at the office on 7 September 2010. It notes the information supplied by the Government in reply to its previous comments. It will examine this information in the context of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also takes note of the comments made by the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) in a communication dated 29 August 2011 as well as by the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) in a communication dated 30 August 2011. It also notes the Government's reply to the comments of the CTV dated 30 November 2011. Since the latter was received too late to be examined, the Committee will examine the Government's report along with the comments of the trade unions and the Government's reply at its next session. The Committee requests the Government to communicate any comment or information it deems appropriate in reply to the comments of the ASI.

Zimbabwe

Articles 3(1) and (2), 5(a), 7 and 18 of the Convention. Strengthening of the primary functions of the labour inspection system and cooperation with the justice system. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that it has taken measures to introduce tripartite discussions on the structural separation of the functions of the labour inspectorate from the functions of conciliation and arbitration in the context of the ongoing labour law reform. According to the Government, this is a first step in the process of strengthening the function of the labour inspectorate within the framework of the ILO Technical Assistance Package which was launched in August 2010 for the implementation of the Recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry appointed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution to examine the observance by the Government of Zimbabwe of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). The Committee also notes with interest in the report under the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), that the Government has engaged in discussions with labour inspectors in provincial levels with a view to identifying the challenges that hamper labour inspection.

The Committee further notes with interest that under the ILO technical assistance package, training is provided to members of the Judicial Services Commission including the Labour Court and Magistrates' Court as well as labour inspectors on ILO Conventions on Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining. Furthermore, a workshop was organized to discuss the comments of the Committee on the application by Zimbabwe of the Weekly Rest (Industry) Convention, 1921 (No. 14) so as to keep labour inspectors well informed of the relevant developments and to be in a position to come up with remedial action where challenges are identified.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in identifying the obstacles that hamper labour inspection and the measures taken or envisaged to address them in the framework of the ILO Technical Assistance Package. In this context, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the ILO informed of progress made in separating the functions of labour inspection from those of conciliation and arbitration. Furthermore, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide details on the training provided to labour inspectors and indicate in particular, the issues addressed, the duration, the number of participants as well as the impact of the training on the effective discharge of the functions of the labour inspection, including with regard to freedom of association. The Government is also requested to indicate any further steps taken to reinforce the cooperation between the labour inspection and the justice system and the impact of such cooperation on the level of enforcement of legislation concerning the conditions of work and the protection of workers, including in the area of freedom of association.

In particular, while noting the information provided by the Government on the fines applicable for violations of the Labour Act, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistical data on the effective enforcement of such sanctions by the justice system.

Articles 4, 5(b), 6, 10, 11, 17 and 18. Functioning and supervision of the labour inspection system. The Committee notes that in reply to its previous comments concerning the composition, distribution and conditions of service of labour inspectors, the Government indicates that 96 labour officers carry out inspections on general conditions of work, and 31 inspectors from the National Social Security Authority carry out inspections on occupational safety and health (OSH). The Government provides information on the geographical distribution of the two inspection services and specifies that they are distributed in a complementary manner so as to make at least one of them available in each province.

The Government indicates that, in addition to the labour inspectors who are public officials with authority under the Labour Act to carry out inspection functions, complementary inspection functions are carried out in accordance with section 63 of the Labour Act by designated agents of employment councils. The latter are bipartite bodies set up by employers and their organizations and trade union organizations. The Government indicates that measures have been taken to ensure that all of the 12 employment councils in the country have designated agents so that they can carry out inspection functions. In its report under Convention No. 129 the Government clarifies that the labour inspection functions of the designated agents are of a consultative and tripartite nature as they are exercised under delegated authority from the Ministry.

According to the Government, even though the salaries of the inspectors have been substantially increased following the introduction of a multiple currency system by the Government in February 2009, their conditions of service are in need of significant improvement in order to address the high turnover of labour inspectors. In addition, facilities such as motor vehicles, stationery and communication technologies are generally inadequate and the lack of technical equipment for OSH inspectors impedes their activities. According to the Government's report on Convention No. 129, the abovementioned "designated agents" have better conditions of service, characterized by competitive salaries and the relative availability of tools for the labour inspection including motor vehicles. The Government indicates that it has undertaken to remedy this situation as the economy recovers.

While recalling from its previous comments the need to ensure an effective and efficient labour inspection system with the support of the social partners, the Committee also recalls that according to Article 4 of the Convention, labour inspection should be placed under the supervision and control of a central authority and that the enforcement powers foreseen in Articles 17 and 18 of the Convention should be the exclusive prerogative of labour inspectors and the justice system. The Committee also emphasizes the need to ensure that the status and conditions of service of the labour inspectors are such that they are assured of stability of employment and are independent of changes of government and of improper external influences as provided for in Article 6.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the central labour inspection authority maintains supervision and control of the labour inspection system in its entirety and to specify the conditions and modalities under which it collaborates with designated agents of employment councils (including the manner in which it delegates powers and supervises their activities). The Government is also requested to provide clarifications and statistical data on the distribution of enforcement and advisory functions (Articles 3(1)(a) and (b)), between the labour inspectors and the designated agents of employment councils as well as on the practical aspects of their collaboration.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged in order to gradually improve on the conditions of service of labour inspectors as well as the material facilities at their disposal and to ensure, as soon as the financial situation of the country will allow it, that both categories of inspectors (on general conditions of work and OSH) are progressively posted in all provinces so as to cover the entire territory.

Articles 3(1)(b), 13, 14, 16, 20 and 21. Data on the activities of the labour inspection system to publish an annual labour inspection report. While the Government communicates sample documents on the results of inspection visits and the investigation of industrial accidents, it indicates that it faces significant challenges in terms of compilation of labour inspection statistics due to the non-existence of a labour market information system. The Government also indicates that despite its appeal, ILO technical assistance has not been provided in this regard.

The Committee considers that a labour market information system would allow, to a large extent, the labour inspection central authority to publish an annual labour inspection report in conformity with Articles 20 and 21 of the Convention. As stressed in its general observation of 2011, when well prepared, the annual report offers an indispensable basis for the evaluation of the results in practice of the activities of the labour inspection services and subsequently, the determination of the means necessary to improve their effectiveness. Moreover, with reference to its general observation of 2009, the Committee emphasizes that the elaboration of a register of workplaces liable to inspection and workers employed therein is an important tool for the central authority to assess the relationship between the activities carried out and the resources available, especially for the development of a human resources policy that takes into account merit and motivation.

The Committee expresses the hope that the technical assistance of the ILO in relation to the elaboration of a labour market information system will be provided without delay and that progress will be reported by the Government in its next report in relation to the steps taken for the establishment of a register of industrial and commercial workplaces liable to labour inspection and the number of workers covered.

With reference to Articles 16, 17, 18 and 21(d)–(e) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of inspection visits (both programmed and pursuant to complaints), the number of violations detected with reference to the legal provisions and economic sectors concerned, as well as the number of notices served and cases brought to the justice system.

With reference to Articles 14 and 21(f)–(g), the Committee also requests the Government to describe the mechanism in place for the recording and notification of industrial accidents and cases of occupational disease and to communicate relevant statistical data.

Finally, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the preventive activities carried out by the labour inspectorate in the area of OSH in conformity with Articles 3(1)(b) and 13, and to indicate in particular the number of measures with immediate executory force issued by the labour inspection during the reporting period.

Referring to its comments under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee requests the Government to reply to the questions raised in that framework to the extent that they relate to labour inspection in agriculture. In addition, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the following.

Article 6(1) of the Convention. Enforcement of legislation on freedom of association rights and wage payment. The Committee takes note of the Government's reply to the comments made by the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) in September 2009. The Government indicates that these comments concerned events that have in the meantime become obsolete. In particular, the question of wage levels and their payment has been resolved since the introduction of the multiple currency system in February 2009. According to the Government, the major obstacle to the effective functioning of the enforcement mechanism has been that of limited financial and material resources. Recalling that the comments of the ZCTU referred to grave issues like acts of violence against trade unionists and the absence of an effective enforcement mechanism to address the non-payment of wages, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information and data on the activities of the labour inspectorate in agriculture aimed at the enforcement of legislation on freedom of association rights and wage payment. Please indicate in particular, the number of visits carried out, including incidents investigated in response to complaints, the violations found and the sanctions imposed to ensure the effective enforcement of the relevant provisions.

Articles 6(1), 17, 18 and 19. Labour inspection functions in the area of occupational safety and health. The Government indicates that there is currently no labour inspection on occupational safety and health (OSH) in agriculture even though in practice OSH inspectors from the National Social Security Authority conduct inspections in farms notwithstanding the legislative gaps. Furthermore, in the event of occupational accidents in farms the OSH inspectors are supposed to conduct inspections to enable processing of workers' compensation (Statutory Instrument 68 of 1990: National Social Security Authority (Accident Prevention and Workers' Compensation Scheme) Notice, 1990).

The Committee notes, however, the information by the Government according to which, in the framework of a concerted effort to harmonize all legislation on OSH in Zimbabwe so as to cover agriculture, the OSH legislation is being reviewed with the intention to extend the coverage of the Factories and Works Act to include the agricultural industry. This development will enhance the work of the presently existing inspectorates.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the ILO informed of progress made in amending OSH legislation so as to extend its application to agriculture and formally extend the functions of the labour inspectorate in this area. It hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the activities carried out by labour inspectors in agriculture with regard to both enforcement and prevention in line with Articles 6(1), 17 and 18 of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to provide any available statistical information on occupational accidents and cases of occupational disease recorded in agriculture (Article 19).

Articles 16(1), 16(3) and 20(c). Right of access to workplaces. The Government indicates that, while in terms of the legislation advance notice to an employer of an inspection visit is at the discretion of the labour inspector, the latter is expected to give such notice in practice. The Committee recalls that the possibility to carry out unannounced inspections at any time is essential in order to ensure that the duty of confidentiality as to the existence of a complaint and its source is fully respected when visits are conducted pursuant to complaints, in line with Article 20(c). According to Article 16 of the Convention, labour inspectors should be able to avoid notifying inspection visits to employers if they consider that such a notification may be prejudicial to the performance of their duties. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in order to ensure that there is no formal or informal requirement to give advance notice for inspection visits in agriculture.

Articles 13 and 14. Number of labour inspectors in agriculture and collaboration with employers, workers and their organizations. The Government indicates that in the agricultural sector labour inspectors and designated agents of Employment Councils coordinate their activities in order to maximize the use of resources and the quality of inspection services. The Ministry, which has the overall authority for ensuring the implementation of labour inspection services, has at its disposal 96 labour officials distributed across the country with the ability to cover all agricultural industries (along with the other sectors of the economy). The Ministry delegates the authority for labour inspection on conditions of service to the responsible Employment Council for the Agriculture Industry. The latter is a bipartite body that operates under the supervision of the Ministry of Labour and Social Services and has five designated agents who also carry out inspections. According to the Government, the labour inspection functions of the Employment Council are of a consultative and tripartite nature.

The Committee would be grateful if the Government would specify the proportion of the activities of labour inspectors which are focused on agricultural industries in relation to other industries. Moreover, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide further details on the manner in which labour inspectors and designated agents collaborate in terms of nature of activities (enforcement and advisory) and the impact of this collaboration on the attainment of the objectives of the Convention.

Article 15. Transportation facilities. The Government indicates that in cases where suitable public transport is not generally available, inspectors make use of officials' motor vehicles during their work. Inspectors are given advance payments for out of station allowances to cater for travel and subsistence during field work. Upon return to station, the inspectors are only required to present receipts for the funds spent. Recalling the importance of adequate transport facilities for the effective exercise of the functions of labour inspectors in agriculture, including appropriate vehicles to reach enterprises that are difficult to access, the Committee requests the Government to specify the number of vehicles at the disposal of labour inspectors in agriculture, as well as any measures taken or envisaged in order to gradually improve on the transportation facilities available to them.

Article 24. Enforcement of penalties for obstruction of labour inspectors' work. The Committee notes that, under section 126 of the Labour Act, any person who hinders an officer during inspections is liable to a fine not exceeding level 5 or imprisonment not exceeding six months or both. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the enforcement of section 126 of the Labour Act and any protection afforded to labour inspectors in case of obstruction in the exercise of their duties during inspection visits.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of further technical assistance from the Office if it so wishes.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 63 (Djibouti, Kenya, Myanmar, Nicaragua, South Africa, Syrian Arab Republic, United Republic of Tanzania, United Kingdom: Guernsey, United Kingdom: St Helena); Convention No. 81 (Albania, Algeria, Argentina, Bahamas, Belarus, Belize, Benin, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Costa Rica, Croatia, Cuba, Cyprus, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Estonia, Fiji, Finland, France: French Polynesia, Gabon, Germany, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Honduras, Hungary, Indonesia, Iraq, Israel, Kuwait, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Lebanon, Liberia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Mali, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Montenegro, Morocco, Netherlands, Netherlands: Curaçao, Netherlands: Sint Maarten, Norway, Panama, Poland, Portugal, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Sao Tome and Principe, Saudi Arabia, Seychelles, Sierra Leone, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sri Lanka, Suriname, Sweden, United Republic of Tanzania: Tanganyika, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Tunisia, Ukraine, United Kingdom: Gibraltar, United Kingdom: Guernsey, United Kingdom: Isle of Man, Uruguay); Convention No. 85 (Papua New Guinea, United Kingdom: St Helena); Convention No. 129 (Albania, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Costa Rica, Croatia, Denmark, Finland, France: French Polynesia, Hungary, Luxembourg, Malta, Montenegro, Morocco, Netherlands, Norway, Poland, Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Spain, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine, Uruguay); Convention No. 150 (Algeria, Cambodia, Congo, Czech Republic,

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 81 (Switzerland, United Kingdom); Convention No. 160 (Lithuania, United States).

Employment policy and promotion

Angola

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its 2010 observation which read as follows:

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes the succinct report provided by the Government in May 2010. In its 2008 observation the Committee noted that, in the context of its policy to combat unemployment and poverty, the Government established some public policies with a view to stimulating employment. It further noted that employment and vocational training were one of the ten priorities of the poverty reduction strategy, which should channel the resources obtained from oil to create favourable opportunities for productive employment for young persons and to reduce the informal economy. The Committee observed that the social indicators were a source of great concern – 70 per cent of the population survived on less than US$2 a day and enrolment in primary schools was increasing very slowly (from 50 per cent in 1990 to 53 per cent in 2000). It therefore emphasized the need to guarantee the essential function of employment services to promote employment in the country. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the employment service staff is composed of public officials who are hired through public competition according to the needs of the Ministry of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security and of the employment centre. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide a report containing the available statistical information on the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, vacancies notified and persons placed in employment by such offices (Part IV of the report form) and to provide information on the following matters:

- consultations held with representatives of employers and workers on the organization and operation of the employment service, and on the development of employment policy (Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention);
- the manner in which the employment service is organized and the activities which it performs to effectively carry out the functions set out in Article 6;
- the activities of the public employment service in relation to socially vulnerable categories of jobseekers, with particular reference to workers with reduced mobility and disabilities (Article 7);
- the results of the measures adopted to give effect to Act No. 1 of 2006 to encourage young persons seeking their first job (Article 8);
- the measures proposed by the Training Centre for Trainers (CENFOR) and other institutions to provide training or further training to employment service staff (Article 9(4));
- the measures proposed by the employment service in collaboration with the social partners to encourage the full use of employment service facilities (Article 10); and
- the measures adopted or envisaged by the employment service to secure cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies (Article 11).

The Committee recalls that the Office is in a position to provide the Government with technical advice and assistance for the establishment of a public employment service, as required by the Convention.

Plurinational State of Bolivia

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1977)

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2010, which includes detailed statistics on the numbers of vacancies and applications for employment within the ten Employment Promotion Units, registered vacancies by department and sex, and other relevant data on the operation of the public employment service. The Government suggests that the service is not being used by enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the new measures adopted to ensure the efficient operation of the free public employment service comprising a network of employment offices sufficient in number to meet the needs of employers and workers throughout the country (Articles 1–3 of the Convention). The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to supply information on the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices (Part IV of the report form).

Cooperation with the social partners. In the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee noted that in the Plurinational State of Bolivia, employers' and workers' organizations, as well as other civil society organizations, cooperate even further with the public institutions. The Committee noted that these organizations actively participate and share responsibility with the public employment service in regard to policy development, implementation and even co-financing of certain programmes (paragraph 215 of the General Survey). The Committee requests the Government to include up-to-date, detailed information in its next report on the cooperation of the social partners in the operation of the employment service at both the national and local levels (Articles 4 and 5).

Implementation of a national policy. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2010 listing the legal provisions on persons with disabilities in force and indicating the most recent statutes on the subject. The Government states that in August 2009 a National Solidarity and Equity Fund was created on a temporary basis for persons with disabilities with the aim of increasing the probability of integrating men and women with disabilities in the labour market, either in employment or self-employment. The Government suggests that the apparent ignorance of the existing rules and regulations by employers prevents their implementation by the Ministry of Labour. The Government also includes a list of measures taken under Supreme Decree No. 27477 of May 2004, the aim of which was to promote preferential treatment for persons with disabilities in terms of labour market access, progress and stability, with the requirement that in public entities, such persons must account for at least 4 per cent of total human resources on average. The Committee refers to its observation of 2006 and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results obtained in integrating persons with disabilities into the open labour market (Article 2 of the Convention). It also asks the Government to provide further information on the impact of the measures adopted to ensure effective equality of treatment between men and women workers with disabilities and other workers (Article 4), the provision of vocational guidance, vocational training, placement, employment and other related services to enable persons with disabilities to secure, retain and advance in employment (Article 7), the provision of vocational rehabilitation and employment services for persons with disabilities who live in remote areas and who lack economic resources (Article 8) and the specific measures put into effect to ensure the availability of suitably qualified vocational rehabilitation staff (Article 9).

Consultation of the representative organizations of employers and workers. The Committee again asks the Government to provide information on the consultations held with employers and workers organizations – such as the Bolivian Central of Workers and the Confederation of Private Employers of Bolivia – regarding the measures taken to promote cooperation and coordination between public and private institutions engaged in vocational rehabilitation activities (Article 5).

Part V of the report form. The Committee asks the Government to illustrate its next report with practical information such as extracts from reports, studies and enquiries concerning the matters covered by the Convention.

Cambodia

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1971)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of social and economic policy with poverty reduction. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2011 containing some replies to the points raised in the 2010 observation. In its report, the Government refers to the implementation of the Rectangular Strategy Plan, Phase II 2009–13. The Committee notes that the Government's six priorities in setting up the aforementioned action plan are as follows: (1) employment creation; (2) improving working conditions; (3) enforcement of the rule of law in social security matters; (4) building and development of technical and vocational skills; (5) expansion and strengthening of gender mainstreaming in the labour market; and (6) strengthening cooperation between institutions, work efficiency and accountability. The Committee also notes that the Government has set up a policy on labour migration. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives in the Rectangular Strategy Plan, Phase II 2009–13. In addition, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on how it intends to meet, in the context of its new labour migration policy, the employment needs of migrant Cambodian workers.

Employment trends. The Committee notes that data concerning labour market and employment trends is compiled by the Department of Labour Market Information operating under auspices of the Ministry of Labour and Vocational Training. Due to a lack of resources, reorientation of officials responsible for the data collection to other positions, the Government was unable to submit any new relevant information on employment trends. The Committee hopes that the Government will supply detailed statistical information in its next report on the nature and extent of the country's labour market and employment trends. It also requests the Government to indicate the manner in which labour market data is collected and used to determine and review employment policy measures.

ILO technical assistance. The Government indicates that the "Better Factories Cambodia" programme has led to improved compliance by Cambodian export garment factories of national and international labour standards. This has contributed to Cambodia's national social and economic growth as export garment factories continue to win-over and retain key international buyers who are weary of poor labour standards. The Committee would appreciate continuing to receive the information on the implementation and results of the Better Factories programme in terms of employment generation.

Regional development and rural employment. The Committee notes that the Cambodia–Laos–Viet Nam Development Triangle Area (CLV–DTA) is a multilateral agreement that focuses on economic, political and social objectives in the subregion. Among the social objectives mentioned in the report, the Government refers to several labour related objectives, such as hunger eradication and poverty reduction. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on how the measures taken under the CLV–DTA have promoted the objective of full and productive employment. Please also indicate how the objectives of overcoming poverty, eradicating hunger, reducing social inequalities and ensuring sustainable development have been achieved. The Committee invites the Government to continue to include information on the measures taken to reduce regional disparities so as to attain a better balance in the labour market.

Youth employment. The Committee observes that its previous requests regarding information on the specific measures adopted by the Government aimed at generating employment opportunities for the youth was left unanswered in the Government's report. The Committee reiterates its request and invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the adoption of a youth policy action plan and the results achieved to promote productive employment of young persons.

Educational and training policies. The Committee observes that its previous requests that the Government continue providing information on the effects of educational and training measures adopted by the National Training Board was left unanswered in the Government's report. The Committee reiterates its previous request and invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the measures taken to improve qualification standards and coordinate education and training policies with employment opportunities.

Article 3. Participation of social partners. The Committee observes that its previous requests regarding information as to how the Government involves representatives of employers and workers in the formulation and implementation of employment policies was left unanswered in the Government's report. The Committee reiterates its previous request and invites the Government to address this essential issue in its next report by demonstrating how representatives of employers and workers are consulted at the policy planning and implementation stages so that their experience and views are taken into account.

Canada

Cooperation with employers' and workers' representatives. The Committee notes the Government's response received in September 2011 in reply to the comments of the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC). The CLC indicated in September 2010 that the Government affords a low priority to consultation with the social partners on the matters set out in the Convention. It further indicated that there are no advisory committees, as set out in Article 4 of the Convention, involving trade unions and employer organizations dealing with the organization and operation of the employment service in the country. The CLC would welcome consideration to create such advisory committees that would examine specific issues and measure the Government's progress in implementing the Convention. In the longer term, an Article 4 consultation process could help to better coordinate workplace training by bringing together employers, unions and various levels of government. The Government indicates that it consults with employers and workers on a number of issues related to skills development and employment through, inter alia: (i) meetings of the Roundtable on Workforce Skills (RWS), which is comprised of senior representatives from the business community, unions, and federal and provincial governments; and (ii) sectoral and regional consultations with employers and unions through the Sector Council Program and other Human Resources and Skills Development Canada (HRSDC) initiatives. The Committee notes that Service Canada is reviewing its approach in order to further improve service delivery while realizing efficiencies. This process began in 2009 and one of the objectives is to simplify and enhance Service Canada's presence across the country by balancing in-person interaction with the online self-service channel. The CLC indicated in its 2010 comments that it continued to uncover claimants who remained unassisted because of staff shortages in Service Canada offices. This has led to delays in receiving benefits or denial of benefits altogether due to incorrectly filled out forms. Furthermore, with regard to Article 6(b) of the Convention, the CLC expresses the view that the Canadian Employment Insurance (EI) system does not appear to be serious about facilitating mobility between one region or province to another. The Government responded that it is committed to facilitating mobility between provinces and territories. It indicates that a number of studies have looked at the determinants of labour market mobility and whether EI played a role in the decision to migrate for employment. Results of these studies reveal that factors such as personal and labour market characteristics, and moving costs, play a key role in mobility decisions, and it appears that EI is not a barrier to mobility. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the active cooperation of employers' and workers' representatives in the organization, the operation of the employment service and in the development of the employment service policy (Article 4(1) of the Convention). Please also provide information on the effectiveness of Service Canada's review of the employment service system.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2014.]

Implementation of an active employment policy. Involvement of the social partners. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2011 which includes detailed information provided by the provincial governments. It also notes the comments and useful labour market information provided by the Canadian Labour

Congress (CLC) and the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CSN). The Government indicates that between October 2008 and July 2009, 427,900 jobs were shed from the Canadian economy (on a seasonally adjusted basis). The Committee notes that Canada has rebounded much more quickly from this recession than from those of the 1980s and the 1990s. During the recovery, the labour market gained almost 590,000 jobs since July 2009. The unemployment rate rose to an 11-year high of 8.6 per cent in July 2009 but declined by 1.2 percentage points to 7.4 per cent in June 2011. The Government indicates that it published a report on the job impact of the Economic Action Plan (Budget 2009) in January 2011. The report confirmed that Budget 2009 achieved its objective with over 220,000 jobs estimated to have been created or maintained since December 2010. The Government indicates that consultations were held with private sector employers in February and March 2010 to discuss their labour market experiences during the recession and into the economic recovery, and the nature of their human resource management responses. The Committee notes that Budget 2011 includes new targeted measures to support jobs and growth. It also notes that the CLC reiterates its 2009 comments pertaining to the Government's failure to declare and pursue, as a major goal, an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment, and for this to be well integrated into socio-economic decision making in Canada. The CLC is concerned that unemployment is much higher now than before the recession, and many workers can find only part-time and temporary, low-paid jobs. In 2010, part-time employment reached a record high of one in five workers. In the recovery period, short-term contract jobs have grown much faster than permanent jobs. The real unemployment rate, counting discouraged workers and involuntary part-timers, was still over 10 per cent at the start of 2011. In response to the comments made by the CLC, the Government indicates that all Canadian governments are pursuing, as a major goal, active policies designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment and that policies support the aims identified in Article 2 of the Convention. These policies are reviewed to respond to changing economic circumstances and all jurisdictions have established extensive programmes for the application of these measures. Persons affected by these measures, including employer and worker representatives, are consulted. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information in its next report on employment measures adopted and their outcomes with the objective of maintaining full employment. It also invites the Government to keep in mind the concerns raised by the social partners and to provide further information on the effective consultations held on the matters covered by the Convention.

Education and training policies. The Government indicates that the Career Transition Assistance (CTA) initiative, which came into force on 31 May 2009, has helped more than 14,000 long-tenured workers who needed additional support for retraining to find a new job. While eligibility for the CTA measures ended in May 2010, claimants who met the eligibility criteria for the CTA could begin training until May 2011 and continue to receive benefits as late as May 2012. The Committee notes that the Human Resources and Skills Development Canada (HRSDC) has allocated more than 31.3 million Canadian Dollars (CAD) to support Pan Canadian Innovations Initiative (PCII) activities since 2006. The Government reports that while some PCII projects have been completed and results are positive, evaluation data is not yet available. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken in the area of education and training policies and on their relation to prospective employment opportunities.

Young persons. The Government indicates that it invests almost CAD340 million into the Youth Employment Strategy (YES) to help youth between the ages of 15 and 30 acquire the skills and work experience they need to successfully prepare for the labour market and for the jobs of the future. The primary objectives of the YES are to enhance employability skills, encourage education attainment, and facilitate the transition of young persons into the labour market. The Committee notes the concerns raised by the CSN indicating that the unemployment rate of young persons between the ages of 15 and 24 reached 14.1 per cent in July 2011, as compared to 11.7 per cent in October 2008. The CSN hopes that the Government will pay attention to the integration of young persons in the labour market. The Committee invites the Government to provide an evaluation of labour market measures regarding young persons.

Aboriginal people. The Government indicates that the HRSDC implements complementary Aboriginal labour market programmes supporting the participation of Aboriginal people in the Canadian economy. Launched in April 2010, the Aboriginal Skills and Employment Training Strategy (ASETS) is a five-year strategy designed to help Aboriginal people prepare for, find, and keep high-demand jobs now and in the long term. Aboriginal people, regardless of status or location, may access its programmes and services, which include: job-finding skills and training, programmes for youth, Aboriginal people with disabilities, and access to child care for people in training. The Committee notes that, in the 2010–11 period, more than 14,300 people found employment and over 7,000 returned to school through ASETS. It also notes other measures aimed at increasing employment opportunities for Aboriginal people such as the Skills and Partnership Fund (SPF) and the Aboriginal Skills and Employment Partnership (ASEP). The Committee invites the Government to include information on the impact of the measures taken to promote productive employment opportunities for Aboriginal people.

Means to promote employment of other vulnerable categories of workers. The Government indicates that the Labour Market Agreements for Persons with Disabilities (LMAPDs) and the Opportunities Fund (OF) for persons with disabilities respond to the labour market needs of employers as well as support the development of education, knowledge and skills for persons with disabilities to foster their participation in the labour market. LMAPDs provide approximately CAD218 million to provinces for programmes which serve around 300,000 people. The Canada-Manitoba LMAPD was evaluated in 2010 and the results indicated that the programme addressed employment barriers, such as low educational attainment and lack of essential workplace skills, and that employment-related interventions were associated with improvements in outcomes (earnings/hours worked). Additional funding was allocated to the Targeted Initiative for Older Workers (TIOW) in order to extend the programme until 2013–14. All provinces and territories are participating in the programme and as of July 2011, 294 projects have been approved, assisting approximately 15,500 unemployed older workers. Results from the 2010 evaluation of the TIOW show that 75 per cent of participants surveyed have found employment during or after their participation in the TIOW and 80 per cent felt more employable as a result of the project activities. The Government also indicates that in February and March 2011, HRSDC consulted with employers and older workers (aged 50 and over) in eight cities across Canada to explore factors influencing the decisions and ability of older workers to continue working, current and best practices for retaining and recruiting older workers, and the potential role for government and other labour market stakeholders. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it is committed to working with partners and stakeholders to position Canada as a destination of choice for immigrants and to break down barriers to integration, which include the recognition of foreign educational credentials. To this end, the Pan-Canadian Framework for the Assessment and Recognition of Foreign Qualifications was announced in November 2009. Since the launch of the Framework, governments have worked collaboratively towards the enhancement of foreign qualification recognition processes across Canada so that internationally-trained workers can integrate more quickly and effectively into the labour market. The Committee invites the Government to include information on the effectiveness of labour market measures regarding workers with disabilities, older workers, immigrants, and other vulnerable categories of workers.

Colombia

In its direct request in 2010, the Committee invited the Government to send its comments on the observations received from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), which were forwarded to it in September 2010. The Committee notes the replies to the comments made by the trade union organizations, which were received in May and July 2011. The CGT and also the CUT together with the CTC made new comments, which were forwarded to the Government in September 2011.

Measures to combat unemployment. In their comments, the CTC and the CUT emphasized the unemployment rate, which affects 12.5 per cent of the population (first half of 2010) and the high level of precarious employment in the labour market. The CTC and the CUT referred to the concluding observations of the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights at its 44th Session in May 2010, in which it recommended the Government to “take effective measures to reduce the high rate of unemployment; design specific policies and strategies aimed at creating employment opportunities for young persons, women, indigenous and afro-Colombian peoples; continue the vocational training programmes for young persons, as well as incentives already adopted”. The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights also recommended the Government to “promote employment opportunities while improving the working conditions in the informal economy and rural areas, in particular with regard to low wages and social security benefits” (E/C.12/COL/CO/5, paragraph 11). In the reply received in May 2011, the Government indicates that the National Development Plan 2010–14 sets as a priority the generation of formal employment. The Government is promoting the modernization of the labour market and establishing a system of protection for those made redundant and a system of employment services (SNIL). Act No. 1429 of December 2010 is intended to provide incentives for formalization at the initial stages of enterprise creation by seeking to increase profits and decrease the costs of formalization. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the results achieved in the context of the National Development Plan 2010–14 and the application of Act No. 1429 of 2010 to combat unemployment (Article 1 of the Convention).

Article 2. Labour market mediation. The CGT expressed the view that labour market mediation makes employment precarious, avoids the social responsibility of enterprises and reduces the quality of life for workers. In this respect, the CGT denounces enterprises known as associated work cooperatives which are exempt from the Substantive Labour Code. The Government included information in its report on the number of associated work cooperatives and on the operation of temporary employment agencies. The National Directorate of Temporary Work Agencies lists a total of 486 authorized agencies (between 2006 and 2009) which offer an option for seeking and obtaining employment for those who are unemployed. During this period, user enterprises sought over 3 million persons to meet their staffing needs and 2,918,794 persons were placed in employment. In the reply received in July 2011, the Government indicated its concern at the clear misuse of associated work cooperatives and pre-cooperatives. New regulations have been issued for such entities (Decree No. 4388 of December 2006) and a programme of inspection and monitoring was launched by the Ministry of Social Protection. In its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee recalled the historical context in which Convention No. 2 was adopted in 1919. Convention No. 2 recognizes the coexistence of free public and private agencies and calls for the coordination of the operations of public and private agencies. More recent instruments, such as the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), acknowledge the role played by public and private agencies in ensuring an optimal operation of the labour market. In the 2010 General Survey, the Committee noted the concerns expressed by trade union organizations concerning the growth of “pseudo cooperatives”, in the form of false associated work cooperatives, the emergence of which is often accompanied by the destruction of jobs and by massive lay-offs (2010 General Survey, paragraph 463). In this context, the Committee invites the Government to provide updated information on the operation of temporary work agencies and the coordination of their activities with those of the public employment service. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures which ensure that cooperatives which intervene in the placement of workers comply with the values and principles set out in the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193).

Unemployment insurance. The CUT and the CTC indicate in their comments that the country has not concluded agreements to guarantee unemployment insurance for migrant workers who could be protected by agreements between the member States which have ratified the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the Employment Promotion and Unemployment Protection Fund, including all the data requested in the report form under Article 3 of the Convention.

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1967)

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. In the report received in August 2010, the Government provided detailed information on the applications for employment received and the number of persons placed in employment between 2005 and 2010 by the 33 offices of the National Employment Service (SNE) of the National Apprenticeship Service (SENA). The Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) referred in their comments, which were forwarded to the Government in September 2010, to Articles 2, 3, 6 and 7 of the Convention and indicated that the number of offices is inadequate, there is no effective coordination between the various regions and there are no specialized employment offices. They reiterated their comments in a communication forwarded to the Government in September 2011. They added that there is also a mismatch between the training provided by the State through the SENA and the training required by enterprises, many of which do not make use of the employment service provided by the State. In another report received in August 2011, the Government enumerates its policies for the generation of new jobs in the formal economy, the strengthening of labour market institutions, the design and implementation of active and passive employment policies, the strengthening of the labour inspection system and the system for the training of human capital. The Committee refers to the comments that it has made in relation to the Unemployment Convention, 1919 (No. 2), in which it emphasizes the role played by public employment services and private agencies in ensuring the optimal operation of the labour market. The application of Conventions Nos 2 and 88, ratified by Colombia, would give effect to the right to work and would help to achieve full employment (Article 1(2) of Convention No. 88). In the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized that the public employment service is one of the institutions that is necessary to achieve full employment. Together with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), Convention No. 88 forms part of a structure that is necessary to sustain employment growth (see paragraphs 785–790 of the 2010 General Survey). The Committee invites the Government to provide more detailed information in its next report on the manner in which the public employment service contributes to achieving the best possible organization of the labour market, with an indication of the manner in which employment offices have been able to meet the needs of employers and workers in each of the regions of the country. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its report on the new measures adopted for the establishment of institutions with a view to achieving full employment and it encourages the social partners to take into account the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), the ratification and application of which are important for governance.

Cooperation with the social partners. In reply to the previous comments, the Government indicated in the report received in August 2010 that consultations have not been held with the regional employment councils concerning the organization and operation of the employment service. The Government refers to information for 2003 concerning a survey carried out among employers on the employment generation achieved by Act No. 789 of December 2002, establishing measures to support employment and extend social protection. The trade union organizations, however, indicate that they are excluded and do not participate in the determination of general employment policies. In the report received in August 2011, the Government expresses its intention of involving public and private actors, as well as the permanent participation of partners such as trade unions and community organizations which are directly involved in fields relating to employment with a view of articulating and promoting the efficiency of employment services. The Committee emphasized in its 2010 General Survey that member States should promote genuine tripartite consultation on the subjects covered by the employment instruments. Priority needs to be given to consultations with the social partners in the formulation and implementation of labour market policies. The Committee requests the Government to provide tangible examples in its next report of the consultations held with representatives of employers and workers in relation to the organization and operation of the employment service (Articles 4 and 5).

Promotion of the voluntary use of the employment service. The trade union organizations indicate that the use of the National Employment Service does not provide or imply any benefit or incentive for enterprises making use of such instruments. The sole difference is the prejudice to the conditions of employment of those registered in SENA training programmes, as workers attached to the SENA receive lower wages than the others. In its 2010 report, the Government provided information on the number of unemployed persons who received guidance and additional training from the services of the SENA, as well as on the general labour market information made available to the public through the SENA employment observatory. Taking into account the policy orientations outlined in the new National Development Plan, 2010–14, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the national or local measures adopted in collaboration with employers' and workers' organizations to promote the widest possible voluntary use of the employment service, including an evaluation of the manner in which beneficiaries of SENA apprenticeship contracts have succeeded in obtaining suitable employment on the labour market.

Employment service and workers in the informal economy. In reply to the previous comments, the Government indicates that the National Employment Service contributes to the decrease in informality by providing incentives for the participation of legally constituted employers in the process of employment mediation. However, the trade union organizations expressed their doubts concerning the benefits deriving from the application of Act No. 1429 of December 2010, which proposes incentives for formalization during the initial stages of enterprise creation. The Committee invites the Government to include an evaluation in its next report of the impact of Act No. 1429 in promoting the integration of informal workers into the formal labour market. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the public employment service ensures the effective discharge of the functions set out in Article 6 of the Convention in relation to workers in the informal economy in the main cities of the country, as well as in rural areas.

Application of a national policy. In its direct request in 2010, the Committee invited the Government to provide its comments on the observations made by the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), which were forwarded to it in September 2010. The CUT and CTC indicate that, according to specialized studies, 85 out of every 100 Colombian nationals with a permanent disability do not receive the rehabilitation that they need, in most cases due to lack of resources. Furthermore, a policy has not been formulated for the integration into work of persons with disabilities which combines elements for the harmonization of employment policy with access to employment opportunities under equality of conditions for persons with disabilities. The CUT and CTC emphasize the important role played by the case law of the Constitutional Court in protecting the labour rights of workers with disabilities, even though court decisions have not succeeded in promoting employability, but only in guaranteeing the employment stability of persons with disabilities. The CGT also comments on the failure to give effect to the existing legislation and indicates that broader awareness-raising measures are required in accordance with the needs of persons with disabilities. In the report received in August 2010, the Government provided full documentation on the comprehensive standards for the protection of disability, the methodological guide for the implementation of a comprehensive socio-employment model for persons with disabilities and a detailed table of the forums of enterprises established to facilitate intermediation between enterprises and persons with disabilities. In the reply received in May 2011, the Government indicates that it is endeavouring to include the theme of disability in its various programmes in a transversal manner, and particularly in the framework of the National Disability System. The Committee also notes a further report by the Government received in July 2011 in which it emphasizes the role played by the Ministry of Social Protection in coordinating public policy on disability and as the body responsible for the National Disability System. The report includes a review of the case law on the strengthening of employment stability to protect persons in a situation of vulnerability or who suffer from a serious health problem. The CUT and CTC, in further observations which were forwarded to the Government in September 2011, reiterate their concern regarding the application of the Convention. The trade unions called on employers to generate employment and provide stability for men and women workers with disabilities. The Government should also afford greater accessibility to workers with disabilities at the national, departmental and local levels. The Committee invites the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the results achieved by the national policy of vocational rehabilitation and employment for persons with disabilities in terms of their entry into the free labour market (Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention). In particular, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its report the manner in which the representative organizations of employers and workers, as well as the representative organizations of persons with disabilities, are consulted on the matters covered by the Convention (Article 5). The Committee further requests the Government to provide with the report data disaggregated, in so far as possible, by age and gender, and taking into account the nature of the disability, as well as extracts from reports and summaries of inquiries as a basis for examining the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice (Part V of the report form for the Convention).

Comoros

Implementation of an active employment policy. Youth employment. Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's brief report received in October 2011. In reply to its 2009 observation, the Government indicates that the framework document on the national employment policy was approved by the Council of Ministers and that a Bill issuing the national employment policy has been prepared and submitted to the National Assembly. The Committee also notes the comments made by the Workers' Confederation of Comoros (CTC) in September 2011. The CTC confirms that, despite the approval of the framework document on the national employment policy, no legislation has yet been approved by the National Assembly on this subject. The CTC acknowledges that it was consulted on the national Poverty Reduction and Growth Strategy Paper (PRGSP) and the ILO Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP). The Government indicates that the support project for peace-building in Comoros through employment promotion for youth and women (APROJEC) has launched several activities to promote youth employment in the islands. The CTC calls for a mid-term re-evaluation of the results of the APROJEC project. The Government also refers to the lack of the necessary financial resources to continue surveys of young unemployed graduates and requests financial support from the ILO with a view to the general application of these surveys in other islands. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether the Act issuing the national employment policy has been adopted and to indicate whether specific difficulties have been encountered in achieving the objectives set out in the PRGSP. It also invites the Government to provide information on the resources used to achieve the employment priorities established in the context of the DWCP, 2009–12, and on the impact of measures and programmes, such as the APROJEC project, which are designed to facilitate the access of youth to decent work.

Collection and use of employment data. The Committee invites the Government to supplement its next report with detailed information on the progress achieved in the collection of labour market data and on the manner in which such data are taken into account in the formulation and implementation of the employment policy (Article 2).

Participation of the social partners. The Committee invites the Government to provide full information on the consultations envisaged in Article 3 of the Convention, which requires the participation of all of the persons affected, and particularly employers' and workers' representatives, in the formulation and implementation of employment policies.

The Committee hopes that the preparation of a detailed report, containing all of the indications requested in the present observation, will provide the Government and the social partners with the possibility to evaluate the achievement of the objectives of full and productive employment, in accordance with the Convention.

Costa Rica

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1960)

Modernization of the employment service. The Committee notes the report for the period ending May 2010. The Government attached to the report Decree No. 3436-MTSS published in December 2008 revising the national system of employment mediation, guidance and information and re-establishing a National Employment Mediation Council. The Government adds that in August 2009 the electronic employment mediation platform was launched. The Committee emphasizes that the implementation of Conventions Nos 88 and 122, ratified by Costa Rica, would give effect to the right to work and would assist in achieving full employment (Article 1(2) of the Convention). In the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized that the public employment service is one of the institutions necessary to achieve full employment. The conjunction of Conventions Nos 88 and 122 forms part of a structure that is necessary for employment growth (see paragraphs 785–790 of the 2010 General Survey). The Committee refers to the comments that it has been making for many years and requests the Government to provide information so that it can examine the efficient operation of the free public employment service, with the participation of the social partners and comprising a network of employment offices sufficient in number to meet the needs of employers and workers throughout the country (Articles 1 to 5 of the Convention).

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide statistical information on the number of employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by the national employment mediation, guidance and information system.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Adoption and implementation of an active employment policy. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes the Government's report for the period ending May 2011. In reply to its previous comments, the Government indicates that the Higher Labour Council did not approve the National Employment Plan. The Government adds that in February 2011 a proposal was made to the National Labour Council to develop a national youth employment plan and the proposal was received positively by the three social partners. With a view to promoting productive employment, the Government emphasizes that an electronic tool has been established (buscoempleocr.com) through which employment vacancies are found and where employers identify the personnel required for their enterprises. In a communication forwarded to the Government in September 2011, the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) expresses concern at the lack of a long-term employment policy with a vision of the State. According to the workers' organization, an employment policy should have the fundamental objective of generating high-quality jobs. The Committee emphasized in its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments that the first fundamental step for achieving full employment consists of a political commitment reflected in national legislation or the Government's main strategic documents.

The Committee also emphasized the importance of holding continuous and genuine tripartite consultations to address and mitigate the consequences of the global economic crisis (paragraph 513 and also its concluding remarks, paragraphs 785–790). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the progress achieved in the adoption and implementation of an active employment policy, as required by the Convention.

The Committee invites the Government to describe the manner in which the discussions held in the National Labour Council have been used to declare and pursue an active employment policy. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to include examples of the manner in which full account has been taken of the opinions and experiences of the persons affected by employment policy measures, with particular reference to those working in the rural sector and the informal economy. The report should also describe the measures that have been taken to compile and analyse statistical information on the labour market and provide updated data on the size and distribution of the labour force, and the nature, extent and trends of unemployment and underemployment.

Coordination of education and training policies with employment opportunities. The Committee notes the action taken by the National Training Institute (INA) to improve the skills and provide vocational training to the population, and particularly to women and young persons. The Government emphasizes the gender perspective promoted by the INA. The Committee notes that the INA provided training for more women than men through vocational skills and training modules and programmes, while the skills certification services catered for more men than women. More women have chosen to train in the commerce and services sectors, as well as in the food industry. The INA collaborates with municipal authorities to promote the access to employment of young persons and persons with disabilities, as well as with the National Programme to Support Micro-enterprises (PRONAMYPE). The Committee invites the Government to provide data in its next report as a basis for assessing the manner in which the beneficiaries of the action taken by the INA have found lasting employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the coordination of education and vocational training policies with employment policy.

Women's employment. The Committee notes that in May 2010 it was declared of public interest to establish and develop the National Childcare and Development Network. The National Development Plan 2011–14 includes among its objectives improving the employability of the workforce, and particularly of women and vulnerable groups. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which the measures adopted have facilitated the achievement by women of greater participation in the labour market.

Youth employment. The Government recalls in its report that a plan is being promoted to improve the vocational skills of young persons living in poverty and who are at social risk, particularly through a subsidy allowing them to follow training modules in private institutions. The Government adds that programmes have been developed for the employability, employment and entrepreneurship of young persons (the programme known as the Ventanilla Única). The Committee reiterates its request for the inclusion of information on the measures adopted for the development of the National Youth Employment Plan and to ensure lasting employment for young persons who enter the labour market.

Micro-enterprises and cooperatives. The informal economy. The Government indicates that microfinance is used to promote self-employment and ensure that households have a sustainable income. The Committee notes that the credits provided in 2010 by PRONAMYPE amounted to a little over US$3 million. The Committee once again invites the Government to indicate the manner in which the loans provided by PRONAMYPE have been converted into sources of sustainable employment. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the initiatives to promote micro-enterprises and cooperatives have had an impact on improving the working conditions of the those engaged in the informal economy.

Export processing zones. The Government's report contains the information provided by the Costa Rican Coalition for Development Initiatives indicating that in 2010 some 7,432 new jobs were created in export processing zones. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide updated information on the contribution of these zones to the creation of sustainable and high-quality employment.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Cyprus

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2011 containing detailed information in reply to the points raised in the 2009 observation. The Committee notes the data concerning employment and unemployment rates, as well as the employment situation of beneficiaries of the Special Prevention Action Plan 2009–10. The Government indicates that the economy was not directly affected by the global financial crisis due to the negligible exposure of the financial sector to toxic financial products. However, the economy was affected in an indirect manner due to its small size and open nature, resulting in a 1.7 per cent contraction in GDP in 2009 before rebounding by 0.9 per cent in 2010. The unemployment rate between 2008 and 2010 rose from 3.6 per cent to 6.5 per cent. The Government reports that the substantial increase in unemployment is a new and unfamiliar phenomenon for the country, which has traditionally enjoyed conditions of almost full employment. In 2009, the economic downturn primarily affected male-dominated sectors such as construction, real estate and tourism, which has led to more male than female workers losing their jobs. According to ILO data, the unemployment rate reached 7.1 per cent in the second quarter of 2011. The Government further reports that the National Reform Programme (NRP) for Europe 2020 presents structural reforms that aim to boost growth, employment and social cohesion. In particular, increasing labour market participation and creating employment opportunities for the highly skilled workforce by restructuring the economy remain top priorities. Along these lines, the NRP presents five national quantitative targets that are interrelated with employment, three of them directly related (employment: 75–77 per cent level of the population aged 20–64 should be employed by 2020; education: 46 per cent of the population aged 30–54 should have completed tertiary education by 2020 and the share of early school leavers should be 10 per cent; and social inclusion: reduction of the number of people at risk of poverty and social exclusion by 27,000 or to 19 per cent by 2020), while the innovation and the climate/energy targets are indirectly related, leading to increased competitiveness, more efficient use of resources and green growth. Furthermore, a National Action Plan for reducing the gender pay gap covering the period 2010–15 has been laid out and schemes aimed at improving the productivity of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) and the enhancement of the competitiveness of micro-enterprises have been implemented by the Human Resource Development Authority (HRDA) for the period 2010–14. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on how the measures adopted have succeeded in mitigating the impact of the debt crisis on the labour market and have translated into the generation of productive and lasting employment opportunities for the unemployed and other categories of vulnerable workers.

Education and training policies. The Government indicates that the HRDA has put forward a Special Prevention Action Plan 2009–10 which comprises the following main features: in-company/on-the-job training programmes for employees facing layoffs, training programmes for upgrading the skills of unemployed persons, job placement and training for unemployed tertiary education graduates, and accelerated initial training programmes for newcomers and other unemployed persons in occupations which are in demand. The Government reports that the strategic objectives set forth in the National Strategic Plan 2007–13 are being pursued by the promotion of targeted actions which may be classified under the following five priority pillars: (1) training and development of human resources; (2) support of enterprises for upgrading their human resources; (3) human resource development and infrastructure systems; (4) research and development; and (5) effective governance. In order to meet this wide range of training and development needs, the HRDA promotes specific schemes, each with their own aims and targets, such as: initial training programmes, continuing training programmes and other developmental activities. The Government further reports the launch of a Lifelong Learning Strategy 2007–13 (CyLLS) in order to promote lifelong learning in a systemic and integrated basis. As a result of this initiative, the rate of lifelong learning has improved from 5.6 per cent in 2005 to 7.8 per cent in 2009. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the CyLLS is in line with Article 2(a) of the Convention which provides for a coordinated policy that will be kept under review. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the area of education and training policies and on their relation to prospective employment opportunities.

Article 3. Participation of social partners. The Government reports that several evaluation studies conducted by independent consultants have been presented to the Board of Governors of the HRDA, which is made up of representatives of the Government, the employers' organizations and trade unions. Based on the evaluation studies results, the Board will make policy decisions for modifying and enriching the HRDA's training and development activities and thus improving the efficiency and effectiveness of vocational training in Cyprus. The Committee invites the Government to supply information on the policy decisions made by the Board, including concrete examples on the manner in which the views of the social partners are taken into account in the development, implementation and review of employment policies and programmes.

Czech Republic

The Committee notes the report provided by the Government in November 2010, including comments from the Czech–Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS) and the Confederation of Industry and Transport (CIT). The Government indicates that, as a consequence of the global economic crisis, the number of jobseekers has increased due to, in part, a fall in production. The Government further reports “made-to-measure” projects for specific target groups of jobseekers at the regional and national levels. The Government states that jobseekers are placed in motivational activities, are provided with consultancy on how to successfully enter the job market and requalification leading to an increase or change in their current qualifications, and are placed in jobs created and supported with wage contributions.

Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. Cooperation of the social partners. The CMKOS indicates that some advisory committees work better than others. The Government indicates that it very much depends on local economic, social and other conditions and circumstances. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report further information on the effective involvement of the social partners in the organization and operation of advisory committees and in the development of an employment service policy.

Article 8. Special arrangements for young persons. The CMKOS reports concern with the 2008 amendment of the Employment Act, more specifically with regard to the abolishment of assistance provided by the labour offices to university graduates for a period of up to two years after successfully completing their studies (for persons up to 30 years of age). The CMKOS regards this group to be in constant danger and should therefore enjoy attention through the stability of legislation. According to the Government, the situation of the labour market did not further justify special care for this group in comparison to, for example, persons with disabilities or people over 50 years of age. However, young persons are continuously considered as one of the most vulnerable groups in the labour market and are therefore subject to special attention by the local and regional labour offices within the active labour market policies. The Committee refers to its General Survey of 2010 concerning employment instruments, paragraph 800, and encourages governments to develop job-creation and career guidance policies targeted at educated unemployed young persons, as unemployment among educated workers, particularly young university graduates, is now an issue for the advanced market economies as well as developing countries. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the special measures taken to meet the needs of young workers, within the framework of the employment and vocational guidance services, allowing them to integrate or reintegrate into the labour market.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Employment policy measures. Consultations with social partners. The Committee notes the Government's detailed reports received in October 2010 and 2011, including comments from the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS) and the Confederation of Industry and Transport (CIT). The Government summarizes the discussion that took place on 18 October 2010 at the Council of Economic and Social Agreement of the Czech Republic (CESA CR). CMKOS and CIT both claimed that social partners jointly proposed the possibility to introduce measures that had been adopted in other European Union countries and had a positive impact on keeping jobs, production and overall employment. The social partners noted that unfortunately, these proposals were not further developed by the Government. CMKOS indicated, in its 2010 comments, that measures which promote greater labour market flexibility and reduce labour costs for entrepreneurs are one of the factors which contributed to the development of the crisis, worsened conditions of employees and did not necessarily bring the expected benefits in terms of raising entrepreneurial activity and a greater willingness of entrepreneurs to create more jobs. CMKOS believes that in evaluating the implementation of the Convention, the decisive factor should ultimately be the situation in the labour market and not formal reporting of government measures. The Government recalled in its 2010 report several employment policy measures taken during the economic crisis, mainly the vocational training and retraining programmes for workers, financed by the European Social Fund. The Committee notes the Government's expectations in the sense that the social partners will take an active role in the future when it will bring forward further reforms regarding the competitiveness of the Czech economy and its labour market. CMKOS indicated, in its 2011 comments, that it is dissatisfied with the application of Article 3 of the Convention because no consideration is afforded to the positions and opinions of social partners and trade unions, in particular, when adopting new labour legislation. CMKOS is also concerned with the Government's budgetary cuts in the implementation of an active labour market policy. In response, the Government reports that tripartite consultations have been regularly held and the mere fact of not reaching an agreement favourable to all does not constitute a violation of the Convention. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact and results achieved in terms of productive jobs creation by new labour market regulations. It also invites the Government to include information on the involvement of the social partners, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention, which requires that their views and experiences are fully taken into account when designing and implementing an active employment policy.

Employment trends and active labour market policies. The Government recalls that its economic situation during the 2008–10 period was strongly affected by the global financial and economic crisis, and reports that, starting in the mid fourth quarter of 2008, there were repeated monthly declines in industrial production amounting to nearly 10 per cent, whereas in January of 2009, the industrial production was down by 23.3 per cent as compared to 2008. However, the economy did show some signs of revitalization in 2010 as industrial production increased by 10.3 per cent and continued to rise through the first quarter of 2011, during which production increased by 12.7 per cent. Furthermore, the foreign trade turnover recorded the highest ever decline in the history of the Czech Republic in the first half of 2009, a decline calculated at 20.3 per cent when compared with the first half of 2008. The Government indicates that the implications of the recession were immediately apparent in the labour market through the gradual increase in unemployment and the reduction in the number of vacancies. Starting in December 2008, the reported instances of mass lay-offs started to increase with the highest number of reported instances recorded in January 2009. In June 2009, the registered unemployment rate reached 8 per cent and, in 2010, it further increased to 9 per cent and attained an estimated rate of 9.6 per cent in the first quarter of 2011. The Committee notes that, from January to June 2009, the total number of foreign workers decreased by more than 11 per cent, from approximately 285,000 to less than 252,000. The Government indicates that in 2008 the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs granted investment incentives to 45 investors who subsequently undertook to create 5,563 new jobs and train or retrain up to 6,132 new employees. In terms of regional distribution of this support, the most financial funds went to Ústí nad Labem Region (64.1 per cent), followed by the Moravian-Silesian Region (13.0 per cent). The Committee notes that the Government grants financial support in order to create new jobs in regions most affected by unemployment. Funds were attributed to investors who undertook to support and create employment, and to provide training and retraining. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide in its next report data concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, the nature and extent of unemployment and underemployment and trends therein, as a basis for deciding on employment policy measures, especially in regions most affected by unemployment.

Education and training policies. The Government recalls that, in December 2008, the action plan for the support of specialized education was adopted which focuses on the support of cooperation with employers, and accentuates certain measures such as the transition and success of graduates of specialized schools in practice. The Government further states that the national individual project involves practical training for young people up to 29 years of age registered by labour offices for at least five months, for the purpose of acquiring, improving and refreshing specialized skills. It further indicates that the practical training should comprise counselling activities as well as the hands-on training itself for the period of 6–12 months, during which time the labour office provides salary grants to the employer. In 2011, the Ministry of Industry and Trade prepared the International Competitiveness Strategy for Czech Republic 2012–20 (ICS). The ICS aims at increasing the employment of certain population groups, such as older workers, women, people with low qualifications and young people. As part of the ICS, the Changes in the Content of Education programme was implemented to change the educational system in order to help young persons acquire a wider range of skills and to motivate them to take part in lifelong learning. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information regarding policies and programmes for lasting employment opportunities for young people and older workers. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the ICS and its impact in overcoming the difficulties in finding lasting employment for workers affected by the crisis.

Business development. The Government indicates that the Operational Programme Enterprise and Innovation (OPEI) for the period of 2007–13 is intended to support business activities, namely in the area of small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), and to increase the competitiveness of enterprises. The OPEI grants support for the development of business activities and monitors the impacts of the measures on the creation of jobs via a newly created jobs indicator. The Government indicates further measures to create a favourable business environment necessary for the development of business thinking and to promote competitiveness of SMEs. These measures include the simplification of tax legislation and less administration as factors affecting the creation of a more favourable business environment. The Committee invites the Government to continue to include information in its next report on the effects of these measures on employment creation and its impact to improve the success of young entrepreneurs. Please also indicate how the social partners were involved in informing SMEs of key labour market concerns and opportunities.

Article 1 of the Convention. Contribution of the National Employment Office to employment promotion. The Committee notes the information provided in the report received in June 2011 in reply to the points raised in its 2007 observation. The Government indicates that the National Employment Office (ONEM), established in 2002, operates in five provinces out of 11 and that the extension of the ONEM to the remaining six provinces is being undertaken progressively. It adds that, in collaboration with private agencies, the ONEM organizes the employment market in terms of information, guidance, jobsearches, training and the placement of jobseekers. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the progress achieved by the ONEM in ensuring the effective operation of a free public employment service. It hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide the data requested in Part IV of the report form on the number of public employment offices established, applications for employment received, vacancies notified and persons placed in employment by such offices.

Article 3. Establishment of regional offices. The Government indicates that the delay that has occurred in the extension of the ONEM over the whole of the territory is related to the financial difficulties arising in its operation, but that other means of registration have been established to enable jobseekers to have access to placement services. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the establishment of a sufficient number of provincial directorates of the ONEM and on the other means of registration referred to by the Government to respond to the needs of employers and workers in each of the geographical regions of the country.

Articles 4 and 5. Consultation and cooperation with the social partners. The Government recalls that the decree establishing the ONEM provides for the participation of employers and workers on its administrative board. Although the board is not yet operational, the ONEM has concluded partnership agreements with the Enterprise Federation of the Congo (FEC), the National Association of Investment Enterprises (ANEP) and the Confederation of Congolese Small and Medium-sized Enterprises (COPEMECO). The Committee invites the Government to report on the measures adopted to ensure that the partnership agreements between the ONEM, FEC, ANEP and COPEMECO result in effective cooperation with employers and workers in the organization and operation of the employment service and in the development of employment service policy.

Article 11. Cooperation with private agencies. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/ETPS/062/08 of 18 September 2008 establishes the conditions for the opening, approval and operation of private employment agencies. The Government indicates that this Order gives effect to its commitment to ensure effective cooperation between the ONEM and private employment agencies. Under the terms of the Order, the ONEM has authorized the operation of approximately 20 private agencies, with which it holds periodic meetings to assess the level of placement carried out and to remedy weaknesses. The Committee observes that the Order is closely inspired by the provisions of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). It draws the Government's attention to the fact that Conventions Nos 88 and 181 are mutually complementary. In its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized that cooperation between public employment services and private employment agencies was necessary for the operation of the labour market and the achievement of full employment. Together with the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and Convention No. 181, the institutions envisaged by Convention No. 88 form a necessary building block for employment growth (see paragraphs 785–790 of the General Survey). The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the collaboration between the ONEM and private employment agencies. It also invites the Government to include information on the measures adopted to strengthen the institutions necessary for the achievement of full employment.

Djibouti

Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent a reply to its 2007 observation. Nevertheless, noting the information provided by the Government in its reports received in May 2008 on the application of Conventions Nos 88, 122 and 144, and with reference to its previous comments on Convention No. 96, the Committee requests the Government to provide a report containing information in response to the following questions:

Part II of the Convention. Progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. Previous observations reveal that the proliferation of private employment agencies following the liberalization of employment under Decree No. 11/PRE/97 has resulted in a reduction of the activities of the public employment service. According to previous observations from the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) and the Labour Union of Djibouti (UGT), fee-charging employment agencies have been legalized in Djibouti and are acting as filters for recruitment. Furthermore, the unions alleged that these agencies charge jobseekers and even deduct sums illegally from workers' wages. The Committee notes that section 7 of Decree No. 2004-0054/PR/MESN of 1 April 2004 concerning private employment agencies expressly prohibits the latter from imposing charges or fees on workers. Moreover, section 14 of the same Decree provides that private employment agencies are required to send the labour inspector and the National Employment Service (SNE) a monthly summary of contracts concluded. The Committee notes that, under section 31 of Act 203/AN/07/5th L of 22 December 2007 establishing the National Agency for Employment, Training and Vocational Placement (ANEFIP), one of the tasks of the latter is to monitor the application of the provisions of Decree No. 2004-0054/PR/MESN concerning private employment agencies. The Committee requests the Government to state the specific measures taken to monitor the activities of agencies covered by the Convention, providing a summary of the reports of the inspection services, information on the number and nature of infringements reported and also any other available information, particularly with regard to the recruitment and placement of workers abroad.

Revision of Convention No. 96. The Committee recalls that one of the objectives of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), is to allow the operation of private employment agencies as well as to protect workers using their services. The ILO Governing Body, during its 273rd Session in November 1998, invited the State parties to Convention No. 96 to contemplate the possibility of ratifying, if appropriate, the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). Such ratification would entail the immediate denunciation of Convention No. 96. Consequently, as long as Convention No. 181 has not been ratified by Djibouti, Convention No. 96 remains in force in the country, and the Committee will continue to examine the application of Part II of the Convention in national law and practice. In this regard, the Committee refers to its comment on Convention No. 144 and requests the Government to indicate whether tripartite consultations have been held within the National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training with a view to the ratification of Convention No. 181.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its 2008 observation, which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. The Committee notes the Government's report received in May 2008 in reply to the 2007 observation. The Government indicates in particular that, for the first time since the country's independence, structures have been established in Djibouti in 2008 for the organization and development of the employment market. The Committee notes the creation of the National Employment, Training and Vocational Integration Agency (ANEFIP), which is responsible for implementing national policies and programmes relating to employment, vocational training and vocational integration. The Committee also notes the establishment of the Djibouti Social Development Agency (ADDS), which has the task of contributing to the eradication of poverty among vulnerable groups and reducing disparities between regions. With regard to the employment situation, the unemployment rate is estimated at 60 per cent of the active population and young people are particularly affected. Furthermore, 75 per cent of workers are employed in the informal economy. The Government intends, in the context of the implementation of the poverty reduction strategy, to promote labour-intensive activities, vocational training, the development of small and medium-sized enterprises and microfinance. With regard to microfinance, funding given to women's organizations seems to have met with some success. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information in its next report on the results achieved by the ANEFIP and ADDS to implement an employment promotion and poverty reduction strategy, including updated quantitative information on the development of the programmes put in place to promote the objectives of the Convention.

Article 2. Collection and use of employment data. The Government indicates that the development of information on employment is one of the tasks of the ANEFIP. To that end, section 32 of Act No. 203/AN/07/5th L provides for the creation of an Employment and Qualifications Observatory. The Observatory will be responsible in particular for establishing an employment database and carrying out specific surveys in this field. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide information in its next report on the progress made by the Employment and Qualifications Observatory in collecting data on employment as well as on the employment policy measures adopted following the establishment of the new labour market information systems.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any consultations held on employment policies in the National Labour, Employment and Vocational Training Council.

Part V of the report form. ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes that, under the ILO's Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) in Djibouti for 2008–12, priority is given to job creation, with particular emphasis on women and young people, and to access to employment through vocational training. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the results achieved during the implementation of the DWCP in terms of job creation.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ethiopia

Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report received in February 2011 in reply to points raised in its previous observations. The Committee notes the adoption of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation No. 632/2009, which replaces the Employment Agency Proclamation No. 104/1998. The Government reports that the Proclamation was discussed and enriched in a tripartite workshop before its adoption. The Government indicates in its report, as also provided in the preamble to the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation, that the legislation was revised as it became necessary: to clearly define the role of public and private employment agencies in employment exchange; to further promote the rights, safety and dignity of Ethiopians going abroad for employment in pursuance of their qualification and ability; and to strengthen the mechanism for monitoring and regulating domestic and overseas employment exchange services.

Article 8 of the Convention. Protection of migrant workers. In reply to previous comments, the Government indicates that it has devised different mechanisms in order to protect the rights of Ethiopians seeking employment opportunities abroad, such as: verification, approval and registration of contractual agreements against pre-set model working conditions; providing pre-departure orientation and counselling services; and providing employment information to potential migrant workers. The Committee notes section 16(4) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation, which provides that a private employment agency shall submit the employment contract to the competent authority for approval and registration when it makes a worker available to a third party. The Government also reports that it is establishing an inter-agency national committee comprised of representatives of different ministries and of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions and the Ethiopian Employers Federation. The Committee notes that one of the listed powers and duties of the national committee, as provided in section 39(2)(c) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation, is to conduct studies with a view to concluding bilateral agreements with receiving countries on issues related to employment. The Government indicates that bilateral agreements have been concluded with different countries. The Committee also notes section 31(7) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation which provides that the functions of the public employment service shall include monitoring, through the Ethiopian embassies or consular offices, the overseas employment opportunities and protecting the rights, safety and dignity of citizens deployed abroad. The Committee invites the Government to report on the application of the new legislation. The Committee also asks the Government to provide particulars of cases when section 598 of the Criminal Code has been applied to abusive recruiters. It also again requests the Government to provide information on bilateral labour agreements concluded to prevent abuses and fraudulent practices in the recruitment, placement and employment of Ethiopian migrant workers abroad.

Article 9. Trafficking of children. The Government indicates in its report that the legislation clearly stipulates that recruitment of children by private employment agencies is prohibited and this provision is ensured by inspectors. The Committee notes in this regard section 16(2)(a) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation which provides that a private employment agency which sends workers for employment abroad shall not recruit a job seeker below the age of 18 years. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the measures taken by inspectors to ensure the application of section 16(2)(a) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation in practice.

Articles 11 and 12. Allocation of responsibilities in regard to the protection of migrant workers. The Committee notes section 16(2)(l) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation which provides that private employment agencies sending workers for employment abroad have the obligation, among others, to ensure that the worker has acquired the necessary skill for the intended employment abroad and to produce evidence to prove such fact. It also notes section 20(1) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation which provides that an employment contract concluded between a private employment agency, which sends workers abroad, and a worker shall fulfil the minimum working conditions laid down in the laws of Ethiopia and shall in no circumstance be less favourable than the rights and benefits of those who work in a similar type and level of work in the country of employment. Section 20(2) of the Proclamation provides that private employment agencies shall be responsible to ensure the rights, safety and dignity of the worker, and section 22 provides that the private employment agency and the third party, the user enterprise or person, shall jointly and severally be liable for violation of the employment contract which makes a worker available locally or abroad to a user enterprise. Furthermore, section 23 provides that any employment agency which deploys workers abroad in accordance with the Proclamation shall, for the purpose of protecting the rights of the workers, deposit a specified fixed amount, depending on the number of workers, as a guarantee. The Proclamation further states that the Government may release the funds provided as guarantee after six months from the termination of the employment contract of the workers sent abroad, unless there is a claim pending connected with the workers' rights and benefits. The Committee asks the Government to report on the operation of the abovementioned provisions of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation.

Articles 10 and 14 and Part V of the report form. Complaint procedures, supervision by the competent authorities and statistics. The Government reports that the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs has established procedures and mechanisms to receive complaints, alleged abuses and fraudulent practices (sections 35(1) and 35(2)(e) of the Employment Exchange Services Proclamation). The Committee requests the Government to report on the type and volume of complaints received, as well as how they are resolved, the number of workers covered by the Convention and the number and nature of infringements reported.

The Committee reiterates its interest in receiving detailed information in the Government's next report on the measures adopted to apply the provisions of the Convention which are referred to specifically in a direct request. The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Finland

Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181) (ratification: 1999)

Part V of the report form. Practical effect given to the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2010 and the comments by the Central Organization of Finnish Trade Unions (SAK) and the Finnish Confederation of Professionals (STTK) attached to the Government's report. The Government indicates that, in 2008, approximately 18,100 companies and public bodies and some 1,400 households used the services of private employment services. In comparison to 2007, the number of companies or public bodies using private employment services decreased slightly, whereas the number of household users increased. The peak in companies using hired labour was in 2004, when nearly 21,000 companies used hired labour. The number of temporary work agencies was approximately 100,000 in 2008, with temporary agency workers representing 3.7 per cent of the entire labour force. Approximately 388,000 employment contracts for temporary agency work were concluded in 2008 and the average duration of a temporary agency worker's employment relationship was 32 days. In the same year, a total of 4,400 people were recruited through private employment agencies (direct recruitment). In 2007, the corresponding number was 7,400 people. Respectively, the number of people recruited as a result of temporary agency work was around 4,900 in 2008 and 5,800 in 2007. The Government further reports that although figures for 2009 were not available when the report was prepared, it was apparent that the activity of private employment agencies diminished significantly due to the recession. The Committee notes that the Private Employment Agencies' Association, which includes the majority of private employment agencies operating in Finland, adopted a mandatory authorisation system for its members in the beginning of 2010. The Government reports that the system is challenging. Authorisation is granted by a board of representatives of employer and worker organizations and the Ministry of Employment and the Economy. The Government further indicates that it is anticipated that this approach will further simplify the operating principles of the private employment sector and enhance the reliability of its operations. The Committee notes that a tripartite working group conducted a research on temporary agency work and, on the basis of their report, four legislative amendments were drafted and entered into force in 2009. These amendments enhance the status of temporary agency workers, as they enhanced the legislation's applicability with regards to the special characteristics of temporary agency work. In addition to legislative amendments, the tripartite working group prepared a guidebook on temporary work for temporary agency employers and workers. The Committee notes the comments by the SAK and STTK indicating that, despite the statistics maintained by the Ministry of Employment and the Economy, there is no information on whether the rights of temporary agency workers are being met. For instance, no information is available on how many temporary agency workers' employment contracts are valid indefinitely and how many are fixed-term contracts. In the opinion of the workers' organizations, information on the duration of employment contracts and other factors pertaining to the temporary agency worker would be required and would enable clarification of whether temporary agency workers are provided with sufficient protection as required by the Convention. The Committee would appreciate continuing to receive information relevant to the practical effect given to the Convention, including extracts from reports of the inspection services and information on the number of workers covered by the Convention.

Articles 11 and 12 of the Convention. Protections for workers and responsibilities of private employment agencies and user enterprises. In reply to the previous comment, the Government lists in its report the binding collective agreements on temporary agency work concluded during the reporting period. It also reiterates that the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Act, the Employment Contracts Act and of the new Annual Leave Act cover hired workers on the same terms as all other workers. The Government further indicates that due to the divided nature of the employer obligations related to temporary agency work, compliance with certain employer obligations related to temporary agency work may require cooperation between the temporary agency and the user enterprise. Unless cooperation and information exchange run smoothly, problems may arise, especially in situations where compliance with employer obligations is sanctioned. In this regard, the Committee notes that a special provision was added to the Employment Contracts Act concerning the notification obligation between the temporary agency and the user enterprise.

The aim of this provision is to improve the concerned parties' right to receive information and ensure that the temporary agency can meet its obligations as an employer. The Committee invites the Government to specify the manner in which adequate protection is guaranteed for workers employed by private employment agencies with regard to compensation in case of insolvency and statutory social security benefits (Article 11(e) and (i)). Please also indicate the respective responsibilities of private employment agencies and user enterprises with regard to statutory social security benefits (Article 12(d)).

Article 13. Cooperation between the public authorities and private employment agencies. The Committee notes that the partnership project for finding new modes of cooperation between public and private employment services was brought to an end as a special project in 2008. This cooperation produced common principles of operation related to, for example, job advertising. The partnership project did not succeed in discovering new approaches to finding employment for jobseekers that are in a less favourable position in the labour market. However, the Government indicates that the Public Employment Services Act was amended in 2010 which allows private employment agencies to find job placements, or hire out to another employer, employees who are in a subsidised employment relationship. It further indicates that this amendment is expected to improve the employment opportunities of jobseekers when they are temporary agency workers. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the manner in which efficient cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies is promoted and reviewed periodically.

France

Part II of the Convention. Progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. The Committee notes the Government's report received in November 2011. The Government indicates that a meeting was held with the social partners in May 2011 to establish an assessment of the activities of Pôle Emploi. The Government reiterates that Act No. 2008-126 of February 2008 opened up the employment placement market to private employment agencies by bringing an end to the legal monopoly of the National Employment Agency (ANPE). The activity of private employment placement, either in a primary or secondary role, is henceforth provided by sections L.3121 to L.312-8 of the Labour Code. The Government also reiterates that the French legislation was drawn up based on the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). According to the Government, the new legislation provides a similar framework with regard to the conditions governing the performance of private employment placement activities by private employment agencies and workers benefit from the protection provided under Convention No. 181, if not a higher level of protection, in terms of a free placement service, the prevention of discriminatory practices with regard to employment placement and protection of privacy in the processing of personal data. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that, like other member States which have ratified Convention No. 96, France has accepted Part II of the Convention, which obliges it to abolish fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. The measures introduced in January 2005 and February 2008 opening up the employment placement market to private employment agencies do not give effect to the obligations contained in Part II of Convention No. 96 accepted by France at the time of its ratification in 1956. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to adhere to the obligations of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the ratification of which involves the immediate denunciation of Convention No. 96.

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report received in September 2011 regarding the application of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144). The Government indicates that the social partners have been consulted on the ratification of Convention No. 181. The Committee therefore invites the Government to provide information on the progress made in relation to the ratification of Convention No. 181.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Article 1(2) of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the detailed replies in the Government's report for the period ending in June 2011. It notes that the unemployment rate for the active population in metropolitan France was 9.3 per cent in the fourth quarter of 2010, amounting to 2.6 million unemployed persons. The Government indicates that the measures taken to improve the employment situation did contribute to an increase in the number of persons hired in the course of 2010, with more than 200,000 jobs created, amounting to annual employment growth of 0.8 per cent and an employment level almost equal to that recorded before the 2008 crisis. The Government nevertheless states that more than half of these jobs were attributable to a dynamic temporary job sector, particularly in industry. Furthermore, as the temporary job sector continued to generate employment, the proportion of persons in stable employment fell, posting a drop of 1.2 points as compared to 2009. Underemployment, affecting both part-time employees seeking more work and unemployed jobseekers (temporary layoffs and short timers), increased by 0.6 per cent over 2009. The Committee notes that with the entry into force of new subsidized contracts in 2010 – the Employment Initiative Contract (CUE-CIE) and the Employment Support Contract (CUI-CAE) – the number of workers in assisted employment remained stable in relation to 2009. The Committee also notes that the number of jobseekers registering with Pôle emploi centres has continued to increase in 2011. The Committee accordingly invites the Government to provide an evaluation of the active employment policy measures currently implemented and to indicate how, in practice, they have affected the creation of productive employment and the objective of reducing unemployment and underemployment nationwide. Please also indicate how the recent public debt retrenchment initiatives taken by the Government will contribute to improving the employment situation.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that the youth unemployment rate remains high, having reached 23.7 per cent in 2009, and that the employment rate in the 15–25 age group was around 64 per cent in 2010. In reply to the comments made by the Committee in its previous observation, the Government indicates that several measures to revive youth employment have been launched to facilitate the integration of young people in the labour market. Thus, in 2010, young people accounted for 85 per cent of all persons hired under integration contracts and support contracts in the commercial sector, and 28 per cent in the non-commercial sector, so that, in all, over 25 per cent of jobs in the under-26 age group were subsidized by the State. Work/training scheme has also been developed through fiscal incentives to hiring, such as the recruitment premium for hiring an additional employee granted to more than 55,000 enterprises, generating more than 65,000 new jobs, or the exemption from charges granted to more than 500 enterprises, enabling a further 33,000 persons to be hired. The Committee also notes the results obtained through the Social Integration Contract (CIVIS). The CIVIS has been offered to around 1 million young people since its creation in 2005, and 34 per cent of the beneficiaries, most of whom are low-skilled, have gone on to find employment. “Autonomy” contracts, of which 36,000 have been signed since they were introduced in 2008, enabled 10,000 new jobseekers to go on to employment in 2010. The introduction of “single entrepreneur” (autoentrepreneur) status and the creation of the cheque emploi service in 2009 have likewise had a positive effect on employment, generating an increase in self employment among young people in 2010. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide detailed information on youth employment trends, including statistics disaggregated by age, gender and any other grounds in respect of which data is available. The Committee invites the Government to include an evaluation of the active employment policy measures implemented to minimize the impact of unemployment on young people and to encourage their sustainable integration in the labour market, in particular the most disadvantaged categories of young people.

Older workers. The Committee notes that the employment rate of older workers aged from 55–64 years stood at 40 per cent at the end of 2010, with recruitment under subsidized contracts amounting to only 4 per cent in the commercial sector, and 19 per cent in the non-commercial sector. Although older workers have suffered less than youth from the repercussions the crisis has had on unemployment, the Government indicates that more than 6 per cent of this group were unemployed in 2009. The Committee notes that publicly funded retirement, arrangements, including early retirement, have had a positive effect on the activity rate of elderly workers. It also notes that in January 2010, new arrangements were introduced to encourage employers to adopt an active age management strategy. Thus, since 2010, provision has been made for the abolition of mandatory retirement at the age of 65 in the Social Security Financing Act, and the age at which an employer may order retirement has been raised from 65 to 70 years, this being the age at which the employer may terminate the contract of an older worker, citing the statutory age of entitlement to retirement benefit. In the public service too, employees may work beyond the maximum age and up to the age of 65 at the request of the worker and subject to physical fitness. The Government indicates lastly that, even though the activity rate of older workers varies according to age and declines rapidly after the age of 54, it has increased consistently in the last ten years across all occupations, and that large firms are increasingly giving consideration to employing older workers. The Committee requests the Government to continue to send detailed information on the situation, level and trends of employment for older workers, and to indicate the results obtained by the measures intended to remedy unemployment and underemployment among these workers.

Education and training policy. The Government indicates that the Joint Career Security Fund (FPSPP), established by the 2009 Act on lifelong vocational guidance and training, has provided support for more than 100,000 jobseekers and 250,000 wage earners. The FPSPP covers various types of measures aimed at affording jobseekers easier access to labour market information and at facilitating recourse to the “validation of non-formal learning” (VAE) system. The Government further indicates that the Association for Vocational Training for Adults (AFPA) enabled 60 per cent of its trainees in 2010 to find employment within six months of completing the programme, 30 per cent of whom obtained fixed-term appointments. The Individual Training Leave (CIF) system, which enables workers on indefinite contracts, fixed-term contracts or temporary contracts to undergo training of their choice, has enabled more than 80 per cent of the beneficiaries to keep their jobs and to sit an examination on completion of training in order to validate their experience. The Committee notes that the social partners recognize the effectiveness of the CIF and consider that it plays an active part in employment policies, particularly to the benefit of underskilled employees. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the programmes to promote lifelong training with a view to improving the professional skills of adults, together with an evaluation of how they affect the generation of lasting and freely chosen employment.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that the social partners are consulted both before employment policies are created and after they are in place, thanks in particular to the role the National Employment Council (CNE) plays in consultation. It adds that the CNE held nine meetings in the course of 2010 during which it was consulted about a number of decrees and a law pertaining to employment policy, and about requests for approval for decisions taken by the social partners, such as agreements on the temporary cessation of activity or the 2010 National Interoccupational Agreement on social management of the consequences of the economic crisis on employment. The Committee also notes that in 2011, the social partners introduced the Occupational Security Contract (CSP) to facilitate the return to employment of workers dismissed on economic grounds. The Committee asks the Government to include in its next report other examples of how the consultations held with social partners have had an impact on the formulation of an active policy to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment.

Ghana

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. Request for ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in the report received in November 2010, including comments submitted by the Ghana Employers' Association (GEA). The Government indicates that the National Employment Service is responsible for ensuring equal access to employment for all and organizing the labour market for the creation and maintenance of employment opportunities. This operates through a network of 67 public employment centres and youth employment centres spread throughout the country. They operate hand-in-hand with private employment agencies. The GEA states that over the years it "has not fully appreciated the efforts to improve the services of the public employment centres" and indicates that services provided at these centres are unreliable and inaccessible to both employees and jobseekers. The GEA has drawn the Government's attention to improve conditions at the centres in order to promote employment in the country. The Government reports that it acknowledges the need to strengthen the public employment service and collaboration with private employment agencies to meet the new requirements of the economy and the working population. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government requested ILO technical assistance to modernize the employment service. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the activities of the public employment centres and the contribution of these centres to the implementation of a national employment policy. It also invites the Government to include information on the number of public employment centres established, applications for employment received, vacancies notified and persons placed in employment by such centres (Part IV of the report form). With regard to the Government's request for technical assistance, the Committee hopes that the Office will respond favourably to the request. It further invites the Government to report on any new measures taken to build institutions for the realization of full employment and encourages its support for the ratification of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

Articles 4 and 5. Cooperation with the social partners. The Government reports that the National Tripartite Committee has been used by the social partners as a platform to consensually agree on a number of issues regarding employment and other economic and social matters. The Committee invites the Government to provide specific information on the participation of representatives of employers and workers in the operation of the employment service.

Article 8. Special arrangements for young people. The Government indicates that youth employment centres have been established to cater to the needs of the youth by providing vocational guidance to persons not above 20 years of age. Youth employment services are rendered at public employment centres in areas of the country without youth employment offices. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on special arrangements for young people initiated and developed within the framework of the employment and vocational guidance services.

Article 11. Cooperation with private employment agencies. The Government indicates that there are 75 private employment agencies operating in Ghana. These agencies are licensed and monitored by the Labour Department and are required to submit periodic reports on their activities. The Committee refers to its 2010 observation on the application of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), with regard to the steps agreed, in consultation with the social partners, to ratify the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report on Convention No. 88 the measures taken to ensure effective cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies, including information on steps taken in consultation with the social partners to ratify Convention No. 181.

Greece

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes the report provided by the Government in December 2010 for the period ending in May 2010. The Government refers to the provisions introduced in May 2010 promoting the operation of temporary employment agencies. It also indicates that it has implemented a merger of services in 2008 between local services of the Employment and Labour Organization (OAED) and Employment Promotion Centres (KPA) in districts and cities where both operated. This consolidated employment service unit (KPA2) operates under the auspices of the OAED. The Government further indicates that the OAED seeks maximum cooperation with the social partners, local government bodies and vocational training organizations in order to improve the effectiveness of employment measures taken. The Committee noted in its comments on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), a serious deterioration in the employment situation. It stresses the need to ensure the essential function of a public employment service to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market, adapting its operation to meet the new needs of the economy and the active population (Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention). The Committee requests the Government to provide available data on the number of public employment offices established by the OAED, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by the offices (Part IV of the report form).

Article 11. Cooperation with private employment agencies. The Government referred in its report to the legislative amendments introduced in May 2010 promoting the operation of temporary employment agencies. The Committee invites the Government to supply information on the arrangements made to secure effective cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies including data enabling a quantitative and qualitative examination of the placement provided by the private employment agencies.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

The Committee notes the replies provided by the Government in May 2011 to the observations on Convention No. 122 of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE) forwarded to the Government in August 2010. The GSEE provided new remarks that were forwarded to the Government in September 2011. Furthermore, the Committee takes note of the discussion that took place at the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the Conference (June 2011) with regard to the application by Greece of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It notes that the Conference Committee welcomed the Government's indication that it was working on arrangements with the ILO for the visit of a high-level mission proposed by the Committee of Experts to facilitate a comprehensive understanding of the issues raised by the GSEE in its comments concerning the application of 12 Conventions ratified by Greece including the present Convention. The Conference Committee also considered that contact with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Union (EU) would assist the Mission in its understanding of the situation (Provisional Record No. 18, Part II, pages 68–72). The Committee takes note of the report of the high-level mission which visited the country from 19–23 September 2011 and held further meetings with the EU and the IMF in Brussels and Washington, DC, in October 2011, on the basis of the request made by the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment policy measures implemented under the adjustment programme. The Government indicates in its May 2011 report that the economic downturn has negatively impacted the labour market and, in particular, the most vulnerable categories of workers such as low-skilled workers, people with low education levels, temporary workers and migrant workers. The economic downturn primarily affected the construction, manufacturing, tourism, financial and trade industries. The Government further indicates that, since the beginning of 2009, the ever-increasing loan cost of Greece and the downgrading of the country's creditworthiness by international rating agencies in combination with its ever-growing deficit caused the country's inability to meet its debt obligations. The Committee notes that the EU Council indicated in July 2011 that the 2008–2009 global economic crisis exposed vulnerabilities in the Greek economy, including: unsustainable fiscal policies, partly hidden by unreliable statistics and temporarily high revenues; rigid labour and product markets; and loss of competitiveness and rising external debt. The high-level mission to Greece was informed in September 2011 that the overall unemployment rate has risen to 16.5 per cent and youth unemployment stands at staggering 43.3 per cent. Although female unemployment officially stands at 19.9 per cent, a large proportion of women have joined the ranks of the "discouraged" jobseekers who are not accounted for in the statistics. The GSEE estimates that the projected unemployment rate will be approximately 17–18 per cent at the end of 2011. The Government reports that programmes have been implemented to increase labour market participation and to foster greater labour market mobility. Incentives include: subsidies for enterprises creating new jobs, subsidies for the unemployed starting up their own business, and support for small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs). The Committee recalls that in May 2010 the Government accepted a Memorandum of Understanding on specific economic policy conditionality which included economic policy conditions on the basis of which financial assistance is disbursed. In this regard, the Government intends: (i) to extend the probationary period for new jobs to one year; (ii) to reduce the overall level of severance payments; (iii) to raise the minimum threshold for activating rules on collective dismissals, especially for larger companies; and (iv) to facilitate the use of temporary contracts and part-time workers. In its May 2011 communication, in reply to the GSEE's concerns regarding collective redundancies, the Government indicated that Greek legislation was in compliance with EU Directives. With regard to the choice of the economic policy objectives and the deterioration that took place in the employment situation since 2009, the Committee invites the Government to specify in its next report how, pursuant to Article 2 of the Convention, it keeps under review the policies and measures adopted to achieve the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment. It further invites the Government to include information on how the measures adopted have succeeded in mitigating the impact of the debt crisis on the labour market.

Promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee notes the measures implemented by the Government to simplify and accelerate the process of establishing, licensing and operating SMEs. It also notes the establishment of regional one-stop shops to promote entrepreneurship and support SMEs. The high-level mission to Greece was informed that approximately 90 per cent of all workers were employed in enterprises with less than 20 workers, and only 6 per cent worked in companies employing more than 50 workers. Some 75 per cent of employed persons were working in SMEs with less than ten employees. According to the data gathered by the mission, 150,000 SMEs had closed down since the crisis began (one in four SMEs) and 100,000 were expected to close in 2011. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to improve the business environment in order to promote the development of SMEs and create employment opportunities for the unemployed.

Modernization of labour market institutions. The Committee notes that the Government has underscored the need to give priority to the modernization of labour market institutions. The Government has implemented a merger of services in 2008 between local services of the Employment and Labour Organization (OAED) and Employment Promotion Centres (KPA) in districts and cities where both operated. The public employment service will design and implement integrated regional and local employment measures aimed at promoting entrepreneurship for young persons and women. The Committee refers to its observation on the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), and invites the Government to provide in its next report on Convention No. 122 further information on the effectiveness of the reorganization of its labour market institutions.

Vulnerable categories of workers. The Government states that greater emphasis has been placed on active employment policies targeting young people, women and older workers. Different programmes have been implemented to improve professional qualifications of unemployed women in order to facilitate their integration in the labour market. The Committee notes that the employment policies targeting women aim at increasing their employment rate to 52 per cent in 2013. With regards to young persons, the Government reports that different programmes have been implemented including: “One Start, One Chance” to support 40,000 unemployed young persons who did not pursue higher education; “New Jobs” for 10,000 unemployed high-school graduates under the age of 30; and lastly, a programme to promote youth business initiatives. In its May 2011 communication, the Government also describes additional measures aimed at promoting youth employment. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of measures taken to ensure lasting employment for vulnerable categories of workers.

Education and training policies. The Committee notes that continuous vocational training schemes will be gradually transformed to articulate apprenticeship systems combining classroom education, on-the-job training and in-work practice. The Government also intends to encourage employers, particularly SMEs, to employ more apprentices. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government to the high-level mission to Greece indicating that a programme, essentially an internship programme, was established under the auspices of the OAED which aims to help young persons enter the labour market through contracts to obtain work experience. The Government indicated that the programme’s initial results were disappointing and legislation was modified in July 2011. The Committee further notes the Government’s efforts in identifying the needs of the labour market and linking vocational training to employment, as well as its plan to establish 15 life-long learning institutes. The Government reports on the creation of a specialized body to promote continuous vocational training and increase the participation of employers and workers. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on progress made to activate the National System for Linking Vocational Education and Training with Employment (ESSEEKA). Please also provide information regarding the progress made in investing in workers’ skills development.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes the strong concerns expressed by the GSEE that social dialogue degenerated into a summary, informative and superficial procedure. In the report received in May 2011, the Government indicates that consultation with the social partners is pursued to the greatest extent when reviewing employment legislation. The high-level mission to Greece noted that, in the field of employment, there appears to be a strong desire from all social partners for the promotion and development of sustainable SMEs, skills development and active labour market policies. The Committee recalls the role to be played by active labour market policies in addressing the human dimension of the financial and economic crisis. In its concluding remarks of the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized that social dialogue is essential in normal times and becomes even more so in times of crisis (paragraph 794 of the 2010 General Survey). The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which account is taken of the opinions and experience of the representatives of employers’ and workers’ organizations in the formulation and implementation of the labour market measures included in the adjustment programme.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Guinea

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the application of the Convention since its last report received in February 2004. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to provide a detailed report on the application of the Convention, including information in reply to the points raised in the Committee’s 2004 observation, which set forth the following matters:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. In its report received in February 2004, the Government provided information on the establishment of the “employment” component of the poverty reduction strategy approved in 2002, including its plans to enhance the range of vocational and technical training available, promote small and medium-sized enterprises, promote labour-intensive work and improve access to employment for women. The Committee also noted the objectives of the Labour and Employment Statistical Information Network (RISET), the establishment of which was already noted in its previous comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide up to date information on the measures taken to guarantee that employment, as a key component in poverty reduction, is at the heart of macroeconomic and social policies. It asks the Government in particular to provide information on the results achieved by group, such as for young people and for women, by the measures taken to improve the range of vocational and technical training available, on the promotion of small and micro-enterprises and on the jobs created by labour-intensive programmes.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and application of policies. The Committee recalled in 2008 that Article 3 of the Convention requires consultations with all interested parties – in particular, representatives of employers and workers – in the establishment and implementation of employment policies. It is the joint responsibility of the Government and the representative organizations of employers and workers to ensure that representatives of the most vulnerable and marginalized groups of the active population are associated as closely as possible with the formulation and implementation of measures of which they should be the prime beneficiaries. The Committee trusts that the Government will include detailed information in this regard.

Part V of the report form. ILO technical assistance. The Committee once again asks the Government to indicate the actions taken to implement an active employment policy within the meaning of the Convention, further to the technical assistance received from the ILO.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments, which read as follows:

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Community-Based National Rehabilitation Programme (PNRBC), initiated by the Ministry for Social Affairs and the Advancement of Women and Children, provides for vocational rehabilitation measures, including the integration of children with disabilities in schools, vocational training and promotion of the employment of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the measures adopted in the context of the PNRBC and a copy of the annual report referred to in its previous reports. Please also provide any other document containing statistics, studies or surveys on the matters covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

Article 4. The Committee notes that rules are applied to guarantee equality of opportunity and that a bill has been prepared on the protection and advancement of persons with disabilities. Please provide information on the content of the acts and to send a copy of the abovementioned text when it has been adopted.

Article 7. The Committee notes the existence of a department responsible for the occupational integration of persons with disabilities in the National Directorate of Technical Education and Vocational Training and that the National Office for Vocational Training and Further Training has established a special section responsible for the training of young persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action taken in practice by these services for securing, retaining and advancing persons with disabilities in employment.

Article 8. The Committee notes that vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities at their place of origin (rural areas and remote communities) is an essential objective of the PNRBC in collaboration with the Guinea Federation of Disabled Persons (FE.GUI.PAH). Furthermore, some measures have been taken, such as the establishment of branches of the National Orthopaedic Centre in the interior of the country (Mamou and N'Zérékoré) and the granting of tax and duty exemptions for any enterprise of persons with disabilities. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the development of services for persons with disabilities in rural areas and remote communities.

Article 9. The Government indicated previously that a National Orthopaedic Centre has existed since 1973 for the rehabilitation and apprenticeship of persons with disabilities of all ages. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the number of persons trained and made available to persons with disabilities.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Honduras

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1980)

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in June 2011. At the conclusion of the tripartite discussions, the Conference Committee invited the Government to update the information provided on new employment policy programmes, recent data on the size and distribution of the workforce, and specific information on the effectiveness of the measures implemented in reducing unemployment and achieving the objectives of the Convention. In particular, the Conference Committee requested detailed information on how tripartite mechanisms contribute to the formulation of employment programmes and to the monitoring and implementation of active labour market measures in order to overcome the current crisis and to ensure a sustainable recovery. The Committee also takes note of the observations made by the Unitary Confederation of Honduran Workers (CUTH), the General Confederation of Workers and the Honduran Workers' Confederation, in March 2011 and September 2011, as well as a communication submitted by the CUTH in September 2011. The Committee takes note of a new and very informative report from the Government received in September 2011, as well as supplementary data provided in November 2011.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Labour market trends. The Committee notes the trends in labour market indicators between 2008 and 2010. In 2010, unemployment affected 158,813 workers (nearly 90,000 men and 70,000 women), and 45 per cent of the population was unemployed. The Committee notes that “Vision of the Country 2010–48” includes employment objectives. Goals to be achieved by 2013 include reducing the number of households living in extreme poverty from 36 to 32 per cent, reducing underemployment to 30 per cent and affiliating 23 per cent of wage earners to the social welfare systems. The Government also indicates in its report that it signed an agreement with the International Monetary Fund for the financial year 2010–11, the main aim of which is to restore macroeconomic stability, improve public finances and support the creation of conditions for sustainable economic growth and public investment. The Committee observes that studies by the Central Bank of Honduras confirm the importance of remittance flows (which in 2010 accounted for 16.4 per cent of the country’s gross domestic product) to encouraging initiatives for job creation. The amount of remittances in 2010 showed an increase of 5 per cent over 2009. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information allowing it to ascertain the manner in which the employment objectives in government programmes have been reached. It also asks the Government to include data on the size and distribution of the workforce, and the nature and extent of unemployment and underemployment. Please also continue to provide information on the manner in which remittances from migrant workers contributed to generating productive employment.

Participation of social partners. In their communication of March 2011 the trade union organizations reported that they were not consulted in November 2010 when the National Congress approved the National Hourly Employment Programme. According to the organizations, the programme proposes to deregulate the labour market, which will deepen precarious employment. The labour market is saturated with temporary and contract workers, and the organizations make the point that abusive employers have no need of a specific programme in order to hire temporary workers. The CUTH indicates that there is no State employment policy for the creation of meaningful and decent jobs. The Committee notes the detailed documentation submitted by the Government to the Conference Committee and the additional information in the reports received in September and November 2011 on the consultations held in the National Congress for discussion and approval of the programme. The President of the National Congress and the Secretary of State for Labour signed a framework agreement on inter-institutional cooperation to facilitate exchanges on measures adopted. The Government plans to strengthen the Labour Market Observatory and in the future to set up a National Employment Service to implement and coordinate all the country’s employment programmes. The Government confirms that the National Hourly Employment Programme registered only 193 work contracts (73 women and 120 men) in Tegucigalpa, San Pedro Sula, Comayagua, Choluteca and La Esperanza. Most of the contracts were for two months with four-hour working days. Some of them were up to 30 months in length. Seventy-one enterprises have applied to the authorities for further information on the programme. In November 2011, the Government reported that 311 firms were registered as users of the programme at the national level. The Committee invites the Government to continue to send information on efforts made to hold consultations with the social partners in order to design and implement an active employment policy. The Committee stresses that it is important to take account of the social partners’ views and obtain their support in order to ascertain that the programmes implemented have generated decent jobs. The Committee would like to continue to examine up-to-date information on the supervision and follow-up of the National Hourly Employment Programme and the extent to which its beneficiaries have found productive employment, including details on their age, sex, residence, training and other particulars allowing a quantitative and qualitative assessment of the employment generated.

Coordination of policies. The Committee refers the Government to its observation of 2010 and asks in its next report to provide information on the programmes implemented by the National Education for Work Centre and the National Vocational Training Institute with a view of aligning the workforce and the labour market. The Committee would appreciate receiving more detailed information on measures actually adopted to coordinate education and vocational training policies with prospective employment opportunities and to improve the country’s competitiveness.

Impact of trade agreements. Export processing zones. The Government indicates that the main destination for exports is the United States (39.8 per cent in 2009). The United States is also the largest investor in terms of source of capital. The Government also indicates that the maquila industry (manufacturers established in the export processing zones) helped to reduce pressure on the labour market. The Government suggests in its report that most of the income earned by maquila workers appears to be spent in the informal economy. The Committee notes that some maquila enterprises run training programmes. The Committee invites the Government to include information on the results obtained in improving employment opportunities for workers under the Comprehensive Training Programme for the Garment and Textile Industry. It also asks the Government to provide particulars of any effects trade agreements have had on the generation of productive employment.

Micro, small and medium-sized enterprises (Micro and SMEs). The Government points out that an Micro and SMEs development fund is being created to meet the sector’s financial needs. The Committee notes that efforts are still under way to produce enabling regulations for the legislation adopted in 2008 to develop Micro and SMEs. It invites the Government in its next report to provide updated information on the impact of the new legal framework for Micro and SMEs on employment creation and poverty reduction, together with data on the running of the fund planned for Micro and SMEs.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that in 2010 the National Youth Policy was launched. The Government intends to submit to the Economic and Social Council an Action Plan for Youth Employment, based on strategic objectives that include social dialogue, technical education for employability and the promotion of business development. The Committee again urges the Government to step up its efforts to ensure that young people are integrated in the labour market and have the opportunity to find decent jobs. The Committee again underlines the importance of enlisting the support of the social partners and representatives of the persons concerned to the successful implementation of employment policy measures. It again invites the Government in its next report to include information on concrete results obtained by the National Youth Policy and the Action Plan for Youth Employment 2009–11.

Iceland

Promotion of employment for persons with disabilities. The Committee notes the Government's report received in November 2010. In reply to previous comments, the Government indicates that collective agreements were concluded in 2008 to set up a vocational rehabilitation fund (VIRK) following a tripartite agreement between employers' and workers' organizations and the state. According to its charter, the role of the VIRK is to systematically reduce the likelihood that workers will be forced to withdraw from the labour market due to permanent disability by enabling workers with disabilities to be more active, upgrading rehabilitation and offering other services. The Committee notes with interest that the VIRK began its operations in August 2008 and, when the report was prepared, 22 counsellors were providing vocational rehabilitation services with the aim to assist the individual to continue in employment or return to employment. Close to 1,400 persons received assistance from the counsellors and the demand for their services is continuously rising. The Committee also notes the variety of employment and training measures to assist persons with disabilities which are offered by the municipalities. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities. Please also include practical information, including statistics (disaggregated as much as possible by age, gender and the nature of the disability), extracts from reports, studies or inquiries on the matters covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

India

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. General economic policies. The Committee notes the Government's report provided in August 2011 including detailed information in reply to the 2010 observation. The Government indicates that it is implementing various employment generation and poverty alleviation programmes under the 11th Five Year Plan 2007–12 to increase employment opportunities in both rural and urban areas. The Committee notes that these programmes have not only generated employment opportunities but have also provided financial cushions for the workers and their families affected by the slowdown. The Government also recalls that the economic growth of 6–8 per cent per annum during the first half of the past decade has significantly increased the demand for labour and, hence, employment growth. The Government recognizes that employment growth has not been uniform across various population segments. Employment growth was much higher in urban areas than in rural areas and was significantly higher for urban females than for the rural males, rural females and urban males. The Government also states that addressing underemployment along with open unemployment is important for policy initiatives, particularly, from the point of view of inclusive growth. Youth were particularly affected by unemployment (for the period 2004–05, the unemployment rate was almost 30 per cent for young people aged 20–24 years). According to the Employment–Unemployment Survey conducted by the Labour Bureau, the unemployment rate for 2009–10 was 9.4 per cent nationwide, rising to 10.1 per cent in rural areas. The unemployment rate was 14.6 per cent for women compared to 8 per cent for men. As indicated by the ILO in the technical advice provided to the Government in recent years, the Committee notes that for an employment strategy to be effective, it is important to mainstream employment in the country's development strategy. The Government might consider going beyond special programmes and integrating employment concerns into policy-making at the macroeconomic as well as sectoral level. The Government and the social partners might wish to identify sectors that are more employment-friendly and pursue policies and programmes conducive to their growth based on an analysis of the employment impact of growth of such sectors. The Committee therefore invites the Government to indicate in its next report to which extent measures implemented under the Five Year Plan 2007–12 have managed to improve the quality of the employment generated and alleviate both unemployment and underemployment. Please also provide information on the efforts made to improve the employment situation for young persons and workers in the unorganized sector and the results achieved in terms of designing targeted programmes and incentives for promotion of sustainable job creation for the youth and for those working in the informal economy. The Committee would welcome continuing to receive relevant data on the situation and trends of the labour market disaggregated by state, sector, age, gender and skills, in particular for socially vulnerable groups such as young persons, women jobseekers, scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, ethnic minorities and persons with disabilities (Article 1(2) and Article 2(a)).

Promotion of employment for poor workers in the rural sector. The Committee notes the information provided on the various important programmes implemented to provide job opportunities in the rural sector. The programme Swarnajayanti Gram Swarozgar Yojana has been providing self-employment to villagers through the establishment of self-help groups since its launching in 1999. Thus, in 2010–11, 322,093 self-help groups received assistance under that programme. The Committee notes that the national policy designed for the creation of sustainable employment in the rural sector was renamed as Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Act (MNREGA) in October 2009. According to the data supplied by the Government, MNREGA provided 52.58 million households with sustainable employment in 2009–10. The total number of jobseekers that were provided with sustainable employment has been increasing steadily over the last four years. It was suggested to increase providing work for 100 days to 200 days and that special emphasis be put on fostering small industries. The impact of the MNREGA on the improvement of rural workers' wages was also significant in numerous states. The Committee invites the Government to continue to supply information on the impact of MNREGA and other major employment generation programmes in enhancing job growth and sustainable employment for poor workers in the rural sector.

Consultation of the representatives of the persons affected. The Committee notes that the 43rd India Labour Conference held on November 2011 included tripartite consultations and discussions on employment generation and skill development. The representatives of trade unions, employers' organizations and States and Union Territories proposed various measures to generate employment and sustain economic growth. The Committee also notes that the social partners have been actively involved in the skills development system and that they actively contributed to the elaboration of employment policies. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide examples of questions addressed and decisions reached on employment policy through tripartite bodies. It would also appreciate continuing to receive information on the involvement of the social partners in the implementation of the major employment generation programmes.

Part V of the report form. ILO technical assistance. The Government indicates that a National Employment Policy has been drafted in association with the ILO and is still awaiting final approval. Its objective is to accelerate employment growth, particularly in the organized sector, and to improve the quality of jobs in terms of productivity, incomes and protection of workers, especially in the unorganized sector. The Committee also notes that a Decent Work Country Programme – India Document (DWCP-ID) was launched in February 2010 in close cooperation with the ILO supporting the implementation of a national employment policy. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the action taken as a result of the advice received from the ILO in the matters covered by the Convention.

Islamic Republic of Iran

The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2011 which includes indications related to the 2010 observation, as well as replies to the comments raised by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The ITUC noted that the unemployment rate was very high and job cuts operated in large industrial enterprises in Asalouyeh and leather factories in north-eastern Iran affected the employment situation in those regions. The ITUC further indicated that the job market struggles to absorb the influx of young educated people and pointed out the difficulties for women to be fully integrated in the labour market. It finally expressed concern at the lack of effective consultations with the social partners on employment policy issues.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Application and implementation of an active employment policy. The Government provided in its report the document on general policies of employment adopted by the Supreme Leader, which contains policy orientations for the state authorities listed in 13 points. Its objective for 2010 was creating 1,100,000 jobs and a survey is being carried out to assess the achievement of that goal. The Government also reports that a database for assessing job creation is being completed and that the "Plan for development of fast growth and entrepreneurial enterprises", which started in 2006 with the aim of promoting small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs), is planned to continue. Moreover, various "Entrepreneurship plans" were developed. In 2010, a Plan for Rural Jobs was adopted. In October 2010, as many as 44,271 persons were employed in Asalouyeh. The Government indicates that supportive policies were adopted to create alternative opportunities for addressing the employment gap in the Khorasan province. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report further information on the procedures and mechanisms established to review and assess the results of its employment policy measures. The Committee also asks the Government to include information on the policies that promote full, productive and lasting employment opportunities to the unemployed and other categories of workers affected by the difficult employment situation in different regions.

Labour market information and employment trends. The Government states that statistics released by the Statistics Centre of Iran (SCI) are based on the ILO definitions. It further indicates that a comprehensive Labour Market Information System (LMIS) needs to be completed and staff in charge of collecting statistical data should be trained. The Government reiterates that differences in economic participation between women and men are due to social and cultural reasons. The real share of women in employment may be underestimated. Notwithstanding, the Government intends to take measures to address this issue through a plan aiming to increase job opportunities for women and promoting a legal and administrative framework for home-based work. The Committee notes that the Government's objective is to move women's work from the informal to the formal economy. It further notes that in 2010 the labour force participation rate was 39 per cent, being 61.7 per cent among men and 16 per cent among women. The unemployment rate was measured at 14.6 per cent, accounting for 11.9 per cent among men and 25 per cent among women. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report data assessing the effectiveness of the measures implemented to promote productive employment opportunities for women. It also invites the Government to provide information on any developments towards the establishment of the LMIS.

Labour market measures. The Committee notes the data provided by the Government on the operation of the Workers' Unemployment Prevention Fund. The Government indicates that efforts have been made to reduce the term of payment of unemployment benefits and extend their scope of coverage. The Committee notes the data supplied by the Government on job opportunities advertised at public employment centres and private employment agencies. The Government indicates that only a small percentage of jobseekers register at employment offices, whether public or private. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of measures taken under the Workers' Unemployment Prevention Fund. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to strengthen labour market institutions.

Integration of Afghan workers in the labour market. The Government reports that efforts have been made to provide Afghan workers with proper training and ensure that they and their families are residing legally in the country. The implementation of the plan to redevelop job opportunities in line with the national labour market needs is expected to increase job opportunities for Afghan and other foreign citizens. The Committee would appreciate receiving further information on the integration of Afghan workers and other foreign workers in the local labour market including information on the nature of the jobs available for those workers (see Part X of the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169)).

Youth employment. The Government indicates that the policies established in recent years have been directed at increasing job opportunities for the youth through technical and vocational training and support for entrepreneurship, as well as addressing the issue of graduates' unemployment. The Committee notes that the internship project provides for incentives for employers who sign internship contracts with graduates, and further incentives for those who employ such graduates. The Government indicates that, in 2009, 70,000 young persons benefited from the project and it is forecast that by the end of 2011 another 100,000 will be covered. More than 50 per cent of trainees were women and in some provinces this ratio reached 60 to 70 per cent. Both the Parliament and the private sector supported the continuation of the project. The Government also indicates that, in order to improve the performance of the State Technical and Vocation Organization (TVTO), it has designed the National System of Skill and Technology, which orients technical and vocational training towards the system of skills and technology and pursues, inter alia, the objective of linking skills training with labour market needs. The Committee notes that, according to 2010 data provided by the Government, the youth unemployment rate reached 29.6 per cent in 2010, reaching 46.5 per cent among young women. Referring to its comments on Convention No. 142, the Committee invites the Government to supply disaggregated data on young persons obtaining lasting employment following their participation in vocational guidance and vocational training programmes. The Government might also wish to hold appropriate consultation with the social partners and others stakeholders concerned on the difficulties encountered to obtain lasting employment for young people.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that the Supreme Council of Employment, which is composed of government officials, and delegates of employers' and employees' organizations, decides on the monitoring and following-up of the fulfilment of quantitative and qualitative objectives of employment in the programmes approved by the same Council. The Council participated in the development of the Fifth Development Plan with regards to the labour market component. The ITUC pointed out that consultations with social partners have so far failed to address employment-related issues. Independent unions must be allowed in order to create an environment that enables real social dialogue, through which problems related to employment policy can be addressed. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on how consultations with the social partners have been used in the formulation and implementation of the employment policy. In this regard, the Committee asks the Government to focus on the points raised in this observation and the procedures which enable to take fully into account the views and experiences of persons affected by employment policy measures so as to secure their full cooperation in formulating and enlisting support for such measures.

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's last report was provided in October 2005. Following the deterioration that took place in the employment situation since 2008, the Committee invites the Government to provide information on the measures adopted by the public employment service to achieve the best possible organization of the employment market and to meet the needs of the economy and the active population (Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention). It also invites the Government to provide relevant information concerning the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified, and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices in each region of the country (Part IV of the report form).

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

The Committee notes with serious concern that the Government's report has not been received since 2005. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to provide a detailed report on the application of the Convention, including information on the following matters:

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends and labour market policies. Following the deterioration that took place in the employment situation since 2008, the Committee asks the Government to provide an assessment of the impact of its active labour market measures adopted in order to overcome the negative effects of the global economic crisis on the labour market. It also invites the Government to include information on how the measures to promote full and productive employment are decided on within a "framework of a coordinated economic and social policy".

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the social partners, both at the formulation and implementation stages of employment policies.

Italy

Promotion of employment opportunities for workers with disabilities. The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received in October 2010, which includes replies to its 2006 direct request and comments by the Italian General Confederation of Labour (CGIL). The Government indicates that as a result of the implementation of Act No. 68/99 on the right to work of persons with disabilities, in 2008, 28,306 out of 99,515 persons with disabilities figuring on the mandatory employment list were placed in employment and, in 2009, 20,830 out of 83,148 were placed in employment. In its comments, the CGIL indicates that persons with disabilities are mostly concentrated in the 50–57 years age group, which makes their placement more difficult. It further indicates that public employment centres in Northern and Central regions are more efficient in promoting the employment of persons with disabilities. However, Southern employment centres improved their performance, which resulted in an increased number of persons with disabilities placed in employment. In some Central and Northern regions, persons with disabilities were employed in enterprises with less than 15 employees, although the employers were not bound to employ persons with disabilities. The CGIL stresses that more rigorous inspections should be carried out in order to detect enterprises which do not comply with their legal obligations towards the employment of persons with disabilities and punitive measures taken. In this regard, the Government indicates that in 2008 the labour inspectorate found 1,259 administrative violations of the legislation on the employment of persons with disabilities. In the 2010 inspection planning, persons with disabilities have been included among the labour market groups at risk. The Committee encourages the Government to strengthen its efforts to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities in the open labour market so as to ensure that they secure, retain and advance in employment. It requests the Government to provide an assessment supported by statistics disaggregated by sex, where available, of the impact of the national policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities on effectively increasing labour market participation for the persons concerned (Articles 3 and 7 of the Convention).

Practical application. The CGIL recognizes in its comments that Act No. 68/99 is a valuable instrument to create employment also in times of crisis, but regrets that its application is hindered by measures such as the suspension of the obligation to employ persons with disabilities and the hiring freeze in the public sector. Moreover, regulations implementing the legislation on the employment of persons with disabilities are still lacking. The Government indicates that the suspension of the obligation to employ persons with disabilities provided by Circular of the Ministry of Labour No. 2/2010 only concerns employers in the private sector who experience difficulties due to the financial and economic crisis. It further points out that, as clarified by Circular No. 6/2009 of the Civil Service Department, persons with disabilities are excluded from the hiring freeze in the public sector within the limits of the mandatory quota. The Government stresses that the adoption of legislation which would, in the CGIL's view, improve the application of Act No. 68/99, is under way. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the measures taken to ensure a better application of the existing legal framework on the employment of persons with disabilities. It also asks the Government to supply statistics disaggregated by sex, extracts of reports, studies and inquiries concerning the matters covered by the Convention, and particularly information on the number of persons with disabilities employed, including details on the type and duration of their employment arrangements, as well as on education and training opportunities offered to persons with disabilities (Part V of the report form).

Formulating labour market policy. The Committee notes the Government's report received in November 2010, which includes comments by the Italian General Confederation of Labour (CGIL). In its 2006 observation, the Committee requested information on cooperation between the national and regional employment services and private employment agencies with regard to the placement of underprivileged workers. It also requested the Government to report on the manner in which public authorities retain final authority for formulating labour market policy. The Government indicates that in 2008, 726 private employment agencies were authorized and registered, i.e. 28 more than in 2007. Some 600 agencies performed research and selection activities and 90 were acting as temporary work agencies. Outplacement activities were performed by 20 agencies, while those acting as employment mediators were only 13. Most agencies were located in Northern regions, especially in Lombardia, while only a few operated in the South. The results of research undertaken in 2007 on the cooperation between public employment centres and other labour market operators indicate that a significant number of private employment agencies cooperated with the public employment centres between 2000 and 2007. The Government indicates that labour market services have the potential to be further developed through mutual collaboration between the public and private sectors.

The CGIL indicates that new regulations under the 2010 Finance Act expand the role played by private employment agencies. Among other measures, the 2010 Finance Act reintroduced staff leasing, that was abolished by previous legislation; temporary work agencies to supply to allowed user enterprises employees benefiting from income support mechanisms in breach of the requirements established by the collective agreements applicable to those enterprises; and introduced incentives for temporary work agencies that place workers benefiting from income support mechanisms. The CGIL expresses concern that, following the adoption of the new legislation, private employment agencies are likely to focus on two objectives, i.e. the externalization of the enterprise activity and the use of workers benefiting from income-support mechanisms, which undermine social inclusion. Considering that only part of the workforce benefits from income-support mechanisms (1.6 million workers are excluded from any benefits according to Bank of Italy statistics), the Government appears to use public resources in a way that directs private employment agencies towards activities which increase labour market segmentation. The CGIL also observes that flexibility in the labour market is not the best approach to create jobs in times of crisis, as shown by the negative employment trends during the last years. Temporary workers, including workers employed by temporary work agencies, were most affected by the crisis. Private employment agencies were used for replacing workers with permanent employment. In the CGIL's view, providing further employment security should be reconsidered as a means to enhance economic productivity growth and achieve further social cohesion. In order to increase Italian productivity, long-term investments as well as better conditions for training and retraining workers should be promoted. Productivity and competitiveness will not be achieved by increasing the use in the workforce of individuals who are always available and easy to lay off. In its reply to the CGIL's comments, the Government clarifies that measures contained in the 2010 Finance Act were conceived in the crisis context and thus are intended to be experimental and of a temporary nature. Placement by the private employment agencies of persons benefiting from income support mechanisms was already provided by the legislation since 1991. With regard to staff leasing, which was introduced by Legislative Decree No. 276/03, the Government indicates that the possibility of supplying employees to user enterprises under contracts of indefinite duration is only allowed in a specific list of cases identified by the Decree. It further specifies that Italia Lavoro, which is entrusted with managing the active labour market measures provided for by the 2010 Financial Act, operates under the authority of the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection. The Committee recalls that Convention No. 181 allows for an improved functioning of private employment agencies by recognizing their role in the well-functioning of the labour market. It also stresses the need to protect workers against abuses. As stated in the Global Jobs Pact, full and productive employment and decent work are at the heart of the crisis responses. This includes enhancing the competence and increasing resources available to public employment services so that jobseekers receive adequate support and, where they are working with private employment agencies, ensuring that quality services are provided and rights respected (paragraph 11(2)(ii) of the Global Jobs Pact). The matters raised by the CGIL reflect concern that fair treatment for agency workers is not ensured with regard to their working and employment conditions. The Committee therefore invites the Government to provide a report indicating how the measures adopted under the 2010 Financial Act and subsequent legislation have ensured adequate protection for workers in temporary work agencies working for user enterprises (Articles 11 and 12 of the Convention). It also invites the Government to provide information demonstrating that the views of the social partners have been taken into account concerning the measures taken to promote cooperation between public employment centres and private employment agencies (Article 13). The Government is also requested to indicate the number of workers covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention (specifying the type and duration of their employment arrangements), and the number and nature of infringements reported in relation to the activities of private employment agencies (Articles 10 and 14 and Part V of the report form).

Japan

The Committee notes the Government's report received in October 2011 including comments by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC-RENGO). The Government's report refers to the 2010 Committee's observation as well as to the matters raised by the National Union of Welfare and Childcare Workers (NUWCW) in October 2010 and September 2011.

1. Employment promotion for persons with disabilities. In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted that the "Basic Policy on Employment Measures for Persons with Disabilities" was adopted by the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare in 2009 and was followed by a Cabinet Decision of 29 June 2010, regarding the Basic Direction with Promoting Reform of the System for Persons with Disabilities. JTUC-RENGO indicates that since the Basic Direction was adopted, there has been no sign of progress in the labour and employment-related policies for persons with disabilities. It also observes that the statutory employment rate, i.e. 1.8 per cent, is yet to be achieved and that less than half of the companies fulfilled their obligations. JTUC-RENGO calls for the promotion of comprehensive policy measures to improve the employment system of persons with disabilities. NUWCW also indicates that the socio-economic environment surrounding workers with disabilities has been increasingly worsening, coupled with the global economic and financial crisis: the number of unemployed persons with disabilities is increasing and decreased demand from private enterprises has seriously affected the Support Programme for Continuation of Work (SPCW). NUWCW stresses that only few of the employable persons with disabilities are employed under the quota system. The Government reports that the number of persons with disabilities employed has been increasing year by year and, as of June 2010, the employment rate was 1.68 per cent, representing the highest ever recorded. However, the Government recognizes that further employment promotion is needed, since this rate remains below the statutory employment rate and the percentage of enterprises that achieved the statutory employment rate was 47 per cent. The Committee notes that guidance will continue to be provided through the Public Employment Security Office (PESO) to enterprises that failed to achieve the statutory employment rate. PESO will also continue to support employment and workplace adaptation of persons with disabilities. The Government indicates that various measures will be implemented to further promote the employment of persons with disabilities, such as increasing the number of Employment and Living Support Centres for Persons with Disabilities. The Committee notes that the Basic Direction envisages reviewing the employment promotion system for persons with disabilities by 2012. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report an evaluation of the reform of the employment promotion system for persons with disabilities in terms of increasing the employment opportunities of these persons in the open labour market. It also invites the Government to include in the evaluation process representatives of organizations of and for persons with disabilities as well as the social partners. Please also supply statistics disaggregated as much as possible by sex, age and the nature of the disability, as well as extracts from reports, studies and inquiries concerning the matters covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form).

2. Follow-up to a representation under Article 24 of the ILO Constitution. Articles 1(3) and 3 of the Convention. National policy aimed at ensuring appropriate vocational rehabilitation for all categories of persons with disabilities. (a) Criteria used to determine whether a person with disabilities is considered to be able to "work under an employment relationship" (paragraph 73 of the tripartite committee report). The Committee recalls that it was entrusted to follow-up on the application of the Convention with regard to the questions raised in the representation under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Japan of Convention No. 159. The report of the tripartite committee established to examine the representation was approved by the ILO Governing Body at its 304th Session (March 2009). In the 2010 observation, the Government was requested to provide information on the number of persons falling under the categories that do not allow them to be covered by an employment relationship and measures taken to ensure that they may also benefit from opportunities in the open labour market. In its 2011 report, the Government indicates that as of February 2011, the number of recipients of Type-A programmes under the SPCW was 12,731 but the number of those who were not covered by an employment relationship is not known. The number of recipients of Type-B programmes under the SPCW, i.e. those not working under an employment relationship and not covered by labour legislation, was 100,599. The Government also refers to measures implemented by PESO to ensure to persons with disabilities employment opportunities in the open labour market. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the measures taken or envisaged to increase the opportunities for persons with disabilities falling in the categories which do not allow them to be covered by an employment relationship, to have access to the open labour market. In this regard, the Government is requested to supply updated information on the number of transitions from Type-B programmes under the SPCW to Type-A programmes and to open employment, as well as on the impact of measures implemented by the PESO on the transition of persons with disabilities from welfare to open employment.

(b) Bringing work performed by persons with disabilities in sheltered workshops within the scope of the labour legislation (paragraph 75 of the report). In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted the criteria according to which persons with disabilities engaging in activities at welfare workshops and small-scale workshops may be considered to be workers. NUWCW recalls that workshops and welfare factories (Type-B programmes under the SPCW and the Support Programme for Transition to Employment (SPTE)) appear to be the facilities for sheltered employment referred to by the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955 (No. 99). In NUWCW's view, the application of labour legislation to Type-B programmes under the SPCW is based on a very narrow interpretation contrary to the broad criteria of equal opportunity and treatment enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. Moreover, the transition to the new system under the Services and Support for Persons with Disabilities Act (SSPDA) was not sufficiently implemented and the sheltered employment system under the new scheme fails to bridge the gap in working conditions with other workers. NUWCW further indicates that several local governments have successfully implemented a social support scheme for the employment of persons with disabilities (sheltered employment system), according to the impact assessment made by the Subcommittee on Comprehensive Welfare for Persons with Disabilities. The Government recalls that an interim period until end of March 2012 is established for the transition to the new system. The Committee invites the Government to continue to report on the impact of the measures taken to ensure that the treatment of persons with disabilities in sheltered workshops is in line with the principles of the Convention, including the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment (Article 4).

(c) Low pay for persons with disabilities carrying out activities under the Type-B programmes under the SPCW (paragraph 76 of the report). In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted that the Government adopted measures to increase the rates of workshop pay in the framework of the Five-Year Plan to Double Workshop Pay (Five-Year Plan). NUWCW indicates that due to its questionable effectiveness, resources allocated to the Five-Year Plan were decreased by half in the Government's 2010 budget. NUWCW also points out that the average monthly wage in sheltered workshops is much lower than that of regular workers. The Government indicates that prefectures have continued to provide support for service providers to increase the rates of workshop pay in accordance with the Five-Year Plan. The Committee invites the Government to report on further measures taken or envisaged for raising workshop pay.

(d) Service fees for participants in Type-B programmes under the SPCW (paragraphs 77 and 79 of the report). In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted the measures taken to reduce service fees for recipients of Type-B programmes, such as the abolishing of fees for persons with disabilities from low-income households. NUWCW stresses that participation in programmes such as Type-B under the SPCW should in principle be free of charge. NUWCW further clarifies that the concern expressed for Type-B programmes under the SPCW should be understood to include the SPTE scheme and Type-A programmes under the SPCW. The Government reiterates that recipients of Type-B programmes under the SPCW, while engaging in productive activities also receive welfare support and thus pay service fees in the same way as recipients of other welfare services. The Committee notes that the SSPDA will be replaced by legislation comprehensively regulating the welfare of persons with disabilities, which will link payment for using welfare services to income and that discussions are taking place at the Comprehensive Welfare Panel for enforcing the new legislation. The Committee invites the Government to strengthen its efforts to ensure that persons with disabilities are not discouraged or excluded from becoming involved in such programmes and eventually gaining access to the labour market. In this regard, the Committee recalls that Paragraph 22(2) of the Vocational Rehabilitation (Disabled) Recommendation, 1955 (No. 99), recommends provision of free vocational rehabilitation services.

Articles 3, 4 and 7. Equality of opportunity between persons with disabilities and workers generally.

(a) Implementation of the Five-Year Plan for Implementation of Priority Measures (2008–12) (paragraph 80 of the report). The Committee notes the new data provided by the Government on the implementation of the Five-Year Plan for Implementation of Priority Measures (2008–12). The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report an evaluation of the Five-Year Plan for Implementation of Priority Measures (2008–12), including information on the involvement of representatives of organizations of and for persons with disabilities, as well as of the social partners, in the evaluation process.

(b) Quota system for the employment of persons with disabilities (paragraphs 81 and 82 of the report). In the 2010 observation, the Government was requested to provide information on the impact of the quota system, limited to persons with physical and intellectual disabilities, on the employment opportunities of persons with other disabilities. The Government indicates that in 2010, 244,621 persons with disabilities of which 95,347 with severe disabilities were employed under the quota system, marking an increase of 5,851 and 2,927 respectively, compared to 2009. NUWCW indicates that further information on the duration of employment is needed to corroborate the data on the increase in the employment of persons with intellectual disabilities. In view of the overwhelming increase in the number of jobseekers with disabilities, NUWCW questions the double counting practice effectiveness and calls for the adoption of policies focusing on improving the employment of persons with severe disabilities. The Government points out that in the 2009–10 period, dismissals decreased more rapidly among persons with disabilities than for other categories of workers. The Government indicates that the increase in the employment of both persons with severe and non-severe disabilities proves that the double counting system does not prevent the employment of those with non-severe disabilities. It further indicates that various measures have been taken for promoting the employment of persons with severe disabilities, such as fiscal and financial incentives to undertakings which employ persons with particular difficulties in finding employment. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide relevant information on persons with disabilities employed under the quota system.

(c) Reasonable accommodation (paragraph 84). In its 2010 observation, the Committee noted that a study group was to be formed on the issue of reasonable accommodation. NUWCW indicates that this issue was discussed in 2010 within the Subcommittee for Employment of Persons with Disabilities of the Labour Policy Council. While the Subcommittee agreed on the obligation for employers to provide reasonable accommodation, the issue of whether or not the lack of provision of reasonable accommodation was to be regarded as discrimination was left for further discussion. NUWCW further indicates that the Persons with Disabilities Abuse Prevention Act, approved in June 2011, while prohibiting dismissal and other unfavourable treatment against persons with disabilities, does not clearly stipulate the means to ensure reasonable accommodation at the workplace and the procedure to settle conflicts between workers and the management on such issues. The Government indicates that the Basic Direction established that conclusions on measures to prohibit discrimination with regard to work and employment on the basis of disability and to secure the provision of reasonable accommodation at the workplace will be reached in 2012. It further reports that the issue will continue to be discussed by the Discrimination Prohibition Panel of the Committee for Disability Policy Reform. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report updated information regarding the ongoing discussion on the matter of reasonable accommodation.

3. Consultation with representative organizations of employers and workers. The Government indicates that the Subcommittee on Employment of Persons with Disabilities was established to discuss at a quadripartite level (Government, social partners and representatives of persons with disabilities) important matters related to the employment of persons with disabilities. NUWCW points out that it is not represented within the Subcommittee and, therefore, is not granted the opportunity to officially express its views. In this regard, it alleges that workers' opinions are not taken sufficiently into account by the Government. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Health, Labour and Welfare, upon request from trade unions, organizes meetings between ministerial officers and trade unions representatives in which the opinions of the latter may be heard and that the last of such meetings were held in November 2010 and May 2011. The Committee requests the Government to provide other concrete examples of how the views and concerns of representatives of workers' and employers' organizations as well as of organizations of and for persons with disabilities, are taken into account in the formulation and implementation of the policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities.

[The Government is requested to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Republic of Korea

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Overall labour market trends. The Committee notes the Government's report for the period ending in May 2010, which includes replies to previous comments and detailed labour market data indicating that the rate of unemployment was 3.6 per cent in 2009 (0.4 percentage point higher than in 2008), a first such increase since 2005. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) stating that the nation's capability to create jobs has been deteriorating as the economy followed a pattern of economic growth without employment generation. The employment rate was close to 59 per cent in 2009, and the figure has not changed much for years, posing employment issues. The unemployment rate was 4.1 per cent in March 2010, but the KCTU observes that more than 3 million workers are underemployed, including a very important number of young workers. The Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) has also observed that the Government initiatives to boost employment through growth and labour market flexibility were identified as a cause of the global economic crisis. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report, as it did in the past, an analysis of the labour market trends taking into account the assessment made by the social partners of the effectiveness of the employment policy measures implemented.

Job creation measures. The Committee notes from the report that job creation projects directly funded by the Government created 810,000 jobs, including major public works programmes such as the Hope Work Project which employed 250,000 people from low-income families. The Government indicates that despite a growing number of jobseekers due to the economic crisis and programmes implemented to provide vocational skills development, some workplaces had trouble finding suitable workers. The Committee also notes that under the national strategy and five-year plan for green growth established in July 2009, the Government laid the foundation for the creation of decent green jobs by monitoring working conditions and improving work environments, including the introduction of new technical qualifications to meet the needs of green industries. The number of green jobs was estimated at 610,000 in 2008 and the Government expects it will rise at an annual average of 6 per cent from 2009 to 2013, reaching about 810,000 people in 2013. The FKTU indicates that 78 per cent of the projects announced are public works and construction projects, but the funds allocated for research and development for the green economy appear to be limited when taking into account the expectations. The Committee invites the Government to continue to supply information on the impact of the measures taken to promote full employment within a framework of a coordinated economic and social policy.

Employment generation and deregulation. The KCTU expresses concern to many deregulation initiatives considered as job creation measures by the Government. It claims that the Government is revising laws and labour market institutions to increase non-regular workers and dispatched workers, facilitate part-time work and expand private employment services. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact and results achieved in terms of productive job creation by new labour market regulations.

Youth employment promotion. The Government indicates that 426,000 young persons were having difficulties in finding employment in May 2010, representing a youth unemployment rate of 6.4 per cent, compared to 8.1 per cent in 2009. The Government launched measures aimed to provide short-term jobs to young people and enhance their employability. The New Start Project provided young people with comprehensive individually specialized employment services. The FKTU indicates that one in every four young persons is in fact out of work and claims that the youth employment measures implemented by the Government produced poor results when looking at the total amount of funds invested. It further indicates that public institutions and local public enterprises do not comply with their obligation under the Special Act on the Promotion of Youth Employment, as amended in June 2010, to hire at least three unemployed young people per year for every 100 workers employed. The KCTU denounces the significant reduction of decent jobs for young people, as jobs created by the Government for the youth have been low-wage or temporary jobs on a less than one-year contract. The Committee asks the Government to provide in its next report data which will allow assessing the effectiveness of the various measures implemented to promote the long-term integration of young persons in the labour market. The Government might also wish to hold appropriate consultations with the social partners and representatives of the stakeholders concerned in overcoming the difficulties encountered to obtain lasting employment for young people. In this regard, the Committee recalls its concluding remarks in the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, where it was noted that there is a growing problem of unemployment among educated workers, particularly young university graduates, who are unable to find secure employment commensurate with their skill level. Not only are their skills underutilized, but this pattern of casual jobs can prove detrimental to their lifetime career progression. The Committee encourages the Government to develop job creation and career guidance policies targeted at educated young unemployed persons, as well as other categories of young people having difficulties in finding employment.

Employment promotion for women. The Committee notes that the female participation rate increased to 50.5 per cent in May 2010 (6 percentage points higher than in 2009). The Government also reports on various measures to ease childcare burden on working women and to support reconciliation between work and family life. It also mentions a draft of a five-year plan to prepare for a low fertility and aging society, to be adopted after consultations and a public hearing. The FKTU indicates that, in its effort to promote decentralization, the Government is delegating its responsibilities relating to equal employment to local governments. The KCTU claims that regular female employment continues to fall. The Committee asks the Government to provide in its next report data which will allow it to assess the effectiveness of the various measures implemented to promote productive employment opportunities for women.

Employment promotion of older workers. The Government indicates that it supported 274,849 people by providing subsidies for employment promotion for older workers and 1,497 people in 224 workplaces by paying allowances to compensate for wage cuts under the wage peak system. The Committee notes that a total of 3,031 people were employed after completing short-term adaptation for middle and old-aged people and that the employment rate for people aged 55–63 increased from 57.8 per cent in 2003 to 60.4 in 2009. The FKTU indicates that in 2003, people retired from their major career at 54 and then spend some 13–14 years in their second career with poor working conditions before complete retirement. The focus of the measures targeting those aged 55 or above is placed on implementing job retention and there are few job creation policies for older workers. The FKTU further notes that the recommendations included in the Act on Prohibition of Age Discrimination in Employment and Aged Employment Promotion were not accompanied by penal provisions and do not work effectively as measures for older workers. The Committee asks the Government to include data which will allow it to assess the effectiveness of the various measures implemented to promote productive employment opportunities for older workers.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. In reply to previous comments, the Government summarized in its report the agenda of the meetings held by the Regional Tripartite Consultative Body. The FKTU indicates that only government agencies participated in the process of setting up a national employment strategy without involving the representatives of the workers' organizations or the tripartite Economic and Social Development Commission. The KCTU asks for further measures to improve the quality of employment, creation of decent jobs in the public and social service sectors, building employment protection and new infrastructure for the public employment services. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on how consultations with the social partners have been used in the formulation and implementation of the employment policy. In this regard, the Committee asks the Government to focus on the points raised in this observation and the procedures which enable it to take fully into account the views and experiences of persons affected by employment policy measures.

Kyrgyzstan

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the application of the Convention since its last report received in June 2005. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to provide a report including information in reply to the points raised in the Committee's 2005 observation, which sets forth the following matters.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Policies to promote employment and coordination with poverty reduction. The Government enumerated the aims of the National Employment Policy, which was established in the context of the national poverty reduction strategy 2003–05, and was approved by Decree No. 126 on 14 March 2005. The objectives of the employment policy aimed, among others, at assisting unemployed citizens in choosing an occupation and placement; improving vocational training and retraining of the unemployed; organizing temporary employment and voluntary work; preventing the rise of unemployment by eliminating or reducing the effect of the factors which lead to mass unemployment; and supporting entrepreneurship and self-employment. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that employment, as a key element of poverty reduction, is central to macroeconomic and social policies. Indeed, the Committee considers that it is essential from the outset for employment objectives to be included “as a major goal” in the formulation of economic and social policy if these objectives are truly to be an integral part of the policies that are adopted. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results and progress achieved with the implementation of the measures envisaged by the National Employment Plan, including information on the employment situation of socially vulnerable groups such as women, young persons and older workers.

The Committee also requests the Government to include in its next report information on the following matters that were raised in its 2004 observation:

- training and retraining measures for workers affected by structural reforms (such as the declining of the Kumtor gold mine);
- the impact of the different programmes adopted by the Government concerning specific groups of workers, such as the “National programme ‘Zhashtyk’ on youth development until 2010” and the “State programme ‘New Generation’ for the protection of children’s rights”.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and application of policies. The Government reported that a tripartite committee has been created to regulate issues of employment promotion, which held its first session on 17 May 1999. The basic tasks of the tripartite committee: were the preparation of the National Employment Policy up to 2010; the development of corresponding measures to determine future directions in reducing tensions in the labour market; and the development of proposals to introduce amendments in Kyrgyz legislation on employment promotion and other regulatory acts in application of employment policy. The Committee asks the Government to provide specific information about the operation of the abovementioned tripartite committee, as well as the involvement of social partners in the formulation and implementation of the National Employment Plan. It also requests information regarding the measures taken or contemplated to involve in the consultations required by the Convention.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the Government’s report received in June 2005, which is the second report received since the ratification of the Convention, for the period of 2004 through to the first quarter of 2005. The Government concedes that the situation of the labour market in Kyrgyzstan is exceptionally difficult. On 1 April 2005, there were on average 22 applicants for every job vacancy. Under these difficult conditions, persons with disabilities are particularly vulnerable. The basic objective of the state employment service is first and foremost to get them into employment. Two hundred and thirty five persons with disabilities applied to the employment services – of which 89 were placed in work – during the period covered by the report.

The Committee also notes the difficulties to implement the system of quotas in workplaces for persons with disabilities. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue its efforts in order to enable people with disabilities to participate in the open labour market. The Committee asks the Government to regularly provide information on the manner in which difficulties have been overcome and the progress achieved by the National Employment Policy, in so far as it concerns vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities (Article 2 of the Convention).

Access to the open labour market for persons with disabilities. The Committee notes that a project on social support for persons with disabilities with visual and audio impairments was implemented in 2002, and that the results of the project were reviewed and evaluated in the Tripartite Committee on employment promotion issues. The Government mentions, however, that the experiment was halted due to lack of funds. The Government is requested to keep the Committee informed of any further measures taken with a view to promoting the employment of persons with disabilities on the free labour market (Article 3).

Effective equality of opportunities and treatment between workers with disabilities, whether men or women, and other workers. The Committee takes note of the measures set out in the decree of the President on the national plan of action to increase gender equality 2002–06. It asks the Government to provide further information on the impact of the measures aimed at effective equality of opportunity and treatment between workers with disabilities and other workers (Article 4).

Consultation of the representative organizations. In reply to previous comments, the Government states that consultations and exchanges of views with workers’ and employers’ representative organizations are held on a continuing basis through regular meetings of the tripartite committee on regulation of the labour market, including persons with disabilities. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of the tripartite committee and on the outcome of any consultations held on the application of the national policy for the rehabilitation of workers with disabilities during the period covered by the next report. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate if any other organization was created by the Act on the Social Protection of Persons with Disabilities, besides the Society for Deaf and Blind referred to in the Government’s report, and to describe the manner in which these organizations are consulted on the implementation of that policy (Article 5).

Vocational rehabilitation and employment services in rural areas and remote communities. Please describe the measures taken to promote the establishment and development of vocational rehabilitation and employment services for persons with disabilities in rural areas and remote communities (Article 8).

Training of staff responsible for vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities. Please indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the availability of suitably qualified vocational rehabilitation staff, in accordance with this Article of the Convention and section 17 of the Act on the Social Protection of Persons with Disabilities concerning training of vocational rehabilitation staff (Article 9).

Lithuania

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 2004)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Employment trends. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2010 which includes detailed information in reply to its 2009 observation. The Government indicates that as a result of the global economic crisis in 2008, the country's economy and financial sector suffered from a slowdown in economic growth. Credit resources in Lithuania became inaccessible and the Lithuanian economy experienced a great overheat in 2004–08, resulting in a greater decline than other EU Member States. On 9 December 2009, the Programme of the fifteenth Government of the Republic of Lithuania was approved and noted that globalization, emigration of the labour force, in particular of high-skilled specialists, has become a threatening holdout for economic development; therefore the Government will put resolute efforts in restructuring the labour market and the related institutions to ensure successful economic development and growth for the benefit and welfare of the country's population. The Government reports that the employment rate was calculated at 64.3 per cent in 2008, a 0.6 percentage point decline when compared to 2007, and decreased to 60.1 per cent in 2009 and 57.8 per cent in 2010. The Government further reports that the unemployment rate reached 13.7 per cent in 2009, twice as high as the previous year, and the Committee notes the Eurostat unemployment figures calculated this rate at 15.6 per cent in May 2011. The Government indicates that labour market policy was restructured so as to involve as much unemployed persons as possible in active labour market policy measures. The essential objective in 2009 was to stabilize the situation of the labour market and create employment opportunities for dismissed workers. The Law on Employment Support, adopted in 2009, aimed at creating conditions favourable to increase employment possibilities for individuals through active labour market policy measures such as retraining, subsidized employment, support for creating jobs, support for territorial mobility of the unemployed, job rotation, public works and self-employment. In 2009, the territorial labour exchange offices of the country referred over 47,500 persons to active labour market policy measures. Following the enactment of revised provisions of the Law on Employment Support, the Lithuanian Labour Market Training Authority ceased being the institution implementing employment support policy as of October 2010, and was replaced by the Lithuanian Labour Exchange and its 10 territorial labour exchange offices. The Lithuanian Labour Exchange prepares reports on the assessment of the situation of the labour market in Lithuania and labour market forecasts. It also provides statistical information to the Department of Statistics of the Government following surveys carried out by the territorial labour exchange offices. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the extent to which active labour market policies are coordinated so as to effectively translate into productive employment creation. It also invites the Government to provide in its next report information and data concerning the size and distribution of the labour force, the nature and extent of unemployment and underemployment and trends therein by region, as a basis for deciding on employment policy.

Regional development. The Government reports that provisions of the Law on Employment Support, as of 1 August 2009, created preconditions for the implementation of the measures for supporting territorial mobility and promoting employment with regard to jobs available in remote locations. The Committee notes that unemployed persons who obtain employment in remote areas shall be paid compensation which covers some expenses, such as commuting and accommodation costs, as indicated in the legislation. Following redundancies at the Ignalina Nuclear Power Plant (INPP), the Government indicates that monitoring of the labour market in the INPP region is carried out on a continuous basis, through the organization of individual and group consultations with employers and jobseekers in the region, with the aim of further integration of the redundant INPP employees in the labour market. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on specific measures undertaken to promote employment in remote areas of the country.

Small and medium-sized enterprises. Cooperatives. The Government reports that amendments were introduced to the Law on Small and Medium-sized Business Development in May 2010 aimed at reducing the administrative burden on businesses seeking to obtain state support. The Government further reports that a key priority for developing business at the European and national level remains to support small and medium-sized businesses, not only by encouraging the establishment of new enterprises but also by creating favourable conditions for existing ones. The Committee notes the measures targeting small and medium-sized businesses include: the Entrepreneurship Foundation, a measure implemented in the third quarter of 2010 which provides training, loans and/or subsidies to persons starting their own business and enterprises developing their activities; the Open Credit Fund which will facilitate open credit line agreements with selected banks; and the provision of guarantees and subsidizing of interests and loans. The Committee invites the Government to supply further information in its next report on the impact of the law adopted in May 2010 on the promotion of small and medium-sized enterprises as well as on the measures adopted to support cooperatives on employment creation.

Corporate social responsibility. The Government indicates that it aims to promote the principles of corporate social responsibility among businesses operating within the country. The aim is to balance competitiveness with a safe and ecologically clean environment, strong social cohesion, transparent and ethical business practices. The Promotion of corporate social responsibility project in Lithuania was implemented following measures adopted under the 2007–13 Action Programme on developing human resources. Furthermore, on 12 January 2010, the Government approved the 2009–13 National Programme on Corporate Social Responsibility and its 2009–11 Plan of measures for its implementation. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report further information on the impact on employment generation of the abovementioned corporate social responsibility project and the 2009–13 National Programme on Corporate Social Responsibility.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that, in 2009, the labour exchange offices registered 79,600 young unemployed persons under the age of 25 which represented twice the number of persons registered in 2008. The unemployment rate for young persons reached 29.3 per cent in 2009. In January 2010, the number of registered young unemployed persons amounted to 39,000, three times more than in January 2009. The Committee also notes the increase in long-term unemployment among the youth (young persons unemployed for over six months) with 24.7 per cent of all unemployed young persons (9,500 persons) as of 1 January 2010, when the figures for January 2009 were as low as 3 per cent. The Government indicates that mismatches between the needs of the labour market and the available pool of skills or lack thereof are the essential causes of unemployment among young persons. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the measures aimed at finding lasting employment for young workers.

Other vulnerable categories of workers. The Government reports that, in 2008, close to 50,000 unemployed persons over the age of 50 were registered with the labour exchange offices, and that this number increased to 71,900 in 2009. The Committee notes that 19,500 older workers were placed into jobs in 2009 and 10,600 older persons were referred to active employment policy measures, such as public works, subsidized employment and vocational training. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing in its next report information on the impact of the measures aimed at finding lasting employment for vulnerable categories of workers, such as the long-term unemployed and older workers.

Article 3. Consultation and cooperation with the social partners. The Government indicates that the social partners implementing the employment policy measures represent their interests by participating in the activities of the Republic of Lithuania Tripartite Council at the Ministry of Social Security and Labour. Cooperation arrangements are also signed between the institutions implementing employment support policy and separate sectors of the economy, associations, organizations and research institutions representing interests of various groups of residents. Moreover, the Lithuanian Labour Exchange cooperates on the basis of agreements with eleven employers' organizations with the largest memberships in the country. In organizing vocational training of unemployed persons, the Labour Exchange coordinates the list of available training and retraining programmes with employers' organizations. The Committee also notes with interest that tripartite commissions were established at the Lithuanian Labour Exchange and territorial labour exchange offices and consist of an equal number of employer, worker and state/municipal representatives. The Government states that the objective of the tripartite commissions is to submit proposals on defining the priority guidelines for the Lithuanian Labour Exchange on the expediency of drafting employment support programmes, on the implementation of employment support measures and provision of labour market services, as well as on the issues of increasing the efficiency of activities. Furthermore, the Government approved on 24 March 2010 the proposals concerning the reduction of unemployment submitted by the Work Group which include: the creation of privileges to employers hiring young persons for their first job; the simplification of the procedure for organising public works by municipalities; and the compensation of partial costs for the unemployed getting business licences through the mediation of the Labour Exchange. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on consultation and cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations in the formulation and implementation of employment policies in the meaning of the Convention.

Madagascar

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordinating employment policy and poverty reduction. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government in a report received in October 2010. The Government indicates that, since the regime change in 2009, the Action Plan for Madagascar 2007–11 (MAP), which placed employment promotion and poverty reduction at the heart of economic priorities, was abrogated and that statistical data on labour market trends are not available. In view of the national crisis and the reactions imposed against the new regime by the African Union, the European Union and the South African Development Community (SADEC), the economic and trade advantages granted by the United States under the African Growth and Opportunity Act (AGOA) have been suspended. Furthermore, the closure of several enterprises in the export processing zones and the problems encountered by enterprises have likewise had adverse effects on employment. In such a context the Committee is concerned about the effective pursuit of "an active policy designed to promote full, productive and freely chosen employment", "as a major goal" "within the framework of coordinated economic and social policy" (Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention). It hopes that the Government will be in a position to send information in its next report that will allow an assessment of how the main axes of the economic policy, in areas such as monetary, budget, trade or regional development policies, contribute “within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy” to the pursuit of the employment objectives laid down in the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide information on the measures taken to create lasting employment, to reduce underemployment (reported to affect some 25 per cent of the active population) and combat poverty, specifying the measures taken to promote employment among the most vulnerable categories (women, young people and rural workers).

Coordinating education and training policy with employment policy. In reply to the previous observation, the Government states that the decree to create the Malagasy Employment Promotion Office (OMEP) was repealed in 2009 and that the employment programmes implemented with support from the UNDP have likewise been suspended since the onset of the crisis. The Government states that large enterprises that have vocational training centres have been alerted with a view to the provision of training opportunities to facilitate re-entry to the labour market for workers made redundant. The Committee hopes to be able to examine information in the Government’s next report on the results of the action taken to ensure the coordination of education and vocational training policies with employment policies. It asks the Government to give an account of the results obtained in terms of access for young graduates to lasting employment.

Collection and use of employment data. The Government again points out that the training organized by the ILO in 2008 on monitoring indicators was of benefit to employment managers. The statistical data allowing implementation of an employment policy are still not reliable because data collection has been disrupted by the national crisis. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to send the results of the household surveys conducted by the National Statistics Institute. It accordingly asks the Government in its next report to give an account of the progress made in obtaining reliable data so as to formulate and implement an employment policy within the meaning of the Convention.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of policies. The Government states that at the last consultation, the social partners discussed the dissolution of the OMPE and the transfer of functions to the Malagasy Observatory of Employment and Ongoing and Entrepreneurial Training (OMEF). The Committee again draws attention to the importance of giving full effect to Article 3 of the Convention, particularly in a context of massive and persistent underemployment. It hopes that the next report will contain detailed information on the consultations held with representatives of the social partners on the subjects covered by the Convention. Furthermore, it asks the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the most vulnerable categories of the population, particularly with the representatives of workers in rural areas and the informal economy, in order to obtain their cooperation in the formulation and implementation of employment policy programmes and measures.

Mauritania

Employment promotion. The Committee notes an observation from the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM) forwarded to the Government in September 2011. The CGTM deplores the introduction of a provision in the Labour Code leaving the management of employment offices to private organizations. The trade union recalls that the State has the obligation to define and promote employment policy in the country, which would be the best means of combating poverty and the current crisis and also of ensuring the best possible distribution of natural resources. The CGTM notes the systematic recourse to multinational companies, which exploit the principal mining, fishing and agricultural resources of the country without adopting genuine policies to promote employment. Furthermore, the multinational companies make use of expatriate staff to fill high-level positions. The CGTM considers that it is incorrect to say that there is a lack of skills among the national workforce. The CGTM also indicates that the major sectors which are the sources of employment, such as agriculture and stock breeding, are seriously dysfunctional. In this regard, the Committee refers to its direct request of 2010 concerning the application of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 96), where it noted that, in response to a crucial problem of unemployment, the Government established the National Youth Employment Promotion Agency (ANAPEJ) and had once again authorized labour inspectorates to open employment offices. The Committee refers to its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, in which it emphasized that one of the fundamental steps contributing towards the achievement of full employment is to build or strive to build institutions that ensure an efficient public employment service and to regulate the operation of private employment agencies (paragraph 786). The Committee requests the Government to provide a report indicating the measures taken to reinforce the institutions necessary for the achievement of full employment. It hopes that the report will contain precise information on the contribution of existing employment offices in the country towards ensuring the adequate placement of available workers in the labour market. It recalls that assistance is available from the ILO to promote the Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. In its previous comments the Committee noted the “National Employment Strategy and Plan of Action 2008–12”. The Government indicated that the objectives pursued by the National Employment Strategy were geared to those laid down by the Strategic Framework for Poverty Reduction 2006–10 (CSLP 2), namely reducing the unemployment rate to less than 25 per cent and increasing the rate of persons completing technical or vocational training to 55 per cent in 2010. According to the latest estimates, even though the poverty index in 2008 was 42 per cent, compared to 46.7 per cent in 2004, this figure is still far removed from the 25 per cent target fixed for 2015. The National Employment Strategy had enabled the main gaps in employment policy to be identified, namely a very high unemployment rate, a national economy dominated by the informal sector and a mismatch between training and the needs of the national labour market. Issues and structures related to employment would now be grouped together within the Ministry of Employment, Integration and Vocational Training (MEIFP). The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the results achieved under the National Employment Strategy in terms of the creation of lasting employment and the reduction of underemployment and poverty. In particular, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would supply information on the steps taken to improve the vocational and technical training available for young persons and women, to promote small and micro-enterprises, and to create productive and lasting employment in conditions which are socially satisfactory for workers in the informal economy.

Employment promotion and labour-intensive services. In its National Employment Strategy, the Government indicated that its economic choices had concerned industrial and commercial projects and labour-intensive services. The labour-intensive approach (HIMO) aimed at integrating persons with few or no skills in working life had been tried out in numerous programmes, such as the stone masonry programme, the urban development programme and the integrated national programme to support small and micro-enterprises. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of jobs created by the labour-intensive programmes and on their impact on the creation of productive employment.

Compilation and use of employment data. The Committee previously noted that the sixth component of the employment strategy underlined the need to establish a national information system on the employment market and a mechanism for technical and vocational training. This system would cover three main areas: (a) creation and operation of the network of producers and users of employment and training data, with the joint involvement of the Ministry of Employment, the National Office for Statistics, sectoral departments and the private sector; (b) monitoring of employment and the technical and vocational training mechanism; and (c) focusing on studies and analysis to improve the system and share information. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the compilation of employment data, stating the employment policy measures further adopted to the establishment of a new national employment information system.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in policy formulation and implementation. The Committee previously noted that, in the context of the National Employment Strategy, two institutional mechanisms would be established, namely an Inter-Ministerial Committee on Employment and a Higher Council for Employment, Training and Labour (CSEFT), chaired by the Ministry of Employment, and that within these two bodies the social partners would be represented. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the operation of these two bodies, and also on the participation of the social partners in the implementation of the National Employment Strategy. It also requests the Government to indicate the steps taken or contemplated to involve representatives of persons living in rural areas and those operating in the informal economy in the consultations provided for by the Convention.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Mongolia

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes the brief report provided by the Government in November 2010 and the information submitted by the Mongolian Employers Federation (MONEF) and the Confederation of Mongolian Trade Unions (CMTU). The Committee also notes that Mongolia is one of the countries assisted by the ILO in designing and implementing their crisis response policies through the framework provided by the Global Jobs Pact, which was adopted in June 2009. The Government reports that the population of Mongolia was 2,683,500 at the end of 2009; and in 2010, the unemployment rate was 3.7 per cent, the same level as in 2009. The Government indicates that the Employment Promotion Law was revised in 2010. This revision brought on the adherence of principles which include: (i) to improve the participation of public and private organizations and responsibilities of local and administrative and employment promotion organizations; (ii) to decentralize; (iii) to improve budget allocation for employment promotion and its effectiveness; (iv) to renew the coordination mechanism of employment promotion in meeting with local features and needs; (v) to identify the scope of employment promotion; and (vi) to conduct its activities to the targeted groups who needed support from the Government. Two new mega-mines will be operational in the south of the country in 2013 which will have a significant impact on the economy of Mongolia. The Committee notes the comments submitted by MONEF indicating that the Government did not allow the National Employment Council to discuss the legislative revisions and did not take into account comments from stakeholders. MONEF also raised some concerns that some tripartite bodies had not yet been established, such as subcommittees on employment in the mining, construction, and transport sectors, as well as at the aimag and district level. Furthermore, MONEF indicates that the centralization of the labour and social welfare services has had a negative impact on the quality of the activities and employment services, such as covering all the vulnerable target group of jobseekers; therefore, MONEF indicates that there is a need for decentralization and raising private sector responsibilities for the implementation of employment services and projects. MONEF expressed the view that it is very important for the Government to support employers in times of economic crisis, increased international competitiveness and costs. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the extent to which active labour market policies are coordinated so as to effectively translate into productive employment creation. In this regard, the Government is requested to include information on the results of the implementation of the Employment Promotion Law and on the potential employment impact of the increase in activity in the mining industry. The Committee also requests the Government to report on the activities of the National Employment Council and other tripartite bodies in respect of employment policies and the steps taken to ensure that the views of representatives of social partners (including representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy) are fully taken into account for the purposes of formulating and enlisting support for employment policies.

Vocational training and education. The Government reports that the Law on Vocational Education and Training was adopted in February 2010. The Government also indicates that section 20 of the Employment Promotion Law provides that the National Employment Council acts as a social partnership institution which will ensure equal participation of the public and private sectors for the implementation of state policy on vocational education and training. The Committee notes that the number of persons involved in vocational training reached 10,128 in 2010, compared to 9,753 in 2008, and 11,233 in 2009. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of policies and measures implemented to improve skill levels and coordinate education and training policies with employment opportunities.

Employment services. The Government indicates that 39,842 jobseekers registered in labour exchange services offices in 2010, compared to 31,925 in 2008 and 39,212 in 2009. The CMTU indicates that 21.5 billion tugriks were disbursed by the Employment Promotion Fund in 2009 on different activities in which 285,000 persons participated. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the activities of the employment services, and how they contribute towards implementing active labour market policies.

Youth employment. The Committee refers to its previous observation noting that a draft National Plan on Youth Employment for 2008–15 was formulated with a view to promoting school-to-work transition and to support the employment of young persons. The Committee once again asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to implement the National Plan on Youth Employment, and to report on the effects of such measures on increasing the access of young people to sustainable employment.

Persons with disabilities. The Committee notes from the Global Jobs Pact Scan that special employment support measures and services are provided for persons with disabilities under the Employment Promotion Fund, in addition to the training and job placement support provided as a regular service for all persons in need. The main support measure is the cash support to promote the creation of micro-enterprises by persons with disabilities based on invitations to tender. Funding for this measure more than doubled in 2010, supporting over 300 micro-projects. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the results of measures taken to address the employment needs of persons with disabilities.

Herders. The Committee notes from the Global Jobs Pact Scan that measures were undertaken in 2009 for herders to redress cash deficits and loan defaults. The Committee also notes that the Herders' Employment Promotion Programme, approved in 2010, is resourced by the Employment Promotion Fund and delivered through business incubation centres in selected aimags. The Government is invited to continue to provide further information on the Herders' Employment Promotion Programme and other measures taken to address the particular needs of herders.

Workers in the informal economy. The Committee notes from the Global Jobs Pact Scan that the first action plan to implement the National Policy on Informal Employment covered the period 2006–08 and had limited results. A national review of the informal economy was organized by the Ministry of Social Welfare and Labour in June 2010, leading to the adoption of an action plan for the informal economy for the period of 2010–12. Several NGOs have established the United Confederation of the Informal Economy, providing some level of organization for informal workers. The new Confederation will, however, need capacity building to implement its mandate. The Committee once again asks the Government to include information in its next report on the implementation of measures to enable the progressive transfer of workers from the informal economy to the formal economy, and any measures to promote complementary relationships between the formal and informal economy and to provide greater access of undertakings in the informal sector to resources, product markets, credit, infrastructure, training facilities, technical expertise and improved technologies (Part V of the Employment Policy (Supplementary Provisions) Recommendation, 1984 (No. 169)).

Migrant workers seeking employment abroad. The Committee notes from the Global Jobs Pact Scan that the Ministry of Social Welfare and Labour is working on a new draft Law on sending workers abroad and receiving foreign workers. The Committee invites the Government to include information in its next report on the implementation of the new legislation including relevant information on programmes implemented in the field of labour migration policy.

Morocco

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1979)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the Government's report sent in September 2010 containing information on the points raised in the observation of 2009. The Government indicates that cooperation between the National Agency for the Promotion of Employment and Skills (ANAPEC) and the various administrations takes place via the steering and monitoring bodies set up at national and regional level. The Committee invites the Government to provide a detailed evaluation of employment policies in its next report, as it would like to be able to examine the active and effective policies which help to achieve full employment. The Committee recalls that it already expressed the wish in its previous observation to be able to examine the monetary, budgetary and trade policies that are contributing "within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy" to the attainment of the objectives of full employment set out in the Convention.

Labour market programmes. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government on the resources mobilized in the context of three major programmes relating to training and job placement (Idmaj), employability (Taehil) and enterprise creation (Moukawalati). The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to include an evaluation in its next report of the number of jobs created by these three programmes, establishing the ratio of jobs created during a given period in relation to the total active population, the total population of working age and the number of persons who are underemployed. The evaluation of the impact of these programmes should incorporate data disaggregated by sex.

Women's employment. The Government provides information in its report on the many measures taken to advance the participation of women in the labour market. The Ministry of Employment and Vocational Training has embarked on a policy of gender mainstreaming. The Committee notes that in 2007–08 women accounted for 43 per cent of persons who completed vocational training. The Government indicates that women continue to predominate in sectors leading to traditionally female occupations and remain very much in the minority in sectors where new investment has occurred. However, in the sectors of information technology and communication, hotels and tourism, there is a growing trend towards parity. The Committee invites the Government to continue to send information on the progress made in ensuring the participation of women in the labour market. It hopes that the next report will contain up-to-date information enabling an evaluation of the extent to which the adopted initiatives have ensured free choice of employment, giving workers the fullest possible opportunity to acquire and use the necessary qualifications, in accordance with Article 1(2)(c) of the Convention.

Employment promotion in small and medium-sized enterprises. In its previous observation the Committee expressed the wish to examine information on the amount of financing allocated to the development of small and medium-sized enterprises, the number of beneficiary enterprises and the economic sectors concerned. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures adopted "in order to create an environment conducive to the growth and development of small and medium-sized enterprises" (see Paragraph 5 of the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189)).

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in policy formulation and implementation. In its report the Government again describes the functions of the Higher National Council and regional and local councils for the promotion of employment. It also mentions that the social partners participate in the implementation of employment promotion measures through participation in the study committee preparing the ANAPEC development plans. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the consultations held with the social partners on the matters covered by the Convention as well as on the role of the Higher National Council and regional and local councils for the promotion of employment. It also requests the Government to supply information on the consultations held with the most vulnerable categories of the population, and particularly with representatives of workers in rural areas and in the informal economy, with a view to securing their cooperation in formulating and implementing employment policy programmes and measures.

Myanmar

Advisory committees on the operation of free public employment agencies. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2011 indicating that measures are being taken to enact the Employment and Skill Development Law in order to increase employment opportunities, maintain industrial peace and enhance the skill development of workers. The Government further reports that the Labour Organization Bill has been finalized. A draft of the said Bill was amended after discussions with the ILO Consultation Team in July 2011. In August 2011, the amended Bill was approved by a legislative body. The Government also indicates that more local employment opportunities are created due to the implementation of many infrastructure projects and the financing of large industries by foreign direct investment. Bilateral employment agreements have been signed with the Republic of Korea and Thailand containing measures aimed at reducing unemployment. The Committee reiterates its hope that the future legislation will enable the establishment of free and independent workers' organizations for the purposes of consultation on the operation of free public employment agencies, as required by the Convention. It invites the Government to include in its next report information on the impact of the measures taken to combat unemployment in the country, such as the infrastructure projects implemented and the bilateral employment agreements with other neighbouring countries (Article 1 of the Convention).

Netherlands

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report for the period ending in June 2010 and the comments submitted by the Confederation of Netherlands Industry and Employers (VNO-NCW), the Federation for small and medium-sized businesses (MKB-NL), and the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV). The Government indicates that the Dutch economy was hit relatively hard by the global financial crisis in September 2008, resulting in a historically large decline in economic growth of 4 per cent in 2009 and the effects of the negative economic developments can be observed in the labour market: unemployment rose from 3.9 per cent in 2008 to 4.9 per cent in 2009 and 5.4 per cent in 2010. The unemployment rate was measured at 5.1 per cent in June 2011 and 5.3 per cent in July 2011. Furthermore, Statistics Netherlands provides data indicating that the number of unemployed men in the age category 25–45 has more than doubled over the past three years: from 46,000 in the second quarter of 2008 to 99,000 in the second quarter of 2011. The Government indicates that before the crisis the main goal of employment policy was to increase the employment rate to solve problems caused by an ageing labour force and society, such as labour shortages and deficits in public finances. It further states that despite the economic crisis, the underlying structural challenges have not fundamentally changed; if anything, they have intensified. Increasing participation remains as important as before. The Committee notes the main crisis measures introduced to help employers deal with the impact of a sudden drop in demand: the Special scheme for the reduction in working hours (bijzondere WTV), and its successor, the Partial unemployment benefit (deeltijd WW). The Committee notes the comments submitted by the FNV indicating that the focus of the government policy is on higher participation. According to the FNV, both the Government and employers should pay more attention to the slowing growth in productivity. The FNV further states that, although the regulation concerning dismissal did not change, employment security declined due to the extension of the number of temporary contracts a company is allowed to offer an employee before the company is obliged to offer a permanent contract. This further increases the number of people with a flexible contract, the same group of workers that were already hit hard by the crisis. The FNV also points out the steadily declining share of labour in national income, which is seen as a clear indication that wage increases in the Netherlands have been moderate in comparison with economic growth. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of the measures taken on employment generation and in particular to indicate how such measures are decided and kept under periodical review within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. It also invites the Government to provide information on employment policy objectives with regard to productivity and the development of wages.

Older workers. The Committee notes that an important goal of the Government is to increase the employment rate and to improve the labour market position of older workers. It notes that the labour participation rate of persons aged between 55 and 64 rose from 50.9 per cent in 2007 to 53 per cent in 2008 and 55.1 per cent in 2009. The Government indicates that it used a variety of policy instruments to reach the goal of increased participation of older workers aimed at both the supply and demand side of the labour market. These include financial incentives for employers and changes to the statutory retirement age. The FNV states that the position of older workers has not improved in recent years and highlights the need for a better analysis of the labour market for this particular group of workers. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the effectiveness of the various measures implemented to increase employment opportunities for older workers.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that a consequence of the crisis was to negatively impact, to a greater extent, employees with temporary or flexible contracts or self-employed persons. Groups that are relatively most often working in flexible jobs are young people and ethnic minorities. The Committee notes that the Government introduced the Investment in the Young Act with the aim of promoting sustainable participation by young people. The Act requires municipalities to provide an offer for work or learning to jobless young people up to the age of 27 who request social assistance. Furthermore, the Invalidity Insurance (Young Disabled Persons) Act (Wajong) was adopted in January 2010 in order to offer maximum support to young people who do not have prospects of work, helping them find and retain jobs. The FNV raises concern on the quality of the education, training or jobs available to all young workers targeted by these measures. The Committee asks the Government to report on the effectiveness of the various labour market measures implemented to meet the employment needs of young persons and to provide further information in light of the concerns raised by the FNV.

Ethnic minorities. The Government indicates that the relative labour market position of ethnic minorities is quite dependent on the economic situation. Before the crisis their employment rate was growing faster and the decrease of their unemployment rate was more substantial than for other groups. In 2009, the unemployment rate for ethnic minorities rose for the first time since 2005. The Committee notes that the Government chose to improve the underlying factors that cause the weaker position of ethnic minorities, such as lower educational attainment. They will benefit from general measures to prevent school leaving and improve the employability of workers. The Government also indicates that the labour market position of ethnic minorities will be improved by other measures taken, such as the Integration Delta Plan. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the employment situation of ethnic minorities as well as on measures taken to improve their participation in the labour market.

Article 3. Cooperation with social partners. The Committee notes that, although the crisis had a negative impact on the employment rate, the Government remains committed to the target agreed with the social partners of achieving an employment rate of 80 per cent in 2016. The Government indicates that a social summit was held on 24 March 2009 on how to combat the effects of the crisis on the labour market. The main topics were to prevent long-term unemployment, promote a responsible development of labour costs and improve the sustainability of public finances and the Dutch pension system. The Government revealed its plan to increase the statutory retirement age from 65 to 67 years and gave the social partners the opportunity to come up with an alternative plan. The FNV indicated that it strongly opposed the Government's plans to raise the statutory age to 67 years. In this regard, employers and trade unions, after an initial failure to come to an agreement, have made a better and more robust plan to come to a sustainable retirement scheme. Part of this agreement is to improve the position of older workers in the labour market, as people will work until a later age in the decades to come. The Committee invites the Government to continue to report on consultations held with representatives of employers' and workers' organizations and representatives of other sectors of the economically active population involved in the formulation and implementation of active employment policies.

Supervision of the operation of private employment agencies. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report received in August 2010 in reply to the 2009 direct request. It also notes the new remarks provided by the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV) and the contribution of the Confederation of Netherlands Industry and Employers (VNO-NCW) and the Federation for small and medium-sized businesses (MKB-NL). In reply to the issues raised by the FNV in 2009 indicating that a system of permits would be more efficient for combating fraud and illegality, the Government indicates that until 1998 such a system of permits existed in the Netherlands; however this system was not efficient. The Government reports that it was hardly possible to maintain the system and to control all permit holders. It further indicates that it is difficult to confirm if the current system of self-regulation eliminates illegal temporary work agencies. The FNV maintains its concerns about the system of self-regulation indicating that it does not eliminate fraudulent and illegal temporary work agencies. It also acknowledges that the previous system of permits was not the most efficient and points out that with sufficient government resources, a better, more efficient and transparent system is possible. The FNV reiterates its previous statement concerning the estimated number of fraudulent private employment agencies in the country, that is, 5,000 to 6,000. The VNO-NCW and the MKB-NL also refer to these estimates, indicating that the figures are based on a 2008 study carried out for the Foundation for Compliance with Collective Agreements in the Temporary Employment Sector (SNCU). The Committee recalls the concerns expressed by the FNV indicating that the purpose of the self-regulatory system is that the labour inspectorate focuses its attention and inspections mainly on the non-registered temporary work agencies instead of inspecting the registered agencies. The FNV indicates that the Government transfers through the system of self-regulation the responsibility of supervision and control over certified agencies on to private parties. Furthermore, the FNV is of the view that, in practice, both registered and unregistered agencies are mainly, if at all, supervised and monitored by private and not public authorities. The Government states that temporary agencies registered in the Labour Standards Register are supervised or controlled by the labour inspectorate. The Dutch Association of Temporary Work Agencies (ABU) periodically produces facts and figures on the activities of private employment agencies. The Committee invites the Government to report on the application of Article 14 of the Convention to all temporary work agencies and to provide extracts from reports of the inspection services and information on the number of workers covered by the Convention (Part V of the report form). It also invites the Government to indicate the manner it ensures that the system of self-regulation of temporary work agencies is supervised by the labour inspectorate or other competent public authorities (Article 14(2)).

Article 6 of the Convention. Protection of personal data. The FNV indicates that it is very critical about the fact that temporary work agencies have access to all the data files of the registered unemployed persons at the public employment service (UWV). The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the manner in which workers' personal data is protected.

Articles 11 and 12. Protections for workers and responsibilities of private employment agencies and user enterprises. Replying to the FNV's previous comments regarding the payment of wages, the Government indicates that it has the responsibility to ensure that minimum wages are paid to all employees, not for the payment of correct wages. It further indicates that, with respect to the matters covered in Articles 11 and 12, the protection of the position of temporary workers is the same as regular employees. The Government also states that the user enterprise explicitly is responsible for the working conditions of the temporary agency workers. The FNV states that the protection of the position of temporary workers is not always the same as regular employees and provides an example indicating that most agency workers have no access to training. The FNV is also of the opinion that a joint liability for full wages should be shared by the agency and user enterprises together as agencies tend to file for bankruptcy if a wage claim is looming. Furthermore, the FNV indicates that Section 10 of the Placement of Personnel by Intermediaries Act (WAADI) prohibits a company confronted with a strike of its workers from hiring workers from a temporary employment agency. However, the Act does not prohibit a company affected by a strike in a contracted company from making its own personnel perform the duties of the striking workers. The FNV is of the opinion that the Act should be revised. The Committee wishes to recall that given the particularities of working arrangements in which employees work for a user enterprise that assigns and supervises the execution of the work and the uncertainty as to responsibility, it is necessary for member States to address these particularities through measures that ensure that in each case effective responsibility is determined (see paragraph 313 of the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments). The Committee invites the Government to provide information with regard to the concerns raised by the FNV and to supply information on the measures taken to ensure protection for workers in the areas described in Article 11 and how it has determined the allocation of the responsibilities between the temporary work agencies and the user enterprises as laid down in Article 12.

Article 13. Cooperation between the public authorities and private employment agencies. The Government indicates that temporary employment agencies play no additional role in the formulation of labour policy of public employment services. Private agencies are positioned at the central floor of the work plazas because they are considered as a useful party in helping people with difficulties in the labour market. At the regional level, public and private employment services are working together. The Government reports on an agreement between the UWV and the ABU concerning the placement of young unemployed persons. The FNV raises concern that an unemployed person asking for an unemployment benefit is obliged to accept a new job not only through the UWV but also through the temporary work agency. If the unemployed person does not accept a suitable temporary job, he or she may lose the benefit. The Committee invites the Government to report on the manner in which efficient cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies is promoted and reviewed periodically. Please also provide information on the measures taken to ensure that the competent authority receives relevant information on the activities of the private employment agencies.

Nigeria

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. In its 2004 observation, the Committee requested the Government to report in detail on the application of the Convention. In June 2006, the Government reported that a total of 6,640 applicants were registered in the Employment Exchange and Professional and Executive Registries in 2005. Of these, 1,516 applicants were placed in employment, while a total number of 1,989 vacancies were notified. In reply to a request by the Office for supplementary information, the Government provided, in August 2006, figures on the impact of the National Economic Empowerment and Development Strategy (NEEDS) concerning the training of youth under the Vocational Skills Development Programme between 2002 and 2005. The Committee notes that the NEEDS covers small-scale enterprise programmes, rural employment promotion programmes, assistance for self-employment, special public work programmes and women's cooperatives. The Committee notes again, as pointed out by the NEEDS, that since manufacturing is stagnant there are few jobs for the growing urban population, and urban unemployment was estimated at 10.8 per cent in 2004. NEEDS policies are expected to create about 7 million new jobs by 2007, by making it easier for private enterprises to thrive, by training people in skills relevant for the world of work and by promoting integrated rural development in collaboration with the States. The Committee hopes that the Employment Exchange and Professional Executive Registries will effectively perform their essential task within the meaning of the Convention, that is, of ensuring, in accordance with Article 1(1) of the Convention, the best possible organization of the employment market for the achievement and maintenance of full employment and for the development and use of productive resources. The Committee therefore requests the Government to report on the measures taken, in cooperation with the social partners, so that the public employment service is run efficiently and free of charge, and that it comprises a network of offices sufficient in number to meet the specific needs of jobseekers and employers countrywide. It also asks the Government to describe in its next report the activities of the employment service and the effects noted or expected on employment as a result of implementing its poverty reduction strategy.

The Committee further requests the Government to include in its next report statistical information published in annual or periodical reports on the number of public employment offices established, applications for employment received, vacancies notified and persons placed in employment by such offices (Part IV of the report form). Please also provide information on the following matters:

- consultations held with representatives of employers and workers on the organization and operation of the employment service and the development of employment policy (Articles 4 and 5);
- the manner in which the employment service is organized and the activities which it performs in order to carry out effectively the functions listed in Article 6;
- the activities of the public employment service concerning the various occupations and industries, as well as particular categories of jobseekers that are in socially vulnerable positions, in particular workers with disabilities (Article 7);
- measures proposed by the employment service to assist youth in finding suitable employment (Article 8);
- measures proposed by the employment service, with the cooperation of the social partners, to encourage the full use of employment service facilities (Article 10);
- measures taken or envisaged by the employment service to pursue cooperation between the public employment service and private employment agencies (Article 11).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Pakistan

The Committee notes the short statement submitted by the Government in June 2011 indicating that it is complying with the provisions of the Convention through the application of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976. The Government further reports that the Act regulates employment agencies and licensing, and provides sanctions which may lead to imprisonment of up to one year. In its previous observations, the Committee recalled that in 1977 it noted the enactment of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976, which provided for the licensing of fee-charging employment agencies and empowered public authorities to prohibit the establishment of fee-charging employment agencies in any area where the public employment service was operating. According to section 1(3), the Act would enter into force when the federal Government made an official notification in the Official Gazette. The Committee recalls the comments made by the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) in June 2005. The APFTU stated that agencies are allowed to charge fees for recruitment abroad and that some of them were involved in human trafficking. The Committee also noted the Pakistan Workers Federation's (PWF) observations, forwarded to the Government in August 2010, indicating that recruiting agencies have been exploiting prospective migrant workers. The PWF urged the Government to ensure that the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976, enters into force in order to protect prospective migrant workers against exploitation and to set up free public employment exchange facilities for jobseekers. The Committee requests a copy of the Official Gazette indicating the enactment of the Fee-Charging Employment Agencies (Regulation) Act, 1976. The Committee also requests the Government to reply in detail to the following points raised in the previous observations.

Progressive abolition of fee-charging employment agencies conducted with a view to profit. Part II of the Convention. In its 2006 observation, the Committee noted that in relation to the abolition of fee-charging employment agencies, as required by Part II of the Convention, the Government reiterated that draft rules have been framed to regulate the operation of fee-charging employment agencies. The Government also confirmed that the licences for overseas employment promoters were granted for a period of one, two or three years. In relation to Article 9 of the Convention, the Government indicated that, due to the economic conditions of Pakistan, levies have been established for migrant workers. Therefore, the Government was not in a position to adopt a policy for abolishing fee-charging employment services for migrant workers. It also added that punitive action was taken against those overseas employment promoters that were involved in violations of the Emigration Ordinance, 1979, and the Emigration Rules, 1979. The Committee refers to its previous comments, noting again the lack of progress in achieving the abolition of fee-charging employment agencies. The Committee asks the Government to report on the following issues:

- the measures taken to abolish fee-charging employment agencies;
- the numbers of public employment offices and the geographical areas they serve (Article 3(1) and (2));
- the consultations of employers' and workers' organizations on the supervision of all fee-charging employment agencies (Article 4(1)(a), (2) and (3));
- with regard to overseas employment promoters, the measures taken to ensure that these agents may only benefit from a yearly licence renewable at the discretion of the competent authority (Article 5(2)(b)) and charge fees and expenses on a scale submitted to, and approved by, the competent authority (Article 5(2)(c));
- with regard to placing and recruiting workers abroad, the conditions established by the laws and regulations in force for the operation of fee-charging employment agencies (Article 5(2)(d)).

Revision of Convention No. 96. The Committee refers to its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments in which it recalled that public employment services and private agencies are both actors in the labour market. They should therefore mutually benefit from cooperation as their common aim is to ensure a well-functioning labour market and the achievement of full employment (paragraph 728). In Chapter III of the General Survey, the Committee noted that if private employment agencies operate in a particular labour market, this operation has to be regulated. Therefore, governmental action is required, either directly through a system of legislation, licensing or certification or, indirectly, by authorizing an existing national practice or one that is to be established (paragraph 237 et seq.). In its previous observations on Convention No. 96, the Committee has already highlighted the role that the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), and the Private Employment Agencies Recommendation, 1997 (No. 188), play in the licensing and supervision of placement services for migrant workers and the role that Convention No. 181 attributes to private employment agencies for the functioning of the labour market (see paragraph 730 of the 2010 General Survey). Taking into account that the present situation is not in conformity with the provisions of Part II of Convention No. 96, the Committee hopes that the Government and the social partners will contemplate adhering to the obligations of the Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), the ratification of which involves the immediate denunciation of Convention No. 96. It invites the Government to report on steps taken, in consultation with the social partners, to ratify Convention No. 181.

Promotion of employment opportunities for persons with disabilities. The Committee notes the report submitted by the Government in June 2011 including a copy of the Disabled Persons (Employment and Rehabilitation) Ordinance, 1981. The Government states that it is complying with the provisions of the Convention through the application of the abovementioned Ordinance. It also indicates that organizations are required to employ persons with disabilities according to fixed quotas which are notified by the federal and provincial governments. The Government further reports that Special Education Departments are functioning in all four provinces to educate children with disabilities and to rehabilitate them through vocational training. The Committee recalls the remarks made by the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF) indicating that the vocational education and training facilities provided by the State to the rehabilitation of workers with disabilities are insufficient. PWF also suggested that the Government should increase the quotas for the employment of persons with disabilities in the public and private sectors so that they can be rehabilitated and obtain gainful employment after receiving vocational education and training. The Committee refers to its previous comments and asks the Government to provide information on measures taken in the context of its policy on vocational rehabilitation and employment of persons with disabilities, both at federal and provincial levels (Articles 3 and 7 of the Convention). The Committee also asks the Government to include relevant information supported by statistics disaggregated by sex on the implementation of the Convention, as well as on the activities of the National Council for the Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons (NCRDP) (Part V of the report form).

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Panama

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1970)

Reorganization of the employment office network. The Committee notes the detailed information on activities to modernize the employment service which were undertaken in 2006–09. In a report received in October 2010, the Government refers to the information and documentation sent with regard to the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122). In relation to the observation of 2004 concerning Convention No. 88, the Government indicates that the model put forward in August 2006 included the proposal to decentralize the employment offices. The Government reports that, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention, in August 2008 an evaluation was made of the strengths, weaknesses and opportunities relating to the proposal of the public employment service. Difficulties were identified with regard to the area of employment in the regional offices, which should be given greater priority. Plans were also made to strengthen the Directorate-General of Employment in order to have an optimum public employment service that promotes, organizes and facilitates public access to a modern service. The Committee invites the Government to continue to supply information in its next report on Convention No. 88 on the progress made in ensuring that full effect is given to Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to include up-to-date statistical information on the number of public employment offices established, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment by such offices at national and local levels (Part IV of the report form).

Participation of the social partners. In its observation of 2004, the Committee noted the collaboration between the Ministry of Labour (MITRADEL) and the social partners in relation to certain matters covered by the Convention. The report received in October 2010 does not contain any information on the participation of the social partners to ensure the effective functioning of a free public employment service. The Committee refers to the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, in which it highlighted the importance of the public services' direct and constant interaction with employers and jobseekers (General Survey, paragraph 208). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the social partners have been involved in the activities of the public employment service. The Committee recalls that, under the provisions of Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention, advisory committees must be set up to ensure the full cooperation of employers' and workers' representatives in the organization and operation of the employment service.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

The Committee notes the detailed information and full documentation provided by the Government in October 2010 in reply to the comments made in 2009.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with social and economic policy objectives. The Committee notes the National Strategic Plan for the period 2010–14, approved in December 2009, which contains a programme for economic growth and social development, accompanied by a financial programming and public investment plan. The National Strategic Plan focuses on four high-priority sectors: high added-value logistical services, tourism, high-margin agriculture and non-traditional financial services. Significant investment is envisaged in public infrastructure projects, such as the construction of the Metro in the city of Panama and the launching of private electricity generation projects. Up to May 2010, the economy had grown by 5.5 per cent under the stimulus of an increase in investment in public infrastructure and the dynamism of sectors such as construction, trade and transport, storage and telecommunications. The Committee invites the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the impact that the National Strategic Plan 2010–14 is having on the achievement of the objectives of the Convention.

Labour market trends. According to the data published by the ILO in Panorama Laboral 2010, the participation rate as of October 2010 was 63.5 per cent, the occupation rate was 59.4 per cent and the unemployment rate was 6.5 per cent. The Committee observes that women's unemployment fell to 8.5 per cent, while men's unemployment rose slightly to 5.3 per cent. The sectors in which there was net job creation in 2009 include, in particular, construction under the effect of hotel and tourism projects, and various public infrastructure works. These projects helped to mitigate the effects of the financial crisis on employment. The Government envisaged the creation of 500,000 new jobs by 2010 and the creation of 500,000 additional jobs, with a view to achieving full employment by the end of 2020. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing statistical information in its next report on the situation, level and trends of employment, unemployment and underemployment.

Panama Canal extension and employment creation. The Government considers that the Canal Extension Project will generate as many technical and artisanal jobs as professional posts connected with the planning, coordination and implementation of the various phases of the work. It is envisaged that the extension work will lead to the indirect creation of jobs in areas such as logistics, messaging, purchasing and supplies, financial services, customs procedures, security, housing, transport and food. The National Vocational Training and Human Development Skills Institute (INADEH) has launched training programmes in such areas as information and communication technologies, enterprise management, English, gastronomy, hotels and tourism. The Committee notes that, as of March 2010, a total of 6,274 jobs had been created derived from the Canal Extension Project. The Government envisages a greater impact on employment generation in the medium and long term as a result of the economic growth induced by the additional income generated by the extended canal and the economic activities generated by the increase in cargo and vessels transiting the canal. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on the results that are being achieved in terms of direct and indirect employment creation through the Canal Extension Project and other infrastructure investments.

International trade and its labour market impact. With regard to the impact of the free trade treaties in terms of the improvement of the labour market, the Government indicates that the conclusion of free trade treaties has a positive impact on legal regulations and international cooperation in terms of the exchange of information and support for human resources development. The Committee invites the Government to provide more specific information in its next report on the impact of trade policy on the demand for employment.

Employment promotion and vulnerable categories of workers. The Government indicates that 14 per cent of the population is in a situation of extreme poverty and that the authorities have formulated a Strategic Social Plan with a view to reducing poverty and social exclusion and creating opportunities for everyone, with particular emphasis on training and social inclusion. The Plan is focused on the provision of high-quality education and vocational training to improve the skills of workers in priority development sectors. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to meet the needs of persons who are below the poverty line and to promote the development of income-generating opportunities.

Youth employment. The Government indicates in its report that youth unemployment is an alarming problem which has given rise to much attention in the public sector. The youth unemployment rate was 15.2 per cent in 2009. The Government adds that an analysis is being undertaken of the occupational situation and difficulties encountered by young persons in integrating the labour market. The programme "My First Job", launched in July 2009, envisages the provision of training to over 20,000 young persons between the ages of 18 and 29 who lack the skills to compete on the labour market, including in the most vulnerable areas of the country. By the end of 2010, some 2,213 young persons who had been unemployed and were without work experience had entered into the labour market. The General Directorate of Employment is implementing the Labour Assistance and Integration Programme (PAIL), which offers grants for periods of up to three months of vocational adaptation in enterprises. As of July 2009, agreements had been concluded with 104 enterprises at the national level to hire 860 persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide data in its next report on the impact of the measures adopted in improving youth employability and in supporting and promoting the entrepreneurship initiatives of young persons.

Coordination of training and employment policies. The Government indicates that 6 per cent of GDP is invested in education. It recognizes that educational results, over and above quantitative progress in access to education and average schooling (94 per cent of the population have completed primary education) are still not satisfactory, particularly with regard to quality and equality of opportunity. In this respect, the Committee notes a considerable increase in the number of students enrolled in the INADEH, which offered 991 courses during the period between January and May 2010. Total enrolment rose to 21,217 students, of whom 6,576 obtained certificates. Furthermore, collaboration with other institutions at the national level resulted in the creation of new careers and university programmes in critical areas for the implementation of the Canal Extension Project. The number of universities and training institutes increased. The Committee notes that the Strategic Social Plan proposes the establishment of coordination machinery between the INADEH and the Ministry of Labour (MITRADEL) and their institutional strengthening with a view to the development of a system for the identification of demand for vocational training and employment services. The Committee requests the Government to include information in its next report on the manner in which INADEH and MITRADEL coordinate so as to ensure that education and training policies are in coherence with employment policy.

Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes that the Government is continuing to examine the possibility of reactivating the Tripartite Decent Work Commission. The Committee recalls the essential role played by social dialogue in employment policy and in the promotion of decent work. The Committee requests the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the progress achieved in the reactivation of the Tripartite Decent Work Commission and reiterates its interest in examining concrete information on the manner in which the social partners participate in the process of designing, formulating, implementing and reviewing employment policies, as required by Article 3 of the Convention.

Peru

With reference to its observation of 2009, the Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in the report received in September 2010. The Committee also notes the joint comments from the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT), the Confederation of Workers of Peru (CTP) and the Autonomous Confederation of Workers of Peru (CATP) dated 27 August 2010, from the Lima Chamber of Commerce (CCL) dated 28 August 2010, and from the CGTP dated 31 August 2010.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Formulation of an active employment policy. The Government indicates that, in July 2009, by means of Ministerial Decision No. 160-2009-TR1, the “Guidelines on social and labour policy 2009–11” were approved. The Decision contains the foundations for the formulation and implementation of the “Sectoral plan of action for the promotion of youth employment 2009-II-2012-I”, the formulation of national employment policies, the setting up of the Directorate of Labour Migration and the National Employment Service, and also the establishment of the Revalora Peru programme, the restructuring of the “PROJOVEN” programme and the reinforcement of the Construyendo Peru programme. The trade unions again express their concern at the lack of a national employment plan, without which it is difficult to apply the guidelines adopted in July 2009 and achieve their objectives. Moreover, the trade unions consider that the policies formulated to promote employment do not contribute to an overall, integrated decent work strategy and tend to make conditions of work more precarious. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, reflecting a recovery in economic activity in the first quarter of 2010, which had a positive impact on labour indicators in comparison with those for the same period in 2009. According to data published by the ILO in the Labour Overview, Panorama Laboral 2010, the unemployment rate stood at 8.1 per cent and the underemployment rate owing to insufficient hours of work stood at nearly 16 per cent. The Government indicates that the impact of the international financial crisis was seen in a sharp drop in foreign demand during 2009. In order to alleviate its impact, measures were adopted to sustain domestic demand and from the third quarter of 2009 onwards economic activity began to recover. The Revalora Peru programme promotes employment and improves the employability of the unemployed and of workers who risk becoming unemployed owing to the global crisis or as a result of changes occurring in the country’s economic sectors. The programme also seeks to increase business competitiveness by means of training services, consultancy, technical assistance and links between enterprises. According to Government data, the programme had provided training for 28,474 persons up to April 2010, of which 39 per cent were women and 61 per cent were men. The CGTP points out that investment in infrastructure, colleges and health centres and investment in social expenditure could generate many temporary jobs in areas where mass unemployment occurred as a result of the crisis. The Committee recalls that the Convention invites member States to take steps to implement active labour market measures and to keep those measures under review, within a clearly defined and established framework. The Convention accordingly asks governments and the social partners to periodically review their labour market measures to evaluate their effectiveness in achieving full employment (2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, paragraphs 785 and 786). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether a national employment plan was adopted, and how it is ensured that the social partners participate in the review and evaluation of the measures adopted to achieve full employment. The Committee requests the Government to include information in the report on the situation, level and trends of employment, unemployment and underemployment in both urban and rural areas of the country.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and implementation of employment and vocational training policies. The Government indicates that the process of drawing up national employment policies has been public and participatory, with contributions and comments from the employers, the workers and the general public, with the goal of promoting the creation of decent work, especially identifying the different features and needs of men and women from vulnerable groups of the population. The trade unions state that the Government was unwilling to subject employment policies to the process of social dialogue and that the Technical Employment Committee of the National Council for Labour and Employment Promotion (CNTPE) has not met since October 2007. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the manner in which it is ensured that the views of the representatives of the social partners (including representatives of workers in the rural sector and the informal economy) are taken fully into account in formulating employment policies and obtaining the necessary support for their implementation.

Precarious employment and the informal economy. The Committee observes that informal work continues to involve large sections of the population, with nearly seven in ten persons outside the agricultural sector engaging in some kind of informal employment. In the first half of 2010, a total of 4,426 enterprises and 17 formalization offices and information booths catering for micro- and small enterprises were established, providing assistance, advice and training in that sphere. The Ministry of Production, through the CRECEMYPE programme, provides users with brochures and publicity material to inform them of the procedures to follow to formalize their businesses and the profits made. Priority sectors are wood and carpentry, textiles, craftwork, tourism, catering, leather, footwear and agro-industry. The trade unions have repeatedly expressed concern, stating that measures to promote micro- and small enterprises may generate more precarious employment and have a negative impact on the rights of workers in micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises (2010 General Survey, paragraph 394). The trade unions repeat their concern in the observations received in August 2010 at the lack of consultation with regard to identifying and resolving the social problems that arise in micro-, small and medium-sized enterprises and in the informal economy. The CCL considers that the existing legislative machinery can facilitate the formalization of small and medium-sized enterprises. The Committee recalls that the Conference, in the conclusions relating to the promotion of sustainable enterprises (96th Session, June 2007), urged all enterprises, regardless of their size, to apply workplace practices based on full respect for fundamental principles and rights at work and international labour standards. The Committee requests the Government to include information in its next report which shows that while the creation of productive and sustainable employment in smaller enterprises is promoted, it is also ensured that the rights contained in ratified Conventions are applied to the workers in these enterprises.

Vulnerable categories of workers. The Government indicates that women, young persons, persons with disabilities and, in general, all groups with low skill levels tend to have a precarious footing in the labour market. The goal of the Construyendo Peru programme is to generate temporary employment and the development of skills for unemployed persons in situations of poverty and extreme poverty in urban and rural areas. The beneficiaries of the programme include significant numbers of women, young persons at risk, single mothers, persons with disabilities and older people. According to the information in the Government's report, since July 2006 a total of 296,277 temporary jobs were created in 10,522 projects and 224,058 persons were trained to develop basic, technical and productive skills to improve their employability. The Committee requests the Government to include up-to-date information in its next report on the impact of the measures taken to ensure that the most vulnerable categories of workers obtain productive, high-quality employment.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that youth unemployment stands at 18.8 per cent. The Committee notes that the aim is to provide labour and social security incentives for employers in labour-intensive sectors with regard to placing young persons in jobs or training schemes. In addition, the aim is to strengthen the Vocational Guidance and Occupational Information Service vis-à-vis young persons, taking account of their needs and capacities and the requirements of the labour market. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information in its next report on the impact of the measures taken to stimulate youth employment, vocational training and the business development of young entrepreneurs. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to include information on the incorporation of the youth employment promotion policy in tripartite consultation bodies.

Coordination of training policies with employment. The Government indicates that the "National vocational training policy guidelines" (LNPPF) are being implemented to create more effective links between vocational training and the requirements of the labour market. Vocational training policies have been established in 18 regions, six of which have a regional vocational training plan. The Committee notes that the drawing up of various surveys on worker skills in different sectors served as the means for developing occupational profiles in the agro-industry and dock work and updating occupational profiles connected with tourism and the textile industry. Policies were also formulated to promote occupational, technical and vocational training, to increase access to high-quality technical training and various forms of retraining, and to enhance the development of entrepreneurial capacities in the workforce and the reinforcement of enterprises. The trade unions consider that the level of investment in education is abnormally low. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the impact of regional policies and plans on promoting education and vocational training policies. It also requests the Government to include information on the coordination of education and vocational training policies with employment policies, especially how the supply of training is coordinated with the demand for knowledge and skills and the needs of the labour market.

Cooperatives. The Government recalls that the Ministry of Production is formulating policies and programmes to promote the creation of cooperatives, the formalization thereof and an increase in their competitiveness. The Committee notes that the "National plan for cooperative development" will lead in the medium term to a greater contribution by cooperatives to productive employment in the country. The IV National Economic Census of 2008 reveals that urban cooperatives have created 8,120 jobs but does not contain any information on rural service cooperatives. The trade unions reiterate their concern at Act No. 27626 regulating temporary work cooperatives, which they consider contributes towards evasion in the application of the labour legislation. The Committee again emphasizes the importance of ensuring the application of labour laws so as to avoid the emergence of "pseudo-cooperatives", which are only intended to gain access to the benefits related to the status of cooperatives, such as tax advantages or social security benefits, while avoiding the application of labour legislation (2010 General Survey, paragraph 465). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to combat and eliminate the practices of “pseudo-cooperatives”. The Committee refers to the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193), and requests the Government to include information on the manner in which cooperatives contribute to the promotion of productive employment.

Philippines

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1976)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2010 including replies to the 2009 observation. The Government indicates that the Worktrepreneurial Program continues to benefit the workers in the informal sector to have sustainable business enterprises. The Committee also notes that evaluation studies will be undertaken as to the impact of programme assistance to the workers in the informal sector. The Government indicates that the Philippine Labor and Employment Plan (LEP) for the period 2011–16 was adopted and focused on inclusive growth through decent and productive work. The LEP provides the strategic directions for the Medium-Term Development Plan (2010–16) by communicating the Philippine vision for labour and employment and showing the intended direction and emphasis over the next five years. The Government is currently strengthening its commitment to addressing the employment issues by preparing a Philippine Labor and Employment Agenda 2011–16. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report detailed information regarding the impact of the Worktrepreneurial Program on assisting workers in the informal sector to enter into sustainable business enterprises. It also invites the Government to indicate how the major employment promotion strategies articulated in the Medium-Term Development Plan (2010–16) are executed and whether special difficulties are encountered in attaining the employment objectives of the strategies announced. Please also provide information on the implementation of the Labor and Employment Agenda 2011–16 objectives within a framework of a coordinated economic and social policy (Article 2(a)).

Employment trends. The Committee notes that employment increased by around 6,879 million persons from 2001 to 2010; from 29,156 million to 36,035 million persons. Employment moved towards the services sector (74 per cent of total employment generated) and away from the industrial sector (10 per cent) and agriculture, forestry and fishing sectors (16.1 per cent). The LEP indicates that by 2010, 51.8 per cent of the employed during the year were in the services sector and the share of agriculture, forestry and fishing sector stood at 33.2 per cent, while the industrial sector was at 15 per cent. The Committee notes that with the economic recovery in 2010, the domestic economy posted a rebound, growing by 7.3 per cent, due to a firm recovery in manufacturing. Merchandise exports and service based industries bolstered by strong consumption and sustained inflow of remittances. The LEP also indicates that over the 2001–10 period, the growth trend in labour productivity has been generally increasing, except during the 2008–09 crisis years. Nevertheless, labour productivity, on average, grew annually by 1.6 per cent with the highest growths posted in 2007 (4.1 per cent) and 2010 (4.4 per cent). The Committee notes that a large proportion of the employed is made up of the self-employed and unpaid family workers, and the volatility in employment can be traced in large part to the effect of weather disturbances which had a negative impact on agricultural employment. The Committee further notes that employment growth is barely catching up with population growth. The LEP also suggests that unemployment is prevalent in areas where the agriculture sector continues to play a dominant role. Unemployment rates had little changes from 2005 to 2010, following a small decline between 2006 and 2007 (-0.7 percentage point), unemployment rates remained constant in 2008 (7.4 per cent), 2009 (7.5 per cent) and in 2010 (7.4 per cent). The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report an analysis of the labour market trends, including data on the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment, disaggregated by sector, age, gender, in particular for vulnerable categories of workers mentioned in this observation.

Youth employment. The Committee notes that unemployment is largely concentrated among young workers (aged 15–24 years) which in 2010 represented 51.1 per cent of the total number of persons unemployed. It further notes that the Government has implemented the Youth Education–Youth Employability (YE–YE) project to respond to the urgent need to create more opportunities for the youth to study and enhance their employability. The Government indicates that the YE–YE project was implemented through the Department of Labor and Employment and that three programmes are partners of the YE–YE project: the Jollibee Foods Corporation (JFC), the Youth Employment and Migration (YEM), and the Special Program for Employment of the Students (SPES). The Committee invites the Government to continue to report on measures taken to meet the needs of young persons and to indicate how beneficiaries of the different programmes implemented have found lasting employment.

Coordination of training policies with employment opportunities. The Government indicates that the Technical Education and Skills Development Authority (TESDA) facilitates the employment of the Technical Vocational Education and Training (TVET) system graduates through the SEEK-FIND-TRAIN-VERIFY-EMPLOY proactive job-skills matching approach – this approach aims to provide for increased wages and/or self-employment for TVET graduates – by equipping the Filipinos with the skills needed in the labour force. The Government also indicates that, in 2009, graduates of TVET regular programs accounted for 1,903,793 out of the 1,982,435 enrollees. The Committee notes that some programmes such as the Youth Profiling for Starring Career (YP4SC), the TESDA Blue-Desk Jobs Bridging (BJB), and the Private Education Student Financial Assistance (PESFA), link training to employment opportunities. The Government indicates that there is no available information, disaggregated by gender and age, concerning education, training and lifelong learning. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on how the human resources development policies are coordinated with employment policies and on how the Government is strengthening the coordination between vocational institutions. It also welcomes information on how the local authorities and social partners participate in the design and implementation of training policies and programmes, and relevant data on the impact of the training programmes implemented in terms of the integration of its beneficiaries into lasting employment.

Article 3. Participation of social partners in the formulation and application of policies. The Committee notes that the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) collected inputs from many stakeholders through discussions at the Tripartite Industrial Peace Council (TIPC), and dialogue with worker's and employer's groups and other stakeholders to prepare the LEP. The Committee also notes with interest that the Task Force on Private Employment Agencies Convention, 1997 (No. 181), was created to benchmark areas for improving regulatory measures affecting private employment agencies. The Government indicates that one of the objectives of this Task Force is to identify the potential areas of partnership between private recruitment and placement agencies and public employment service and establish a mutual cooperation, assistance and collaboration between them in facilitating local employment opportunities. In its General Survey of 2010 concerning employment instruments, the Committee highlighted that the employment services are part of the necessary institutions for the achievement of full employment. In conjunction with Convention No. 122 and the Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88), Convention No. 181 forms a necessary building block for employment growth (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 785–790). The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report on Convention No. 122 information on the new measures taken to build institutions for the realization of full employment. It further invites the Government to include information regarding the involvement of representatives of the rural sector and the informal economy in the formulation and implementation of the employment policy.

Poland

Implementation of an active labour employment policy. The Committee notes the Government's report received in August 2010 containing detailed replies to the points raised in the 2009 observation. The Government reports greater efficiency of employment services, cooperation of labour market partners, and professional activation measures for vulnerable categories of workers. In terms of improving the institutional servicing of the labour market, the most important change relates to the separation of the Centre for Professional Activation from the structure of the poviat labour office into a specialized, decentralized unit mandated with the implementation of services and tools into the labour market. The Government further reports that it seeks to enhance the enforceability of decisions taken by employment councils and authorities. The Government indicates that, in a 2009 research study, it was demonstrated that the employment councils fulfil their entrusted advisory function but lack the ability to make any binding decisions. As a result of this study, a set of recommendations was formulated concerning the organization, activities and tasks of employment councils. The National Action Plan for Employment 2008 (NAPE) has benefited several categories of vulnerable workers notably: persons with disabilities, elderly workers and the long-term unemployed. According to Government data, 14,649 persons with disabilities and 49,388 elderly persons participated in the implementation of employment programmes. The Government further reports that, over the last several years, the long term unemployment rate was reduced by half. The Committee notes that the Government has drafted a National Action Plan for Employment for 2009–11 with the specific purpose to increase the professional activity of Polish workers during the economic slowdown. The Committee notes that the global financial crisis led to a slowdown in economic activity in Poland, with the rate of real GDP growth dropping to 1.6 per cent in 2009. In 2010, real GDP growth increased to 3.8 per cent. The general government deficit rose from 3.7 per cent of GDP in 2008 to 7.9 per cent in 2010. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved and difficulties encountered in implementing the measures set out under the national actions plans to promote full employment and how these measures will translate into productive and lasting employment opportunities for the unemployed and other categories of vulnerable workers affected by the crisis.

Youth unemployment. The Government states that the high and rapidly rising level of unemployment among young people is one of the most important problems in the Polish labour market. The Government reports that the unemployment rate among young people is slightly higher than the EU average. The Committee observes from ILO data that the youth unemployment rate increased from 17.3 per cent in 2008 to 23.7 per cent in 2010. The lack of work experience and appropriate high-level vocational education are an impediment for young jobseekers. In 2009, active labour market programmes covered 267,953 unemployed persons under the age of 25, which marked an increase of 7,336 (2.6 per cent) from 2008. For the period of January–April 2010, active forms of counteracting unemployment benefited 96,975 persons less than 25 years of age (i.e. 37.6 per cent of all persons who started participating in active programmes). The Committee notes that a programme of professional activation for persons less than 30 years of age has been initiated by the Minister of Labour and Social Policy in 2010. The activation measures focus, inter alia, on general and vocational trainings, apprenticeship programmes and granting of loans to finance the costs of trainings. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing detailed information in its next report on the efforts made to improve the situation of young persons, and the results achieved and difficulties encountered in implementing the youth employment policy objectives.

Women. The Government reports that, in recent years, the employment situation of women in the workforce has improved. The disparity between the unemployment rate of men and women has decreased over the years. In 2005, this disparity was 2.5 percentage points (16.6 per cent for men and 19.1 per cent for women). In 2009, the active labour market measures covered 697,370 unemployed persons, including 384,634 unemployed women. During the period of January–April 2010, 144,149 women participated in active employment programmes. The Government indicates that the traditional division of social roles persists in its society. It also underlines the importance of stimulating the country's low birth rate and its intention to address this issue. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the 2010 direct request formulated under the Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention, 1958 (No. 111), in which the Government was encouraged to pursue its efforts to combat the stereotypes regarding the roles of women and men in society and at work. The Committee therefore invites the Government to provide in its next report on Convention No. 122 information on the impact of measures adopted to ensure that each worker shall have the fullest possible opportunity to qualify for and use his or her skills, in accordance with Article 1(2)(c) of the Convention.

Portugal

Implementation of an active employment policy. Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee notes the report provided by the Government for the period ending May 2010, with contributions from the General Union of Workers (UGT), the Confederation of Trade and Services of Portugal (CCSP) and the Portuguese Confederation of Tourism (CTP). In its observation in 2009, the Committee invited the Government to provide information on the manner in which the difficulties encountered in attaining the objectives of the Convention had been overcome, and particularly on the effects on the labour market of the February 2009 reform of the Labour Code. The Government recalls that, with a view to overcoming the global financial and economic crisis, the “investment and employment” initiative (Act No. 10 of 10 March 2009) was launched to promote public investment projects in critical areas for the modernization of national infrastructure (school infrastructure, renewable energy, information technology), including measures to facilitate exports by small and medium-sized enterprises. In January 2010, the Government launched an “employment initiative” (Council of Ministers Decision No. 5/2010 of 29 January 2010) to maintain employment levels, facilitate the entry of young persons into the labour market and combat unemployment. Furthermore, to follow up the tripartite agreement concluded in June 2008, the Government had adopted new contractual arrangements, adjusted unemployment benefits and taken other measures to promote employment. Agreement was reached with the social partners on combating precarious employment and the segmentation of the labour market and improving the quality of employment. The reforms of the Labour Code were intended to strengthen the legal presumption of the existence of an employment contract and prevent dependent employment relationships being hidden by means of “false green receipts”, which prejudiced workers and state revenue. The measures adopted included limiting the renewal of fixed-term contracts and promoting the use of a simple form to legally challenge dismissal. According to the data published by the Employment and Vocational Training Institute (IEFP), in 2010 a total of 181,115 persons benefited from employment and placement programmes, around 340,000 persons had received vocational training and 11,718 retraining (similarly, in 2009, almost 173,000 persons benefited from employment and placement programmes, 344,155 persons from vocational training and 17,103 from retraining). The Committee notes that in January 2011 a total of 557,244 unemployed persons were registered with the employment centres, showing a small decrease in the number of unemployed (of 0.5 per cent) in relation to January 2010. Nevertheless, despite this slight improvement, unemployment had increased for 27 consecutive months. The unemployment rate rose from 7.6 per cent in 2008 to 9.5 per cent in 2009, reaching 10.8 per cent in 2010. Taking into account changes in the statistical methodology, it is projected that the unemployment rate will be higher than 12 per cent in 2011. In view of the worsening nature of the debt crisis, in May 2011 the Government received the support of the European Financial Stability Mechanism and submitted a Memorandum of Economic and Financial Policies to the International Monetary Fund with the intention of restoring market confidence and increasing the potential of the national economy to generate socially balanced growth and employment. The Government plans to create new jobs, particularly for youth. Furthermore, the Government indicates its readiness, in consultation with the social partners, to reform the employment protection legislation to foster flexibility and improve equity, and to ensure that labour costs support job creation and competitiveness. Although it was decided to suspend public works and reduce the number of public employees, the Committee understands that the Government is also proposing to continue implementing active measures to support the labour market, improve the employability of young persons and other vulnerable categories of workers and ease labour market mismatches. While being aware of the burden of structural adjustment, the Committee emphasizes the importance of continuous and genuine tripartite consultations in confronting and mitigating the effects of the crisis (paragraph 788 of the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments). In this respect, the Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report demonstrating that the opinions of the social partners have been taken into account in the adoption of measures intended to increase labour market flexibility. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information allowing an assessment of the manner in which the reduction of labour costs has permitted the creation of productive and quality jobs.

Measures to promote employment among vulnerable categories of workers. In its report, the Government recalls the measures specifically intended for unemployed workers over 55 years of age and those adopted in respect of the “integration employment” and “integration employment+” contractual arrangements (envisaged in the tripartite agreement of June 2008). According to the IEF analysis, in December 2010, the majority of the unemployed were women between 35 and 54 years of age. Taking into account the importance of the employability of young and disadvantaged categories of the population in the new adjustment measures proposed in May 2011, the Committee once again requests the Government to include updated information in its next report on the results achieved by the measures intended to promote employment opportunities for all vulnerable categories of workers.

Creation of jobs in small and medium-sized enterprises. The CCSP emphasizes the positive contribution of the meetings held periodically of the Technical Support Group for the National Employment Plan in the context of the Economic and Social Council. The CCSP expresses its conviction that the future of employment policy will depend on the improvements that are made in the coordination of the various national policies, on giving greater importance to measures intended to promote the creation of self-employment and on improving the evaluation of the impact of the measures adopted on employment levels. The CCSP also emphasizes the need to review the measures adopted so as to allocate resources more effectively and obtain a positive return on the investments already made in employment. The CCSP also reports the difficulties encountered by most Portuguese enterprises, which are small or micro-enterprises, and are not able to organize their work so that one or more of their workers can benefit from training schemes. Small-enterprises and micro-enterprises should be provided with specific training taking into account the very small number of their workers. The Government recalls in its report the specific training measures adopted aimed at small enterprises. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report the measures adopted which have been successful in facilitating the activities of micro- and small enterprises for the creation of productive employment.

Education and training policies. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized the concern of trade union organizations concerning the school drop-out rate among youngsters and the decline in the participation of adult workers aged between 25 and 65 years in further training. In its report, the Government refers to the establishment of a tripartite support commission for the initiative Novas Oportunidades and the National Qualification System (SNQ). Enterprises are now under the obligation to provide quantitative data on the continuous training of workers in their annual reports. In the Memorandum on Economic and Financial Policies submitted to the IMF in May 2011, the Government acknowledged the need to continue taking action to tackle low educational attainment and early school leaving and to improve the quality of secondary education and vocational education and training, with a view to increasing efficiency in the education sector, raising the quality of human capital and facilitating labour market matching. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide updated information in its next report on the measures adopted to coordinate education and training policies with employment policy, the necessity for which has become more acute in the current context of structural adjustment.

Employment Service Convention, 1948 (No. 88) (ratification: 1982)

Contribution of the employment service to employment promotion. The Committee notes the Government’s report received in April 2007 in reply to its 2006 observation, which includes a brief statement that there is no formal cooperation between the public employment services and representatives of employers’ and workers’ organizations and that the public employment services have not yet been properly organized to act in accordance with the Convention. The Committee understands that human resources development and access to basic social services are one of the five principles set out in the National Strategy for Poverty Reduction (NSPR – Estratégia Nacional de Redução de Pobreza), which was validated in December 2002 and approved in January 2003. From the information contained in the update of the NSPR published in January 2005, urban and rural unemployment in the country is still a matter of serious concern. In this context, the Committee emphasizes the need to ensure the essential function of employment services, which is to achieve the best possible organization of the labour market, including its adaptation to meet the new needs of the economy and the active population (Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention). It requests the Government to provide the statistical information available in published annual or periodical reports concerning the number of public employment offices established in the district of Agua Grande and in rural areas, the number of applications for employment received, the number of vacancies notified and the number of persons placed in employment, disaggregated by gender and the location of the offices concerned (Part IV of the report form).

Cooperation of the social partners. The Committee refers once again to the provisions of Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention and asks the Government to report on the manner in which the representatives of the social partners have been associated with the operation of the public employment service. The Committee recalls that for many years, it has been pointing out that the above provisions of the Convention require the establishment of advisory committees to secure the full cooperation of representatives of employers and workers in the organization and operation of the employment service.

The Committee recalls again that the Office is available to provide the Government with technical advice and assistance for the implementation of a public employment service within the meaning of the Convention.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received since 2007. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its previous comments, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the brief reply provided by the Government in March 2007 indicating that owing to a lack of human, material and financial resources, the Ministry of Labour still does not have a centre to deal with persons with disabilities. Therefore, there are currently no policies of any kind relating to the matters covered by the Convention. The Committee also notes that there is a single NGO which deals with issues relating to persons with disabilities. Owing to the lack of material and financial resources, this NGO has been able to do very little for persons with disabilities. The Committee hopes that the Government will demonstrate its commitment to the Convention and will be able to provide in its next report detailed information on the measures adopted or envisaged to promote employment opportunities in the open labour market for persons with disabilities within the meaning of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the Government may request technical advice and assistance from the Office for the implementation of a national policy to provide vocational rehabilitation and to promote employment opportunities for persons with disabilities as required by the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Implementation of an active employment policy. Participation of the social partners. The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received in November 2010, which includes a comprehensive analysis of the country's labour market and a description of the implemented measures. The Government reports that the employment policy and decentralization process continued in 2009 and activities were directed at local employment councils in order to strengthen their capacities in the area of elaboration and implementation of local employment measures. In this regard, training activities were held for members of local employment councils which focused on: the European employment policy; the national employment policy and the importance of employment policy decentralization; regional and local employment policy development; the creation of local employment action plans; and the financing of active employment policy measures. The Government further indicates that the Law on Employment and Unemployment Insurance, which took effect on 23 May 2009, provides an adequate, all-inclusive and flexible legal framework for elaboration and implementation of an active employment policy. The obligation to conclude individual employment plans, the system for tracking and assessing the active employment policy, as well as forecasting the future needs of employers have been introduced. Arrangement and positioning of the National Employment Service and other employment agencies have been specially regulated, while the promotional mechanisms have provided for greater decentralization in the implementation of active employment policy measures. As for the participation of employers' and workers' organizations, the Government indicates that representatives of the social partners have been included in the elaboration of strategic and operative components of the employment policy with regard to defining objectives, priorities and determining measures for employment promotion at the national, regional and local levels. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the impact of the implementation of employment policy measures at the local level, as well as the involvement of the social partners in policy development and implementation and in the local employment councils. The Committee also requests the Government to provide specific details on the consultations held on the matters covered by the Convention with the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations, both at the national and local level, with regard to the implementation and review of an active employment policy.

Employment policy measures taken in response to the global economic crisis. The Government reports that objectives concerning the employment rates defined in the National Employment Strategy 2005–10 were not attained due to the global economic crisis. The Government indicates that macroeconomic data indicate gradual recovery and stabilization, which has also been confirmed by the positive grade carried out by the IMF under the programme supported by a standby arrangement. Interventions implemented by the Government and the National Bank of Serbia to mitigate the negative consequences of the global economic crisis contributed to the attainment of key objectives of the 2009 economic policy. The Government reports that more balanced growth in Serbia will depend on global trends but primarily on structural reforms. The Committee notes that the employment rate declined from 50 per cent in October 2009 to 47.2 per cent in April 2010 and, during the same period, the employment rate of women declined from 42.7 to 40.3 per cent. Unemployment increased during the reporting period with 16.4 per cent in April 2009, 17.4 per cent in October 2009, and 20.1 per cent in April 2010. The unemployment rate of women reached 20.9 per cent in April 2010 compared to 19.4 per cent for men. The number of unemployed persons increased from 517,000 in October 2009 to 572,000 in April 2010. The Government indicates that the active employment policy measures implemented through the National Employment Service include: mediation for persons looking for employment; professional orientation and career-planning counselling; employment subsidies for employers; self-employment support; additional education and training; incitements for financial compensation beneficiaries; and public works. The total number of unemployed persons who participated in the different employment policy measures in 2009 was 135,784 persons, with 42 per cent of this total amount securing employment. While stressing the importance of mitigating job losses in the process towards a new economic growth model, the Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information on the impact of interventions implemented by the National Employment Service. The Committee also invites the Government to provide an evaluation on progress made in terms of policy coherence and policy integration in order to achieve sustainable and productive employment growth.

Monitoring and evaluating employment policy measures. The Government indicates that the Statistical Office carries labour force surveys in April and in October. The opportunity to carry out the labour surveys four times per year is being examined. The Government also indicates that the National Employment Service's information system has been improved so that changes in the labour market can be continuously reported on. Since the new information system has been introduced in all National Employment Service local offices and the central reporting database has been organized, data presentation will now be of a considerably better quality. The Committee refers to the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments and recalls that "[p]rocedures to review and assess the results of employment policy measures are of crucial importance" and such procedures "serve as a helpful means for governments and the social partners to assess the extent to which proposed measures have been implemented and the desired results have been achieved" (paragraph 66). In this regard, the Committee requests the Government to include information in its next report on the methods of coordination envisaged between the economic and social ministries and the social partners, to review and assess the results of employment policy measures.

Youth employment. The Government indicates that the promotion of employment of persons up to 30 years of age is a great challenge since the unemployment rate of young persons in Serbia is one of the highest in Europe. The Committee notes that the unemployment rate of persons in the 15–24 age group increased from 40.7 per cent in April 2009, to 42.5 per cent in October 2009, and 46.4 per cent in April 2010. The number of young persons deciding to continue with their education increased by 31.9 per cent in April 2010 when compared to October 2009 figures, due to the lack of employment opportunities caused by the period of economic crisis. The Committee notes that the ILO Project on Youth Employment Promotion in Serbia, realized with the technical support of the ILO and funding from the Government of Italy, has been assisting, since February 2008, an inter-ministerial working group of experts in the development of the youth employment policy and a National Action Plan on youth employment. The Committee also notes the joint project entitled Support National Efforts for the Promotion of Youth Employment and Management of Migration implemented by the IOM, ILO, UNDP and UNICEF. The project, which started in May 2009 and will last in 2012, has been financed by the Spanish Millennium Development Goals Achievement Fund. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the results of the measures taken to increase the access of young people to sustainable employment.

Roma population and other minorities. The Government indicates that the promotion of employment of the Roma population was one of its employment policy priorities in 2009 and 2010. The Committee notes that a working group dealing with the promotion of employment of Roma people was appointed by the decision of the Ministry of Economy and Regional Development. The information system of the National Employment Service was also improved to better track the effects of the active measures intended for Roma people. On 31 December 2009, 13,416 persons of Roma nationality were registered within the National Employment Service, 6,571 of which were women. In 2010, special public invitations were announced for self-employment of Roma people as well as for employment with subsidies for employers. Activities were directed towards raising awareness and encouraging employers to employ Roma people and towards the improvement of the capacities of local authorities and employment councils with regard to the creation of active employment policy measures intended for Roma people. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the employment situation of the Roma population and other minorities as well as measures taken to improve their participation in the labour market.

Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122) (ratification: 1970)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Policies to promote employment and coordination with poverty reduction. In reply to its 2009 observation, the Government provided in September 2010 a brief report in which it recalled that, in the context of the five-year plan for the period 2007–11, a comprehensive strategy was adopted under which small employment projects aimed at poverty reduction were funded by the Government in collaboration with the Federation of Employers. Job opportunities were also created through funding and training activities for graduates and persons with disabilities. The Government also paid special attention to projects aimed at combating desertification and providing income-generating activities in regions suffering most from poverty. In its 2009 observation, the Committee noted that about 60–70 per cent of the population in the north and 90 per cent in the south of the country are estimated to be living below the poverty line, with incomes of less than US$1 per day. Persons living in rural areas, in particular women and internally displaced populations, are the hardest hit by poverty. Beyond the state of Khartoum, the infrastructure is either non-existent or underdeveloped. The Committee once again recalls that the UN adopted a policy for post-conflict employment creation, income generation and reintegration which stresses that, in post-conflict situations, employment is vital to short-term stability, reintegration, economic growth and sustainable peace. The Committee asks the Government to report in detail on the measures taken to develop and implement an active employment policy within the meaning of the Convention, with the assistance of the ILO and other international agencies. The Government is also asked to provide detailed information on the results obtained, in the context of the five-year plan for 2007–11, in meeting the employment needs of vulnerable categories of workers, such as women, young persons, older workers and persons with disabilities.

Collection and use of labour market data. In its 2009 observation, the Committee noted that the Government carried out a population census in 2008 in order to compile information needed by planners and policy-makers. The Government expressed its intention to release the results of the census in 2009 and to prepare a survey for the collection of data and information on the labour market. In this respect, the Committee notes that the ILO provided training to concerned staff to carry out a labour market survey. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report an account of the progress made to improve the labour market information system and to include detailed statistics on the situation and trends in employment, specifying the manner in which the collected data has been used to determine and review employment policy measures.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in policy preparation and implementation. The Government refers in its report to the formulation and implementation of an employment policy in line with the Global Jobs Pact. It also indicates that a national charter was formulated with the full participation of the social partners. The Government intends to provide the Committee with information on the development of the national charter in a subsequent report. In the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee underlines the importance of ongoing genuine tripartite consultations for tackling and alleviating the consequences of the global economic crisis (2010 General Survey, paragraph 788). The Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will supply detailed information in its next report on the consultations held with the social partners on the formulation and implementation of an active employment policy. It also requests the Government to supply information on the consultations held with the representatives of the persons affected by the employment measures to be taken, such as those working in the rural sector and the informal economy.

Technical assistance to fulfil reporting obligations and the requirements of the Convention. In view of the difficulties to comply with the reporting obligations under the Convention during these past few years and the lack of information in the last report received, the Committee notes that the preparation of a detailed report, including the information requested in this observation, will certainly provide the Government and the social partners with an opportunity to evaluate the effectiveness of the employment policy in meeting the objectives of full and productive employment set out in the Convention. In this regard, the Government might wish to request technical assistance from the relevant units of the ILO to address gaps in the implementation of an active employment policy within the meaning of the Convention.

Thailand

Follow-up of the discussion at the 99th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2010). The Committee notes the replies provided by the Government in January 2011 containing information on the measures taken to promote employment for persons with disabilities, women in remote areas and workers in the informal economy. According to the data from the National Statistical Office, 24,300,000 workers, representing nearly half of the entire active labour force, were in the informal economy. The Committee notes that studies performed by two academic institutions have concluded that Thai workers in the informal economy definitively need benefits from the Social Security Fund. The Government refers again to the second SMEs Promotion Plan for 2007–11 among other measures to enhance the capacity of business and enterprises to tackle the global economic crisis. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report updated information on the impact of the measures taken to promote full, productive, freely chosen and decent employment for vulnerable categories of workers, in particular for workers in the informal economy. Please also include information on the extent, trends and coverage of social security benefits for workers in the informal economy, as well as on the steps taken to coordinate active labour market measures with social security benefits.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. Involvement of the social partners. The Government recalls the three strategic objectives of the Tenth National Economic and Social Development Plan for 2007–11: development of human potential and social protection, sustainable restructuring of rural and urban development, and upgrading national competitiveness. Between October 2009 and September 2010, the Government provided some assistance to workers that were unemployed as a consequence of the global economic crisis. The Committee also notes that a Code of Practice to Promote the Labour Relations in the Economic Crisis was adopted by the social partners in 2008. In its contribution, received in February 2011, the National Congress of Thai Labour (NCTL) recalls that most Thai people have lived in poverty, and indicates that the disparity of income generation is rather high. NCTL asks the Government to formulate concrete policies and measures to alleviate income disparities. The Committee asks the Government to include in its next report information on the results obtained in terms of employment generation concerning the Tenth National Economic and Social Development Plan and to provide details on the employment objectives formulated following the 2007–11 Plan. In this regard, the Committee stresses the importance of promoting and engaging in genuine tripartite consultations on the matters covered by the Convention. The Committee therefore asks the Government to include in its next report detailed information on the consultations held with the social partners to formulate and implement an active employment policy as required by Article 3 of the Convention.

Labour market and training policies. The Government indicates that the National Committee on Skills Development Coordination and Labour Development was set up under the authority of the Prime Minister. In 2010, the Department of Skills Development formulated a new strategy to take into account the impact of the global economic crisis. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government provides online labour market information. The NCTL expressed the view that the Skills Development Scheme does not respond to the needs of the labour market. The cooperation between skills development institutes and enterprises in implementing the measures should be taken into account. In its 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized the increasingly important role of the social partners and training institutions in defining human resources development strategies. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the manner in which the representatives of workers and employers have contributed to developing vocational training mechanisms, as well as how the coordination between training institutions has been strengthened. Please also indicate how skills development measures are coordinated with active labour market measures.

Women. Prevention of discrimination. The Government indicates that there is no discrimination towards women and that women have equal opportunities and market access. The Committee notes the statistical data disaggregated by gender provided by the Government in its report on the number of jobseekers registered with the Department of Employment who obtained jobs, as well as on the training courses provided. Referring to its 2011 comments on the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100), the Committee requests the Government to clarify to what extent the data provided in its report on Convention No. 122 shows that the principle of non-discrimination is being implemented effectively in practice. It also invites the Government to continue to provide information on initiatives taken to promote increased participation of women in the labour market. Please provide further information, including statistics, on the effects of such initiatives in ensuring that there is freedom of choice of employment, and that each worker shall have the fullest possible opportunity to qualify for, and to use his or her skills in a job for which he or she is well suited in the conditions set out in Article 1(2)(c) of the Convention.

Migrant workers. The Government recognized in its report that it faces a challenge concerning migrant workers related to political, social, economic, health-care and national security issues. Having realized the difficulties that migrant workers face in terms of harassment from employers and employment agencies, including the threat of human trafficking, the Ministry of Labour carried out various measures to register migrant workers, especially illegal migrant workers, and to enhance the labour inspectorate for these workers. The Government mentions the Declaration of 3 August 2010 for dignity and work aimed to protect Thai workers working overseas and migrant workers working in Thailand and to prevent human trafficking, to reduce service fees and expenses on employment services and to take care of the families of the workers concerned. The Committee notes that NCTL expressed concerns about the practices and measures taken by the Government to tackle the difficulties concerning migrant workers. NCTL further indicates that an extensive number of unregistered alien workers, who do not possess any national identity certificates, are still remaining. Unregistered alien workers are unable to enjoy their rights with regard to access to labour protection and social security coverage, as required by Thai law and regulations. The Committee requests the Government to act expeditiously and to report in detail on the effective measures taken to address and resolve issues relating to migrant workers. It also requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained in the framework of an active employment policy to prevent abuse in the recruitment of foreign workers and the exploitation of migrant workers in Thailand, with due regard to their fundamental rights.

Older workers. The NCTL indicated that priority should be given to extend medical coverage, retirement savings and employment opportunities for older workers. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report information concerning the measures taken or envisaged in order to better integrate older workers into the labour market.

Workers in the rural sector and the informal economy. The Government reports on the project for emergency employment and skills development to mitigate the suffering of people from economic crisis and natural disasters. Emergency employment includes hiring workers for public interest work like dredging canals and ditches and building dams. The Committee invites the Government to indicate how the emergency schemes implemented gave the opportunity for its beneficiaries to qualify for and use their skills in decent jobs for which they are well suited, as required by Article 1(2) of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee invites the Government to report on the quantity and quality of job opportunities for homeworkers, with special attention to the situation of women, and on the impact of the measures taken to reduce the decent work deficit for male and female workers in the informal economy and to facilitate their transition into the labour market.

Tunisia

Implementation of an active employment policy. The Committee notes the brief report received in May 2011 containing information relating to its previous comments. The Committee notes the provisional Government's employment programme, established by the Ministry of Vocational Training and Employment. The programme has four main components: the creation of new paid jobs in all sectors; entrepreneurial development and the creation of micro-enterprises; support for struggling enterprises and the preservation of existing jobs; and active support for jobseekers and enhancing their employability. In its previous comments the Committee underlined the importance of being able to examine information on the manner in which the main areas of economic policy contribute "within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy" (Article 2 of the Convention) to achieving the objectives of full, productive and freely chosen employment. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives set out in the Government's new programmes, including updated quantitative information on the trends and results of the measures established to stimulate growth and economic development, raise living standards, respond to labour force needs and resolve the problem of unemployment and underemployment (Article 1(1)).

Labour market policies to promote balanced and integrated regional development. The Government indicates that the Ministry of Vocational Training and Employment has adopted a local approach toward the creation of jobs involving all regional and local players concerned with employment. This local approach has been gradually stepped up. The Government also indicates that the dialogue with the social partners is ensured on an annual basis in the context of the Higher Council for the Promotion of Human Resources. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the results achieved, in collaboration with the social partners at the regional and local levels, in terms of job creation through the various programmes established, particularly to make up the backlog in relation to employment creation between the regions.

Promotion of small and micro-enterprises. In its previous comments the Committee expressed the desire to examine the measures adopted "in order to create an environment conducive to the growth and development of small and medium-sized enterprises" (see Paragraph 5 of the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189)). The Committee understands that one of the main components of the provisional Government's employment programme is the development of entrepreneurship and the creation of micro-enterprises and also support and monitoring at all stages of the business development. The support programme for promoters will go ahead throughout the first two years of the project. The Committee invite the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the results achieved as result of these initiatives.

Collection and use of employment data. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in the coordination of the various labour market information systems and information on the manner in which the data compiled have been used to decide on and keep under review employment policy measures. It hopes that the studies undertaken with international assistance will allow new measures to be defined to promote employment among the most vulnerable categories of workers, such as women, young persons, older workers, rural workers and workers in the informal economy.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation and application of policies. The Committee once again emphasizes the importance of giving full effect to Article 3 of the Convention, particularly in a new constitutional context and one of persistent unemployment. It hopes that the next report will contain precise information on the consultations held with the representatives of the social partners on the subjects covered by the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the most vulnerable categories of the population, and particularly with representatives of workers in rural areas and in the informal economy, with a view to securing their cooperation in formulating and implementing employment policy programmes and measures.

Uganda

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Coordination of employment policy with poverty reduction. Following its previous observations, the Committee notes with interest that the National Employment Policy (NEP) for Uganda was completed, adopted by Cabinet and launched by the President in May 2011. The Government commended the ILO in providing technical support for the preparation of the NEP. The Committee observes that the NEP addresses the problems of unemployment, underemployment, labour productivity and poverty in the country. It also emphasizes that employment creation is central to the national socio-economic development process. Furthermore, the NEP stresses that despite Government poverty reduction efforts, the number of Ugandans living under poverty (7.5 million according to the data provided by the Uganda Bureau of Statistics (UBOS) in 2009) is still high and that addressing unemployment and underemployment is one of the ways to further reduce poverty levels. The Committee expresses its appreciation with regard to the efforts made to implement an active employment policy within the meaning of the Convention. It invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in attaining the employment policy objectives set out in the National Employment Policy, including results of the programmes established to stimulate growth and economic development, raise living standards, respond to labour force needs and resolve the problems of unemployment and underemployment.

Article 2. Collection and analysis of employment data. The NEP recognises that the twin challenge of poverty and unemployment is at the core of the transformation of Uganda from a poor agrarian economy to a modern, prosperous and skilled society. Accordingly, the NEP has laid a strategic framework to direct efforts towards employment intensive interventions within a stable macro-economic environment. In this respect, the NEP emphasizes that monitoring and evaluating the implementation and impact of policy measures at all levels shall be carried out on regular basis using appropriate indicators. This will involve full participation of the government ministries and departments, private sector, workers' and employers' organizations and civil society. The Government recognises that accurate and timely labour market information on jobs, jobseekers, labour mobility, employment levels, real wages, and hours worked and desired skills, among others, in the public and private sector, especially in the small-scale unregistered private sector, is essential to this policy. Labour market information enables the monitoring of the employment situation and trends, as well as the design of appropriate policies. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report up-to-date information on the current situation and trends regarding the active population, employment, unemployment and underemployment throughout the country and in the different regions, by sector of activity, gender, age and level of qualifications.

Labour market information system. The Government indicates in its report that to strengthen the labour market, it has created a unit for the collection of labour market information in the Directorate of Labour. The unit works very closely with the UBOS. It also indicates that the capacity of the unit to collect, analyse and disseminate information on the employment situation needs to be developed. Further steps have been taken to update the labour market database to cater to the new demands of information and statistics nationwide and in East African Community. The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report whether any particular difficulties have been encountered in improving the labour market information system.

Promotion of youth employment. The Committee notes that there are differences in employment levels by gender, education attainment, residence, whether urban or rural, and by age. The NEP indicates that the population is predominantly young with children and youth constituting 75 per cent of the total population. It further indicates that Uganda's labour force is young, untrained, unskilled and rural-based. According to the UBOS, the youth population is estimated to increase from 5.4 million in 2002 to 8.5 million in 2015. The high total fertility rates (6.38 per cent) in Uganda are the proximate cause of the fast rate of growth of new young entrants to the labour force. The Committee notes that despite the introduction of Universal Primary Education, the majority of new entrants to the labour force over the period 2002–03 to 2009–10 had not completed primary education. Poor training, low productivity jobs and low wages trap the working poor and exclude young persons from participating in economic growth. The Committee notes that the NEP also emphasizes that youth requires to be instilled with, among others, a positive work culture, commitment and dedication to work, including discipline, career guidance and counselling and provision of skills to enable them to meet the current needs of the labour market. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on the results of programmes concerning education and vocational training for young persons. Please also provide information on the efforts made to improve the employment situation for young persons and the results achieved in terms of designing targeted programmes and incentives for promotion of sustainable job creation for the youth.

Promotion of women's employment. The Committee notes that women represent over 50 per cent of the labour force. A larger percentage of the female rather than the male labour force is illiterate. Unequal access to education restricts women to sectors with low productivity and low wages, and most of the young unemployed persons are women. The Government indicates that women in Uganda constitute the majority of farmers and unpaid workers as they are responsible for most of the care economy. Only 12 per cent of women are in wage employment compared to the 25 per cent of economically active men (the male participation rate in wage sectors is more than three times that of women). The Committee notes that there is a sharp segregation of women into low paying sectors such as agriculture; women in the low paying sectors receive at most half the average male wage. Recalling the Committee's comments under the Equal Remuneration Convention, 1951 (No. 100) as to the occupation segregation of women and its contribution to the gender pay gap, the Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on Convention No. 122 on the efforts to improve job creation and increase labour market participation for women as a result of the measures adopted.

Informal economy. The Committee notes that, according to the NEP, the informal sector is growing and generates both wage and self-employment opportunities in unregistered small and micro-enterprises. Informal employment constitutes 67 per cent of the total employment outside agriculture. The 2009–10 Uganda National Household Survey (UNHS) indicates that 1.2 million households operated off-farm informal businesses engaging 3.5 million persons. Out of these, 600,000 persons and one million persons respectively were engaged in trade and manufacturing. The Government indicates that the informal sector will continue to be a major employer for some time and that more information is required on the full range of its activities, as well as on its capacity to generate decent wage earning opportunities. It also indicates that despite the fact that the informal sector currently provides alternative employment to the majority of the labour force, it is insufficiently supported, hence the need for measures to develop it, enable it to grow and provide better job opportunities. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the efforts made to extend access to justice, property rights, labour rights and business rights to the informal economy workers and business (see 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, paragraph 697). It also invites the Government to indicate how the initiatives relating to micro-enterprises have contributed to improving the working conditions in the informal economy.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners. The Government indicates that the NEP was developed by a National Taskforce comprising ministry officials, representatives of the Federation of Uganda Employers and of the unions, the Uganda Bureau of Statistics and others key stakeholders. Furthermore, the NEP emphasizes that the Government shall take overall responsibility for its implementation with the participation of other actors, including the private sector, employers' and workers' organizations, development partners, as well as other stakeholders. The Committee notes that the Ministry responsible for Labour shall spearhead the implementation of the policy in collaboration with other ministries, social partners and agencies that play a key role in employment creation. The Committee invites the Government to provide examples of the questions addressed or the decisions reached on employment policy through tripartite bodies. It would also appreciate continuing to receive information on the involvement of the social partners in the implementation of the National Employment Policy.

United Kingdom

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Employment trends and active labour market measures. The Committee notes the comprehensive and detailed Government's report received in September 2010 for the period from June 2008 to May 2010, including the 2008–11 Corporate Plan of the Department for Employment and Learning, and information for Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales. The Government states that it remains committed to the idea that work is the best route out of poverty and, despite the recession, has objectives to: (a) provide employment opportunities for all; (b) prevent poverty and provide security for those who cannot work; and (c) ensure that the welfare system is affordable for the State. The Government indicates that the labour market performed well during the recession, despite record falls in GDP and large rises in the number of people being made redundant. While unemployment increased by 383,000 people in January 2010 when compared to the previous year, it fell in the last quarter of 2009. The number of people in employment in the United Kingdom for the three months ending January 2010 was 28.86 million, down 54,000 over the quarter, and down 483,000 over the year. This relatively strong performance was reportedly driven by £5 billion investment to maintain an active labour market regime and extend support to people to help them move back into work. The Government reports that, even at the height of the recession, around half of all people who made a claim to Jobseeker's Allowance had left benefit within three months, many of them moving straight into employment. The Government also reports that the employment rate for ethnic minorities fell, along with the overall rate in Great Britain, while the gap between the two narrowed to 12.4 per cent. The 2010 first quarter figures showed that the employment rate in Great Britain stood at 71.9 per cent and the ethnic minority employment rate at 59.9 per cent. The Government indicates that the most urgent task facing the United Kingdom is to implement an accelerated plan to reduce the deficit as a necessary precondition for sustained economic growth. The June 2010 budget set out the action the Government will take to rebalance the economy and provide the conditions for sustainable, private sector-led growth, balanced across regions and industries. The Office for Budget Responsibility forecasts an increase in private sector employment of nearly 2 million by 2015–16 through measures such as reducing the main rate of corporation tax and increasing support to businesses. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on private and public sector employment outcomes and the labour market impacts of public budget cuts, as well as on the involvement of the social partners in the employment policy formulation and implementation process.

Role of employment services in employment promotion. The Committee notes that Jobcentre Plus is the principal agent of the Government's active labour market policy. Working with a range of partners, Jobcentre Plus promotes work as the best form of welfare, helping unemployed and economically inactive people of working age to move closer to the labour market and compete effectively for work, while providing appropriate help and support for those without work. The Committee notes that the Government published a consultation paper entitled "21st Century Welfare" in July 2010 on the future of the benefits and tax credit systems. Following consultations, one of the Government's responses with regard to Jobcentre Plus is to allow it freedom and flexibility to work in partnership at the local level and to respond to local needs, to secure improvement to employment services and achieve the necessary employment outcomes. The Committee invites the Government to include information on the contribution of the employment services and Jobcentre Plus in the implementation of active labour market policies.

Education and training policies. The Government reports that it established a Commission for Employment and Skills (UKCES) in April 2008, which funded and managed the performance of the Sector Skills Councils. The Government also indicates that it is committed to bring about a culture and systems change to integrate employment and skills services to help low-skilled unemployed persons to improve their skills, to get and keep a job, and to progress in work through continued training. The white paper "Building Britain's Recovery, Achieving Full Employment", published in December 2009, committed the Department for Work and Pensions and the Department for Business, Innovation and Skills to work more closely with Jobcentre Plus and the LSC-SKILLS Funding Agency, to bring employment and skills closer together. The Committee notes the Five Year Strategic Plan 2009–14 which sets out UKCES' corporate plan and high-level priorities. An important part of the skills strategy is to focus training provision on meeting more accurately the needs of business and local economies. The Committee also notes that in April 2008 the Scottish Government created a new public body, Skills Development Scotland (SDS), to bring a better focus to skills development. The SDS has a key role to play in driving forward the strategic priority on learning, skills and well-being as set out in the Scottish Government Economic Strategy to contribute to increasing sustainable economic growth. It will work with other established bodies to realise the vision set out in the skills strategy to focus on the individual development of skills, improve the economic pull of skills development and create cohesive structures for the delivery of skills development. The Government further reports on the trade unions' role in raising demand for learning and skills through the Union Learning Fund, which has enabled over 800,000 workers to get back into learning since the Fund was introduced in 1998; and over 220,000 workers during 2008–09. The Committee asks the Government to provide in its next report information on how various existing and newly established bodies are actually streamlining the efforts to make skills development and employment closer.

Youth employment. The Committee notes two major specific measures targeting youth employment. Firstly, the Young Persons' Guarantee (YPG) offers a guarantee of an offer of a job, training or work experience to jobseekers aged 18–24 who reached the six-month point of their claim to Jobseeker's Allowance. Under this programme, the young unemployed were given a number of options to choose, from applying to existing vacancies to taking up an internship. However, due to the austerity measures, the Government planned to end the YPG programme during the first half of 2011. Another programme called Backing Young Britain (BYB) supported young people aged 18–24 in obtaining work experience. Work experience was available from week 13 of a young person's Jobseeker's Allowance claim. However, as part of the public expenditure savings announced in the May 2010 budget, the Future Jobs Fund was scaled back and the recruitment subsidy ceased in June 2010. The Government indicates that it will replace the employment measures with a coherent single programme, the Work Programme. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures taken to meet the needs of young people in order to increase their access to lasting employment.

Persons with disabilities. The Government indicates that it is important that everybody, and in particular health-care professionals and employers, understand the links between work and health and the role they can play in helping people to stay in or return in employment. It is working to take this agenda forward, in partnership with key stakeholders like employers, the National Health Service, health-care professionals, trade unions and insurers. The Government reports an increase in the labour participation rate for persons with disabilities from 39 per cent in 1998 to 48 per cent in 2008, thanks to specific targeted measures, such as the New Deal for Disabled People and Pathways to Work provision, alongside a strengthening of the legal rights of persons with disabilities. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the results of the implementation of the measures designed to address the needs of persons with disabilities in the open labour market.

Older workers. As many people wanted to remain in the labour market beyond the age of 65, the Government indicates that it issued a public consultation paper in July 2010 outlining proposals to phase out the Default Retirement Age (DRA). The Government also indicates that the Age Positive initiative is working with business leaders in nine key sectors – manufacturing, transport, construction, health, retail, hospitality, local authorities, education and finance – to align their respective priorities to the business case for older workers, the value of flexible working and the value to employers of retaining skills and experience by working without a fixed retirement age. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the impact of measures promoting the participation of older workers in the labour market.

Long-term unemployed. The Government indicates that it recognizes the continuing need to provide strong employment support to people out of work. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government will introduce a single Work Programme for the long-term unemployed to deliver coherent, integrated support more capable of dealing with complex and overlapping barriers to work. The Work Programme will be an integrated package of support providing personalized help for people who find themselves out of work, based on need rather than benefit claimed. The Committee invites the Government to include information on the implementation of the Work Programme and the achievements in promoting the return of long-term unemployed persons to the labour market.

Uruguay

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Implementation of an employment policy within the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. In reply to the observation of 2009, the Government described in its report received in September 2010 the interrelationship between active and passive labour market measures. The Committee notes that the Unemployment Insurance Act was amended to approve the payment of a special benefit to people over 50 years of age who faced major difficulties in finding employment. For specific sectors particularly affected by the crisis in the leather, textiles, clothing, wood and metallurgical industries, a system of special subsidies for partial unemployment was set up.

Moreover, the Committee notes that employment protection measures were adopted for training and reclassifying workers in the most vulnerable sectors by means of the “Objective Employment” and “Uruguay Studies” programmes. The Committee notes that during 2009, despite the effects of the crisis, the economy maintained a positive growth rate (2.9 per cent) supported by increases in consumption, public investment and external demand. The most dynamic sectors were transport, storage and communications, while the industry in general contracted significantly as a result of the decrease in exports. In 2009 the activity rate stood at 63.2 per cent and the unemployment rate fell from 7.3 per cent in 2009 to 6.8 per cent in 2010. The Committee notes that the strengthening of the network of public job centres (CEPES) continued and that 24 such centres were operational by May 2010. The Committee refers to its previous observation and requests the Government to indicate in its next report what progress was made in achieving the goals of tackling poverty, reducing social inequalities and ensuring sustainable development, as indicated in the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) adopted in February 2007. The Committee requests the Government to include information on the results of the active and passive labour market measures referred to in the present observation and the manner in which they have contributed towards achieving full, productive and high-quality employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide data disaggregated by categories of workers who face major difficulties in finding lasting employment, such as women in the rural sector, young people and older unemployed workers.

Strengthening and coordination of institutions. The Government indicates that the “National Employment Directorate–National Employment Board” system was reorganized in the context of the DWCP and draws attention to the setting up of the National Employment and Vocational Training Institute (INEFOP) in October 2008. In the 2010 General Survey on employment instruments, the Committee observed the setting up of INEFOP (2010 General Survey, para. 144). The Committee recalls the importance of linking measures adopted in the context of employment and vocational training policy with general development policies, especially those promoting industry. The Committee requests the Government to include information in its next report on mechanisms established to facilitate the necessary coordination of employment and education policies with economic and social development policies adopted by various ministerial bodies.

Workers in the informal economy. The Government states that the informal employment sector has decreased markedly, due to a set of measures adopted to that end. The Committee notes with interest that a negotiating group for the domestic service sector was formed in the Wage Council and initiatives were taken by the Social Security Bank (BPS) to reduce the lack of social security registrations, which increased the number of contributors. Moreover, steps were taken to facilitate the formalization of the smallest enterprises, the tax system and exports of products manufactured by micro-enterprises. According to the National Institute of Statistics, the informal employment rate reached 32.9 per cent in 2008, mostly affecting the interior of the country, where there was also a greater disparity between the rates for men and women than in urban areas. The Committee invites the Government to continue to supply information on the integration of workers from the informal economy into the formal economy and on the impact of support measures on the establishment and consolidation of micro- and small enterprises.

Cooperatives. The Committee notes that by Decree No. 558/009 of 9 December 2009 the Government regulated the functioning of the National Cooperative Institute (INACOOP), whose tasks include coordination of the formulation, linkage and execution of the programmes constituting the National Cooperative Development Plan, promotion of the cooperative sector and formulation of training programmes for capacity building in cooperative management. The Committee invites the Government to supply further information in its next report on the progress made by INACOOP in promoting labour cooperatives and social cooperatives.

Education and vocational training. The Government supplied information on the “Uruguay Studies” programme aimed at enhancing competencies, knowledge and skills linked to innovative projects and to the demands from the public, private and social sectors. Grants, internships and credit lines have been established for persons wishing to develop productive business ventures further to completion of their training. The Committee invites the Government to include information in its next report on the impact of the adopted measures and the other initiatives aimed at training employed workers, the recently unemployed and the long-term unemployed.

Article 3. Participation of the social partners in the formulation of employment and vocational training policies. The Government highlights in its report the tripartite operation of INEFOP, which strengthens the possibilities of formulating and implementing vocational training programmes in the country. The Government also mentions that in November 2009, under the national agreement concerning employment in the construction industry, activities were undertaken with social partners from Argentina to train workers in the sector. The Committee requests the Government to include more detailed information in its next report on the manner in which the social partners participate in the formulation and implementation of active employment and vocational training policies, including data on activities undertaken by the INEFOP tripartite committees on employment and vocational training at departmental and sectoral levels and with other countries in the region.

Uzbekistan

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Active labour market measures taken in response to the global crisis. The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2010 and the additional information provided by the Government and the Federation of Trade Unions of Uzbekistan (FTUU) in May 2011. The Government indicates that it benefited from sustainable economic growth, with an 8.1 per cent GDP growth in 2009. The Asian Development Bank forecasted GDP growth of 8.5 per cent in 2010 and 9.0 per cent in 2011. The Committee notes with interest that prior to the elaboration of the ILO Global Jobs Pact, the Government adopted in 2008 an Anti-Crisis Programme of Measures for 2009–12 aimed at recovering from the crisis and providing an increase of the number of available jobs. The Government indicates that 600,000 jobs were created in 2008, and 940,000 jobs in 2009 due to the implementation of the anti-crisis programme. In 2010, in accordance with set targets, 950,000 jobs were created through the adoption of measures which included the support of exporting enterprises, the modernization of vital branches of the economy, the implementation of investment projects, the development of micro- and small enterprises, and the promotion of home-work arrangements in cooperation with the manufacturing sector. The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report information on the impact of the employment measures taken to overcome the negative effects of the crisis.

Implementation of an active employment policy. The Government reports that the country's employment policy is proactive as it aims at ensuring full, productive and freely chosen employment. It also indicates the provisions of the Employment Act dealing with employment policy. Furthermore, the Government indicates in its report that in order to implement the employment policy, the local state administration bodies are vested with certain powers which include the development and implementation of the measures promoting the stabilization of the situation of the labour market through, inter alia, the identification of the regions in need of priority development. In this regard, state policy on regional labour markets is implemented both in the framework of national programmes and regional and local employment promotion programmes, taking into account the specific demographic features and the social and economic development of the regions. The FTUU indicates that a General Agreement on socio-economic issues for 2011–13 between the Cabinet of Ministers, the Chamber of Commerce and Industry, and the Council of the FTUU provides, inter alia, for the following: ensuring that systemic measures are taken into account when drafting and implementing annual job creation and employment programmes, where special attention should be given to the creation of permanent jobs with stable remuneration and safe working conditions, especially in rural areas; ensuring further implementation of job creation measures by developing effective forms of employment, including small business development and entrepreneurship, construction of housing and social infrastructure, and extensive use of home work arrangements; ensuring the reduction in unemployment and the improvement of vocational training and retraining for the unemployed; ensuring a steady growth in employment, especially in rural areas; and supervising employers' compliance with the requirements laid down in the labour legislation. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information on the effects of the 2011–13 General Agreement and the outcomes of specific employment policy measures and programmes adopted to address the employment situation in the most affected regions.

Vulnerable categories of workers. The Committee notes the information supplied by the FTUU indicating that trade unions submit proposals on job creation measures and on the allocation of a fixed number of jobs for vulnerable categories of workers. The FTUU further states that these proposals are normally taken into account in designing regional employment programmes. It also indicates that one of the objectives of the General Agreement on socio-economic issues for 2011–13 is to provide all possible support to ensure the employment of graduates of higher education and specialized secondary schools, persons returning from military service and socially vulnerable population groups. The Committee invites the Government to include in its next report detailed information on the impact of employment measures addressing the needs of vulnerable categories of workers such as women, young people, older workers and workers with disabilities.

Article 3. Participation of social partners in the formulation of policies. The Government indicates that the direct participation of the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations is ensured in the elaboration and implementation process of the employment policy. The FTUU also indicates that an agreement to cooperate in the field of employment policy has been reached between the Ministry of Labour and Social Protection and the Council of the FTUU. As part of the implementation of the said agreement, the trade unions have set up a public monitoring system relating to job creation measures. In the first quarter of 2011, trade unions carried out verifications in 118 enterprises in order to evaluate the number of new jobs created. The FTUU also indicates that regional and sectoral agreements focus on matters relating to the design and implementation of programmes to promote employment, create jobs, prevent mass unemployment and provide social protection to persons who have lost their jobs. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the consultations held with the representatives of employers' and workers' organizations, including details of their contributions to the implementation of an active employment policy.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report for the period ending September 2010. The Committee also notes the comments made by the Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production of Venezuela (FEDECAMARAS) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI), and the Government's replies to the comments made by FEDECAMARAS and ASI.

Implementation of the employment policy in the framework of a coordinated economic and social policy. Participation by the social partners. The Government provides information on the implementation of the Simón Bolívar National Economic and Social Development Plan (2007–13) to achieve an efficient economy and collective social welfare. Among the various elements of the employment policy, emphasis may be placed on protecting the quality and mobility of employment, an active wages policy and the reactivation of employment in strategic sectors. The objective, through the Plan, is to reactivate the construction industry so as to reinforce its dynamic role, and there is also interest in promoting tourism as an employment-generating industry. Credit policies and incentives are also being applied to promote small and medium-sized enterprises. Support has been provided for non-traditional exports through the establishment of facilities, the identification of potential products and the implementation of incentive policies. The Government has established funds with resources to improve the physical infrastructure of the country, the support services for production and to reduce the deficit in relation to social infrastructure. According to the ASI, employment policies have been strengthened in the services and transport sectors, although in the industrial sector the policies have not met the expectations generated. FEDECAMARAS expresses concern at the absence of bipartite and tripartite consultations and the lack of social dialogue. The Government indicates that consultations were held with all the sectors of the national economy. It reiterates that all the social partners participated in productive round-table meetings, including representatives of all production sectors, social production enterprises, cooperatives and micro-, small, medium-sized and large enterprises. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information in its next report on the impact of the measures adopted within the framework of the Economic and Social Development Plan 2007–2013 in terms of the generation of productive, stable and quality employment. The Committee also requests the Government to provide tangible examples of the manner in which the viewpoints of employers' and workers' organizations and of other categories affected have been taken adequately into account in the development, implementation and review of employment policies and programmes (Article 3 of the Convention).

Employment situation, level and trends. According to the National Statistical Institute (INE), in January 2010 the activity rate was 65.2 per cent and the unemployment rate was 10 per cent. According to the data provided by the Government, between 2005 and 2009, the total unemployment rate fell by 3.9 percentage points, with that of women falling by 5 percentage points and of youth by 3.8 percentage points. The Committee notes that, according to the INE, in the second half of 2009 the employed population numbered 7,001,120 workers, of whom 2,364,562 were engaged in the public sector and 4,636,558 in the private sector. The Committee invites the Government to provide data in its next report on the size and distribution of the labour force, employment, underemployment and unemployment. The Committee would welcome information on the manner in which labour market data are used as a basis for regularly reviewing the employment policy measures adopted, as an integral part of a coordinated economic and social policy, with a view to achieving the objectives of the Convention (Article 2).

Youth employment. The Committee notes that in 2009 there were 360,815 unemployed young persons. The Government indicates that a series of programmes have been launched to delay the entry of young persons into the labour market through the provision of study grants and education subsidies. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures adopted to create jobs for young persons, ensure their training and promote entrepreneurship among young persons.

Workers in the informal economy. The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government, three out of every four new jobs created during the period under examination were in the formal economy. The Government indicates that over the past decade public policies have been introduced to promote formalization through alternative financing mechanisms. In its Economic Survey of Latin America and the Caribbean 2009–10, ECLAC emphasized that there had been a significant reduction in the number of formal jobs, accompanied by the creation of informal employment. Over the last two quarters of 2009, formal employment fell by 0.7 per cent, while informal employment rose by 5.1 per cent in relation to the same period of 2008. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the implementation of measures allowing the progressive transfer of workers from the informal to the formal economy.

Development of micro and small enterprises. The Committee notes that the Observatory of Small and Medium-Sized Industry (PYMI) is working on the implementation of a geographical statistical information system for the development of policies and interventions for the promotion, development and strengthening of small and medium-sized industries and social ownership units at the national level. According to FEDECAMARAS, the Government's economic policies do not facilitate the development of the private sector, which has diminished in size over the past 10 years by 23 per cent, with a consequent negative impact on possible employment generation. FEDECAMARAS emphasizes that INE data show that micro-enterprises (between one and five workers) fell in numbers by 27.6 per cent and that the number of small enterprises fell by more than 97,000 over the past decade. FEDECAMARAS also denounces the progressive replacement of the private sector by the public sector in terms of employment generation. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed indications in its next report on the measures adopted for the creation of a conducive climate for the generation of productive employment. The Committee would also welcome information on the impact of the measures adopted by the National Institute for the Development of Small and Medium-Sized Industry (INAPYMI) to promote productivity and employment.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 2 (Guyana, Montenegro); Convention No. 88 (Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Belarus, Belize, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Central African Republic, Djibouti, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, Iraq, Montenegro, Nicaragua, Sierra Leone, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Tunisia); Convention No. 96 (Argentina, Ireland); Convention No. 122 (Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Australia, Australia: Norfolk Island, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Croatia, Cuba, Denmark: Greenland, Estonia, Finland, France: French Polynesia, France: New Caledonia, Gabon, Georgia, Hungary, Iceland, Israel, Jamaica, Japan, Kazakhstan, Latvia, Lebanon, Republic of Moldova, Montenegro, Mozambique, Netherlands: Aruba, Netherlands: Curaçao, Netherlands: Sint Maarten, Nicaragua, Norway, Paraguay, Slovakia, Slovenia, Sweden, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, Yemen); Convention No. 159 (Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burkina Faso, Chile, Costa Rica, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Fiji, Hungary, Ireland, Luxembourg, Malawi, Montenegro, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Uganda, Zambia); Convention No. 181 (Algeria, Bulgaria, Czech Republic, Ethiopia, Hungary, Poland).

Vocational guidance and training

Czech Republic

Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's report, received in March 2010, for the period ending in August 2009, including comments from the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS) and the Confederation of Industry of the Czech Republic.

Article 1 of the Convention. Formulation and implementation of education and training policies and programmes. The Government indicates that the Strategy of Lifelong Learning constitutes a comprehensive concept for lifelong learning to be promoted with European funds through the 2007–13 period. The Government further explains that the basic strategic directions of lifelong learning are defined on the basis of analysis of its current state of development in the country and that of its individual segments (initial general, technical and vocational, tertiary, further education). The strategy aims to remove barriers and to provide targeted support in order to allow lifelong learning to become a reality for everyone. CMKOS indicates that the Government's report is confined only to the area of competence of the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs and the Ministry of Education, Youth and Sports. CMKOS also indicates that Resolution No. 1670 of 21 December 2005 regarding the implementation of the Human Resources Development Strategy has been replaced by Resolution No. 761 of 11 July 2007, which focuses only on lifelong learning issues. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the policies and programmes of vocational guidance and vocational training, indicating the manner in which it ensures effective coordination between these policies and programmes, on the one hand, and employment and the public employment services, on the other. The Committee also requests the Government to provide extracts from reports, studies and inquiries and statistical data relating to current policies and programmes of vocational guidance and training (Part VI of the report form).

Article 5. Cooperation of employers' and workers' organizations. The Government indicates that the Employment Act provides for the Labour Offices to establish advisory boards composed principally of representatives of trade unions, employers' organizations, cooperative bodies, organizations for persons with disabilities and regional self-government units. The purpose of these advisory boards is to coordinate the implementation of Government employment policies and human resources development in the relevant administrative districts. The Government further states that the advisory boards provide recommendations on issues such as the assignment of contributions to employers within the scope of active employment policies and retraining programmes. The Labour Offices create working groups, mainly composed of representatives of organizations for persons with disabilities and representatives of employers whose workforce includes more than 50 per cent of employees with disabilities for the purpose of examining suitable forms of work rehabilitation for them. The Committee notes the comments formulated by CMKOS indicating that the Government Board for Human Resources Development, which had been managed by the Deputy Prime Minister due to the cross-sectoral and regional nature of these issues, was terminated without any consultation with the social partners. The Committee also notes that the Confederation of Industry requested the Government to re-establish and use the Board for Human Resources Development with the participation of the social partners. The Committee invites the Government to provide information regarding the manner in which the cooperation of employers' and workers' organizations and, where applicable, other interested bodies is assured in the formulation and implementation of vocational guidance and vocational training policies and programmes. The Committee also refers to its comments formulated on the application of the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122).

Guinea

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the following matter raised in its 2006 direct request, which read as follows:

Policy for the promotion of paid educational leave and its application in practice. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information to demonstrate that it has formulated and that it applies, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, a policy designed to promote the granting of paid educational leave for the various purposes of training and education specified. The Committee also asks the Government to describe the manner in which public authorities, employers' and workers' organizations, and institutions providing education and training are associated with the formulation of the policy for the promotion of paid educational leave (Article 6). Lastly, the Committee invites the Government to communicate all reports, studies, inquiries and statistics which will allow it to assess the extent of the application of the Convention in practice (Part V of the report form).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142) (ratification: 1978)

Formulation and implementation of education and training policies. In reply to its previous comments, the Government indicates that there are no coordination structures linking the three ministries responsible for the implementation of vocational guidance and training policies and programmes. The Government's report received in June 2004 enumerates the technical and vocational training institutions that exist. It also provides information concerning the implementation of the "employment" component of the Poverty Reduction Strategy approved in 2002. The Committee refers, in this respect, to the comments on the Employment Policy Convention, 1964 (No. 122), and asks the Government to indicate the manner in which the measures adopted or envisaged in the context of the Poverty Reduction Strategy reinforce the links between education, training and employment, particularly through the employment services. It asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the efforts being made to secure coordination among the various institutions responsible for developing comprehensive and coordinated policies and programmes of vocational guidance and vocational training. It draws attention once more to the importance of social dialogue in preparing, implementing and reviewing a national human resources development, education and training policy. It would be grateful if the Government would also provide practical information on levels of instruction, qualifications and training activities so that it can assess the application of all the provisions of the Convention in practice.

Guyana

Paid Educational Leave Convention, 1974 (No. 140) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It hopes that a report will be supplied for examination by the Committee at its next session and that it will contain full information on the matters raised in its 2003 direct request:

The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which the various training programmes and plans implement paid educational leave, as provided for by the Convention. It also hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide statistics on the number of workers in both the public and private sectors who have benefited from paid educational leave during the period covered by the next report (Part V of the report form).

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the arrangements for the participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the formulation and application of the policy for the promotion of paid education leave (Article 6 of the Convention).

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the application of the Convention since its last report received in 2003.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls the Government's reply to its direct request of 1999 regarding proposed amendments to draft legislation for the creation of a National Council for Technical and Vocational Education and Training. The Committee requests the Government to report on any progress achieved in adopting and developing comprehensive and coordinated policies of vocational guidance and vocational training, closely linked with employment, in particular through public employment services, as provided in Article 1 of the Convention.

Article 1(5). The Committee refers to its previous comments regarding projects and programmes adopted by the Government to encourage and enable all persons, on an equal basis and without any discrimination whatsoever, to develop and use their capabilities for work in their own best interests and in accordance with their own aspirations, account being taken of the needs of society. The Committee requests the Government to include in its next report information on the implementation of projects and programmes in line with Article 1(5) of the Convention and relevant information on initiatives to encourage the vocational training of women, as well as on the type of training used and the percentage of their participation.

Article 5. The Committee requests that the Government indicate the manner, procedure or consultative machinery instituted to ensure the cooperation of employers' and workers' organizations and other interested bodies in the formulation and implementation of policies and programmes for vocational guidance and training.

The Committee requests the Government to provide any extracts, reports or other available material relating to policies and programmes of vocational training which target specific areas or particular branches of economic activity or specific population groups, as requested in Part VI of the report form.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142) (ratification: 1984)

Implementation of policies and programmes of vocational guidance and training. Collaboration of the social partners. In its 2008 observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the manner in which employers' and workers' organizations collaborate in extending the system of vocational guidance, ensuring effective coordination between initiatives for the provision of vocational guidance and training and the achievement of employment policy objectives. In the report received in September 2010, the Government provides information on progress in relation to training, the activities of the Directorate of Professional and Vocational Training and the vocational guidance services of the employment service. With regard to the National Institute of Socialist Cooperative Education (INCES), the Government emphasizes that work was undertaken for the unification of the various allied courses and that training models were prepared for the certification of learning and knowledge so that beneficiaries could find employment outlets. Since 2009, a vocational skills certification plan has been under implementation in 184 communes. The Government also provides information on the vocational rehabilitation of workers with disabilities. According to INCES data, during the course of 2008 training was provided to 79,237 people, and during 2009 to 96,788 people through the training programmes of the Che Guevara mission, principally targeting the socio-productive vocational training of young persons. In its examination of Convention No. 142 in the context of the 2010 General Survey concerning employment instruments, the Committee emphasized that consultation with the social partners in both the design and implementation of training policies and programmes is imperative for the full application of Convention No. 142. The involvement of local communities and the private sector, including through public–private partnerships, is key to the successful design and delivery of effective training policies and programmes. The Committee requests the Government to include detailed information in its next report on the manner in which, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention, the cooperation is ensured of the social partners and of representatives of communities and the private sector with the view to achieving the objectives of the Convention (Article 1, paragraphs 2–4). The Committee once again requests the Government to supplement the report with extracts from reports, studies and surveys, statistical data, disaggregated by age and gender, etc., on the policies and programmes designed to promote access to education, training and lifelong learning for people with special needs, such as young persons, the low-skilled, people with disabilities, migrant workers, older workers, indigenous peoples, ethnic minority groups and the socially excluded, as well as for workers in small and medium-sized enterprises, the informal economy, the rural sector and in self-employment (Part VI of the report form and Paragraph 5(h) of the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 2004 (No. 195)).

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 140 (Azerbaijan, Czech Republic, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Ukraine); Convention No. 142 (Central African Republic, India, Islamic Republic of Iran, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia).

Australia

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received in September 2011 which includes replies to the matters raised in the 2009 observation. The Committee also notes the comments received from the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU). The Government indicates that from 1 January 2010, all States other than Western Australia referred their industrial relations powers to the Commonwealth, essentially creating a new national industrial relations system for the private sector (known as the "national system"). The number of applications by national system employees for remedy for unfair dismissal in 2009–10 was 11,116. At the end of first quarter of 2011, the number of applications for 2010–11 was 9,498. Information provided by Fair Work Australia indicates that there have been a total of 258 applications finalized at arbitration in the first nine months of 2010–11, of which a total of 20 orders were made for reinstatement. The Government indicates that it is not possible to make a direct comparison between the number of applications under the general protections and the previous legislation because the Fair Work Act general protections consolidated the freedom of association protections, unlawful termination and other miscellaneous protections that applied under the previous legislation. The conciliation settlement rate for 2009–10, which includes all termination matters, was 81 per cent. Under the former legislation, the conciliation settlement rate was 75 per cent in 2008–09. Telephone conciliation remains the predominant conciliation method (96 per cent of conciliations in the first quarter of 2011 and 97 per cent in the last quarter of 2010). The Government indicates that research conducted by TMS Social Research for Fair Work Australia and released in November 2010 shows that 88 per cent of employers reported that having the conciliation over the telephone was convenient and cost effective and 82 per cent of employers were satisfied or extremely satisfied with the cost effectiveness and efficiency of the conciliation process. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing updated information on the application of the Convention in practice and examples of court rulings concerning questions of principle relating to the Convention.

Article 2(2)(b) of the Convention. Workers serving a qualifying period of employment. The Government indicates that the Fair Work Act provides for a longer qualifying period of 12 months for employees in businesses with less than 15 employees to make an unfair dismissal claim. The Government supplied information indicating that, out of the 9,498 unfair dismissal applications made to Fair Work Australia in 2010–11, 1,876 related to small business employers. The ACTU welcomed the Fair Work Act's restoration of unfair dismissal rights to most workers in the federal system. However, the ACTU has serious concerns about the continuing existence of different rules for small businesses. The ACTU notes that this 12-month qualifying period for workers in small businesses effectively excludes 22 per cent of small business employees from claiming unfair dismissal: 41 per cent of all hospitality sector workers and 64 per cent of young people between the ages of 20 and 24. Furthermore, in a transfer of business situation, the Fair Work Act allows a new employer to require a transferring employee to re-serve a qualifying period for accessing unfair dismissal remedies. Keeping in mind the concerns raised by the ACTU, the Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on this issue.

Article 4. Valid reasons for dismissal. The ACTU expresses concern that the Fair Work Act does not require Fair Work Australia to be satisfied that individuals selected for redundancy are fairly chosen. The ACTU adds that there is a risk that employers will be able to unfairly select individuals for redundancy. It believes that the Act should clearly specify that a redundancy is only genuine if the workers retrenched were fairly chosen. The Government indicates that there were 22 unfair dismissal claims dismissed in 2009–10 and 21 unfair dismissal claims dismissed in the first three quarters of 2010–11, arising from redundancy. The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information concerning this provision of the Convention, including examples of court rulings taking into account the requirements for genuine redundancy.

Article 7. Procedure prior to or at the time of termination. The Committee refers to its 2009 observation and invites the Government to include in its next report information on the application of the Small Business Fair Dismissal Code with regard to workers' opportunity to defend themselves against the allegations made prior to termination.

Articles 8 and 9. Procedure of appeal against termination. The Committee notes the ACTU's comments indicating that the usual limitation period for civil claims is six years. The ACTU believes that the 60-day limit under the Fair Work Act is too short, as many workers may not be aware of the motive for the dismissal until well after the event. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the effect given to these provisions of the Convention.

Article 11. Serious misconduct. The ACTU is concerned that the Small Business Fair Dismissal Code does not ensure that employees in small businesses are treated fairly. For example, the Code suggests that an employer may summarily dismiss an employee if he/she believes that the employee has engaged in a single act of theft, fraud or violence. The ACTU indicates that it is unclear whether Fair Work Australia will be able to inquire into the reasonableness of the employer's belief in these cases. The Government indicates that for Fair Work Australia to determine that the Small Business Fair Dismissal Code has been complied with, employers must be able to show that they had reasonable grounds for the summary dismissal, which may include reporting the alleged theft, fraud or violence to the police. Employers who make false reports to the police may be liable for charges under other legislation. The Government indicates in its report that a number of Fair Work Australia decisions demonstrate that the tribunal will examine whether an employer had reasonable grounds for believing that an employee is guilty of serious misconduct. Keeping in mind the concerns raised by the ACTU, the Committee invites the Government to continue providing information on this issue.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2014.]

Cameroon

Articles 12, 13 and 14 of the Convention. Collective dismissals. Severance allowance. The Committee notes the detailed information supplied in the Government's report received in September 2011 in reply to its previous comments. It notes a communication from the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC), which was forwarded to the Government in November 2010, in which the UGTC informed the National Social Security Fund (CNPS) of the dismissal of a number of young workers without prior notification and without any payment of damages. The union also emphasized that the former employees of several local companies had still not received any severance pay after several years. In its observation of 2009 the Committee noted the establishment in July 2006 of a tripartite committee responsible for assessing the balance of social rights of the former employees of liquidated or restructured state companies. The tripartite committee completed its work and the Government gave assurances that the procedure for the settlement of those entitlements was under way. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether the dismissed workers have been paid their severance allowance and to provide information on the measures taken to mitigate the adverse effects of dismissals, such as those envisaged in Paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). The Government is also requested to supply statistics relating to the activities of appeal bodies and the number of terminations on economic grounds (Part V of the report form).

Article 2. The Government indicates that domestic workers and workers in the informal economy belong to the categories of workers that are subject to special regulations or a special scheme. Workers subject to special regulations are not considered as workers covered by the Labour Code of 1992. As regards domestic workers, the Government indicates that the legislation dating from 1967 does not appear to be applied properly. The Committee recalls that the Government did not list in its first report the categories of workers excluded under Article 2(4) of the Convention. The Government is requested to include in its next report copies of the particular provisions that apply to domestic workers. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the new standards concerning domestic workers adopted by the International Labour Conference in June 2011 (Convention No. 189 and Recommendation No. 201). It also requests the Government to continue to take all possible steps to ensure that domestic workers and workers in the informal economy enjoy adequate protection in the spheres covered by the Convention.

Articles 4 and 5. Valid and invalid reasons for termination. The Government indicates that section 34 of the Labour Code requires the existence of grounds for termination. In a ruling of 2 November 1996, the appeals court of the Littoral region stated that, in addition to giving the worker written notification of the termination, the grounds for termination had to be established, proven and legitimate. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide up-to-date information in its next report on the application of the Convention in practice (especially court decisions relating to valid and invalid reasons for termination).

Article 7. Procedure prior to termination. The Government indicates in its report that, in accordance with the right of defence, employers are required to notify the workers concerned of the grounds for termination of their employment. The Government also indicates that, in cases where the worker's conduct or competence constitute grounds for termination, the worker has the right to prove otherwise. The Committee requests the Government to send examples of court decisions which implement this Article of the Convention.

Article 8(3). Time limit for the appeal procedure. The Government indicates that, as regards the time limit for lodging an appeal, if there is no communication from the labour inspector, the appeal is rejected and the matter is referred to the competent authorities, once a period of three months has elapsed (Ordinance No. 72/6 of 26 August 1972 establishing the structure of the Supreme Court). The Committee previously noted that section 74(1) of the Labour Code stipulates a limitation of three years for an action to recover wages or compensation for termination of a contract. The Committee requests the Government to include cases in its next report which show that the time limit for exercising the right of appeal against termination is three years.

Articles 11 and 12(3). Definition of serious misconduct. The Committee notes that serious misconduct is not defined by the Labour Code but by case law. The Government indicates that, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, is serious misconduct of an extremely grave nature which, according to customary practice at work, makes it intolerable to maintain the contractual link. Depending on the circumstances, it may also entail deliberate misconduct or negligence which is extremely detrimental to the employer (theft, assault, defamation, prolonged and unjustified absence). The Committee requests the Government to include in its next report examples of relevant court decisions which allow an evaluation of the application of Articles 11 and 12(3) of the Convention.

Central African Republic

Progress in the application of the Convention. In its 2008 direct request, the Committee expressed the hope that, when preparing new labour legislation, the Government would take into account its comments with a view to reinforcing the application of the Convention. The Committee notes the replies provided by the Government in June 2011 and welcomes the fact that, in January 2009, when adopting a new Labour Code, the terms of the Convention were reflected more precisely in defining the termination of the employment contract at the initiative of the employer, justification for termination and the payment of compensation (Articles 3, 4 and 10 of the Convention). The Committee also notes with satisfaction that under section 152 of the Labour Code of 2009 the dismissal of a worker for filing a complaint or participating in proceedings against an employer involving alleged violations of laws or regulations, or for having recourse to the competent administrative authorities (Article 5(c)) is invalid. Section 143 of the Labour Code of 2009, by providing that an employer who envisages termination for economic reasons shall, to avert or minimize termination, meet the representatives of the personnel and, in the presence of the labour inspector, and explore “all other possibilities, such as: work by rotation, part-time work, temporary lay-offs, the readjustment of bonuses, compensation and other benefits”, is in line with the approach envisaged in Paragraph 21 of the Termination of Employment Recommendation, 1982 (No. 166). The Committee invites the Government to provide in its next report examples of decisions by courts of law relating to individual or economic reasons for termination, as set out in section 142 of the Labour Code (Article 4). It invites the Government to include in its next report statistics on the activities of the labour inspectorate and the courts in relation to termination of employment, the number, duration and outcome of appeals, the level of compensation for termination (Articles 10 and 11), and examples of situations examined by the labour inspection services in relation to collective dismissals (Articles 13 and 14).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Gabon

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report received in August 2011, and also the recent decisions issued by the labour tribunals attached to the report. It notes with interest that Ordinance No. 018/PR/2010 of 25 February 2010 has given a new wording to section 23 of the Labour Code to introduce safeguards against the recourse to fixed-term contracts in order to avoid the protection afforded by the Convention. It is thereby established that fixed-term contracts may only be renewed once, for a maximum period of two years (Article 2(3) of the Convention). Moreover, section 51 of the Labour Code has been amended by introducing an obligation for the employer to draw up a record of the interview that takes place prior to the termination procedure (Article 7).

Application in practice. In reply to the 2009 direct request, the Government indicates that in 2010 there were 73 terminations on economic grounds and 981 terminations on individual grounds in Libreville, where most activities in the tertiary sector are concentrated. The Committee notes Decision No. 40/2010 of 3 December 2010 issued by the court of first instance in Libreville, which, referring to section 53(2) of the Labour Code, indicates that in the event of any dispute the burden of proving the genuine and serious nature of the grounds for termination rests on the employer and thus gives effect to Article 9(2)(a) of the Convention. It also notes that Decision No. 63/09-10 of 24 December 2010 issued by the court of first instance in Libreville, by referring to the relevant provisions of the Labour Code – termination of the employment contract is subject to notice being given by the party that initiates termination – gives effect to Article 11 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information in its next report on the application of the Convention in practice, including available statistics on the activities of appeal bodies and examples of court decisions concerning workers whose employment was terminated on economic grounds.

Papua New Guinea

The Committee notes the Government's report received in September 2011 indicating that the Industrial Relations Bill has received legal clearance from the Office of the State Solicitor and is now in its passage through the National Executive Council and the Parliament for promulgation. It further indicates that, with the assistance of the ILO Pacific Office, progress is being made in the review of the Employment Act with the first round of consultations scheduled to begin in October 2011 and continuing through 2012. The Committee reiterates its previous comments and invites the Government to report on the enactment of the new Industrial Relations Act in order to ensure the full and effective application of each provision of the Convention. As soon as the new legislation is enacted, please provide a copy of its text to the ILO.

[The Government is invited to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Spain

The Committee notes the Government's report for the period ending June 2011, in which emphasis is placed on the provisions respecting termination of the employment relationship adopted through Act No. 43/2006 of 29 December to improve growth and employment; Framework Act No. 3/2007 of 22 March on Effective Equality for Women and Men; and Act No. 35/2010 of 17 September adopting urgent labour market reform measures.

Reasons for dismissal. The Committee notes with interest that the provisions of the Framework Act on Effective Equality for Women and Men have reinforced the grounds that do not constitute justified reasons for the termination of the employment relationship (Article 5 of the Convention). Reasons included relate to the protection of workers during maternity leave, an absence related to pregnancy and adoption, and also in the case of workers who are victims of harassment in respect of the exercise of their work-related rights.

The Committee notes, in particular, that dismissal as a disciplinary measure is imposed for harassment against the employer or persons who work in the enterprise on grounds of racial or ethnic origin, religion or convictions, disability, age or sexual orientation, as well as sexual harassment or harassment on grounds of sex (section 54.2 of the new version of the Workers' Charter).

The Committee invites the Government to indicate in its next report any decisions by courts of law giving effect to these changes introduced by the Framework Act of 2007 on Effective Equality for Women and Men.

Justification of dismissal. Reforms of termination benefits. The Government indicates in its report that Act No. 35 of 2010 adopting urgent labour market reform measures changed the wording of the reasons for dismissal on economic, technical or production-related grounds, as a result of certain shortcomings in the operation of the termination procedures set out in sections 51 and 52(c) of the Workers' Charter. These shortcomings had given rise to a shift from the termination of indefinite contracts for economical or production-related reasons towards more cases of wrongful dismissal for disciplinary reasons. The Committee notes the detailed wording of the justified reasons required for dismissal on economic, technical, organizational or production-related grounds set out in section 54(1) of the Workers' Charter. The Committee observes that this is intended to reinforce the giving of reasons for the termination of employment contracts.

The Committee invites the Government to provide with its next report the main decisions by courts of law giving effect to the reasons justifying the termination of the employment relationship based on the operational requirements of the enterprise (Article 4). The Government adds that Act No. 35 of 2010 contains other amendments to the Workers' Charter and the Labour Procedures Act specifically related to notice periods and the calculation of termination benefits. The Committee understands that the principal purpose of these measures is to maintain and create employment. The Committee invites the Government to include in its report an evaluation of the impact of the reduction in the level of termination benefits by the legislative reforms of 2010 and 2011 in terms of maintaining and creating employment. In this respect, the Committee invites the Government to include with its report updated information on the intervention of the labour authorities in cases of collective dismissal, the outcome of appeals against unjustified termination, the average time taken for an appeal to be decided and the role played by mediation and arbitration in resolving issues related to the Convention (Part V of the report form).

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Uganda

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 1990)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided any information on the application of the Convention since its report received in June 2004, which indicated that the draft Employment Bill which, according to the Government, would give effect to the Convention, had still not been adopted. The Committee understands that the Employment Act was adopted and came into force in 2006. In this context, the Committee considers it particularly regrettable that the Government has still not provided the relevant information on the application of the Convention. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to provide a detailed report containing full particulars on the application of each of the provisions of the Convention in both law and practice.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Termination of Employment Convention, 1982 (No. 158) (ratification: 1985)

Legislative reforms. In two communications received in September 2010 and September 2011, the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers and Associations of Commerce and Production (FEDECAMARAS) referred to the extension of the decrees providing protection against dismissal until December 2011, which are intended to guarantee labour stability for workers who earn up to three times the minimum wage by requiring employers to seek authorization to terminate employment. According to FEDECAMARAS, the application of the new rules could mean that workers will agree to financial compensation so as to avoid cases being brought before the labour authorities. In a reply received in November 2010, the Government emphasizes the progressive fall in the number of persons applying for benefits for involuntary loss of employment and the annual fall in the number of unjustified dismissals. In the report received in August 2011 and in a new communication received in December 2011, the Government confirms the extension of protection against dismissal until December 2011 for those earning up to three times the minimum wage. Workers covered by protection against dismissal cannot be terminated, without a valid reason approved previously by the labour inspector. The Government indicates that during the course of 2010, a total of 40,298 applications for reinstatement (appeals against dismissal) were lodged with labour inspectorates. These appeals resulted in 19,710 applications being found to be justified, with the corresponding reinstatement of the persons, while 12,718 applications were found to be without merit. The decisions were handed down within a period of between four and eight months. The Government indicates that in 2010 no complaints were recorded for economic dismissals. The Committee also notes the summary of court decisions relating to the definition of justified reasons for dismissal provided by the Government in its report. The Committee invites the Government to continue providing updated information on the activities of the appeal bodies (the number of appeals against unjustified dismissal, the outcome of such appeals, the nature of the remedy awarded and the average time taken for an appeal to be decided) and on the number of terminations for economic or similar reasons (Part V of the report form). The Committee invites the Government to provide examples of recent court rulings handed down in relation to the definition of justified reasons for dismissal (Part IV of the report form).

Exclusions. The Committee understands that workers engaged in managerial positions are excluded from the special protection against dismissal established since 2001. The Committee invites the Government to indicate the measures adopted to ensure the protection afforded by the Convention to managers.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 158 (Antigua and Barbuda, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Central African Republic, Cyprus, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia, Finland, France, Latvia, Malawi, Republic of Moldova, Morocco, Namibia, Niger, Saint Lucia, Serbia, Slovenia, Turkey, Ukraine, Yemen, Zambia).

Wages

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes the Government's indications that steps have been taken to ensure the application of the provisions of section 14 of the Presidential Decree of 26 October 2008 obliging all public operators to incorporate in all public contracts a clause requiring observance of national labour law. It notes that correspondence describing the terms of this obligation was sent to the General Secretary of the Ministry of Finance and also to the President of the Procurement Board at the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security. However, the Committee pointed out in its previous comment that the inclusion in public contracts of clauses simply requiring compliance with the labour legislation is insufficient to give effect to the core requirement of the Convention. The Convention states that public contracts must include clauses ensuring that workers employed in the execution of the contracts receive wages and enjoy other conditions of work which are not less favourable than those established for work of the same character in the same region and the same sector of activity by national law or regulations, collective agreement or arbitration award. In other words, the workers concerned must have conditions of work not less favourable than the best conditions provided by the three aforementioned alternatives. Hence it often happens that minimum conditions relating to wages or hours of work are improved either for the whole economy or for a given sector of activity through a collective agreement. In this case, the mere application of the labour legislation in the context of public contracts would be insufficient to provide these workers with the best conditions of work that exist.

The Government also indicates in its report that bidders are required, at the time they submit their tenders, to provide a certificate that they are up to date with their contributions to the National Social Security Fund. However, as the Committee emphasized in its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts (paragraph 118), certification that the contractor concerned has complied with labour law and paid the appropriate social security contributions offers some proof of his past performance but, unlike labour clauses, offers no binding commitment with respect to the performance of future work.

The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation it emphasized that the Convention also requires the fulfilment of other obligations, namely consultation of the employers' and workers' organizations concerned with respect to the terms of the labour clauses (Article 2(3)); the posting of notices in conspicuous places at the establishments concerned with a view to duly informing the workers (Article 4); and, in the event of failure to observe and apply the labour clauses, adequate penalties such as the withholding of contracts or the withholding of payments to the enterprises concerned (Article 5).

The Committee again expresses the hope that the Government will take the additional measures in the near future that are needed to ensure the full application of the Convention. It requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this respect.

Argentina

Article 1 of the Convention. Definition of the term "wages". The Committee notes that a Bill establishing the progressive elimination of "non-remunerative" allowances in the private sector and their incorporation into the wages within a period of six months was recently approved by the Senate and is now pending discussion before the House of Deputies. Moreover, the Committee notes the communication of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT RA), dated 31 August 2011, in which the Confederation expresses its support for the aforementioned Bill. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of further developments in this regard and to provide a copy of the new legislation as soon as it is adopted. Furthermore, the Committee notes the CGT's indication that recent jurisprudence has confirmed that all payments to a worker in exchange of his/her work – irrespective of their designation or attributed characteristics – form part of the wage.

However, the Committee notes that the Government once again fails to address the other points raised in its previous observation, namely: (i) the progress made in the negotiations to resolve the dispute between the Ministry of Health of the Government of Buenos Aires and the Federation of Professional Employees of the Government of the autonomous city of Buenos Aires; (ii) the situation with regard to the Bill to amend sections 120 and 147 of the Act on labour contracts on the elements of wages which cannot be attached; (iii) any changes in the situation concerning the payment of wages in the form of locally issued vouchers; and (iv) the current situation regarding wage arrears and other difficulties in the regular payment of wages which may persist in certain sectors or provinces. The Committee is therefore bound to renew its request for detailed information on these points.

Belgium

Article 11 of the Convention. Protection of wage claims in the event of bankruptcy. The Committee notes the joint comments submitted by the Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (CSC), the General Federation of Liberal Trade Unions of Belgium (CGSLB) and the General Labour Federation of Belgium (FGTB) concerning the Act on the Continuity of Enterprises of 31 January 2009, which repeals the Act on Judicial Composition Proceedings of 17 July 1997. The new Act allows enterprises in difficulty to opt for judicial reorganization proceedings so as to continue with all or part of their activities. Under these proceedings, the employer-debtor is granted a moratorium that must not exceed six months, with a view to reaching an amicable agreement with the creditors on a restructuring plan that must specify the periods of payment, the reduction of outstanding debts and, if applicable, the conversion of receivables into shares and the differentiated settlement of certain categories of debts, depending on the extent or nature of these debts. This plan has to be approved by the majority of creditors representing at least half of the claims involved. The CSC, the CGSLB and the FGTB, for their part, state that the conditions for approving the reorganization plan do not guarantee that workers are adequately informed of their rights during the proceedings and tend to benefit other creditors, such as banks or large suppliers, to the detriment of wage earners who, in practice, have to bear a reduction of 50–70 per cent of their wage debts, and sometimes even more, under the majority of plans. On the assumption that wages constitute a vital component guaranteeing the subsistence level of workers and their families, the three trade union organizations believe that wage debts should not be exposed to commercial risk or be conditional upon procedures undertaken from a purely market standpoint. In their observations, the CSC, the CGSLB and the FGTB also point out that wage earners, considered as ordinary creditors, have no privileges whatsoever and that the commercial courts, who are the only ones competent in the matter, systematically refuse to apply the Protection of Remuneration Act of 12 April 1965, citing the principle of speciality. The Committee requests the Government to submit comments concerning the joint observations by the CSC, the CGSLB and the FGTB.

Articles 4, 6, 7, 8 and 12 of the Convention. Abusive practices in the payment of the wages of indigenous agricultural workers. Further to its previous comment regarding abusive pay practices with respect to indigenous agricultural workers, the Committee notes the Government's reference to Act No. 3785 of 23 November 2007 and Supreme Decree No. 29432 of 16 January 2008, which extend the coverage of the General Labour Act and social security protection to seasonal agricultural workers. The Committee also notes the Government's reference to: (i) Supreme Decree No. 28159 of 16 May 2005 on a labour regime for the Guaraní communities; (ii) Supreme Decree No. 29215 of 2 August 2007 on regulations concerning national agrarian reform; (iii) Supreme Decree No. 29292 of 3 October 2007 establishing an Inter-ministerial Council on the eradication of servitude and forced labour; and (iv) Supreme Decrees No. 29802 of 19 November 2008 and No. 0388 of 23 December 2009 on servitude and forced labour in agricultural areas. The Committee asks the Government to elaborate on the practical impact that this legislation has had on the situation of indigenous agricultural workers in the Chaco region, and indicate any targeted programmes or initiatives seeking to improve the pay conditions of the workers concerned. Moreover, noting that a new General Labour Act is currently being drafted, the Committee again requests the Government to take into account the comments made in 2010 under the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), and the Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117).

As regards the implementation of a national plan of action to eradicate and combat forced labour in all its forms, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning: (i) the establishment of the Fundamental Rights Unit (UDF) under Supreme Decree No. 29894; (ii) the Transitional Inter-ministerial Plan 2007–08 for the Guaraní people (PIT Guaraní); and (iii) the programme to strengthen institutional capacities (FORDECAPI) in agreement with the Government of Switzerland. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the UDF set up an action plan for 2009–10 to enforce fundamental rights of all Bolivian workers, especially indigenous and vulnerable workers, that the PIT Guaraní aimed to guarantee individual and collective rights of the Chaco community and was administered in six components, and that the FORDECAPI which addressed all cases dealing with, inter alia, indigenous agricultural workers has been extended until December 2012. The Committee asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any assessment of the various plans against forced labour and on the working conditions of indigenous agricultural workers as well as any follow-up activities that might be undertaken in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Brazil

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes that the Government's report provides detailed information on the legislation governing the conditions of employment of federal public servants, which are not really relevant to the scope and purpose of this Convention. The Committee recalls that the primary objective of the Convention is to guarantee appropriate levels of wages and decent working conditions for workers employed for the execution of public contracts, that is to say contracts concluded by a government authority and involving the expenditure of public funds. The Convention therefore requires that labour clauses be included in public contracts in order to ensure that the workers concerned enjoy wages and other working conditions not less favourable than those established by law, collective agreement or arbitration award for work of the same nature in the same district. As explained in the Practical Guide prepared by the Office in 2008 (page 17), Convention No. 94 is about procurement contracts in the public sector, not about the employment contracts of public employees. The Committee recalls that it has been drawing the Government's attention to the main requirements of the Convention for more than a decade and has been suggesting measures to supplement the public procurement legislation, especially section 44 of Act No. 8666 of 1993 and Normative Instruction No. 8 of 1994. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to take action in order to bring its legislation into full conformity with the requirements of the Convention.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Bulgaria

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes with regret to note that the Government is still not in a position to report any concrete progress in giving effect to the principal obligation of the Convention, i.e. the insertion of the labour clause prescribed by Article 2 in all public contracts falling within its scope. The Government refers to three different provisions of the Public Procurement Act (SG No. 28/06.04.2004) which transpose corresponding provisions of the EU public procurement directive 2004/18/EC but which bear no or little relationship to the specific requirements of the Convention. More concretely, sections 16c and 26 of the Public Procurement Act deal with situations where States may use procurement operations as a means to pursue broader public policy objectives such as environmental protection or the promotion of employment of vulnerable groups (e.g. persons with disabilities), whereas section 56 of the same Act requires tenderers to declare that in drawing up their offer they have taken into account existing regulations concerning minimum wage levels. As the Committee has pointed out in paragraphs 242 and 248 of its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, even though there is no contradiction between the requirements of ILO Convention No. 94 and the principles set out in the two EU public procurement directives, these directives do not specify a level of employment protection or the working conditions required in the performance of a contract as the Convention does. The Committee further refers to paragraph 46 of the same General Survey in which it observed that Convention No. 94 calls for the insertion of labour clauses of a very specific content which should not be confused with clauses related to equal remuneration and gender equality, such as those including affirmative action measures (e.g. measures to promote the employment of women or addressing discrimination through a system of quotas), or yet other clauses requiring compliance with core labour standards (e.g. those aimed at preventing the use of child labour and anti-union practices).

In view of the Government's continued failure to implement the basic requirement of the Convention, the Committee wishes once again to draw attention to the following: (i) the rationale of the Convention is to ensure – through the insertion of specific labour clauses in all public contracts – that workers engaged in the execution of public contracts enjoy the most advantageous wage and other working conditions among those established by law, collective agreement or arbitration award for work of the same nature in the same district; (ii) since labour laws and regulations normally set out minimum standards which are susceptible of being improved through collective bargaining, it is evident that the mere fact that the general labour legislation applies also to public contracts is not sufficient in itself to ensure to the workers concerned the most advantageous pay and working conditions established for work of the same character in the district concerned; (iii) to ensure compliance with the terms of labour clauses, the Convention requires concrete measures for adequate publicity (posting of notices) and an adequate system of sanctions (withholding of contracts or withholding of payments) that go beyond the enforcement measures often provided for in the general labour legislation. The Committee therefore urges the Government to adopt without delay the necessary measures in order to give full effect to the requirements of the Convention and recalls that the Government may draw upon the advisory services of the Office to this effect.

Burundi

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 1/01 of 4 February 2008 concerning the Code on Public Procurement. The new public procurement legislation regulates the award, execution and supervision of all public contracts on the basis of equality of treatment and transparency. It also establishes two organs, the National Directorate for oversight of public procurement operations (DNCMP) and the Regulatory Authority of public procurement (ARMP) which are responsible for ensuring compliance with laws and regulations in respect of public contracting. The Committee regrets to note, however, that the Code on Public Procurement does not provide for the insertion of labour clauses as prescribed by this Article of the Convention. In fact, the only provision which appears to address labour matters in relation to the public procurement process is section 55(1)(a) of the Code which excludes from public tendering persons who have not been regular in the payment of taxes, contributions and other dues of all kinds and who cannot produce a certificate of the administrative authority concerned showing compliance with those obligations. The Committee refers, in this respect, to paragraphs 117–118 of the General Survey of 2008 on labour clauses in public contracts in which it pointed out that the Convention does not relate to some general eligibility criteria of individuals or enterprises bidding for public contracts but requires a labour clause to be expressly included in the actual contract that is finally signed by the procuring entity and the selected contractor. Similarly, certification may offer some proof about tenderers' past performance including respect for social obligations but carries no binding commitment with regard to prospective operations as labour clauses do. Noting that the Government in its last report had announced its intention to take appropriate action in order to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention, the Committee hopes that the necessary steps will be taken without further delay. Noting also that Decree No. 100/120 of 18 August 1990 on general conditions of contract will cease to apply upon the entry into force of the new Code on Public Procurement, the Committee requests the Government to transmit the text of the new general conditions of contract once they have been adopted. Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to clarify whether Presidential Decree No. 100/49 of 11 July 1986 on specific measures to guarantee minimum conditions to workers employed by a public contractor – which reproduces in essence the provisions of Article 2 of the Convention without, however, referring expressly to labour clauses – is still in force and, if so, how the application of section 2 of that Decree is ensured in practice.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Cameroon

Article 2 of the Convention. Labour clauses. The Committee notes the adoption of Order No. 033/CAB/PM of 13 February 2007 issuing the General administrative terms and conditions applicable to public contracts (CCAG) and the Prime Minister's Circular No. 003/CAB/PM of 18 April 2008, concerning compliance with regulations pertaining to Government procurement, enforcement and monitoring. It notes in particular the CCAG applicable to public contracts, section 14.1 of which refers to the employer's obligations to protect the labour force and comply with the social legislation in force. The same section stipulates that the rules for application of these texts shall be established by the Special administrative terms and conditions (CCAP). In this respect, the Committee notes that the regulations established by the CCAG are drafted in very general terms and do not comply with the specific requirements of Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of the Convention requires the inclusion of clauses ensuring that workers in enterprises involved in public contracts enjoy the same working conditions as those established for work of the same character in the trade or industry concerned in the district where the work is carried on. The main aim of the Convention is therefore to guarantee that workers employed by an enterprise and paid indirectly from public funds enjoy – thanks to the inclusion of appropriate labour clauses in public contracts – wages and working conditions that are at least as favourable as wages and working conditions normally assured for the type of work in question, especially when the statutory minimum working conditions are exceeded by collective agreements or specific agreements. While noting that the Government states that it intends bringing its legislation in line with the Convention, the Committee asks the Government once again to take steps in the very near future to bring the legislation concerning public contracts in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, especially Articles 2 (inclusion of labour clauses), 4(a)(iii) (notices in workplaces) and 5 (withholding of contracts or of payments). It also requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments concerning the drafting of the new Public Contracts Code, and to include a copy of the text of the CCAP in its next report.

Article 8(1) of the Convention. Deductions from wages. The Committee notes the comments of the General Union of Cameroon Workers (UGTC), dated 9 September 2011, according to which the National Social Insurance Fund (CNPS) as from August 2009 has been making deductions from the wages of certain employees in violation of section 75 of the Labour Code and section 4 of Decree No. 94/197/PM of 9 May 1994. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Labour Code is currently in the process of revision and section 75 will be brought into line with the Convention with respect to wage deductions (known as "deposits") prescribed by individual labour agreements. The Committee also notes the comments of the Cameroon United Workers Confederation (CTUC) according to which the announced labour law reform would call for the involvement of the National Consultative Labour Commission, which nonetheless has not met for the last two years. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in reply to the observations of the UGTC and CTUC. It also requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in the process of revision of the Labour Code.

Article 12(1). Payment of wages at regular intervals. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has recently allocated more than 3 billion CFA francs (approximately US$6.35 million) to private educational institutions permitting them to pay delayed wages. It also notes the Government's indication that the heavily indebted poor countries (HIPC) initiative of the International Monetary Fund has contributed to the reduction of poverty in the country, for instance, by reducing the existing wage debt in the education and health sectors. In this regard, the Committee notes the comments of the CTUC according to which the report of the meeting with public administrations concerned by the payment of wages arrears by liquidated public and semi-public companies has not yet been finalized and communicated to the social partners. The Committee asks the Government to provide more detailed information concerning the persistent problems of accumulated wage arrears that have been highlighted by the Committee in the observations addressed in 2008 and 2009, especially in the public sector, including the total amounts of wage arrears by different branches of the economy, the operation of the special commission set up to calculate and settle wage entitlements and arrears of former employees of state and semi-public enterprises, concrete quantified results of the HIPC initiative with respect to wage arrears, and any other measures taken or envisaged with a view to settling all outstanding payments and preventing the recurrence of similar problems in the future.

Central African Republic

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 08.017 of 6 June 2008 issuing the Public Contracts Act and Decree No. 08.335 of 20 September 2008 on the organization and functioning of the authority to regulate public procurement operations. However, it notes that this new Act, which is aimed at guaranteeing free access to public procurement orders, equality of treatment of tenderers, the economy and effectiveness of the procurement procedure and the transparency of procedures based on their rationalization, modernization and traceability, does not contain any provision on labour clauses which are to be included in public contracts, in accordance with this Article of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee considers it necessary to refer to its 2008 General Survey, which recalls that the essential objective of the Convention is to guarantee to workers employed by an entrepreneur and paid indirectly out of public funds, by placing appropriate labour clauses in public contracts, wages and working conditions that are not less favourable than those normally established for the same type of work, whether they are determined by collective agreement or otherwise. While noting that section 83 of Act No. 08.017 referred to above provides for the establishment of specifications determining the conditions for the execution of the contract, which will include general administrative clauses as well as specific administrative clauses, the Committee requests the Government to take any appropriate measures for the inclusion of provisions giving full effect to Article 2 of the Convention in the general administrative clauses of the specifications. The Committee hopes that, when adopting the decrees issued under the Public Contracts Act, the Government will not miss the opportunity to finally bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, and it requests the Government to provide a copy of any new text as soon as it is adopted.

Article 12 of the Convention. Regular payment of wages. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information regarding the action taken on the Joint Technical Committee's recommendations made in its report of November 2006, for the purpose of setting a time frame for repayment of the wage debt, estimated to amount to 70.05 billion CFA francs (approximately US$144 million). The Committee nonetheless understands that a plan for the settlement of domestic arrears was produced in 2008 by the Ministry of Finance and the Budget in the context of current efforts to reduce the public deficit. Under the plan, a timetable has been set for the clearance of wage arrears, which, according to a new estimate, amount to 117 billion CFA francs (approximately US$239 million) and which must be settled in full by 2016. It also understands that the Government has adopted the settlement plan by incorporating it in the 2009 Finance Act. It understands that wage arrears continue to accumulate in the public sector, for example in the postal and savings services, where workers have not been paid for 55 months, and also in the education sector as well as in the defence and security forces. As the Committee emphasized in paragraph 367 of its 2003 General Survey on the protection of wages, a situation in which part of the workforce is systematically denied the fruits of its labour cannot be prolonged and priority action is therefore needed to put an end to such practices. It accordingly asks the Government to indicate whether a wage debt clearance plan has indeed been adopted and, if so, to report on its implementation, giving particulars of the measures taken and indicating whether and how foreign financial assistance granted for the settlement of wage arrears has been used.

Colombia

Articles 11 and 12 of the Convention. Protection of wage claims in the event of bankruptcy – Payment of wages at regular intervals. Further to its previous comment, the Committee notes the updated information provided by the Government concerning the liquidation proceedings of the hospital San Juan de Dios and of the Merchant Navy Investment Company, which have been the subject of numerous communications received previously from trade union organizations. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made for the final settlement of these disputes. Moreover, in the absence of any reply concerning the situation of the Airline Pilots' Provident Fund (CAXDAC), the Committee again requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments in this regard.

In addition, the Committee notes the comments of the Single Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), dated 29 August 2011, according to which the constitutional and legislative provisions on wage protection are not applied in practice. The CUT and the CTC allege that the Government has failed to put in place sufficient inspection mechanisms to ensure the regular payment of wages. The two organizations refer to the current level of the minimum wage which is far below the poverty line and they denounce the lack of social dialogue in these matters. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in reply to the observations of CUT and CTC relating to inspection mechanisms to ensure the regular payment of wages.

Comoros

Article 3 of the Convention. Minimum wage fixing. Further to its previous observation in which it noted with regret that no progress had been made over the past nine years with respect to the readjustment of the guaranteed interoccupational minimum wage (SMIG), the Committee notes the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Comoros (CTC), dated 31 August 2011, concerning the application of the Convention. The CTC regrets that the compromise monthly minimum wage of 35,000 Comoro francs (KMF) (approximately €70) has still not been made official and that the Higher Council of Labour and Employment (CSTE) has not been reconvened since 2002. The CTC is of the view that the authorities are deliberately blocking the establishment of the SMIG under the pressure of certain employers. In its reply, the Government indicates that the question of a real assessment of the minimum wage will be examined shortly by the CSTE and that following a number of different studies a minimum rate of approximately €70 has been retained and will be proposed for adoption. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any measures taken or envisaged for the determination of the SMIG and the reactivation of the CSTE.

Article 12 of the Convention. Regular payment of wages. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that despite its repeated commitments to put an end to the persistent problem of the deferred payment of wages, especially in the public sector, the Government, hindered by economic and political constraints, had not come forward with any specific measure to pay off the wage debt. In its last report, the Government states that it paid six months of wages in April 2010 and three months of wages in May 2011 to officials affected by the deferred payment of their wages. In this connection, the Committee understands that the Government received financial assistance from international institutions and donor countries in 2010, designed to help it settle its wage arrears. Furthermore, the Committee understands that the amount of time that officials were not paid wages during the 1995–2010 period is estimated to be between 35 and 45 months. Referring to its previous observation and to paragraph 367 of its 2003 General Survey on the protection of wages, the Committee recalls that a situation in which part of the workforce is systematically denied the fruits of its labour cannot be prolonged and that priority action is needed to put an end to such practices. The Committee trusts that the Government will, in the immediate future, formulate a schedule for the prompt and final settlement of all wage arrears. It requests the Government once again to provide detailed information on the extent of the problem, particularly on the overall amount of outstanding wage arrears, the approximate number of workers concerned and the average length of delay in the payment of wages. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged concerning the use of the foreign assistance it was granted to settle the wage debt.

Minimum Wage Fixing Machinery (Agriculture) Convention, 1951 (No. 99) (ratification: 1978)

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Minimum wage fixing machinery. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the Government's explanations that confirm that no progress has been made either with respect to the promulgation of the decree fixing the guaranteed inter-occupational minimum wage (SMIG) at 35,000 KMF (approximately US$110) per month or as regards the reactivation of the Higher Council of Labour and Employment (CSTE). The Government indicates that the draft decree establishing the SMIG rate for the entire private sector, including agriculture, has not yet received the final approval of the President and that the Ministry of Labour is currently taking steps to successfully complete this process. The Government also indicates that tripartite consultations within the CSTE are expected to resume after the adoption of the revised Labour Code which, in turn, is scheduled to be discussed at the next ordinary session of the National Assembly. Regrettably, the Committee is once again obliged to observe that the Convention is presently not applied in either law or practice. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary action without further delay with a view to: (i) establishing and implementing the guaranteed inter-occupational minimum wage rate; and (ii) initiating tripartite consultations within the CSTE on its periodic review and adjustment. It also asks the Government to transmit a copy of the revised Labour Code as soon as it is adopted.

Congo

Article 12 of the Convention. Payment of wages at regular intervals. Further to its previous observations concerning accumulated wage debt, especially in the public sector, the Committee notes the Government's indication that all unpaid wages to public employees, which represented the wage bill of 22 months, have now been paid. More concretely, the Government states that wage arrears totalling 240 billion CFA francs (approximately US$28 million), including both unpaid wages and social security contributions, have been settled. With respect to the payment of the sums owed to the former workers of the Ogooué Mining Company (COMILOG), to which the Committee has been drawing attention for several years, the Government indicates that from July 2008 to March 2009, a total amount of 422 million CFA francs (approximately US$934,000) has been paid to 319 out of 912 former workers of the company. The Committee notes with interest these positive developments and trusts that the Government will continue to closely monitor the process of settling any outstanding payments to the workers concerned. The Committee asks the Government to provide together with its next report an updated account on the situation regarding the regular payment of wages, including detailed particulars on any persistent difficulties in either the public or the private sector and the measures taken in response to such situations.

Costa Rica

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts – Measures of supervision and sanctions. Following its previous comment on the scope of the provisions of Executive Decree No. 11430-TSS of 30 April 1980 compared with that of Executive Directive No. 34 of 8 February 2002, the Committee notes the detailed information communicated by the Government concerning the hierarchy of sources in national administrative law. It particularly notes that a directive is an administrative act of general application with no legislative function and that the provisions of Executive Directive No. 34 are incorporated into the requirements of Executive Decree No. 11430-TSS, which is a higher ranking rule of law. The Committee notes the Government's assurances that an amendment of this Directive for reasons of legal certainty does not seem necessary.

In its previous observation, the Committee also raised matters concerning the inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts, which, according to a Government report, are rare. On this point, it notes the Government's comments to the effect that national legislation clearly and specifically establishes the rights of all workers and that any failure to include labour clauses in a public contract does not undermine the obligation to respect labour and social security legislation. The Committee nevertheless recalls the importance of including labour clauses not only in the contract concluded with the contractor selected, but also in the specifications given to the persons tendering for contracts, in accordance with Article 2(4) of the Convention. Informing the persons tendering for contracts in advance is intended to make them aware of their social obligations when drawing up their tenders. Furthermore, including labour clauses in the actual contract makes it possible to apply sanctions inherent in public contracts if there is failure to comply with these clauses. In this respect, Article 5(1) of the Convention specifically states that adequate sanctions should be applied, by the withholding of future contracts, for failure to observe these labour clauses. Furthermore, under Article 5(2), measures such as the withholding of payments under the contract should be taken to ensure the workers concerned obtain the wages of which they are unduly deprived. The Committee therefore reiterates its previous observation, when it urged the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the actual inclusion of the labour clauses provided for under Executive Decree No. 11430-TSS in all public contracts to which the Convention applies. It notes, in this context, that the Government has contacted the ILO Decent Work Technical Support Team and Country Office for Central America in San José with a view to jointly examining its report on the application of the Convention and, if necessary, to discussing measures that would enable it to ensure the contractors' respect of social legislation in public procurement. The Committee hopes that the Office will provide the Government with all the necessary technical assistance to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention in practice.

Articles 6, 8 and 9 of the Convention. Freedom of workers to dispose of their wages – Deductions from wages. The Committee refers to its previous comment pursuant to observations made by the Union of Workers of the Ministry of Finance and the National Customs Service (SITRAHSAN) concerning the obligation for certain officials to take out an insurance policy (póliza de fidelidad) designed to ensure that they duly fulfil their obligations. It notes with interest the detailed information communicated by the Government on the rules for implementing this obligation, and in particular the fact that the amount of insurance premiums paid by the official concerned is relatively low compared to that of their pay.

Articles 3 and 4. Payment of wages in legal tender and value attributed to allowances in kind. The Committee follows-up on comments it has been making for many years on the need to amend sections 165 and 166 of the Labour Code. As regards section 165, more particularly the possibility of giving workers on coffee plantations coupons that may later be converted into cash, the Committee notes that the Legal Affairs Department of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security had consultations with the Costa Rican Coffee Institute and the Ministry of Agriculture and Livestock to try to obtain more specific information on the way in which workers involved in coffee harvesting are paid and to take a decision concerning the reactivation of the draft amendment of this provision of the Labour Code. As regards section 166 of the Labour Code, under which the value of the remuneration in kind is fixed at a flat rate of 50 per cent of the wage in cash if another amount has not been fixed by an agreement between the parties, the Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government on the subject of the criteria used to establish whether the allowances in kind provided by the employer should be qualified as wages or not. It notes that the Government, while indicating that the fixing of the value of remuneration in kind must reflect reality, nevertheless confirms the application of the regulation established under section 166 of the Labour Code. While noting that, according to the Government, no complaint has been lodged with the labour inspection services on this matter, the Committee recalls, as it stressed in its 2003 General Survey on wage protection (paragraph 153), that Article 4(2) of the Convention imposes an obligation as to the result to be achieved and therefore requires the adoption of practical measures to ensure that any allowances in kind which may be provided in partial settlement of the wages due are attributed a fair and reasonable value. Determining a flat rate to fix this value, as stipulated under section 166 of the Labour Code, does not seem to be in conformity with the Convention on this point. Furthermore, the absence of specific criteria for the assessment of the value of allowances in kind by the parties concerned carries a degree of risk of abuse in this area. By way of example, some national legislations specify that the value of any payment in kind must normally correspond to the cost price and may in no case exceed its market value. The Committee notes that the Government has reiterated its request for technical assistance from the Office concerning the draft amendments to sections 165 and 166 of the Labour Code. The Committee hopes that the Office will provide the technical assistance requested in the very near future so that the Government might take the necessary measures to bring sections 165 and 166 of the Labour Code fully in line with the provisions of the Convention.

Articles 8 and 12. Deductions from wages and payment of wages at regular intervals. The Committee notes with interest the measures described in the Government's report aimed at strengthening the labour inspection services, particularly the introduction of an electronic system of cases and the institution of a national campaign for the respect of minimum wages. It notes the information on the way in which inspection visits aimed at stopping the irregular payment of wages in enterprises are conducted. Finally, the Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the problems linked to the unjustified deductions from wages – upon which the Committee had previously commented – have been settled and no complaint has been lodged on this matter.

Articles 3 and 5 of the Convention. Criteria for determining minimum wage levels – Adequate inspection. The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN), which were received on 31 August 2011 and transmitted to the Government on 22 September 2011, concerning the application of this Convention. The CTRN denounces the low number of labour inspectors resulting in poor compliance with the minimum wage legislation. The CTRN indicates, in this regard, that practically one third of the active population receives wages inferior to the applicable minimum wage rates. In addition, the CTRN draws attention to the need to bring up to date the structure and value of the family basket of goods (rural and urban), to strengthen the National Wages Council and to create within the Ministry of Labour a Technical Unit on Productivity. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the CTRN.

In addition, the Committee understands that in October 2011, the National Wages Council adopted unanimously changes in the methodology for the annual readjustment of the minimum wage. Whereas since 1998, minimum wage rates were reviewed only on the basis of the recorded inflation rate, in the future they will be adjusted by reference to national productivity levels and the expected inflation rate. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report additional explanations on the new methodology and its impact on minimum wage rates.

Côte d'Ivoire

Article 12 of the Convention. Payment of wages at regular intervals. Further to its previous comments concerning persistent problems with the timely payment of wages, the Committee notes the Government's statement that even though there are currently no wage arrears in the public and semi-public sector, the situation in the private sector is different with an increasing number of enterprises experiencing difficulties with the regular payment of wages. The Government adds that according to labour inspection reports, infringements of the labour legislation related to the timely payment of wages are observed more and more frequently due to the socio-political crisis in the country but also because of the lack of legal sanctions. In this connection, the Government indicates that one of the major innovations of the new draft Labour Code currently under examination would be the introduction of penal sanctions against employers who would fail to pay wages on time and in full.

The Committee understands, however, that considerable amounts of wage debts persist in the public sector. It notes, for instance, that in April 2011, a first loan of €200 million was granted by France, aimed at paying accumulated wage arrears to public employees while another loan of €150 million is expected to follow. The Committee also notes that in June 2011, it was announced that unpaid wages owed to postal workers totalled 865 million CFA francs (approximately €1.3 million). The Committee accordingly asks the Government to provide an updated account on the current wage arrears situation detailing the number of workers concerned, the principal sectors affected, the average delay in the payment of wages, the total amount of unpaid wages and the measures taken or envisaged in order to contain and progressively eliminate such practices which clearly contravene both the letter and the spirit of the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments concerning the revision of the labour legislation and the introduction of dissuasive sanctions for the delayed payment or non-payment of wages.

Cyprus

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1960)

Article 15 of the Convention. Implementing legislation. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been drawing the Government's attention to the absence of legislative provisions giving effect to most of the provisions of the Convention and it has been urging the tripartite Labour Advisory Board and successive technical committees to complete the drafting of new legislation. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Protection of Wages Act No. 35(I)/2007 which transposes into domestic law all the key principles of the Convention and complies with most of its requirements.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 10/010 of 27 April 2010 respecting public contracts. However, it notes that this new Act, which is intended to adapt the system of the conclusion of contracts to the requirements of transparency, rationality and effectiveness which currently characterize this vital sector, does not contain any provision on the labour clauses which have to be inserted in public contracts, in accordance with this Article of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee considers it necessary to refer to its 2008 General Survey, which recalls that the essential purpose of the Convention is to ensure that, through the insertion of appropriate labour clauses in public contracts, the workers employed by a contractor and paid indirectly out of public funds enjoy wages and conditions of labour which are at least as satisfactory as the wages and conditions of labour normally established for the type of work concerned, whether they are established by collective agreement or otherwise. While noting that section 49 of Act No. 10/010 provides for the establishment of specifications determining the conditions for the execution of the contracts, which will include general administrative clauses as well as specific administrative clauses, the Committee asks the Government to take all the appropriate measures for the inclusion of provisions giving full effect to Article 2 of the Convention in the general administrative clauses contained in the specifications. The Committee hopes that, when adopting the decrees to apply the Act to public contracts, the Government will not fail to take the opportunity to bring its legislation finally into conformity with the Convention and it requests the Government to provide a copy of any new text once it has been adopted.

Djibouti

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention. Establishment of minimum wage fixing machinery. Further to its previous comments on the abolition of the system of the guaranteed interoccupational minimum wage (SMIG), the Committee notes the Government's explanations to the effect that this decision was taken under pressure from the International Monetary Fund (IMF), which required the Government to adopt a raft of measures, including liberalization of the labour market, to be the beneficiary of a Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP). The Government adds that it made the choice of deregulation rather than leave the SMIG in place, since the balance of public finances would have been seriously jeopardized and wages would not have been guaranteed, thereby threatening the social peace and stability of the country. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the establishment of minimum wage fixing machinery outside the system of collective bargaining is essential for ensuring effective social protection for workers who are not covered by the rules of collective agreements, and that the Government must take the necessary steps to ensure that collectively agreed minimum wage rates are binding and the application thereof is linked to a system of supervision and effective penalties.

The Committee therefore concludes that the situation remains unchanged. Apart from the Government's indication that the matter would be studied by the new National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training (CNT), the Convention is no longer applied either in law or in practice. The CNT was set up pursuant to Decree No. 2008-0023/PR/MESN of 20 January 2008 as a tripartite structure to enable the Government and the social partners to exchange ideas in a free and open manner. In this regard, the Government points out that there is increasing talk of the possibility of reintroducing the SMIG for each branch of economic activity. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on the planned meeting of the CNT and any decisions regarding the reintroduction of the national minimum wage rate.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1978)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received for the fourth consecutive year. The Committee asks the Government to submit a detailed report on the state of national law and practice regarding labour clauses in public contracts in the light of recently adopted public procurement legislation, including Act No. 53/AN/09/6ème L of 1 July 2009 establishing the Public Procurement Code and Decrees No. 2010-0083/PRE, No. 2010-349/PRE and No. 2010-0085, all dated 8 May 2010.

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 8 and 12 of the Convention. Deductions from wages and payment of wages at regular intervals. The Committee has been commenting for a certain number of years on the provision of the Labour Code permitting wage deductions on the basis of individual agreement and also on difficulties experienced in the public sector concerning the timely payment of wages. The Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on both issues, in the light of the provisions of the Labour Code (Act No. 133/AN/05/5ème L). Moreover, as regards the comments communicated by the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) in 2007, the Committee requests the Government to refer to comments concerning the application of the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26)

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Minimum wage fixing machinery. Further to its previous observation in which it noted that the Convention has for all practical purposes ceased to apply following the Government's decision to abolish the system of guaranteed interoccupational minimum wage (SMIG), the Committee notes the Government's statement that Djibouti is not an agricultural country. In addition, as regards the observations made by the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) in 2007, the Committee asks the Government to refer to its comments made under the Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Dominican Republic

Articles 8 and 12 of the Convention. Authorized deductions from wages – Final settlement of wages due. The Committee notes the comments of the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS), the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Union (CASC) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), which were received on 31 August 2011 and transmitted to the Government on 16 September 2011, concerning the application of this Convention. The three Confederations denounce unauthorized deductions from workers' wages by banking institutions and without the workers' prior consent, especially for the repayment of private loans or in the form of charges for banking transactions. In addition, the CNUS, CASC and CNTD allege that workers in export processing zones (EPZ) are experiencing delays in the payment of their wages while in some cases EPZ enterprises are suddenly closed down and disappear without settling outstanding wage payments. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the CNUS, CASC and CNTD.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Egypt

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee recalls its previous comment in which it welcomed the issuance of General Circular No. 8 of the Minister of Finance dated 23 June 2008, which adds two new bidding terms to the provisions of the Public Tenders Act No. 89/1998 and its executive decree thus giving effect to the core requirement of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's explanations that, in the absence of collective agreements, wages are fixed according to the prevailing custom in each region. It also notes the Government's statement that, prior to the issuance of the circular, the matter had been discussed within the Tripartite Consultative Committee and that it was only on that basis that the Ministry of Manpower and Migration requested the Ministry of Finance to issue the circular. Moreover, the Committee notes the Government's indication that all additional steps to ensure the effective implementation of the Convention, particularly as regards the posting of notices with a view to informing the workers of the conditions applicable to them (Article 4) and adequate sanctions such as the withholding of contracts or the withholding of payments (Article 5), are currently under consideration. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take all appropriate action in the very near future to ensure the effective application of the Convention in practice. It also hopes that the Ministry of Manpower and Migration will give the necessary instructions so that the two new bidding terms set out in General Circular No. 8 of 2008 are incorporated as standard clauses into all future public procurement contracts (whether for construction works, supply of goods or performance of services) concluded between public authorities and private contractors.

Article 4 of the Convention. Partial payment of wages in kind. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention for a number of years to the need to take measures to ensure that allowances in kind, when authorized, are appropriate for the workers' personal use and benefit and that they are fairly and reasonably valued, as prescribed by this Article of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee has observed that section 32(d) of the Labour Code of 2003, which reproduces section 30(d) of the previous Labour Code, fails to give full effect to the requirements of Article 4(2) of the Convention. The Committee recalls that the obligation to ensure that allowances in kind are appropriate for the worker's personal use and benefit may be satisfied by exhaustively enumerating the permissible payments in kind, for instance, board and lodging, clothing, use of land or free medical treatment. It also recalls that the obligation to attribute a fair and reasonable value to payments in kind may be met in different ways such as the prohibition to exceed cost price or the ordinary market value, or the price as may be fixed by public authorities. The Committee accordingly hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in order to fully implement in law and in practice the requirements of this Article of the Convention.

Article 6. Freedom of workers to dispose of their wages. The Committee notes the Government's renewed reference to section 42 of the Labour Code, which reproduces section 39 of the previous Labour Code, and which prohibits employers from obliging workers to buy food, goods, or services from specific stores or buy goods produced or services provided by them. The Committee is obliged to reiterate that provisions regulating the use of company stores do not cover all the possible ways in which workers can be limited in their freedom to dispose of their wages (one example would be through exerting pressure on workers to make contributions to certain funds). It is therefore necessary for implementing legislation to contain an express provision generally prohibiting employers from restricting the freedom of workers to dispose of their wages. The Committee accordingly hopes that the Government will consider at the next suitable occasion the possibility of introducing a specific provision laying down a general prohibition upon employers from limiting the freedom of workers to dispose of their wages in any form and manner, directly or indirectly, and not simply in respect of the use of company stores.

France

Article 2 of the Convention. Inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes that, in reply to its previous comment, the Government asserts that the Public Procurement Code of 2006 does not provide for the formal inclusion of labour clauses in public contracts as national statutory law already establishes the requirement of compliance with such clauses. It notes the Government's reference in this respect to the requirement placed on those concluding public contracts to comply with labour legislation. The Committee further notes the adoption of the new general administrative clause specifications (CCAG), such as those approved by the Order of 19 January 2009 approving the specifications for general administrative clauses in public contracts for ongoing supplies and services, which reiterate this obligation and place the requirement on the contractor to comply with the ILO's eight fundamental Conventions. It notes that, according to the Government, in relation to social issues, it is in the interests of the adjudicating authority to make principal use of the executing clause in section 14 of the Public Procurement Code, which allows it to have the service performed, under certain conditions indicated in the Government's report, with the inclusion of considerations such as the insertion of persons with few opportunities for employment, the implementation of training activities for them and the promotion of fair trade. The Committee also notes the detailed information contained in the Government's report concerning the recommendations made in this field by the Public Procurement Advisory Commission. It also notes that, under section 55 of the Public Procurement Code, abnormally low offers can be discarded, after requesting tenderers to provide justifications relating to the working conditions applicable where the work is to be performed. In addition, the Committee notes the Government's indications that French labour law requires compliance, by any subcontractor based in France of a principal contractor for public works, with all the collective agreements extended by ministerial order. It further notes that service providers located abroad who are covered by European Directive No. 96/71/EC concerning the posting of workers in the framework of the provision of services, are also required, for a nucleus of mandatory rules, to comply with the content of extended collective agreements. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the objective of the Convention is achieved in French legislation and that requiring all subcontractors to comply with collective agreements that have not been extended would be contrary to Community law, as established by the case law of the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU), and particularly the Rüffert ruling of 3 April 2008.

With regard to the requirement for parties to public contracts to comply with labour legislation, the Committee recalls its previous observations, in which it emphasized that the fact that the labour legislation is applicable to all employers and all workers, including those involved in public contracts, does not release the Government from the obligation to require the inclusion of labour clauses in such contracts. Indeed, such clauses retain their full value in cases in which, as in France, the legislation only establishes minimum labour conditions which may be exceeded by general or sectoral collective agreements. Moreover, the Committee notes that the Government refers to section 43 of the Public Procurement Code, which provides for the exclusion from public contracts of economic operators who have been convicted for violations of the rules of the Labour Code, as well as those who are not in compliance with their social and fiscal obligations. It also notes that section 44 of the Public Procurement Code requires tenderers for public contracts to produce, when applying, a statement in which they certify that they are in compliance with their obligations in relation to labour legislation and are not covered by any of the exclusions set out in section 43 referred to above. Moreover, section 46 requires the selected contractors, when signing the contract, to produce certificates issued by the respective social institutions demonstrating that they are up-to-date with their social obligations. In this respect, the Committee wishes to emphasize, as it did in its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts (paragraph 118), that the objective of the insertion of labour clauses in public contracts goes beyond simple certification, as its purpose is to eliminate the negative effects of competitive tendering on labour conditions. A mere indication that no violation of legislation has been recorded in relation to work already carried out by the entrepreneur is not sufficient to meet this requirement. Indeed, a certificate bears witness to the previous performance of the tenderer and the fact that the legislation has been respected but, in contrast with labour clauses, does not establish any binding requirement concerning the future work to be undertaken.

With regard to the Government's remarks concerning collective agreements that have not been extended, the Committee emphasizes that Article 2(1)(a) of the Convention refers to all the collective agreements concluded between employers' and workers' organizations representative of a substantial proportion of employers and workers in the trade or industry concerned, and not solely collective agreements that have been extended. In its general observation of 1957, the Committee had already observed that it found itself unable to accept the view that, where legislation and collective agreements apply to all workers in a specific country, the Government was freed from the obligation to insert labour clauses in public contracts in accordance with the Convention. It emphasized in that respect that the insertion of labour clauses in public contracts may have positive advantages, particularly where collective agreements are not generally binding. That is the case in France, where not all collective agreements are extended by ministerial order. In the light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any development, particularly in legislative terms, relating to the implementation of the Convention at the national level, and to provide a copy of any court decision or relevant official publication.

Ghana

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that it has been commenting on the application of the Convention since its ratification by Ghana and regrets that the Government is still unable to indicate any real progress in bringing its national legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Government makes renewed reference to section 118 of the Labour Act 2003 even though the Committee has already noted that this provision is not strictly relevant to the subject matter of the Convention and does not give effect to Article 2 of the Convention which explicitly requires the insertion of labour clauses in those public procurement contracts meeting the conditions specified in Article 1 of the Convention. In fact, the general principles set out in the Labour Act regarding minimum wage fixing, maximum working hours or occupational safety and health cannot automatically guarantee to the workers concerned labour conditions which are not less favourable than whichever is the most favourable of the three alternatives provided for in the Convention, i.e. collective negotiation, arbitration or legislation.

As the Committee has stated on a number of occasions, the legislation to which the Government refers in most cases lays down minimum standards, for instance as regards wage levels, and does not necessarily reflect the actual working conditions of workers. Thus, if the legislation lays down a minimum wage but workers in a particular profession are actually receiving higher wages, the Convention would require that any workers engaged in the execution of a public contract be entitled to receive the wage that is generally paid rather than the minimum wage prescribed in the legislation. In other terms, the application of the general labour legislation is not enough in itself to ensure the application of the Convention, inasmuch as the minimum standards fixed by law are often improved upon by means of collective agreement or otherwise.

Moreover, the Government refers once more to the fact that individuals or firms are required to obtain labour clearance certificates before they are allowed to tender for public contracts. In this regard, the Committee is bound to recall that the essential purpose of the insertion of labour clauses in public contracts goes beyond the aims of simple certification, as its purpose is to eliminate the negative effects of competitive bidding on the workers' labour conditions. The Convention seeks to ensure the contractor's commitment to apply high standards of social responsibility in the execution of a public contract which is in the process of being awarded and therefore a mere indication that the contractor concerned has no record of labour law violation in previously completed works is not sufficient to meet its requirements. As regards the adoption of the Public Procurement Act 2003, the Committee asks the Government to specify the provisions referring to the labour clearance certificate and also forward a copy of the standard tender document used for this purpose.

In the interest of maintaining a constructive dialogue, the Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report any concrete measures taken or contemplated to implement the Convention in law and practice, and recalls in this respect that the inclusion of labour clauses in all the public contracts covered by the Convention does not necessarily call for legislative enactment but may also be effected by means of administrative instructions or circulars.

Greece

Article 11 of the Convention. Wages as privileged debts. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the comments of the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE), which drew attention to section 41 of Act No. 3863/2010 granting the same rank of privilege to workers' wage claims and to those of social security institutions. The GSEE referred to the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Convention, 1992 (No. 173) – which requires workers' claims to be given a higher rank of privilege than most other privileged claims, and in particular those of the State and the social security system – as being the international minimum standard and considered that the Government contravened its obligation to secure full payment of workers' claims before other ordinary creditors establish any claim to a proportionate share of the employer's assets. The Committee notes that, in its reply to the GSEE comments, dated 16 May 2011, the Government makes no reference to the revised order of distribution of liquidated assets, which effectively reduces the practical value of privileged protection of workers' claims to the extent that these claims and those of the social security system now rank equally between themselves.

The Committee recalls, however, that Article 11(3) of the Convention requires only that the relative priority of wages and other privileged debts is to be determined by national laws or regulations, and further that Greece has not ratified Convention No. 173, and is therefore not bound by the provisions of Article 8(1) of that Convention, which give a higher priority to workers' claims than to those of the social security system. Also, the Committee notes that a wage guarantee fund – similar to that envisaged by Part III of Convention No. 173 – has been established under Presidential Decree No. 1/1990. In view of the potentially important role of this fund in the context of the major economic crisis facing the country, the ILO high-level mission, which took place in September 2011, noted in its conclusions that the Government was requested to provide additional information on the functioning of the wage guarantee fund but it seems that such information has not been provided so far. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the operation of the wage guarantee fund, particularly the number of claims received and amounts paid since the beginning of the current crisis.

Article 12. Timely payment of wages – Prompt settlement of wages upon termination of employment. The Committee notes the reference made in the report of the ILO high-level mission to a potential problem of non-payment or delayed payment of wages as a result of widespread insolvencies and lack of liquidity. According to information obtained by the high-level mission, while small and medium-sized enterprises (SMEs) represent the vast majority of undertakings and account for a major part of employment in the country, 150,000 of them (one in four) have closed down and another 100,000 are expected to close this year. In the public sector, the high-level mission was informed that retroactive measures had been taken by the Government in certain instances, including the case of a former public institution that had maintained public sector wages through collective bargaining after its privatization, whose employees were obliged to pay back the difference in the salaries paid over the last ten years. The Committee notes that, according to several accounts, instances of several months' delay in the payment of wages are rising in sectors such as industry, commerce and health care. The Committee wishes to recall in this regard that, in its General Survey of 2003 on the protection of wages (paragraph 355), it highlighted that "the quintessence of wage protection is the assurance of a periodic payment allowing the worker to organize his everyday life with a reasonable degree of certainty and security. Inversely, the delayed payment of wages or the accumulation of wage debts clearly contravene the letter and the spirit of the Convention and render the application of most of its other provisions simply meaningless." The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide documented information on any difficulties experienced in the timely payment of wages, in particular the sectors of activity concerned, the number of workers concerned and the amounts due, and to specify any measures taken or envisaged in order to tackle these problems, including the question of retroactive reimbursement of wages already received.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that in its comments the GSEE referred to section 75 of Act No. 3863/2010, which authorizes the payment of severance pay in instalments rendering it uncertain and precarious especially in times of financial crisis. In its reply, the Government indicates that part of the severance pay – equal to two months' remuneration – is payable at the time of dismissal and the remaining amount in two monthly instalments, each of which cannot be less than two months' remuneration. The Government also explains that this arrangement aims at facilitating undertakings facing crucial financial problems due to the financial crisis and wishing to make redundancies so that they might avoid bankruptcy. The Committee observes that the possibility of paying the severance pay in instalments may, in some cases – particularly in an environment of recession and widespread liquidity problems – compromise the full and prompt payment of termination benefits and thus limit the workers' right to receive without delay upon termination of employment all sums due to them. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to indicate any measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the high numbers of workers who are being dismissed at the present difficult juncture collect swiftly all entitlements due to them.

More generally, the Committee is concerned about the considerable wage cuts in the public sector decided as part of the austerity measures to reduce the public deficit. According to information obtained by the high-level mission, wages have been reduced through legislative measures by at least 20 per cent, while according to the Confederation of Greek Public Servants' Unions (ADEDY), almost 40 per cent of public employees' income has vanished within the last two years. The Committee considers that by their scale and recessionary effect on the entire economy, these wage cuts represent a major challenge to the notion of wage protection that is at the heart of the Convention and risk undermining its basic objectives (even though, in a strictly legal sense, compliance with the technical standards of the Convention that deal with the modalities of the payment of wages may not be at issue). In this connection, the Committee recalls its Note on the "Relevance and application of ILO wage-related Conventions in the context of the global economic crisis" (paragraph 119 of the Committee's 2010 Report, page 35), in which it emphasized that wage protection takes on particular importance in times of crisis and therefore relevant standards should not be undermined but rather put at the centre of crisis responses, as is underlined in the Global Jobs Pact. It also considered that ILO wages-related standards and principles serve as a reminder of the special nature of wages as the workers' principal, if not sole, means of subsistence, and hence of the need for targeted and priority action in this field, and expressed the hope that ILO member States would act positively in the economic downturn by carrying out the necessary reforms in wage legislation and wage policy consistent with those standards and principles. The Committee also recalls that the Global Jobs Pact insists that action for promoting recovery and development must be guided by the Decent Work Agenda and invites governments to avoid protectionist solutions as well as the damaging consequences of deflationary wage spirals and worsening working conditions in their response to the crisis, and to engage in social dialogue. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide full particulars on any new anti-crisis measures and policies that impact on wages, including information on the necessary consultations with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned on these measures.

Guatemala

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts – Enforcement measures. Further to its previous comment, the Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that the Ministerial Agreement of 21 November 1985 approving model labour clauses to be included in contracts concluded by public authorities is still in effect. The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that persons tendering for public contracts are aware of the terms of these labour clauses, for instance by advertising specifications, as required under Article 2(4) of the Convention. The Committee considers that informing tenderers of the exact scope and content of labour clauses is all the more important as neither the Public Procurement Act of 1992 nor the Public Procurement Regulations of 1992 contains any express reference to labour clauses. In the absence of any reply on this point, the Committee once more asks the Government to take all appropriate measures to give full effect to the requirements of Article 2(4) of the Convention. In addition, the Committee asks the Government to transmit together with its next report: (i) copies of public contracts containing the model labour clauses prescribed by the Ministerial Agreement of 1985; and (ii) documented information on measures to ensure compliance with the labour clauses, including adequate inspection and effective sanctions.

Article 3 of the Convention. Criteria for determining the minimum wage. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the Government's detailed explanations concerning the evolution of the national minimum wage during the period 2000–11 as compared to the evolution of the inflation rate, the cost of the basket of essential foodstuff (canasta básica alimenticia – CBA) and the cost of the basket of essential goods (canasta básica vital – CBV). The Government indicates that, whereas the minimum wage represents the remuneration of an individual worker, the CBA and the CBV are calculated on the basis of a typical household of 5.38 persons, which explains the gap between the respective figures. The Government adds, however, that considering that on average there are two employed persons in every household, the aggregate amount of the minimum wage received covers the basic needs of the household as reflected in the CBA and CBV indicators.

In this regard, the Committee notes the comments made by the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala for the Defence of Workers' Rights (MSICG), alleging systematic non-compliance with the requirements of the Convention both in law and in practice. The MSICG denounces the establishment of a lower minimum wage rate applicable to the maquila industry as being discriminatory. The trade union organization also refers to large-scale problems of non-payment of the minimum wage, the widening gap between the minimum wage and the CBV, and the participation of non-representative workers' organizations in the National Wages Commission (CNS). The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the MSICG.

Moreover, the Committee understands that in September 2011 a Bill on the indexation of the minimum wage was introduced before the National Parliament providing for the annual readjustment of the minimum wage to reflect the evolution of the CBV in the same period. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments in this regard.

Article 5. Adequate inspection. Further to its previous observation on the need to rigorously and effectively enforce the minimum wage legislation, particularly in the agricultural sector, the Committee notes that in his fourth follow-up report to the National Policy of the Government of Guatemala on Food and Nutrition Security, the Human Rights Ombudsman made special reference to the failure to apply the national minimum wage with respect to indigenous workers and agricultural workers. The Committee also notes the conclusions of the UN Special Rapporteur on the right to food from his 2009 country visit to Guatemala (see Doc. A/HRC/13/33/Add.4, paragraphs 28–30), according to which 50.1 per cent of workers currently receive a salary that is below the legally established minimum wage while the labour inspectorate is significantly under-resourced and unable to monitor compliance with labour legislation. Noting the persistent widespread violations of the minimum wage legislation in rural areas, the Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on any measures taken or envisaged with a view to reinforcing the labour inspection services and ensuring the effective application of the relevant legislation, particularly with regard to indigenous and agricultural workers.

Guinea

Minimum Wage-Fixing Machinery Convention, 1928 (No. 26) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Introduction of a minimum wage and consultation of the social partners. The Committee notes with regret that, according to the information contained in its last report, the Government is maintaining its decision not to introduce the guaranteed interoccupational minimum wage (SMIG) at the present time in view of the economic situation of the country. It also notes that, as acknowledged by the Government, the introduction of a minimum wage is an important claim of national trade union organizations. The Committee notes in this respect that in November 2005 a 48-hour general strike was called by the National Confederation of Workers of Guinea (CNTG), and that the claims included the establishment of a minimum wage. In this context, it notes with concern that the inflation rate in Guinea appears to be particularly high, which makes it all the more necessary to ensure workers a minimum wage permitting them and their families to benefit from a satisfactory standard of living.

The Committee deplores the fact that, despite its repeated comments on the subject, the Government has still not been able to adopt the decree determining the minimum guaranteed wage rate for one hour of work, as provided for in section 211 of the Labour Code. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay to give effect to the provisions of the Convention by adopting the implementing decree for section 211 of the Labour Code. The Committee would also be grateful to be provided with more detailed information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure effective consultations with the social partners on equal terms in all the stages of the process of fixing minimum wages, as required by the Convention.

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government in its last report, the minimum wage rates in the various sectors are determined in collective agreements. In this respect, it is bound to recall that the fixing of minimum wages by collective agreements is only permitted under certain conditions: the minimum wages must have the force of law, not be subject to abatement and failure to apply them shall make the person or persons concerned liable to appropriate penal or other sanctions (see paragraphs 99–101 of the 1992 General Survey on minimum wages). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the manner in which compliance with these principles is ensured in the context of the system for fixing minimum wages by collective bargaining. It requests the Government to provide copies of these sectoral collective agreements containing provisions relating to the minimum wage and to indicate the number of men and women, and of adults and young persons, covered by such provisions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes that the Government's last report contained no reply to its previous comments, but essentially reproduced information already submitted in earlier reports which the Committee had considered to be strictly irrelevant to the scope and content of the Convention. The Committee is once again led to conclude that for the last 40 years there has been practically no progress in implementing the provisions of the Convention in either law or practice. The Committee expresses its deep disappointment about the Government's continued failure to apply the Convention despite the technical assistance provided by the Office in 1981 and the numerous commitments made by the Government ever since as regards the drafting and adoption of specific regulations or legislation concerning public contracts. Under the circumstances, the Committee hopes that the Government will make a sincere effort to maintain a meaningful dialogue with the ILO supervisory bodies and once more urges the Government to take all necessary measures without further delay in order to bring its national law and practice into conformity with the clear terms and objectives of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Honduras

Article 4 of the Convention. Partial payment of wages in kind. The Committee notes the observations of 31 August 2010 and 31 March 2011 made by the Single Confederation of Workers of Honduras (CUTH), the Workers' General Central Union (CGT) and the Workers' Central Union of Honduras (CTH), as well as the Government's reply of 22 November 2011, concerning the application of the Convention. The observations refer to a draft decree to establish a national anti-crisis plan for job creation, which has since been adopted and is now Decree No. 230-2010 of 4 November 2010. The Committee notes that in its technical comments on the draft decree, the Office observed that it allowed 30 per cent of the basic wage to be paid in the form of allowances in kind. Referring to the Committee's direct request of 2006, the Office pointed out the limited conditions in which partial payment of wages in kind may be authorized. The Committee notes with interest, in this connection, that section 6 of Decree No. 230-2010 provides for payment of the basic wage solely in currency of legal tender.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that section 7 of Decree No. 230-2010 provides that workers hired under the anti-crisis programme are subject exclusively to the programme's provisions as regards their rights and obligations and the benefits to which they are entitled. It notes that section 7 also provides that the workers concerned will nonetheless enjoy the fundamental rights established in the Labour Code and the eight ILO fundamental Conventions. In the Committee's view, as currently worded, this provision suggests that only the provisions of the Labour Code relating to freedom of association, the right to collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour and child labour and non-discrimination apply to these workers, to the exclusion of the provisions on wage protection among others. This view appears to be confirmed by the Government in its response to the observations of CUTH, CGT and CTH. The Committee therefore asks the Government to indicate how it is ensured that workers hired under the anti-crisis programme established by Decree No. 230-2010 effectively enjoy the protection afforded by Articles 3 to 15 of the Convention.

Islamic Republic of Iran

Article 12 of the Convention. Payment of wages at regular intervals. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it continues to massively subsidize enterprises that are experiencing financial difficulties having granted to enterprises with less than 50 workers 18.1 billion Iranian rial (IRR) (approximately US$1.7 million) in 2010 in the form of social aid. The Committee also notes that according to the Government's report, in 2010, 17,025 cases concerning 19,790 workers were examined by dispute settlement boards. The Committee observes, however, that no precise information is provided regarding the current level of wage arrears by region or sector of economic activity, and the implementation of measures, legislative, administrative or others, aimed at resolving the persistent problems of delayed payment of wages.

Monitoring the situation of wage arrears – Labour inspection. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the Government showing for the period 2009–10 a nine per cent increase in the overall number of periodical labour inspections conducted nationwide. These inspections identified 2,192 establishments with 141,661 workers experiencing problems of delayed payment of wages. The Committee also notes the Government's indications that a new software is used by labour inspection services to monitor the situation of wage arrears and to collect monthly statistics which are then communicated to the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs. The Government adds, however, that at present the software does not permit to extract exact figures of wage arrears, and therefore, it is being revised and updated. The Committee wishes to emphasize, in this connection, the importance of properly functioning labour inspection services capable of identifying breaches of wage legislation and prosecuting offenders. It also recalls that a proper assessment of the problem in its true dimensions, with its causes and effects, is only possible through the systematic collection of up-to-date statistical information emanating from credible sources. Noting that in its previous report the Government had indicated that working groups consisting of skilled labour inspectors and inspection officers had been established in each province to monitor the wage arrears situation and to address any issues through various means, the Committee asks the Government to provide more detailed information on labour inspection results, including not only the number of visits carried out but also the number of infringements, the sums due and any amounts of wages recovered.

The situation of wage arrears in the sugar cane, textile and metal sectors. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the sums paid in 2010 to settle wage arrears in the sugar cane, textile and metal sectors through the social aids programme. It also notes the Government's indication that at the Haft Tapeh Sugar enterprise, as of 2010 the payment of wages to all staff has been on time, and all outstanding payments to pensioners have been settled. In contrast, with respect to the textile and metal sectors, the Government's report does not contain any updated figures on the amount of the wage debt or any progress made towards its elimination. More generally, the Government's description of the overall situation of wage arrears remains unclear making it difficult for the Committee to assess the effectiveness of the measures taken to address it. The Committee therefore requests the Government to collect and transmit concrete information on the evolving situation of wage arrears in the sectors concerned, including if possible comparative statistics for the last couple of years, to enable the Committee to assess the positive or negative trends over time, especially in terms of number of establishments and workers affected, and amounts of wages due or settled.

Iraq

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the Government's statement that public contracts which are carried out by private contractors are obliged to comply with the Labour Code, which, as provided for in section 8, applies to all workers employed in the private, mixed and cooperative sectors. However, as the Committee has already observed in earlier comments, the Convention goes beyond the mere applicability of the general labour legislation to work done in the execution of public contracts and seeks to ensure that public contracts are executed under conditions of labour which are not less favourable than those established by collective agreement, arbitral award or national laws or regulations for work of the same character in the trade or industry concerned in the district where the work is carried out. It is only when the conditions which are laid down in the national legislation constitute both maximum and minimum standards which may not be exceeded by more favourable collective agreements or arbitration awards that a reference in the public contracts to the relevant provisions of the national legislation would be sufficient for the purpose of giving effect to the Convention. The Committee once again recalls that the essential element required for the application of the Convention is that a labour clause, along the terms set out in Article 2 of the Convention, be incorporated into every public contract whether for works, supply of goods or performance of services. In this regard, the Committee draws the Government's attention to paragraphs 98–121 of the 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, which contain detailed explanations on the exact nature and content of this principal obligation.

In addition, the Committee recalls the Government's earlier indication that a tripartite consultative committee had been established and recommended the amendment of the Labour Code in order to bring the national legislation in line with the provisions of the Convention. Noting that, in its last report, the Government no longer refers to the work of this consultative committee, the Committee asks the Government to specify whether the tripartite consultative committee is still in operation, and if so, to provide information on any progress made in adopting legislative or administrative measures to give effect to this Article of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take without delay the necessary measures in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Jamaica

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on the absence of any laws or regulations implementing the provisions of the Convention. In its last report, the Government refers to new Contracts and Standard Bidding Documents and Procurement Regulations which are soon to be issued and which are expected to cover labour aspects of public procurement operations. The Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of these documents as soon as they are finalized.

The Committee notes that the Revised Handbook of Public Sector Procurement Procedures (RHPP) was issued in December 2008 and has been in use for an interim period pending formal approval by the Cabinet. It notes, however, that the RHPP does not address working conditions of workers employed under public contracts, except for subsection No. S-2120, which provides that deviations from the bidding requirements, including non-compliance with local regulations relating to labour, import taxes and duties, which do not appear at first sight to provide immediate grounds for bid rejection, may be considered further in the evaluation process. Noting that the Government is still not in a position to report any concrete progress as regards the application of the Convention, the Committee wishes to refer to paragraphs 40 and 44 of its General Survey of 2008 on labour clauses in public contracts, in which it indicated that the purpose of the Convention is to ensure that the workers employed for the execution of public contracts enjoy wages and other working conditions at least as satisfactory as those normally established for the type of work concerned, whether they are established by collective agreement or otherwise, in the locality where the work is done. The Convention requires that this be done through the insertion of appropriate labour clauses in public contracts. This has the effect of setting as minimum conditions for the contract standards that are already established within the locality. The further aim is that local standards higher than those of general application (this in practice means the most advantageous labour conditions) should be applied, where they exist. In fact, the type of labour clauses prescribed by this Article of the Convention seek to oblige the contractor to apply the most advantageous pay rates, including overtime pay, and other working conditions, such as work hour limits and holiday entitlement, established in the industrial sector and geographical region in question. The concrete terms of this obligation incumbent on the selected bidder and any subcontractors, are to be reflected in a standard contractual clause which has to be effectively enforced notably through a system of specific sanctions.

Japan

Articles 1, 3 and 4 of the Convention. Minimum wage system. The Committee notes the comments of the National Confederation of Trade Unions (ZENROREN), which were received on 25 September 2011 and transmitted to the Government on 30 September 2011, concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in reply to the observations of ZENROREN.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Myanmar

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Minimum wage fixing machinery. The Committee notes that the Government is still not in a position to indicate any progress on a number of issues raised in previous comments, including the possible extension of minimum wage protection to industrial sectors other than the rice-milling and cigar- and cheroot-rolling industries, the revision of the minimum wage rates applicable in those sectors, the establishment of new minimum wage councils, the collection of statistical data on the evolution of economic indicators, such as the inflation rate, in recent years compared to the evolution of minimum wage levels, and the effective enforcement of the minimum wage legislation. In its last report, the Government merely indicates that existing labour laws are currently under review to ensure compliance with the Constitution and that any new draft legislation will eventually be submitted to the Parliament. Recalling the Government's earlier statements that the minimum wage rates in force were no longer in line with market wages and needed readjustment, and also that the determination of minimum wages for the oil and garment industries was under consideration, the Committee asks the Government to take prompt action in this direction and to keep the Office informed of any concrete results.

Paraguay

Articles 3, 4, 6, 7 and 12 of the Convention. Debt bondage of indigenous communities in the Chaco region. Further to its previous comments concerning the debt bondage situation affecting thousands of indigenous workers in the Paraguayan Chaco, the Committee notes the Government's explanations that it is focusing its efforts on sensitization campaigns and inspections of cattle farms and plantations. The Government adds that as a result of those awareness-raising activities, an unprecedented number of requests have been received concerning the application of labour laws and the protection of workers' rights. The Committee welcomes the measures taken so far, in particular the labour inspection visits to rural establishments suspected of debt bondage practices, but recalls that such measures must be reinforced and lead to systematic action commensurate to the seriousness and extent of the problem. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide detailed information on the results of the inspection visits to Chaco estates showing the number and nature of wages-related infringements observed and the sanctions imposed. Recalling that as documented in several ILO studies and official reports of the UN Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues and the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, debt bondage situations may result through delayed payment of wages, excessive pricing of company store goods, payment in kind instead of cash wages, and absence of wage records, the Committee requests the Government to specify any targeted action to ensure compliance with the requirements of Articles 3 (payment of wages in legal tender), 4 (partial payment of wages in kind), 6 (freedom of workers to dispose of their wages), 7 (works stores) and 12 (payment of wages at regular intervals) of the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments made under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) and the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Romania

Articles 8 and 10 of the Convention. Deductions from wages – Attachment of wages. The Committee notes the comments of the National Trade Union Confederation (CNS “CARTEL ALFA”) and Block of National Trade Unions (BNS) concerning the application of the Convention. The two workers’ organizations consider that recent austerity measures, such as the 25 per cent reduction in the salaries of public sector employees and the 15 per cent reduction in pension payments which were imposed from July to December 2010, are in violation of the Convention. The BNS indicates that this measure concerned more than 1.3 million employees and affected their standard of living as most of them earned less than 1000 Romanian new leu (RON) (approximately €230) per month.

In its reply, the Government explains that these austerity measures were taken in application of a loan agreement signed with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank. It also indicates that the 25 per cent reduction was introduced by Act No. 118/2010 concerning measures to restore budgetary stability for a limited period of six months. The Government further states that the constitutionality of this law was challenged before the Constitutional Court which by decision No. 872/2010 pronounced itself in favour of the constitutionality of the law in question. The Court upheld the constitutionality of the law principally because of the temporary character of the measures, their non-discriminatory application and their consistency with article 53 of the Constitution that permits limitations to the exercise of rights and liberties in cases of extreme necessity.

The Committee notes the Government’s explanations. It observes that although wage cuts implemented in a context of harsh economic crisis may not be deemed to represent deductions from wages within the meaning of Article 8 of the Convention nor do they qualify as wage attachment within the meaning of Article 10, they may nonetheless effectively challenge the very object and purpose of this Convention depending on their extent and severity. The Committee recalls its Note on the “Relevance and application of ILO wage-related Conventions in the context of the global economic crisis” (paragraph 119 of the Committee’s 2010 Report, page 35) in which it emphasized that wage protection takes on particular importance in times of crisis and therefore relevant standards should not be undermined but rather put at the centre of crisis responses, as is underlined in the Global Jobs Pact, adopted by the International Labour Conference in 2009. It also considered that ILO wages-related standards and principles serve as a reminder of the special nature of wages as the workers’ principal, if not sole, means of subsistence, and hence of the need for targeted and priority action in this field, and expressed the hope that ILO Member States will act positively in the current economic downturn by carrying out the necessary reforms in wage legislation and wage policy consistent with those standards and principles. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to provide full particulars on any new anti-crisis measures and policies that impact on wages, including information on the necessary consultations with the employers’ and workers’ organizations concerned on these measures.

Rwanda

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 issuing labour regulations. It also notes that, according to the Government’s last report, sections 42–46 of this Act establish the labour clauses required by the Convention. However, these provisions regulate subcontracting, in which the head of an industrial or commercial enterprise assigns the execution of work or services to a contractor who in turn recruits the necessary workforce, and do not regulate contracts concluded with a public authority. The Committee notes with regret that, despite the comments which it has been making for many years, the recent General Survey and the Practical Guide – copies of which were sent to the Government – the Government still does not appear to fully understand the actual concept of public contracts which is the subject of the Convention. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat that a public contract pursuant to Article 1(1) of the Convention is a contract: (i) concluded by a public authority; (ii) involving the expenditure of funds by a public authority and the employment of workers by the other party to the contract; and (iii) relating to the execution of public works, the manufacture of materials or the provision of services. It is therefore clear that subcontracting in the form of the specific labour contract governed by the provisions of Chapter II, Title II, of the new Labour Code bears little relevance to public contracts and even less to the labour clauses which such contracts ought to contain.

Moreover, with regard to the 2007 Public Procurement Act, the Committee recalls that the mere fact that the general legislation applies to workers responsible for the execution of public contracts, as laid down by section 96 of this Act, is not sufficient to ensure the observance of the provisions of the Convention. The Convention seeks to ensure that public contracts are executed under conditions of labour which are not less favourable than those established by collective agreement, arbitration award or national laws or regulations for work of the same character in the trade or industry concerned in the region where the work is carried out. This in practice means the most advantageous labour conditions for the workers concerned, including pay rates, overtime pay, and other working conditions, such as limits on hours of work and paid leave entitlement, established in the industrial sector and geographical region in question. The concrete terms of this obligation incumbent on the selected bidder and any subcontractors are to be reflected in a standard contractual clause which has to be effectively enforced, notably through a system of specific penalties. Moreover, the Committee recalls that the Convention does not only apply to construction contracts but also to contracts for supplies and services. In the light of the above, the Committee urges the Government to take all necessary steps without delay to bring national law and practice into conformity with the Convention, and requests it to keep the Office informed of any developments on these matters.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Serbia

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. Binding force of the minimum wage – Adequate inspection. The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions of Serbia (CATUS), which were received on 27 September 2011 and transmitted to the Government on 3 October 2011 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in reply to the observations of CATUS.

Sierra Leone

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94) (ratification: 1961)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received for the fifth consecutive year. The Committee asks the Government to submit a detailed report on the state of national law and practice regarding labour clauses in public contracts in the light of recently introduced public procurement reforms, including the adoption of the Public Procurement Act, 2004.

Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95) (ratification: 1961)

Article 16 of the Convention. Full information on legislative amendments. While recalling that the Government has been referring for the last ten years to the imminent adoption of new labour legislation and also recalling that draft amendments had been prepared with the assistance of the Office more than 20 years ago in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with the requirements of the Convention, the Committee urges the Government to take all the necessary steps without further delay to enact the new law and reminds the Government of the availability of further ILO technical assistance in this regard.

Singapore

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. The Committee recalls its previous comment in which it noted the Government's persistent failure to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in both law and practice, and requested the Government to take the necessary steps without further delay in order to effectively implement the provisions of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reply that public contracts are awarded on the basis of "value for money" which refers not only to price but also to the quality and reliability of goods and services provided. Tenderers are also assessed in totality, taking into consideration their financial position, track records, including employment terms and conditions of their workers ensuring that workers' well-being is not undermined. The Government indicates, in this connection, that contractors engaged by the Singapore Ministry of Manpower are required to be part of the bizSAFE programme, which assists companies to manage workplace safety and health. The Government also indicates that it is exploring a debarment framework whereby egregious employers would be barred from tendering for public contracts.

While noting the Government's explanations, the Committee considers, as it has pointed out in paragraph 308 of its 2008 General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts, that the objectives of the Convention are even more valid today than they were 60 years ago and strengthen the ILO's call for fair globalization. The Convention seeks to promote good governance and socially responsible public procurement by requiring bidders/contractors to apply locally established prevailing pay and other working conditions as determined by law or collective agreement. The Convention proposes a common level playing field – in terms of labour standards – for all economic actors so as to ensure fair competition. By requiring all bidders to respect, as a minimum, certain locally established standards, wages, working time and working conditions may not be used as elements of competition and consequently no downward pressure on wages and working conditions may be exerted.

As for the possibility of screening tenderers through a debarment mechanism, the Committee wishes to refer to paragraphs 117–118 of the abovementioned General Survey in which it pointed out that the Convention does not relate to some general eligibility criteria of individuals or enterprises bidding for public contracts but requires a labour clause to be expressly included in the actual contract that is finally signed by the procuring entity and the selected contractor. Similarly, certification may offer some proof about tenderers' past performance and law-abiding conduct but carries no binding commitment with regard to prospective operations as labour clauses do. Noting therefore that national legislation appears to contain no provision implementing the requirements of this Article of the Convention (the Executive Resolution of 1952, which previously gave effect to the Convention, having probably fallen into desuetude), the Committee once more expresses the hope that the Government will take all necessary measures to put its legislation in line with the provisions of the Convention and asks it to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this regard.

Uganda

Articles 1 to 4 of the Convention. Minimum wage fixing machinery. The Committee notes with regret that the national minimum wage remains unchanged since 1984 and that no progress has been made concerning the reactivation of the Minimum Wages Board and Wages Council. In its last report, the Government limits itself to indicating that the Ministry of Gender, Labour and Social Development has been collecting since 2007 data on occupations, wages and hours of work in an effort to address the issue of the minimum wage while this year a Cabinet Memo was prepared with a view to reactivating the tripartite Minimum Wages Board and Wages Council. The Government adds that among the proposed terms of reference for the Board will be to examine and assess wage levels and harmonize them within the framework of the West African Community. The Committee notes, in this connection, that the National Development Plan 2010–11 to 2014–15 of April 2010 defines as one of the objectives concerning labour and employment, the establishment of a minimum wage for decent income, improved productivity and increase in aggregate demand for goods and services. The Committee recalls that the revision of the national minimum wage, as a tool for social protection and poverty eradication, is long overdue and that at present the minimum wage system does not seem to operate in either law or practice. The Committee therefore asks the Government to take prompt action in order to reactivate the tripartite consultative body for the revision of the national minimum wage and to keep the Office informed of any concrete progress made in this respect.

Ukraine

Article 12(1) of the Convention. Payment of wages at regular intervals. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the report of the technical assistance mission to Ukraine which was undertaken from 16 to 19 May 2011 as a follow-up to the discussion at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2010. The technical assistance mission was mandated by the Conference Committee to further inquire into the causes and extent of the wage arrears problem in order to better understand the situation, to assess the action being taken to redress the situation, and to collect up-to-date statistical information and documentation. The Committee notes the findings, observations and recommendations of the technical assistance mission which are summarized below:

Findings – Wage arrears situation. According to data provided by the Government, the total amount of wage arrears as of 1 April 2011 stood at 1.32 billion Ukrainian Hryvnia (UAH) (approximately €165 million), which represents a 26 per cent decrease from UAH/1.79 billion in 2010. The industrial sector continues to be the sector with the highest amount of accumulated wage arrears representing approximately 56 per cent of the total amount. Wage arrears reached their peak in March 2010, then declined by nearly 30 per cent by January 2011 before increasing again to UAH/1.32 billion by April 2011. The technical assistance mission therefore considered that while the reduction was real, the Ukrainian economy remained vulnerable to the wage arrears problem.

In terms of the structure of the wage debt, between March 2010 and April 2011, wage arrears declined mainly among economically active enterprises, as opposed to bankrupt enterprises. Even among economically active enterprises, however, wage arrears at State-owned enterprises persisted, representing 32 per cent of the total amount of wage arrears. On the other hand, at both private enterprises and communal enterprises, the amount of wage arrears decreased during the same period by 55 per cent. The technical assistance mission accordingly observed that the Government's measures seemed to produce results at the local level among communal enterprises and in the private sector while much remained to be done in State-owned enterprises.

Activities of labour inspection services. According to data provided by the State Labour Inspectorate, as of April 2011, 3,483 inspected enterprises experienced wage arrears, the regions most affected being the Donetsk, Lviv and Lugansk regions. In terms of the number of workers, the Kharkiv region is the region with the highest number of workers affected. The State Labour Inspectorate confirmed that the number of violations of the legislation concerning the timely payment of wages and other entitlements increased in the first quarter of 2011 compared to the same period of 2010. As regards the number of industrial action related to wage arrears, the National Mediation and Conciliation Service (NSPP) reported that 49 cases had been filed in 2010, involving 19,200 employees of 102 companies, and 22 cases in the first quarter of 2011, involving 19,400 employees of 26 companies.

Wage situation at the Nikanor-Nova coalmine. Based on the results of direct contacts with both the management and trade unions of the mine, the technical assistance mission concluded that there were currently no wage arrears, and that wages were paid on monthly intervals, except for a practically constant one-month delay. The mission indicated, however, that there was a lack of common understanding between the management and the workers about the methodology for determining the applicable wage rate for miners employed for underground work, in particular because the national law, the general collective agreement and the sectoral collective agreement seemed to establish different minimum wage rates. The technical assistance mission concluded that there is obviously a need for further consultations on the interaction between the Act on enhancing the prestige image of coalminers' labour of 2008 and relevant general and sectoral collective agreements, and their implications on wage rates. With respect to general working conditions at mines, the technical assistance mission noted with interest the ratification by Ukraine of the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174), and of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), which was registered on 15 June 2011, and expressed the hope that these instruments would provide useful guidance for the improvement of safety and health standards in the mine industry.

Observations and recommendations. The technical assistance mission noted the decrease of the amount of wage arrears as a positive trend confirming the Government's commitment to tackle the problem. The Government reaffirmed its decision to include the fight against accumulated wage arrears among its priorities and to devote all its energy to the timely settlement of all outstanding payments. In addition, the social partners, also conscious of the gravity of the problem, seemed to be fully engaged in the collective effort towards the eventual eradication of wage arrears. A tripartite working group was established to guide this effort and propose solutions. The mission was also satisfied that there were no difficulties with the flow of information and that statistics were freely disseminated among all those concerned.

The technical assistance mission noted that some policy and legislative measures were under consideration, including: (i) increasing the liability of managers in case of non-payment of wages; (ii) amending the bankruptcy law to grant first-rank priority to wage claims in bankruptcy proceedings; (iii) drafting new legislation on a wage guarantee fund; and (iv) increasing the number of labour inspectors and frequency of inspections. The mission suggested that supervision and enforcement of the national legislation could be improved by introducing sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against the sense of impunity which currently prevailed, and by strengthening the labour inspection services, which would currently visit one company on average every 36 years. The mission referred to problems with the current methodology for collection of statistical data, namely the coverage of monthly survey of the State Statistics Committee, which excluded enterprises with less than 50 employees and the lack of confidentiality in the process of collecting reports from enterprises. It also pointed out the need for adopting a common definition of the term, "wage arrears" especially as regards the one-month delay in payment of wages, which appeared to be currently perceived at certain workplaces as a normal practice.

The technical assistance mission referred to possible technical assistance and knowledge-sharing activities by the Office concerning, for instance, the establishment and operation of a wage guarantee fund, the reform of the bankruptcy law and the improvement of data collection on wage arrears. More generally, the mission expressed the view that the wage arrears problem was structural and called for a holistic approach as part of an overall wage policy, and accordingly suggested that interrelated issues, including informal wage practices such as "envelope wages", should also be addressed.

Having duly examined the report of the technical assistance mission, the Committee notes that the discussions with Government officials, members of employers' and workers' organizations and academic experts were direct, open and constructive. As regards the general situation of wage arrears, the Committee notes with interest that the overall amount of wage arrears is generally on a decreasing trend, and that monthly wages are now paid on a regular basis at the Nikanor-Nova coalmine. While noting that the Government announced in September 2011 a further decrease of wage arrears to UAH1.1 billion (approximately €100.7 million), the Committee considers that the situation continues to require rigorous monitoring and possible improvements in the methodology of collecting relevant data.

The Committee also notes various measures taken and considered by the Government in consultation with the social partners, including new legislation and policies. In this regard, while welcoming these measures, it recalls its earlier indication that this was not a problem of legislative conformity but rather a problem of effective implementation of existing legislation. It therefore emphasizes the need to take prompt action to adopt appropriate sanctions and to reinforce the labour inspection services. It recalls, in this connection, the indication by the State Labour Inspectorate made during the technical assistance mission that if the number of inspectors was increased to 5,000, the Inspectorate would be able to visit an enterprise every five years.

In the light of the foregoing, the Committee hopes that the Government will take concrete steps, as a matter of priority and based on the recommendations of the technical assistance mission in order to: (i) improve data collection methodology in the field of wage arrears; (ii) adopt sufficiently dissuasive sanctions; (iii) strengthen the system of labour inspection; and (iv) address pending issues which directly impact the wage arrears situation, including, for instance, establishing a wage guarantee institution, revising bankruptcy law and eradicating the practice of “envelope wages”. It also asks the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made in this area and to continue to provide detailed statistics concerning the overall amount of wage arrears disaggregated by economic sector, region, form of ownership and the (in)active status of economic activity.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Binding force of the minimum wage and periodic review of minimum wages. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments made by the Independent Trade Union of Miners (ITUM) of the Nikanor-Nova coalmine and the National Forum of Trade Unions of Ukraine (NFTU) concerning the application of the Convention.

With respect to the observations of the ITUM, the Committee notes the Government’s indication that, based on the branch collective agreement for the mine sector, in cases where an enterprise is, for objective financial and economic reasons, unable to implement the minimum pay rate provided for in the applicable collective agreement (i.e. not less than 120 per cent of the legal minimum wage), a lower minimum wage rate may be applied for a period not exceeding six months. This wage rate, however, may not be lower than the legal minimum wage rate, and must be brought back to the rate set out in the mine sector collective agreement at the end of the six-month period. The Government further indicates that the State Inspectorate conducted 35 inspections during the period 2009–10 at various divisions of the state enterprise “Luganskugol”, in particular four inspections at the Nikanor-Nova mine. These inspections identified a number of violations of the labour legislation, including section 95 of the Labour Code concerning minimum wage and section 3 of the Act concerning measures to enhance the prestige of mine work, which provides that employees working underground on a full-time basis must be paid at least 630 Ukrainian hryvnia (UAH) (approximately €54) plus 30 per cent increment per month. The Director of the mine, who was ordered twice to take remedial action, has been prosecuted in accordance with section 188-6 of the Administrative Offences Code. The Director of “Luganskugol” was also ordered to rectify certain contraventions and has since been prosecuted. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the evolution of the situation at the Nikanor-Nova mine, in particular as regards compliance with the applicable minimum wage for the mine sector and the results of any new inspection visits. The Committee also requests the Government to refer to its comments made under the Protection of Wages Convention, 1949 (No. 95).

Concerning the comments made by the NFTU, the Committee notes the Government’s explanations concerning various provisions of the draft Labour Code, in particular section 208 which provides that the conditions and rate of remuneration of public legal entities must be determined by the Cabinet of Ministers in consultation with the trade unions concerned, and sections 209 and 213 that provide that self-financed enterprises must determine the conditions and rate of remuneration through collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of the draft Labour Code and explain how the Convention is given effect under the draft Code, in particular Article 4 of the Convention (full and genuine consultations with, and direct participation of, employers’ and workers’ organizations in the establishment, operation and periodic review of the minimum wage fixing machinery).

In this connection, the Committee understands that the Government intends to introduce in the new labour legislation a “guaranteed salary” for eight categories of workers based on the level of qualifications, the “guaranteed salary” of the first category being equal to the legal minimum wage rate. The Committee also understands that, as from 1 April 2011, the monthly minimum wage was raised to UAH960, and was further increased to UAH985 on 1 October, and to UAH1,004 (approximately €88) on 1 December. The Committee further understands that despite this increase, the national minimum wage remains largely insufficient to cover workers’ basic subsistence needs which are estimated to be in the neighbourhood of UAH2,000 per month. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide additional explanations as to how the “minimum consumer budget” and the “poverty line”, to which reference is made in the Wages Act of 1995, are defined in practice and also how social criteria, such as the relative living standards of different social groups, are considered when determining minimum wage levels.

Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention, 1949 (No. 94)

Article 2 of the Convention. Insertion of labour clauses in public contracts. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that section 183 and the Rules set out in the Schedule of the new Labour Code, 2010 essentially reproduce the main provisions of the Convention and give full effect to its requirements. The Committee would appreciate if the Government would provide together with its next report general information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice.

Zambia

Article 12(1) of the Convention. Payment of wages at regular intervals. In its previous comment, the Committee had asked for comprehensive information concerning the overall situation of unpaid wages owed to local council employees in all nine provinces of the country. According to official data published by the Local Government Finance and Audits, as of July 2011, the overall wage debt amounted to 46 billion Zambian kwacha (ZMK) (approximately US$9.2 million). In its last report, the Government indicates that apart from giving grants to councils in order to resolve the wage crisis, it has re-established in April 2010 the Local Government Service Commission (LGSC) to take over some functions of councils in matters relating to employment and workers' welfare and has also allowed councils to retain 100 per cent of the revenue collected on liquor and trade licences effective 2012 while previously 90 per cent of such revenue was remitted to the Central Government. The Government also indicates that these measures were adopted through social dialogue between the workers' union and the councils' management. The Committee understands that serious problems of accumulated wage arrears are also experienced by teachers and health workers. Recalling the importance of closely monitoring the evolution of the situation by collecting reliable statistical information, the Committee requests the Government to transmit all available information on the total amount of outstanding payments, wage sums settled, the sectors of economic activity and approximate number of workers affected, and the average delay in the payment of wages. The Committee hopes that the Government will intensify its efforts in order to eliminate the accumulated wage debt and accordingly requests the Government to provide detailed information on any new measures or initiatives taken to this end.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 26 (Angola, Argentina, Bahamas, Barbados, Belarus, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Bulgaria, Burundi, Canada, Colombia, Congo, Côte d'Ivoire, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Fiji, Gabon, Ghana, Grenada, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, India, Ireland, Italy, Jamaica, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Togo, United Kingdom: British Virgin Islands); Convention No. 94 (Armenia, Bahamas, Belgium, Cyprus, Denmark, Dominica, Finland, France: French Polynesia, France: New Caledonia, Grenada, Guyana, Israel, Italy, Kenya, Nigeria, Solomon Islands, Uganda); Convention No. 95 (Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Armenia, Bahamas, Barbados, Belarus, Belize, Benin, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Chad, Comoros, Cuba, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Dominican Republic, France: French Polynesia, Gabon, Grenada, Guatemala, Guinea, Guyana, Hungary, Iraq, Israel, Italy, Kyrgyzstan, Paraguay, Solomon Islands, Togo, Uganda); Convention No. 99 (Algeria, Australia, Belgium, Belize, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, El Salvador, Gabon, Grenada, Hungary, Italy); Convention No. 131 (Albania, Armenia, Australia, Australia: Norfolk Island, Azerbaijan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Central African Republic, Chile, Egypt, El Salvador, France, France: French Polynesia, Iraq, Japan); Convention No. 173 (Albania, Armenia, Australia, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Chad).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 94 (Austria, Belize); Convention No. 173 (Austria, Finland).

Working time

Argentina

Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1) (ratification: 1933)

Article 2 of the Convention. Daily and weekly limits of hours of work. The Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments made under Article 3 of the Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30).

Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30) (ratification: 1950)

Article 3 of the Convention. Daily and weekly limits of hours of work. The Committee notes the comments of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), which were received on 1 September 2011 and transmitted to the Government on 16 September 2011, concerning the application of this Convention and of the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1). The CTA denounces the laxity and inefficiency of the system of labour inspection with respect to working time and indicates that in 2010 the proportion of workers who worked more than 8 hours a day exceeded 35 per cent. According to the CTA, the highest number of working time irregularities are recorded in the sectors of commerce (especially retail shops and supermarkets) and road transport but the system of control and supervision is deficient. Moreover, the CTA refers to section 1 of Act No. 11544 of 12 September 1929, which provides that the hours of work may not exceed eight in the day or 48 in the week, and considers that in its current wording (eight-hour day, or – instead of and – 48-hour week) it appears to authorize the so-called “compressed workweek” (i.e. four consecutive workdays of 12 hours followed by three days off). Furthermore, in the view of the CTA, shift work arrangements are known to be most harmful to the workers’ health and family life and are not consistent with either the letter or the spirit of Conventions Nos 1 and 30. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of CTA.

In addition, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Canada

Articles 2, 5 and 6(1)(b) of the Convention. Limits for daily and weekly hours of work – Federal legislation. Further to its previous comment in which the Committee expressed concern at the many discrepancies between the national legislation and the provisions of the Convention, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that the Convention is not on the list of up-to-date ILO Conventions and that workplaces, production methods and workforce demographics have changed significantly since the Convention was adopted in 1919. In the Government’s view, the ILO should therefore consider tripartite discussions with respect to updating this instrument. The Government recognizes that there is a continuing need to regulate hours of work but considers that balancing employers’ needs for flexibility and employees’ needs for work-life balance requires some flexibility in the regulation of hours of work. In this connection, the Committee wishes to recall paragraph 328 of its 2005 General Survey on hours of work in which it concluded that Convention No. 1 warranted revision but noted that it did not have a mandate to make concrete proposals to this end. It also wishes to draw the Government’s attention to paragraph 332 of the same document in which the Committee suggested, among other elements to be taken into account if a decision were to be taken to consider revision, the need to ensure that the new instrument does not result in a reduction of the level of protection currently afforded by existing instruments.

Further to its previous comments with respect to the ongoing review of Part III of the Canada Labour Code, the Committee notes (i) the report authored by Professor Harry W. Arthurs, Fairness at Work: Federal Labour Standards for the 21st Century (the Arthurs’ report), published in October 2006 by the Federal Labour Standards Review Commission setting out the Commission’s recommendations for legislative changes and (ii) the resulting Discussion Paper on the Review of Labour Standards in the Canada Labour Code, published in February 2009, framing discussions with interested organizations and individuals based on those recommendations. The Committee further notes the comments of the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in response to the recommendations set out in the Arthurs’ report and the discussion paper by the Human Resources and Skills Development Canada (HRSDC) dated July 2009. The Government indicates that, in addition to the above material, consultations were held with a wide range of stakeholders on the potential modernization of Part III, and that 63 written submissions were received. It further indicates that it is currently considering the results of the written submissions and stakeholder consultations before deciding on a course of action. The Committee hopes that in the ongoing review process of Part III of the Canada Labour Code based on the recommendations of the Arthurs' report and the ensuing consultations with stakeholders, the Government will not fail to take into consideration the various issues the Committee has been raising for several years. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this regard and to transmit copies of any new texts once they have been finalized.

Provincial legislation – Alberta. The Committee notes that section 21(b) of the Employment Standards Code provides that overtime provisions apply to an employee's hours of work in excess of 44 hours in the work week, but observes once more that the Code does not set an overall limit for weekly hours.

Prince Edward Island. The Committee notes the Government's indication that industries such as heavy equipment and seasonal highway construction, industrial sandblasting, fish processing, trucking and peat moss industry are altogether exempted from the standard work week of 48 hours and recalls that such general exceptions do not meet the conditions of any of the permissible exceptions under the Convention.

Nova Scotia. The Committee notes the Government's explanations that the absence of limits for daily or weekly hours is due to the fact that employees in low-paid jobs needed to work additional hours in order to earn a decent living. The Government adds that following recent increases in the minimum wage, the need for minimum wage earners to work overtime will be reduced and a comprehensive review of the Labour Standards Code is expected to address these issues over the next couple of years. The Committee is obliged to note, however, that at present the general labour legislation fails to give effect to basic requirements of the Convention.

Newfoundland and Labrador. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the standard work week is 40 hours, and not 48 hours, but recalls that there is no other limitation on working hours than the minimum eight-hour daily rest.

Fixing limits to daily and weekly hours of work. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the provincial legislation which fails to implement the requirement of Article 2 of the Convention, i.e., that the standard working hours are to be limited to eight a day and 48 a week. More concretely, (i) the Employment Standards Act of New Brunswick sets no limit either on daily or on weekly hours of work; (ii) the Employment Standards Act of Prince Edward Island does not regulate daily working hours; (iii) the Employment Standards Code of Manitoba sets a standard working day of eight hours, allowing to fix a different limit by collective agreement, regulation or by permission of the Employment Standards Director; (iv) the legislation of Ontario allows to set by collective agreement a working day of up to 13 hours and, subject to administrative authorization, a working week in excess of 60 hours; and (v) the legislation of Nova Scotia sets standard working time at 110 hours over a two-week period in the construction sector.

Compressed work week. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to the fact that Article 2(b) of the Convention allows weekly hours of work to be spread unevenly, i.e., in a compressed working week, but only if the length of the working day does not exceed nine hours. In this respect, the Committee again notes that the Employment Standards Code of Alberta permits recourse to a compressed work week which allows a working day of up to 12 hours. It also notes that the Labour Standards Act of Nunavut permits work days of up to ten hours.

Averaging of hours of work. The Committee refers once again to Article 5 of the Convention which allows averaging of work hours only in exceptional cases where it is recognized that the normal limit of eight hours a day and 48 hours a week cannot be applied, and observes that the legislation of Alberta and Manitoba authorize averaging with no restriction and that working time arrangements of this kind are also allowed by the relevant legislation of Quebec, Saskatchewan and British Columbia and Nunavut.

Overtime. The Committee recalls that in Nova Scotia, Quebec and Saskatchewan, overtime seems to be authorized under any circumstances provided that hours worked are paid at a higher rate whereas Articles 3 and 6(1)(b) of the Convention permit temporary exceptions to normal hours of work only in very limited and well-circumscribed cases.

In light of the foregoing analysis, the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of law and practice with the provisions of the Convention both at the federal and the provincial level.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Costa Rica

Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1) (ratification: 1982)

Article 2 of the Convention. Maximum hours of work. The Committee notes the comments sent on 22 August 2010 by the Rerum Novarum Workers' Confederation (CTRN) concerning the application of the Convention and the Government's reply dated 30 March 2011.

In its comments, the CTRN refers to several bills aimed at making labour legislation more flexible, including with regard to hours of work. The Committee notes the Government's indications that only one of these bills is currently before Parliament, namely Bill No. 17351 concerning employment protection in times of crisis. It also notes that, according to the Government, this Bill has not yet been placed on the agenda of Parliament for discussion and that the Ministry of Labour made a number of negative comments, one of the grounds being that the proposed measures were not based on any technical study. The Committee notes that Bill No. 17351 aims to enable the employer, in the event of an economic crisis and subject to certain conditions, to take temporary measures designed to preserve employment. These measures include the possibility of obliging the workers concerned to take their annual holiday in advance, replacing the system of working hours in force with another system authorized by the labour legislation, and reducing hours of work by one third. The Committee notes that the last measure, known as a system of short-time work in some countries, may constitute a relevant response to the current global economic crisis and at any rate does not raise issues with regard to maximum limits on working hours. The obligation on workers to take their holidays in advance does not pose any problem either as regards the application of the Convention. On the other hand, more detailed information is required on the scope of the provisions allowing employers to replace the existing system of working hours with a different one. The Committee notes the legal and economic report drawn up by the technical departments of the Legislative Assembly on 24 September 2009, which contains an important critique of the Bill. It also understands that this legislative text has not been discussed in Parliament for two years. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the current status of Bill No. 17351 and to provide further information on the type of system of working hours which an employer would be authorized to put in place under section 8 of the Bill.

Articles 2 and 6(1)(b). Hours of work and overtime for bus drivers. The Committee notes that the CTRN refers in its comments to the situation of bus drivers employed by transport companies affiliated to the National Chamber of Transport, alleging that these workers are subjected to exhausting working days of 16 to 18 hours, often without payment for the overtime worked. The CTRN also makes allegations concerning other practices to which bus drivers are exposed, such as the lack of a rest period for meals, the obligation to clean the vehicle at the end of the working day without payment for the additional time worked, etc. It also refers to a study conducted by the tripartite National Council for Occupational Health concerning the exhausting working days experienced by these drivers, the excessive stress that they suffer and the increased risk of accidents. The Committee notes the Government's indications that, further to the aforementioned study published in 1997, Executive Decree No. 27298-MTSS of 2 September 1998 was adopted concerning the conditions of work and occupational health of bus drivers. In reply to the CTRN allegations, the Government indicates that workers in the transport sector are not deprived of protection given that, further to the repeal in 1997 of section 146 of the Labour Code, which allowed special rules to be fixed concerning hours of work in the transport sector, the enterprises concerned have reduced working time to 8 hours per day. The Government also refers to the information sent by the National Chamber of Transport in reply to the CTRN allegations. This organization argues that overtime is required occasionally, in order to respond to shortages of workers and that, further to the repeal of section 146 of the Labour Code, transport enterprises have increased the length of rest periods to allow their employees time for meals. The Government also emphasizes that any infringement of the applicable labour and occupational health standards with regard to bus drivers would be examined by the National Directorate of Labour Inspection and Social Security, regardless of any legal action taken. It indicates that in 2010 the labour inspection services undertook 99 inspections in transport enterprises. No infringements were reported in 26 enterprises, and another 37 applied the measures recommended by the labour inspectors. The Committee notes with interest the efforts of the labour inspectorate to enforce the regulations applicable to bus drivers as regards hours of work. However, the Committee requests the Government to carry out the necessary inquiries into the allegations made by the CTRN regarding the daily hours of work of bus drivers, overtime pay and the question of remuneration for time spent cleaning the vehicle, and to send any other observations that it may wish to make in reply to the comments of the CTRN.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Dominican Republic

Night Work Convention, 1990 (No. 171) (ratification: 1993)

Article 3 of the Convention. Protective measures for night workers. For the last 18 years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to adopt measures – legislative or others – implementing the specific requirements set out in Articles 4 (free medical assessment), 6 (workers certified as unfit for night work), 7 (maternity protection), 9 (social services) and 10 (consultation of workers' representatives) of the Convention. The Committee recalls once more that these provisions of the Convention call for concrete protective measures in view of the inherent risks of night work. For instance, Article 4 provides that night workers are entitled to request a free health assessment before they take up an assignment, at regular intervals during such assignment and whenever they experience health problems during the assignment, and also to receive advice on how to reduce or avoid health problems associated with night work. Article 6 provides that workers who are medically certified as unfit to work at night – but may not necessarily be unfit for day work – have to be either transferred to a similar job for which they are fit, or, if their transfer to an alternative position proves impracticable, granted the same benefits (for instance, unemployment, sickness or disability benefits) as those day workers who are generally unfit for work. Article 7 requires that an alternative to night work (e.g. similar or equivalent day work) be available to women workers for a period of at least sixteen weeks, of which at least eight weeks before the expected date of childbirth, or for longer periods if this is medically necessary for the health of the mother or child. Recalling that the provisions of the Convention may be implemented by laws or regulations, collective agreements, arbitration awards or court decisions, a combination of these measures or in any other manner appropriate to national conditions and practice, the Committee urges the Government to take prompt action in order to give full effect to the abovementioned requirements of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Equatorial Guinea

Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1) (ratification: 1985)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 6 of the Convention. Permanent and temporary exceptions. In reply to the comments the Committee has been making since 1994, the Government indicated that the regulations applying section 49 of Act No. 2/1990 were still being examined with the parties concerned, particularly in the oil sector. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this matter. The Government is also invited to communicate information on the organizations of employers and workers consulted in the preparation of the abovementioned regulations. Pending the latter's adoption, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the manner in which effect is given, in practice, to the provisions of section 49 of Act No. 2/1990 on overtime.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30) (ratification: 1985)

Article 7 of the Convention. Permanent and temporary exceptions. In reply to comments that the Committee has been making since 1994, the Government indicated that the regulations to implement section 49 of Act No. 2/1990 are still being examined with the parties concerned, particularly in the oil sector. The Committee requests the Government to report on progress in this process. The Government is also asked to provide information on the employers' and workers' organizations consulted in the preparation of these regulations. Pending the latter's adoption, the Committee urges the Government to provide information on the way in which the provisions of section 49 of Act No. 2/1990 on overtime are applied in practice.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Honduras

Article 6 of the Convention. Right to weekly rest. The Committee notes the observations of 31 August 2010 and 30 March 2011 made by the Single Confederation of Workers of Honduras (CUTH), the Workers' General Central Union (CGT) and the Workers' Central Union of Honduras (CTH) as well as the Government's reply of 22 November 2011, concerning the application of the Convention. These comments refer to a draft decree to establish a national anti-crisis plan for job creation, which has since been adopted and is now Decree No. 230-2010 of 4 November 2010. The Committee notes that section 7 of the Decree provides that workers hired under the anti-crisis programme are subject exclusively to the programme's provisions as regards their rights and obligations and the benefits to which they are entitled. It notes that section 7 also provides that the workers concerned will nonetheless enjoy the fundamental rights established in the Labour Code and the eight ILO fundamental Conventions. In the Committee's view, as currently worded, this provision suggests that only the provisions of the Labour Code relating to freedom of association, the right to collective bargaining, the prohibition of forced labour and child labour and non-discrimination apply to these workers, to the exclusion of the provisions on weekly rest among others. This view appears to be confirmed by the Government in its reply to the observations of CUTH, CGT and CTH. The Committee therefore asks the Government to indicate how it is ensured that workers hired under the anti-crisis programme established by Decree No. 230-2010 effectively enjoy their right to weekly rest in accordance with the provisions of this Convention.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

India

Article 2 of the Convention. Limitations on daily and weekly working hours. The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous comments concerning the observations made by the Centre of Indian Trade Unions (CITU) and the Bharatiya Mazdoor Sangh (BMS) union, concerning the application of the Convention. It notes the Government's indications that the information technology sector is not governed by the Factories Act, but by the provisions of the Shop and Establishment Acts of the respective state governments. The Committee wishes to specify that the comments of the above trade union organizations referred to two different points: firstly, the BMS alleged the existence of violations of the legislation on working time in certain sectors, and particularly information technology, without referring to the Factories Act; second, the CITU alleged, without mentioning any specific sector, that the provisions of the Factories Act limiting weekly working hours to 48 were among those most frequently violated. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to reply to the observations made by the above trade union organizations on the two points indicated above. It also requests the Government to provide information on any complaints that may have been filed under the Factories Act and results of those complaints.

With regard to violations of the legislation on working time in Special Economic Zones, which were also alleged by the BMS, the Committee notes the Government's indications that it has sought information from the various state governments. The Committee requests the Government to provide the Office with any information that is received concerning any violations of the legislation on working time in the Special Economic Zones.

Furthermore, with regard to the possible revision of the legislation to raise the limits on working hours to 12 in the day and 60 in the week, the Committee notes the Government's indications that there is no information on such an initiative. The Committee, however, observes that the Economic Survey for 2008–09, published by the Ministry of Finance, makes explicit reference to the need to amend the Factories Act as indicated above. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide additional clarification in this regard.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kenya

Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132) (ratification: 1979)

Article 5(2) of the Convention. Minimum period of service. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any reply to its previous comment regarding the period of service required to qualify for an annual holiday with pay. It recalls that section 28(1)(a) of the Employment Act fixes the minimum period of service to qualify for an annual holiday with pay at 12 months, whereas Article 5(2) of the Convention limits this minimum period of service to no more than six months. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation into conformity with this provision of the Convention.

Article 5(4). Definition of the period of service giving entitlement to an annual holiday with pay. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the application of this provision of the Convention is ensured by sections 8, 9(2) and 12 of the general regulations on wages. The Committee notes, however, that these sections do not refer to the inclusion of absences from work for reasons beyond the control of the worker concerned in the qualifying period for an annual holiday with pay. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee again requests the Government to insert a provision in its legislation ensuring the implementation of the Convention on this point.

Article 6. Exclusion of public holidays and periods of incapacity for work from the annual holiday with pay. The Committee notes that section 9(2) of the general regulations on wages provides that the annual paid holiday of 21 working days is in addition to public holidays, weekly rest days and additional holidays, whether provided for by law or by an agreement. The Committee requests the Government to state whether the additional holidays referred to in this provision also include days of sick leave, as prescribed by the Convention.

Article 7(2). Payment of remuneration relating to the annual paid holiday. The Committee notes the Government's indications that, although the legislation does not make the advance payment of remuneration relating to the paid holiday obligatory, as required by the Convention, in practice workers receive this remuneration before the start of their annual holiday. However, the Committee recalls that payment in advance is compulsory, unless otherwise provided for in an agreement between the employer and the worker concerned. In order to ensure uniform application of this rule, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to insert such an obligation in its legislation.

Article 10. Time at which the holiday is taken. The Committee notes the indications in the Government's report that the period of annual holiday is determined by the employer in consultation with the worker concerned. It draws the Government's attention to the fact that Article 10(2) of the Convention provides that, in fixing the time at which the holiday is to be taken, work requirements and the opportunities for rest and relaxation available to the employed person shall be taken into account. In other words, the employer must take account not only of his/her own needs but also of the interests of his/her employees and their families when fixing the period of annual holiday with pay. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the implementation of this provision of the Convention.

Article 12. Prohibition of agreements to relinquish the right to the minimum annual holiday with pay. The Committee notes the Government's reference in its report to section 26 of the Employment Act, which states that the provisions of this Act relating to conditions of employment (especially annual holiday with pay) constitute minimum standards and that if a collective agreement, an agreement between the parties or a court decision establish more favourable conditions, it is these conditions which will be applicable. However, the Committee notes that this provision of the Employment Act does not give effect to Article 12 of the Convention since it does not stipulate that any agreement to relinquish the right to the three-week annual paid holiday or to forgo such a holiday shall be null and void or be prohibited. The Committee therefore requests the Government to insert a provision in the legislation stating explicitly that such agreements shall be null and void or be prohibited.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Kuwait

Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee notes with interest that following the adoption of the new Labour Law No. 6 of 2010 on work in the private sector, which repeals Law No. 38 of 1964, casual workers engaged in seasonal work not exceeding six months and owners of non-mechanical enterprises employing fewer than five workers are now covered by the provisions on working time. It notes, however, that under section 5 of Labour

Law No. 6 of 2010, these provisions do not apply to workers whose employment and working conditions are regulated by other laws. The Committee requests the Government to specify the categories of workers who are exempted from the application of the new Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010, and to provide a copy of the legal provisions regulating the working hours of those workers.

Article 6(1)(b). Temporary exceptions. The Committee notes that section 66 of the Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010, which essentially reproduces section 34 of the previous Labour Law No. 38 of 1964, provides that employees may be requested to perform overtime if this is necessary for avoiding a certain loss or completing such work exceeding the daily required work. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that Article 6(1)(b) of the Convention permits the introduction of temporary exceptions to the normal hours of work only when industrial establishments need to deal with exceptional cases of pressure of work, whereas section 66 of the new Private Sector Labour Law does not seem to limit recourse to additional hours to exceptional situations. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the requirements of Article 6(1)(b) of the Convention and to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this matter.

Article 6(2). Limit on the number of additional hours. The Committee notes that under section 66 of the Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010, additional hours are permitted up to a maximum of 180 hours per year. Furthermore, the Committee notes once again that sections 3 and 4 of Ministerial Order No. 34/77 concerning overtime in the public sector do not specify the maximum number of additional hours that may be authorized in the case of temporary exceptions to the normal hours of work. In this regard, the Committee wishes to refer to paragraph 144 of its 2005 General Survey on hours of work in which it noted that even though the establishment of specific limits to the total number of additional hours is left to the competent authorities, this does not mean that such authorities have unlimited discretion in this regard. Such limits must be reasonable and they must be prescribed in line with the general goal of the Convention, namely to establish the eight-hour day and 48-hour week as a legal standard of hours of work in order to provide protection against undue fatigue and to ensure reasonable leisure and opportunities for recreation and social life. It appears from the preparatory work that led to the adoption of Convention No. 1 that the limits considered to be permissible amounted to 150 hours per year in the case of temporary exceptions. In light of the preceding observations, the Committee hopes that the Government will take without further delay all necessary measures in order to establish a reasonable limit on the number of authorized additional hours in case of temporary exceptions both in the private and the public sectors and to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments made under Articles 1 and 2 of the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1).

Article 7(2)(b) and (d). Temporary exceptions. The Committee notes that section 66 of the new Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010, which essentially reproduces section 34 of the Previous Law No. 38 of 1964, provides that employees may be requested to perform overtime if this is necessary for avoiding a certain loss or completing such work exceeding the daily required work. The Committee recalls that under Article 7(2) of the Convention temporary exceptions may only be granted in specific and narrowly-defined circumstances, including the need to prevent the loss of perishable goods or avoid endangering the technical results of the work; as well as enable establishments to deal with cases of abnormal pressure of work due to special circumstances, in so far as the employer cannot ordinarily be expected to resort to other measures. In contrast, the formulation used in section 66 of the private sector labour law appears too broad as compared to the authorized scope of temporary exceptions under the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary action to ensure that the exceptions provided for in section 66 of the new Private Sector Labour Law No. 6 of 2010 are strictly limited to the exceptions provided for in Article 7(2) of the Convention.

Article 7(3). Limit on the number of additional hours. The Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments made under Article 6(2) of Convention No. 1.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Nicaragua

Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30) (ratification: 1934)

Article 3 of the Convention. Limits on daily and weekly hours of work. The Committee notes the comments of the Trade Union Unification Confederation (CUS) dated 30 August 2011 alleging that the Ministry of Labour does not monitor or control working time violations and that in the interest of preserving their employment workers in most commerce and offices are obliged to work more than eight hours per day and 48 hours per week. In particular, the CUS denounces the situation in “call centres” where workers are asked to work more than eight hours a day, without being paid overtime in exchange of employment stability. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of CUS.

Moreover, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Panama

Hours of Work (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1930 (No. 30) (ratification: 1959)

Article 7 of the Convention. Temporary exceptions – Annual limit on the number of additional hours and overtime pay. The Committee notes with regret that in reply to its numerous comments the Government merely repeats its previous indication that section 36(4) of the Labour Code cannot be amended to conform with the provisions of the Convention owing to a lack of consensus among the social partners. The Committee once again draws the Government’s attention to the fact that, while tripartite consultations are indeed necessary prior to any legislative reform, the Government bears the ultimate responsibility for the fulfilment of its international obligations, including the implementation of ratified ILO Conventions. The Committee again urges the Government to amend section 36(4) of the Labour Code in order to fix a reasonable annual limit to the number of additional hours authorized in the context of temporary exceptions and thereby bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point.

In addition, the Committee notes the observations made by the National Federation of Public Employees and Public Service Enterprise Workers (FENASEP) concerning the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), received on 25 August 2011, which refer to overtime work in the public sector, and which are therefore also relevant to Convention No. 30. It also notes the Government’s reply received on 14 November 2011, in particular the reference to Act No. 43 of 30 July 2009, which amends Act No. 9 of 20 June 1994 regulating the administrative career service. The Committee will examine in detail the observations of the FENASEP as well as the Government’s response at its next session. In the meantime, the Committee requests the Government to provide any supplementary information which may be available concerning the measures taken or envisaged in order to ensure that: (i) public employees are authorized to perform additional hours only in the limited cases provided for in Article 7(2) of the Convention; (ii) an annual limit is introduced on the number of additional hours authorized, as required under Article 7(3) of the Convention; and (iii) additional hours are paid at not less than one and a quarter times the regular rate, as prescribed by Article 7(4) of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Romania

Article 6(2) of the Convention. Overtime pay. The Committee notes the observations made by the Block of National Trade Unions (BNS) concerning the application of the Convention, which were received on 1 September 2010, and also the Government's reply to these observations, which was received on 18 January 2011. According to the BNS, even though weekly hours of work are clearly regulated by the Labour Code and the relevant European Union (EU) directive, there is a worrying failure to observe these provisions, especially in the imposition, in breach of the regulations, of overtime hours that do not qualify for compensatory rest or for extra payment. It notes that the Government in its reply recalls the provisions of the Labour Code relating to compensation for overtime and points out that any infringement of these provisions is liable to incur a fine and that any employee who considers that his/her rights have been infringed may take legal action. The Committee recalls its previous comment concerning the application of Article 6(2) of the Convention, in which it emphasized that, regardless of whether compensatory rest is granted, the rate of pay for overtime must in any case be at least 25 per cent higher than the normal rate. The Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that the Labour Code only provides for a higher rate of pay if the worker concerned has been unable to take paid rest during the 30-day period following the overtime worked. It notes that Act No. 40/2011 of 31 March 2011 has increased this period from 30 to 60 days. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report in reply to its direct request of 2008 concerning the application of Article 6(2) of the Convention, and also regarding the steps taken to ensure the observance of the corresponding provisions of the Labour Code in practice.

The Committee also notes the more general remarks made by the BNS concerning the draft amendments to the Labour Code, which were under examination at the time. It notes that the BNS described as worrying the Government's intention to make the Labour Code more flexible, including with regard to the regulation of hours of work. It notes the Government's indication in reply to these remarks that the draft amendments formed part of the commitments made by Romania vis-à-vis the EU. The Committee notes that these amendments have been adopted since then, becoming Act No. 40/2011 of 31 March 2011. It notes that the Act, apart from extending the period in which overtime can be compensated, as referred to above, also extends the reference period from three to four months during which maximum weekly working hours (including overtime) can be averaged. The Committee notes that the Office, in its technical comments on the draft amendments, sent to the Government in January 2011, emphasized the fact that the planned amendments to the Labour Code did not deal with the issues raised by the Committee in its comments of 2008. Moreover, the Committee understands that Act No. 40/2011 was adopted by Parliament under an accelerated procedure and that the draft Act was criticized by both employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the consultations held with the social partners concerning the provisions of the aforementioned draft Act relating to hours of work. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to reply in detail to the observation and direct request of 2008 and indicate the measures it plans to take on these issues in order to ensure that the national legislation is in full conformity with the Convention.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the conclusions of the ILO Tripartite Meeting of Experts on Working Time Arrangements, held in October 2011, according to which the provisions of existing ILO standards relating to daily and weekly hours of work, weekly rest, paid annual leave, part-time and night work, remain relevant in the twenty-first century, and should be promoted in order to facilitate decent work. The Experts also emphasized the importance of working time, its regulation, and organization and management, to: (a) workers and their health and well-being, including opportunities for balancing working and non-work time; (b) the productivity and competitiveness of enterprises; and (c) effective responses to economic and labour market crises.

Sierra Leone

Holidays with Pay (Agriculture) Convention, 1952 (No. 101) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 1 and 8 of the Convention. Right to annual holidays with pay. The Committee notes the statement in the Government's last report that section 63(6) of the draft Employment Act would provide that any agreement to relinquish the right to minimum annual holiday would be null and void. The Committee hopes that the Act will be adopted in the near future, bringing section 12(a) of Government Notice No. 888, which the Committee has repeatedly highlighted as being in need of amendment, into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the full text of the revised legislation as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee also takes this opportunity to recall that, on proposal of the Working Party on Policy regarding the Revision of Standards, the ILO Governing Body has decided that Convention No. 101 is outdated and has invited States parties to that Convention to contemplate ratifying the Holidays with Pay Convention (Revised), 1970 (No. 132), which is not deemed to be fully up to date but remains relevant in certain respects (see GB.283/LILS/WP/PRS/1/2, paragraph 12). Acceptance of the obligations of Convention No. 132 in respect of persons employed in agriculture by a State party to Convention No. 101 involves the immediate denunciation of the latter. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any decision it may take in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Direct requests

White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that, in addition to referring information already stated in previous reports, the Government refers to the provisions of the recently adopted Decree No. 05–08 of 8 January 2005 on specific requirements concerning preventive measures for the handling of locally produced or imported hazardous substances, preparations or products at the workplace. According to article 3 of this Decree, such hazardous substances, preparations or products are classified in 11 different categories, including those that are harmful, toxic, carcinogenic and dangerous for the environment, and according to its article 4 these categories are to be further defined by ministerial decree. The Committee notes that while the adoption of the present Decree represents a step forward, it does not constitute the specific provisions required to give effect to the Convention. The Committee again deplores the fact that the Government has not yet taken the necessary measures to secure the application of the Convention. The Committee is therefore bound to recall the main principles of the Convention: (i) the prohibition of the use of white lead and sulphate of lead in the internal painting of buildings; (ii) the regulation of the use of white lead in artistic painting; (iii) the prohibition of the employment of young men under 18 years of age and all women in any painting work involving the use of white lead; and (iv) the regulation of the use of white lead in painting work for which its use is not prohibited. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide statistics with regard to lead poisoning among working painters, as required by Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures without delay to bring the national law and practice into conformity with the terms and objectives of the Convention and to provide detailed information in this respect.

Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119) (ratification: 1969)

With reference to its previous comments the Committee notes, with concern, that in its most recent report, the Government makes no reference to the process to revise Act No. 88-07 of 26 January 1988 and to adopt implementing regulations to ensure compliance with the Convention – a process that the Government has reported on for the past 20 years. It recalls that the Government in its previous report specifically referred to a draft executive decree that would reflect all the relevant provisions of the Convention, as well as those of the Recommendation. Recalling the constitutional obligations of the Government to implement the provisions of Conventions it has ratified the Committee urges the Government to adopt the draft executive decree referred to above without delay so as to give effect to the various provisions of the Convention and to report to the Committee on any progress in this respect.

In the meantime, the Committee is bound to recall the following points:

Article 2(3) and (4) of the Convention. The Committee recalls that section 8 of Act 88-07 of 26 January 1988 which prohibits the manufacture, exhibition, putting up for sale, sale, import, hire or transfer in any other manner of machinery or parts of machinery that do not correspond to current national and international health and safety standards does not determine the machinery that is considered to be dangerous, nor the parts thereof which are likely to present danger, in accordance with the requirements of Article 2(3) and (4) of the Convention. It recalls that it had noted that the provisions of Executive Decree No. 90-245 of 18 August 1990, applicable to gas pressure machinery and of Executive Decree No. 90-246 of 18 August 1990, applicable to steam pressure machinery, met the requirements of Article 2 of the Convention, but that similar measures of general application to machinery covered by the Convention as a whole were needed. In this regard the Committee wishes to reiterate its previous comments that the objective of Article 2 of the Convention is to guarantee that machines are safe before they reach the user, whereas the provisions of Executive Decree No. 91-05 of 19 January 1991 respecting general safety provisions concerning the guarding of machinery once it is in use.

The Committee again draws the attention of the Government to paragraphs 73, et seq., of its General Survey of 1987 on safety and the working environment, where it indicates that it is essential for the effective application of Part [I] of the Convention that national legislation designate those parts of machinery that present danger and require appropriate guarding (paragraph 82), and that, until there has been a determination of the machinery and parts thereof that present danger, the prohibition of the sale, hire, transfer in any other manner and exhibition of machinery contained in Article 2 of the Convention remains ineffective. The Committee recalls its previous reference to paragraph 85 of the 1987 General Survey, op. cit., to indicate that the definition of dangerous machinery and parts thereof should as a minimum cover all those parts enumerated in Article 2 of the Convention.

Article 4. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's reply that the responsibility referred to in paragraph 2 of the Committee's previous comments was provided for in section 37 of Act No. 88-07 of 26 January 1988, which prescribed sanctions in cases of violations of sections 8, 10 and 34 of the same Act. The Committee recalls once again that, while section 8 of Act No. 88-07 prohibits the manufacture, exhibition, putting up for sale, sale, import, hire or transfer in any other manner of machinery that is dangerous, with a view to its use, section 10 of the same Act explicitly lays down the responsibilities only of those who are involved in the manufacture, import, cession and use of the machinery (manufacturer and importer) and not of the vendor, the person letting out on hire or transferring the machinery in any other manner, or the exhibitor, and their respective agents. The Committee once again refers to paragraphs 164–175 of its 1987 General Survey, op. cit., in which it observes that the general prohibition from manufacturing, selling, hiring or transferring in any other manner machinery which is dangerous is inadequate if it is not accompanied by a provision explicitly requiring these provisions to be applied to the manufacturer, vendor, the person letting out on hire or transferring the machinery in any other manner or their respective agents, in order to comply with Article 4 of the Convention which expressly establishes the responsibility of these persons, and to avoid any ambiguity. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the responsibility of the categories of persons mentioned in Article 4 is explicitly established in national legislation and that sanctions are applicable in the event of the violation of these provisions.

Articles 6 and 7. Further to its previous comments concerning the responsibility of the employer, the Committee notes the Government's indication that this responsibility is established in section 38 of Act No. 88-07. The Committee notes that the provisions of Act No. 88-07, including section 38, do not fully respond to its previous comments that the use of machinery, any parts of which, including the point of operation, is without appropriate guards, is not explicitly prohibited in law. It reiterates its previous indications that sections 40–43 of Executive Decree No. 91-05, while requiring the dangerous parts of machines to be guarded, do not explicitly prohibit the use of machinery, the dangerous parts of which are not guarded. The Committee refers once again to paragraph 180 of its 1987 General Survey, op. cit., in which it indicates that Article 6(1), of the Convention is formulated as a general prohibition to be included in the national legislation and that, in order to observe this provision, it is not enough to require the guarding of machines while in use, without at the same time requiring that the use of machines without appropriate guards is forbidden. The Committee wishes to reiterate the need for the legislation to establish clearly that the obligation to ensure compliance with this prohibition rests on the employer, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes the Government report and the attached legislation. The Committee also notes that the Government report does not contain replies to the questions raised in its previous comments and does not indicate the measures taken, in law and in practice, to ensure the application of Articles 14 and 18 of the Convention. It must therefore once again repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 14 of the Convention. Suitable seats for workers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government indicating that labour legislation is currently being reviewed, and that the obligation to provide suitable and sufficient seats for workers has been taken into consideration in the provisions of the future Labour Code. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt, as soon as possible, appropriate measures in law and practice to ensure that all workers covered by the Convention have sufficient and suitable seats, and the possibility of using them, and to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 18. Protection against noise and vibrations. The Committee notes the reference by the Government to sections 15 and 16 of Executive Decree No. 91/05 of 19 January 1991 which states the obligations of employers to reduce the impact of noise on workers' health, and where this is not possible, to provide such workers with personal protective equipment. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government adopt, as soon as possible, appropriate measures in law and practice to give effect to the provisions of this Article with regards to vibrations, and to keep the Office informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government reference to the body in charge of the enforcement of the Convention, the Labour State Inspectorate. However, the information provided does not allow for a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied to the country. The Committee accordingly requests once again the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, for example by supplying extracts from inspection reports and, where such information exists, the number of workers covered by the legislation; the number and nature of the contraventions reported; and the number, nature and cause of accidents reported.

The Committee takes this opportunity to invite the Government to request ILO technical assistance with the view to ensure an effective application of the Convention. The Committee hopes that such technical assistance can be carried out and asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken in this respect with the relevant ILO bodies.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Argentina

Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184) (ratification: 2006)

Article 4(1) of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodical review of a coherent national policy on safety and health in agriculture after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee notes with interest the Argentinian Occupational Safety and Health Strategy 2011–15, adopted on 27 April 2011, with the signature of the Government and the representative organizations of employers and workers, which contains references to the present Convention: Decision No. 11/2011 establishing requirements for the housing of temporary, cyclical and seasonal agricultural workers, which gives effect to Article 19(b) of the Convention; and the approval by the National Congress and the promulgation by the executive authorities, on 24 August 2011, of Acts Nos 26693 and 26694 approving the ratification of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its Protocol of 2002 and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), which are key occupational safety and health (OSH) instruments, as determined by the Governing Body in March 2010 in the Plan of Action to achieve widespread ratification of the three abovementioned instruments. The Committee considers that the adoption of the Strategy and the decision to ratify the above instruments constitutes progress in public OSH policies and facilitates the application of the other sectoral and thematic OSH Conventions, such as the present Convention. It hopes that it will facilitate the adoption of the national OSH policy for the agricultural sector and the adoption of the respective legislation.

The Committee hopes that the Government will communicate in the near future the registration of the ratification of these instruments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the formulation, implementation and periodical review of a coherent national policy on safety and health in agriculture after consulting the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned; on the consultations held during the period covered by the report; on the basic principles of the national policy; and on the manner in which the periodical review envisaged by this Article of the Convention is carried out.

Article 4(2)(b). Specification of the rights and duties of employers and workers with respect to occupational safety and health in agriculture. The Committee notes that a new draft National Agrarian Work Regime, which will replace the legislation that is in force, is currently before the Chamber of Deputies. The Committee notes that this draft text incorporates certain Articles of the Convention, but does not give effect to others. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the above legislation, or any other relevant legislation, gives effect to the provisions of the Convention, to take into account for this purpose the comments made by the Committee and to provide information on this subject, with an indication, if the draft text is approved, of the changes made by the new legislation as it relates to the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Barbados

Comments by the Barbados Workers Union (BWU). The Committee notes the comments transmitted by the BWU on 1 September 2011 which were communicated to the Government on 19 September 2011 and that no response thereto has been received from the Government. The Committee notes that the BWU reiterates its call to institute its previously suggested measures so as to mitigate the probability and severity of any incidents relative to radiation exposure, that the BWU on several occasions has requested that the Advisory Committee be reactivated, maximum admissible radiation exposure doses be fixed and a compulsory annual examination be instituted, among other measures and that according to the BWU workers in a number of establishments have, of late, made calls for the aforementioned measures relating to radiation protection to be implemented without delay. In the light of these comments, the Committee requests the Government to take all appropriate measures to ensure full application of the Convention. It also reiterates its request to the Government to respond to its previous observations which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report and the reply to its direct request. It notes that, despite comments it has reiterated for several years, the Government's report contains no new information and that, according to the Government's replies, no follow-up has been given to the Committee's comments. The Committee also notes that the Government's report refers to observations submitted by the "Barbados Workers' Union" which requests the Government to reactivate the Advisory Committee on Radiation Protection (ACRP); to establish legislative measures to afford protection to workers exposed to ionizing radiation, particularly by fixing the maximum admissible radiation exposure doses; to take appropriate measures to prescribe a compulsory medical examination – not merely optional – for workers exposed to radiation; and to provide alternative employment allowing them to maintain their income for persons who can no longer work in zones exposed to radiation. In view of the above, the Committee is bound to reiterate its observations on the following matters.

Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the regulatory body to monitor the exposure of workers to ionizing radiation has not been established yet. It further notes that the ACRP has not yet given directives regarding protective measures to be taken against ionizing radiation, or time limits for the application of such measures. Referring to its introductory comments, the Committee urges the Government to take the appropriate steps to make the ACRP operational and thus creating the framework for the monitoring of workers' exposure to ionizing radiation and the issuing of directives regarding protective measures, which falls, according to the Committee's understanding, in the area of competence of the ACRP.

Articles 3 and 6. With regard to the fixing of maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation, necessary in order to comply with the requirement to ensure effective protection of workers in the light of "knowledge available at the time" and in the light of "current knowledge", the Committee noted from the Government's report that the radiation protection officer, being a hospital physician and the chairperson of the ACRP, is well aware of the recent revised dose limits of the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP). In this regard, the Government indicates that reports on the doses of ionizing radiation received by workers show that the limits recommended by the ICRP were not exceeded. However, in particular cases recorded for cardiac catheterization doctors and one radiologist, the dose of radiation absorbed was beyond this limitation, which subsequently has been brought to their attention. The Committee, noting that the observance of the dose limits for ionizing radiation, as recommended by the ICRP in 1990, do not seem to set a problem to the Government in practice, requests therefore the Government to reconsider the possibility to fix maximum permissible dose levels of ionizing radiations with legally binding effect in order to guarantee by means of enforceable provisions an effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiations, in accordance with Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention.

Article 5. With regard to the installation of a computerized system, type "Selectron HDR", in 1990 which reduces the number of workers dealing with radiation sources to an extent that the probable exposure to radiation would turn to zero, the Committee noted the Government's indication that this system is used in the treatment of cancer of the uterine cervix and related problems. However, its use in other medical disciplines has to be planned since logistical problems regarding the necessary equipment and the movement of staff working in related disciplines need to be resolved. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary action to enable the use of the “Selectron HDR” system in all medical disciplines where appropriate in order to restrict the exposure of workers to the lowest practicable level and to avoid any unnecessary exposure of workers. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on experiences already collected in applying the system in the field of the treatment of cancer of the uterine cervix.

Article 7. The Committee noted the Government’s indication that no legislation is in place to set a lower limit on the age of radiation workers. However, since it is a very fundamental issue, it is hoped that it will appear in the amended Radiation Act. In the meantime it belongs to the radiation protection officer’s tasks to ensure that adequate structural shielding in place is provided, such as area monitoring, warning lights or alarm where appropriate and that only qualified workers are employed to operate machines producing radiation. In this respect, the Committee notes again the Government’s indication provided with its 1998 report to the effect that the minimum age for engagement in radiation work was 16. Recalling the provision of Article 7(2) of the Convention which provides for a minimum age of 16 to become engaged in work involving ionizing radiation, the Committee requests again the Government to specify the legal basis providing for the prohibition to engage young persons under 16 years of age in work involving exposure to ionizing radiations. Moreover, the Committee recalls the provision of Article 7(1)(a) of the Convention, providing for the fixation of appropriate levels of exposure to ionizing radiations for workers who are directly engaged in radiation work and are aged 18 and over. The Committee therefore asks the Government once again to indicate the measures taken or contemplated in order to fix appropriate levels for this group of workers. Since the Committee understands from the Government’s indication that an amendment of the Radiation Act is intended, it would invite the Government to consider the possibility to incorporate such appropriate levels in the amendment of the above Act.

Article 8. With regard to dose limits to be set for workers not directly engaged in radiation work, the Government indicated that the reports on radiation received by these workers show either negligible or zero doses. While the Committee noted this information with interest, it nevertheless wishes to point out that Article 8 of the Convention obliges every ratifying State to fix appropriate levels of exposure to ionizing radiations for this category of workers, in accordance with Article 6, read together with Article 3(1) of the Convention, that is in the light of knowledge available at the time. In this respect, the Committee would draw the Government’s attention to paragraph 14 of its 1992 general observation under the Convention, as well as to section 5.4.5 of the ILO Code of Practice on the Radiation Protection of Workers (ionizing radiations) of 1986, explaining that the employer has the same obligations towards workers not engaged in radiation work, as far as restricting their radiation exposure is concerned, as if they were members of the public with respect to sources of practices under the employer’s control. The annual dose limits should be those applied to individual members of the public. According to the 1990 ICRP Recommendations, the annual dose limit for members of the public is 1 mSv. The Committee therefore asks the Government to indicate the measures envisaged to fulfil its obligation under this Article of the Convention.

Article 9. The Committee noted the information supplied with the Government’s report on the functions of the alarm systems used in those units at hospitals where radiation treatment is carried out. It also notes the existence of appropriate warning signs fixed on the doors to indicate the presence of hazards arising from ionizing radiations. However, with regard to adequate instructions of workers directly engaged in radiation work, the Committee calls again the Government’s attention to section 2.4 of the 1986 ILO Code of Practice on the Radiation Protection of Workers (ionizing radiations) which contains general principles for informing, instructing and training of workers. The Government is requested to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers are adequately instructed in the precautions to be taken for their protection in conformity with Article 9(2) of the Convention.

Article 11. The Committee noted the Government’s indication to the effect that the workers designated to perform radiation work are presently monitored by TLD radiation monitoring badges supplied by the universities of the West Indies. The Committee requests the Government to explain more in detail the characteristics of this specific monitoring and the manner in which it is carried out.

Article 12. With regard to appropriate medical examination of workers directly engaged in radiation work, the Government indicated that a medical examination is still a prerequisite for an appointment to the public service. In addition, all workers assuming duties at the hospital are tested subsequently after they have taken up their work on a voluntary basis. In this respect, the Committee wishes to underline that subsequent medical examinations of workers directly engaged in radiation work have to be carried out on a mandatory basis and thus cannot be left to the discretion of the workers concerned whether or not they want to undergo a medical examination once they have been employed. The Government is accordingly requested to indicate the measures taken or envisaged ensuring that all workers engaged in radiation work are obliged to undergo appropriate medical examinations, not only prior to their employment, but also subsequently at appropriate intervals.

Article 13. With regard to the measures to be taken in emergency situations, the Government indicated that no such measures are in place yet, but that it is hoped that the development of emergency plans will be one of the tasks of the proposed regulatory body. In this respect, the Committee states that the ACRP is responsible, inter alia, to prepare a detailed radiation protection programme for Barbados (point (3) of the Advisory Committee on Radiation Protection – Terms of reference). The Committee thinks that the preparation of measures to be taken in emergency situations would form an integral part of its task. The Committee therefore hopes that the ACRP will resume its functions in the near future and that it will, within the framework of its duties, elaborate plans for emergency situations. To this effect, the Committee invites the Government again to refer to its 1987 general observation under the Convention as well as to paragraphs 16-27 of its 1992 general observation under the Convention concerning occupational exposure during and after an emergency which intend to give guidance regarding the measures to be taken in emergency situations. The Committee hopes that the Government will report on any progress made in this respect.

Article 14. In absence of any additional information regarding alternative employment of workers with premature accumulation of their lifetime dose, the Committee requests once again the Government to indicate whether and, if so, under which provisions, it is ensured that a worker who is medically advised to avoid exposure to ionizing radiations is not assigned to work involving such exposure, or is transferred to another suitable employment if he or she has already been assigned.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Belize

The Committee notes the information provided that the issues raised by the Committee would be addressed in a new National Occupational Safety and Health Act. This act was not, however, attached to the report and according to available information it has not yet been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to submit a copy of this new legislation as soon as it has been adopted. In the meantime, the Committee must repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 3(1) and 6(2) of the Convention. Maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's response indicating that on 13 March 2009, the Labour Advisory Board was re-activated and that its main duty is the revision of national labour legislation. The Committee notes that the Ministry is currently in the process of identifying a consultant that will work with the Labour Advisory Board to conduct the revision of the legislation, and that comments made by the Committee will be submitted to the Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of national labour legislation due account will be taken on the exposure limits adopted by the International Commission on Radiological Protection in its 1990 Recommendations, to which the Committee referred to in its 1992 general observation under the Convention, in order to ensure the effective protection of workers exposed to ionizing radiation in the course of their work.

Article 14. Provision of alternative employment. The Committee notes the Government's response indicating that there is no provision in the Labour Act for the transfer of pregnant women from their work involving exposure to ionizing radiation to another job. The Committee notes, however, the Government's statement that that the National Occupational Safety and Health Policy, adopted by Cabinet on 9 November 2004, can provide a suitable framework for drafting legislation that could make provision for such transfer and that legislation is drafted in consultation with the Labour Advisory Board. The Committee hopes that in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation due account will be taken of the need to ensure that suitable alternative employment opportunities, not involving exposure to ionizing radiations, be provided for workers having accumulated an effective dose beyond which detriment to their health considered unacceptable is to arise, as well as for pregnant women, who may be faced with the dilemma that protecting their health means losing their employment.

Occupational exposure during an emergency. The Committee notes that there is currently no provision within the Labour Act laying out the circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized. With reference to paragraphs 16–27 and 35(c) of its 1992 general observation under the Convention, and paragraphs V.27 and V.30 of the International Basic Safety Standards issued in 1994, the Committee requests the Government, in the course of the ongoing revision of the national labour legislation, to take due account of the need to determine circumstances in which exceptional exposure is authorized, and to make protection as effective as possible against accidents and during emergency operations, in particular with regard to the design and protective features of the workplace and the equipment, and the development of emergency intervention techniques, the use of which in emergency situations would enable the exposure of individuals to ionizing radiations to be avoided.

Benin

Article 2 of the Convention. Legislation and adoption of a national policy on occupational safety and health. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 207-410 of 31 August 2007 approving the national occupational safety and health (OSH) policy for Benin as well as a five year (2010–14) Action Plan concerning OSH. The Committee notes that, together with other legislative measures taken, including relevant provisions in the Labour Code (Act No. 98-004 of 27 January 1998), the National OSH Policy and Action Plan constitute a comprehensive framework for implementation of the Convention and a progressive improvement of occupational health services in the country giving effect to Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes, however the absence of information regarding the consultations held with the representative organizations of employers and workers in the elaboration of this Plan of Action. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on the consultations held with representative organizations of employers and workers in the elaboration of the National OSH Policy as well as on progress in relation to its implementation.

ILO Plan of Action on occupational safety and health (2010–16). The Committee notes that the national OSH policy referred to above paves the way for a future ratification not only of the three key instruments in the area of OSH namely the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its 2002 Protocol and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), but also of more specific Conventions such as the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170). The Committee would like to take this opportunity to inform the Government that, in March 2010, the Governing Body adopted a plan of action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the three key instruments referred to above, and that, under this Plan of Action, the Office is available to provide assistance to Governments, as appropriate, to bring their national law and practice in conformity with these key OSH Conventions in order to promote their ratification and effective implementation. The Committee invites the Government to provide further information on any needs for technical assistance it may have in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136) (ratification: 1977)

Situation in occupational safety and health (OSH). The Committee notes that the Government's report does not reply to most of the matters raised by the Committee in its observation of 2009. The Committee notes that the Government refers to general problems in OSH. The Government indicates that the 1979 Occupational Safety and Health Act is currently in force but despite the period it has been in force it has not been implemented effectively since occupational safety has still not been incorporated into management criteria. In addition, employers and workers still consider that the introduction of systems for prevention and improvement would constitute expenditure, not investment, enabling improvements in production and efficiency and reductions in social costs. In light of this situation, and on the basis of the new Constitution, the State has focused its efforts on establishing bodies to promote advances in this field and on adopting legislation. On 18 November 2008, the Government established the National Council for Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare, under the supervision of the Director-General of Labour and Industrial Safety at the Ministry of Labour. The Council is a tripartite body whose main function is to formulate policy in this field as well as advising the State authorities. In addition, the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare promoted the drawing up of draft legislation in OSH, within the framework of the new Constitution. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the draft legislation seeks to lay down guidelines for immediate action for the handling and use of benzene and the adoption of necessary protection measures. The Committee notes the efforts made by the Government in setting up the abovementioned body and the drawing up of the draft legislation. With regard to the National Council for Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on the activities undertaken by this body with respect to the application of this Convention. With regard to the draft legislation, the Committee requests the Government to ensure that the legislation gives effect to this Convention and to the other OSH Conventions which it has ratified, to take account of the Committee's comments on the application of these Conventions, and to supply information on any developments in this respect, and recalls that the Government may seek technical assistance from the Office if necessary. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general description of the manner in which it ensures that the Convention is applied and to respond to the comments made by the Committee in 2009 and provide detailed information in this respect.

Plan of Action (2010–16). The Committee wishes to take this opportunity to inform the Government that in March 2010 the ILO Governing Body adopted a Plan of Action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key instruments in OSH, namely: the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its 2002 Protocol, and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (GB.307/10/2(Rev.)). Noting the Government's willingness to adopt a global approach to OSH in consultation with the social partners and the fact that the Government has not ratified the three key instruments indicated in this paragraph, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that these instruments could make an effective contribution towards establishing an appropriate and coherent tripartite framework for the management of OSH, which would also facilitate the application of the ratified Conventions. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that, under the terms of the Plan, the Office is available to provide the necessary technical cooperation and assistance to facilitate the application of the ratified Conventions and the ratification of Convention No. 155, its Protocol and Convention No. 187. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on any need for technical assistance and cooperation that it may have in this respect.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general description of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including documents and material by way of illustration.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

Brazil

Rio Grande Do Sul Petrochemical Sector. Article 5 of the Convention. Effective protection of workers exposed to benzene. Article 6. Measures to prevent the escape of benzene vapour into the air of places of employment. Article 8. Adequate means of personal protection against the risk of absorbing benzene through the skin and of inhaling benzene vapour. Article 9. Periodical medical examinations and exceptions. Article 14(c). Labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of a communication from the Union of Workers in the Road Transport of Liquids and Gases, Oil Derivatives and Chemical Products of the State of Rio Grande Do Sul (SINDILÍQUIDA/RS) and of the Government's report. It noted that the communication alleged breach of the abovementioned provisions in the petrochemical sector, particularly by Petrobras Distribuidora SA, Shell Brazil and Distribuidora de Produtos de Petróleo Ipiranga SA, with special reference to "driver-operators". The trade union said that some products handled by workers in the sector contain more than 3 per cent of benzene and that the workers are exposed to serious risks, particularly "driver-operators" in view of the absence of prevention and protection measures. The driver-operators are not as a rule employees of the enterprises concerned since their legal status as employees varies and they perform the tasks of loading and unloading without protection and without any supervision by the appointed employees in the enterprises. The union also asserted that since 2003 these enterprises have not adopted the necessary technical measures to give effect to this Article of the Convention despite instructions from the labour inspectorate and convictions in the courts. Lastly, the organization asserts that the fact that inspection exists but produces no improvement amounts to a “legal fiction” and an instance of failure to apply Article 14(c) of the Convention.

Government’s report. Labour inspection. The Committee notes that, at the Government’s request, in September 2011 the Office again sent the Government the documents appended to the SINDILQUIDA/RS communication, including reports by the Regional Labour Delegation of Rio Grande Do Sul, that the union had sent as an attachment to the communication and which the Office forwarded to the Government on 8 November 2007. The Committee also notes that the Government emphatically refutes the union’s assertion that there is supervision by the labour inspectorate but that it is a “legal fiction”, and denies that matters may be at a standstill. The Government states that the labour inspectorate of Brazil is respected worldwide and that when an enterprise breaks the law, the democratic system can resort to instruments such as administrative and judicial sanctions, to be applied in observance of due process, and if the system proves inadequate, the solution is to get parliament to pass stricter laws. The Committee invites the Government to send its comments on the reports of the Regional Labour Delegation attached to the SINDILQUIDA/RS communication.

Labour inspectorate’s work relating to the issues raised in the communication. The Committee notes with interest the information sent by the Government on the labour inspectorate’s work relating to the enterprises and issues referred to in the communication. The Government indicates that Petrobras, Shell Brazil and Ipiranga were inspected regularly in 2009 in connection with the regulatory standards on occupational safety and health (OSH), as well as on general issues, individual protective equipment, and programmes on environmental risk prevention and health conditions and amenities at the workplace. The Government reports on infringements that were remedied and others that were reported after it was found that the enterprise failed to apply adequate risk-prevention measures; failed to develop adequate planning measures; failed to specify strategies and methodologies and overlooked the views of the workers; disregarded the need for joint measures where two or more employers carry on activities simultaneously in the same workplace; and failed to ascertain the absence of any risks and to carry out proper supervision. The Committee also notes that, according to the Government, two Petrobras units were inspected: Petrobras Transporte SA – TRANSPETRO and Petrobras Distribuidora in Canoas, Rio Grande do Sul. TRANSPETRO was inspected in connection with regulatory standards on general aspects of OSH, individual protective equipment, medical occupational health supervision programmes, environmental risk-prevention programmes, unhealthy activities, and operations. These inspections also involved the State Benzene Committee (CNBz). The Government also indicates that in March 2009, Petrobras Distribuidora was inspected and deficiencies that had been found were put to right. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the impact of the work done by the labour inspectorate on the issues raised in the communication, including on other enterprises mentioned in the communication, such as Shell.

Court cases. The Committee notes the information sent by the Government on judicial proceedings under way as a result of reports of infringements submitted by the labour inspectorate. As regards compliance with Decision No. 00075-2003-024-04-00-0 of the District Labour Court No. 24 of Puerto Alegre, referred to by the union in its communication, the Committee notes that a hearing of 22 August 2008 dealt with the execution of the decision, and that SINDILQUIDA/RS concedes that the enterprise (Petrobras Distribuidora) is complying as regards the issues mentioned. An extract of the hearing record, provided by the Government, states that the drivers of the service providers are no longer carrying on activities outside the scope of their occupation as lorry drivers, having concluded a contract the latter capacity with the company Servale. The enterprise also submitted programmes for risk-prevention in the workplace which recommend the use of respirators for workers responsible for unloading lorries. The Government also reports a court case against Shell Brazil in Esteio, Rio Grande do Sul where a prohibition was sought on safety grounds; a case against Ipiranga in which the Public Prosecutor for Labour, assisted by SINDILQUIDA/RS, applied to have the lorry drivers barred from the tasks of loading and unloading regardless of whether they were employees of the enterprise, or of subcontractors or self-employed. The case is still pending. Referring to the latter case, the Government indicates that the judges deemed the issue of driver-operators to be a “highly controversial” one. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on developments in these cases and to indicate why the courts deem the driver-operator issue to be “highly controversial”, insofar as the matter relates to the application of the Convention or any other ratified Convention on occupational safety and health.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the effect given to the Convention by enterprises in the petrochemical sector, including in the Rio Grande Do Sul region. Please provide information on the manner in which the Articles of the Convention cited at the beginning of this comment apply to persons engaged in the loading and unloading of fuels, whether they are employed directly by enterprises in the sector or by subcontractors, as in the case of the enterprise Servale referred to by the Government in its report on the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). The Committee also asks the Government to state whether it envisages the possibility of examining, together with the social partners and in the course of the reviews provided for in Article 7 of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), how application of the Convention is faring in the petrochemical sector.

Programmes for the prevention of occupational exposure to benzene (PPEOB). In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide copies of a few PPEOB together with information on the manner in which they are applied in practice, including in the enterprises mentioned in the communication. The Committee notes that in its report, the Government indicates that the labour inspectorate is responsible for supervising implementation of such programmes and that information on such programmes may not be forwarded for examination by third parties because copies may not be provided to any institutions, except in the case of court rulings. The Committee requests the Government to provide information allowing it to ascertain whether the programmes are effectively applied in the petrochemical industry, including in the enterprises mentioned in the communication.

Article 1 of the Convention. Carcinogenic substances and agents to which occupational exposure shall be prohibited or made subject to authorization. Periodic updating. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the list of carcinogenic substances and agents to which occupational exposure shall be prohibited is not periodically updated. The Committee reminds the Government that according to Article 1(1) of the Convention, the Government is required to determine periodically the carcinogenic substances and agents to which occupational exposure shall be prohibited or made subject to authorization or control, and those to which other provisions of this Convention shall apply. This Article provides expressly for periodic updating because new substances and agents that may be carcinogenic are constantly coming on to the market. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to give effect to this Article of the Convention and to provide information in this regard.

Mechanism to reduce under-notification and broaden the scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Decree No. 6042/07 establishes a list of etiological agents or occupational risk factors in which a series of substances is recognized as carcinogenic. The Decree also creates a new mechanism for establishing a causal link between the ailment and the work performed, regardless of whether or not the enterprise has notified the incident. The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that the set of instruments to apply the Decree, including INSS/PRES Directive No. 31 of 10 September 2008, has enabled under-notification to be reduced and that in 2007, 514,135 occupational accidents and diseases were notified through the Communication of Occupational Accidents (CAT) system and 138,955 through the new system, in other words there has been a 21.28 per cent increase in cases recognized. The Government also states that prior to the Decree, a CAT was necessary in order for a preliminary medical examination to qualify incapacity for work as due to occupational accident or disease, whereas since the Decree has been in force, the benefit can be awarded without a CAT. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on accidents and diseases relating to this Convention that were notified through the CAT and on cases that were not so notified.

Articles 4 and 5. Information on carcinogenic substances and agents and measures to be taken, medical examinations and monitoring of workers' state of health. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to a communication from the Workers' Union of the Road Transport of Liquids and Gases, Oil Derivatives and Chemical Products of Rio Grande Do Sul (SINDILQUIIDA/RS) concerning workers in the Rio Grande Do Sul petroleum sector and particularly driver-operators. The organization stated that in practice, these provisions of the Convention are not applied; that no information is provided on the hazards of carcinogenic products such as benzene; and that in innumerable cases no suitable medical examination is carried out to assess exposure or state of health as they relate to occupational hazards, and cited as an example two specific cases from a report by the Rio Grande Do Sul labour delegation, which involve Petrobrás, Shell and other enterprises in the sector. The Committee notes that according to the Government, in 2009 in Rio Grande Do Sul alone 5,280 establishments were inspected in connection with NR-01 (general provisions); 8,009 establishments with NR-07, establishing the Occupational Health Medical Programme (PCMSO); and 2,224 establishments in connection with NR-09 on the Environmental Hazards Programme (PPRA). Noting that the information gives no detail of the results of the inspections pertaining to the application of these Articles of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the inspection visits, together with all other available information, including number of workplaces where incidents, number of citations issued, follow-up action pertaining solely to the application of these Articles of the Convention, including inspections conducted in the petroleum sector and pertaining in particular to the drivers referred to in the communication.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. Article 6(c). Labour inspection service. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that the labour inspectorate has 2,882 inspectors, 900 of whom deal primarily with occupational safety and health. The Committee notes in particular the information supplied by the Government regarding Civil Proceedings No. 00075-2003-024-04-00-0 of the 24th Labour District of Porto Alegre, to the effect that in the hearing of 22 August 2008, SINDILQUIIDA/RS is recorded as acknowledging that the enterprise Petrobrás Distribuidora is complying with the law and as quoting from the record of the hearing referring to the recommendation regarding use of respirators for benzene loading operations and as indicating that the drivers of service providers have stopped performing tasks that exceed their occupational activity of driving lorries, a contract with the enterprise Servale having been concluded for this purpose. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the Convention is applied to the workers of the abovementioned enterprise who carry on activities that fall within the scope of application of the Convention, including the use of respirators.

As regards the other issues in dispute, the parties undertook to continue negotiating. The Government also indicates that the court is monitoring issues pending and that in 2010 it confirmed that it had received no further information regarding the meeting scheduled for 16 December 2009, and that this shows that the State is monitoring application of the relevant rules. It also indicates that as a result of inspection visits to Shell Brazil, in the municipality of Esteio in Rio Grande Do Sul, six contraventions were reported, all of which concerned the prevention of environmental hazards, since it was found that risk prevention by the enterprise was inadequate. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, including in the petrochemical sector.

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) (ratification: 1982)

Article 5(4) of the Convention. Right of workers' representatives to accompany labour inspectors on their supervisory visits and Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the efforts made by the labour inspection services to ensure compliance in practice with this Article of the Convention. In this respect, the Government indicates that, according to the data extracted from the computerized system of supervision of the labour inspectorate from July 2005 to June 2010, this matter was covered by 632 inspection reports, with action being taken to ensure compliance in 579 cases, with 13 violations reported. It adds that in July 2009 inspections were carried out in Petrobrás Transporte SA, with the participation of the State Benzene Commission, which includes among its members the Workers' Union of the Road Transport of Liquids and Gases, Oil Derivatives and Chemical Products of the State of Rio Grande do Sul (SINDILÍQUIDA/RS). The Committee will continue to examine any matters relating to the communication in its comments on the application of the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), and Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of this Article in practice and, insofar as possible, to provide its assessment in this respect.

Article 6(1) and (2). Requirement of collaboration where several employers undertake activities simultaneously. Articles 10, 13 and 16. Personal protection equipment, the requirement to provide information, appropriate penalties and appropriate inspection. Article 12. Notification to the competent authority of the use of processes, substances, machinery and equipment which involve the exposure of workers to occupational hazards in the working environment due to air pollution. The Committee notes the information provided in reply to the points raised previously.

Articles 4 and 8 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodic review of a coherent national policy for occupational safety and health (OSH), in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that on 22 February 2010 the Tripartite Committee on Occupational Safety and Health (CTSST) approved the national OSH policy. It notes with satisfaction that on 7 November 2011 the President of the Republic promulgated Decree No. 7602, whereby Brazil adopted its national OSH policy. The Committee notes the information concerning the extensive participation of the social partners in the formulation of this policy and that the policy is based on five principles: universality, prevention, precedence of promotion, protection and prevention over assistance, rehabilitation and reparation, social dialogue and comprehensiveness. Moreover, it notes that the mandate of the CTSST includes the periodic review of the national OSH policy, the formulation, monitoring and periodic review of the National Plan, the dissemination thereof and the coordination of OSH networks. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application of its national policy and on the National Plan.

Articles 1 and 2. Application of the Convention to all branches of economic activity and to all workers in the branches concerned. In its previous comments the Committee noted a communication from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), indicating that informal work is a persistent problem, since a large number of workers are not declared and that, accordingly, policies are not geared to the real number of workers who should normally be covered by them. It also noted the Government's reply indicating that the labour inspectorate plays a key role in taking action against undeclared work and asked the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken, in consultation with the social partners, to extend OSH protection to all Brazilian workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the issue of work in the informal economy is extremely complex and a source of concern for all sectors and that the economic revival of the country has enabled an increase in the formal economy, which in itself extends protection. It indicates that the health system is universal but that social security and protection relating to employment are mainly features of the private formal sector. The Government indicates that efforts have been made to extend the scope of application in certain aspects, for example with a view to extending social security cover for individual contributors without a formal employment relationship, and also through the creation of the "simplified plan for inclusion in the social security system" of Decree No. 6042 of 12 February 2007, which reduced the rate of social security contributions from 20 to 11 per cent of the minimum wage, thus benefiting self-employed contributors and reducing under-registration, as stated in its report on the application of the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). The Committee also refers to its comments on the application of the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), in which it notes similar comments from the trade unions and the Government's statement concerning the drawing up of an indicator of real unemployment, which would contribute towards better identification of the number of workers who should be covered by the Convention. As regards the issue raised by the CUT regarding the extension of health coverage to workers in the informal economy, the Government indicates that this is not applicable under the existing system in which companies pay a tax as a way of partially financing employment injury benefits, and indicates that the abovementioned Decree created a bonus system for the reduction of contributions from enterprises which reduce their sickness and accident rate. The Committee notes that the national policy provides in its guidelines for the universality of its actions and provides for the adoption of a national plan on OSH, the formulation of which will begin this year. While noting the measures communicated by the Government to extend the scope of employment injury benefits, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which its national plan on OSH takes account of workers in the informal economy, both in the estimation of the number of workers and in the proposed OSH measures.

Article 9(1). Adequate and appropriate system of labour inspection to secure the enforcement of laws and regulations concerning OSH. Petrochemical industry. Communication from the Rio Grande do Sul Union of Workers for the Road Transport of Liquids and Gases, Oil Derivatives and Chemicals (SINDILÍQUIDA/RS). In its previous comments the Committee noted the communication from SINDILÍQUIDA/RS and the labour inspection reports attached by the trade union. It noted the indications in these reports that, despite the vigilance of the labour inspection services of Rio Grande do Sul to enforce the relevant legislation, enterprises persist in failing to give effect to the laws and regulations relating to OSH, and this raised doubts as to whether the inspection system is appropriate and efficient. The Committee asked the Government to provide its assessment of the effectiveness of the means that exist to address the issues raised by SINDILÍQUIDA/RS. The Committee notes that, as regards the Petrobrás company and compliance with the obligations established by Ruling No. 00075-2003-024-04-00-0 of the 24th Labour Division of Porto Alegre, to which the Committee referred in its previous observation, the Government provides a transcription of part of the record of the judicial hearing of 22 August 2008, noting that Petrobrás is complying with the points relating to the Articles mentioned above, and that the company has adopted prevention programmes. Furthermore, the Government indicates that it is taking follow-up action and that, according to a statement of 26 February 2010 from the Director of the Secretariat of the 24th Division which brought the case, there had been no statement to date from the parties concerned regarding the meeting that had been planned for 16 December 2009. As regards the Shell company, the report indicates that, as a result of action by the inspectorate in February 2009, six writs of infringement were issued for persistent non-compliance. The Committee notes with interest the work carried out by the labour inspectorate, whose reports show that there is up-to-date and detailed follow-up action in the situation which was the subject of the communication. The Committee will continue to follow up in future on the specific issues arising from this communication in its comments on the application of the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), and of Convention No. 139.

General issues relating to the application of this Article. The Committee refers to information in a report by the Government of 14 December 2007 which it noted in its comments on the application of the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170). On the one hand this report indicates that SINDILÍQUIDA/RS supports its complaints by referencing the labour inspection reports and this therefore endorses the quality of the actions of the labour inspectorate. It also indicates that the penalties established in the legislation are insufficient, that the judiciary has, on occasion, overturned emergency measures ordered by the labour inspectorate, by accepting the employers' argument that stoppage of the plant concerned would cause serious economic damage, without duly recognizing the hazards that continuation of these activities represents, and examples are quoted such as a judicial decision in Minas Gerais which determined that regulatory standards Nos 7, 9 and 18 did not apply to the members of the Trade Union of Major Construction Works (SICEPOT) in Minas Gerais. The document also indicates that the solution called for to obtain greater efficiency lies outside the competence of the Secretary of Labour Inspection, which has spared no effort to perform its task. The Committee wishes to emphasize that the application of the Convention, including this Article, is the Government's responsibility and this requires joint efforts from both the legislative bodies and the law enforcement bodies. The Committee requests the Government to provide its assessment concerning whether the penalties established in law may be inadequate and concerning any court decisions which may constitute possible obstacles to the application of the measures prescribed by the Convention. The Government is also requested to provide information on the measures taken or contemplated in this regard.

Article 11(c). Occupational accidents and diseases – Notification procedures and annual statistics. In its previous comments the Committee invited the Government to take account of the issues raised by the CUT regarding the impact of undeclared work on occupational accidents statistics and to provide detailed information on the measures taken or contemplated to address the problems in this sphere, including in the construction, petrochemical and metallurgy industries. The Committee notes the detailed information from the Government concerning analysis of occupational accidents and the work of the labour inspectorate in the abovementioned sectors. It notes that, as regards the latter's activity in OSH, 17.23 per cent was devoted to civil construction, whereas 0.05 per cent took place in the petroleum industry. As regards the system for the notification of occupational accidents, the Government indicates that information relating to the formal sector is based on notifications of occupational accidents (CAT) to the social security bodies, that the single health system (SUS) registers accidents involving workers covered by this system, and that the labour inspectorate always examines complaints of under-notification. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the new measures taken to address the issue of under-notification, including with regard to workers in the informal economy, with special emphasis on the sectors in which the labour inspectorate has recorded a high accident rate, such as the construction industry, and requests it to supply information on the continuing impact of measures for notification apart from the CAT system, to which it referred in its comments on Convention No. 139.

Article 15. Coordination between various authorities. Communication from the Union of Teachers, Federal District (SINPRO-DF). The Committee refers to the communication from the union and to the information supplied by the Government concerning the measures taken to settle the issues raised, which shows that the union has the possibility of intervening actively in discussions on OSH policies for its sector. The Committee also refers to the communication from the Union of Forensic Experts of the State of São Paulo (SINPCRESP) and the Government's reply. The Committee notes that these cases appear to indicate – together with those to which it referred in 2009 – the existence of problems of application of the Convention in the public administration in various states in Brazil or in the various administrations. While remaining aware of the problems that the application of the Convention may pose in the federal states, the Committee emphasizes that the Government must adopt the appropriate measures to guarantee the application of ratified Conventions throughout its territory, and requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the application of the Convention to the staff in all administrations and states, and to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention to the workers referred to in these two communications.

Article 17. Collaboration between enterprises engaged in activities simultaneously at one workplace. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that Regulatory Standard No. 9 concerning the Environmental Hazard Prevention Programme (PPRA) states in clause 9.6.1 that whenever several employers are engaged in activities simultaneously at the same workplace, they shall be obliged to take coordinated action to apply the measures provided for in the PPRA for the protection of all workers exposed to the environmental hazards concerned. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this standard applies to all workers in all branches of activity and to provide information on its application in practice.

Articles 5 and 8 of the Convention. Occupational health services with functions that are adequate and appropriate to the occupational risks of the undertaking. Cooperation and participation on an equitable basis of the employer, the workers and their representatives. Communication from the Union of Teachers, Federal District (SINPRO-DF). In its previous comments, the Committee referred to a communication from the SINPRO-DF stating that: the health situation of teachers in the Federal District (DF) was very serious; there was a lack of preventive measures; very many illnesses were connected with the work administration, but they were not recognized by the medical services as being occupational illnesses; and the number of judicial proceedings relating to this subject had already exceeded 1,000. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, changes were made in the second half of 2010 in the district government, and the new Government published Decree No. 32795 establishing a new organizational structure made up of an under-secretariat of health, safety and welfare for public officials, a coordinating unit of occupational safety and health (OSH), an administrative unit promoting workers' health, an administrative unit for mental health and preventive measures, and an administrative unit for workers' safety. The statutes of these departments and the OSH policy are still being elaborated. The Committee notes with satisfaction the general and specific measures adopted by the Government in follow-up to the issues raised by the SINPRO-DF. As part of the general measures, the Government indicates that, in the sector of public teachers, there has been an increase in the participation of teachers and their representatives in the current administrative structure, and that this may be verified on the Internet site of the educational secretariat of the Federal District and that of SINPRO-DF. For example, various plenary meetings have been held on proposals for the democratic administration of education, resulting in a number of commitments from the education secretariat, such as the adoption of a more person-centred approach by the occupational safety and health directorate and a decentralization of its activities; the SINPRO-DF drafted a bill relating to the democratic management of education, considered an historical event for the workers; at the district level, a conference on democratic management was held, during which records of the discussions on the bill were drawn up, and subsequently discussed with deputies of the District Legislative Chamber. As part of the special measures, the Committee notes that, according to information submitted by the education secretariat of the DF, by means of official communication No. 477 of 3 May 2011, improvements have been made in the sector, such as: actions designed to improve precarious working conditions in 309 schools; protective, corrective and preventive actions in 14 regional teaching directorates, covering 657 teaching establishments; and finally the introduction of a health plan for all workers in the sector from January 2012 onwards. The Government concludes by stating that adjustment measures for the occupational health services for public servants in the Federal District in general, and teachers in particular, are under way. The Committee requests the Government to continue sending information on any developments in this respect including on the health plan for the sector, which, according to the report, will enter into effect in 2012 and, in particular, on the functions of the health services listed under Article 5 of the present Convention.

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1990)

Articles 3(2) and 10 of the Convention. Review of national laws and regulations in the light of technical progress and advances in scientific knowledge. Replacement and prohibition of asbestos. The Committee notes the communication, including various annexes, provided by the Brazilian Association of Industries and Distributors of Fibrocement Products (ABIFibro), which was duly forwarded to the Government. The communication asserts that there has been technical progress in Brazil and the development of scientific knowledge which today allow the replacement of asbestos and that the time has therefore come for Brazil to prohibit any type of asbestos, and that the legislation needs to be revised in this respect, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention. ABIFibro adds that the prohibition of asbestos would not eliminate jobs, because the industries have demonstrated their capacity for adaptation to new technologies without losing jobs. ABIFibro argues that the reasons justifying the use of chrysotile in Act No. 9055/95 respecting the use of asbestos are no longer valid. The Committee will examine this communication, together with the comments that the Government considers it appropriate to provide, in its next comment.

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application. Article 3. Consultation of the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned regarding the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee referred to communications from the Union of Workers in the Lumber, Civil Construction and Furniture Industries of Altamira and the Surrounding Region (SINTICMA) and the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT). Both communications referred to the growth in the construction industry and, within the industry, to non-registered workers and the serious problems that this situation presented with regard to the application of the Convention. The main points of the communication from the CUT were as follows: (a) occupational safety and health (OSH) policies and measures for the construction industry do not take account of the informal sector and are therefore not realistic; (b) the method for recording occupational accidents does not take account of non-registered workers and so the accident figures contained in official records do not reflect reality; and (c) very few occupational accidents are investigated. SINTICMA stated that the enterprises operating in the Altamira region do not observe labour legislation relating to documentation of workers, that the conditions of work in construction are subhuman, that the workers do not enjoy any of the rights established by the legislation, including with regard to OSH, and that labour inspection is inadequate. The Committee asked for information on the manner in which account is taken of these workers with a view to: (a) formulating OSH policies for the construction industry; (b) recording occupational accidents; and (c) training in OSH. The Committee notes the statement in the Government's report that work in the informal sector is extensive but follows the growth trends in the formal sector. In the first six months of 2010, a total of 1.47 million jobs were created, which corresponds to the highest figure recorded in the General Register of Employment and Unemployment (CAGED). Between January and May 2011, the number of new jobs created was 1,171,796 (up 3.26 per cent), which was only slightly less than the increase indicated for 2010. The Government states that although the construction industry shows problems with regard to informal work, there has also been a high rate of growth in the formal sector in recent years. In order to gain a more precise estimate of informal employment in the country, the Ministry of Labour and Employment announced the creation of an indicator for the end of 2011, based on CAGED data and the Annual Report on Labour Issues (RAIS). The new indicator, called the "real unemployment rate", will focus on the employment market in the informal economy. According to the Labour Minister, the current unemployment indicators do not reflect the reality in the informal sector, in self-employment or in the liberal professions. The Committee notes with interest the development of the real unemployment indicator since this can contribute to a more accurate identification of the number of informal workers in the sector covered by the Convention and contribute towards the application of the Convention to all construction workers. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the statistics obtained in the construction industry on the basis of this indicator, stating the number of registered workers and the estimated number of non-registered workers.

Other measures. The Government also previously indicated that the most effective means of tackling informal employment in Brazil is the action taken by the labour inspectorate, whose objectives in civil construction include prevention (avoiding occupational accidents and diseases) and enforcement, including taking action against informal employment. The Committee notes the Government's detailed information on the action of the labour inspectorate, indicating that in 2010 labour inspectors registered 57,883 workers in civil construction and 18,918 workers in heavy construction and that from January to May 2011 a total of 22,771 workers were registered in civil construction and 8,619 workers in heavy construction. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that, under Government policy, civil construction is one of the priority sectors for the labour inspectorate and that in 2010 a total of 20.4 per cent of inspections in the sector concerned safety and health. As preventive measures, 2,781 seizure orders were issued in cases involving a serious and imminent danger to the workers, 17,244 reports of infringements were issued and 387 investigations into serious and fatal accidents were undertaken. The Government also provides information on action undertaken in heavy construction. The Committee also refers to the information provided by the Government concerning the measures to reduce under-notification and those which it noted in its comments relating to the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139), and the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). Noting the efforts of the labour inspectorate to ensure the application of the Convention to all workers in the sector, the Committee recalls that a fundamental mechanism for giving effect to the Convention is Article 3, under the terms of which the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned must be consulted on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to undertake such consultations, including on the measures to be adopted to give effect to the provisions of the Convention with respect to registered and non-registered workers, and to supply information in this regard. The Government is also requested to supply practical information on the registration of occupational accidents in the construction sector and on training in OSH.

Part VI of the report form. Application in practice and Article 35. Labour inspection. In its previous comments the Committee noted that, according to SINTICMA, working and OSH conditions in civil construction in the trans-Amazonian region are subhuman and the labour inspectorate does not have the means to address this situation. The union indicated that there is one Ministry of Labour and Employment assistant's post for 40,000 workers seeking help from ten towns in the trans-Amazonian region and that the labour inspectorate is unable to monitor these enterprises because the work is temporary and it only visits the region every two or three years. It notes that the Government only refers in its report to Article 10 of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81). The Committee indicates that, according to Article 35 of the present Convention, each Member shall provide appropriate inspection services to supervise the application of the measures to be taken in pursuance of the Convention and provide these services with the resources necessary for the accomplishment of their task. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the action of the labour inspection services with regard to the OSH issues raised by SINTICMA in the trans-Amazonian region and to clarify whether these services are equipped with the necessary means to enforce the application of the Convention in that region.

Article 4 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodic review of a coherent policy on safety in the use of chemicals at work, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations. The Committee notes the Government's statement concerning the procedure for the drawing up of regulatory standards for technical details, which complement international and domestic standards on occupational safety and health (OSH). The Government indicates that in Brazil the first stage in the drafting or amendment of a regulatory standard is the definition by the Standing Joint Tripartite Committee (CTPP) of the subjects to be discussed, and then a technical group is established which submits a draft to a tripartite working group (GTT), which draws up the proposal to be presented to the CTPP. It also mentions the technical cooperation agreement signed between the Ministry of Labour and the National Institute of Metrology, Standardization and Industrial Quality. The Committee notes that this system enables consultations regarding the formulation or modification of a standard but also recalls that this Article of the Convention also requires consultations with the social partners during implementation and review and establishes that this must take place at intervals in order to ensure a follow-up mechanism capable of taking the necessary corrective action that arises from the application of that policy in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether a tripartite group exists for follow-up on the application of the Convention and also to indicate the arrangements for periodic review and consultation under this Article of the Convention during the reporting period.

Article 12. Exposure to chemicals and assessment thereof. Article 13. Assessment of the risks arising from the use of chemicals at work, exposure limits and measures to deal with emergencies. Article 15. Information and training for workers. Petrochemical industry. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the observations made by the Rio Grande do Sul Union of Workers for the Road Transport of Liquids and Gases, Oil Derivatives and Chemicals (SINDILÍQUIDA/RS), alleging the violation of the abovementioned Articles and according to which the Petrobrás Distribuidora enterprise had neither formulated nor implemented a programme for the prevention and control of occupational exposure to chemicals, nor had it implemented any measures for the prevention of occupational accidents or to prepare for emergencies, including the training of workers to that end, nor had it carried out any biological controls with regard to workers. The union also indicates that this situation is duplicated in other enterprises in the sector. The Committee notes with interest the detailed information supplied by the Government concerning the action of the labour inspectorate to ensure the application of the provisions of the Convention, stating that Petrobrás Distribuidora handed over a CD at the judicial hearing containing the enterprise's hazard prevention plans and an extract included by the Government stating that SINDILÍQUIDA/RS admitted that there was compliance with the abovementioned points. The Committee also notes the detailed information from the Government concerning the action taken by the labour inspectorate in the petrochemical industry, including at the Petrobrás Transporte SA (TRANSPETRO), Petrobrás Distribuidora, Shell Brasil and Ipiranga companies, and in particular the action taken to comply with the present Articles of the Convention. The Committee will continue to follow up on any specific issues which may arise relating to the abovementioned communication in its comments on the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136), and the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139). The Committee further notes that, according to a document enclosed from the Labour Inspection Department of 14 December 2007 (Case No. 46011.000096/2007-62), other major obstacles to the effectiveness of the labour inspectorate are decisions issued by the judiciary and legislature, which often interfere in the results of inspection activity without due commitment to the safety and health of the workers. According to this document, the judiciary has overturned emergency measures, accepting the employers' argument that plant stoppages would cause serious economic damage, without taking due account of the hazard represented by continuation of the work, and examples are provided. Finally, the document indicates that the labour inspectorate duly complies with its obligations and that the solution to this situation of legal ineffectiveness lies outside the scope of the competence of the Labour Inspection Secretariat. The Committee observes that the labour inspectorate in Brazil is thorough in its tasks and considers that the labour inspectorate can contribute to the application of the Convention but that the responsibility for ensuring the application of the Convention lies with the Government and not just with one entity. Furthermore, the present Convention requires coherent national policies such as those established in Article 4 and the harmonization of the various bodies and authorities involved in its application. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures to ensure that all state authorities are in a position to contribute to the full application of the Convention and requests it to continue to supply information on the application of the Articles listed at the beginning of this paragraph.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. Articles 6 and 7. Criteria for the classification of chemicals and assessment of hazardous properties of mixtures. Article 16. Cooperation between employers and workers with respect to safety in the use of chemicals. Article 17. Duty of workers to cooperate with their employers in the discharge by the employers of their responsibilities. Article 18(3). Rights of workers and their representatives. The Committee notes that the report contains information on the activities of the labour inspectorate. The Committee indicates that this Convention involves the activity of various competent authorities and that the application of specific Articles goes beyond the scope of the enterprise and the labour inspectorate, as, for example, in the case of Article 6 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general description of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including the Articles referred to in this paragraph. The Committee again requests the Government to provide information on the number of workers exposed to chemicals and on the trends observed regarding the type of violations specifically relating to the provisions of the Convention.

Bulgaria

Article 6(2) of the Convention. Establishment of a system of sufficiently dissuasive penalties. The Committee notes with satisfaction that information that the penalties for violations of the labour law are provided for in articles 413, 414, and 415(c) of the Labour Code and that the size of these penalties has been increased in 2006 and 2008. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the system of dissuasive penalties in the country.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes the information that as a result of systematic application of coercive measures by the controlling bodies in recent years, a high degree of compliance with the Health and Safety at Work Act has been achieved. It also notes that the Government indicates that further efforts need to be deployed in order to increase the awareness of the fact that successful enterprise policies for safety and health are directly dependent on collective agreements at the enterprise level. The Committee also notes the statement by the Government that an essential element of prevention is effective systems for occupational safety and health training and qualifications of workers and managers and that the labour inspectorates have noted the good practice of conducting annual tests of the qualifications of the staff in this respect in large enterprises engaged in mining, manufacturing of chemical products, construction and cement production, and also in the manufacture of various chemicals, the printing and food industries, but that this practice was not yet applied in the case of small enterprises. It also notes the information that in 2009 the number of workers found to work in unhygienic conditions had nonetheless decreased by 5 per cent since 2008. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application in practice of national occupational safety and health legislation and to indicate measures taken to address the reported lack of appropriate working conditions in small enterprises and to provide information on the impact of such measures.

Burkina Faso

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information in the Government's reports submitted in 2007, including the reference to various legislative and regulatory texts.

Article 2 of the Convention. Implementation and periodical review of a coherent national policy on occupational health services. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information in the Government's report, according to which a national occupational safety and health policy is still being prepared. This involves a framework document on national policy in this area, accompanied by a national action plan. The measures concerning the implementation and periodical review of the policy are set forth therein. The Committee hopes that this document will be adopted in the very near future and asks the Government to provide a copy thereof once it has been adopted.

Article 6. Provision for the establishment of occupational health services. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that some progress has been made in this respect, in that the action plan accompanying the framework document on national policy relating to occupational health services will cover not only the formal sector, but also the informal sector and the agricultural sector. The Committee notes, however, that the Government has not provided any clarification as to the points raised in its previous comments. It is therefore obliged to reiterate its request concerning the following points: Article 3, Establishment of health services; Article 5(a), Identification of risks from health hazards in the workplace; Article 5(b), Surveillance of the workplace; Article 5(c), Role of health services in the planning and organization of work; Article 5(d), Role of the health services in testing and evaluating new equipment; Article 5(e) and (i), Role of the health services in ergonomics; Article 5(h), Role of the health services in vocational rehabilitation; Article 5(j), Emergencies and first aid; Article 9(2), Cooperation of the health services with other services in the enterprise; Article 10, Independence of health service personnel; Article 11, Qualifications of health service personnel; Article 15, Notification to health services of absences from work for health reasons. The Committee asks the Government to take these points into consideration within the context of the preparation of the new national policy, so as to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Part VI of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government, according to which 162,372 workers in the private sector and 70,308 workers in the public sector are covered by the legislation. Furthermore, the Committee invites the Government to request, at the appropriate time, ILO assistance with the view to the effective application of the Convention. The Committee hopes that such technical assistance can be carried out and asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken in this respect with the relevant ILO bodies. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information concerning the practical application of the Convention in order to follow the progress made.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Burundi

Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report and the statistical data. It notes with regret that, despite the comments it has been making for a number of years, the legislation to apply the Convention has not been changed.

Article 4 of the Convention. Inspection system. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes from the information provided that the Government will explore possibilities for training labour inspectors to monitor safety prescriptions in the building sector. The Government nevertheless points out in its report that managers in charge of occupational risk prevention at the National Social Security Institute (INSS) are qualified to carry out inspections in the building sector and that they give useful instructions to the employers concerned. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the practical application of this provision of the Convention.

Articles 6–15. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the legislation governing occupational safety has not been repealed and that Rwanda-Urundi (ORU) Ordinance No. 21/94 of 24 July 1953 establishing the legal framework for occupational safety in the building industry has not been revoked, and that the Government is envisaging its re-dissemination. The Committee requests the Government to provide clarification on the legislation in force to enable it to assess how the Convention is applied in Burundi.

Part V of the report form. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the statistical data in the Government's report showing trends in the number of active workers and the numbers receiving occupational risk benefits between 2000 and 2004, and the distribution of enterprises according to size and branch of economic activity at 31 December 2004. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report regarding trends in accidents in the building industry, together with any other relevant information allowing the Committee to assess how the safety standards established in the Convention are applied in practice.

Revision of the Convention. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), which revises Convention No. 62 of 1937 and could well be better adapted to the current situation in the building sector. It again points out that the ILO Governing Body invited States parties to Convention No. 62 to envisage the ratification of Convention No. 167, which entails, ipso jure, immediate denunciation of Convention No. 62 (GB.268/8/2). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any action taken on this suggestion.

Cambodia

The Committee notes with interest the information in the Government's report concerning the signature and publication by the Minister of Labour and Vocational Training of a first Occupational Safety and Health Master Plan 2009–13, including six action areas with concrete strategies and specific targets set. The Committee notes, inter alia, that Action No. 1.6, entitled “Apply ILO OSH standards and prepare for ratification”, targets the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Plantations Convention, 1958 (No. 110), the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184), the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187), and the ILO Guidelines on occupational safety and health management systems (ILO–OSH 2001). Welcoming these developments, the Committee would like to take this opportunity to inform the Government that, in March 2010, the Governing Body adopted a plan of action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key instruments in the area of OSH, Convention No. 155, its 2002 Protocol and Convention No. 187, (document GB.307/10/2(Rev.) 2010–16). The Committee would like to bring to the Government's attention that under this plan of action, the Office is available to provide assistance to governments, as appropriate, to bring their national law and practice into conformity with these key OSH Conventions in order to promote their ratification and effective implementation. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the implementation of the Occupational Safety and Health Master Plan 2009–13 and on any needs for assistance it may have in this respect.

Application of the Convention. With reference to its previous comments and the Government's brief report, the Committee notes the information that while no other action has been taken yet to implement this Convention due to the lack of material and human resources, some training about the effect of the use of white lead has been held with 24 provincial labour inspection officers. With reference to the foregoing and that the Government in its 1994 report indicated that the use of white lead has been very widespread in the country, particularly during the period of reconstruction, the Committee again urges the Government to take appropriate action to give full effect to the Convention and requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this regard.

Cameroon

The Committee notes that the Government does not contain any new information on legislation adopted to implement the Convention and that the Government reiterates its request for technical assistance from the Office in the development of legislation to give effect to the provisions of this Convention. The Committee also notes that the Order No. 051 on diseases caused by exposure to asbestos adopted on 22 September 2009, has not been made available. The Committee urges the Government to take all required measures to ensure a full application of the Convention, including requesting technical assistance from the Office for the development of the required legislation. The Committee also requests the Government to submit copies of all existing relevant legislation.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that, although reference is made to the fact that inspectors ensure control over hazardous and corrosive substances and that relevant statistical and other data will be collected by the National Labour Observatory (ONT), no such information was included in the report. With reference to its previous comments the Committee again refers to the communications of the General Confederation of Labour–Liberty of Cameroon (CGT–Liberté), transmitted to the Government on 8 November 2005, indicating that, while asbestos is not produced in the country, it has been used to create firewalls in certain buildings and there is a general lack of awareness of the dangers related thereto. The Committee asks the Government to respond to the communication by the CGT–Liberté and to give a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied in the country, and to attach extracts from inspection reports and, where such statistics exist, information on the number of workers covered by the legislation, the number and nature of the contraventions reported, and the number, nature and cause of accidents and occupational diseases reported.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2013.]

Canada

Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its latest report in response to the comments by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC) in 2010, to the conclusions of the Conference Committee in 2011, as well as to the comments by the CLC and by the Confederation of National Trade Unions (CSN) attached to the Government's 2011 report.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference 100th Session, June 2011)

The Committee notes that, following the discussion of this case in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, which highlighted the importance of adopting the strictest standards limits for the protection of workers' health as regards exposure to asbestos and noted that the Convention placed an obligation on governments to keep abreast of technical progress and scientific knowledge, which was particularly important for a country like Canada which is one of the main producers of asbestos. It also requested the Government to continue to provide all relevant information to the Committee of Experts for its review, including statistical data on health protection measures and cases of occupational diseases caused by exposure to asbestos and invited the Government to engage in consultations with the employers and workers' organizations on the application of Articles 3(3), 4 and 10 of the Convention, in particular taking into account the evolution of scientific studies, knowledge and technology since the adoption of the Convention, as well as the findings of the World Health Organization (WHO), the ILO and other recognized organizations concerning the dangers of exposure to asbestos.

Legislative measures and other measures undertaken. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government regarding legislative developments in British Columbia and Ontario. According to this information in British Columbia Schedule B of the Workers Compensation Act has been modified to provide for presumptions in favour of workers who have primary-site lung cancer where there is airborne exposure to asbestos dust associated with bilateral diffuse pleural thickening over 2 mm thick and who have been exposed to airborne asbestos dust for a period of ten years or more of employment in one or more of the following industries: asbestos mining, insulation or filter material production, construction (where there is disturbance of asbestos-containing materials), plumbing or electrical work, pulp mill work, shipyard work, and long shoring. It notes further that Ontario Regulation 833 Respecting Control of Exposure to Biological or Chemical Agents under the Occupational Health and Safety Act has been amended to provide for an exposure limit to all forms of occupational exposure to asbestos of 0.1 f/cc and that firefighters and fire investigators are also subject to the exposure limits prescribed for asbestos.

Article 3(1–2) of the Convention. Measures to be taken for the prevention and control of health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos and periodical review in the light of technical progress and scientific knowledge. Article 4. Consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. Article 10. Replacement of asbestos and total or partial prohibition of the use of asbestos. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government regarding measures taken to prevent and control health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos in Alberta, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Labrador, Manitoba, Ontario and Saskatchewan.

The Committee further notes that the Government states that, in conducting reviews and updating laws and regulations related to workplace asbestos exposure, provincial governments rely on available scientific data and technical knowledge including the most up-to-date information from the American Conference of Government Industrial Hygienists and from other scientific sources which may be cited by participating worker and employer representatives and technical experts and that in all Canadian jurisdictions, reviews of occupational safety and health laws and regulations are undertaken in consultation with representatives of workers and employers, in full compliance with Article 4 of the Convention. The Government refers to the current federal review of Part X of the Canada Occupational Health and Safety Regulations on Hazardous Substances being conducted by a tripartite working group, which includes representatives of the CLC. The federal Workplace Hazardous Materials Information (WHMIS), implemented in 1988, was developed by a tripartite steering committee with membership representing the federal and all the provincial and territorial governments, industry and labour. New Brunswick has established a Technical (Stakeholder) Committee to review occupational hygiene issues including threshold limit values for asbestos and the regulation on a code of practice for working with material containing asbestos. Nova Scotia's occupational safety and health legislation and regulations are reviewed on a periodic basis by the Occupational Health and Safety Advisory Council which is made up of both employer and worker representatives and is mandated to advise the Minister. Similarly, Manitoba's legislation requires a review of legislation every five years by a Tripartite Advisory Council. Under Saskatchewan's legislation, the Occupational Health and Safety Council reviews the act and regulations at least once every five years, including Part XXIII of the regulations which establish the requirements for the use, inspection, handling, disposal and training of employees in the handling of asbestos.

With specific reference to the application of Article 10(b) of the Convention, the Government states that the use of manufactured products containing asbestos in construction is very limited and is regulated by the Hazardous Products Act; that Schedule I of this Act and the Asbestos Products Regulations generally prohibit asbestos products that are destined for application by spraying, and prohibits the use of products containing crocidolite fibres and that similar provisions are also included in provincial and territorial legislation, as for example in section 37 of Manitoba's Workplace Safety and Health Regulation. The Government also indicates that Ontario encourages the substitution of hazardous substances with less hazardous ones where possible; that the Nova Scotia Building Code bans the use of any form of asbestos that could enter ventilation systems; and that section 41 of the Occupational Safety and Health Regulations in Quebec prohibits the use of crocidolite, amosite and any product containing either one of these substances unless their replacement is not reasonably and practically feasible.

The Committee notes that the CLC and the CSN consider that the state of current scientific and technical information point to a need for a total ban of asbestos and that the Government has not taken due account of this information. According to the CSN, the fact that the Convention does not provide for an outright ban on the use of asbestos is merely a reflection of the fact that it relies on scientific knowledge at the time and that this knowledge was not as developed in 1986 as it is now. In support for their positions regarding current scientific and technical information, the CLC and the CSN both refer to the conclusions of the Conference Committee and the cited authorities. The CSN also refers to research and studies carried out by the National Public Health Institute of Quebec (INSPQ) and that INSPQ considers that, based on current knowledge, there is no threshold level where workers exposed to asbestos can be protected from cancer. The CSN further indicates that based on two studies covering exposure to asbestos in the periods 1982–96 and 1988–2003, the INSPQ concluded in 2005 that chrysotile asbestos must be considered to be a carcinogen and that the safe use of asbestos is difficult, if not impossible, in sectors such as construction, renovation and transformation of asbestos. The CSN also refers to a statement published in 2009 by medical doctors, toxicologists, industrial hygienists and epidemiologists that the scientific evidence that chrysotile asbestos causes asbestosis and cancer deaths is now irrefutable and that this conclusion is supported by the International Agency for Research on Cancer (IARC). The CSN further cites a study by the Workplace Safety and Health Committee in Quebec of occupational diseases of workers above 45 years of age for the period 1999–2008 which concluded that the fatality rate had increased and the fatalities recorded were mostly related to exposure to asbestos as seven out of ten fatalities were attributable to asbestos. In support of the position that the Government has not taken due account of the ILO and the WHO positions, the CLC refers to a statement by the Government in the House of Commons in Canada that chrysotile can be used safely in a controlled environment. The CSN further affirms that a total of 11 research reports published by the INSPQ since 2003 contradict this official Canadian policy that asbestos can be used safely.

In response to these arguments, the Government refers to the extensive information it has provided in the current and previous reports demonstrating that all provincial governments have adopted and enforced laws and regulations that prescribe measures to be taken for the prevention and control of and the protection of workers against health hazards due to occupational exposure to asbestos. In response to the CSN comments regarding the situation in the Province of Quebec, the Government states that the most recent data provided by the Canadian Society of Safety Engineering indicates 90 fatalities caused by exposure to asbestos (mesotheliomas asbestosis and cancers) were recorded in 2010 and that in 94 per cent of these cases, exposure had been initiated prior to 1980. Among the 20 workers who had died from cancer, 14 had a cumulative exposure time of 20 years and 18 of them had been exposed before 1980, whereas the exposure in the remaining two cases were initiated in 1982 and 1983 respectively. The Government emphasizes that all these cases predate the awareness of the dangers related to exposure to asbestos which subsequently led to the development of national programmes for the control and monitoring of exposure to asbestos, including in Quebec, as well as, at the international level, the development and adoption of this Convention in 1986. The Government also maintains that relevant laws and regulations in Quebec including section 3.23.3 of the Act on Security in Construction (c. S-2.1, r.6) and section 41 of Occupational Safety and Health Regulations are in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention as they provide that the use of crocidolite, amosite or any products containing either one of these substances is prohibited unless their replacement is not reasonable and practicable. The Government also underscores that, according to section 12 of the Occupational Safety and Health Regulations, the employer has an obligation to ensure that a reduced minimum level of exposure to asbestos for workers applies even when the prescribed threshold limit values are applied.

In their submissions, the CSN and CLC both express their view that Canada should follow up on the recommendation by the Conference Committee to engage in consultations with representative organizations of employers and workers on a review of national legislation regarding exposure to asbestos and that, in this context, account should be taken of the evolution of scientific studies, knowledge and technology since the adoption of the Convention. They also maintain that, in this context, account should be taken of the findings of the WHO, the IARC and the International Programme on Chemical Safety, the ILO and the United Nations Development Programme which should lead to a ban on the use of asbestos and to the implementation of a transitional programme including retraining for workers in this industry. The CLC adds that such consultations should be included in the periodical review of laws and regulations which is called for in Article 3(2) of the Convention.

As regards the tripartite consultations held in application of Article 4 of the Convention, the Government affirms its strong commitment to tripartite consultation and involvement of the social partners in all aspects of occupational safety and health. The Government underscores that Article 4 requires that “the competent authority” shall consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of this Convention and that, accordingly, in all jurisdictions in Canada, reviews of occupational safety and health laws are undertaken with representatives of workers and employers. The Government also indicates that, in the province of Quebec, the Government has recently benefited from an exchange of views with the relevant stakeholders including the local authorities in the context of the reopening of the Jeffery Mine, in Asbestos, and that most trade unions, the largest of which in Quebec is affiliated with the CLC, supported the reopening of the mine, while reiterating their commitment to the safe use of chrysotile asbestos.

In light of the comments of the CLC and of the CSN, and the Government’s response, taking into account that Canada is one of the main producers of asbestos and that Canada is required to adopt the strictest standards limits for the protection of workers’ health regarding exposure to asbestos, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide further information on consultations held with the most representative organizations of employers and workers pursuant to Article 4 of the Convention on measures taken to give effect to the Convention, in particular regarding the provisions in Articles 3(2) and 10, taking into account the evolution of scientific studies, knowledge and technology since the adoption of the Convention, as well as the findings of the WHO, the ILO and other recognized organizations concerning the dangers of exposure to asbestos.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Central African Republic

White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921 (No. 13) (ratification: 1960)

With reference to its previous comments, the Committee yet again regrets to note that the Government reiterates, as it has done since 1992, that no statistics are available on morbidity and mortality resulting from lead poisoning among working painters. With reference to its comments in relation to the application by the Government of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), this year, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee welcomes the information regarding the newly adopted Labour Code Law No. 09.004 of 29 January 2009 including the reference made to its section 300 which provides, inter alia, that the Ministry of Labour together with the Ministry of Health shall adopt regulations concerning occupational safety and health in consultation with the National Council for the Prevention of Occupational Hazards. The Committee notes that this provision paves the way for the adoption of the legislation required for implementation of the provisions of the present Convention. The report is silent, however, as to whether any such regulations have been or are being prepared. With reference to the request for information on the practical application of the Convention, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates that the Ministry of Labour does not currently have at its disposal reliable statistics in this field.

Against this background, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Introduction into national legislation of the standards set forth in ratified Conventions. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the need to adopt measures in laws and regulations to give effect to the provisions contained in the Convention even if, as stated by the Government, under the Constitution of 4 January 1995, international agreements, treaties and Conventions that are duly ratified by the Republic have the force of national law.

The Committee recalls that the incorporation into national legislation of the provisions of ratified Conventions, from the mere fact of their ratification, is not sufficient to give effect to them at the national level in all cases in which the provisions are not self-executing, that is where they require special measures for their application, which is the case, at least, for Part I of the Convention. Furthermore, special measures are also needed to establish penalties for non-observance of the standards set forth in the instrument, which is the case of Article 3(c) of the Convention.

The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to Article 1(1) of the Convention, in accordance with which each Member which ratifies the Convention undertakes to maintain in force, laws or regulations which ensure the application of the General Rules set forth in Parts II–IV of the Convention. In this respect, the Committee recalls that draft texts were prepared following the direct contacts which took place in 1978 and 1980 with the responsible government services. The Committee is bound to express the firm hope that the relevant texts will be adopted in the very near future.

The Committee recalls that, under this Article of the Convention, each Member which ratifies the Convention undertakes to communicate the latest statistical information indicating the number and classification of accidents in an enterprise or sector. The Committee once again hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to indicate the measures which have been taken to give effect to the Convention on this point and to supply the appropriate statistical information.

Article 6 of the Convention. Statistics of accidents. For a number of years, the Committee has been noting the absence, in the Government's reports, of statistical information relating to the number and classification of accidents occurring in the building sector. In its last report, the Government states that the Labour Department does not currently have at its disposal reliable statistics in this field.

With reference to its comments in relation to the application of the Government of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), this year, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future and provide detailed information in this respect.

The Committee notes with concern that the Government's report contains no new information regarding the comments that the Committee has been making for numerous years on the application of Articles 2(3) and (4), 10(1) and 11 of the Convention and that the announced revision of General Order No. 3758 of 25 November 1954 with a view to ensuring compliance with the provisions of the Convention has still not been adopted. The Committee reiterates that the International Labour Office is disposed to assist the Government in the preparation of the relevant texts. With reference to its comments in relation to the application of the Government of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), this year, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

The Committee notes that the Government does not attach the requested legislative texts to its most recent report, and notes with concern that the report contains no new information regarding the longstanding comments by the Committee on the application of the Convention. Against this background, the Committee is bound to repeat its previous comment which read as follows:

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 009-004 of 29 January 2009 issuing the Labour Code, repealing Act No. 61-221 of 2 June 1961, certain provisions of which are relevant to the application of the Convention. The latter Act was made available to the Committee. The Committee also notes the reference made by the Government to Order No. 005/MFPESFP/CAB/SG/DGTEFP of 11 July 1994 establishing and regulating the operation of health and safety committees in the Central African Republic, and Order No. 008/MFPTSS/CAB/SG/DGTE/DESTRE of 26 June 1986 respecting general safety and health measures applicable in agricultural, forestry, industrial and commercial enterprises, as well as in similar public and para-public enterprises. The two Orders have not been made available to the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the two Orders referred to above with its next report, as well as of any other relevant legislative texts adopted or envisaged under the new Act issuing the Labour Code so as to enable it to examine the manner in which effect is given to the provisions of the Convention, with particular reference to Articles 5, 6(1) and 19. The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the following points.

Article 10 of the Convention. Temperature of workplaces. Article 16. Information on provisions ensuring that underground or windowless premises comply with appropriate standards of hygiene. Article 18. Protection against vibrations. The Committee notes that the Government refers briefly to General Order No. 3758 of 25 November 1954 respecting general safety and health measures applicable in agricultural, forestry, industrial and commercial enterprises and similar administrative establishments in French Equatorial Africa (AEF). However, the Committee observes that no precise reference is made to the relevant provisions of the Order which give effect to these provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide additional information on the relevant provisions of the Order which give effect to Articles 10, 16 and 18 of the Convention.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied in the Central African Republic, including, for example, extracts from the reports of the inspection services and, where available, information concerning the number and nature of the contraventions reported and the measures taken as a consequence, etc.

With reference to its comments in relation to the application by the Government of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), this year, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Legislation. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the new Labour Code Law No. 09.004 of 29 January 2009 including Section 300 which provides, inter alia, that the Ministry of Labour together with the Ministry of Health shall adopt regulations concerning occupational safety and health in consultation with the National Council for the Prevention of Occupational Hazards. The Committee notes that this provision paves the way for the adoption of the legislation required for implementation of the provisions of the present Convention. The report is silent, however, as to whether any such regulations have been or are being prepared. With reference to its previous comments the Committee notes it had requested the Government to submit copies of the following legislation: Decree No. 05.006 of 12 January 2005 concerning the organization and operation of the Ministry of the Public Service, Labour, Social Security and the Vocational Integration of Young Persons and establishing the responsibilities of the Minister, Decree No. 005/MFPSSFP/CAB/SG/DGTEFP of 11 July 1994 concerning the establishment and operation of safety and health committees in the Central African Republic, Decree No. 008/MFPTSS/CAB/SG/DGTE/DESTRE of 26 June 1986 concerning the general safety and health measures applicable in agricultural, forestry, industrial and commercial enterprises as well as in similar public and para-public enterprises and General Order No. 3758 of 25 November 1954 on the general health and safety measures applicable in agricultural, forestry, industrial and commercial enterprises as well as in similar administrative establishments in French Equatorial Africa, as well as all other relevant legislative texts. It notes that the Government's report does not contain copies of the referenced legislation as requested. In order to enable the Committee to be able to examine how effect is given to the provisions of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide copies of the abovementioned texts with its next report.

The Committee also notes that the report submitted in 2011 is identical to the reports submitted in 2008 and that it contains no new information in response to the comments by the Committee. The Committee is therefore forced to repeat its previous comments which read as follows:

Articles 4, 7 and 8 of the Convention. Obligation to formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy on occupational safety, occupational health and the working environment. The Committee notes the information that the newly created Department of Occupational Medicine is in the process of formulating a coherent national policy on occupational safety, occupational health and the working environment based on the country's needs, while taking into account the country's economic situation and development. The Committee recalls that this work is to be carried out in close association with the country's most representative employers' and workers' organizations, and that these organizations shall also be involved in the process of periodically reviewing this policy in the light of the progress made, changes in society and technological developments. Furthermore, the Committee invites the Government to ensure that the policy is coherent and that it aims to prevent accidents and injury to health arising out of, linked with or occurring in the course of work. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress made with regard to the formulation, implementation and periodic review of the national policy in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention.

Articles 13 and 19(f). Right to removal. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that there are no legislative provisions ensuring the protection provided for by these Articles. The Committee wishes to point out that Articles 13 and 19(f) are complementary provisions and both refer to situations in which an individual worker decides to remove themselves from work situations which they have reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to their life or health. The Committee requests the Government to indicate measures taken or envisaged to ensure that no worker will suffer undue consequences as a result of such action, in accordance with Article 13, and to indicate the arrangements which have been made to ensure that an employer cannot require the worker to return to a work situation where there is continuing imminent and serious danger to life or health, as provided for by Article 19(f).

Article 14. Measures for the inclusion of questions of occupational safety and health at all levels of education and training. The Committee notes the information that the measures provided for by this Article come within the remit of the Department of Occupational Medicine in accordance with the provisions of the abovementioned Decree No. 05.006 of 12 January 2005. The Committee requests the Government to inform it of the manner in which effect is given to this provision, in particular, the measures taken to promote in a manner appropriate to national conditions and practice, the inclusion of questions of occupational safety and health and the working environment at all levels of education and training, including higher technical, medical and professional education, in a manner meeting the training needs of all workers.

Article 15. Measures to ensure coordination between various authorities and bodies. The Committee notes the Government's indications that the obligations provided for by this Article have been assigned to the Department of Occupational Medicine under the provisions of Decree No. 05.006 of 12 January 2005. It requests the Government to indicate what institutions and institutional structures are available to ensure the necessary coordination between the competent national authorities and the bodies responsible for giving effect to the Convention and also to indicate the stage at which the most representative employers' and workers' organizations are consulted.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice and labour inspection. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied in the country and attach extracts from inspection reports and, where such exists, information on the number of workers covered by the legislation, the number and nature of the contraventions reported, the number, nature and causes of the accidents reported etc.

Plan of Action (2010–16). Against this background the Committee would like to take this opportunity to inform the Government that, in March 2010, the Governing Body adopted a Plan of Action (2010–16) to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key instruments in the area of OSH, the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its 2002 Protocol and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (Doc. GB307/10/2 (Rev.)). The Committee would like to bring to the Government's attention that under this Plan of Action, the Office is available to provide assistance to Governments, as appropriate, to bring their national law and practice in conformity with these key OSH Conventions in order to promote their ratification and effective implementation. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on any needs it may have in this respect as well as in relation to the application of other instruments on occupational safety and health also adopted by the Government such as the White Lead (Painting) Convention, 1921, (No. 13), the Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62), the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119), and the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120).

China

Macau Special Administrative Region

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115) (notification: 1999)

Article 7(2) of the Convention. Prohibition to engage workers under 16 years of age in work involving ionizing radiation. The Committee notes with satisfaction the information provided in the Government's report regarding the adoption of the List of Work Forbidden to Minors (Chief Executive Dispatch No. 344/2008) giving effect to Article 7(2) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Colombia

The Committee notes the communication from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT) sent by the Government on 19 September 2011, indicating that section 242 of the Labour Code prohibits the employment of young persons under 18 years of age and women in painting work of an industrial character involving the use of white lead, sulphate of lead or other products containing these pigments. The CGT calls on the Government and Parliament to prohibit the use of white lead for all persons on the basis of the principle of equality. However, the Committee indicates that this request, which can be examined at national level, is outside the scope of the present Convention.

Communication from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC). In its comments of 2010, the Committee noted the abovementioned communication and indicated that it would deal with it in 2011. The Committee notes that the Government has not made any comments in this respect. The communication refers to the following issues.

Article 1 of the Convention. Prohibition on the use of white lead, sulphate of lead and all other products containing these pigments, in the internal painting of buildings. The Committee indicates that, under the provisions of article 53 of the National Constitution, the international labour Conventions ratified by Colombia have the force of national law. It indicates that, apart from the above and the regulations concerning young persons and women, and also the definition of lead poisoning as an occupational disease, there are no other regulations in Colombia which govern the use of prohibited substances. Moreover, the low level of unionization and the control of occupational health committees by the employers, and the lack of guarantees from the labour inspectorate, means that it is extremely difficult to verify the effects of harmful substances.

Article 2(2). Obligation to define the limits of various forms of painting, and to regulate the use of white lead, sulphate of lead or other products containing these pigments. The trade union federations state that the regulation of these standards is practically unknown by the workers, that there are no coordinated legal provisions, and that the employers do not provide information on the content of the materials used.

Article 5(1) and (2). Obligation to regulate the use of white lead, sulphate of lead and all products containing these pigments, in operations for which their use is not prohibited, on the principles set forth in the abovementioned paragraphs. The CUT and the CTC state that there are no special regulations, that the vast majority of workers engaged in painting work of an industrial character are in the informal sector or work in small enterprises or craft workshops which are not subject to any legal controls. The union indicates that the risks in this kind of painting work are high but they are not apparent because of the low level of registration in the social security system.

Article 5(3) and (4). Notification of cases of lead poisoning and of suspected lead poisoning. Medical examination. Instructions. The trade union federations state that there are no reliable statistics, there is no monitoring by the competent authorities, and the labour inspectorate and the health authorities are not functioning. They add that there are no awareness-raising activities in this respect.

Article 6. Adoption of measures that give effect to the regulations prescribed in the previous Articles, after consultation with the employers' and workers' organizations concerned. The CUT and the CTC indicate that the consultation provided for in this Article does not take place, since the regulation referred to by the previous Articles do not exist.

Article 7. Statistics The communication indicates that there are no tables of statistics in the painting industry concerning workers suffering from lead poisoning. The union refers to a 1996 study which indicates, among other things, that there has been insufficient evaluation of the real magnitude of the health problems resulting from occupational exposure to lead in the informal sector. It states that lead poisoning affects 35 per cent of workers employed in battery factories, and 14 per cent of workers employed in smelting, printing and ceramics.

The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that Articles 1, 2 and 5 of the Convention require the adoption of legislative measures and requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which effect is given in law and in practice to these Articles of the Convention, including the statistical information referred to in Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government to send any comments that it considers relevant in reply to the observations made by the CUT and the CTC.

The Committee notes the Government's report in reply to its observation of 2010, in which it referred to a communication of the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC). It also notes two new communications, one from the CUT and the CTC and the other from the General Confederation of Workers (CGT), containing comments on the Government's report, which were forwarded to the Government on 19 September 2011.

Article 2 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodical review of a coherent national policy on occupational health services. Article 4. Consultation of the most representative organizations of employers and workers on the measures to be taken to give effect to the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's indications concerning the national occupational safety and health policy, and it pointed out to the Government that the national policy referred to in the present Convention is the national policy on occupational health services, as defined in Article 1 of the Convention, namely services entrusted with essentially preventive functions and which are responsible for advising the employer, the workers and their representatives in the enterprise of the requirements for establishing and maintaining a safe and healthy working environment and the adaptation of work to the capabilities of workers. The Committee requested the Government to provide further information on the content of its national health services policy and to indicate whether the policy was formulated, implemented and reviewed in consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes that the report does not contain specific information on the policy on occupational health services. The Government indicates that there exist in the country forums for the participation of workers and employers, such as the National Council on Occupational Risks, the National Occupational Health Committee and commissions in various sectors. It further notes that, according to the report, the issue of the coherent national policy on occupational health services will be raised in the National Council for Occupational Risks, and the necessity will be reviewed of adopting a specific policy on health services. The CUT and the CTC indicate that the report contains a good proposal, but no tangible measures to identify and prevent the high rate of accidents, especially in activities such as mining, which involve exposure to chemicals and other high-risk products. They add that the Government does not indicate or specify in its report the measures that have to be adopted. They emphasize that there is no dialogue with the various social actors. The Committee reminds the Government that the requirement of a national policy on health services is a fundamental element of the application of the Convention, and that this involves, in the first place, the formulation of the policy, the monitoring of its implementation and, based on the results achieved, the review of the policy at appropriate intervals, all of which is to be undertaken in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. The Committee therefore requests the Government to: (1) indicate whether the most representative organizations of employers and workers are represented on the National Council on Occupational Risks, the National Occupational Health Committee and other bodies that are operational; (2) indicate the forum for consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers; and (3) indicate the consultations held on the formulation, implementation and review of the national policy and the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of this Convention, and on the outcome of such consultations.

Article 3. Progressive development of health services for all workers. The Committee notes that, according to the report, in over 50 per cent of workplaces evaluated, occupational safety activities are carried out and that it is hoped that this figure will increase with the implementation of the Quality Control System of the General Occupational Risks System. The Committee notes that the Government bases the establishment of occupational health services on Resolution No. 1016 of 1989, which regulates the organization, operation and structure of the occupational health programmes that are to be developed by employers in the country and by the administrators of the General System of Occupational Risks (ARP). The Committee notes that, according to the CUT and CTC, Resolution No. 1016 of 1989 is not a solution, and that it demonstrates the withdrawal of the State, which transfers to employers the responsibility for allocating the indispensable physical and financial resources for the development and implementation of occupational health programmes. They add that, although legislation exists in Colombia, it is not precise and does not determine clearly the parameters established by the legislation governing occupational health services. They add that the will is lacking for the implementation of the Convention, under state responsibility and direction, and that the system that prevails in the country is not based on prevention as, when a worker is already ill, the ARP, which have been privatized since 1993, begin to provide services, but do not play a preventive role. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that its information on occupational health activities is more general than occupational health services. The latter are defined in Article 1 and are entrusted with the functions set out in Article 5(a)–(k) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate clearly the manner in which occupational health services, as defined by the Convention and the Occupational Health Services Recommendation, 1985 (No. 171), are structured, and the manner in which the State ensures that such services exist and operate in accordance with the requirements of the Convention. Please indicate the sectors in which occupational health services are operational and the plans for their progressive development in other sectors.

Article 5. Occupational health services that are adequate and appropriate to the occupational risks of the enterprise. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate clearly the services in the country which discharge the functions set out in Article 5, and to provide detailed information on the manner in which effect is given in law and practice to each of the clauses of this Article. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on each of the functions set out in this Article, and that the information supplied is of a general nature. The Government refers to Resolution No. 1016 and explains its view that a service involves structure, results and processes and that occupational health programmes are equivalent to occupational health services. The Committee considers that, although programmes may provide the basis for health services, it is necessary to ascertain whether such programmes discharge the functions set out in each of the clauses of the present Article, which are all distinct functions. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide comprehensive information on the effect given in law and practice to the functions set out in Article 5(a)–(k) of the Convention.

Article 5(a). Identification and assessment of risks. Clause (b). Surveillance of the factors in the working environment and working practices. Clause (c). Advice on the planning and organization of work, including the design of workplaces. The Committee recalls its previous comments relating to the alleged lack of prevention in mines and the deaths that have occurred, among others, in the San Fernando coal mine, where 73 workers died, the Government has reported that, in view of the fact that the mining sector has become one of the most important economic activities, the structure and functions of the Colombian Institute of Geology and Mining (INGEOMINAS) are being reviewed with a view to strengthening inspection, supervision and control of occupational health standards in the sector. The Government indicates that communication campaigns have been strengthened to promote a culture of self-awareness by miners, and various direct interventions have been undertaken in mines. The Committee notes the newspaper articles supplied by the CGT containing information in a project to reduce deaths in coalmines and its indication that the project is based on the approach that accidents in coalmines are due to the lack of safety technology, the lack of training for owners and workers, and unlawful activities, and that the aim is to reduce by half the number of accidents by 2014. The article also indicates that in 2010 there were 173 deaths resulting from employment accidents in this sector. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the total number of workers in the mines in the country, and the number of workers in mines who in practice benefit from the functions indicated in clauses (a), (b) and (c) of this Article of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on the plans for the establishment of health services in all mines, including those that are not registered, as is the case of the Sinifaná basin, to which it referred in its last comment.

Part VI of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that, according to the communications of the CUT and the CTC, statistics are not updated by the Government, which is an obstacle to prevention and to the implementation, control and effectiveness of safety standards. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report in reply to its 2010 observation, in which it referred to a communication from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC), and the pending matters in reply to its direct request of 2005. It further notes a new communication from the CUT and the CTC of 2011, containing comments on the Government's report, which were forwarded to the Government on 19 September 2011. In their communication of 2011, the CUT and the CTC indicate, among other matters, that the comments made in their 2010 communication continue to be fully relevant, as the Government has not adopted a real practice of the prevention of occupational risks or of occupational safety and health.

Background. The communication of the CUT and the CTC alleges that: public policies have not been established at the national level by the Government for the control and management of asbestos; there is no appropriate legislation, or the will to develop it; technical standards are not implemented; there are no measures promoted by the Government to eliminate the risk and the Government does not have the capacity to control it; the Government has transferred all the occupational safety and health obligations to the employer; precarious measures are set out in internal work rules and in occupational health committees, which are not applied in practice; and there is no national training programme on the handling and use of asbestos. They also assert that there is no dialogue, and that there is a need for real and effective dialogue with the various social partners. They conclude that measures consisting of the establishment of a threshold are not viable, particularly in the construction and mining sectors, for which reason they consider that it is necessary to adopt a public policy of the total prohibition of asbestos. In this respect, they assert that the Government disregards Article 10 of the Convention. The CUT and the CTC add that over 10,000 tonnes of asbestos a year are extracted from the mine located in the department of Antioquia, which is absolutely hazardous for the miners, as the mining is carried out using artisanal techniques, without technology. They add that during the first half of 2007 in the fibre-cement sector, 30,403 tonnes of asbestos were imported. The Committee examines below the points raised, together with the Government's detailed report in reply to its previous comments.

Article 3. National laws and regulations and measures for the prevention and control of, and protection of workers against, health hazards. Background. The Committee notes the indication in the communication of the CUT and the CTC that the Government of Colombia considers the present Convention to be an international instrument which is permissive in its objective, and that there is no appropriate legislation and technical standards are not implemented. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, all of the legislation respecting occupational health and employment risks is compulsory for all branches of activity, and that the Government refers in particular to Decree No. 1295 of 1994 determining the organization and administration of the General Employment Risks System, and Resolution No. 1016 of 1989 regulating the organization, operation and form of the Occupational Health Programmes that have to be implemented by employers in the country. It also notes that in 2010 the Government provided information on draft Regulations respecting health and safety in respect of chrysotile and other fibres, and in 2011 it provided a copy of the draft text and indicated that it was in the process of adoption. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the legislative measures adopted to give effect to certain Articles of the Convention referred to below.

- Articles 9 (adequate technical prevention measures or special rules), 13 (notification to the competent authority by employers) and 14 (responsibility of producers, suppliers and manufacturers for labelling). The Committee notes the Government's indication that effect will be given to these Articles in the draft Regulations, and that information is not provided on the effect given to these Articles at present.
- Article 11. Prohibition of crocidolite and products containing this fibre. The Committee notes the Government's indication that crocidolite has not been used since 1985. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Decree ratifying the Convention in itself constitutes a prohibition of crocidolite and the indication that it will be explicitly prohibited in the draft Regulations.
- Article 12. Prohibition of the spraying of all forms of asbestos. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in Colombia pulverized forms and asbestos applications in sprays are not used, together with the indication that they will be explicitly prohibited in the draft Regulations.

The Committee notes with concern that up to now very limited legislative effect has been given to the above provisions, although it notes that the adoption of draft Regulations giving expression to the provisions of the present Convention could constitute significant progress in the application of the Convention. The Committee wishes to emphasize that it is essential to give legislative effect to the provisions of the Convention with a view to providing employers and workers with a legislative framework that is in conformity with the Convention so that prevention and protection measures and the exercise of the rights and duties of employers and workers are in conformity with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure the rapid adoption of legislation giving effect to the provisions of the Convention, including the adoption of the pending draft legislative texts, and the preparation of new legislation where necessary, and requests it to provide information in this respect. Referring to the comments of the CUT and the CTC that effect is not given or required to technical standards, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the compulsory nature of the technical standards respecting asbestos.

Article 4. Consultation of the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the National Commission on Occupational Health in the Asbestos Sector was established in 2001 by Resolution No. 00935 of 2001, and that in 2008 the Commission was modified by Resolution No. 1458, with its title being changed to the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres. The Government indicates that the Commission has been implementing its programme of meetings and activities. In 2011, the CUT and CTC indicated that the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres examined a number of documents which have not yet received the approval of the Ministry of Social Protection. They add that there is no real and effective dialogue and refer to other consultation forums which they consider more appropriate. The Committee also notes that section 3 of the Resolution of 2008, referred to above, in subsection 7, includes in the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres a delegate of the trade unions or workers' representative, and a delegate of each of the fibre-cement enterprises, while subsection 9 includes a delegate of the trade unions or workers' representative, and of each of the enterprises in the friction materials sector. While noting that the Government holds consultations in the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres, the Committee also notes the call made by the CUT and the CTC for real and effective dialogue, and further notes that the CUT and the CTC do not appear to be represented on the above Commission. The Committee hopes that the Government will make efforts to include in consultations other organizations which meet the criterion of the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the present Convention (Article 3) and that it will provide information on the outcome of these consultations.

Article 10 (replacement of asbestos by other materials or the prohibition of the use of asbestos) in conjunction with Article 3(2) (periodic review of national laws and regulations in the light of technical progress and advances in scientific knowledge) and with Article 4 (consultation of the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned). In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the communication of the CUT and the CTC, the Government disregards Article 10, which provides that where necessary to protect the health of workers and technically practicable (and they emphasize that this is not done in Colombia) national laws and regulations shall provide for one or more of the following measures: (a) replacement; and (b) total or partial prohibition. They add that various international and scientific organizations, including the WHO, have indicated that there is no substantial evidence of a threshold for exposure to asbestos below which cancer is not caused. The Committee further noted that the CUT and the CTC indicated that the Colombian trade union confederations are in agreement that the use of asbestos needs to be prohibited and its replacement promoted. They refer to Resolution No. 001 of 14 December 2006 of the Confederation of Workers of Colombia in this respect and assert that the Convention needs to be applied in domestic legislation and that the use of asbestos should not be allowed. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, based on reference works from the various international organizations, it has recognized on various occasions that the fibres that are being used as possible replacements have not yet been considered less harmful, and that accordingly they do not merit sufficient confidence for it to support the total prohibition of all asbestos fibres. The Government attaches a paper by the Fibre Producers Association of Colombia (ASCOLFIBRAS), which supports the Government's statement. The Committee recalls that all legislative measures should be the subject of consultation and periodically reviewed in the light of technical progress and advances in scientific knowledge, in accordance with Article 3(2) of the Convention, and that accordingly Article 10 has to be viewed in the light of Article 3(2) and be the subject of consultations, as set out in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government, in accordance with Article 3(2), and within the framework of consultations with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, as required by Article 4, to examine the possibility of replacement/prohibition as set out in Article 10 of the Convention and to provide information on this subject.

Other measures

Article 15(2). The fixing, periodical review and updating of exposure limits or other exposure criteria in the light of technological progress and advances in technological and scientific knowledge. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, Resolution No. 2400 of 1979 of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security adopted as permissible limits the threshold limit values (TLVs) approved by the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists (ACGIH). The Government indicates that for 2011 the TLV for chrysotile in workplaces is 0.1 fibres per cubic centimetre of air. The Committee notes that section 154 of the above Decree refers to harmful or hazardous substances and indicates that the values shall be established by the ACGIH or by the Ministry of Health. As this section is of a general nature, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the text which establishes the limit value for asbestos and the manner in which it is ensured that enterprises and workers are aware of this limit value and that it is respected.

Article 17. Demolition work. Authorization for demolition work and elimination to be undertaken only by employers or contractors who are recognized by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the CUT and the CTC, in 2007 the fibre-cement sector imported 30,403 tonnes of asbestos. Although the sector has adopted certain measures, according to the trade union confederations the Government does not control the measures adopted to eliminate the risk and does not have the capacity to do so. They add that, in the construction sector, asbestos and its handling have serious consequences, that workers are exposed to asbestos when working in demolition and using insulation boards, paint primers, asbestos cables, asbestos textiles, packaging, reinforced plastic, roofs, tiles and pipes, for example, and that most of these products are manufactured using chrysotile and crocidolite or amosite. The Committee notes the Government's indication that asbestos has not been used in Colombia in the construction of buildings, except for the content of fibre-cement tiles and storage tanks for drinking water, for which reason it is not considered a risk to the health of workers in enterprises engaged in the demolition of buildings, or for the public. The Government adds that the Ministry of the Environment, Housing and Territorial Development issued regulations on water and air pollution caused by asbestos, exposure to asbestos in the repair and demolition of buildings and the elimination of waste containing asbestos, in Decree No. 4741 of 2005. The Government also refers to paragraph 4.5 of the Technical Annex to the draft Regulations, which will cover demolition. The Committee further notes that the paper by ASCOLFIBRAS provided by the Government indicates that fibre-cement is the generic name to identify products manufactured using fibres and a bonding product, such as cement, and that more specifically in fibre-cement products using chrysotile, fibres account for a minimum percentage of the product (between 7 and 10 per cent). It adds that there is no information that activities such as the use of insulation boards, paint primers, insulation tubes and asbestos cables are prevalent in construction in Colombia. The Committee reminds the Government that this Article of the Convention refers to demolition work, which is an activity which liberates asbestos into the air, and that in other periods the percentage of asbestos used in construction may have been greater than that indicated, and that it is during demolition activities that special prevention and protection measures are required. Accordingly, and even though asbestos may only be used in tiles and roofing, and although fibre-cement contains between 7 and 10 per cent of asbestos, the Committee emphasizes that these activities are covered by this Article of the Convention and it therefore urges the Government to give effect to this Article in law and practice, and to provide information on this subject. Please also provide information on the allegations of the CUT and the CTC concerning the use of crocidolite, despite the indication by the Government that this product is prohibited.

Prevention, vigilance and monitoring of the working environment (Article 20). Monitoring of the working environment and the exposure of workers to asbestos, in conjunction with Article 9. Laws or regulations providing that exposure to asbestos shall be prevented or controlled by one or more specific measures. The Committee notes that, according to the CUT and the CTC, there is no determination of the occupational risks related to asbestos in Colombia and measures are not adopted for healthy practices and protection against risks for any workers in relation to asbestos, white lead or any activities in general. The trade union confederations indicate that the Government has not established public policies at the national level for the control and handling of asbestos and they refer to the measures reportedly adopted by certain enterprises through their internal rules, which are only applicable to them. They add that the fibre-cement sector claims to have adopted certain occupational policies in order to claim the safe handling of asbestos in factories, based on precarious measures set out in internal work rules or occupational health committees, which are not normally operational. They assert that the Government has not adapted the legislation with a view to guaranteeing the safety of workers and indicate that there is no control to eliminate the risk and that there is a lack of capacity at the level of the Government. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the legislative effect given to Article 9 of the Convention, with reference to the draft Regulations. With regard to Article 20, it notes the Government's indication that the comprehensive evidence-based guide (GATISO) for pneumoconiosis, in point 5.12, provides guidance for environmental monitoring for aerosols, solids, silica, asbestos and coal. It adds that the workers' representatives on the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres have indicated that the provisions respecting employment risks and occupational health are complied with and that at the time that the report was drafted no complaints had been made concerning failure to comply with the provisions for the control of the risks caused by exposure to asbestos. Moreover, the representatives of the occupational risk management agencies (ARPs) to which enterprises which work with chrysotile are affiliated have indicated that their affiliated enterprises comply with the obligation to control the risks inherent in the use of chrysotile. Furthermore, the function of supervising the controls carried out by their affiliated enterprises is delegated by the State to occupational risk management agencies. In conclusion, the Government indicates in its report that mechanisms have been established to control the risks arising out of work, particularly in relation to the Convention, and it adds that the numbers of labour inspectors have increased and their profile has changed. It further indicates that the Occupational Risks Directorate of the Ministry of Social Protection is developing a public policy to control occupational cancer, based on which the comprehensive evidence-based guide was prepared for pneumoconiosis (silicosis, pneumoconiosis in coal mines and asbestosis) in 2007; the comprehensive occupational health guide for employment-related lung cancer (GATISO-CAP) in 2008; the National Plan for the Prevention of Occupational Cancer in Colombia in 2009; and the National Plan for the Prevention of Silicosis, Pneumoconiosis in Coal Mines and Asbestosis. The Committee notes the indication in the paper prepared by ASCOLFIBRAS, which was attached by the Government, that the fibre-cement and friction materials enterprises represented by the Association comply with national and international standards and are certified under NTC-ISO Standard 14001 (Environmental management) and NTC-OSHAS 18001 (Occupational health and safety management). The Committee reminds the Government that the exposure prevention or control measures referred to by Article 9 of the Convention have to be adopted through the laws or regulations indicated in Article 3, as Article 9 establishes the responsibility of employers in relation to various matters, such as the records referred to in Article 20(2) and (3), which also have to be regulated by legislation. On the one hand, the Committee notes the activities undertaken by employers and by the ARPs, although on the other it notes that these activities in relation specifically to asbestos are based on guides and certification standards which are apparently not of a binding nature. The Committee recalls that these Articles of the Convention refer to specific matters which have to be regulated by the Government, in order to establish a clear framework for employers, ARPs and workers in relation to the prevention and control measures that are required. The Committee therefore requests the Government to adopt the necessary measures to give legislative effect to these Articles of the Convention and to provide information on this subject.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes the information provided by the CUT concerning a study of occupational diseases caused by asbestos, and the Government's reply indicating that the study was undertaken almost 30 years ago. The Government acknowledges the need to update research in order to know the real impact of the pathologies associated with exposure to asbestos in Colombia and indicates that the National Commission on Occupational Safety in relation to Chrysotile Asbestos and Other Fibres has contacted the University of Bosque and that the Government is willing to support this type of research. It also notes the Government's statement that one of its priorities is the implementation of the occupational risk information system envisaged in the National Plan for Occupational Health 2008–12, and that the reports on occupational diseases for the period 2001–03 and 2003–05 did not indicate that occupational pathologies associated with exposure to asbestos are among the highest in terms of morbidity and mortality. The Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the studies referred to and detailed statistical information. Please also provide practical information on the activities carried out by the labour inspection services to supervise the application of the provisions of the Convention and on the penalties applied, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention.

In light of the above comments, and also taking into account the communication of the CUT and the CTC indicating that Colombia is an important producer and also importer of asbestos, the Committee urges the Government to ensure rapidly that full effect is given to the Convention in law and practice, in consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170) (ratification: 1994)

Legislation. The Committee notes that the Government has provided a copy of Decree No. 2923 of 12 August 2011 establishing the Quality Control System of the General Occupational Risks System, which in its introductory paragraphs indicates that indicators will have to be established and such indicators are necessary to assess and monitor the quality of occupational health services. Section 5 refers to a system of minimum standards, but does not specify them. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the impact of this Decree on the application of the present Convention.

The Committee also notes, that in a communication sent in 2011, the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) raise issues relating to Act No. 55 of 1993 and Legislative Decree No. 1295 of 1994, indicating, among other matters, that the Government does not assume its responsibility, but transfers it to others. They add that Decree No. 2150 of 1995 limits the special controls by the State to enterprises which use hazardous chemicals of a specific category, in accordance with the classification of economic activities set out in Decree No. 1295, and that the others are governed by Decision No. 1016. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the differences in the application of the Convention to enterprises which use hazardous chemicals of the different categories.

Article 1 of the Convention. Application of the Convention to all branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the CUT and the CTC, protection against risks only covers workers who are in a formal employment relationship. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reply that, in the case of the chemicals sector, workers who are not in a formal relationship are not quantified, but that the State provides training through its local agencies and that the present Government's Develop Plan is intended to reduce informality to rational proportions, as illustrated by Act No. 1429 of 2010 to promote formalization and first jobs, which was adopted recently. It adds that alternative projects are undertaken for the informal and vulnerable population, such as the Public Health Plan. The Committee notes that the health measures indicated by the Government are general in nature, but that the Convention applies to activities which require particular monitoring by the Government to ensure that enterprises in all branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used comply with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to make efforts to ensure the application of the Convention in all branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used and to continue providing information on this subject.

Article 4. Formulation, implementation and periodical review of a coherent policy on safety in the use of chemicals, in consultation with the social partners. Article 3. Requirement to consult the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned on the measures to be taken to give effect to the provisions of the Convention. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Social Protection, in the context of the Fifth Ibero-American Congress on Employment Risk Prevention: Prevention 2011, hosted the Fourth Meeting for the Prevention and Elimination of Silicosis. The Committee notes that this information does not reply to the question raised by the Committee concerning the effect given to Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee also notes that the CUT and the CTC, in their 2011 comments, reiterate their observations concerning the absence of social dialogue and propose the following, among other, measures: implementing a system of epidemiological monitoring of occupational cancer; articulating monitoring and control systems; increasing the commitments of the various sectors and socializing national plans for the prevention of pneumoconiosis and the control of occupational cancer. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with the most representative organizations of employers and workers concerned with regard to the national policy and the measures to be taken to give effect to the Convention, and the results achieved. It also requests the Government to indicate whether there are any tripartite sectoral commissions to follow-up the policy and the measures to give effect to the Convention.

Article 13. Obligation of employers to assess risks and protect workers by appropriate means. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indications by the CUT and the CTC that in order to eliminate chemical risks, alternative less toxic materials have to be used, ventilation must be improved, leaks monitored and protective clothing used. They indicate that there are no appropriate prevention plans, control measures are not adopted, appropriate alerts are not given and that the loss of life and cases of permanent incapacity resulting from the handling of certain chemicals are still frequent. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on this subject and on the manner in which the application of the above provisions of the Convention is ensured in practice. The Committee notes that the Government has only provided information of a general nature. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures that employers make an assessment of the risks and ensure the protection of workers by appropriate means. It requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to each of the paragraphs of this Article in law and practice in enterprises in the branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used.

Article 15. Obligation of employers to provide information and training. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the administrators of the General Occupational Risks System (ARPs) are required to invest at least 5 per cent of the income that they receive from contributions on occupational prevention programmes and the promotion of occupational health, and that in overall terms they invest no less than 15 per cent in such activities. The Committee notes the Government's reference to health and safety activities in general, but observes that in relation to this Article the Government is requested to provide information on the manner in which effect is given in law and practice to specific obligations, such as informing workers of the hazards associated with exposure to chemicals used in the enterprise, instructing workers on how to obtain and use the information provided on labels and chemical safety data sheets, among others. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to this Article in law and practice in enterprises in branches of economic activity in which chemicals are used.

Article 6. System for the classification of chemicals. Article 7. Requirement to label and mark chemicals. Article 8. Chemical safety data sheets for hazardous chemicals. Article 9. Responsibilities of suppliers. Articles 10 to 12. Responsibilities of employers in relation to the identification of chemicals, their transfer and the exposure of workers to chemicals. Articles 17 and 18. Rights of workers and their representatives, and duties of workers. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided the information requested in the last paragraph of its previous direct request, or has provided brief, incomplete or general information that does not refer to the Articles of the Convention, which does not enable the Committee to gain an idea of the effect given to these Articles of the Convention. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in detail the manner in which effect is given in law and in practice to the abovementioned Articles or, where appropriate, on the measures adopted or envisaged for that purpose. The Committee asks the Government, when the Articles include more than one paragraph, to provide clear indications of the effect given to each paragraph.

Article 4. Formulation, implementation and periodical review of a national policy on occupational safety and health. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the National Programme for the Protection of Health and Safety at Work for the period 2009–13 which defines policies in the area of occupational safety and health and the adoption of the State Inspectorate Act (OG 116/08 and 123/08). The Committee invites the Government to continue to provide information on any relevant legislative change; to provide further information on the outcome of periodical review of the national policy due in 2013; and to provide information on any decisions taken as regards the 2002 Protocol to the Convention.

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 1991)

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. National policy and plans to develop progressively occupational health services. The Committee notes with satisfaction the information that the Government has adopted a National Programme for the Protection of Health and Safety at Work for the period 2009–13 which defines policies in the area of occupational safety and health including specific policies concerning occupational health services. It notes that the strategic goals of the National Programme include: to design and implement policy instruments to protect the health of workers; to protect and promote health in the workplace; to improve the efficiency of and access to occupational health services; and to monitor the health of workers. The Committee also notes that pursuant thereto and relevant legislation the Croatian Institute for Occupational Safety and Health Insurance and the Croatian Institute for the Protection of Health and Safety at Work were founded and began operations on 1 January 2009. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progressive implementation of the national programme referenced above and the development of health services for workers in all economic sectors and to provide further details on the outcome of periodical review of the national policy due in 2013.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62) (ratification: 1960)

Following numerous requests the Committee welcomes the submission by the Government of a report on the application of this Convention, including a list of current legislation which according to the Government implements the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any legislative changes and provide the Office with a copy of the amending laws or regulations which will permit an assessment of the application of the provisions of the Convention.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes the information that the mission of the restructured labour inspectorate remained the same as previously, namely to monitor relevant regulations, to provide advice and to seek to resolve any conflicts occurring; and that there were no specific competencies attributed to the labour inspectorate in terms of inspections in the area of construction. With reference to its previous comment, the Committee asks the Government to provide more information on the manner in which technical standards applied in the building industry are monitored and enforced.

Article 6. Application in practice. The Committee notes with interest the 2010 report of the National Institute for Social Security and of the Inspector General for 2008–09 including detailed, albeit not comprehensive, statistical information, which reflects a noticeable development in the Government's efforts to improve its monitoring of the working conditions in the country. The Committee notes that the information provided does not fully enable the Committee to evaluate the trends in relation to occupational accidents and diseases in the area of construction. The Committee hopes the Government will be in a position to supply to the Office, with its next report, further and more complete statistical information on the number and classification of the accidents and diseases occurring, particularly to persons working in the sector covered by the Convention, and as detailed information as possible on the number of persons engaged in the building industry and covered by the statistics.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Ministerial Decree No. 12/CAB.MIN/ETPS/046/2008, 8 August (MD No. 46) on guards on machinery and other mechanical engines and the prohibition against sale, hire and exhibition or transfer in any other manner of unguarded machinery including provisions giving effect, inter alia, to Article 2(2)–(4) of the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Djibouti

The Committee notes with regret that, for the fourth consecutive year, the Government's report has not been received and that, prior thereto and since 2000, the Government has submitted the same report which does not provide any new information in reply to the Committee's previous comments. While noting the efforts made in the country through the adoption of a new Labour Code in 2006 and the development and adoption of a Decent Work Country Programme 2008–12, the Committee must underscore that the reporting obligations undertaken by the Government are important and that a regular review of the situation in the country in relation to the matters covered in this Convention can be helpful for the Government in its further improvements, not only in relation to the application of the present Convention but in the area of occupational safety and health in general.

Plan of action (2010–16). The Committee would also like to take this opportunity to inform the Government that, in March 2010, the Governing Body adopted a plan of action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key instruments in the area of occupational safety and health (OSH), the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its 2002 Protocol, and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (document GB.307/10/2(Rev.)). The Committee would like to bring to the Government's attention that, under this plan of action, the Office is available to provide assistance to governments, as appropriate, to bring their national law and practice into conformity with these key OSH Conventions in order to promote their ratification and effective implementation. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on any needs it may have in this respect.

In the meantime, the Committee must repeat its previous observation which reads as follows:

The Committee understands, however, that a new Labour Code has recently been adopted (Act No. 133/AN/05 of 28 January 2006) and notes with interest that it contains provisions concerning occupational safety and health that constitutes a general framework for the protection of workers against risks related to work. According to previously submitted information the relevant legislation would also include Order No. 1010/SG/CG of 3 July 1968 concerning the protection of workers against ionizing radiation in hospitals and health-care institutions, or in Order No. 72-60/SG/CG of 12 January 1972 on occupational medicine. With reference to article 125(a) of the newly adopted law providing for the adoption of implementing legislation to regulate measures for the protection of safety and health in all establishments and companies covered by the Labour Code, on a series of different issues including radiation protection, the Committee requests the Government to clarify whether the abovementioned Orders remain in force and, as appropriate, to transmit to it copies of any revised or complementing legislation once it has been adopted.

The Committee also notes the observations submitted by the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD) on 23 of November 2007, raising concerns regarding insufficient protection against ionizing radiation for employees at health care centres. These observations were transmitted to the Government for comment on 21 September 2007, but no comments have been received to date.

Article 3(1). Protection of workers against ionizing radiations; Article 6(2). Maximum permissible doses; and Article 9(2) of the Convention. Instruction of the workers assigned to work under radiations. With reference to the foregoing and its previous comments, the Committee recalls that all appropriate steps shall be taken to ensure effective protection of workers against ionizing radiations and to review maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiations in the light of current knowledge. In this context, the Committee notes that the UGDT seems to indicate that, in practice, industrial undertakings using procedures involving ionizing radiation do not seem to apply uniform rules for the protection of workers against exposure thereto and that the workers engaged in, for example, health-care centres are not sufficiently informed of the dangers related to their activity and are not protected in an adequate way. The Committee again draws the Government's attention to the revised dose limits for exposure to ionizing radiation established on the basis of new physiological findings by the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) in its 1990 recommendations. The Committee requests the Government to respond to the observations made by the UGDT and urges the Government to take all appropriate measures, in the near future, and with due account of the 1990 Recommendations of the ICRP, to give full effect, in law and in practice, to these provisions of the Convention.

Article 7(1)(b) and (2) of the Convention. Exposure limits for young persons between 16 and 18 years of age. Prohibition against employing young persons under 16 in work involving exposure to radiation. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that there were no provisions in relevant legislation prohibiting the employment of children under 16 years of age in radiation work and fixing maximum permissible doses for persons between 16 and 18 who are directly engaged in radiation work, as called for by this Article of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to take all appropriate measures to ensure the application of this Article in the near future.

Exceptional exposure of workers in situations of emergency. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee again draws the Government's attention to paragraphs 16–17 of its 1992 general observation under this Convention which concern occupational exposure during and after an emergency. The Government is requested to indicate whether, in emergency situations, exceptions are permitted to the normally tolerated dose limits for exposure to ionizing radiation and, if so, to indicate the exceptional levels of exposure allowed in these circumstances and to specify the manner in which these circumstances are defined.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee understands that a new Labour Code has recently been adopted (Act No. 133/AN/05 of 28 January 2006) and notes with interest that it contains provisions concerning occupational safety and health that constitute a general framework for the protection of workers against risks related to work. The Committee nevertheless requests the Government to provide additional information concerning the following points.

Articles 10, 13–16 and 18 of the Convention. With reference to the comments that it has formulated for several years, the Committee notes that article 125(a) of the Labour Code provides for the adoption of implementing legislation to regulate measures for the protection of safety and health in all establishments and companies covered by the Labour Code, in particular, with regard to lighting, ventilation or aeration, drinking water, sanitary facilities, evacuation of dust and fumes, precautions to be taken against fire, installation of emergency exits, radiation, noise and vibrations. The Committee trusts that the Government will adopt the abovementioned legislation in the very near future and that it will give full effect to Articles 10, 13–16 and 18 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of this legislation as soon as it has been adopted.

With reference to the advances that hopefully will be made through the Decent Work Country Programme 2008–12, including, inter alia, further cooperation with the social partners, the Committee urges the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominican Republic

Legislation. The Committee notes with interest that the Occupational Safety and Health Regulations, issued by Decree No. 522-06 of 17 October 2006 and Resolution 4 of 2007, give effect to a good number of provisions of the Convention. Noting that the abovementioned legislation has introduced significant changes, the Committee requests the Government to provide a detailed report specifying the provisions of its legislation that give effect to each provision of the Convention, together with information on the application of the Convention in practice.

Application of the Convention in practice. Communication from trade unions. In its comments of 2010, the Committee noted communications from the Autonomous Confederation of Workers' Unions (CASC), the National Confederation of Trade Union Unity (CNUS) and the National Confederation of Dominican Workers (CNTD), forwarded to the Government on 23 September 2010. It noted that the communications referred among other matters to the high incidence of accidents and diseases in the construction sector and alleged that the labour inspectorate lacks effectiveness in dealing with the frequent, systematic and serious violations of the applicable legislation. The Committee said that it would examine the communications in greater detail at the present session, together with any comments the Government saw fit to make. The abovementioned organizations submit that, generally speaking, it could be said that the legislation of the Dominican Republic is adequate to ensure the application of the Convention, and that it is backed up by penalties to deter any violations, since section 720 of the Labour Code treats occupational safety and health violations as very serious offences punishable by penal sanctions where the violation endangers or is liable to endanger the life, health or safety of the workers. The trade unions nonetheless report that despite the legal framework, breaches of the Convention are frequent, systematic and very serious. They further assert that the work of the inspectorate is ineffectual and indicate that the last Labour Statistics Bulletin, No. 9 of 2006, published by the Secretariat of State for Labour, records 5,326 occupational accidents, 399 of which occurred in construction. They also indicate that according to the same Bulletin, of the 777 contraventions reported by the labour inspectorate, only 27 concerned social security and occupational accidents. Furthermore, according to the country's only occupational risk director, although there are an estimated 70,000 occupational accidents a year, only 5 per cent of them are reported. The trade unions also assert that according to the same director, "as in other countries, here too most cases occur in the construction sector, but with the difference that in the Dominican Republic the victims are Haitian and are not insured". The organizations indicate that with the crisis in the sugar industry and the privatization of the sugar sector, tens of thousands of agricultural workers lost their jobs and moved to the east of the country, where the growing tourism sector needed workers for the construction of hotel complexes, and that according to the calculations of the Association of Housing Project Builders (ACOPROVI), 95 per cent of the workers employed in the tourism sector are Haitian. In Santo Domingo the percentage is lower, but Haitian workers are in the majority in the construction sector. They further assert that many enterprises apply no safety measures, such as nets for high-rise work, protective helmets, harnesses, boots and reflective jackets, and that the workers are careless about their own safety and that of their colleagues because they have received no instruction and, in some cases, because the companies provide no protective equipment. Furthermore, no one pays into the Construction Workers Pension Fund, so in the event of an accident workers resort to the public health system, where care is uneven and where they have virtually no access to medication. The organizations further assert that prevention programmes are rudimentary and, in practice, workers are unprotected and ill-prepared to cope with such risks. In conclusion, the organizations state that, although the authorities are making efforts to comply with their obligations deriving from ratified ILO Conventions, more effective legislation, policies and actions are nonetheless needed in order to apply the Conventions in practice.

Comments of the Government. The Committee notes that although the Government makes no direct reference to the communication, it does provide some information on the application of the Convention in practice. It notes that, according to the Government, various meetings were held in 2010 with representatives of the main trade union federations in the construction sector and that the Ministry of Labour covered 70 per cent of the workplan that was developed. The report indicates that the Ministry of Labour has promoted Regulation No. 522, conducted training activities together with the unions, and supported the establishment of 16 joint committees, which are up and running. It also states that a platform is being developed for immediate registration/notification of occupational accidents to the Ministry of Labour, that there are to be improvements in the statistics on occupational accidents and that an agreement is under discussion on public works so that as soon as formalities start for land use and/or building permits, the Ministry of Labour is informed at once so that it can require submission of an occupational safety and health programme and the establishment of a joint committee. The Government indicates that the first forum on health and safety in the construction sector was organized with representatives of employers, workers and interested technical bodies; 2,000 copies of the rules on safety and health in construction were printed; a programme to promote compliance with construction safety prescriptions was organized in the north-Atlantic, north-east and south-central regions, with the assistance of 50 engineers; a workshop was organized for the association of master builders and another for engineers of the National Drinking Water and Sewerage Institute. The inspectorate monitored the safety and health of 10,026 workers.

The Committee notes that the communication from the workers refers to the application of Article 1 (scope); Article 9 (design and planning of construction projects); Part III (preventive and protective measures); Article 35 (labour inspection); Article 33 (information and training); and Article 34 (notification of accidents and diseases), which are analysed below.

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope. With reference to the communication from the workers, the Committee points out that the Convention applies to all construction activities, namely building, civil engineering, and erection and dismantling work, including any process, operation or transport on a construction site, from the preparation of the site to the completion of the project, without any distinction as to the employment relationship of the workers. The Committee requests the Government provide information on the manner in which it ensures that the Convention is applied to all construction activities and to all those who perform them, whether registered workers, unregistered workers or independent workers, together with specific information on construction workers who are not registered or who work in the informal economy.

Article 9. Design and planning of a construction project. Referring to the communication from the workers, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on how it ensures, in practice, that the persons responsible for designing and planning construction projects fulfil their duty to take account of the safety and health of construction workers, in conformity with national law and practice. Please also indicate whether the agreement which the Government referred to in its report, and under which the authorities issuing building permits must inform the Ministry of Labour of applications for permits, has been concluded.

Part III. Preventive and protective measures. Article 35. Labour inspection. In view of the problems in applying the provisions in practice referred to in the communication from the workers, please indicate the measures adopted to ensure effective application of the preventive and protective measures established in the Convention, including, but not limited to, the reinforcement of the labour inspectorate.

Article 33. Information and training. The Committee refers to the communication from the workers' and the Government's reply, and asks the Government to continue to provide information on the efforts made to give effect to this Article in practice.

Article 34. Notification of accidents and diseases. The Committee refers to the communication from the workers, and noting that a platform is being developed for immediate registration/notification to the Ministry of Labour of occupational accidents and for the improvement of occupational accident statistics, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on all progress made in this regard, including in respect to unregistered workers, whether Dominican or Haitian.

Part VII of the report form. The Committee notes that according to the communication from the workers' federations, in 2010 the Government did not send them copies of its report. It also notes that the 2011 report makes no mention of whether it was sent to workers' and employers' organizations or whether these were consulted. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which it sent copies of its report, in accordance with article 23(2) of the ILO Constitution.

Technical assistance. The Committee further notes that from 17 to 24 July 2011, an ILO Technical Assistance Mission was carried out under the Action Plan 2010–2016 in order to obtain broad ratification and effective application of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and its Protocol of 2002, and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187). The purpose of the Mission, which was requested by the Government, was to explain and facilitate ratification of these key occupational safety and health instruments and the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176). The Committee notes that as a result of the Mission, the Government expressed its intention to ratify Convention No. 187 in the short term and to continue working towards ratification of the other instruments. It also notes the Government's statement that it was having difficulty in giving practical effect to the Occupational Safety and Health Regulations, issued by Decree No. 522-06 of 17 October 2006, and had requested further technical assistance by the Office so as to examine the matter in the context of three forthcoming tripartite workshops. The Committee observes that according to the present communication from the workers' federations, the problems in giving practical effect to Ministerial Decision No. 4 of 2007 on construction are the same. The Committee accordingly urges the Government to extend its request for technical assistance to cover the difficulties encountered in giving practical effect to this Convention and to continue to pursue efforts with the social partners to improve effective application of the legislation giving effect to this Convention, and to provide information in this regard. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to notify in the near future its ratification of Convention No. 187, in accordance with the statement it made to that effect to the Technical Assistance Mission, since this could make an effective contribution to improving the management of occupational safety and health.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Ecuador

In 2010, the Committee asked the Government to reply in detail in 2011 to the questions raised in its observation of 2005. The Committee notes that the Government states in this connection that it will make the necessary amendments to update the law. The Government also refers to a handbook of normal and emergency procedures and a directory for care of radiological emergencies. The Government report being brief, the Committee finds that it is unable to proceed further with its examination of how the Convention is applied. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the legislative proposals referred to. The Committee again asks the Government to consider the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in the drafting of reports and for a number of issues raised in connection with the occupational safety and health Conventions, and requests it to provide information on any needs that may arise in this regard. It also asks the Government to reply to the questions raised and to indicate the manner in which it ensures, in practice, the effective application of the Articles indicated by the Committee in its comments of 2005, which read as follows:

Articles 3(1) and 6(2) of the Convention. Measures taken in the light of the knowledge available. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ecuadorian Commission on Atomic Energy (CEEAA) has given an undertaking to the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to amend the Regulations on radiological safety (RSR) of 1979 during the course of the technical assistance cycle 2005–06 with a view to bringing the national regulations into conformity with international standards on the maximum permissible dose limits for the exposure of workers adopted by the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) in 1990, which were reflected in the 1994 International Basic Safety Standards for Protection against Ionizing Radiation and for the Safety of Radiation Sources established under the auspices of the IAEA, ILO, WHO and three other international organizations. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures rapidly with a view to bringing its legislation into conformity with these provisions of the Convention with due consideration being given to the general observation of 1992 and to provide a copy of the amended regulations as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 7. Workers under the age of 18 directly engaged in radiation work. The Committee notes that section 3 of the Regulations on radiological safety of 1979 defines radiation areas as areas where the radiation doses may be higher than 5 mrem per hour and that this definition will also be amended during the course of the technical assistance cycle 2005–06 so that young persons under the age of 18 cannot be assigned to work involving exposure to ionizing radiations. It also notes the information that the CEEA does not authorize work permits for young persons under the age of 18 to perform work involving ionizing radiations or in “radiation areas”. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures rapidly and to provide it with a copy of the amended regulations as soon as they have been adopted.

Article 14. Alternative employment or other measures offered for maintaining income where continued assignment to work involving exposure is medically inadvisable. The Committee notes the information that workers who, for medical reasons, can no longer work under conditions involving exposure to ionizing radiations may be granted compensation following classification as being affected by an occupational disease by the Ecuadorian Social Security Institute (IESS). In this context, the Committee wishes to draw the attention of the Government to paragraph 32 of the 1992 general observation under the Convention where it is indicated that every effort must be made to provide the workers concerned with suitable alternative employment, or to maintain their income through social security measures or otherwise where continued assignment to work involving exposure to ionizing radiations is found to be medically inadvisable. In the light of the foregoing, the Committee requests the Government to consider appropriate measures to ensure that no worker shall be employed or shall continue to be employed in work by reason of which the worker could be the subject of exposure to ionizing radiation contrary to medical advice and that for such workers, every effort is made to provide them with suitable alternative employment or to offer them other means to maintain their income and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Exposure during emergency situations. The Committee notes that exposure during emergency situations is regulated by the Manual on normal procedures and in cases of emergency, which requires the information on radioactive sources in the country to be updated. It also notes that this manual is prepared for each individual user and that it is regularly updated to ensure that it is in conformity with the international recommendations determining the admissible dose levels in cases of emergency. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of one of these manuals.

In 2010, the Committee noted once again that the Government had not provided the information requested and once again invited it to provide detailed information in reply to its direct request of 2006. The Committee notes that the Government’s report indicates that the content of the direct request has been sent to the respective bodies, but that the detailed information requested has not been provided. The 2006 direct request read as follows:

Article 2(3) and (4) and Article 4 of the Convention. Dangerous parts of machinery requiring guards and the persons responsible. The Committee notes the study done by the Coordinator of the Occupational Safety and Health Unit, which in turn refers to the provisions of the Occupational Safety and Health Regulations, adopted by Decree No. 2393 of 13 November 1986. In its comments in 1995, the Committee noted that this text establishes liability and certain sanctions for failure to apply the prescriptions set forth in its provisions, but does not specify the persons on whom the obligation to ensure compliance with the provisions of Article 2 of the Convention shall rest. The Committee once again recalls that, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, measures have to be taken to ensure that the categories of persons referred to in Article 4, namely vendors, persons letting out on hire or transferring machinery in any other manner and exhibitors and, where appropriate, their respective agents, and the manufacturer when she or he sells machinery, lets it out on hire, transfers it in any other manner or exhibits it, are explicitly covered by the provisions of the national legislation establishing the obligation to prohibit by national laws or regulations or to prevent by other equally effective measures, the sale and hire of machinery of which the dangerous parts, specified in paragraphs 3 and 4 of Article 2, are without appropriate guards. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in the near future to bring the national legislation into conformity with the above provisions of the Convention and requests it to provide information on the progress achieved in this respect.

The Committee once again invites the Government to consider the possibility of requesting ILO technical assistance for the drafting of reports and on certain questions raised in relation to the occupational safety and health Conventions, and to provide information on any need which may arise in this respect.

In 2010, the Committee noted that the Government had not provided the information requested and again asked it to provide detailed information in response to the direct request of 2006. The Committee notes that the Government’s report indicates once again that there has been a delay in the adoption of regulations on the use of benzene and that the technical standards are about to be updated. The Government also states that since benzene is not used in industries, no violations or results of any kind have been reported in the inspection visits carried out. The Government refers to the information it provided previously. The Committee points out that, having noted the information reiterated by the Government, it raised questions designed to seek clarification of some aspects of the application of certain Articles of the Convention for which further information is needed. Since the report supplied by the Government does not respond in detail to the Committee’s questions, it is bound to repeat its previous comments, which read as follows:

Article 5 of the Convention. Occupational hygiene and technical measures to ensure effective protection of workers exposed to benzene. The Committee notes that, in 2005, the Ministry of Labour and Employment approved the Occupational Safety and Health Institutional Policy and the Safety and Health Management System of the Ministry of Labour by means of Ministerial Order No. 000213 of 23 October 2002, which sets out the principles and objectives of the policy, as well as strategies and measures for the development of national law and practice to ensure effective implementation of its terms of reference. The Committee hopes that these strategies will be implemented in the very near future and requests the Government to provide information on progress in this matter.

The Committee notes that adoption of the draft regulations on the use of benzene has been delayed and that, as a consequence of this, the technical standards are now to be updated by the Inter-Institutional Committee and then sent to the tripartite National Labour Council so that it can acquaint itself with this vitally important matter and speed up adoption. The Committee hopes that the abovementioned draft regulations will be adopted in the near future and will give full effect to the provisions of the Convention, and especially:

- Article 2(1). Use of substitute products, where they are available, instead of benzene or products containing benzene;
- Article 4(1) and (2). Prohibition of the use of benzene or products containing benzene in certain processes, at least as a solvent or diluent, except where the process is carried out in an enclosed system or where there are other equally safe methods of work;
- Article 5. Occupational hygiene and technical measures to ensure effective protection of workers exposed to benzene;
- Article 6(1)–(3). Measures to prevent the escape of benzene vapour into the air of places of employment; measures to ensure that the concentration of benzene in the air of places of employment does not exceed a ceiling which shall be fixed by the competent authority at a level not exceeding 25 parts per million, and the establishment of appropriate standards for measuring the concentration of benzene in the air;
- Article 7(1) and (2). Work processes involving the use of benzene or of products containing benzene to be carried out, as far as possible, in an enclosed system or, where this is not practicable, places of work to be equipped with effective means to ensure the removal of benzene vapour;
- Article 8(1) and (2). Adequate means of personal protection against the risk of absorbing benzene through the skin or of inhaling benzene vapour, where its concentration in the air of the place of employment exceeds the ceiling of 25 parts per million; and the obligation to limit exposure as far as possible;
- Articles 9 and 10. Pre-employment medical examinations and periodical re-examinations at no cost to the workers to be undergone by all workers who are employed in work processes involving exposure to benzene or to products containing benzene; medical examinations to include blood tests and biological tests carried out under the supervision or with the assistance, as appropriate, of a competent laboratory; appropriate certification;
- Article 11(1) and (2). Prohibition on the employment of pregnant women, nursing mothers and young persons under 18 years of age in work processes involving exposure to benzene or products containing benzene;
- Article 12. Clearly visible danger symbols on any container holding benzene or products containing benzene;
- Article 13. Appropriate measures to provide that any worker exposed to benzene or products containing benzene receives proper instructions on measures to safeguard health and prevent accidents, and on the appropriate action in the event of poisoning; and
- Article 14. Procedures for the prevention of occupational risks and appropriate inspection.

Part IV of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide general information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including extracts of inspection reports and data on the number of workers covered by the Convention, if possible, disaggregated by gender and the number and nature of the infringements recorded.

The Committee again invites the Government to envisage the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in drafting reports and addressing some of the matters raised in the occupational safety and health Conventions, and asks it to provide information on any needs that may arise in this regard.

Article 1(1) and (3) of the Convention. Determination of the carcinogenic substances and agents to be prohibited or made subject to authorization. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Inter-Institutional Committee has not fixed maximum permissible levels of exposure as required by section 64 of the Regulations concerning the safety and health of workers, but that the limit values laid down in international standards are used as a reference point in the country. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the legislation referring to or prescribing the limit values laid down in international standards and on the manner in which their application is ensured in practice.

Article 2(2).* Reduction to the minimum compatible with safety of the number of workers exposed to carcinogenic substances or agents and the length of such exposure. Having referred to this matter for a number of years, the Committee again requests the Government to supply information on the application of this Article, including on the establishment of the list of enterprises for the purposes of checking the length of workers' exposure to carcinogenic substances or agents.

Article 5. Medical examinations after the period of employment. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it has drafted an instrument which specifies that the type and frequency of medical examinations shall depend on the assessment of exposure levels in the workplace and that the internal occupational safety and health (OSH) regulations presented to the Ministry of Labour for approval shall contain a chapter on this subject. The Committee notes that this information is of a general nature and requests the Government to supply more detailed information on the legislation governing medical examinations after employment, with an indication of the areas of work concerned, and especially on the application of these provisions in practice.

In 2010 the Committee asked the Government to reply in detail to its comments of 2006. The Committee pointed out to the Government that its concise report contained little information in relation to progress made on the application of the Convention. The Committee therefore again requests the Government to contemplate the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office with regard to the drafting of reports and issues raised in connection with the OSH Conventions and to supply information on any needs that may arise in this regard.

Article 4 of the Convention. Measures for the prevention and control of occupational hazards due to air pollution, noise and vibration. Article 5. Cooperation between employers and workers. Article 11. Periodical medical examinations. Workers in the telephony sector. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to consult employers and workers as provided for in Article 5 of the Convention with regard to the measures for prevention and protection referred to in Article 4 which apply in the telephony sector, and to provide information on such consultations as well as on measures taken or contemplated. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the medical examinations conducted for workers in the sector, indicating their frequency and providing information on their results. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, in accordance with the report of the Directorate for Occupational Safety and Health and with regard to reducing the length of the working day in the telephony sector, the sectoral committees were assisted by a safety and health team in defining a working day of seven hours, with the option of reviewing the situation. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that this is a case which it has been dealing with for many years and that, in order to assess whether effect is being given to these Articles in the sector concerned, it is essential that it receives information on the manner in which the application of the abovementioned Articles is ensured in practice. The Committee again requests the Government to supply information on the application of the abovementioned Articles, indicating the action taken by the labour inspectorate in the telephony sector in relation to these Articles of the Convention and the results achieved, so that it can assess whether the measures taken have resulted in improvements for the workers in this sector.

In its observation of 2010, the Committee once again noted with regret that, despite asking the Government to reply in detail to the comments made, the Government's report was a general summary and, in the absence of further information from the Government, the Committee was unable to assess the importance of the additional information from various sources which was attached to the Government's report. It pointed out that, in some cases, the information requested did not come within the competence of the unit concerned. The Committee indicated that coordination is necessary both to apply the occupational safety and health (OSH) Conventions and to prepare the respective reports and that, regardless of the internal distribution of competencies, the responsibility for submitting the reports lies with the Government. As a result of the various issues mentioned, the information available did not enable the Committee to assess whether the national law and practice give effect to the obligations deriving from the Convention. However, the Committee noted that certain efforts were being made with regard to OSH in the country. The Committee asked the Government to compile the information requested by the Committee in its previous comments and to reply in detail to the questions posed in 2009. The Committee also asked the Government to contemplate the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office with a view to preparing reports and replying to the questions raised in relation to the OSH Conventions. The Committee notes that the Government once again has submitted a brief report which does not reply to the questions raised by the Committee. The Committee is therefore bound to repeat its comments of 2009, which read as follows:

Article 6(2). Requirement for employers to cooperate in applying prescribed measures. The Committee notes that the Government merely refers to its previous report without answering the question raised by the Committee. It reminds the Government that under this Article, whenever two or more employers undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace, they shall have the duty to collaborate in order to comply with the prescribed measures and that, in appropriate circumstances, the competent authorities shall prescribe general procedures for this collaboration. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the manner in which it ensures compliance in law and in practice with the duty to collaborate laid down in this Article and, if necessary, to prescribe the procedures for such collaboration.

Article 8(1) and (3). Air pollution and vibration. For several years the Committee has been asking the Government provide information on the establishment, by the Inter-Institutional Committee on Occupational Safety and Health, of exposure limits for corrosive, irritating and toxic substances, by adopting the standards established for such substances by the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists. The Committee notes that according to the Government, Ecuador has regulated maximum permissible limits of exposure only for asbestos and for all other cases, they apply international standards. The Committee requests the Government to indicate which international standards it applies, and submit a copy of the legal provisions providing for the application of these standards. Please also provide documentation on the criteria currently used to define the risks of exposure to air pollution and vibration in the workplace, and the exposure limits, as well as on the manner in which these criteria and limits are supplemented and revised in practice, together with relevant documentation.

Article 10. Exceeding exposure limits and protective equipment. The Committee once again notes that the Government has not sent the information requested. It invites the Government to indicate the methods prescribed for determining whether the limits specified in pursuance of Article 8 are exceeded and to specify the guidelines or instructions on the type of personal protective equipment to be provided to the workers exposed should these limits be exceeded.

Article 11. Medical examinations (pre-assignment and periodical). Please provide information on measures taken, in law and in practice, to regulate how these examinations are carried out and that periodicity.

Article 12. Notification to the competent authority of processes, substances, machinery and equipment which involve exposure. The Committee repeats its request to the Government for information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the use of processes, substances, machinery and equipment involving exposure to air pollution, noise or vibration are notified to the competent authorities.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. Please provide general information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, together with extracts from inspection reports with an indication of the number and nature of infringements detected in connection with the Convention, including in the telephone sector. Please also provide reports prepared pursuant to the Andean Occupational Safety and Health Instrument that may be relevant, to enable the Committee to ascertain more fully the extent to which the Convention is applied.

In general, the Committee notes that although it has asked the Government to reply in detail to its comments of 2006, the information sent by the Government is summary and general in nature. The Committee also notes that the type of reply sent by the Government does now allow it to resolve the application of the issues that it has been raising for several years. The Committee requests the Government to reply in detail to the present comments attaching copies of the legislative provisions, and to provide examples that illustrate the assertions it makes in its report. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that it may seek technical assistance from the Office should it deem this necessary.

The Committee again requests the Government to contemplate the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office with a view to preparing reports and replying to questions raised in relation to the OSH Conventions, and to supply information on any needs that may arise in this regard.

Articles 11 and 12 of the Convention. Use of crocidolite and the spraying of asbestos. In its previous comments the Committee noted that sections 5.1 and 5.2 of the Safety Regulations for the Use of Asbestos of 9 August 2000 prohibit the use of crocidolite and the spraying of all forms of asbestos and provide for possible waivers by the competent authority where there is no alternative and on condition that the health of workers is not endangered, and asked the Government to provide information in this regard. The Committee notes that according to the Government, there have been no cases of any waivers being issued under these provisions of the Regulations.

Article 17(1) and (2). Demolition of plants containing friable asbestos insulation materials. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Safety Regulation for the Use of Asbestos contain no specific requirement that the demolition of plants containing friable asbestos insulation materials is to be undertaken only by employers or contractors recognized by the competent authority as qualified to carry out such work, or any provision on the workplan which has to be drawn up before such work is started. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure application of this Article of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret that the Government refers to the abovementioned Regulations without indicating the relevant provisions that give effect to these Articles of the Convention and which would respond to the questions raised by the Committee. The Committee again asks the Government to indicate clearly the provisions of the relevant legislation that give effect to these Articles, and to provide information on their application in practice in the construction industry.

Article 21(4). Alternative employment and maintenance of workers' income when continued assignment to work involving exposure is found to be medically inadvisable. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government refers to section 5 of the 1993 Recommendations on Occupational Safety and Health in the Use of Asbestos. The Committee notes that section 5 refers to a programme of medical supervision, providing that "the medical service of the enterprise shall determine and apply medical contraindications when assigning or rotating a post". Although this Recommendation may contribute in part to assignment to alternative employment, it would not appear sufficient for effectively ensuring alternative employment or other means of maintaining income in the case at hand. The Committee accordingly asks the Government once again to continue to provide information on the manner in which it ensures alternative employment or other measures such as social benefits so as to secure maintenance of the worker's income where the worker's assignment to or maintenance in a job involving exposure is medically inadvisable. Please provide, in particular, practical information on the manner in which maintenance of income is guaranteed, including through social benefits.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. Article 5. Labour inspection services. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government does not provide the information requested on the application of the Convention in practice. The Government again states that the Occupation Safety and Health Unit is undergoing restructuring with the assistance of the Government of Spain and that the relevant regulations are being disseminated, but provides no further information. The Committee points out to the Government that information on the manner in which effect is given to the Convention is essential to the Committee's examination of how far the Convention is applied. The Committee again asks the Government to make every effort to provide information on the effect given in practice to the Convention, including reports of the labour inspection services or other bodies responsible for the enforcement of the Convention and supervision of the application of the abovementioned Regulations, so the Committee may gain a fuller picture of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice. Please provide, for example, general information on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including in the construction sector as far as possible.

The Committee again asks the Government to envisage the possibility of requesting technical assistance from the Office in drafting reports and addressing some of the questions raised regarding the occupational safety and health Conventions, and requests it to provide information on any needs that may arise in this regard.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2013.]

El Salvador

Article 4 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and periodic review of national policy in consultation with the social partners. The Committee notes Agreement No. 93 of 2006 whereby the National Occupational Safety And Health (OSH) policy was adopted. It notes from the preamble that the Higher Labour Council is the tripartite body for social dialogue which, via the National Occupational Safety and Health Commission, is the forum for analysis, definition, consultation and promotion of policies, programmes, projects and actions in the field of occupational hazard prevention. However, it notes that this document does not show the mechanisms for the implementation and periodic review of this national policy. Also with reference to the 2009 General Survey on occupational safety and health, paragraphs 54–59, the Committee emphasizes that, under the terms of this Article, the State must, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy in this field. This implies a dynamic of implementation and periodic review in consultation with the social partners, with a view to ensuring an evaluation of its application in practice and determination of the spheres of action for achieving future improvements. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which the national policy is reviewed and at what intervals, indicating the results of the evaluation of the areas of action for achieving future improvements.

Articles 4 and 8. Laws and regulations relating to the national policy. The Committee notes the adoption, by means of Legislative Decree No. 254 of 2010, of the General Act concerning occupational hazard prevention, published on 5 May 2010. It notes with interest that the preamble to the new Act expresses the Government's will to give effect to the present Convention and that it provides for the formulation of programmes to manage occupational hazard prevention at the enterprise level and for the establishment of OSH committees that will participate in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of the policy and programme for the management of occupational hazards. However, it notes that the Act does not appear to give effect to certain articles of the Convention, such as Article 13, according to which any worker who has removed himself from a work situation which he has reasonable justification to believe presents an imminent and serious danger to his life or health shall be protected from undue consequences. The Government previously indicated that section 106 of the Labour Code identifies the activities that present an imminent and serious danger. However, Article 13 of the Convention does not refer to activities but to a work situation that may arise, without specifying a particular type of activity, and to the need to protect the worker from undue consequences, and this is not covered by section 106 of the Labour Code or by the new legislation. The Committee informs the Government that further clarification can be found in the 2009 General Survey, paragraphs 145–152. In view of the legislative changes that have occurred, particularly, the new Act and the national policy, the Committee considers it necessary to undertake a full analysis of the effect given to the Convention in law and in practice and requests the Government to send a detailed report according to the terms of the report form.

Article 14. Promoting the inclusion of questions of occupational safety and health and the working environment at all levels of education and training. The Committee notes with interest the activities undertaken by the Government to promote OSH matters. It notes the indication that the Ministry of Labour has concluded agreements with Matías Delgado University in El Salvador and the Polytechnic University of Madrid. It also notes the information relating to technical diploma courses given and persons trained, including 300 OSH technicians at the Ministry of Labour and in the private sector. Furthermore, coordination was increased with the Social Security Institute of El Salvador and with the Association of Agricultural Suppliers for the purpose of training, including in relation to the safe use and storage of pesticides. Work has been ongoing since February 2008 on the formulation of a "local strategic alliance", which continues to pool efforts in the health, labour, environment and education sectors through the implementation of coordinated strategic lines of action, on the basis of the Plan of Action of the 4th Summit of the Americas in 2005. It also notes the different actions designed to reinforce labour inspection with support from the social partners and technical assistance from the Office in the context of the "civil service reinforcement project". Another key task which has been assigned to the labour inspectorate is promotion, training, advice and guidance for workers and employers in the context of the new General Act concerning occupational hazard prevention. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application of this Article of the Convention.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the detailed information supplied by the Government including extracts from labour inspection reports and the number of workers covered, disaggregated by sex, including statistics on occupational accidents by branch of activity. The Committee notes that, for both men and women, the highest number of recorded accidents is in the manufacturing industry. The Committee requests the Government to specify in which manufacturing activities the highest number of accidents is recorded, and to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, including with regard to workers in agriculture.

Protocol of 2002 to the present Convention. The Committee notes with interest that the Government has ratified the Protocol of 2002 to the present Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send a detailed report on the application of the Protocol of 2002 in the terms indicated in the corresponding report form, together with the detailed report on the application of the present Convention.

Plan of Action (2010–16). The Committee wishes to take this opportunity to inform the Government that in March 2010 the ILO Governing Body adopted a Plan of Action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key instruments in OSH, namely: the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its Protocol of 2002, and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (GB.307/10/2(Rev.)). Noting that the Government has already ratified two of the key instruments in the Plan of Action and that it is making intense efforts to give effect to them in law and in practice, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that, under the terms of the Plan, the Office is available to provide assistance to facilitate the application of the present Convention and its Protocol of 2002 and, if the Government so desires, to clarify the scope and additional aspects of Convention No. 187. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on any need for technical assistance that it may have in this respect.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments and to report in detail in 2013.]

Ethiopia

The Committee notes with satisfaction the information provided by the Government regarding the adoption of the Occupational Safety and Health Directive by the Ministry of Labour and Social Affairs in 2008 (OSH Directive), which lays down general occupational safety and health (OSH) provisions and specific rules on fire prevention, working with chemicals, exposure to radiations, electric and magnetic fields, noise, vibration and rules protecting workers employed in cold/hot thermal environments. In addition, the Committee notes that the OSH Directive defines specific rules on OSH in the manufacturing sector, in the construction sector, and in agriculture.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

France

French Polynesia

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information regarding the updating of the list of work that requires an increased medical surveillance by the adoption of Decree No. 126 CM of 8 February 2010 which abrogates and replaces Decree No. 1756 CM of 20 December 2002. The Committee also notes that the discussions undertaken in the technical committee with competence for the prevention of occupational risks concerning the improvements to be made to the regulations on exposure to ionizing radiations, which were pursued in 2009 together with Nuclear Safety Authority health officials. The Committee notes the stated purpose of these discussions is to improve the situation with respect to the declaration of ionizing sources, the effectiveness of dosimetric monitoring, to develop complementary regulations adapted to the conditions in French Polynesia and to harmonize law and practice in the work and health sectors and that the further objective is to prepare a draft for 2010 for submission to the Parliament of French Polynesia in 2011. With reference to the comments the Committee has been making since 1993, the Committee once again urges the Government to pursue its efforts to institute legislative changes to comply with the Convention, to appoint a medical inspector and to inform the Committee of the results of these efforts including any progress made. The Committee also feels bound to reiterate its previous comments, which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee noted Deliberation No. 91-019 AT of 17 January 1991 adopted pursuant to Act No. 86-845 of 17 July 1986, establishing specific measures for the protection of workers against the danger resulting from external exposure to ionizing radiations.

The Committee noted that the dose limits set forth in section 5 of the Deliberation do not correspond to the revised dose limits set forth in the 1990 Recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP). Referring to Articles 3(1) and 6(2) of the Convention, the Committee requested the Government to report on the steps taken or envisaged in the light of current knowledge to amend the dose limits for occupational exposure to ionizing radiations and to ensure effective protection of pregnant women.

The Committee also noted that, under section 3 of the Deliberation, exposed workers are defined as those who because of their work may be exposed to annual doses of ionizing radiations greater than one tenth of the annual limit set for workers. With reference to Article 8 of the Convention, which calls for maximum permissible dose levels to be fixed for workers not directly engaged in radiation work, but who remain or pass where they may be exposed to ionizing radiations or radioactive substances, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the steps taken or envisaged to ensure that non-radiation workers are not exposed to doses of radiation greater than those set for the general public (i.e. 1 mSv per year).

The Committee further requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the effective protection of workers against exposure to ionizing radiations in conformity with Article 6, which calls for dose limits to be set not only for external, but also for internal exposure.

The Committee notes the Government's information in its report that preparations have commenced, in consultation with employers' and workers' representatives, for a progressive revision of the labour legislation, including the provisions on protection against ionizing radiations, and that this process is expected to be finalized by the end of the first quarter of 1996. The Committee notes with interest the information that the revision will take into account the 1990 Recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) in relation to the matters raised in the Committee's previous comments. In particular, it notes with interest that the 1990 ICRP Recommendations will be incorporated with regard to maximum permissible dose limits of ionizing radiations from sources external to the body for all workers who are directly engaged in radiation work and for pregnant women (Articles 3 and 6), for workers not directly engaged in radiation work, but who remain or pass where they may be exposed to ionizing radiations or radioactive substances (Article 8), as well as the maximum permissible doses which may be taken into the body (Article 6) for workers directly engaged in radiation work. Also with reference to its 1992 general observation on the Convention, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to supply information on the provisions adopted to give full effect to the Convention and which are in conformity with the 1990 Recommendations of the ICRP and the 1994 International Basic Safety Standards.

Emergency situations. The Committee refers to the explanations provided in paragraphs 16–27 and 35(c) of its 1992 general observation on the Convention and to paragraphs 233 and 236 of the 1994 International Basic Safety Standards. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the measures taken or contemplated in relation to emergency situations.

Provision of alternative employment. With reference to paragraphs 28–34 and 35(d) of its 1992 general observation on the Convention and the principles set out in paragraphs 96 and 238 of the 1994 International Basic Safety Standards, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or contemplated to ensure effective protection of workers who have received accumulated exposure beyond which they would run an unacceptable risk and who may thus be faced with the dilemma of having to choose between protecting their health or losing their job.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

New Caledonia

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115)

The Committee notes with interest the information provided concerning the developments in the area of occupational safety and health in general in the country, including, in particular, the adoption of law No. 2009-7 of 19 October 2009 concerning occupational safety and health (OSH) as part of the implementation of the new Labour Code adopted in 2008. The Committee notes that the new OSH law is broad in scope, that it emphasizes prevention and risk assessment, that it includes detailed provisions regarding the functions of the labour inspection services, and that the Government refers to several activities destined to increase the general awareness to OSH issues. The Committee notes with regret, however, that the Government reports that no change in law and in practice has occurred as regards the specific requirements of this Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the new OSH law adopted, and urges the Government once again to pursue its efforts to institute legislative changes to comply with the Convention, to appoint a medical inspector and to inform the Committee of the results of these efforts including any progress made. Against this background, the Committee is bound to reiterate its previous comments, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report, including the information concerning the adoption of Decision No. 547 of 25 January 1995 relating to the protection of workers against the hazard of ionizing radiations, as well as Orders Nos 3165-T, 3167-T, 3169-T, 3171-T and 3173-T of 10 August 1995. It wishes to bring the Government's attention to the following points.

Article 1 of the Convention. Tripartite consultation. The Committee notes that the legislation referred to by the Government as giving effect to the Convention does not seem to contain provisions ensuring consultation with the representatives of the workers and the employers regarding the preparation and implementation of measures giving effect to the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged for this purpose.

Article 3(1) and (2), and Article 6. Appropriate measures for ensuring the effective protection of workers against ionizing radiations and for the review, in the light of knowledge available at the time, of the maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiations. In its report, the Government refers to the exposure limits set forth in sections 5 to 8 of Decision No. 547/CP of 25 January 1995. The Committee notes that these exposure limits reflect those set forth by the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) in 1977. In this regard, the Committee brings the attention of the Government to the fact that under the terms of Article 3(1) and (2), and Article 6, of the Convention, all appropriate steps shall be taken to ensure effective protection of workers, as regards their health and safety, against ionizing radiations and that, for this purpose, maximum permissible doses of ionizing radiations shall be kept under constant review in the light of "knowledge available at the time" and "new knowledge". The Committee recalls that, following a recommendation of 1977, these maximum doses have been revised by the ICRP and that new exposure limits were set forth in its recommendations, adopted in 1990. The Committee refers to its recommendations in its 1992 general observation and emphasizes, in paragraph 11, that the ICRP set, inter alia, a maximum admissible dose limit of 20 mSv per year, averaged over five years (100 mSv in five years), but not exceeding 50 mSv in any single year. The Committee also invites the Government to refer to paragraph 13 of its general observation concerning the maximum admissible dose for pregnant women. The Committee notes that the legislation to which the Government refers is not in conformity with the latest recommendations of the ICRP according to which women who may be pregnant shall be ensured a level of protection broadly comparable with that provided for members of the general public (i.e. effective dose not to exceed 1 mSv per year). The recommendations also envisage that, once the pregnancy is declared, the equivalent dose limit to the surface of the woman's abdomen should not exceed 2 mSv for the remainder of the pregnancy. Finally, the Committee notes that the legislation giving effect to the Convention does not seem to contain provisions ensuring the protection of the public in general against exposure to radiations. The Government is requested to indicate the measures taken or envisaged with regard to these points, thus ensuring the effective protection of the workers, in the light of the knowledge available at the time, according to the recommendations issued in 1990 by the ICRP.

Article 9(2). Instruction for workers. The Committee notes that section 10, paragraph 3, of Decision No. 547/CP of 25 January 1995, provides that any handling of industrial radiography or radioscopy apparatus shall be carried out by an employee having received special training. The Committee also notes that the second subparagraph of this section provides that an exemption to this measure may be granted by the Director of Labour in the case of electrical generators for fixed X-ray machines. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that all workers directly engaged in radiation work are duly trained as well as to indicate the criteria according to which the exemptions provided for in section 10, paragraph 3, subparagraph 2, of Decision No. 547/CP of 25 January 1995, are granted.

Article 14. Alternative employment or other measures offered for maintaining income where continued assignment to work involving exposure is medically inadvisable. The Committee notes that the legislation envisaged for the application of the Convention does not seem to contain provisions ensuring that no worker shall be employed or shall continue to be employed in work by reason of which the worker could be subject to exposure to ionizing radiations contrary to qualified medical advice. In this context, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to paragraph 32 of the 1992 general observation under the Convention where it is indicated that every effort must be made to provide the workers concerned with suitable alternative employment, or to maintain their income through social security measures or otherwise where continued assignment to work involving exposure to ionizing radiations is found to be medically inadvisable. In the light of the above indication, the Committee requests the Government to consider appropriate measures to ensure that no worker shall be employed or shall continue to be employed in work by reason of which the worker could be the subject of exposure to ionizing radiations contrary to medical advice and that, for such workers, every effort is made to provide them with suitable alternative employment or to offer them other means to maintain their income and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127)

The Committee notes with satisfaction the information concerning the adoption of Decree No. 2009-4271/GNC of 22 September 2009 containing minimum occupational safety and health (OSH) requirements concerning manual handling of loads. The Decree prescribes specific maximum limits of loads to be carried by adult men, women and young workers and the conduct of risk assessments in relation to the manual handling of loads and gives effect to the provisions of the Convention. The Committee also notes the information that the Government presently implementing is 2009-14 OSH policy based on prevention which includes practical measures including campaigns to increase the general awareness knowledge on OSH. The Committee requests the Government to submit to the Office a copy of the abovementioned national policy on OSH.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the manner the Convention is applied in the country including extracts from inspection services and information concerning the number and nature of contraventions reported and the action taken on them, etc.

Germany

The Committee notes the detailed and comprehensive response provided by the Government including references to legislation and available electronic sources of information. The Committee notes the information provided concerning effect given to the following Articles of the Convention: Articles 2(h), 14(1), 15(1)(e), 17(3) and 12(1).

The Committee notes the observations submitted by the German Confederation of Trade Unions in a communication received on 24 November 2011 and which was transmitted to the Government on 28 November 2011. The Committee will address these comments at its next session in the light of any comments the Government may wish to make in response thereto.

Article 30(1). Provision of personal protective equipment. The Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government regarding the implementation of the provision of the Convention based on a consistent application of a risk management approach. The Committee notes in particular that the Government underscores that the objective of the relevant legislation – including the ordinance on the use of personal protective equipment (PPE) – is to arrive at the independent management of safety and health protection by enterprises, the core elements of such management being: risk assessment; the information and training of workers; and the inclusion of workers in decision-making processes of the enterprise having regard to safety and health at work. The Government further states that therefore, as a rule, the Occupational Safety Act and the ordinances based on risk management lay down only essential framework conditions so as not to prevent employers and workers from achieving the level of autonomous action that is the aim of legislation; that these general requirements are underpinned by more concrete sub-statutory sets of rules and that employers implementing these rules can assume that they comply with the legal requirements. The Government indicates however, that a deliberate choice was made not to draw up a set of rules of this kind to assist with the implementation of the ordinance on the use of PPE as, according to the general principles set out in Article 4 of the Occupational Safety Act, individual protective measures such as the wearing of PPE are subordinate to technical and organizational protective measures. The Government further states that as a result, PPE may be used either only in addition to other protective measures or only if risk assessment has showed that technical or organizational measures cannot be taken at all or merely to an extent that is considered insufficient. The Government goes on to emphasize that it should further be taken into consideration that the use of PPE in itself can impair or damage health, and that it is not advisable for the legislator to prescribe the compulsory use of PPE in certain work situations on construction sites as is impossible for all possible constraints to be covered by legislation; and that therefore only the employers can take all constraints into consideration, based on individual situation-related risk assessments. The Government also refers to the fact that other legislation specifically requires the provision and use of PPE if certain limit values are exceeded (for example the noise and vibration protection ordinance, hazardous substances ordinance and technical rules accompanying the hazardous substances ordinance, notably TRGS 500). Finally the Government indicates that the statutory accident insurance companies have made available a number of practical guides to help employers select appropriate PPE in areas including for example on the use of breathing equipment and on retaining best and coupling mans for retaining belts. The Committee wishes to recall that this approach places high demands on the enforcement of the provisions on risk assessment and their effective application in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide further detailed information on the application of this approach in practice including examples of the methods used to ensure such an effective implementation of this Article in practice.

Part VI of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes the information provided regarding the elaboration of the common occupational safety and health strategy between the competent inspectorates of the Länder and the statutory accident insurance institutions, in which they agreed on core activities and harmonized information, advisory and implementing measures to reduce accidents and occupational diseases in the construction sector, in particular in building and assembly scaffolding and demolition, but that no interim reports are available for the reporting period. The Committee asks the Government to provide further detailed information on the impact of this common approach on the number of occupational accidents and diseases in the referenced sectors. In that context the Committee requests the Government to also provide information on whether and to what extent particular attention is given to occupational safety and health in demolition work involving demolition of buildings containing asbestos and any information on the incidence of asbestos related diseases among construction workers.

Laws and regulations and the Plan of Action (2010–16). The Committee notes the information provided once again by the Government indicating that the new Occupational Safety and Health Regulations have not yet been adopted. The Committee has been referring to this matter for many years and observes that the Government appears to be encountering difficulties in the adoption of the Regulations, which would establish the general occupational safety and health framework and would facilitate the application of the other occupational safety and health (OSH) Conventions that have been ratified. In this respect, the Committee takes this opportunity to inform the Government that in March 2010 the Governing Body adopted a Plan of Action to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key OSH instruments, which are the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its Protocol of 2002 and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (GB.307/10/2(Rev.)). The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that, under the terms of the Plan of Action, the Office is available to provide assistance to governments, where appropriate, to assist in bringing their law and practice into conformity with these key OSH Conventions with a view to promoting their ratification and effective implementation, as well as to provide assistance in relation to the other OSH Conventions. The Committee also wishes to indicate that the approach adopted by these three key instruments can make an effective contribution to the management of OSH systems based on a preventive, coherent and tripartite approach to OSH. The Committee invites the Government to examine the obstacles encountered in the adoption of the Regulations referred to above, and particularly for the adoption of legislation to give effect to the present Convention, and requests it to provide information on these obstacles and on any need for technical assistance identified in this connection.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guinea

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government indicates, in its last report, that a draft Order respecting air pollution, noise and vibration, cesspools, drinking water and protection against radiations had been prepared, but was subsequently separated into several draft Orders to make them more easily applicable. These draft Orders should have been adopted some time ago. However, the Advisory Commission on Labour and Social Legislation, as a tripartite commission, is composed of various members with very different concerns and sometimes constraints at the national level, which prevented it from completing its usual session. Furthermore, the Government states that the State of Guinea has priorities, even with regard to the adoption of laws and regulations. The Committee states that the Government has been expressing the intention for many years of adopting regulations to protect workers against ionizing radiations, without however in practice taking the necessary measures to this effect. It notes with regret that the Government's attitude disregards the urgency of taking the necessary legislative action for the adoption of regulations respecting protection against ionizing radiations. In this respect, the Committee recalls that this Convention was ratified by Guinea in 1966 and that since then the Committee has had to comment on various points concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee recalls that, when the Government takes the sovereign decision to ratify a Convention, it undertakes to adopt all the necessary measures to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in question. The Committee also considers that, while the Government may cite the existence of other matters which must take priority in the adoption of laws and regulations, it would be appropriate after the number of years that have elapsed for it to take the necessary measures to ensure that the draft Orders relating to the application of the provisions of this Convention are adopted as soon as possible. The Committee therefore once again hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the adoption of provisions covering all activities involving the exposure of workers to ionizing radiations in the course of their work and in conformity with the dose limits referred to in its general observation of 1992, in the light of current knowledge, such as that contained in the 1990 Recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) and in the Basic Safety Standards for Protection Against Ionising Radiation and for the Safety of Radiation Sources of 1994.

Articles 2, 3(1), 6 and 7 of the Convention. In its previous comment, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the current dose limits correspond to an equivalent of an annual dose of 50 mSv for persons exposed to ionizing radiations. The Committee had recalled the maximum dose limits for ionizing radiations established in the 1990 Recommendations of the International Commission on Radiological Protection and in the 1994 Basic International Safety Standards for Radiation Protection. For workers directly engaged in work exposed to radiation, this limit is 20 mSv per year averaged over five years (100 mSv over five years), and the actual dose must not exceed 50 mSv in any year. The Committee also draws attention to the dose limits envisaged for apprentices aged from 16 to 18 years, set out in Annex II, paragraph II-6, of the 1994 Basic International Safety Standards for Radiation Protection. The Committee once again hopes that the maximum doses and quantities to be included in the Government's draft Order will be in conformity with the maximum permitted doses and quantities, and that the Government does indeed envisage adopting the above draft Order.

Situations of occupational exposure in emergencies and provision of alternative employment. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures which have been taken or are envisaged in relation to the points raised in paragraph 35(c) and (d) of the conclusions of its 1992 general observation under this Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 11 of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous comments indicating that it has taken due note that section 170 of the Labour Code seems to permit employers to authorize or to order workers to remove safety devices, contrary to Article 11 of the Convention. It also notes the Government's statement that such authorization is only based on prior measures taken by the employer to avoid all exposure to occupational risks, and that in any event it is the responsibility of the employer to promote best safety conditions at workplaces periodically visited by the labour inspectorate. The Committee would nonetheless request the Government to consider including in the draft Labour Code implementing regulations that are in preparation, a specific provision prohibiting such authorization or order to remove safety devices, as required by this Article of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government, in accordance with section 171 of the Labour Code, will be submitting draft orders on sanitary facilities in workplaces and the provision of drinking water and non-alcoholic drinks in enterprises and establishments. The Committee also notes the draft decree establishing Committees on Occupational Safety, Health and Working Conditions (CHSCT).

The Committee recalls that, since 1989, it has been asking the Government to adopt the ministerial orders envisaged in section 171 of the Labour Code in the following areas: ventilation (Article 8 of the Convention); lighting (Article 9); drinking water (Article 12); seats for all workers (Article 14); and noise and vibrations (Article 18) in order to give effect to these provisions of the Convention. The Committee hopes that such decrees will be adopted after consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers, in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls its previous observation in which it drew attention to the fact that all workers who are mainly engaged in office work, including workers in the public services, are covered by the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the near future to ensure the full application of the Convention in the public service and requests the Government to indicate the progress made in this regard.

Part IV of the report form. The Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the information that it is requested to provide in this respect concerns the number of workers covered by the national legislation and the number and nature of the contraventions reported. This type of information may be found, for example, in the reports of the labour inspection services.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government does not presently intend to amend Order No. 2265/MT of 9 April 1982, but envisages formulating, in consultation with the social partners, technical guidelines on harmful, hazardous and carcinogenic products, particularly benzene. The Committee also notes that the guidelines envisaged will be made available to all users. It hopes that the guidelines will be formulated and adopted without delay and requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this matter.

Article 4(2) of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's information on processes which use methods of work that are as safe as those carried out in an enclosed system. It notes in particular that the increase in labour and health inspections in enterprises and the involvement of Workers' Committees for Health, Safety and Working Conditions (CHSCT) ensure that the processes are carried out under the safest possible conditions. The Committee requests the Government to provide an indication of the frequency of the inspections carried out in enterprises that use benzene. It also requests the Government to provide copies of the statistics collected during inspections, to enable the Committee to assess the extent to which this provision of the Convention is applied in practice.

Article 6(2) and (3). With regard to the concentration of benzene vapour in the air of workplaces, the Committee notes that a draft Order concerning data files on the safety of chemical substances establishes a level not exceeding 10 ppm or 32 mg/m³ over an eight-hour time-weighted average. The Committee accordingly concludes that the ceiling established in the draft Order is lower than the one established in the Convention when it was adopted in 1971. It nevertheless wishes to point out to the Government that the threshold limit value recommended by the American Conference of Government Industrial Hygienists (ACGIH) is 0.5 ppm over an eight-hour time-weighted average. It therefore invites the Government to take measures to bring the ceiling value established by the draft Order into line with the value recommended by the ACGIH. The Committee also requests the Government to specify the guidelines issued by the competent authority on the procedure for determining the concentration of benzene in places of employment. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the abovementioned Order as soon as it is adopted.

Article 8(2). With regard to limiting the duration of exposure of workers who, for special reasons, may be exposed to concentrations of benzene in the air of places of employment which exceed the maximum established, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, a study is under way on this matter. It requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in this regard.

The Committee also requests the Government to provide relevant extracts of the inspection reports and the statistics available on the number of employees covered by the legislation as well as the number and nature of violations reported, as requested under Part IV of the report form.

In its previous comments, the Committee noted the Government's statement that a draft Order on occupational cancer giving full effect to the provisions of the Convention had been formulated with ILO technical assistance. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this Order is still under consideration for enactment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139) (ratification: 1976)

Referring to the comments the Committee has been making for several years concerning Article 2(1) of the Convention, the Government has explained in several of its reports that, under section 4 of Order No. 93/4794/MARAFDPT/DNTLS of 4 June 1993, an employer is required to replace a carcinogenic substance or agent by a non-carcinogenic or less carcinogenic substance or agent provided that one exists, each time that such replacement can be envisaged in view of the given circumstances. The Committee notes that, in its last report, the Government indicates briefly that measures will be taken as soon as the new Labour Code is adopted to align the provisions of section 4 of the abovementioned Order. The Committee asks the Government to send a copy of the new Labour Code as soon as it is adopted and to indicate any progress made in this matter.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(1) of the Convention. The Committee notes that the draft conditions of service of the public service, which is being discussed within the Government, should contain the necessary measures to give full effect to the provisions of this Article of the Convention through their application in practice in all branches of economic activity. The Committee requests the Government to keep the International Labour Office informed of developments relating to these conditions of service and to provide a copy of them when they have been adopted.

Articles 4, 8 and 10. The Committee notes the information concerning a draft Order, prepared by the Government, which was due to be examined by the Advisory Committee on Labour and Social Legislation. This draft text would cover cesspits, drinking water, noise, vibration, air pollution, etc. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this text is issued under section 171(1) of the Labour Code. It reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 4, the provisions adopted must prescribe the specific measures to be taken both for the prevention of occupational hazards due to air pollution, noise and vibration, and to control and protect workers against these hazards. The Committee also reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 8 of the Convention, the above draft text should provide for the establishment of criteria for determining the hazards of exposure to air pollution, noise and vibration and should specify exposure limits. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not indicate whether the above draft text provides, as required by Article 10, for the provision of personal protective equipment where the measures taken to eliminate hazards do not bring air pollution, noise and vibration within the limits specified by the competent authority. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the adoption of this draft text, to provide a copy when it has been adopted and to inform it of any other specific measures taken for the application of the provisions of Articles 4, 8 and 10 of the Convention.

Article 9. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the technical measures and supplementary work organizational measures intended to eliminate the above hazards.

Article 14. The Committee notes that the National Occupational Medicine Service is equipped with a laboratory which is inadequately provided with appropriate instruments for its needs, but that the Government plans within a relatively short period to provide the above Service with modern and appropriate equipment. It requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the progress made in equipping the National Occupational Medicine Service and to inform it of any other measures taken to promote such research.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Hungary

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report, including on the adoption of new laws and regulations, including the amendment to Decree No. 25/2000 (IX.30.) EüM-SzCsM to take into account new limit values related to the exposure to asbestos; Decree No. 66/2005 (XII.22.) EüM-SzCsM concerning the exposure to noise and Decree No. 22/2005 (VII.24.) EüM of the Minister of Health regarding exposure to vibration. Based on available information the Committee notes the effect given to Articles 8(1) and (2), and 9 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the referenced legislation was not attached to the report. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on legislative developments in the country and to make the relevant legislative texts available to the Committee.

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application and definitions. The Committee notes that the report is silent as to whether the new legislation, adopted by the Minister of Health has amended the scope of national legislation so as to ensure compliance with this provision of the Convention and that only excerpts of the relevant texts have been made available to the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide further detailed information regarding the scope of the relevant legislation.

Article 11(3). Provision of alternative employment. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government does not include a response to the comment raised by the Committee regarding the rules concerning the transfer of workers who have been exposed to air pollution noise or vibration where continued assignment is considered medically inadvisable, and measures taken to ensure that transferred workers are able to maintain their income. In this respect, the Committee would like draw the Government's attention to the fact that the provision of Article 11(3) also relates to situations before any occupational disease has been declared but after a determination that continued assignment to work involving exposure to air pollution noise and vibration has been found to be medically inadvisable. The Committee again requests the Government to provide further information on measures taken to ensure the transfer to alternative employment of workers who, based on medical opinion, are required to discontinue work involving exposure to air pollution, noise or vibration and how it is ensured that such workers are able to maintain their income.

Article 12. Notification to the competent authority of exposure of workers to occupational hazards. The Committee notes that in its response the Government indicates that, in conformity with harmonized legislation with the European Community, there are no notification obligations with respect to risks related to vibration and noise at workplaces. The Committee also notes that the report is silent as regards the competent authority's entitlement to authorize or prohibit the use of certain processes, machinery and equipment as provided in Article 12. The Government also indicates that, following consultations in the tripartite National ILO Council on the report for the ILO, the workers' organizations expressed the view that national law was not in conformity with Article 12 of the Convention. The Committee deems it relevant yet again to refer to paragraph 68 of its general comments on the application of Conventions on occupational safety and health in its 1997 General Report, where the Committee stated that "there is a difference between international standards and regional standards in the approach adopted to occupational safety and health problems and the manner in which they are to be addressed. The incorporation of regional standards into national legislation is not always sufficient to meet the requirements of the international standards of the ILO. States should therefore be reminded that greater attention should be paid to these standards in the revision and formulation of national laws and regulations". The Committee requests the Government to clarify measures taken to ensure full conformity with this provision of the Convention in law and in practice taking the comments of the workers' organizations into account.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that the report does not contain any information on the application in practice of the Convention as requested. The Committee requests the Government to provide a general appreciation of the application in practice of the Convention, including, for instance, extracts from the reports of the inspection services.

The Committee notes the detailed report submitted by the Government, including information regarding relevant legislation and statistics regarding application in practice of the Convention. Based on available information, the Committee notes the effect given to Articles 16, 19, 21 and 23 of the Convention.

Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. As regards application in practice, the Committee notes the statistical data provided regarding the construction industry, including information on infringements of relevant legislation in 2006–09, and the number of occupational accidents recorded in 2007–09. In terms of infringements, the information provided seems to indicate a downward trend regarding infringements of rules concerning protective equipment and an upward trend regarding infringements of the rules on shock protection. As regards the information regarding occupational accidents, it is difficult to determine any distinct trends. The Committee also notes the information in the Government's report that, following consultations with employers' and workers' organizations – including on the workers' side the National Federation of Autonomous Trade Unions; the Trade Union of Intellectuals; the Democratic League of Independent Trade Unions; the National Confederation of Workers' Councils; and the Co-operation Forum of Trade Unions – the workers' organizations have observed that resolutions on imposing labour protection fines were passed only for a fraction of the breaches of labour protection. In response thereto, the Government indicates that the inspection authority may impose a labour protection fine only in cases provided for in section 82(1) of Act XCIII of 1993 on labour protection which provides, inter alia, that fines be imposed in situations where the infringements "seriously endanger the life, physical integrity and health of workers" and that the inspector shall resort to misdemeanour proceedings in other cases implying serious risks. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on measures taken to address the upward trend regarding infringements of rules on shock protection and on how section 82(1) of Act XCIII of 1993 is applied in practice in the light of the comments of the workers' organizations.

Iraq

Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption and transmission to the ILO of Internal Regulations No. 1 (2006) concerning the Control of the use of Radioactive Sources in Iraq (2006 Regulations) issued by the Radioactive Source Regulatory Authority that these regulations provide for the steps to be taken to ensure effective protection of workers against ionizing radiations and to restrict the exposure of workers to the lowest practicable level avoiding any unnecessary exposure, as prescribed under Articles 3(1), 5, 6(2) and 11 of the Convention, including established dose limits for the various categories of persons referred to in the Convention, and that the dose limits so prescribed are in accordance with the 1990 Recommendation of the International Commission on Radiological Protection to which the Committee refers in its 1992 general observation under the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Italy

Legislation. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its last report. It notes with satisfaction that the Legislative Decree No. 81 of 9 April 2008, the "Single Text for the Protection of Safety and Health in Workplaces (TULS)", establishes a comprehensive framework for the protection of workers exposed to carcinogenic substances and agents (Part IX, Chapter II). Concerning its previous comments, the Committee takes note of the fact that the new legislation replaces different regulations on safety and health at workplace, inter alia, the Legislative Decree No. 626 of 19 September 1994. In addition, the Committee takes notes of the fact that, by means of sections 234 and 245 of the Legislative Decree No. 81 of 2008, Italian law, in line with Article 1 of the Convention, provides for a list of carcinogenic and mutagenic substances and ensures that this list is periodically reviewed by the National Consultative Commission for Toxicology. The Committee notes the update of the list of carcinogenic and mutagenic substances attached to the Government's report. Section 243 of the named Legislative Decree ensures the conformity of Italian legislation with Article 3 of the Convention, by establishing a system of records, composed of a registry and a sanitary file for each worker at risk and the obligation to keep those files at the Higher Institute for Occupational Safety and Health (ISPESL). This body is in charge of data collection and monitoring on occupational hazards related to exposure to carcinogenic substances (the data are received from the National Institute for Social Security, the National Institute of Statistics, the National Insurance Institute for Employment Injuries, physicians and public and private hospitals); each year the ISPESL communicates them to the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Labour.

Article 5 of the Convention. Medical examinations and health supervision. Alternative employment or other measures offered for maintaining income where continued assignment to work involving exposure is medically inadvisable. In its previous comments the Committee referred to the situation of workers for whom a continued assignment to work involving exposure to carcinogenic substances was found medically inadvisable. The Committee pointed out that, in case a relocation of the workers to other positions (at equivalent or lower level) within the same enterprise was not possible, they needed to be assisted in finding alternative employment or with measures to protect their income. Against this background, the Committee takes note of the fact that the previous legislation regulating this issue is no longer in force but that section 42 of the TULS requires the employer to assign the worker who has been declared unable to work under exposure to carcinogenic substances to an equivalent position and, when this is not possible, to a lower position (while retaining the same remuneration). The Committee further notes that, according to section 8, Law

No. 68 of 12 March 1999, in case the assignment to another position with the same employer is not possible, the placement agencies are in charge of helping the dismissed workers to find alternative employment, thus in conformity with point 14 of the ILO Occupational Cancer Recommendation, 1974 (No. 147). In addition, the Committee takes note of the fact that, according to Decree 1124 of 30 June 1965, when workers contract an occupational disease (as under the list contained in Annex 4 of the named Decree), the National Insurance Institute for Employment Injuries (INAIL) provides for, between others, compensation for temporary and permanent inability to work. Concerning health supervision, the Committee notes the information supplied by the Government on the medical examinations to be conducted before and during the employment activities of workers exposed to carcinogenic substances. The Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of this Article, these examinations must also be carried out after the period of employment. The Committee requests the Government to make provision in law and in practice for medical examinations following the period of employment and requests it to provide information in this respect.

Part IV of the report form and Article 6(c). Inspection reports, statistics and appropriate system of inspection. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the detailed information provided by the Government. The Committee notes the data on occupational diseases collected by the INAIL in the period between 2006 and 2011, with statistics disaggregated by region, sector of activity and type of disease. According to these statistics, between 2006 and 2010 there has been an increase of 58.3 per cent of occupational diseases reported (from 26,752 in 2006 to 42,347 in 2010), out of which the majority is related to musculoskeletal disorders (from 10,069 in 2006 to 25,937 in 2010, with an increase of 157.6 per cent), and hearing loss (from 6,483 in 2006 to 6,277 in 2010, with a decrease of 3.2 per cent). The Committee also notes that the asbestos exposure-related diseases continue to increase. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government on the Italian Information System on Occupational Exposure to Carcinogens (SIREP), which has been created by the ISPESL with the aim to monitor the exposure of workers to carcinogenic substances and the report of the National Registry of Mesotheliomas (ReNaM) for the period 1993–2004, which contains data on the types of cancers contracted at workplaces disaggregated by gender. According to this data, out of 6,640 cases of mesothelioma, in the period between 1993 and 2004, the majority of which are pleural cancers (6,203 cases); amongst the others there are cancers developed on the peritoneum area (396 cases). The Committee also notes the data concerning asbestos-related lung cancer mortality for the period 1980–2001 (12,216 pleural cancer deaths). The Committee, therefore, invites the Government to continue providing updated information and statistics on the number of professional cancers, with data disaggregated also by type of cancer.

Japan

Article 1 of the Convention. Periodic updating of the carcinogenic substances that are either prohibited or subject to authorization or control. The Committee notes with interest the information that the coverage of national legislation concerning carcinogenic substances and agents has been extended to include all kinds of asbestos and products containing asbestos as well as certain nickel compounds and formaldehyde among the regulated and prohibited substances, and that the definition of “asbestos” now includes “amosite” and “crocidolite” following the definition of asbestos of the ILO. The Committee also notes the comments by the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) attached to the Governments’ report, according to which it raises concerns that the efforts of the Japanese Government in carrying out toxicity tests (including threshold assessments) remains inadequate due to budgetary constraints. JTUC–RENGO refers to reductions made in both the duration of testing procedures and the number of specimens tested, and considers that it is necessary for the Government to develop alternative testing procedures, in line with advances in toxicology, that can be carried out in shorter testing periods and at less cost, in particular in carcinogen research. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on measures taken to address the concerns raised by JTUC–RENGO.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Kuwait

Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136) (ratification: 1974)

Article 6(3) of the Convention. Measurement of the concentration of benzene. Part IV of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes that it has, on several occasions in previous comments, requested the Government to provide concrete information on how Order No. 210 of 2 October 2001 on executive regulations of Act No. 21/1995 is applied in practice and how compliance with the required limit for exposure to benzene of 0.5 mg/l is maintained in practice. The Committee yet again notes that the Government in its most recent report repeats its reference to the activities of the labour inspection services, without submitting any supporting information on actual labour inspection carried out. Recalling that Article 6(3) of the Convention requires the competent authority to issue directions on carrying out the measurement of the concentration of benzene in the workplace, the Committee urges the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of the Convention in practice, including extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number of employed persons covered by the measures adopted, to give effect to the Convention and on the number and nature of the contraventions reported.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Kyrgyzstan

Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes that the most recent report on the application of this Convention was received in 1994 and that it is yet uncertain whether Articles 5(3), 6(2), 12 and 14 are fully applied in the country. The Committee also notes, however, the publication in 2008 by the Government, in collaboration with the ILO, of Occupational safety and health in the Kyrgyz Republic – National profile. According thereto a number of laws, regulations and technical standards have been adopted since 1994 which indicate promising developments in the area of occupational safety and health. The Committee also notes that according to this national profile the Government is considering the ratification of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129), the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187). Welcoming these developments, the Committee asks the Government to report on progress in this regard. It also urges the Government to fulfil its reporting obligations under this ratified Convention, and invites the Government to consider whether it would benefit from technical assistance from the Office regarding the development of legislation giving effect to the provisions of the present Convention and the reporting obligations associated with such ratified Conventions. In the meantime the Committee must yet again repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 5(3) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of collective and other agreements containing mutual obligations designed to ensure safe and healthy working conditions.

Article 6(2). The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the general procedures prescribed for the collaboration of employers where two or more of them undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace. It also asks the Government to provide a copy of the Standards and Regulations for Health and Safety in Construction Work (No. III-4-80) and of the Order of the Ministry of Industry and Energy governing work done jointly by several enterprises at the same workplace in coalmining.

Article 12. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the Regulations on state medical supervision referred to in its report.

Article 14. The Committee asks the Government to describe the measures taken to promote research, in accordance with this Article.

Luxembourg

Article 4 of the Convention. National policy. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, within the framework of the periodic review of its national occupational safety and health (OSH) policy, the Government, in consultation with the social partners, proceeded to ratify in 2008 the Protocol of 2002 to the present Convention and the following Conventions, for which the first reports were received on 25 October 2010: the Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115); the Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119); the Hygiene (Commerce and Offices) Convention, 1964 (No. 120); the Maximum Weight Convention, 1967 (No. 127); the Benzene Convention, 1971 (No. 136); the Occupational Cancer Convention, 1974 (No. 139); the Working Environment (Air Pollution, Noise and Vibration) Convention, 1977 (No. 148); the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161); the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162); the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167); the Chemicals Convention, 1990 (No. 170); the Prevention of Major Industrial Accidents Convention, 1993 (No. 174); the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176); the Safety and Health in Agriculture Convention, 2001 (No. 184). In this respect, the Committee takes this opportunity to recall that in March 2010 the Governing Body adopted a Plan of Action 2010–16 to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the key occupational safety and health instruments (Convention No. 155, its Protocol of 2002 and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187)). As the Government has ratified the present Convention and its Protocol, as well as sectoral and thematic OSH Conventions, the Committee takes this opportunity to draw the Government's attention to the fact that Convention No. 187 effectively supplements the holistic approach to OSH. The Committee invites the Government to provide information in the manner in which the periodical review of its national policy, as envisaged in this Article, is undertaken, and its outcome.

Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) (ratification: 2008)

Article 3 of the Convention. Progressive development of occupational health services for all workers. The Committee notes the Government's first report providing detailed information and it notes with interest the information that occupational health services have been operational in Luxembourg since January 1995 for all workers in the private sector and since 2004 for the public sector. In the private sector, there are three major types of occupational health services: (1) inter-enterprise services organized by sector; (2) enterprise health services; and (3) a compulsory multi-sectoral health service covering all enterprises which have not opted for one of the first two solutions. It also notes the practical information provided indicating, among other matters, that occupational health has become an indispensable link in the system of medical supervision of the active population, as in 44 per cent of cases the occupational physician is the only doctor consulted during the year.

Mexico

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011).

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO). The Committee notes the discussions that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2011, the conclusions of the Conference Committee, a communication from the National Union of Federal Roads and Bridges Access and Related Services of Mexico (SNTCPF) received on 2 September 2011, the Government's report received on 11 October 2011 and its appendices, and the observations from the Government on a communication from the aforementioned union received in 2010. The Committee is following up on the recommendations made by the Governing Body in March 2009 (document GB.304/14/8) further to the accident that took place at the Pasta de Conchos coalmine in Coahuila. The Committee indicates that the discussions and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards also refer to the follow-up to the report and, in that context, to the application of this Convention to workers in coalmines in Coahuila. The communications from the trade union in 2010 and 2011 also refer to the same situation. In view of the fact that the Committee has before it the documents mentioned above and their numerous appendices and questions relating to the issues raised by the Governing Body, the Conference Committee and the Committee of Experts in previous years, the Committee will restructure the follow-up by combining related themes. The Committee will briefly note in its comment the main aspects of the communication of 2011 and will examine the communication in further detail in conjunction with any observations the Government sees fit to make, including with regard to allegations of child labour in the coalmines, which the Committee will examine in due course as part of its examination of the application of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

I. Measures to be taken in consultation with the social partners

Articles 4(1) and (2) and 7 of the Convention. National policy. Overall reviews or reviews relating to specific areas: hazardous types of work such as those performed in the coalmining sector.

(a) Register of reliable data on existing mines and of workers in these mines. In its previous comments the Committee noted a communication from the SNTCPF, to the effect that there is no register that would enable an overview of legal, illegal and clandestine mines in the coal-producing region of Coahuila, and consequently it is impossible to plan the necessary measures, to monitor their application and to inspect the mines. The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards asked the Government to indicate the number and type of mines in the coal-producing region of Coahuila, including, as far as possible, the registered and non-registered sectors. This information is essential to be able to formulate, revise and implement a national occupational safety and health (OSH) policy based on prevention. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (STPS) indicates that the number of workplaces does not necessarily coincide with the number of mining concessions awarded by the Ministry of Mining. The Government indicates that the STPS has a National Directory of Enterprises and that, as at July 2011, the Directory contains 201 registered workplaces in the state of Coahuila involved in coalmining activities. It also indicates that in Coahuila there are 909 mining concessions covering a surface area of 2.5 million hectares and that there are nine large coalmines and 62 medium-sized coalmines. As regards the pocitos (small-scale mines or pits), the Government indicates that from March 2010 the GeoInfoMex satellite system was used for the location of pozos (small-scale mines or pits), a project that ended in May 2011. This resulted in the identification of the existence of 563 vertical shafts, in 297 of which activity was detected, and these will be inspected. The Committee notes that the Government distinguishes between the registration of mining concessions and the registration of workplaces and indicates that it is making progress on coordination among the various state bodies connected with mining in Coahuila. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply up-to-date information on the number and type of mines and, recalling the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, requests it to distinguish between registered and non-registered mines in that information. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate the estimated total number of miners in Coahuila, the number of registered miners and the estimated number of non-registered miners.

The Committee understands that these are two different but complementary issues that form part of the application of the Convention at the workplace and to all the workers employed there, and requests it to take the necessary measures to obtain the fullest possible records and to provide information in this regard.

(b) Accidents in the coalmining sector. The Committee notes the Government's statement that in the last ten years (2001–10) the Mexican Social Security Institute (IMSS) recorded 38,069 occupational accidents and diseases in the mining sector and 340 deaths. The Government indicates that, if a comparison is made between 2001 and 2010, the number of workers in the mining industry increased by 35.74 per cent and that, as regards the number of deaths, there was no significant variation (31 in 2010 and 30 in 2001). The Committee also notes that, according to the communication, from June 2010 to August 2011, 33 more miners died in occupational accidents, including 26 in Coahuila. It also states that 14 miners died on 3 May 2011 at pozo 3 of the BINSÁ company and that none of these 14 were registered with the IMSS, their average age was 24 years, and one 14-year-old worker survived who had left school and was on the payroll, even though the enterprise stated that he was merely accompanying his father. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide detailed information on these issues, including on the accident in which 14 workers died. The Committee also asks the Government to continue providing statistics on accidents in coalmines and on the application of the Convention to mines in which accidents have occurred.

(i) Lulú mine. In 2010, the Committee briefly noted the information supplied by the trade union, indicating that two workers died at the Lulú mine on 6 August 2009. According to the trade union, this mine had been in operation since 2001 but had never been inspected. The union also declares that the employer, "in the manner of the region", put pressure on the families of the workers not to coordinate with the Pasta de Conchos group of families or with the Pastoral Laboral organization, otherwise they would receive nothing. The union indicates that the families filed a complaint on 31 August and described in detail the defects in terms of safety regulations (pithead constructed with unsuitable material, lack of a fire escape, obstacles on the roadway, water lying in the mine, lack of training and no first-aid kit, etc.). It indicates that the workers were registered with the IMSS for 486.45 Mexican pesos (MXN) per week and MXN/1,500 were paid for piecework, without any registration. The SNTCPF declares that, according to the Ministry of Economic Affairs, the Lulú concession was in order but the trade union maintains otherwise, and supplies detailed information to support its arguments. In its 2011 report, the Government states that it had been planned to conduct an inspection at the Lulú mine in August 2009 but that, prior to the inspection, the accident occurred on 6 August, and so an emergency inspection was conducted from 7 to 10 August, followed by another inspection on 13 and 14 August, and access was then restricted. Five inspection visits were conducted to verify that the restriction on access had not been violated, on 31 August, 2, 4 and 15 September, and 29 October 2009. Other inspections and procedures were conducted in 2010, on 2 February 2011 the mine was closed for repeated failure to implement safety measures, and on 10 February 2011 the workers were notified. The Government concludes by stating that the labour inspector, as was his duty, enforced the applicable standards and it therefore rejects the allegations from the union that the inspection activities were "acts of simulation". The Committee notes that the union's communication of 2011 includes as an appendix Recommendation 12/2011 of 29 March 2011 of the National Human Rights Commission (CNDH), which has constitutional rank, concerning the accident at this mine. In its examination of the case, the CNDH states that "with the omissions described above on the part of public servants of the STPS and the Ministry of Economic Affairs, operations at the abovementioned enterprise were allowed under conditions that did not guarantee the integrity and health of the workers, and they were placed in grave danger and were exposed to situations such as the one that resulted in the death of (two workers)". It also states that this situation contravened Articles 7 and 9 of the present Convention.

(ii) Ferber pocito mine. In its communication of 2010, the union indicated that on 13 August 2009 the periodic inspection of this mine was conducted and, leaving aside the provisions that do not apply to small-scale operations, 85 breaches of the provisions were recorded and 76 corrective measures were ordered, with restriction on access. On 11 September a 23-year-old worker died. The union also indicates that the labour inspectorate only appeared on 17 September 2009 to conduct the inspection. It claims that the Ferber construction company's arrangements for severance of the workers' employment were illegal and that the employer abandoned the scene of the accident without securing or signposting the entrance. The union concludes by stating that there was negligence on the part of the STPS of Coahuila, inasmuch as the latter seemed to consider it sufficient to complete the inspection forms, and that these "acts of simulation" leave the miners and their families in a state of helplessness. In its 2011 report, the Government corroborates the inspection of 13 August, explaining that a second inspection was made on 17 September because the employer failed to meet his obligation to notify the accident; subsequent inspections were conducted on 21 September, when the restriction on access to the mine was reiterated. The labour authority has established physically that the Ferber pocito mine no longer exists, but the prosecution proceedings are continuing and the authority has offered support to the family of the worker who died. The Committee notes that, during the examination of the case conducted by the CNDH (Recommendation No. 85/2010 of 21 December 2010), the CNDH affirmed in similar terms that the provisions of the present Convention have been breached.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Lulú mine and the Ferber pocito mine are not covered by the recommendations adopted by the Governing Body in its report on the representation but that it is providing information with a view to clarifying such matters. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that information on accidents in these mines actually forms part of the follow-up to the recommendations made by the Governing Body since the recommendation in paragraph 99(b)(i) of the report refers to ensuring the application of Articles 4 and 7 of the Convention with particular emphasis on coalmines, and the recommendation in paragraph 99(b)(iii) of the report refers to ensuring the affiliation of Article 9 of the Convention “in order to reduce the risk that accidents such as the accident in Pasta de Conchos occur in the future”. The Committee therefore indicates that information on accidents in the coalmines of Coahuila and the analysis of their causes contribute towards determining the real impact of the measures adopted and understanding whether everything was done that reasonably could have been expected to be done to avoid or reduce as far as possible the causes of the hazards inherent to the working environment. The Committee notes the dissemination activities of NOM-032-STPS-2008 and other promotional activities indicated by the Government, and notes that methods for the evaluation of hazards are based on this standard. Nevertheless, it draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the repetition of accidents in mines which have manifestly failed to adopt the requisite OSH measures highlights the necessity of reinforcing government action to ensure the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee therefore urges the Government to undertake, in conformity with Articles 4 and 7 of the Convention and in consultation with the social partners, the periodic examination of the situation relating to the health and safety of workers and the working environment in the coalmines in Coahuila, including the pocito mines, in order to identify the principal problems, draw up effective measures to resolve them, define the order of priority of the measures to be taken and evaluate their results. The Government is also requested to provide detailed information in this regard, including on the consultations undertaken.

Article 9. Adequate system of inspection. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that a draft reform of the Federal Labour Act is awaiting analysis and opinion in Congress, and this draft proposes in particular that inspectors shall be able to restrict access or limit operations in areas where risks are detected to the lives, health or integrity of the workers and conduct a more streamlined procedure for total or partial closure. It also notes the Government’s indication that the labour and mining authorities have developed a joint strategy for preventing a workplace from continuing to operate when, during any inspection and without the need to exhaust the procedures laid down in section 512-D of the Federal Labour Act, imminent risks of violation of the regulations relating to OSH have been identified. The Government declares that, under this strategy, once the labour inspector has issued an order for access to be restricted, this is immediately brought to the attention of the National Directorate of Mines at the Ministry of Economic Affairs so that this department can issue an order for the provisional suspension of work at the mine. If the risks continue after the inspection visit, the mining authority is requested to order the permanent suspension of work. The Government states that the National Directorate of Mines was thus notified by the STPS of 14 restrictions on access on account of imminent danger, and suspension was notified on ten sites. It also indicates that improvements were made to the procedures for enforcing closure as envisaged in section 512-D of the Federal Labour Act and, accordingly, the Lulú mine was closed on 10 February 2011. The Committee also notes that the Government has supplied a CD and a folder of labour inspection documents relating to the coalmines of Coahuila. The Committee draws the Government’s attention to the fact that, for this information to be useful to the Government and the social partners and also to the Committee, the Government needs to undertake an analysis of the information, identifying trends regarding the cases of non-compliance detected, the effectiveness or otherwise of the measures taken by, or available to the labour inspectorate for remedying cases of non-compliance, especially in cases of serious and imminent danger, including its own evaluation in conjunction with the social partners of whether the system and the legal remedies available are appropriate and sufficient. The Committee refers to its previous paragraphs in which it noted the cases of the Ferber and Lulú mines as providing an illustration of the application and monitoring of OSH regulations. The Committee notes with concern that the Lulú mine which the Government closed on 10 February 2011 had its first inspection on 7 August 2009, the day following the death of two workers, that numerous irregularities relating to OSH were reported, and that in spite of this the closure of the mine took 17 months. In the case of the Ferber mine, the proprietor undertook the closure. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the inspectors enforced the existing regulations. In that case, those regulations do not appear to constitute a framework that ensures an appropriate and adequate inspection system for safeguarding the lives, safety and health of workers in underground coalmines. Furthermore, the Committee reminds the Government that in its recommendations the Governing Body asked the Government to ensure, by all necessary means, the effective monitoring of the application in practice of laws and regulations on occupational safety and health and the working environment, in consultation with the social partners. The Committee therefore requests the Government to examine, as part of the review required by the Committee pursuant to Article 7, the manner in which the labour inspectorate can be strengthened, particularly in cases of imminent danger, and to provide information on this matter and also on the measures for immediate enforcement currently at the disposal of the labour inspectorate, including closure in the event of imminent danger to the health and safety of the workers. It also requests the Government to undertake an analysis of the inspections conducted of which it informed the Committee in order to identify the principal problems with a view to achieving greater effectiveness in inspection work in coalmines and also provide information on the measures proposed for tackling these problems.

Pending the abovementioned reviews, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures in the very near future to safeguard the lives and safety of the workers and to send information in this regard.

With regard to the Occupational Safety and Health Self-Management Programme, the Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on its operation, including details of the requirements for joining the Programme, the manner in which the labour inspection services monitor activities implemented under the Programme and its impact on safety and health in mines and in the “pocitos” where coal is extracted.

Request for information on any developments concerning the possible ratification of the Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176), based on Mexican Official Standard NOM-032-STPS-2008 concerning safety in underground coalmines. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that on 18 July 2011 consultations were held, with a view to evaluating whether ratification should occur, with various state bodies, plus the Confederation of Chambers of Industry (CONCAMIN), the Employers’ Confederation of the Republic of Mexico (COPARMEX), the Confederation of Workers of Mexico (CTM) and the Mining and Metallurgy Union. The Government states that at the time of sending its report (October 2011) it was awaiting the requested information. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the results of these consultations with the social partners.

II. Other measures

Compensation, pensions. The Committee notes the union’s indication in its communication of 2010 that death certificates were issued, which would supposedly speed up procedures, but in fact this only resulted in the calculation of pensions and compensation amounting to a starvation wage for the families owing to the fact that, when the time and date of the miners’ deaths were indicated, the payment of a “triple wage” to the families which should have been made by the company in the following days was cancelled (despite the company’s obligation to maintain this commitment until the handing over of the mortal remains) and was suspended in March 2007. This triple wage meant that the deceased workers’ contributions to the IMSS were maintained for more than one year, as though they were still alive, but this sum of money was not given to the families. The union maintains that, in the cases represented by Office of the Federal Attorney for the Defence of Labour (PROFEDET), the wages were not increased and that, in cases involving private lawyers who requested this, the requests were refused because the death certificates were contested and rejected. It also indicates that the enterprise gave humanitarian aid of MXN830,000, which did not represent compensation but was a response to the fact that the awards had been contested. It indicates that the amounts of compensation ranged from MXN66,200 to MXN117,000. The Committee also notes the Government’s statement that, as regards the 57 demands for compensation filed by the families of the miners who died at the Pasta de Conchos mine, a judgment was issued ordering the Industrial de México and General de Hulla companies to pay the beneficiaries the legal contractual benefits for death in an industrial accident, funeral expenses, seniority bonus, vacation allowance and bonus, the extra month’s wage, life insurance savings fund payments, and compensation. The Government also indicates that all the awards were appealed against by the parties. As regards pensions, the Government states in reply to the communication of 2010 that these were not calculated incorrectly but were based on the wages registered with the IMSS. The Government also indicates the rulings handed down by the courts with regard to the appeals against the awards. The Committee requests the Government to indicate which issues are still pending with regard to compensation and pensions for the families of the deceased workers.

State and social benefits. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government but notes that this does not enable the number of beneficiaries among the widows and children of the deceased workers to be identified. Noting that housing and scholarships were promised and that the communication refers to 106 children whose fathers died at Pasta de Conchos, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how many of the children whose fathers died are receiving scholarships and how many of the 65 families have received assistance with housing.

Dialogue with the Pasta de Conchos families. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the Government held various meetings in 2007 and 2011 with the Pasta de Conchos Families’ Organization and the families of the miners with a view to ensuring the observance and full exercise of their rights, including an analysis and discussion of a possible recovery of the bodies. The Committee also notes that the 2011 communication continues to make allegations of harassment of the defenders of the Pasta de Conchos Families’ Organization by means of defamatory public statements that include accusations of opportunism and making money out of the tragedy. The Committee considers that the families of the victims of the Pasta de Conchos accident, including the 106 children who lost their fathers, deserve special care and attention from the Government. The Committee requests the Government to continue the dialogue with the organization and the families in order to find an appropriate solution to the complaints made by the families of the victims of the Pasta de Conchos accident, including with regard to the possibility referred to by the Government of recovering the bodies of the miners, and requests the Government to continue to provide information on the ongoing dialogue.

III. Technical assistance

In its previous comments the Committee invited the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office in relation to the possible ratification of Convention No. 176. It also notes that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, in its 2011 conclusions, also invited the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Director-General of Labour Inspection appointed a person to forward the necessary information to the Office but notes that it has not received any information concerning the Government’s decision to accept the request of the Committee and the Conference Committee. In view of the difficulties relating to application that persist in the coalmining sector, the Committee again requests the Government to avail itself of technical assistance from the Office in order to tackle these problems and requests it to notify the Office of its decision in this regard.

The Committee also draws the Government's attention to its comments on the application of the Labour Administration Convention, 1978 (No. 150).

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Nicaragua

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Determination of carcinogenic substances and agents and establishment of an appropriate system of records. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the existence of new legislation, and particularly Act No. 618 of 2007 (the General Occupational Safety and Health Act) and it requested a detailed report, including information on the application of the Convention in practice and replies to its previous comments. The Committee notes the Government's brief report, which does not enable it to gain a complete overview of the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that, through the Ministry for Natural Resources (MARENA), in coordination with other institutions, Nicaragua is implementing the second phase of the Stockholm Convention, as a result of which 12 persistent organic pollutants (POPs) are prohibited, and that the national legislation is being revised to provide a framework to be used by all national institutions for the provision of supervision and follow-up wherever toxic, hazardous and similar substances are commercialized. With regard to pesticides, the Government indicates that it is intended to carry out an investigation of the population near to the airport in Chinandega which acts as a base for spraying operations. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government does not indicate the substances that are prohibited or the protection measures for workers in the event of exposure. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that the fundamental aspect of Article 1 of the Convention is the determination of a list of carcinogenic substances and agents to which occupational exposure shall be prohibited or made subject to authorization or control and the existence of a mechanism for periodic review. The Committee also notes that the Government does not provide information on the operation of the Single National Registry of Pesticides and Toxic, Hazardous and Other Similar Substances envisaged in section 6 of Basic Act No. 274 to regulate and control pesticides and toxic, hazardous and other similar substances of 1998. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide a copy of the legislation determining the substances to which occupational exposure shall be prohibited or made subject to authorization or control, and those to which other provisions of the present Convention shall apply, the mechanism for review, the protection measures for workers and the records referred to in Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the National Registry of Pesticides and Toxic, Hazardous and Other Similar Substances is already in operation, which will be a body of the authority responsible for the application of Act No. 274 and its Regulations.

Article 2(1). Obligation to have carcinogenic substances and agents replaced by non-carcinogenic substances or agents or by less harmful substances or agents. The Committee notes the Government's indications that sections 19, 20 and 21 of Act No. 618 provide that the employer shall ensure the development of risk maps and prevention programmes together with the Joint Occupational Safety and Health Committee. The Committee notes that these sections refer to training, and not replacement, and it draws the Government's attention to the fact that such broad provisions do not ensure that effect is given to this provision of the Convention. It further notes that section 18(5) provides that employers shall have the obligation to replace what is dangerous by what involves little or no danger. Noting that this section contributes to the application of this provision of the Convention, the Committee observes that the latter is more specific and requires prior determination by the authority of the carcinogenic substances and agents which have to be replaced. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to this Article and to provide information on this subject.

Article 2(2). Duration and degree of exposure. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of section 129 of Act No. 618, the Ministry of Labour shall establish, in respect of chemicals identified in various workplaces, exposure limit values for workers, which shall be established in accordance with international criteria and the national investigations that are undertaken in this area, and it authorizes the Directorate-General of Occupational Safety and Health to take the threshold limit values (TLVs) of the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists (ACGIH) as a reference point in inspections. The Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the application of the legislation in practice including, for example, the provision of information on the limit values laid down by the Ministry of Labour pursuant to section 129, and including information on the application of the Convention to rural workers. Noting that the Government has not provided the requested information, the Committee asks it once again to provide detailed information on this subject.

Article 4. Obligation to inform workers of the dangers involved in working with carcinogenic substances. Noting that the Government has not provided information on the effect given to this Article of the Convention, the Committee again requests that it do so in relation both to law and practice.

Article 5. Medical examinations during employment and thereafter. The Committee notes that sections 23 to 27 of Act No. 618 provide for examinations to be carried out prior to employment and during employment, but do not envisage examinations after employment, as required by the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to adopt measures to give effect to this Article and to provide information on the law and practice.

Part IV of the report form. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention in the country, including the effect given to the requirement to keep records, training, medical examinations, as well as information on the application of the Convention to rural workers, and particularly on the application of the Basic Act No. 274 to regulate and control pesticides and toxic, hazardous and other similar substances in relation to the aspects that are relevant to the present Convention.

The Committee notes with interest the detailed first report of the Government and in particular Decree No. 2 of 15 February 2008 regulating safety, health and hygiene in the construction industry; Executive Decree No. 15 of 3 July 2007 and Act No. 68 of 26 October 2010, which establish a preventive, progressive, coordinated and tripartite approach to health and safety in construction. It notes the Government's indication that Decree No. 2 was drawn up by the Interinstitutional Technical Committee on Occupational Safety and Health, a standing advisory body which was consulted extensively together with the Panamanian Construction Industry Board (CAPAC) and construction industry workers' organizations, such as the Single National Union of Construction Industry and Allied Workers (SUNTRACS). It contains detailed technical provisions relating to health and safety in the various processes and activities of the construction industry, establishes the principle of prevention by means of identification, monitoring, elimination or reduction of hazard factors, and covers notification, consultation, tripartite participation and training of workers and employers. It also establishes the obligation to draw up, during the project planning phase, a study on occupational safety and health (OSH) and a plan resulting from the study, the cost of which must be included in the budget for performance of the work (section 12 of the regulations). The following sections lay down the minimum requirements for the study and safety plan and the obligation to designate a safety coordinator during the execution of the works. Section 400 of the regulations sets up a standing tripartite committee for improvements in OSH in the construction industry, with the participation of representatives of the construction workers, one of which is to be SUNTRACS and the other the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO), two representatives of the employers in the construction industry, one of whom will come from CAPAC and the other from the National Council for Private Enterprise (CONEP), and two representatives of the Government. The task of this committee is to keep the regulations up to date, in line with any innovations in the construction industry. Decree No. 15 of 2007 introduced the concept of the occupational safety official, a post which is filled by engineers or architects specializing in OSH. The Decree also establishes a database of persons who may perform this function, which will be at the National Directorate for Labour Inspection and, in order to ensure the independence and objectivity of safety officials, establishes a fund for OSH in the construction industry with contributions from contract promoters. The Ministry of Labour designates the safety officials. Act No. 68 of 26 October 2010 establishes fines for persons who do not comply with this requirement and states that the "resident suitable professional" must be a constant presence during the execution of the work and lays down monetary fines in connection with the exercise of the profession. The report also indicates that 50 safety officials have just been appointed, of whom 43 perform their duties in the province of Panama, in view of the boom in the construction industry. In addition, a special unit has been established of inspectors for the construction industry, and the 2012 budget for the National Directorate for Labour Inspection includes a provision for hiring more inspectors and safety officials. The Government also states that ongoing training is provided for inspectors in the areas of safe conduct, basic safety and health concepts, physical hazards, electrical hazards and hazards from vibration. The Committee welcomes the legislative and practical measures adopted and requests the Government to continue to supply information on any changes in the legislation.

Plan of Action 2010–16. The Committee wishes to take this opportunity to inform the Government that in March 2010 the Governing Body adopted the Plan of Action 2010–16 to achieve widespread ratification and effective implementation of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), its 2002 Protocol, and the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (GB.307/10/2(Rev.)). The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that, under this Plan, the Office provides technical assistance for governments, where applicable, so that they can bring their law and practice into conformity with these key occupational safety and health instruments, with a view to promoting the ratification and effective implementation thereof. The Committee also reminds the Government that it may avail itself of assistance from the Office with regard to the preparation of reports on ratified Conventions. Noting that Panama has not ratified these key Conventions which cover all workers in all sectors of activity, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any needs that may arise in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Peru

Safety and Health in Mines Convention, 1995 (No. 176) (ratification: 2008)

The Committee notes the Government's first report received on 14 September 2010; the comments on the draft report of the Government sent by the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), received by the Office on 14 September 2010 and forwarded to the Government on 28 September 2010; the comments of the National Confederation of Private Business Associations (CONFIEP), received by the Office on 12 November 2010, and the comments of the Chamber of Commerce of Lima (CCL), both forwarded to the Government on 18 November 2010. The Committee notes the indication by the CGTP, with regard to the authority competent to suspend or restrict mining activities on safety and health grounds, that it would have been advisable for the Government to provide information on the number of mining sites closed as a preventive measure by the Supervisory Body for Investment in Energy and Mining (OSINERGMIN), to provide further information in its report, in addition to referring to the respective legislative provisions, and to indicate the inspections carried out. The Committee notes that, according to the CCL, as envisaged in the legislation on the subject, the State shall ensure that the holders of mining rights are in compliance with the provisions of the Mining Act, its General Regulations, mining safety regulations in all exploration and exploitation concessions and in permits for the establishment of separation, smelting and refining plants. In conclusion, the Committee notes that, according to the CONFIEP, for reasons of timing, when the report was drawn up the recent Occupational Safety and Health Regulations and other additional measures in mining, approved by Supreme Decree No. 055-2010-EM, published in the Diario Oficial el Peruano, on 22 August 2010, were not taken into account. Indeed, the Committee notes that the Government's first report, provided in September 2010, is based on Supreme Decree No. 046-2001-EM, issuing the Mining Safety and Health Regulations, and that the Decree was repealed in full by the sole provision repealing former texts of Supreme Decree No. 055-2010-EM, which consists of 396 sections, 19 annexes and three guidelines. In light of the above, the Committee requests the Government to provide a new detailed report based on the legislation that is in force and on its application in practice, together with the comments that it deems appropriate concerning the communications referred to above.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2012.]

Rwanda

Safety Provisions (Building) Convention, 1937 (No. 62) (ratification: 1962)

National legislation. The Committee notes the information in the Government's report regarding the application of section 3 and Title V of Law No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 to workers in the informal economy. The Committee also notes that the process of drafting a Ministerial Order on health and safety at the workplace in the building industry to fill the legal void created by the abrogation in 2001 of Ordinance No. 21/94 of 23 July 1953 is still ongoing. Concerned about the current situation, the Committee urges the Government to take relevant action without further delay. It would like to inform the Government that the Office is available to provide relevant technical assistance to the Government to assist it in its efforts to bring national law and practice into conformity with this Convention and requests the Government to transmit a copy of any new legislation once it has been adopted.

Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, in conjunction with Part V of the report form. On taking note of the Government's reply, the Committee looks forward to receiving the Government's annual report on the latest statistical information in relation to the number and classification of accidents, including those relevant to workers in the informal economy. The Committee also notes that the Government has indicated that it is in the process of raising the awareness and building the capacity of the labour inspectors. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on this process and any supporting legislative provisions.

Revision of this Convention. The Committee would also like to draw the Government's attention to the Safety and Health in Construction Convention, 1988 (No. 167), which revises Convention No. 62 of 1937 and could well be better adapted to the current situation in the building sector. The ILO Governing Body invited States parties to Convention No. 62 to envisage the ratification of Convention No. 167, which entails, ipso jure, immediate denunciation of Convention No. 62 (GB.268/8/2). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on all possible developments in this respect.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Guarding of Machinery Convention, 1963 (No. 119) (ratification: 1964)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes that the Government's summary report submitted in June 2004 indicated that the Government had no new developments to report.

For a number of years, the Committee has drawn the attention of the Government to the fact that the national legislation does not contain provisions to give effect to Part II of the Convention (prohibition of the sale, hire, transfer in any other manner and exhibition of unguarded machinery) and that it does not provide for the full application of Article 17 of the Convention (which applies to all sectors of economic activity), as it is not applicable to certain branches of activity, inter alia, sea, air or land transport and mining.

Since 1979, in reply to the Committee's comments, the Government has indicated in its reports that a Bill to revise the 1974 Factories Act was being drafted and would contain provisions consistent with those of the Convention, and would apply to all the branches of economic activity. In its latest report (received in 1986), the Government indicates that the draft Factories Bill, 1985, has been examined by the competent parliamentary committee and is to be submitted to Parliament for adoption.

With its report for the period ending 30 June 1991, the Government supplied a copy of extracts of the Factories Bill containing provisions which should give effect to Part II of the Convention. In this connection, the Government was requested to indicate the stage of the legislative procedure reached by the Bill and the body which was in the process of examination of the Bill. Since no information has been provided by the Government in this respect, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the abovementioned Bill will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide a copy of this text, once it has been adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sweden

Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 2006 (No. 187) (ratification: 2008)

The Committee notes the Government's first report including the legislative texts attached. The Committee also notes the observations by the Swedish Trade Union Confederation (LO) and the Swedish Confederation of Professional Employees (TCO) transmitted to the Office by the Government.

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Promoting a safe and healthy working environment by formulating a national policy. The Committee notes that the Government in its report refers to a national policy for the work environment reportedly reflected in the Government's Budget Bill and that a draft national plan of action for a future working environment policy has been prepared. The Government indicates this draft policy includes facilitating and increasing better development of jobs and to break the isolation of people removed from the employment sector and that it has been developed in consultation with social partners and other stakeholders. In this respect the Committee notes that LO and TCO observe that while a national plan of action on a future work environment policy had been prepared, this plan had not yet been adopted in June 2010. The Government is requested to provide further information on current and future national policies on occupational safety and health (OSH) giving effect to this provision of the Convention, and to submit a copy of the relevant national OSH documents.

Article 3(3). Consultation with the most representative organizations of employers and workers. The Committee notes the information that both national legislation and legislation adopted by the Work Environment Authority (WEA) are drafted in tripartite consultation and that the outcome of the application of the obligations concerning Systematic Work Environment Management are shared with the social partners and inspectors in different contexts. It also notes that the LO and TCO indicate that consultations between the WEA and social partners and inspectors have only taken place on rare occasions and only in some districts. The Government is requested to provide information on the outcome and frequency of the consultations held in this regard in the light of the observations of LO and of TCO.

Article 4(2)(c). Mechanisms for ensuring compliance with national laws and regulations, including systems of inspections. The Committee notes the information that the WEA is responsible for enforcement of binding rules on the nature of the work environment and on obligations related thereto, that this authority has developed a system of work environment surveillance, with particular attention paid to workplaces where risks of ill health and accidents are greatest including an inspection system, which guarantees compliance. In this respect the Committee notes the observations from the LO and TCO according to which the number of labour inspectors in 2007 was reduced from 1 to 0.7 inspectors per 10,000 workers which is below the ILO recommendation of one inspector per 10,000 workers. In the light of the observations by LO and TCO, the Government is requested to provide further information on the functioning of and efforts to maintain, progressively develop and periodically review its labour inspection system.

Article 4(3)(a). A national tripartite advisory body, or bodies, addressing OSH issues. The Committee notes that the Government's report indicates that national tripartite bodies exist at the Ministry of Labour and the WEA and, when necessary the Ministry of Labour invites representatives of other departments to attend these consultations. In this respect the Committee notes that LO and TCO question whether these arrangements meet the requirements in the Convention as the tripartite body of the Ministry of Labour is more informative than political in nature and meets too seldom, and as the tripartite body within the WEA only addresses issues delegated to that authority. In the light of the observations by LO and TCO, the Government is requested to provide further information on the functioning of the national tripartite body or bodies addressing occupational safety and health issues.

Article 4(3)(d). Occupational health services in accordance with national law and practice. The Committee notes that the reference made by the Government to the provisions in Chapter 3, section 2(b) of the Work Environment Act according to which the employer shall provide occupational health services to the extent the work conditions require. It also notes the observations by the LO and TCO, according to which the application in practice of the referenced provision has not resulted in giving access to occupational health services for the sectors and businesses that are in the greatest need for such services, and that the effect has been rather the contrary, namely that where there is the greatest need, occupational health services are the most scarce. In the light of the observations by LO and TCO, the Government is requested to provide further information on efforts to maintain, progressively develop and periodically review its occupational health service system.

Article 4(3)(e). Research on occupational safety and health. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that under the Swedish system, state funded work environment research is conducted at higher education establishments. The Committee also notes the LO and TCO comments, that since the closing down of the National Institute of Working Life, research on occupational safety and health issues has regressed and it has become considerably more difficult to find already existing knowledge and to find information on which scientists have responsibility for a particular field of research. In the light of the observations by LO and TCO, the Government is requested to provide further information on efforts made to maintain, progressively develop and periodically review research carried out on OSH related issues.

Article 4(3)(g). Mechanism for collection and data analysis, and provisions for collaboration with relevant insurance or social security schemes. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that, by virtue of Chapter 8, section 1 of the Work Injuries Insurance Act, employers are required to report work injuries to the Social Insurance Agency, and that section 12 of the Work Environment Ordinance places a duty on physicians to report to the WEA any diseases which may be connected with work or of interest from the view point of the working environment. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the WEA is responsible for the collection and annual publication of work injury statistics of work accidents and work-related illnesses and that sample surveys of work-induced disorders are carried out by Statistics Sweden (SCB) and published annually. The Committee also notes the observations of the LO and TCO that the incidence of occupational injuries and diseases is considerably underreported in national statistics due to the structure of the Swedish work injury insurance and that it is thus questionable whether the national mechanism for the collection and analysis of data on occupational accidents and diseases fulfils the requirements of the Convention in this respect. The Government is requested to provide further information on the mechanisms of collection and analysis of data within the national system and processes for the collaboration with the Social Insurance Agency.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Uruguay

Article 4 of the Convention. Formulation, implementation and review of a coherent national policy. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the intense activity on the part of the sectoral tripartite committees dealing with occupational safety and health (OSH). The Government provides information on the following committees: (1) Tripartite Committee on the Construction Industry, which was established 23 years ago and has drawn up two decrees concerning hazard prevention in the sector (Decree No. 111/990 and Decree No. 89/995) and is currently engaged in the revision of the standard of 1995; (2) Tripartite Committee on the Chemicals Industry, which has drafted Decree No. 307/009 and is currently working on a new decree amending two articles of Decree No. 307; (3) Tripartite Committee on the Dairy Industry, which has conducted dissemination activities regarding standards and training in the context of Decree No. 291/2007; (4) Tripartite Committee on Telephone Call Centres, which has been doing intensive work for three years to create a consensus on a decree for hazard prevention in this major sector of activity and is close to finalizing this task; (5) Tripartite Committee on the Clothing Industry, which has been working in the context of Decree No. 291/2007 and is planning a survey of enterprises to gather input with a view to setting the direction for future specific actions; (6) Tripartite Committee on Rural Matters, which drafted Decree No. 321/009 by consensus and is undertaking dissemination activities; (7) Tripartite Committee on Health, which was established in 2011 and is working to install an observatory relating to the conditions of work of health personnel; (8) Tripartite Committee on the Metallurgical Industry, which has been preparing dissemination materials concerning prevention measures but is facing difficulties in its operation; (9) Tripartite Committee on Liquid Petroleum Gas Companies, which has been conducting a joint analysis of conditions of work and has signed memoranda of understanding for reducing the daily hours of work to six hours 40 minutes. Finally, the Government states that the National Council on Occupational Safety and Health is responsible for defining national policy in this sphere and has just taken a decision to adopt the latest list of occupational diseases promoted by the ILO and has on its agenda the regulation of the Occupational Health Services Convention, 1985 (No. 161) and statistical information on occupational accidents. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the establishment of any new committees or activities or the adoption of any new legislation.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO) (document GB.270/15/6). In its previous comments the Committee requested information on the action taken on the recommendations contained in paragraph 41 of the report adopted by the Governing Body in 2005. The Committee notes with satisfaction the comprehensive information supplied by the Government on the action taken on each recommendation made by the Governing Body in the abovementioned report, which demonstrates that it has complied with these recommendations. The Government provides information on the legislation relating to OSH adopted between 2005 and 2009 and the legislation which is being drafted; on the substantial increase, in 2007 and 2008, in the operational capacity of the labour inspectorate and the measures taken by the inspectorate in relation to OSH; on the vitality of tripartite dialogue; on the joint work with the organization responsible for statistics at national level, which will enable better results to be achieved within several months, and also the training and technical assistance granted to workers and enterprises. Furthermore, the Government attaches the 2010 annual report of the Labour and Social Security Inspectorate-General, which contains valuable information on the activities of the inspectorate relating to OSH. Consequently, the Committee declares the follow-up to the recommendations contained in report GB.270/15/6 to be closed.

Legislation. The Committee noted previously that sections 356 to 363 of Act No. 18362 establish a register of construction works and their traceability, to apply as from 2009. The register would operate within the General Inspectorate of Labour and Social Security (IGTSS) and the Government stated its view that the register consisted of a database of enormous importance to the construction industry and state bodies, as it will contain all information of importance in real time concerning the various public and private sector construction processes and those operating them. The Committee notes with interest Decree No. 481/009 to regulate the operation of the register, which, according to the 2010 annual report of the IGTSS, is up and running. Decree No. 481 defines the scope and establishes the requirements for the registration of construction work which include submission of an occupational safety and health study and plan (section 4) and sets out the functions of the tripartite occupational safety and health committee for the construction industry as they concern the register (section 7). Furthermore, with regard to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's statement that a technical committee is hard at work studying the amendment and updating of Decree No. 89/995 on safety and health in the construction industry and it is hoped that it will present its results to the sectoral tripartite committee in the coming months. The Government states that in introducing amendments and improvements to the existing legal framework, the technical committee has taken into account not only the existing legal voids but also proposals from all inspectors who monitor environmental conditions of work and the conclusions of the occupational safety and health congress organized in October 2010 by the sectoral tripartite committee. The Committee requests the Government to make efforts to ensure that the new text gives effect to the provisions of this Convention and to take account of the comments made by the Committee in its examination of this Convention and the other ratified occupational safety and health Conventions, particularly its comments on the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), and the Asbestos Convention, 1986 (No. 162). Furthermore, because the legislation is undergoing significant changes, the Committee requests the Government to provide a detailed report indicating the legislative, regulatory or other texts and the relevant provisions thereof that give effect in law to each Article of the Convention.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee notes the 2010 annual report of the IGTSS, which notes that according to the register of works and their traceability, in 2010, 8,552 construction works were registered, and of these 1,625 had final certification while for 6,832 certification was pending, works were finalized for 58 and works were closed for the remaining 37. It also notes the information on investigations into occupational accidents in the sector and their results. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information in this regard.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2014.]

The Committee takes note of the Government's detailed report; of the Government's reply to its comments in 2009 when it referred to a communication from the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV); of a communication from the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) sent by the Government on 24 September 2010; and of two communications dated 30 August 2011, of which one is from the CTV and the other from the ASI, sent by the Government on 22 September 2011. The Committee notes that the Government has not sent information on the questions raised in these three communications. The Committee will refer to the communications when examining the relevant Articles of the Convention. Furthermore, the Committee notes that on 2 December 2011, the Office received comments from the Government referring to the communications from the trade unions mentioned above, but it did not provide any information in this respect. The only information connected with the application of this Convention is the number of occupational accidents and diseases for the first six months of 2011.

Articles 4 and 8 of the Convention. Formulating, implementing and periodically reviewing a coherent national policy on occupational safety, occupational health and the working environment; measures to give effect to this Article by consulting with the most representative employers and workers' organizations concerned. The Committee notes that, according to the Government in its report, the principle of the people as participants is a constitutional right set forth in section 5 of the Basic Act on Prevention, Working Conditions and the Working Environment (LOPCYMAT) which gives effect to Article 4 of the Convention, and that draft legislation, regulations and technical standards are submitted for consultation among the various social partners. The Committee also notes that section 10 of the LOPCYMAT establishes that the Ministry of Labour shall consult the employers' and workers' organizations in respect of its national policy and that it will take into account, for the elaboration of this policy, inter alia, statistics on occupational diseases, accidents and death; the Government adds that section 36 of the same Act establishes a National Safety and Health Council with the participation of employers and workers. The Committee notes, however, that the Government has not provided information on the way in which this section of the Convention is applied in practice, indicating for example, the content of its national policy and whether this policy and its implementing measures have been and are discussed with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations concerned. This implies a process of application and periodical revision in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations concerned, to ensure an evaluation of the national policy, the basis upon which the scope of future actions is determined. With respect to Article 8 of the Convention, the Government states that the Assembly puts into practice the so-called "parliamentarism of the street" which consists of discussing a number of bills with the citizens. It also points out that workers' assemblies, workshops with safety officers, meetings with trade union organizations and business associations of a number of productive groups are also held. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, in its comments of 2010, the CTV indicates that the Institute for Occupational Prevention, Health and Safety (INPSASEL) does not consult with the trade union organizations. The CTV adds that the Government should use the tripartite consultation mechanisms established under the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144) to improve the occupational safety and health conditions and reverse the present trend. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that Articles 4 and 8 of the Convention refer to consultations on national policy and ways to give effect to these, with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations concerned, and therefore discussions with the citizens does not replace consultations with the said organizations. The Committee requests the Government to send additional information on the content of its national policy; on the consultations held with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations concerned with respect to the formulation, application and evaluation of its national policy and measures referred to under Article 8; and on the results of these consultations.

Article 5(e). Spheres of action that should be taken into account by national policy; the protection of workers and their representatives from disciplinary measures as a result of the actions properly taken by them in conformity with the policy referred to in Article 4 of this Convention. The Committee notes that, according to section 44 of the LOPCYMAT, no safety delegate may be dismissed, transferred or demoted in his/her job, from the time he/she is elected until three months after the period for which he/she has been elected, without justified grounds previously approved by the labour inspectorate, in accordance with the Organic Labour Law. Noting that, according to the ASI communication in 2010, 400 safety delegates were dismissed at the end of the first quarter of 2008, the Committee requests the Government to indicate what its legislation considers "justified grounds" in the context of the said Article; to send information on the application of this Article in practice, including on the application of dismissal with "just grounds previously approved by the labour inspectorate in accordance with the Organic Labour Law", and on the alleged cases of dismissal of safety delegates.

Article 6. Functions and responsibilities. Article 15. Coordination. With respect to its comments in 2009, in which the Committee noted that, according to the CTV, the LOPCYMAT had not as yet been fully implemented and the Social Security Fund was not yet in operation, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, it is untrue that the LOPCYMAT is not yet functioning. The Governing points out that in the context of the transition of the social security institutions, certain legal situations of occupational safety and health (OSH) fall within the remit of the Venezuelan Social Security Institute (IVSS); that the entering into force of the Social Security Fund will enable the remaining aspects to come into effect; however, there has not been a deterioration or vacuum with respect to situations regulated by previous laws and regulations. The Committee also notes that, according to the ASI's communication of 2010, another delay with the LOPCYMAT is connected to the appointment of special prosecutors in occupational safety and health matters. In turn, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided the information requested in its previous comment on the difficulties encountered in formally setting up the National Council for Prevention, Safety and Health at Work, to which section 36 of the LOPCYMAT refers. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the National Council for Prevention, Safety and Health at Work is operating and to send information on which bodies governed by the LOPCYMAT are functioning in practice, and those which are not, as well as the Government's plans to implement the Act in its totality.

Article 7. Reviews, either overall or in respect of particular areas, carried out at appropriate intervals. Article 11(c). The establishment and application of procedures for the notification of occupational accidents; and paragraph (e), the annual publication of information on measures taken, and on occupational accidents and occupational diseases. The Committee notes that in 2010, the ASI indicates that, according to the INPSASEL, up to the third quarter of 2008, 69,119 serious accidents occurred, compared to the 57,000 registered throughout 2007. It is estimated, according to the ASI, that 90 per cent of occupational accidents are not reported. The Committee notes that in its communication of 2010, the ASI stated that INPSASEL would administer the OSH services in six sectors, and mentioned the petrochemical, petrol, auto-parts and agriculture sectors; and that in its 2011 communication, the ASI refers to the poor state of some installations belonging to the Venezuelan Petroleum Enterprise (PVDSA), adding that trade union officials urged the INPSASEL to assume the responsibility for and supervise gas-filling plants throughout the country, and noted that workers were not employed in adequate safety and health conditions. Similarly, the Committee noted that, according to a communication from the CTV in 2011, there has been an increase in the number of occupational accidents compared with ten years before; and that this may be attributed to a deterioration in the working environment. It pointed out that there were no reliable statistics. The CTV also states that the petroleum industry is a particular case in point given that accidents in this industry have increased dramatically during the past eight years, and that according to the statement by the Secretary-General of the Federation of Petroleum Workers in August 2011, there have been 500 occupational accidents in the industry and 15 deaths, and that the PVDSA has dismissed workers involved in occupational accidents. As regards the notification of accidents, the Committee states that these are reported online and that this system is in its first phase. The Government also states that the INPSASEL posts on its webpage information on occupational accidents which occurred during the 2005–07 period, and on occupational diseases during the 2002–06 period. The Committee notes that the Government, in its communication received on 2 December 2011, stated that in the first semester of 2011, 29,020 occupational accidents and 1,130 occupational diseases were reported, but it did not provide information on previous years. Having noted that the information available on the INPSASEL webpage is up to the year 2007, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to bring the available information on occupational accidents up to date so that it may count on efficient indicators in due time, allowing it to identify the sectors requiring priority action and, in this way, to be able to re-examine its national policy on the basis of reliable and recent data, and to provide information on this particular issue. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to: (1) send its comments on the issues related to the increase in the number of occupational accidents and under-reporting; (2) indicate the trends in occupational labour accidents by sector and the measures taken or envisaged to deal with this situation, including statistical information from 2007 until the present date; (3) send information on the surveys carried out or ongoing in specific sectors; and (4) indicate the sectoral committees to which it referred in its previous comment and provide information on the way they are run and activities.

Article 9. Adequate and appropriate system of inspection. Taking into account the problems of application in practice referred to in the communications, the Government is asked to indicate the measures adopted to guarantee the effective application of preventive and protective measures established under the Convention, including, but not exclusively, the strengthening of the labour inspectorate.

Other issues. Article 5. Spheres of action that should be taken into account in national policy; Article 11(a)(b) and (d). Functions that should be covered by national policy; Article 12. Obligations on persons who design, manufacture, import, provide or transfer machinery, equipment or substances for occupational use; and Article 15. Coherence of the national policy and coordination between the various authorities and bodies responsible for giving effect to parts II and III of the present Convention. Noting that the Government has not, in its report, provided information on the application of the abovementioned Articles, the Committee requests the Government to send information in this respect.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 13 (Azerbaijan, Comoros, Guinea, Iraq, Luxembourg, Togo); Convention No. 45 (Angola, Belarus, Bulgaria, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Fiji, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Nigeria, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands); Convention No. 62 (Greece, Guinea, Ireland); Convention No. 115 (Argentina, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Brazil, Chile, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Denmark, Guyana, Hungary, Iraq, Italy, Kyrgyzstan, Luxembourg, Tajikistan); Convention No. 119 (Azerbaijan, Croatia, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Iraq, Italy, Kyrgyzstan, Russian Federation, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia); Convention No. 120 (Azerbaijan, Belarus, Costa Rica, France: New Caledonia, Iraq, Kyrgyzstan, Slovakia, Tajikistan, Ukraine); Convention No. 127 (Algeria, Costa Rica, France: French Polynesia, Peru); Convention No. 136 (Brazil, Chile, Greece, Guyana, Iraq, Nicaragua, Uruguay, Zambia); Convention No. 139 (Brazil, Croatia, Denmark, Guyana, Hungary, Iraq, Ireland, Japan, Luxembourg, Slovakia, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela); Convention No. 148 (China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Costa Rica, Egypt, Ghana, Guatemala, Iraq, Luxembourg, Malta, San Marino, Seychelles, Slovakia, Uruguay, Zambia); Convention No. 155 (Algeria, Bahrain, Belarus, Belize, Brazil, Croatia, Denmark, Ethiopia, Hungary, Ireland, Luxembourg, Mexico, Mongolia, Niger, Nigeria, Seychelles, South Africa, Syrian Arab Republic, Uruguay); Convention No. 161 (Benin, Brazil, Colombia, Croatia, Niger, Slovakia, Uruguay); Convention No. 162 (Plurinational State of Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Colombia, Denmark, Germany, Luxembourg, Russian Federation, Uganda, Uruguay); Convention No. 167 (Algeria, Belarus, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Guatemala, Iraq, Italy, Luxembourg, Panama, Slovakia, Uruguay); Convention No. 170 (Burkina Faso, Dominican Republic, Italy, Luxembourg, Mexico, Syrian Arab Republic); Convention No. 174 (Brazil, Colombia, Luxembourg, Saudi Arabia); Convention No. 176 (Albania, Botswana, Ireland, Slovakia, Zambia); Convention No. 184 (Argentina, Fiji, Ukraine); Convention No. 187 (Cyprus, Denmark, Japan, Niger, Spain, Sweden).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 45 (Cyprus, United Kingdom: Falkland Islands (Malvinas)); Convention No. 127 (Hungary);

Convention No. 136 (Hungary); Convention No. 148 (Belgium, Denmark, Italy); Convention No. 161 (Hungary); Convention No. 162 (Belgium).

Social security

In cases where the problems of application identified by the Committee were of a systemic nature, the Committee considered it appropriate to formulate one general observation covering several or all social security Conventions ratified by the country concerned. This year such integrated comments are addressed to the following countries: Plurinational State of Bolivia, Guinea-Bissau, Nicaragua, Peru and Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela.

Algeria

Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report does not provide any reply concerning the points to which it has been drawing its attention for many years:

- (i) the need for the wording of the various pathological manifestations enumerated in the left-hand column of the schedules of occupational diseases entitled "designation of diseases" to be of an indicative nature, in the same way as the wording for the corresponding types of work in the right-hand column of the schedules;
- (ii) the wording of the items pertaining to poisoning by arsenic (Schedules Nos 20 and 21), manifestations caused by the halogen derivatives of hydrocarbons of the aliphatic series (Schedules Nos 3, 11, 12, 26 and 27), and poisoning by phosphorus and certain of its compounds (Schedules Nos 5 and 34) must, pursuant to the Schedule annexed to the Convention, cover in general terms all the manifestations that may be caused by the above substances (such a wording would also make it possible to cover diseases which may be caused by the use of new products);
- (iii) the activities in which there is a risk of exposure to anthrax infection should also include the loading, unloading or transport of merchandise in general so as to cover workers (such as dockworkers) who have transported merchandise that has been contaminated by anthrax spores.

The Committee requests the Government to indicate the reasons which have prevented it from bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention for over 30 years and once again urges it to take the necessary measures without further ado to bring the schedules of occupational diseases into conformity with the obligations deriving from the Convention.

Angola

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1976)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Protection of apprentices in the event of employment accidents. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, under the terms of section 7 of Decree No. 53/05 of 15 August 2005 on the legal framework for employment accidents and occupational diseases, coverage of occupational risks has been extended to apprentices and trainees, as requested by the Committee in its previous comments.

The Committee is raising certain other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Barbados

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1974)

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of benefits abroad. With reference to its 2008 observation, the Committee notes that, in its report of 2009, the Government provided information on the pensions in payment under the reciprocal agreements concluded with Canada, Quebec, the United Kingdom and the member countries of CARICOM. The Committee notes, however, that the Government's report did not reply on the other issues raised in the observation, particularly as regards the Government's indication in 2005 of the planned adoption of a draft bill amending the national legislation so as to comply with Article 5 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide in its next report due in 2012 all the information requested in the Committee's previous observation on the following points.

The Committee recalls that section 49 (in conjunction with section 48) of the National Insurance and Social Security (Benefits) Regulations of 1967 and section 25 of the Employment Injury (Benefits) Regulations of 1970 deprive a beneficiary residing abroad of the right to ask for the benefit to be paid directly to him at his place of residence, which is contrary to the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention. In its previous report of 2002, the Government stated that approval has been given for direct payment of the benefits in the country where the claimant is currently residing, that corresponding amendments of the National Insurance and Social Security Act were approved by the Government to bring it in accordance with Article 5 of the Convention, and that the procedural steps were taken to submit these amendments to Parliament for enactment. In its report, received in June 2005, the Government indicated that a draft bill had been prepared for benefits to be paid to persons residing abroad and that a copy of the new provisions would be forwarded to the ILO as soon as they were adopted by Parliament.

The Committee recalls that, in granting equality of treatment for residents of the contracting parties under their social security legislation, the CARICOM Agreement on Social Security ensures protection and maintenance of the rights of beneficiaries “notwithstanding changes of residence among their respective territories – principles which underlie several of the Conventions of the International Labour Organization” (Preamble). The Committee wishes to recall in this respect that, in accordance with the principle of the maintenance of rights through the provision of benefits abroad, as established by Convention No. 118, Barbados shall guarantee direct payment of the benefits to all entitled beneficiaries at their place of residence, irrespective of the country in which they reside and even in the absence of a bilateral or multilateral agreement to that effect. It therefore trusts that the Government will make every effort to ensure that the bill is adopted in the very near future so as to ensure direct payment at their place of residence abroad of old-age, survivors’ and employment injury benefits, both to its own nationals and to nationals of any other Member that has accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of these branches. The Committee hopes that the Government’s next report will contain a copy of the new provisions together with detailed statistics on the transfer of benefits abroad to beneficiaries, including Barbadian nationals, who are not covered by the CARICOM Agreement or bilateral agreements with Canada and the United Kingdom.

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102)
(ratification: 1977)

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1977)

Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors’ Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128)
(ratification: 1977)

Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130)

In reply to the Committee’s previous observation concerning Conventions Nos 102, 121, 128 and 130, the Government explained, in its report received in August 2010, that the new Political Constitution of the State has established a new hierarchy of legal standards. This new hierarchy gives precedence over national law to international instruments including the Conventions of the International Labour Organization (ILO) ratified by the Plurinational State of Bolivia, a hierarchy that differs from the one existing under the Political Constitution of the State of 1967. The Government also stated that the Plurinational State of Bolivia must adopt new legislation as soon as possible (acts, supreme decrees and other legal instruments), reflecting the new spirit of the Constitution in force. Accordingly, the State and the Bolivian Workers’ Federation (COB) signed a framework agreement for the reform of Bolivian social security legislation, and it was agreed to amend the parameters concerning retirement in terms that would imply greater solidarity for affiliated workers. The abovementioned plans for social security reform maintain the financial system of individual capitalization and establish a solidarity component. Referring to its 2011 General Survey Social security and the rule of law (paras 451–452), the Committee welcomes the reinforcement of the involvement of the Bolivian State and the reconstruction of solidarity mechanisms based on the principle of collective financing as major components of national social security systems. The Committee considers that the principles of collective financing and social solidarity are a powerful weapon against poverty and an effective instrument for making societies more equal and just. Besides improving social security administration, management and supervision, public systems more readily abide by the governance principles set out in ILO social security instruments. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that all future reforms of the social security system, such as the reform of the pensions system currently under way, will be based on the principles of solidarity and collective financing established in the new Political Constitution and by the ILO Conventions ratified by Bolivia. Moreover, the Committee notes that the Government has not replied to its observations concerning the extension and restructuring of the social security scheme and the creation of a national strategy for the development of social security. The Committee trusts that the Government, in its next detailed report which it is due to present before 1 September 2012, will reply to the questions raised in its previous observation, which read as follows:

Extension and restructuring of the social security scheme

The level of coverage of the social security scheme currently remains one of the lowest in the region. However, a number of recent measures have resulted in progress being made, with regard to health protection, through the introduction of universal insurance for mothers and children (SUMI) and free old-age medical insurance (SMVG). However, the health system remains very fragmented between the public assistance targeting the most vulnerable, the social security scheme directed at the employed population and their beneficiaries, and the private actors focusing on the higher income brackets. A rational restructuring would allow efforts to increase membership of the system to be coordinated, a series of basic health benefits to be defined giving effect in practice to the right to health protection for all and major economies of scale to be made with regard to both administrative management costs and the financing of care facilities.

Membership of the pension scheme also remains very low despite the introduction in 1997 of the new funded pension scheme which replaced the pay-as-you-go scheme based on solidarity. In order to remedy that situation, the Government recently established a universal non-contributory pension paid to all persons over 65 years of age, which has produced tangible results. A reform of the pension system is currently under way and a bill has already been approved by the Chamber of Deputies and is to be submitted to the Senate. The bill establishes a mixed pension scheme comprising a contributory and semi-contributory scheme and a non-contributory system. It also creates an invalidity and survivors' scheme for common and occupational risks, as well as a specific invalidity and survivors' insurance scheme for self-employed workers.

According to the 2009 ILO study, the weak coverage of the social security system with regard to health protection and pensions is largely due to the structure of the labour market and the fact that the social security scheme is essentially focused on covering the employed population benefiting from a relatively stable formal employment relationship and working essentially in large urban enterprises. However, given that this workforce accounts for only 25 per cent of the total workforce, the large majority of the economically active population, which comprises self-employed, domestic and rural workers, is excluded from the compulsory social security scheme, even though they represent more than two-thirds of the country's population. This situation is compounded by considerable evasion of contributions even within the formal economy. The combination of these two factors leads to a very low overall rate of health coverage of the economically active population (13.5 per cent in 2003). Access to health services in rural areas remains very limited with only 6 per cent of the rural population being covered. Furthermore, the high number of actors and the lack of coordination constitute yet more factors which contribute to keeping the coverage of the population at a very low level and perpetuating the lack of a comprehensive strategy in this regard. As regards old-age, invalidity and survivors' risks, the Government indicated in its report that only 38 per cent of employees of large enterprises employing over 20 persons are covered. The economically active persons affiliated to the old-age, invalidity and survivors' scheme represented only 5 per cent of the total number of residents. The problem of poor coverage is particularly pronounced with regard to self-employed workers and in agriculture, with only 4 per cent of Bolivian self-employed workers being affiliated to a pension fund administrator in 2007. In view of these factors, there is a need to adjust the Bolivian social security model in line with the economic and social reality of predominantly self-employed informal employment. The gradual compulsory membership of self-employed workers is a possible means of ensuring coverage of a large proportion of the population not yet benefiting from any social security coverage. State support in the form of social contribution subsidies would be an important component to ensure the success of such an initiative. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide information in its next report on the solutions found to increase the rates of membership and coverage and indicate the progress made with regard to reforming both the pension scheme and the health scheme.

The separation, since 1987, of the management of the short-term benefits scheme and the basic long-term scheme has resulted in each of these schemes devoting a significant proportion of their resources to the performance of administrative and operational functions, particularly those relating to membership and the collection of social contributions. Studies show that the establishment of centralized management with regard to the collection of benefits and supervision of compliance with the obligation to join the social security scheme would allow significant results to be achieved in terms of coverage and would ensure better coordination, planning and linking of strategic activities regarded as priorities from the point of view of the entire system. The creation of an independent specialized body responsible solely for supervising and controlling the social security system, without participating in the management of the system's programmes, is another necessary component for the proper operation and viability of social security systems. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the structural measures taken or envisaged with a view to optimizing the structure of the social security system.

Creation of a national strategy for the development of social security

In 2001, the International Labour Conference (ILC) reaffirmed the central role of social security and reiterated that it was a challenge which all member States had to tackle as a matter of urgency. The resolution adopted by the ILC in 2001 recognizes that "the highest priority should be given to policies and initiatives that bring social security to those who are not covered by existing systems". To achieve that objective, the Conference urged every country to devise a national strategy closely linked to other social policies. States such as Bolivia which are party to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) are also required, according to the general observations made in 2007 by the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (CESCR), to devise a national strategy for the comprehensive implementation of the right to social security and to allocate sufficient budgetary and other resources at the national level. The Committee considers that the need to devise a national strategy arises from the general responsibility of the State, established by Convention No. 102, to ensure the continuity and proper operation of the social security system. The launch of a national strategy designed to ensure the strengthening and sustainable development of the social security scheme, taking into account the above concerns, would allow the State to exploit to the full all the potential offered by international social security standards with a view to ensuring the proper administration of schemes and enabling the gradual extension of coverage to the entire population. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the possibility of making greater use of technical assistance from the ILO with a view to devising, together with the social partners, a national strategy for the sustainable development of social security.

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 2(1)(i) and (2), and 6 of the Convention. Family allowances. Referring to its previous observation, the Committee notes that the new Political Constitution of the Plurinational State of Bolivia, adopted on 7 February 2009, provides that the social security scheme will include the branch of family allowances and other social benefits. The Government states that it envisages adopting new legislation that will be fully in accordance with all the rights recognized by the new Constitution, including in the area of social security. The Committee hopes that the measures taken by the Government to comply with the new Constitution will enable it to reintroduce a family benefit scheme guaranteeing the granting of family allowances both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of this Convention for that branch, in respect of children who reside in the territory of any such Member, in accordance with Article 6 of the Convention.

Articles 7 and 8. Social security agreements ensuring the maintenance of acquired rights and rights in course of acquisition. The Committee notes with interest the entry into force on 1 May 2011 of the Multilateral Ibero-American Social Security Convention, signed on 10 November 2007 by 15 countries: Argentina, Plurinational State of Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Paraguay, Peru, Portugal, Spain, Uruguay and the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela. Under Article 2 of this Convention, it applies to any person who is subject or has been subject to the legislation of one or several States parties, as well as to their families and dependants. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the ratification of this Convention and of its implementing agreement required amendments to the national legislation.

Cape Verde

Branch (g) (Employment injury benefit). Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's reiteration in its 2010 report that the system for protection against industrial accidents and occupational diseases is currently being revised in consultation with the social partners. The Committee recalls that, as the law currently stands, section 3(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84/78 of 22 September 1978, establishing the system of compulsory insurance against industrial accidents, subjects equality of treatment of foreign workers working in Cape Verde to a condition of reciprocity. This arrangement is contrary to Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention, which provide for a system of automatic reciprocity for States that have ratified the instrument. In view of the commitment previously made by the Government to bring national law into conformity with the Convention and the fact that this situation has persisted for many years, the Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide information in its next detailed report due in 2012 on progress made in this regard.

Article 5. Payment of benefits abroad. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to incorporate into Legislative Decree No. 84/78 of 22 September 1978 a specific provision prescribing the granting of benefits for employment injuries when the persons concerned reside abroad, in order to give full effect to Article 5 (branch (g)) of the Convention. The Government reiterates in its report that, even though it is not explicitly provided for in the abovementioned Decree, this provision of the Convention is applicable inasmuch as, under the terms of the Constitution of Cape Verde, the provisions of ratified Conventions prevail over national law. The Committee reiterates, as it has now done in several prior observations, that as regards the situation in law it is necessary to bring Legislative Decree No. 84/78 explicitly into conformity with Article 5 of the Convention in order to avoid any ambiguity in the legislation and its application in practice. The Committee trusts that by the time of its next detailed report in 2012, the Government will have taken the opportunity provided by the current reform to establish an explicit provision guaranteeing the principle of preservation of rights with regard to the granting of employment injury benefits in cases of residence abroad. The Committee also requests the Government once again to send information on the internal regulations relating to the procedures followed for the transfer of benefits abroad and to provide statistics on the effective transfers by the National Social Security Institute or another relevant body and on the amounts of benefits for employment injury to beneficiaries residing abroad.

Chile

Old-Age Insurance (Industry, etc.) Convention, 1933 (No. 35) (ratification: 1935)

The Committee notes the comments on the application of Conventions Nos 35 and 37 received from the National Confederation of Municipal Employees of Chile (ASEMUCH) on 30 May 2011 with respect to the determination of remuneration taken into account to compute old-age pensions; as well as the collective comments on Conventions Nos 35 and 36, from the National Association of Public Employees (ANEF), the Association of Employees of the Women's National Service, the College of Teachers of Chile AG, the National Confederation of Business and Services, and the Confederation of Unions in the Banking and Financial Sectors of Chile, dated 15 September 2011, with respect to the differences in the rates of old-age pensions granted to men and women by the private pension system. The Government is invited to reply to these comments in its next report due by 1 September 2012.

With regards to the representation made by the College of Teachers AG in 2009 under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by Chile of Conventions Nos 35 and 37, the Governing Body has referred the matter for examination to a tripartite committee set up to this effect at its 311th Session (June 2011). In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee has decided to suspend the examination of this issue awaiting the end of the article 24 procedure.

Finally, the Committee hopes that, in its next report, the Government will provide detailed information on the follow-up given to the recommendations made by the tripartite committees established to examine:

- the representations made in 1985 by the National Trade Union Coordinating Council (CNS) (ILO Official Bulletin Vol. LXXI, 1988, Series B, Supplement 1) and in 1998 by a number of national trade unions of workers of the private sector pension funds (AFPs) (document: GB.277/17/5); and
- the representations made in 1997 and 2004 by the College of Teachers of Chile AG (documents: GB.274/16/4 and GB.298/15/6).

Costa Rica

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (ratification: 1972)

I. Reform of the national old-age, invalidity and survivors' insurance scheme

In 2000, the Workers' Protection Act No. 7983 established the new regulatory framework for old-age pensions, made up of a public social security scheme, a compulsory private scheme, a voluntary private scheme and a public non-contributory scheme. With a view to ensuring the sustainability of the Social Security Fund of Costa Rica, important changes were made in April 2005 to the first "pillar" of the Regulation concerning the national old-age, invalidity and survivors' insurance programme (IVM), which covers about 800,000 workers. For the most part, these changes focused on: the introduction of a new mechanism to determine a basic pension rate to help those with low incomes; the introduction of a pension with proportional rates after 15 years; the extension of the minimum contributory period and the period used to determine earnings taken into consideration to calculate old-age and invalidity benefits; the gradual increase of contributions over a period of 30 years; and the introduction of an invalidity pension at a rate of 50 per cent of the full-rate invalidity pension for persons aged 48 years and over who have contributed for at least 60 months. In order to understand more clearly the way in which the Convention is implemented in the light of the considerable changes made in the country with respect to the abovementioned benefits, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next detailed report due in 2012, all the information required by the report form under each of the Parts of the Convention accepted by Costa Rica, i.e., Parts II and V to X, as well as the statistics required by Article 76 of the Convention.

II. Questions raised previously

Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the amendments made in 2007 to the Regulation concerning old-age, invalidity and survivors' insurance and death, which introduced a proportional pension for beneficiaries who have reached 65 years of age and paid a total of 180 contributions, i.e. 15 years, in accordance with the requirements of Article 29(2)(a) of the Convention. The Committee also notes the statistical information demonstrating the correlation between the reassessment of the pensions, the inflation rate and the upgrading of salaries.

Part VI (Employment injury and occupational illness benefit), Articles 34, 36 and 38 (in conjunction with Article 69). The Committee notes that no change has been made to the limited period during which pensions are paid in the event of minor or partial permanent disability and in the event of death of the breadwinner. The Government refers once again in its report to a communication from the National Insurance Institute, which considers that there is no reason to amend the national legislation given that national policy attempts to reinstate the victims of occupational accidents into professional life, provided that their incapacity for work is not total and enables them to continue working. In this respect, the Committee reminds the Government that it has an overall responsibility to implement the Convention by guaranteeing the benefits due, and that there is no question of referring to an opinion handed down by the competent authority to avoid compliance with international obligations arising from ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls once again that the degree of loss of earnings capacity considered to be a minimum threshold by the legislation (section 223 of the Labour Code) ranges between 0.5 per cent and 50 per cent, implying that a person having lost half of his capacity to work following an occupational accident may be deprived of benefits which should be guaranteed throughout the duration of the contingency. In this respect, the Committee points out that the Convention favours the vocational rehabilitation of victims who are permanently disabled and their reintegration into the labour force, but authorizes the cumulation of the permanent disability pension with any other possible income that persons might earn by drawing upon their remaining capacity to work. In these circumstances, the Committee can only hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the relevant provisions of the Labour Code so that in all cases of permanent incapacity, partial incapacity higher than 25 per cent, or death, periodical cash payments are granted for life, in accordance with the Convention, without any condition as to resources.

Part VII (Family benefits), Articles 40 and 44. In reply to the Committee's previous comments concerning the need to amend the system of family benefits to bring it into line with the definition of the contingency defined under Article 4 of the Convention, the Government states that, despite the efforts made to comply with the Convention, the socio-economic factors affecting developing countries means that it does not have sufficient resources to pay the family benefits at the rates required by the Convention. The Committee recalls in this respect that the benefits paid at present to low-income families under section 4 of Act No. 5662 of 23 December 1974 and section 2 of Act No. 4760 of 30 April 1971 are means-tested. In these circumstances, the Committee would like to ask the Government to provide in its next report additional information on the types of benefits provided under the legislation quoted above and to indicate whether actuarial studies have been carried out with a view to assessing the financial implications of introducing a branch providing benefits to families, in accordance with Part VII of the Convention.

III. Questions raised by the Confederation of Workers Rerum Novarum (CTRN) and the Trade Union of Employees of the Ministry of Finance (SINDHAC)

The Committee took note of the comments made by the CTRN and the SINDHAC, as well as of the Government's full reply to these comments. Referring to its 2003 observation, the Committee reiterates that the reference under Article 29(I)(a) of the Convention to the qualifying period of "20 years of residence" refers to universal non-contributory schemes and does not, therefore, refer to schemes which are financed by contributions.

The Committee recalls that the Democratic Republic of the Congo has accepted the obligations under Convention No. 102 in relation to old-age benefit (Part V), family benefit (Part VII), invalidity benefit (Part IX), and survivors' benefit (Part X). The Democratic Republic of the Congo has also ratified the Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118), and the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121).

In 2004, following the comments that it has been making for many years concerning the need to bring the national legislation fully into conformity with the standards referred to above, the Government established a Committee on Social Security Reform with the mandate of preparing a draft revision of the Social Security Code (Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/DC/FMK/066/04 of 8 December 2004). In 2005, by Decree No. 05/176 of 24 November, the Government also created the National Social Protection Support Programme (PNPS).

The Committee notes that, according to the information provided by the Government in its latest report, it has not been possible to finalize the reform of the social security system as the body responsible for approving the draft of the new Social Security Code, the National Labour Council, is experiencing financial difficulties in holding its 30th Session. It also notes that the Government has availed itself of ILO technical assistance for the preparation of the draft text of the new Social Security Code, and that this assistance covered, among other matters, the reinforcement of the institutional capacities of the National Social Security Institute and the extension of social protection to populations hitherto not covered.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take all the necessary measures to finalize the reform of social security in the near future. It also hopes that the Government will provide detailed information in its next report due in 2012 on the manner in which the legislation gives effect to Convention No. 102, and on any difficulties encountered in practice in the application of the Convention. Please provide a copy of the new Social Security Code or the draft text approved by the National Labour Council, as appropriate.

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with regret that, notwithstanding the comments that it has been making for many years, the Government's latest report does not indicate any tangible progress achieved in bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention and does not provide the information requested previously on the following points:

- the need to add to the schedule of occupational diseases, diseases caused by the toxic halogen derivatives of the aliphatic series hydrocarbons and those caused by benzene or its toxic homologues (Article 8 of the Convention);
- the need to specify the manner of calculation and actual payment for the periodic benefits due in respect of temporary incapacity for work, including incapacity at its initial phase, and benefits in respect of the total or partial loss of earnings capacity, or the death of the breadwinner, in accordance with the report form for the Convention under Articles 13, 14 and 18 (in relation with Articles 19 and 20);
- the need to indicate how the periodic benefits due in respect of total or substantial loss of earnings capacity and survivors' benefits are reviewed following substantial changes in the general level of earnings where these result from substantial changes in the cost of living (Article 21);
- the need to explain the manner in which appeal procedures operate in practice in the case of refusal of the benefit or complaint as to its quality or quantity (Article 23);
- the need to describe the manner in which the State assumes general responsibility for the proper administration of the institutions or services concerned in the application of the Convention (Article 24, paragraph 2).

The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures with a view to resolving the issues referred to above in the very near future.

Djibouti

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19) (ratification: 1978)

Ever since the Convention was ratified in 1978, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 of 1957 on the compensation of occupational accidents and diseases in order to bring the national regulations into conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention. According to this provision, the nationals of States that have ratified the Convention and their dependants must receive the same treatment as Djibouti grants to its own nationals in respect of workers' compensation. Under the terms of this section of the Decree, unlike nationals, foreign workers injured in industrial accidents who transfer their residence abroad no longer receive a periodical payment but a lump-sum payment equal to three times the periodical payment they received previously. The Government previously referred to a draft reform of the labour legislation aimed at the full application of the principle of equal treatment and the formal repeal of the residence requirement laid down by the Decree of 1957. The Government also stated that this residence requirement has only been applied occasionally to foreigners. In its last report, the Government indicates that the Committee's observations will be studied by the National Council for Labour, Employment and Vocational Training with a view to bringing the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. It hopes that the conditions allowing for this process to resume will be met as soon as possible. Nevertheless, the Government points out that the Djiboutian system does not apply any reduction to the amount of the periodical payment transferred abroad. The Committee trusts that, in view of the situation which prevails in practice, the Government will seize the opportunity represented by the reform of the system of social protection currently under way and will formally repeal section 29 of Decree No. 57-245 so as to bring both the letter and spirit of the national legislation into full conformity with Article 1(2) of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Ecuador

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1970)

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes the indication contained in the Government's report of 2007 that the Constitutional Tribunal declared several provisions of the Social Security Act of 2001 unconstitutional. In order to clarify the situation in law, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government to provide, in its next detailed report due in 2012, information on the extent to which the amended legislation gives effect to each of the provisions of the Convention, as well as the statistical information requested in the report form. Please supply also any regulations that have been adopted to apply the new Act.

Article 5 of the Convention (in conjunction with Article 10). Payment of benefits abroad. The Government confirms in its report that the payment abroad of old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits, and of workers' compensation in cases of accidents, occupational diseases or the death of the worker, is made in each individual case on the basis of a resolution issued by the Benefits Committee of the Ecuadorean Social Security Institute (IESS). Referring to the conclusion of the Multilateral Ibero-American Social Security Convention and the Andean Instrument of Social Security (Decision No. 583) establishing the principle of equality of treatment and exportability of benefits among the ratifying parties, the Government also indicates that where bilateral social security agreements have been concluded, special liaison offices have been created with respect to the transfer of benefits abroad. The Committee once again requests the Government to legitimize the practice of authorizing the payment of benefits abroad by adopting a specific provision ensuring that Articles 5 and 10 are applied both in law and in practice, as it had previously expressed the intention of doing. The Committee asks the Government to send information on the progress made in this regard in its next detailed report due in 2012. The Committee recalls in this respect that the scope of obligations assumed by Ecuador under Convention No. 118 goes beyond the circle of the countries party to the Andean Instrument of Social Security or the Multilateral Ibero-American Social Security Convention. By ratifying Convention No. 118, the Government has undertaken to guarantee, in accordance with its Articles 5 and 10, payment of the above benefits to the nationals of any other Member which has accepted the obligations of the Convention in respect of a given branch, as well as to its own nationals and to refugees and stateless persons, in the event of residence abroad, irrespective of the new country of residence or the conclusion of any reciprocity agreement.

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1978)

Further to its previous observation, the Committee requests again that in its next report, due in 2012, the Government provide detailed information on all the Articles of the Convention, as required by the report form, and that it indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the following Articles of the Convention are actually applied:

Article 8 of the Convention. Recognition of occupational diseases. The Committee notes that the legal provisions on occupational diseases are to be found in the Labour Code of 2005 (sections 349, 363, 364, etc.), Chapter VII of Social Insurance Act No. 2001-55, particularly in section 158, and in resolution No. 741 (general regulations on occupational risk insurance). The Committee observes in this connection that section 363 of the Labour Code contains a schedule of occupational diseases and that section 364 allows for a Risk Assessment Committee to add other occupational diseases to those already listed. Resolution No. 741, section 4, lists the specific agents carrying a risk of occupational disease, and section 6 lists the occupational diseases they are liable to cause, with the requirement that the “presence and action” of the agent concerned must be demonstrated. Section 9 of the resolution allows for the Disability Evaluation Committee to add other occupational diseases on condition that this Committee first establishes a causal link between the work performed and the acute or chronic ailment. It should be noted that the Labour Code says nothing of the need for proof of a causal link, either in connection with the list of occupational diseases or in relation to the decisions of the Risk Assessment Committee. Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to specify the coverage of the various provisions referred to above as regards the lists of occupational diseases, and to specify which of these lists it deems to be consistent with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee also asks the Government to provide copies of decisions by the Risk Assessment Committee and by the Incapacity Assessment Committee so that the burden of proof regime governing occupational diseases not included in the lists can be assessed. The Committee further requests the Government to take appropriate steps to amend section 5 of resolution No. 741, so as to establish a presumption of occupational origin in favour of workers suffering from a disease enumerated in Schedule I of the Convention when they are engaged in the types of work mentioned in the schedule.

Article 9. Coverage of chronic diseases. The Committee notes that in its report the Government construes sections 10, 12, 14 and 19 of resolution No. 741 and section 177 of the IESS Codified Statute to mean that benefits under employment injury insurance are not subject to length of employment, duration of insurance membership or payment of contributions. The Committee observes, however, that in section 14 of the above resolution, under which occupational diseases are treated on a par with employment accidents, reference is made to acute, but not to chronic, occupational diseases. Consequently, to avoid all ambiguity, the Committee asks the Government to confirm that its interpretation of the abovementioned provisions also applies to chronic diseases.

Articles 13, 14 and 18 (in conjunction with Articles 19 and 20). Amount of periodical payments. The Committee notes the information in the Government's 2007 report to the effect that the calculation of cash benefits is based on Article 19 of the Convention. If this is so, the Committee invites the Government to explain in its next detailed report, due in 2012, how it determines the skilled manual male employee in accordance with Article 19(6), specifying the amount of his earnings, benefits and family allowances as established in Parts I–V of the report form or under Article 19 of the Convention.

Article 21. Review of the rates of cash benefits. The Committee notes with interest that the Social Security Act was amended in 2009 by the Act to Amend the Social Security Act, the Armed Forces Social Security Act and the National Police Force Social Security Act, which entered into force on 30 March 2009 (supplement to Official Gazette No. 559). Thus, section 234 of the Social Security Act has been amended by section 11 of the amending Act which establishes that cash benefits shall be increased at the beginning of each year by a percentage equal to that of the previous year's inflation. The Committee invites the Government to provide the statistical information requested under Article 21 of the report form.

Greece

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (ratification: 1955)

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee takes note of the Government's reply of 16 May 2011 to the comments made by the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GSEE), dated 29 July 2010, under article 23 of the ILO Constitution on the application by Greece of a number of Conventions, including the present Convention, in relation to the legislative measures taken for the implementation of the support mechanism for the Greek economy. The Committee also takes note of the discussion that took place at the Committee on the Application of Standards during the 100th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2011) with regard to the application by Greece of the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98). It notes that the Conference Committee welcomed the Government's indication that it was working on arrangements with the ILO for the visit of a high-level mission proposed by the Committee of Experts to facilitate a comprehensive understanding of the issues raised by the GSEE in its comments. The Conference Committee also considered that contact with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the European Union (EU) would assist the mission in its understanding of the situation (Provisional Record No. 18, Part II, pages 68–72). The Committee takes note of the report of the high-level mission which visited the country from 19 to 23 September 2011 and held further meetings with the EU and the IMF in Brussels and Washington, DC, in October 2011. Furthermore, notwithstanding the fact that the detailed report of the Government on the Convention due in 2011 has not been received, the Committee notes that the 29th annual report (2011) of Greece on the application of the European Code of Social Security, being a detailed report, contains all the information requested in the report form on the Convention, as well as the Government's reply to questions raised in the Committee's previous comments concerning the general responsibility of the Government for the sustainable financing and management of the national social security system in the context of the grave economic and financial crisis. Finally, the Committee takes note of Act No. 3863/2010 on the “New Social Security System and Relevant Provisions” (FEK A’115) of 8 July 2010, the provisions of which are contested by the GSEE.

The Government states that the distortions accumulated in the operation of the social security system have rendered it socially ineffective and economically unsustainable. As the population was rapidly ageing (four workers for one pensioner in 1950 and today, one worker for 1.7 pensioners), the expenses of the system had run out of control and were projected to reach 13.2 per cent of GDP in 2020 and 24 per cent in 2050. This unsustainable situation was amplified by the economic crisis, making it necessary to change the structure of the social security system in order to safeguard its long-term viability and public character. The adoption of the Act No. 3863/2010 introduced a unified and consolidated architecture of the pension system, which was a precondition to raising its functional efficiency and effectiveness. Different funds were merged into three covering workers, farmers and the self-employed. The supplementary pension scheme was reconstructed on consistent insurance principles by withdrawing state subsidies while introducing strict actuarial monitoring of the contributions/benefits ratio. This insurance pillar was complemented by a universal tax-financed scheme, which secured a minimum guaranteed pension for all citizens, including those who were not insured or did not fulfil the qualifying conditions. A transitional period was foreseen (2010–15) for gradually increasing the qualification requirements; pension rights acquired by 31 December 2010 were maintained in full and a number of adjustments were made to avoid hardship to certain categories of persons in the transition phase. Under Act No. 3863 an actuarial evaluation should be carried out one year after the introduction of the reforms, to assess their sustainability.

The Committee notes that in planning substantial changes to the pension system the Government sought advice and technical assistance of the International Labour Office, who insisted on the absolute necessity to adopt parametric and financing reforms to guarantee the overall sustainability of the Greek pension system. In May 2010, following the signature of the Memorandum of Understanding between the Government of Greece and the IMF, the European Commission, the Eurogroup, and the European Central Bank, an ILO mission visited Greece at the request of the National Actuarial Authority and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to support the quantitative analysis of a set of consolidating reforms of the pension system under the provisions of the draft law No. 3863. The ILO projections delivered on 1 June 2010 showed that the reform would trigger substantial long-term savings for the pension system, to the extent that the deficit, even in view of mounting demographic pressures, would be more or less stabilized during the next five decades, provided that the assumptions of the costing held good. Noting that the new design and parameters of the Greek pension system, which should become fully operational in 2015, are in line, conceptually and technically, with the minimum standards laid down by the Convention, the Committee nevertheless considers that, in the context of the rapidly deteriorating economic situation of the country, the initial costing assumptions in the ILO projections might need to be reviewed, and that the ongoing actuarial evaluation of the Act No. 3863 presents the best opportunity for this. The Committee also considers that, in view of the international obligation of Greece under the Code, it would be prudent for the Government to specifically include among the basic parameters for the projected scenarios for the future development of the national pension system the minimum standards of the Code. The Committee wishes to underscore that an objective actuarial study drawing a red line alerting the Government to conditions which might lead to the possible violation of the minimum international social security standards, will equip the Government with an invaluable tool to exercise effectively its general responsibility for the proper governance of the social security system and seek an enlightened acceptance of the reforms by the social partners in full knowledge of the situation. Bearing this in mind, the Committee asks the Government to explain in detail in its next report the basic assumptions and the resulting conclusions of the current actuarial evaluation of the reforms introduced by Act No. 3863.

Besides the concerns over the long-term viability of the pension system, in the immediate future the country is facing the risk of the social security system being unable to withstand the continuing contraction of the economy, employment and public finances and compelled to reduce the level of protection, which may fall below the minimums guaranteed by the Convention. According to the information collected by the high-level mission of the ILO, which has specifically covered social security among other areas, it was estimated that, in the event that unemployment increases to 1 million people from the current 800,000, social security funds would be losing €5 billion annually and the sustainability of the benefits provided by them would be called into question. Already, in addition to pension cuts operated by Act No. 3863, Act No. 4024/27-10-2011 on “Provisions concerning pensions, the common pay-scale and grading system [in the public sector], the labour reserve and other provisions for the implementation of the mid-term fiscal strategy 2012–15” introduced new cuts in the pensions over €1,000 received by persons below and above 55 years of age of the order of 40 per cent and 20 per cent respectively, as well as reductions in the supplementary pensions. The high-level mission noted that such drastic reductions in the level of benefits undermine the people’s trust in the social security system and raise concerns for social justice in handling the crisis. The Committee observes that the general responsibility of the Government for the proper governance of the social security system obliges it to restore people’s confidence in its ability to be an effective and just regulator and provider of services in the interests of the Greek people. To achieve this, the following principles of social solidarity and justice on which the Convention is based, become particularly important when times are bad:

- that the cuts in benefits, likewise their costs, shall be borne collectively, spreading fairly among the members of the society in a manner which avoids hardship to persons of small means and takes into account the economic situation of the country and of the classes of persons protected (Article 71(1) of the Convention);

- that the cuts in benefits shall not result from the unilateral withdrawal of the State or of the employers from the financing of the benefits, thus leaving the employees protected to bear more than 50 per cent of the total of the financial resources allocated to the protection of employees and their families (Article 71(2));
- that the cuts in benefits and related austerity measures shall be decided and managed in consultation with the representatives of the persons protected as well as of the employers and of the public authorities through the established mechanisms of tripartite social dialogue (Article 72(2)).

In the light of these principles, the Committee considers that it is incumbent upon the Government to assess, with all the parties concerned by the implementation of an international support mechanism for Greece, the resources available to those who evade contributing to the country's efforts, in order to ensure that they are forced to contribute by legal means. The Committee would like the Government to explain to what extent it abides by the above principles of social solidarity and justice in introducing the social austerity measures in the context of the implementation of the support mechanism for Greece.

Furthermore, the need to strengthen the governance of the social security system would require the Government to plan and assess past and future social austerity measures in relation to one of the main objectives of the Convention, which consists in the prevention of poverty among the categories of the persons protected. The social security system would not fulfil its role if the benefits it provides would be so low as to push the workers below the poverty line; in such cases the State will be seen as failing to fulfil its general responsibilities under Articles 71(3) and 72(2) of the Convention. In this context, the Committee would consider it the duty of the Government to assess, together with all the parties involved in the implementation of the international support mechanism for Greece, the spread of poverty in the country, particularly among persons of small means, and the ability of the available social security benefits to withstand this trend and "maintain the family of the beneficiary in health and decency" (Article 67(c) of the Convention). In doing so, the Government should establish a comprehensive system of statistical monitoring of poverty and consider social security policies in coordination with its tax, wage and employment policies in the context of the obligations undertaken under the international support mechanism. The Committee would like to point out in this respect, as it has done already in its General Report of 2009, that "social security and the overall economy were inseparable, particularly in periods of crisis, and needed to be governed and managed together, at both the national and global levels. It meant that bringing the economy out of the crisis required enhanced measures of social protection and, indeed, making social security part of the solution." Exploring exclusively fiscal solutions at the expense of cutting non-wage labour costs and basic welfare could eventually lead to the collapse of the internal demand and the social functioning of the State, condemning the country to years of economic depression. Taking into account the gravity of the situation, the Committee calls on the ILO to continue to provide comprehensive technical assistance to Greece in reforming its social security system, and to draw the attention of all the parties implementing the support mechanism for Greece to the need, in order to prevent the drastic impoverishment of the population and mounting social unrest, to maintain social security benefits at least at the minimum levels prescribed by the Convention, as well as to establish the statistical monitoring system of the spread of poverty among different categories of the population and use its indicators to closely coordinate social security, tax and employment policies.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Guinea

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of benefits in case of residence abroad. The Committee recalls that the Government, in its earlier reports, indicated that the new Social Security Code, when adopted, would give full effect to Article 5 of the Convention under which the provision of old-age benefits, survivors benefits and death grants, and employment injury pensions must be guaranteed in the case of residence abroad, irrespective of the country of residence and even in the absence of agreements with such country, both to nationals of Guinea and to nationals of any other State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for the corresponding branch. However, in its last report, the Government indicates that the new Social Security Code does not entirely fulfil the requirements of the provisions of Article 5 of the Convention, in that it does not provide for maintenance of payment of the various benefits in case of change of residence, and that this restriction is a constant feature of the legislation governing the field in the States in the subregion. However, the Government hopes that further negotiation of bilateral agreements with other States will make good this weakness in the Social Security Code.

In this connection, the Committee notes that under section 91, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the new Code, benefits are cancelled when the beneficiary definitively leaves the territory of the Republic of Guinea, or are suspended while she or he is not resident on national territory. It notes however that, under the last paragraph of that section, these provisions "are not applicable in the case of nationals of countries which have subscribed to the obligations of the international Conventions of the International Labour Office regarding social security ratified by the Republic of Guinea, or where there are reciprocal agreements or multilateral or bilateral social security agreements on the provision of benefits abroad". Since, by virtue of this exception, the nationals of any State which has accepted the obligations of Convention No. 118 for the corresponding branch, may in principle now claim benefits in case of residence abroad, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this is in fact the case and, if so, whether a procedure for the transfer of benefits abroad has been established by the national social security fund, to meet the possible demands for such foreign transfer. In addition, the Committee requests the Government to state whether the exception provided in the last paragraph of section 91 is also applicable to Guinean nationals in the event of their transferring their residence abroad, in accordance with the principle of equal treatment established under Article 5 of the Convention as regards the payment of benefits abroad.

Article 6. Payment of family benefit. With reference to the comments it has been formulating for many years regarding the provision of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad, the Committee notes that, under section 94, paragraph 2, of the new Code, to obtain the right to family allowances, dependent children “must reside in the Republic of Guinea, subject to the special provisions of the international Conventions on social security of the International Labour Office, reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements”. With respect to reciprocal agreements or bilateral or multilateral agreements, the Committee recalls that to date Guinea has concluded no agreement of this sort for the payment of family allowances in respect of children residing abroad. Regarding the special provisions of the ILO Conventions, it recalls that under Article 6 of Convention No. 118 any State which has accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i) (family benefit) must guarantee payment of family allowances both to its own nationals and to the nationals of any other member which has accepted the obligations of this Convention for that branch, as well as for refugees and stateless persons, in respect of children who reside on the territory of any such State, under conditions and within limits to be agreed upon by the States concerned. In this connection, the Government states in its report that the payment of family benefits is guaranteed to families of whom the breadwinner has been regularly insured by the social security system, and is in order regarding the payment of his own contributions, and those of his successive employers. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will be able to confirm formally in its next report that the payment of family allowances will also be extended to cover insured persons up to date with their contributions, whether they are nationals, refugees, stateless persons or nationals of any other States which have accepted the obligations of the Convention for branch (i), whose children reside on the territory of one of these States and not in Guinea. The Committee would also like to know in these cases how the condition of residence is dispensed with for the application of section 99, paragraph 2, of the new Code, which only recognizes as dependent those children “that live with the insured person”, and also for section 101, which makes payment of family allowances subject to an annual medical examination of the child, up to the age where she or he comes under the school medical service, and the regular medical care for beneficiaries of school age attending courses in educational or vocational training establishments.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1967)

Article 8 of the Convention. Occupational diseases. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the list of occupational diseases revised in 1992, indicating whether it is now in force.

Article 15(1). Conversion of periodical payments into a lump sum. In accordance with the provisions of section 111 of the Social Security Code, periodical payments for employment injury are converted into a lump sum when the permanent incapacity is at most equal to 10 per cent. The Committee recalls, however, that its comments concerned the possibility of converting the benefit granted in the event of employment injury in the circumstances provided for in sections 114 (conversion after expiry of a five-year period) and 115 of the Social Security Code (conversion into a lump sum of part of the periodical payment at the request of the person concerned). The Committee again expresses the hope that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that in all these cases periodical payments may be converted into a lump sum only in exceptional cases and with the consent of the victim where the competent authority has reason to believe that the lump sum will be utilized in a manner which is particularly advantageous for the injured person.

Articles 19 and 20. Amount of benefits. In the absence of the statistical information requested which the Committee needs so that it can determine whether the amount of benefits paid in the event of temporary incapacity, permanent incapacity and death of the breadwinner, reaches the level prescribed by the Convention, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate whether it avails itself of Article 19 or of Article 20 of the Convention in establishing that the percentages required by Schedule II of this instrument have been reached, and to provide the statistical information required by the report form adopted by the Governing Body under Article 19 or 20, depending on the Government’s choice.

Article 21. Review of employment injury benefit rates. In view of the importance it attaches to this provision of the Convention which establishes that the rates of employment injury benefits must be reviewed to take account of trends in the cost of living and the general level of earnings, the Committee hopes that the Government’s next report will contain information on the amount of the increases already established and that it will not fail to provide all the statistics required by the report form under this Article of the Convention.

Article 22(2). Payment of employment injury benefits to dependants. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will be able to take the necessary measures to ensure that, in all cases where employment injury benefits are suspended and particularly in the cases provided for in sections 121 and 129 of the Social Security Code, part of these benefits will be paid to the dependants of the person concerned in accordance with the provisions of this Article of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the provisions of the Conditions of Service of the Public Service give public servants and their families full satisfaction as regards social coverage. It once again asks the Government to provide the text of the provisions of the above Conditions of Service dealing with compensation for employment injury with its next report.

Lastly, the Committee asks the Government in its future reports to provide information on any progress made in the revision of the Social Security Code, to which the Government referred previously.

Reporting obligations. The Committee notes the Government's reports on Conventions Nos 12, 17, 18 and 19, received for the first time since the year 2000, notwithstanding the numerous reminders sent to the Government. It regrets, however, that they still do not reply to most of the questions raised in the comments of 2001 and repeated in 2008, 2009 and 2010. The National Workers' Union of Guinea (UNTG) in its observations on the Government's reports on ratified Conventions, stressed that the Government should step up its efforts to comply with international labour standards and bring its legislation in line with the ILO Conventions. In the UNTG's opinion, the Government should take all necessary measures to strengthen its technical, material and financial capabilities to enforce the application of the labour standards in the private and public sectors. The Committee hopes that the Government will take these observations into account and will not fail to include the information requested in its next detailed reports on these Conventions due before 1 September 2012. The Government is also reminded to provide detailed information on the practical application of these Conventions as required in Part V of the report forms, particularly on the number and nature of the occupational accidents reported and the amount of benefits paid.

Legal framework of protection against occupational accidents and diseases in Guinea-Bissau. The said legal framework is composed of several laws and decrees, including Decree No. 4/80 on Compulsory Insurance on Occupational Accidents and Diseases (6 February 1980), Regulatory Decree No. 6/80 regulating Decree No. 4/80, Legislative Decree No. 5/86 on Establishment of a Social Protection Regime (29 March 1986), Legislative Decree No. 1/97 on the Replacement of the National Insurance and Social Protection Institute by the National Institute of Social Security (INPS) and GUIBIS-Guinea-Bissau Insurances SÀRL (29 April 1997), and Act No. 4/2007 on the Legal Framework for Social Protection (3 September 2007). Decree No. 4/80 governs compulsory insurance against occupational accidents and diseases providing for the workers' (and their family members') right to compensation. It sets the definition of occupational accidents and diseases and rules regarding the exercise of the rights to compensation under the compulsory insurance scheme, and financed through employers' and workers' contributions, operated by the INPS. Regulatory Decree No. 6/80 establishes different types of benefits to which a worker suffering an occupational accident or disease is entitled according to the degree of incapacity, and sets forth the rules to determine the base salary upon which compensation is paid. Legislative Decree No. 5/86 repeals the provisions of the Agricultural Code and establishes the basis of the general regime of social security. Legislative Decree No. 1/97 replaces the former National Insurance and Social Protection Institute with the INPS. Lastly, Act No. 4/2007 establishing a Legal Framework for Social Protection for the population of the country, consists of three schemes: Citizenship Social Protection of a non-contributory nature; Mandatory Social Protection, which is a contributory regime covering all wage earners (nationals or foreigners); and a voluntary Complementary Social Security scheme. The Committee would ask the Government to complete the above description of the legal framework existing in the country and providing protection against occupational accidents and diseases, clarifying in particular: (i) whether Act No. 4/2007 has entered into force and been regulated; (ii) whether Decree No. 4/80 and Regulatory Decree No. 6/80 have been repealed by Act No. 4/2007; (iii) the relations between Regulatory Decree No. 5/86 and Act No. 4/2007, with respect to their scope of application, rules regarding foreign workers, benefits and degrees of compensation for incapacity of workers due to occupational accidents and diseases; (iv) proposals for reforming this framework and elaborating new legislation.

Adoption of the list of occupational diseases. The Committee recalls that back in 2000, the Government stated that the INPS, which has competence for workers' compensation for occupational accidents and diseases, was having difficulty in identifying occupational diseases, and consequently, the Ministry of Public Health had not been able to adopt a list of such diseases. In its 2011 report on Convention No. 18, the Government regretted that Guinea-Bissau has neither enacted a legal regime regulating occupational diseases nor adopted a list of such diseases but reported that a Commission had been established to review the legislation regarding industrial accidents and to draft legislation and establish a list of occupational diseases. While taking due note of these developments, the Committee wishes to remind the Government that by ratifying Convention No. 18 it has made the list of diseases in Schedule to Article 2 of the Convention part of the national legal order. That list was elaborated by the International Labour Conference back in 1925 specifically for the purpose of providing countries, which had no capacity to establish their own lists, with a ready-made compendium of diseases recognized as occupational on the basis of the best international experience available at that time. Since then, the ILO list of occupational diseases has been complemented on several occasions (see Conventions Nos 42 and 121 and Recommendation No. 194) by new diseases the professional origin of which was ascertained by the evolution of scientific knowledge. The diseases listed in Convention No. 18 ratified by Guinea-Bissau therefore constitute the minimum protection to be guaranteed and must be automatically recognized as occupational where contracted in the conditions prescribed in the Schedule by all the national authorities for the purposes of workmen's compensation. The Committee would like the Government to explain what legal or other reasons prevented it for so long from bringing this list to the attention of the national labour administration, social insurance and judicial authorities in order to ensure the practical implementation of the obligations assumed by the country under Convention No. 18. The Committee again expresses the hope that the Government will take all necessary steps to ensure, through the adoption of the new legislation referred to in its report, that the list of occupational diseases established by the Convention becomes fully operational and legally enforceable in the country for the purpose of workmen's compensation.

Compensation for occupational accidents and diseases. The Committee notes from the report on Convention No. 17 that, in practice, compensation may be paid wholly as a lump sum. Please indicate what authority is competent to decide that payment shall be made in a lump sum and what guarantees, if any, for the proper utilization of the lump sum it ordinarily requires, in accordance with Article 5 of Convention No. 17. The report also states that public servants are not subject to any legal framework in relation to compensation in case of industrial accidents, but, if a public servant suffers a personal injury due to an industrial accident, he/she receives compensation in the form of a sum of money. The Committee would ask the Government whether any consideration was given to the possibility to include public servants within the legal framework protection against occupational accidents and diseases. Finally the Committee notes that, according to section 17(2) of Decree No. 6/80, where the incapacity is such that the injured person must have the help of another person or special care, the pension may be increased to up to 100 per cent of the basic wage. Please indicate the number of people who are actually receiving such an increased pension.

Application to agricultural wage earners. In its previous reports on Convention No. 12, the Government had indicated that Decrees Nos 4/80 and 6/80 governing compulsory insurance against occupational accidents and diseases applied to agricultural wage earners. In its 2011 report, the Government indicates that, according to section 1(b) of Chapter I of Legislative Decree No. 5/86 only agricultural wage earners whose employers can be identified are mandatorily covered, while independent agricultural wage earners who do not perform their work in a "family regime", as set out in section 2(2)(d) of Decree No. 4/80 are excluded from coverage. Section 17 of Act No. 4/2007 provides, however, that wage earners in all branches and sectors are to be included in the Mandatory Social Protection System, provided that the employer they work for can be identified, with the exclusion only of domestic workers who are subject to a special regime. The Committee would like the Government to explain what agricultural wage earners are covered by the "family regime" and whether they benefit from the protection given by the legislation cited above. Please explain also the special regime applicable to the domestic workers.

Section 6 et seq. of Decree No. 4/80 set forth a general definition of occupational accidents as well as the definitions related to specific sectors such as agriculture, where according to the Government, occupational accidents are defined as the wrong use of chemical products and protection equipment. The Committee wishes to point out that the principle of equality of treatment of agricultural wage earners implies that they should benefit from the same definition of occupational accidents that is applicable to other workers. The Government should therefore consider harmonizing the different definitions of occupational accidents so that workers in different sectors of activities would benefit from the same protection and compensation.

The Government states that it has no statistics on occupational accidents and diseases because most of agricultural wage earners are not aware of their obligation under section 20 of Decree No. 4/80 to report the occurrence of any occupational accident or disease to the National Institute of Social Security. The General Labour Inspectorate has neither special knowledge in the field of agricultural work nor financial nor human resources to carry out inspections in this sector. Most occupational accidents and diseases are caused by the fact that agricultural workers do not wear suitable protection equipment in carrying out their tasks. Some companies fail to comply with their obligations under occupational accidents and diseases legislation and some others are not even registered with the INPS. The Committee notes the practical difficulties encountered by the Government in the application of Convention No. 12. It observes that these difficulties will not go away without systemic and vigorous action taken by the Government in cooperation with the social partners to raise awareness of workers and companies of their respective rights and obligations, establish simple and rapid procedures for reporting occupational accidents supported by insurance compensation and labour inspection, promote the use of protection equipment and safer technologies, etc. The Committee asks the Government to step up its efforts to reduce the gap between the agricultural and the industrial sectors with regard to protection against occupational accidents and diseases and to indicate the concrete measures taken in this respect in its next report.

Equality of treatment of foreign workers. In its previous comments concerning Convention No. 19, the Committee pointed out that section 3(1) of Decree No. 4/80 is inconsistent with the Convention in that it lays down reciprocity as a requirement for equality of treatment between foreign workers employed in Guinea-Bissau and national workers. In response, the Government mentions that article 28 of the Constitution forbids any discrimination between foreigners and citizens and that under the current legal order, equality of treatment regarding accident compensation is granted to all workers. In practice, the Government indicates that the General Labour and Social Security Inspectorate did not find any situation amounting to unequal treatment of injured workers, and that no judicial decisions have been rendered evidencing unequal treatment between foreign and national workers.

The Committee also notes that section 17(2) of Act No. 4/2007 provides that workers who suffered injuries as a result of an industrial accident are covered by the mandatory social protection scheme without any condition as to residence in the country, and section 3 requires the Government to foster the conclusion or adherence to international agreements aiming at the reciprocal recognition of equality of treatment of the nationals of the countries concerned. The Committee recalls, in this respect, that Convention No. 19 lays down a system of automatic reciprocity between the 121 ILO member States which have ratified it, and thereby ensures that nationals of all countries party to the Convention, as well as their dependants, benefit from national treatment in respect of workmen's compensation. It would therefore be more consistent with the Convention and the Act No. 4/2007 for section 3(1) of Decree No. 4/80 to be amended so as to delete the reciprocity requirement. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether, pursuant to Article 1(2) of the Convention, any compensation is paid for injured persons or their dependants residing outside the country, and if so, to provide the statistical data confirming these payments.

Guyana

Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that it has been drawing the Government's attention since 1971 to the need to amend the list of occupational diseases attached to Regulation No. 34 of 1969, implementing Act No. 15 of 1969 on national insurance and social security. It notes with regret, from the information communicated by the Government in its last report, that this list has still not been amended but that the competent authorities have been requested to accelerate the review procedure of the relevant regulation. It further notes that the Government no longer refers to the legislative reform regarding occupational safety and health. The Committee trusts that the Government will be able to take the measures necessary as soon as possible to amend the list of occupational diseases to ensure full application of the Convention on the following points:

- (a) No. 1(x), (xi), (xii) and (xiv) on this list are to be replaced by a heading containing in general terms all halogen derivatives of hydrocarbons of the aliphatic series;
- (b) No. 7, which refers to certain disorders due to radiation should include all pathological manifestations due to radium and other radioactive substances or X-rays and the list of processes likely to induce these should be completed;
- (c) No. 1(i) and (v) relating to poisoning by lead and its compounds and mercury and its compounds should include lead alloys and mercury amalgams respectively;
- (d) No. 1(iii), which refers to poisoning by phosphorus and its compounds, should include the inorganic compounds of phosphorus;
- (e) No. 2 should include, among the processes likely to induce anthrax infection, all loading and unloading or transport of merchandise of any kind;
- (f) silicosis with or without pulmonary tuberculosis and the industries or processes involving the risk of this infection should also be added to the list.

The Committee wishes to remind the Government that it may request technical assistance from the ILO in this domain.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Kenya

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the adoption of the Work Injury Benefits Act which replaced the Workmen's Compensation Act as of June 2008 and addresses certain issues previously raised as regards the manner in which the Convention is implemented in the country. The necessary regulations for the effective implementation of the new Act are yet to be developed and the social partners are being consulted on the matter. The Committee encourages the Government to rapidly adopt the necessary implementing regulations and to give favourable consideration to the following remarks.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of compensation in the form of periodical payments. In accordance with section 28 of the Work Injury Benefits Act (WIBA), an employee who suffers temporary total or partial disablement due to an accident that incapacitates the employee for three days or longer is entitled to receive a periodical payment. In case of permanent disablement, section 30 of the Act maintains the payment of a lump sum granted under the previous system, only increasing the amount of the compensation granted to 96 months' earnings as opposed to the 48 months granted under the previous system. While it welcomes this increase, the Committee wishes to recall that Article 5 of the Convention guarantees that the compensation payable to the injured workers, or their dependants, where permanent incapacity or death results from the injury, needs to be paid in the form of periodical payments; it may only be wholly or partially paid in a lump sum, if the competent authority is satisfied that it will be properly utilized. The Committee therefore once again invites the Government to seize the opportunity of the ongoing reform so as to provide for the payment of the compensation in a lump sum only for injured persons with a slight degree of incapacity or for whom the competent authority is satisfied that the lump sum will be properly utilized. Other victims of occupational accidents suffering permanent incapacity or their dependents in cases of fatal accidents need to be provided with periodical payments.

Articles 9 and 10. Medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid free of charge. Section 47 of WIBA provides that an employer must defray any expenses reasonably incurred by an employee as the result of an accident arising out of, and in the course of, the employer's employment in respect of, inter alia, dental, medical, surgical and hospital treatment, the supply of medicine and surgical dressing, as well as the supply, maintenance, repair and replacement of artificial limbs, crutches and other appliances and apparatus. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the manner in which this provision gives effect to the principle of free of charge medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid to the victims of occupational accidents without any participation, even temporary, to the cost of such aid by the victims. Please also clarify how the term "reasonable expenses" incurred by victims of occupational accidents is defined and applied in practice given that the Convention guarantees injured workers the right to such medical aid as is recognized to be necessary in consequence of their accidents.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Peninsular Malaysia

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Equal treatment of foreign workers. The Committee recalls that since 1 April 1993, the Malaysian social security system has contained inequalities of treatment that run counter to the provisions of the Convention. This inequality is due to national legislation that transferred foreign workers, employed in Malaysia for up to five years from the Employees' Social Security Scheme (ESS), which provided for periodical payments to victims of industrial accidents, to the Workmen's Compensation Scheme (WCS), which guaranteed only a lump sum payment of a significantly lower amount. On several occasions, the case of Malaysia has been discussed by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. Most recently, in June 2011, the Conference Committee urged the Government to take immediate steps in order to bring national law and practice into conformity with Article 1 of the Convention, to respect the system of automatic reciprocity instituted by the Convention between the ratifying countries, and to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO to resolve administrative difficulties by concluding special arrangements with the labour-supplying countries under Articles 1(2) and 4 of the Convention.

In its report received in August 2011, the Government replied that it is considering bringing its national law and practice into conformity with Article 1 of the Convention. A technical Committee including all stakeholders will be formed under the Ministry of Human Resources to pursue the formulation of the right mechanism and system to administer this issue considering the following three options: (i) extension of ESS coverage to foreign workers; (ii) creation of a special scheme for foreign workers under the ESS; and (iii) raising the level of the benefit provided by the WCS so as to be equivalent to that of the ESS benefit. Upon completion of the study by the technical Committee, the Government will consider engaging technical assistance of the ILO to facilitate bringing the national legislation in compliance with the principle of equality of treatment between nationals and non-nationals.

The Committee notes that an ILO mission visiting the country from 3 to 7 October 2011, was briefed on action being taken to rectify the situation. The Committee also notes the comparative tables supplied by the Government with its report, listing in detail the characteristics of both the WCS and the ESS with respect to qualifying conditions, conditions for the granting of benefits and the calculation formulas used to compute benefits. It notes that there are considerable differences in the levels of benefits granted by the WCS and ESS, as illustrated by the fact that the WCS does not grant invalidity pensions in case of permanent total invalidity and that the WCS benefit in case of permanent partial disability represents only 6.5 per cent of the ESS benefit. The Committee hopes that in determining the most suitable option among those mentioned above, the Government will act with the best interests of migrant workers in mind and will treat them on an equal footing with Malaysian workers. The Committee trusts that the Government will accomplish this task in the very near future so as to be able to report success in its next report to be supplied by 1 September 2012.

Mauritius

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 5, 7, 9, 10 and 11 of the Convention. Ongoing reform of national legislation. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to include in the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1931 (Cap. 220) provisions giving effect to the following Articles of the Convention: Article 5 (the principle of the payment of compensation in the form of periodical payments in the case of permanent incapacity or death), Article 7 (additional compensation for workmen injured in such a way as to require the constant help of another person), Article 9 (free entitlement to the necessary medical and surgical aid), Article 10 (supply and renewal of artificial limbs and surgical appliances) and Article 11 (guarantees against the insolvency of the employer or insurer). Since 1999, the Government reiterates that a merger of the Workmen's Compensation Act and the National Pensions Act, 1976 (NPA), which gives effect to the above provisions, was envisaged with a view to ensuring the full application of the Convention and that the Bill was to be introduced to the National Assembly. The Government's latest report indicates that the reform is still in the process of being completed, but gives no further details. In these circumstances, the Committee cannot but request the Government to take all necessary measures to complete the reform so as to bring the Workmen's Compensation Act into full compliance with the above provisions of the Convention.

Equality of Treatment (Accident Compensation) Convention, 1925 (No. 19) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1 of the Convention. Equality of treatment. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend section 3 of the National Pensions (Non-Citizens and Absent Persons) Order, 1978, as amended by the National Pensions Act (NPA), under which foreign nationals may not be affiliated to the insurance scheme unless they have resided in Mauritius for a continuous period of not less than two years. In its reports, the Government had repeatedly indicated that a bill revising this section 3 was being prepared and would be introduced to the National Assembly as soon as it has been accepted by the State Law Office. In its latest report of 2011, the Government does not make any reference to the above bill but instead refers to the draft legislation merging the Workmen's Compensation Act and the National Pensions Act. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the above issue and expresses the firm hope that all necessary measures will be taken in the very near future so as to bring the national legislation into compliance with the principle of equal treatment between national and foreign residents guaranteed by the Convention without any condition as to residence.

Mexico

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received in October 2011, which contains information requested under Parts I and III to VI of the report form on the Convention adopted by the ILO Governing Body, as well as a partial reply to the Committee's previous observation. This information concerns exclusively the application of the Act on the State Workers' Social Security and Services Institute (ISSSTE). With regard to Part II of the report form, the Committee observes that, while the last sentence of the report indicates that information on the application by ISSSTE of each of the corresponding articles of the Convention is given under Part II of the report form, this part of the Government's report has not been received by the Office. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will not fail to supply this information as soon as possible. It wishes to remind the Government in this respect that the detailed report should not be confined to only one piece of legislation, as the ISSSTE Act in this case, but should cover all national legislation giving effect to the Parts of the Convention accepted by Mexico (Parts II, III, V, VI and VIII to X). The Committee expects to receive such a comprehensive report before 1 September 2012.

With respect to Parts III and V of the report form which ask about enforcement, inspection and the difficulties encountered in the application of the Convention in practice, the Government informs that in the period from 1 June 2008 through 31 March 2011, 138,728 labour inspections have been carried out nationwide in 80,284 places of work without detecting any violations or workers' complaints relating to the subject matter of Convention No. 102 of the ILO, which covers 9,251,838 workers in Mexico. In the light of this information, the Committee would like to know whether the Government sees no difficulties and is generally satisfied as to how the Convention is applied in practice. From its side, the Committee observes a great disparity between the high number of the workers' complaints dealt with by the judiciary bodies and the zero number of violations registered by the labour inspection. Recalling that Mexico has not ratified the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee asks the Government to specify whether its labour inspection services have the legal competence to supervise the application of the social security legislation and, in particular, pension insurance. Please also supply information on the organization and working of the inspection in social security, as requested in Part III of the report form.

With respect to Part IV of the report form which asks for information on court decisions involving questions of principle relating to the application of the Convention, the Government refers to 42 jurisprudential criteria of the Supreme National Court of Justice (SCJN) concerning constitutional complaints (amparos constitucionales) and 23 decisions of other national tribunals concerning only the ISSSTE. The Committee would like to know whether in the reporting period of 2006–11 the national courts of law have rendered decisions of principle concerning other branches of the Mexican social security system. As regards the decision of the national tribunals concerning ISSSTE, the report specifies that they have not led to any modification of this Act. In terms of legislative implications of the decisions taken by the SCJN, the Government states that the declaration of unconstitutionality of certain provisions of the ISSSTE Act does not affect the nature and operation of the pension system established by it. In relation to the judgments rendered by the SCJN whereby articles 25, second and third paragraphs, 60, last paragraph, 136, 251 and Tenth Transitional Provision of the ISSSTE Act were found to be unconstitutional, the Government reports that the SCJN observed that the authorities responsible for the implementation of the said Act should take into account its interpretation of these provisions regarding the system chosen by the employee (the new system of individual accounts or the previous pension system), and that when dealing with claimants' cases these authorities should refrain from implementing the provisions declared unconstitutional until they are repealed or amended. For this purpose, the competent authorities shall take the necessary measures to ensure that all authorities, which, by reason of their functions, are responsible for the enforcement of the judgments upholding the protection of claimants' rights, shall be aware of decisions of the SCJN regarding the scope of the provisions of the ISSSTE Act and the persons covered by them. The Committee would like the Government to explain what measures have been taken by the competent authorities to that end.

The Committee thanks the Government for maintaining an active dialogue with the trade unions, having considered every aspect of the observations submitted by the various trade union organizations mentioned in the Committee's previous comments. It notes that many of the questions raised by the trade unions concerning ISSSTE Act have been the subject of the jurisprudential criteria of the SCJN referred to above. In particular, in connection with the allegation made by the unions that there were irregularities during the approval process of the ISSSTE Act, the Federal Legislative Power considered that both the form and mechanisms were fully in conformity with the legislation: the SCJN also found that there were no flaws in the legislative process, and that the law contained the required preliminary recitals. Regarding the allegation that the new system introduced by the ISSSTE Act involves the privatization of the social security system, the SCJN concluded that this situation is not tantamount to the privatization of the regime, given that this is a process whereby services previously monopolized by the State are now freely rendered by individuals, and that the fact that the old-age benefits agency (Pensionisste) is authorized to invest the resources of individual accounts, which never cease to be owned by workers, in order to obtain higher returns, does not imply, in any way, a privatization. In this regard, the Government asserts that regardless of the use Pensionisste makes of the funds contained in the individual accounts of workers, this agency shall always bear responsibility for them in accordance with the ISSSTE Act. The Committee further notes that the report refers to additional replies to the workers' questions concerning the ISSSTE given under each Article of the Convention in Part II of the report form, which has not been received.

In August 2011, new comments on the application of the Convention were forwarded by the Revolutionary Confederation of Workers and Agricultural Labourers (CROC) and the "Vanguardia Obara" Federation of Workers (FTVO), affiliated to the CROC in relation to domestic workers. In September 2011, the Trade Union Delegation of "Radio Education" (SNTE) and the National Union of Workers (UNT) also submitted comments on the ISSSTE Act and, in October 2011, the Union of Masons, Assistants and General Related-Construction Activities and Private Companies presented comments on issues relating to old-age benefits. The Committee hopes that the Government will reply to these new comments of the workers' organizations in 2012. Finally, the Committee took note of the Government's explanations provided in reply to the communication, dated 22 February 2010, from the Trade Union of Telephonists of the Mexican Republic concerning the situation of the AVON company workers.

Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government's report does not reply to the questions raised in its previous observation concerning certainty as to the level and sustainability of benefits, which read as follows:

In its previous observation, the Committee pointed out that the reform of the ISSSTE made it necessary to conduct an overall actuarial valuation of the entire social security system to ensure the financial equilibrium of the new system, which should henceforth include the part corresponding to the ISSSTE scheme, and asked the Government to indicate whether such a valuation has been carried out and, if so, to provide the results thereof. The Government's report of 2008 has not provided the information requested, indicating that the information processing systems of the two social security institutions – ISSSTE and IMSS – are in the process of coordination. In the meantime, the managing board of the ISSSTE has approved the actuarial report for 2008, which concludes that in the period 2008–13 the resources available to the Institute would on average cover only 88 per cent of the total cost of benefits it would have to deliver under the new law. The Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of this report and to indicate measures taken or envisaged by the Government to make up the deficit and ensure the due provision of benefits under the ISSSTE scheme.

Taking into account that the reform of the state workers' scheme necessitated transfer to the ISSSTE of the social security funds from the general scheme (IMSS), the Committee once again stresses the importance of an actuarial evaluation of the entire social security system, which should cover the various pension schemes recapitulating at a specific evaluation date the fixed and contingent liabilities, as well as all the debts and commitments of the State deriving from the old and the new social security systems. Indeed, only an overall actuarial valuation of the entire system will make it possible to estimate the contingent deficits to be underwritten by the State and to make the corresponding forecasts. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take the necessary measures to conduct such an actuarial study, as required by Article 71(3) of the Convention.

With regard to the question of the level of benefits, which the Committee has been addressing to the Government in its previous comments under Part XI of the Convention (Standards to be complied with by periodical payments), in the fully funded defined contributions scheme the amount of the pension is not determined in advance but depends on the capital saved in the workers' personal accounts and on the return thereon. The Committee therefore requests the Government to explain, with reference to the relevant actuarial forecasts, what replacement level the ISSSTE scheme aims to achieve after 30 years of contributions and whether the replacement level of 40 per cent required by the Convention would be attained for the standard beneficiary.

Pursuant to section 92 of the ISSSTE Act, for workers meeting the requirements on age and qualifying period laid down in section 89 of the Act, the State provides a "guaranteed pension" in a monthly amount of 3,034.20 pesos. The Government indicated in its report of 2008 that this amount represents the double of the minimum pension level established by the Convention and that the amount of the average pension equalled four minimum wages and was four times higher than the Convention's minimum. The Committee noted this information but did not find in the Government's report the statistical information requested in its previous observation under Article 66 of the Convention, to enable the Committee to ascertain whether the minimum amount of the old-age pension attains the percentage prescribed by the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to substantiate the above statements by comparing the amount of the guaranteed pension with the reference wage of an ordinary adult male labourer, as required in the report form under Article 66 of the Convention.

In the general IMSS scheme, under section 170 of the Social Security Act, the State guarantees to workers who fulfil the age conditions and qualifying periods set out in section 162 of the Social Security Act, the provision of a "guaranteed pension", the amount of which is equal to the general minimum wage for the Federal District. According to the statistics provided previously by the Government, the amount of the minimum guaranteed pension for 2006 attained 42.95 per cent of the wage of an ordinary adult male labourer selected in accordance with the provisions of Article 66 of the Convention. The Committee wishes the Government to explain the difference between the guaranteed pension under the ISSSTE, which, according to the Government, represents double the minimum pension level established by the Convention, and the guaranteed pension of the IMSS, which is scarcely above this minimum.

The Committee notes in this respect that, according to the trade unions' observation of 2007, neither the guaranteed pension under section 92 of the ISSSTE, nor the old age and invalidity pensions under sections 91, 121 and 139 of the ISSSTE ensured the replacement level of 40 per cent required by the Convention. Referring to the Government's reply to the trade unions' observation, the Committee observes that in contesting these allegations the Government does not refer to any statistical data and seems to confuse the general minimum wage for the Federal District with the wage of an ordinary adult male labourer, which should be used as the reference wage for measuring the replacement level of the guaranteed pensions. The Committee therefore once again asks the Government in its next detailed report due in 2012 to provide the statistical information requested by the report form under Article 66 of the Convention (Titles I, II and IV). It also asks the Government to indicate whether the guaranteed pension also applies to the pension arising out of death and, if so, under which provisions.

Myanmar

The Committee recalls that, since 1967, it has been urging the Government to amend the national legislation in order to align it with the following provisions of the Convention:

Article 5 of the Convention. The Workmens' Compensation Act of 1923 provides that in case of personal injury followed by death or permanent disability, compensation is paid in the form of a lump sum payment, whereas according to Article 5 of the Convention, it shall be in the form of periodical payments which may be wholly or partially converted into a lump sum, if the competent authority is satisfied that it will be properly utilized.

Article 10. Article 4(3) of the Workmens' Compensation Act and Regulation No. 65 taken under the Social Security Act of 1954 impose a ceiling for the supply and normal renewal of necessary artificial limbs and surgical appliances to victims of occupational accidents in contradiction with the Convention, which does not authorize such limits to be set.

In reply, the Government states in its reports of 2007 and 2011 that the Workmens' Compensation Act of 1923 and the Social Security Act of 1954 are being reviewed by the Law Scrutiny Central Body with a view to repealing the provisions which have become obsolete, and to adding the provisions which are in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee consequently requests the Government to submit copies of the draft amendments to these Acts elaborated by the Government and to explain in detail how their amended provisions would give full effect to Articles 5 and 10 of the Convention. The Committee wishes to remind the Government that its report of 2011 should have been prepared according to the report form on the Convention adopted by the Governing Body of the ILO, and hopes that the Government will not fail to supply a detailed report by 1 September 2013.

Article 4 of the Convention. Situation of Myanmar migrant workers in Thailand. The Committee notes the Government's report, received in August 2011, describing the legislative provisions on accident compensation and including statistics related to workmen's compensation cases in Myanmar. The Committee has been following with concern for a number of years, the situation of more than 2 million irregular migrant workers employed in Thailand, who are denied the right to affiliate to the Thai Workmen's Compensation Fund (WCF). The humanitarian problems raised by this situation have also been under the continued scrutiny of UN Human Rights bodies and have been a matter of serious concern among Thai trade unions and human rights NGOs. In order to be authorized to affiliate to the WCF in Thailand, a circular No. RS0711/W751 of the Thai Social Security Office requires migrant workers to engage in a nationality verification process with a view to obtaining temporary passports or migrant identification documents. Recently, the Government of Thailand, in cooperation with the Governments of Cambodia and Lao People's Democratic Republic, authorized state officials from these countries to proceed to nationality verifications of their nationals in centres located in Thailand in order to facilitate the completion of the verification process by migrants from these countries. The Memorandum of Understanding concluded between Myanmar and Thailand to facilitate the delivery of migrant identification documents has, for its part, been inoperative for a number of years with the consequence that migrant workers were required to return to Myanmar in order to obtain the documents required by Thai authorities. The bilateral cooperation between Thailand and Myanmar was recently reactivated on the occasion of a ministerial meeting which took place in June 2011, with the Government of Myanmar having committed itself to give all needed assistance through its diplomatic and consular representations and to issue in the near future the remaining temporary passports necessary for the completion of the nationality verification process by Myanmar migrants working in Thailand.

The Committee takes due note of these developments and underlines the need to protect the rights of migrant workers from Myanmar returning from other countries and to assist them effectively. It also recalls that, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, all ratifying members undertake to afford each other mutual assistance with a view to facilitating the application of the Convention and the execution of their respective laws and regulations on workmen's compensation. The Committee further notes, in this context, that the 2007 ASEAN Declaration on the Protection and Promotion of the Rights of Migrant Workers, also invites States receiving and sending migrants to closely cooperate, in particular, to resolve the cases of undocumented migrant workers. In view of the fact that Myanmar and Thailand both have ratified the present Convention, the Committee hopes that they will actively pursue cooperation with a view to overcoming the administrative difficulties in the application of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to afford the authorities of Thailand the assistance necessary in this respect, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention.

Netherlands

The Committee notes the Government's detailed report received on 29 August 2011, which contains a reply to the Committee's previous observation concerning the compatibility with the Convention of the main aspects of the Work and Income (Employment Capacity) Act of 2006 (WIA). It also notes the comments on the report, dated 31 August 2011, submitted by the Netherlands Trade Union Confederation (FNV) and the National Federation of Christian Trade Unions (CNV), to which the Government replied in a letter of 18 October 2011. The Committee further notes that various meetings were held between the Dutch Government and senior officials of the Office concerning ongoing compliance issues involving the WIA.

The Committee would like to thank the Dutch Government for the additional efforts it undertook to clarify its position and legislation, as well as to maintain the social dialogue with the trade unions, which provided the Committee with in-depth information on the application of the Convention both in law and in practice. The Committee recalls that its previous observation was entirely directed to an analysis of the WIA, including WIA coverage of the contingency of total or partial loss of earning capacity likely to be permanent, as defined in Article 6(c) of the Convention. As indicated in its previous observation, the Committee has decided to examine in its present comments the protection accorded by other Dutch implementing legislation, specifically legislation addressing the contingency of a morbid condition due to an employment injury (Article 6(a) of the Convention), which is provided by the health insurance scheme. For that purpose, the Committee has taken note also of the information contained in the Government's detailed report on the Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130), both of which were ratified by the Government in view of the linkages between these two Conventions, and of the dialogue it has with the abovementioned trade union organizations. The Committee will examine at its next sessions the protection offered by the Dutch legislation against the contingency of temporary or initial incapacity for work (Article 6(b) of Convention No. 121), which is provided by the mixed private/public system based on employers' civil liability to maintain wages during the first two years of sickness underpinned by the public safety net established by the Sickness Benefit Act (ZW), as well as the contingency of loss of support due to the death of the breadwinner (Article 6(d)) covered by the General Surviving Relatives Act (ANW).

Articles 7 and 8 of the Convention in conjunction with Article 26. Definition of industrial accident and occupational disease. With respect to these provisions of the Convention, the Government limits itself to stating that there is no special scheme concerning industrial accidents or occupational diseases and employees are compensated regardless of the cause of the disability. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the national labour or occupational safety and health legislation contains definitions of industrial accident and occupational disease, as well as a list of such diseases, established for the purpose of reporting and monitoring industrial accidents and occupational diseases. The Committee also requests that the Government provide information on accident and disease investigations by the labour inspectorate on the imposition of appropriate sanctions, and on the elaboration of measures for preventing industrial hazards, developing occupational health services, and determining employer liability for damages to workers' health. Please indicate whether the Netherlands collects statistical data on the frequency and severity of industrial accidents and, if so, supply this data with the Government's next report.

Medical care and allied benefits

The Committee notes that the Netherlands health insurance system has undergone a radical reform after the entry into force on 1 January 2006 of the Health Insurance Act, under which health insurance was fully privatized. The Committee requests the Government to explain whether there remain any type of public health services or medical institutions in the area of occupational health and rehabilitation and, if so, whether health-care insurers are encouraged to use these services and institutions for the treatment of employment injuries.

Articles 4 and 9. Coverage by the health insurance scheme and conditions of entitlement to benefits. The Committee notes that, in its comments under Convention No. 130, the FNV states that the Health Insurance Act is not a general public scheme in the sense that all citizens are compulsory insured, but a private insurance scheme under which all citizens are obliged to take out health-care insurance from private companies. The FNV further states that, given the private nature of the scheme, the Government cannot guarantee that all employees are protected and that in 2011 at least 150 000 persons of all classes and ages are not insured.

In reply, the Government's report on Convention No. 130 states that, while full coverage is not guaranteed, the essential factor is that there is a governmental measure that offers the protection desired. Whether the persons to be protected wish to accept such protection or not is up to them, but if they do not conclude a health insurance contract, they may end up being unable to pay the costs of the required care in case of serious illness or accident. In general, this outcome is not acceptable and the Government acts to urge such persons to take out health insurance. Furthermore, if, having concluded an insurance contract, a person for some reason does not pay the normal insurance premiums, the care insurer is entitled to terminate the health insurance. "After all", says the Government's report, "it is an agreement under private law". This situation too can lead to highly undesirable consequences if the insured person ends up needing care, and the Government reports that it is being taken care of through additional legislative measures.

With regard to the evasion of concluding health insurance contracts, the Government indicates in its report on Convention No. 121 that a new law took effect on 15 March 2011 designed to identify uninsured persons by means of database comparisons and obliging them to take out health-care insurance under the threat of two successive penalties equal to three times the standard premium. After two penalties have been imposed, the Health Insurance Board will take out insurance on behalf of anyone who is still uninsured, summoning this person to pay an administrative premium for 12 months, which, where possible, will be withheld at source. With the introduction of this measure the Government can guarantee that all persons legally residing in the Netherlands are protected. With respect to the evasion of paying health insurance premiums, the Government indicates that, starting on 1 September 2009, measures have been taken to reduce the number of people who do not pay premiums on time or do not pay at all. According to the Health Insurance Act, when the insured person is in arrears for an amount equivalent to six months' premiums, the obligation to pay the nominal premium to the care insurer is converted to an obligation to pay the Health Insurance Board an administrative premium equal to 130 per cent of the standard premium. The Board imposes this levy on the defaulter, bears responsibility for its collection and pays a compensation for the loss of premium to the care insurer.

The Committee notes the measures taken by the Government to ensure coverage of persons who would otherwise be left unprotected by the private health insurance scheme functioning with a view to profit. It requests the Government to indicate how many employees were found by the Health Insurance Board to lack health insurance coverage and whether the employer has any obligation to check that its employees have the proper health insurance coverage. The Committee further notes that all the measures to improve coverage are based on the imposition of substantial fines on those persons whom the Convention seeks to protect automatically and free of charge. The Committee points out that if, for example, a partially disabled employee has no money to pay health insurance premiums, imposing additional fines on that person would only aggravate the situation of hardship, which the Convention prescribes the Government to avoid. The Committee wishes the Government to explain in this respect to what extent the improvement of coverage has been achieved through the social assistance mechanism established by the Health Care Allowance Act (Wet op de zorgtoeslag), under which persons for whom the nominal premium is too high in relation to their income may receive an allowance paid by the tax authorities.

With respect to the right of private insurance companies under private law to desist themselves from the obligation to provide care in case of non-payment of premiums, the Committee points out that, according to the Convention, the national legislation concerning employment injury benefits shall protect all employees and ensure that benefits are provided without any supplementary conditions not mentioned in the Convention. Article 9 of the Convention guarantees eligibility for benefits on the basis of the employment relation alone and forbids subjecting eligibility to the payment of insurance contributions or premiums. In the Netherlands' case, this would mean that employees suffering employment injury shall be given prescribed medical care and allied benefits even in the absence of a duly concluded individual health insurance contract or the required premium payment. The Government is invited to explain how and by virtue of which provisions of the national legislation the necessary emergency and follow-up medical treatment are provided to an employed person who at the moment of an industrial accident or manifestation of an occupational disease did not possess a health insurance contract or whose contract was terminated due to non-payment of premiums.

Article 10(1). Types of care to be provided. The Government report states that all persons legally residing in the Netherlands, or non-residents who work and pay income tax in the Netherlands, are obliged to take out health-care insurance under the Health Insurance Act and the Exceptional Medical Expenses Act and that they then become entitled to benefits in kind or to reimbursement of the costs of the medical care they receive. The types of benefits to be covered by the insurance package are statutorily defined under the two Acts and are provided irrespective of the cause for the need of care. The Committee would like the Government to explain under which legal provisions and practical arrangements emergency and follow-up treatment in case of employment accident stipulated in Article 10(1)(g) would be provided free of charge at the place of work. Please also indicate under which provisions of the Health Insurance Act care provided by general practitioners and specialists includes domiciliary visiting, as stipulated in Article 10(1)(a) of the Convention.

The report states that dental care for insured persons aged 18 and over is limited to specialized surgical dentistry (oral surgery), the associated X-rays, and dentures. People with an exceptional dental disorder, physical/mental disability or special dental problems resulting from medical treatment are entitled to complete dental care (subject to special conditions). The Committee recalls that Article 10(1)(b) and (e) of the Convention requires provision free of charge of complete dental care, not limited to surgery and including fillings, root-canal treatment, extractions, dental supplies, etc., in case such care is necessary as a result of occupational accident or disease. Please state what additional measures are foreseen under the Dutch health insurance scheme to provide such care to victims of employment injuries.

Article 10(2). Effectiveness of medical care. The Government states in its report on Convention No. 130 that the care system in the Netherlands has been organized in a way that will reduce direct government involvement. This is achieved through the "functional description" of care covered by the insurance package. The Government lays down legal requirements only for the content and extent of coverage and the medical indications that trigger coverage. It is the responsibility of the care provider to decide who provides the care and where. According to the Government, the choice for having private insurance that assigns greater responsibilities to insurers who are allowed to make a profit makes it inappropriate for the Government to supervise the effectiveness of the way health insurance is operated. Therefore, the Government continues, the main objective in overseeing lawful performance of health insurance is for the Government to ascertain whether the care insurer is fulfilling its obligation to provide insured persons with the services they are entitled to under the Health Insurance Act.

The Committee points out that such limited supervision of the quality and effectiveness of the medical care provided by private insurers seeking to make a profit, and therefore perhaps interested in reducing the volume and cost of care, might not be sufficient in view of the obligation imposed on the Government by Article 10(2) of the Convention to ensure that the medical care afforded to employment injury victims conforms to the highest practicable standard, using all suitable means. The Committee therefore asks the Government to explain what procedures exist to include among reimbursable care new technologically advanced treatments, which might help to restore health in particularly serious cases and whether there exist medical centres specializing in treatment of industrial accidents and occupational diseases that possess state-of-the-art knowledge in this area. Please indicate whether the Health Care Inspectorate (IGZ) which is entrusted with overseeing the quality of public health, or the occupational health services, possess any system of indicators measuring effectiveness of medical and professional rehabilitation of employment injury victims.

Article 11(1). Participation in the cost of medical care. In its previous observation, the Committee asked the Government to examine whether persons in need of prolonged care or particularly expensive treatment may find themselves in a situation of hardship in view of the fact that victims of employment injuries are required to share costs for certain types of medical care, and are subject to limitations in duration and number of treatments. In this respect the Committee notes from the Government's reports on Conventions Nos 121 and 130 that victims of employment injuries are subjected to the same limitations on the quantity of care as other persons insured under the Health Insurance Act. Types of care typically offered by medical specialists may be excluded by the insurance companies from reimbursement; physiotherapy and remedial therapy are confined to the treatment of chronic disorders, excluding the first 12 treatments for each disorder; occupational therapy, which is particularly important in case of employment injuries, is provided up to a maximum of ten treatment hours per year; dental care is limited to specialized oral surgery, the associated X-rays and dentures. The cost of treatment in excess of these limitations would have to be assumed by the persons concerned, who are also required to pay fixed contribution amounts to the cost of various types of medical care included in the basic health insurance package up to a maximum of €170 per year for 2011 (so-called “compulsory deductible”). Persons who incur structural care expenses due to chronic illness or disability receive financial compensation so that they do not pay more in terms of compulsory deductible than an average insured person who receives no compensation. For most types of care under the Exceptional Medical Expenses Act, a personal contribution is also required, the amount of which depends on the taxable income, age, marital status and the living situation of the person concerned. In 2011, the cost sharing in case of residential care in an institution amounted to a maximum of €764.40 per month during the first six months of stay and to a maximum of €2,097.40 per month thereafter. As of 1 January 2009, the Chronically Ill and Disabled Persons (Allowances) Act (Wtcg) has introduced a number of measures to offset extra care expenses incurred by these categories of persons. The Government emphasizes that these measures together with the establishment of the maximum for the compulsory deductible are taken to ensure that cost sharing does not involve hardship for insured persons.

The Committee observes that the rules on cost sharing and limitations of certain types of medical care laid down in the Dutch legislation are designed for the general population and do not take into account the special needs and the financial situation of the persons suffering employment injuries, particularly those requiring prolonged and expensive care. The Committee further notes, from the Government’s report on Convention No. 102, that in order to receive a discount on the insurance premium, persons with good health as a rule choose a health insurance policy with a high level of personal contribution to the cost of care (personal excess). At the meetings with ILO officials referred to above, the Government confirmed that the present cost-sharing requirements and limitations in duration and number of treatments paid by the insurance did not exclude the possibility of some employment injury victims finding themselves in a situation of hardship and compelled to refuse further necessary treatment due to lack of money. Situations where victims of employment injuries are compelled to stop medical treatment because of the inability to pay for it would contradict the very purpose of the Convention, which makes the Government responsible for the due provision of medical and allied benefits with a view to maintaining, restoring or improving the health of the injured person (Articles 10(2) and 25 of the Convention). The Committee would therefore ask the Government to conduct a thorough study of the existing limitations and cost-sharing arrangements with respect to the statutory medical benefits, so as to identify and prevent possible situations of hardship that may affect the standard beneficiary (man with wife and two children) who has fallen victim of a serious employment accident or a chronic occupational disease. The Committee notes in this respect that insurance covering the costs of the medically necessary transport of patients includes a hardship clause, which provides for reimbursement of additional transport costs encountered by persons following a prolonged treatment. The Committee would ask the Government to consider incorporating similar hardship clauses into the insurance rules covering other types of costly medical care and allied benefits, which may be identified by the study mentioned above.

Article 24. Participative management of the health insurance scheme. The Committee notes that in the Netherlands the administration of health insurance is not entrusted to an institution regulated by the public authorities, but is entirely in the hands of private insurance companies which run it for profit. For such schemes Article 24(1) of the Convention requires the national legislation to prescribe conditions for the participation of the representatives of the persons protected in the management of the scheme. To promote its management on a tripartite basis, the legislation may provide for the participation of representatives of employers and of the public authorities. The Convention also requires the Government to accept general responsibility for the proper administration of the health insurance institutions and providers of medical services. With respect to the application of these provisions of the Convention, the Government’s 2011 report indicates no changes and refers to the previous reports, whereas the previous report of 2009 simply states that Article 24 is not applicable. In its report on Convention No. 130 under Article 31, which contains similar provisions concerning the participative management of the health insurance schemes, the Government states that the basic principle of health insurance in the Netherlands is that insured persons must be able to exert influence on the policy of the company that insures them. A care insurer’s articles of association must ensure that insured persons possess a reasonable degree of influence over the company’s policy. The Committee wishes to point out in this respect that reliance on the private care insurer’s articles of association is not sufficient to give effect to these provisions of the Convention, which require the right of the persons protected to be able to influence the company’s policy through participation of their representatives in the company’s management as directed under national law. The Committee also points out that Article 24 of Convention No. 121 remains fully applicable to the Netherlands. Moreover, the Government carries the general responsibility for ensuring that the national health insurance scheme is managed in a democratic and transparent manner with the proper participation of the trade unions and other organizations representing the persons protected together with the professional associations representing care providers and the medical profession. The Committee therefore asks the Government to supply full information in its next report on the application of Article 24 of the Convention in Dutch law and in practice.

The Work and Income (Employment Capacity) Act of 2006 (WIA)

In its previous observation, the Committee had concluded that the WIA was incompatible with Convention No. 121 on the following points:

- that the WIA leaves victims of employment injuries with incapacity up to 35 per cent without any form of compensatory benefit, contrary to Article 14(4) of the Convention;
- that the Income Provision Scheme for Fully Occupationally Disabled Persons (IVA) permits the benefit to be reduced by 70 per cent of the income earned by the beneficiary from employment or self-employment, whereas the Convention does not authorize any reduction of the benefit in case a fully incapacitated person finds the force to earn additional income from any gainful occupation, permitting him to combine disability benefit with income from work;
- that under the Return to Work Scheme for the Partially Disabled (WGA) the qualification requirements for entitlement to the wage-related WGA benefit and to the wage supplement impose restrictive conditions that are contrary to the Convention;
- that the nature and the extent of the obligations and sanctions in case of non-compliance, to which the WIA subjects the recipients of the follow-up WGA benefit, go beyond limitations permissible under Article 22 of the Convention and should be reviewed;
- that the disproportionately low level of the follow-up WGA benefit might result, contrary to the objective of Article 14(5) of the Convention, in hardship for many partially disabled persons, obliging them to apply for social assistance in case they do not find sufficiently paid employment.

The Committee has examined the Government's report on the Convention and its reply on the legal inconsistencies mentioned above in the context of the Government's stated objective to reduce by all means the number of claimants of disability benefits and the Committee has taken due note of the explanations provided by government officials during the consultations with the Office, which have permitted clarification of certain technical questions.

The Committee nevertheless decides that there are no new elements that would cause it to change its previous conclusions on the WIA. It notes, however, that the Government has disagreed with these conclusions and has challenged the Committee's understanding of the content of related provisions of the Convention. In particular, the Government has considered that, although Convention No. 121 refrains from explicitly mentioning the possibility of imposing sanctions on an occupationally disabled person who fails to cooperate with his/her reintegration, the provisions of a Convention must not be interpreted statically, but in line with social developments; it is thereby appropriate to impose sanctions if the person concerned fails to cooperate with his/her reintegration.

The Committee also notes that the comments submitted by the trade union organizations contest the arguments advanced by the Government, and describe the worsening employment and income situation of disabled workers as calling into question the effectiveness of the WIA and of the overall government policy concerning the invalidity benefit scheme.

The Committee observes that responding in full to the Government's position would require lengthy explanations of the scope and purpose of different provisions of the Convention in the context of the evolution of international social security law, and this would run into scores of pages, well beyond what can be reasonably accomplished during a single session of the Committee. The Committee further observes that certain questions raised by the trade unions in their disagreements with the Government take the discussion into policy areas and consideration of alternative solutions, well beyond the legal framework of the Convention. In this situation, the Committee invites the Office to make contact with the Government in order to find the most suitable way of providing it with the necessary background information on the contested provisions of the Convention and thereafter identify the remaining issues on which the Government would then still like to solicit the explanations of the Committee. The Committee would like to be informed of these issues sufficiently in advance to be able to respond to them at its next session in November–December 2012, but in any case not later than 1 September 2012.

Article 9. Co-payment of costs of medical treatment by injured workers. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee regrets to note that the Government has not taken advantage of the recent revision of the Accident Compensation Act (AC Act 2010) in order to abolish the financial participation by the victims of occupational accidents in the cost of care provided to them. The Government states that full compliance with the Convention is currently unaffordable and that the amendments made to the AC Act constituted a response to the significant losses in the accounts of the Accident Compensation Commission (ACC) with a view to securing the long-term future of the scheme. The Government however confirms its commitment to gradually increasing compliance with the Convention over time in order to maintain the financial sustainability of the ACC scheme and refers to the initiatives it has taken in this direction since 2001: increased ACC contributions towards the costs of medical treatment in a number of areas; the introduction of the Accredited Employer Programme where employers pay in full the cost of medical treatment in return for paying lower contributions to the ACC; and the Community Services Card for persons with low incomes, limiting their co-payments to medical treatment. Taking due note of the Government's repeated commitment to comply with the Convention, the Committee would like it to conduct the necessary actuarial studies and calculations to establish the financial impact on the ACC scheme of the introduction of the legal provisions abolishing participation of the victims of occupational accidents in the cost of required medical care.

Article 5. Lump sum compensation. The Committee notes that a lump sum compensation for workers who suffer from a permanent incapacity due to a personal injury has been reintroduced (Section 54, Part 3 of Schedule 1 (Entitlements) to the AC Act of 2010). The minimum lump sum compensation is NZD2,500 for a minimum incapacity of 10 per cent up to a maximum of NZD100,000 for persons with a permanent incapacity of 80 per cent or more, indexed to inflation (Section 56, Schedule 1). Persons with a permanent incapacity that occurred before 1 April 2002 are not entitled to a lump sum but to a pension (independence allowance). The Committee would like the Government to state if the Accident Compensation Commission, when deciding on the payment of a lump sum, requires guarantees for the proper utilization of this compensation. Please indicate also whether persons with a permanent incapacity of 80 per cent or more, who have inadvertently spent the lump sum payment they have received, would be entitled to any other income maintenance benefits.

Survivors' benefits. The Committee notes that the period during which weekly compensation is provided to the surviving spouse of a victim of an accident is limited to five consecutive years where the surviving spouse does not have the care of any child under the age of 18 years or any other dependant of the deceased (Section 56, Schedule 1). The Committee requests the Government to examine the situation of the surviving spouse who is no longer receiving the weekly compensation under Section 56 of Schedule 1 of the AC Act of 2010 and who has not yet reached the retirement age and is incapable of self-support.

Article 10. Artificial limbs and surgical appliances. According to Section 13 of Schedule 1 of the AC Act of 2010, injured workers are supplied with aids and appliances and the ACC shall decide whether to provide them or to contribute to the cost of such aids or appliances. The Committee wishes to point out that, according to Article 10 of the Convention, injured workers are not required to contribute to the costs of the supply and normal renewal of artificial limbs and surgical appliances by the insurer.

The Committee recalls that Nicaragua has ratified the Conventions relating to social security protection in the event of occupational accidents and illnesses (Conventions Nos 12, 17 and 18) and protection in the event of illness (Conventions Nos 24 and 25). In view of the fact that, according to the information contained in the Government's reports, the problems raised by the application of these Conventions are essentially of the same kind, the Committee has seen fit to formulate a general comment concerning all the social security Conventions ratified by Nicaragua. The Committee has also used the information sent by the Government in its report supplied under article 19 of the ILO Constitution in the preparation of the General Survey on social security instruments, and also the information sent by the Trade Union Unification Confederation (CUS) concerning Conventions Nos 17, 18 and 24. In its previous comments concerning all the abovementioned Conventions, the Committee emphasized the need to extend the coverage provided by the social security system, the total number of persons affiliated to which represented some 18 per cent of the population in 2008. With this in mind, the Government indicates in its reports a progressive extension of the coverage provided by the social security system launched in 2007, which forms part of five strategic components of social security policy including, inter alia, stabilization of administrative costs, strengthening of controls connected with the effective collection of contributions, performance of actuarial studies in relation to decision-making and stimulating investment. As a result of these measures, coverage provided by the system increased by 27 per cent between 2007 and 2011.

As regards protection against occupational risks, the statistics provided by the Government in its report on Convention No. 17 show that, between 2007 and 2011, the number of protected employees and apprentices increased by 24.5 per cent and that 98.4 per cent of workers registered with the Nicaraguan Social Security Institute (INSS) are currently covered against occupational risks. In its reports on Convention No. 12, the Government mentions the conclusion of numerous agreements aiming to extend to the agricultural sector – especially agricultural, fish-farming or stock breeding cooperatives – the protection provided by the system against invalidity, old age, death and occupational risks. These agreements aimed to extend to the whole territory the coverage provided by the social security system, by reducing to ten and then to five the minimum number of employees in enterprises for the purpose of affiliation to the system (Agreement Nos 8 and 9) or by extending social insurance to the agricultural sector (Agreement No. 10). These measures resulted in a 122 per cent increase in the number of agricultural workers protected against occupational risks between 2006 and 2011. Nevertheless, according to the CUS, certain categories of workers, in respect of which Article 2 of Convention No. 17 authorizes States to make exceptions that they deem necessary (casual workers, home workers, non-manual workers whose earnings exceed a certain limit, members of the employer's family), are rarely affiliated to the scheme providing protection against occupational accidents. Moreover, it happens that workers affected by occupational diseases do not receive the compensation to which they should be entitled. The Committee requests the Government to identify the categories of workers the coverage of whom by the system poses difficulties, and also the measures taken to resolve them.

As regards sickness insurance coverage, the Government indicates in its report on Convention No. 24 that the INSS has held information days intended for employers and workers concerning the issue of the extension of sickness insurance to all persons covered by the Convention. It also indicates in its report on Convention No. 25 that 56.8 per cent of the 51,451 agricultural workers have sickness and maternity coverage. An agreement was concluded with the Directorate of Cooperation for the Export Processing Zones with a view to promoting affiliation to the social security system for new enterprises. Efforts were made to ensure better coordination between central government and its autonomous entities and thereby achieve a better exchange of information enabling the creation of a register of newly established employers. The CUS points out that there are still many cases in which enterprises do not in practice respect the obligation to affiliate their employees to the social security system. In order to redress this situation, a plan of action was adopted for 2011, one of the objectives of which is to increase the number of inspections undertaken by the labour inspectorate in order to promote fulfilment by employers of their social security obligations, the Penal Code now explicitly penalizing offences in this area. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the plan of action and also on progress made with a view to extending coverage of the system to the export processing zones.

The Committee notes that the objective of extending the coverage provided by the social security scheme is also reflected in the inclusion of this priority under the Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for 2008–11. According to the DWCP, only about 26 per cent of the economically active population are covered by the INSS, especially because of the size of the informal sector, the fact that protection focuses on workers in the formal sector and the impossibility for the INSS to provide assistance to those in greatest need in the informal sector. In order to rectify this situation, the DWCP provides for the drawing up of actuarial studies and also of long-term reforms sustained on a tripartite basis and aimed at extending the coverage provided by the social security system while observing the principles of solidarity, equity and universality. The Committee notes that the information supplied by the Government shows a positive dynamic in social security necessary for achieving the level of coverage required by Convention No. 12 (Article 1), Convention No. 17 (Article 2), Convention No. 18 (Article 1), Conventions Nos 24 and 25 (Article 2). Furthermore, the Committee notes that the information, especially statistics, at its disposal show that the Government has a system for evaluating progress made on the basis of detailed data. The Committee requests the Government to supply comprehensive statistics in its next report on the current coverage provided by the system by branch in the various sectors of activity (industry, agriculture, informal economy, etc.) in relation to the total number of workers, in accordance with the questions contained in the report forms for the various Conventions concerned. The Government is also requested to send the results of the actuarial studies provided for by the DWCP, indicating the priorities adopted for the progressive extension of the coverage provided by the social security system and also any actions to this end already undertaken in the context of the DWCP. The Committee notes that, according to the information supplied by the CUS, the Ministry of Labour (MITRAB) does not adequately enforce the national legislation in practice and offending enterprises are not systematically prosecuted or the resulting penalties imposed, especially where they fail to register their employees in the social security system. According to the Committee, this is especially damaging to the sustainable management of social security institutions as the latter are required by national regulations to grant the corresponding benefits despite the non-payment of social contributions by the employers (section 109 of the General Regulations relating to the Social Security Act, read in conjunction with Decree No. 975 of 1 March 1982). In view of the above, the Committee considers it useful to intensify the dialogue with the Government and the social partners in order to enable them to fully exploit the potential of international social security standards as an instrument of social development. These standards provide that States must assume the general responsibility of ensuring the sound management of social security institutions and services with the involvement of representatives of the persons protected.

The Committee encourages the Government to fully involve the social partners in the management of social security institutions (as required, in particular, by Article 6 of Conventions Nos 24 and 25) in order to ensure transparent and durable management and hence extended coverage.

The Committee observes that its comments should be able to help countries in the formulation of an exhaustive national strategy for the development of social security. Nicaragua has already established a national policy whose main priorities coincide with the objectives established in the General Survey, aiming in particular at the extension of coverage, the quest for good governance, the collection of contributions, effective inspection and durable planning, by conducting actuarial studies. The Committee observes that the policy implemented by the Government might benefit from the addition of measures ensuring closer coordination of social security with employment policy, especially with a view to extending coverage to the informal sector, and refers the Government to the relevant developments in this area in the General Survey (paragraphs 496–534).

Finally, the Committee considers that the Government's efforts would be better targeted if its adopted priorities included the objective for the country to match the minimum social security standards established by the up-to-date Conventions in this area and which, to date, have not been ratified by Nicaragua. It recalls that the Government, in its report under article 19 on social security instruments, provided detailed information in the form of a comparative analysis of national law and the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102). The analysis concluded that Nicaragua is in a position to ratify this Convention and to accept Parts III (Sickness benefit), V (Old-age benefit), VI (Employment injury benefit), VIII (Maternity benefit), IX (Invalidity benefit) and X (Survivors' benefit), with the proviso of having recourse to the possibility allowed by Article 3 of Convention No. 102 to limit, for an initial period, the personal scope of application of the Convention to enterprises that employ more than 20 workers. The Committee considers that the ratification of Convention No. 102 represents a key element for guiding the process of reform by establishing minimum criteria to be achieved on the basis of international standards. The International Labour Conference, at its 100th Session, recalled that Convention No. 102 still serves as a point of reference for the progressive establishment of comprehensive social security coverage and that increasing the number of ratifications remains a key priority. The Committee therefore encourages the Government to pursue the objective of ratification of Convention No. 102 and to consider the possibility of including the ratification of this Convention among the objectives of the next DWCP, which would enable it to mobilize any technical assistance from the Office which it might need. The Committee also hopes that the programme which will cover the next period will maintain and develop the objectives pursued so far, and in so doing will take the present comments into consideration. The Committee requests the Office to ensure the dissemination, through all of its bodies, including regional ones, of the present observation to the various interested parties and to provide them with any technical support needed for this purpose.

Norway

Employment Promotion and Protection against Unemployment Convention, 1988 (No. 168) (ratification: 1990)

Article 21 of the Convention. Suspension of benefit. In the Committee's previous observation, the Government has been urged to review the guidelines of the Directorate of Labour and Welfare (LWS) so as to ensure that unemployed persons are not sanctioned for refusing to accept unsuitable job offers at least during the initial period of 26 weeks provided for in Article 19(2)(a) of the Convention. The Government emphasizes that during the first three months of unemployment, the jobseeker has the primary responsibility of finding a job, and will therefore determine which jobs the jobseeker finds suitable. However, as time passes, the jobseeker must be ready to adjust expectations and expand the job search. On the basis of the jobseeker's curriculum vitae and the labour market, the job request will be evaluated every third month. This evaluation can result in an agreement between the jobseeker and the LWS to expand the job search. The Committee understands from these explanations that, in practice, the suitability of jobs searched for and offered is being assessed for every new period of three months with a view to expanding the acceptable types of jobs by relinquishing certain criteria of suitability. It understands also that under this arrangement special rules apply for the initial period of unemployment of three months when the decision on the suitability of available jobs is largely left at the discretion of the jobseeker himself. The Committee invites the Government to consider how the existing practice of giving unemployed persons primary responsibility for a job search during the initial three months of unemployment and therefore a certain discretion in the selection of job offers could best be reflected in the guidelines of the Directorate of Labour and Welfare. Such consideration would assist the implementation of section G.4.1 of the guidelines, which forbids applicants for employment to make reservations as regards the type of occupation they will work in and requires them to accept work even in occupations for which they are not trained or in which they have no previous experience.

As regards sanctions imposed on unemployed persons, the Government reports that in 2007 less than 200 jobseekers got their benefit stopped during the first three months of unemployment because of refusal to accept: offered work, work in another part of the country or part-time work. The Committee would like the Government to verify that in all these cases the jobseekers concerned were not sanctioned for having refused to take up jobs that were not suitable to their acquired professional status. It therefore invites the Government, if necessary, to follow the example of Denmark where, in order to assess the extent to which the unemployed persons refuse job offers due to the job not being "suitable", the National Directorate of Labour, which deals with complaints and supervision in relation to the Unemployment Insurance Act, had in 2005 manually examined all cases (352 files) of sanctions for refusal to take up a job offer. The Committee hopes that the results of this verification would help the Government to decide whether or not the guidelines of the Directorate of Labour and Welfare need to be changed in order to ensure that the discretionary power to sanction the behaviour of the unemployed persons in the current labour market situation is being applied with due respect for their acquired professional and social status.

In this connection the Committee further notes the assurances of the Government that the unemployed will normally not get offered jobs from the Labour and Welfare Service, unless it is a job that corresponds to his or her education and qualifications. The LWS will initially devote a lot of time, to identify the jobseekers' qualifications, working experience and job requests. The goal is to help the unemployed to get a suitable job. When considering whether the work is suitable, the LWS should – according to the Directorate of Labour and Welfare’s guidelines, section A, article 4.18 – also consider:

- how long the jobseeker has been unemployed;
- the probability of getting a job which corresponds to his or her qualifications;
- whether the offered job can give valuable working experience; and
- whether the remuneration offered for the job involves an unreasonable reduction of income compared to what the person is receiving by way of unemployment benefits.

The Committee would like the Government to explain how this last criterion, which requires the jobseeker to consider job offers remunerated at the level below the unemployment benefit, could still be retained in the guidelines of the Directorate of Labour and Welfare after the abolition since 1 January 2006 of the legal provisions, which previously made it possible to compel unemployed persons to accept jobs offering less income than the unemployment benefit.

Panama

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been drawing the Government’s attention to the need to amend certain provisions of the Labour Code and of the social security legislation in relation to compensation for employment injury with a view to giving effect to Articles 5 and 7 of the Convention.

Article 5 (in conjunction with Article 2(1)). Payment of compensation in the form of periodical payments without limit of time. The Committee recalls that workers who are not covered by the compulsory social security scheme are governed by the provisions of the Labour Code respecting compensation for employment injury, which in such cases only guarantee them the provision of benefit for a period of 12 months at the expense of the employer. In this respect, the Committee has requested the Government on numerous occasions to amend sections 306 and 311 of the Labour Code in order to provide for the payment of compensation in the form of periodical payments without limit of time in the event of an occupational accident resulting in permanent incapacity or death. In its reply, the Government reiterates the reasons put forward previously to the effect that, in order to amend these provisions, it is necessary to undertake actuarial studies and to have the agreement of the sectors concerned in relation to occupational risks. The Committee deplores the fact that over almost two decades the Government has not undertaken the necessary actuarial studies and has not initiated dialogue with the social partners with a view to undertaking the reforms indicated.

Article 7. Provision of additional compensation to workers suffering employment injury when their condition requires the constant help of another person. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized that, neither the Labour Code nor the social security legislation concerning compensation for employment injury (Decree No. 68 of 31 March 1970) provides for the granting of additional compensation to injured workers whose condition requires the constant help of another person. In this respect, the Government indicates in its report that “... at the present time, there has been no initiative in this respect either by the social partners, or by the executive authorities”.

The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not, for such a long period, taken any steps to initiate the reform process of the legislation on employment risks and it urges the Government to take appropriate measures in the near future to bring its legislation into conformity with Articles 5 and 7 of the Convention.

Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes the report submitted by the Government on 3 September 2010; the comments submitted on 14 September 2010 by the Coordinator of the Trade Union Federations CUT–GCTP–CTP–CATP; the comments submitted on 28 August 2010 by the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP); the Government’s reply of 15 October 2010 to the observations made by the Coordinator of the abovementioned federations; the comments of 18 November 2010 by the National Confederation of Private Business Institutions (CONFIEP) (Chamber of Commerce of Lima); the Government’s new report submitted on 19 September 2011; the comments on the Government’s new report submitted on 23 September 2011 by the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT). The Committee thanks the Government and the social partners for having maintained a substantial and constructive dialogue on the questions raised in its general observation regarding all the social security Conventions ratified by Peru (Nos 12, 19, 24, 25, 35 to 40, 44 and 102). The Committee trusts that the dialogue will facilitate formulation of a national strategy for the consolidation and sustainable development of the social security system that will enable the State to make full use of the potential afforded by international social security standards, with a view to securing sound administration of social security schemes and gradually extending coverage to the whole population. In this context, the Committee wishes to draw the attention of the Government and other interested parties to the following matters:

1. Observance of the basic principles laid down by the international Conventions on social security

The Committee notes the opinion expressed by the CGTP, which is reflected in the General Survey of 2011 on social security instruments (paragraph 545), namely, that as a result of a strong tendency towards privatization in the 1990s, the social security system violates the principle of collective financing of benefits, both in the private system and in the public system; the level of the benefits paid is not sufficient to guarantee minimum compensation throughout the contingency and there are no technical criteria for the adjustment of pensions; there is no democratic participation of workers in the administration and management of social security; there are serious deficiencies in the mechanisms for complaint and appeal concerning entitlement to social security benefits. In view of these repeated allegations, the Committee considers that the Government needs to draw on all its technical knowledge to review the structure of the national social security system in the light of the fundamental principles of good governance established by the international community during the past 60 years, namely:

The principle of collective financing of social security. According to this principle, the cost of benefits and the cost of administering them shall be borne collectively by way of contributions or taxes (Article 71(1) of the Convention), and the total of the insurance contributions borne by the employees protected shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total of the financial resources allocated to the protection of the employees (Article 71(2)). In contradiction with this principle, under Peru's Private Pension System (SPP) only the insured contribute to individual capitalization accounts and the financing of old-age, invalidity and survivors' insurance, and the administration costs are borne solely by workers affiliated to the Administrators of Private Pension Funds (AFPs). As to the National Pension System (SNP), the Government stated in its report of 3 September 2010 that this system "is based on contributions and solidarity on the part of workers and employers", and that according to Legislative Decree No. 19990, Title III, section 6 and the amendments thereto, the system is financed by contributions from employers and employees. However, in its reply of October 2010 to the comments of the trade union federations, the Government states that the laws governing the SNP establish that the obligation to contribute falls entirely on the workers. What is more, the website of the National Supervisory Authority for Tax Administration (SUNAT) states that contributions to the Office of Standards for Welfare (ONP) (which administers the SNP) will be borne by the employee and that the employer's role is merely to deduct contributions at source. In view of these conflicting statements, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would explain the extent to which the principle of the collective financing of social security is observed for the SNP.

Principle of democratic administration of the social security system. According to this principle, where administration is not entrusted to an institution regulated by the public authorities or by a government department accountable to Parliament, representatives of persons protected must participate in the administration or be associated and have advisory powers (Article 72(1)). The SPP affords its members no opportunity to participate in the management of the AFPs. In its report of 2010, the Government stated that it planned to examine the possibility of establishing a supervisory board, in which representatives of SPP members would participate, along the lines of the Supervisory Board provided for in Legislative Decree No. 862 respecting Investment Funds and their Administrators, and which would be able to collect information on pension fund administration from the AFPs. However, in its last report of 2011 the Government gives no account of any progress in involving representatives of the insured in the administration of the AFPs, at least in a consultative capacity. According to the CUT, there was no tripartite consensus on the SPP reforms and the objectives established were not met. The Committee observes that, paradoxically and by contrast, in the SNP the Government reinforces participation by representatives of the insured in the government bodies of the system. Thus, pursuant to section 16 of Legislative Decree No. 817 of 1996 (law on state social security), a Consolidated Pension Reserve Fund has been set up with an administrative board that includes two representatives of the pensioners, who are proposed by the National Council for Labour and Employment Promotion (CNTPE) and appointed by a decision of the Ministry of the Economy and Finance. In view of the Government's wish to promote the principle of shared management in the SNP, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would explain to what extent provision is made for applying the principle to the SPP so as to allow participation by representatives of persons insured under the AFPs, in accordance with Article 72(1). As to participation by protected persons in the administration of health insurance, the situation is much the same as that of participation by beneficiaries in the SNP. However, the Committee notes that in the case of private insurers such as private institutional administrators of health insurance funds (IAFAS), health provider entities (EPS), institutional providers of health services (IPRESS) or private health insurance companies, no provision is made for insured persons to participate in administration. According to information on the National Supervisory Authority for Health Insurance (SUNASA) website, the EPS, which are established under the Act to Modernize Health Social Security (No. 26790), may be private, public or mixed, and their function supplements that of EsSalud, the health social insurance system. They are supervised directly by the Supervisory Authority for Health Provider Entities (SEPS) pursuant to the fourth supplementary provision of Decree No. 009-97-SA, which regulates Act No. 26790 mentioned above, though there is no requirement for private or mixed EPSs to appoint representatives of insured persons to participate in their administration. As to EsSalud, an autonomous decentralized public body responsible for administering the Health Social Insurance Contribution Scheme, the Government states in its 2011 report that the Board of EsSalud is made up of representatives of the State, employers and insured persons, the latter consisting of representatives of public sector workers, private sector workers and beneficiaries. The Committee notes with interest that the principle of shared management, laid down in the Framework Act on Universal Health Insurance, is defined as "the exercise of citizenship in the formulation and monitoring of universal health insurance policies". Section 9 of the Regulations to that Act provides that the Ministry of Health (MINSA) shall establish the public oversight mechanisms to be developed by regional and local governments with a view to allowing people to exercise their rights under universal health insurance. Accordingly, MINSA issued Resolution No. 040-2011 establishing general policy guidelines for public oversight. However, the document mentions several Public Oversight Committees established by the Health Ombudsman while recognizing that there is no evidence as yet that they are operating at national level. These public oversight mechanisms, which are to be established by regional and local governments, will pay particular attention to universal health insurance in terms of observing the guarantees of quality, suitability and financing, without prejudice to the competence of the SUNASA. The Committee observes that these public oversight mechanisms could act in supplementary capacity but do not obviate the need to appoint representatives of insured persons in IAFAS. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to envisage the possibility of establishing a mechanism in private EPS, IPRESS, or private health insurance companies, enabling representatives of the insured to participate in the administration of these bodies or to be associated with them, in a consultative capacity, without prejudice to the public oversight mechanisms that regional or local governments may establish in due course, so as to bring the legislation into line with Article 72(1) of the Convention.

Principle of guaranteed minimum benefits. The Committee points out that the introduction of guaranteed minimum pensions should be accompanied by the establishment of a poverty line or a subsistence minimum and the increase of the minimum pensions above this parameter. The Committee is concerned by the fact that social security schemes, which are naturally designed so as to provide adequate benefits, have degenerated in many developing countries to the point that benefits are paid at levels below the poverty line; in such cases the State may be seen to be failing to fulfil its responsibilities (see General Survey of 2011 on social security instruments, paragraphs 459 and 460). The Committee notes in this context the information supplied by the Government to the effect that there are different ways of calculating pensions depending on whether they are granted under Legislative Decree No. 19990, Act No. 25967 or Act No. 27617. Pensions under Legislative Decree No. 19990 are calculated on the basis of the average insurable remuneration of the insured person and according to the number of years of contributions. Under Act No. 25967, the amount of pensions granted to insured persons who show that they have contributed for 20 full years shall be equal to 50 per cent of their reference remuneration (section 2 of the Act provides for three different methods of calculating reference remuneration based on the number of years of contributions), and under Act No. 27617, the reference remuneration is determined on the basis of the average remuneration of the 60 months preceding the last month of contribution, and the amount of the pension is determined on the basis of a table, which was not sent with the Government's report. The Government confirms in its report of 2011 that in the SPP there is no guaranteed replacement rate. In the SNP, on the other hand, payment of pensions is insured and guaranteed by the ONP, the Consolidated Pension Reserve Fund and the national Government through the transfer of funds from the Treasury's regular budget. However, the CUT asserts that the amount of the pensions paid is below the minimum threshold established in Convention No. 102 for wage replacement. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to indicate the minimum amount of each type of pension mentioned above as compared to the minimum amount laid down in the Convention, and to state how the amounts are updated.

The Committee also notes the measures under way to increase SNP pensions, in particular section 4(a) of Act No. 28449 providing that pensions granted under Legislative Decree No. 20530 shall be increased for beneficiaries aged 65 and over, taking account of annual cost of living trends and the financial capacity of the State. The Committee also notes in this context the forthcoming implementation of the "Pension 65 Programme", initially to be run by the Presidency of the Council of Ministers, under which a non-contributory pension of 225 soles (PEN) (equal to approximately US$90), with an initial budget of PEN225 million, will be granted to persons aged 65 and over who have never contributed, and which will in principle be limited to the poorest regions in the country. The Committee is bound to stress the advantages to be gained from extending the system of guaranteed lower pensions to all persons of a certain age, which would enable the State to guarantee a reduced minimum old-age pension for all persons whose old-age benefits have suffered unduly, particularly as a result of the present economic and financial crisis. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures it plans to take in order to extend the Pension 65 Programme to all regions of the country, together with details of its implementation and progress made.

The Committee notes the actuarial assessment, mentioned by the Government in its report, conducted by the Ministry of the Economy in connection with the extension of a minimum pension to all low-income residents with a minimum of 15 years of contributions, with the aim of assessing the impact of the measure recommended by the Committee of Experts for the introduction of a pension consistent with Article 29(2) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the actuarial assessment conducted by the Ministry of the Economy.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that in 2009, the SNP's Consolidated Pension Reserve Fund broke even, in that it exceeded the maximum level reached prior to the 2008 crisis. As to the SPP, the Supervisory Authority for Banking, Insurance and AFPs has indicated that pension funds have been recovering and have even exceeded the maximum level reached prior to the international crisis. The Committee notes the Government's rather optimistic evaluation to the effect that the pension system appears to have overcome the negative effects of the financial crisis. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would confirm that this is indeed the present status of the pensions system, and to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to support persons who were compelled to retire at the height of the crisis and who sustained heavy losses in their pensions.

Principle of granting benefits throughout the contingency. The old-age benefits managed under the private administration system are calculated on the basis of the capital accrued in the individual accounts of the insured. Once that capital is exhausted, the entitlement of the individual account holder may cease to exist and insured persons exceeding the average life expectancy could be deprived of their sole source of income (see section 45, “Programmed Retirement” of the Act (Single Harmonized Text) on the Private Pension System). Such a situation is not consistent with the principle laid down in international Conventions whereby benefits are to be paid throughout the contingency at a guaranteed minimum rate.

2. Improving the operation of the public pension system

In its previous observation the Committee took note of allegations that no up-to-date record of members’ contributions exists and that the burden of proof regarding the contributory period lies not with the ONP but with the insured person and that procedures for granting pensions are extremely complex. In its report the Government refers to various measures taken by the ONP that have led to improvements in the way the State administers social security. Noteworthy among these are: the substantiation of decisions; improvement of the checking and accreditation of contributions in that failure by the employer to deposit with the ONP the contributions withheld from wages does not affect workers, who need only present their work certificates in order to obtain the benefit from the ONP; the efforts made to operate a single contributions register (RIA) and the adoption of measures to optimize computer systems; measures to simplify the processing of benefits due – the process consisting of 11 stages has been replaced by a four-stage process. However, the Committee notes the information supplied by the CUT to the effect that in around 15,000 cases, pension processing took more than 306 days on average, and that over 90,000 files were awaiting “rubber stamping”, i.e. recognition of the pensioners’ eligibility. The CUT further states that the ONP’s unwarranted refusal to entertain beneficiaries’ claims and the role played by the external legal advisers hired by the ONP were responsible in part for the fact that claimants had to apply to the courts to assert their pension rights.

The right to have a recourse duly examined has been considered by the Committee as falling under the general responsibility of the State to guarantee the proper administration of social security institutions. Any dysfunctions in social security recourse procedures therefore have to be duly addressed by the State in conformity with the principles guaranteed by international social security law. The Committee has also observed in this respect that the existence of appropriate recourse procedures should not be used abusively by forcing beneficiaries to file claims against decisions systematically denying their right to benefits. The Committee points out in this context that according to Article 71(1) of the Convention, claimants shall have a right of appeal in case of refusal of the benefit or complaint as to its quality or quantity (see General Survey of 2011 on social security instruments (paragraph 433)). The Committee accordingly observes that the ONP’s unwarranted refusal to entertain the applicants’ claims offends against the right of claimants to have access to simple and rapid complaint and appeal procedures, particularly where simplicity and promptness in such proceedings are essential because in most cases the claims are for social security benefits that constitute the claimants’ sole economic support. The Committee further points out that the general principles laid down in international social security instruments, which call for recourse procedures to be simple and rapid, also militate in favour of the harmonization of the applicable procedural law throughout dispute settlement procedures in social security matters. Dispute settlement bodies should therefore ensure that individual claimants have reasonable opportunities to assert or defend their rights. The Committee notes in this connection the ruling on Case No. 05561-2007-PA/TC of 24 March 2010, in which the Constitutional Court found the ONP’s participation in court proceedings pertaining to payment of statutory or accrued interest on pensions to be an “unconstitutional state of affairs”, and ordered the ONP to waive such proceedings. This decision by the Constitutional Court is of great significance as the ONP will have to waive proceedings that concern the payment of statutory or accrued interest, which will allow cases to be dealt with more expeditiously. Citing the Constitutional Court’s ruling, the CUT also states that the ONP should likewise desist from challenging workers’ court claims pertaining to evaluation and payment of old-age benefit, since the proceedings in such cases are cumbersome and delay the effective exercise, by thousands of workers, of the right to receive old-age benefit. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on the repercussions the abovementioned ruling of the Constitutional Court has had in practice, and urges the Government to speed up the process of evaluation and payment of benefits due to workers by simplifying complaint and appeal proceedings, thereby giving effect to Articles 70(1) and 72(2) of the Convention.

3. Combating evasion of the obligation to join the social security system

According to a study conducted by the ILO (2009), in 2007 only 35 per cent of the wage earning economically active population had old-age, invalidity and survivors’ coverage. As regards health protection, only 36 per cent of the total population was covered. Overall, these figures reflect the worrying situation that has arisen due to evasion of the obligation to belong to the social security system, especially on the part of large enterprises in the formal economy, and indicate a need for the State to reinforce significantly the supervision carried out by the national body responsible for the collection of taxes and social contributions, SUNAT. The Committee also notes the measures undertaken by the Government to improve collection and supervision in respect of the payment of contributions by employers by setting up a unit in EsSalud to monitor the debiting and auditing practices of employers that are supervised and audited by SUNAT. The Committee also notes the efforts made by EsSalud to get SUNAT to attach greater importance to the Strategic Plan to supervise taxes and monitor payment of contributions, and the Inter-institutional Cooperation Agreement concluded with the Ministry of Labour and Employment Promotion (MTPE), whose objectives include measures to improve the detection of practices by employers that affect workers' access to payroll records and health social security. The Government also refers to the MTPE's efforts to bring the workforce into the formal economy through inspection, which have led to a significant increase in the social security contributions collected in recent years. The Government also reports that a Technical Committee analysed measures to improve the SNP and the SPP and enable the two systems to coexist in the medium and long term, thereby extending the level of coverage.

While noting the measures taken by the Government to curb social security evasion by setting up close cooperation between social security institutions and other public services responsible for supervision and enforcement, such as the tax authorities and the labour inspectorate, the Committee is bound to stress the magnitude of the problem the Government has to tackle given the extent of social security evasion. According to information provided by the CUT, the classification of offences and the penalties for social security evasion by employers are not sufficiently dissuasive. In the SPP, every month AFPs file 8,000 complaints with the courts against enterprises that fail to record employees' pension contributions, and up to the year 2008, 300,000 complaints had been lodged against enterprises that deducted their workers' contributions but failed to transfer them to AFP individual capitalization accounts. The CUT also refers to two bills (2866-2008CR and 2890-2008-CR) proposing that SUNAT take on the collection and auditing duties pertaining to AFPs, so that there would be a single social security register covering the SPP and the SNP. The Committee points out that the obligation to improve collection of social security contributions falls within the State's general responsibility for the proper administration of the institutions and services involved, in accordance with Article 72 of the Convention. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to step up its efforts to secure supervision of the payment of contributions by employers, to adopt measures to prevent non-compliance by intensifying inspection, and to secure closer cooperation between social security institutions and the tax authorities (such as the measures proposed by EsSalud to SUNAT). The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the progress through Parliament of the abovementioned bills that seek to make SUNAT responsible for collection and supervision in both systems (SPP and SNP).

The Committee welcomes the promulgation of the Framework Act on Universal Health Insurance, No. 29344 ("AUS Framework Act") laying the foundations for the extension of health insurance to all residents in Peru, so as gradually to achieve universal coverage based on solidarity and participation. The Committee nonetheless observes that because there are so many health service providers, whether public, private or mixed, it is difficult to secure sound administration of all the service providers participating in the universal health insurance process. It should be pointed out that the law establishes a National Health Insurance Supervisory Authority responsible for safeguarding and guaranteeing the right of every person to full and progressive access to health insurance based on the principles of universality, solidarity, unity, comprehensiveness, equity, irreversibility and participation. It is nonetheless worth noting that while in the rest of the world there is a trend towards unification of health service providers, the AUS Framework Act provides for at least nine options for insurance, by public, private or mixed bodies. The Committee suggests that the Government might look into simplifying the provision of health insurance in the interests of harmonizing and rationalizing health services and so contribute to better administration and greater efficiency in such services. It also asks the Government to send information on the progress made in extending the coverage of universal health insurance, by economic sector and geographical region.

4. Measures for micro and small enterprises

The Committee recalls that when Peru ratified this Convention in 1961, it availed itself of the possibility that the Convention affords to any Member whose economy and medical facilities are insufficiently developed, of applying the provisions to only 50 per cent of the workers in enterprises with more than 20 employees instead of 50 per cent of all employees (Article 3 of the Convention). States that opt for the abovementioned exception must indicate in their periodical reports the measures taken progressively to extend the scope of the persons covered, specifying whether the reasons for maintaining reduced coverage subsist, or stating that they renounce the right to avail themselves of the exception in the future. The Committee asks the Government to provide this information in its next report.

The Committee notes in this context the promulgation of Legislative Decree No. 1086 introducing measures to promote the competitiveness of micro and small enterprises which enable the employees and heads of the enterprises to affiliate to the Social Pension System (SPS), which the State will subsidize in an amount equal to that paid in by the member (4 per cent of basic minimum remuneration). Under the SPS, (see section 14 of the abovementioned legislative decree), protected persons who have reached the age of 65 and who have made 300 effective contributions to the social pensions fund are entitled to retire. Section 11 provides that contributions to the SPS must be paid into an individual member's account, to be administered by an AFP, an insurance company or a bank selected by tender. The Committee is bound to reiterate here the comments it made in point 1 of this observation concerning the basic principles of social security. Section 17 of the Legislative Decree No. 1086 allows members fulfilling the same requirements as those laid down in section 14 to apply for refund of the amounts accrued in their individual accounts plus any interest. The Committee points out that this provision is contrary to Article 30 of the Convention, since old-age benefits are to be provided throughout the contingency.

Furthermore, the CUT has informed the Committee that the SPS, established by the abovementioned decree, has not been positive for Peru's pension system because membership is voluntary, so workers refrain from joining to avoid a reduction in their wages; that it is necessary to have reached the age of 65 and to have 25 years of contributions; that it allows applications for the refund of contributions plus any interest. The CUT also points out that the State's contributions are not guaranteed since they depend on budgetary resources, and that at the time of writing, no such provision had been made in the budget. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the system established in Legislative Decree No. 1086 for the provision of old-age, invalidity and survivors' pensions and on the resources allocated in the national budget to fund the contributions to the SPS. Bearing in mind that affiliation to the SPS will be voluntary for workers and heads of microenterprises, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to align the SPS with the provisions of Article 6 of the Convention laying down the principles to be observed by voluntary insurance schemes (supervision by the public authorities or joint administration by employers and workers, coverage of a substantial part of persons with low income, and compliance, in conjunction with other forms of protection, where appropriate, with the relevant provisions of the Convention.

Rwanda

Article 2 of the Convention. Coverage of apprentices and casual and temporary workers against the risk of employment injury. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report, including the law regulating labour in Rwanda, No. 13/2009 of 27 May 2009 (Labour Law) and the National Social Security Policy document of the Ministry of Financing and Economic Planning of February 2009. Section 2 of the new Labour Law provides that this law applies to the labour relations between workers and employers as well as between the latter and the apprentices or the trainees under their authority as per contract. Casual and temporary workers are included in the scope of application by virtue of section 3, while section 47 establishes the obligation of the employer to affiliate workers to the social security scheme. On the basis of the above sections of the newly adopted Labour Law, the Committee notes with satisfaction the extension of the national legislation on the protection against employment injury to apprentices and casual and temporary workers.

The Committee also welcomes the National Social Security document, which provides an analysis of the current social security programme and policy orientations for its improvement with the objective of achieving social security coverage for all. As regards employment injury, the policy document indicates the Government's commitment to reinforce measures to establish 100 per cent coverage for employment injury of all workers in the formal sector. In the absence of coherent legal texts defining the basic social security framework, the policy document recommends a legal reform through an organic law, which will be guided inter alia by the provision that employment injury benefits are managed by the Rwanda Social Security Board and mandatory for all workers with a formal employment contract. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the progress made in developing a legal framework for the social security system in Rwanda.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Saint Lucia

With reference to its previous observation, the Committee notes the reply of the Government that, contrary to Article 7 of the Convention, no provision is made in national legislation for the payment of additional compensation for injured workers requiring the constant help of another person; and that compensation for all expenses (medical, surgical or pharmaceutical, etc.) is limited to 20,000 East Caribbean dollars, whereas no such ceiling is foreseen in the Convention in case of occupational accident (Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention). The Committee regrets to note that since the entry into force of the Convention in 1980 the Government has been unable to bring the provisions of the national legislation in conformity with Articles 7, 9 and 10 of the Convention. In this situation, the Committee deems it necessary to ask the Government to undertake an actuarial study which will determine the financial implications of the introduction into the national insurance scheme of the benefits guaranteed by these Articles of the Convention. The Committee wishes to remind the Government of the possibility to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this respect.

Sao Tome and Principe

Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention, 1925 (No. 18) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes that the change of administration prevented the finalization of the adoption of the schedule of occupational diseases which should have supplemented Act No. 1/90 on social security. However, the Government indicates that its programme includes the reactivation of this process and the reopening of dialogue with UNDP with a view to the adoption of a schedule of occupational diseases recognized in the country. Recalling that it has been examining the issue of the establishment of the schedule of occupational diseases for many years, the Committee hopes that the Government will spare no effort for the adoption of a schedule of occupational diseases recognized in the country as soon as possible, including at least those enumerated in the schedule attached to Article 2 of the Convention. It also draws the Government's attention to the possibility of having recourse to ILO technical assistance in this respect. This is a fundamental protection which, in accordance with the Convention, has to be guaranteed to men and women workers in the country engaged in certain industries and occupations involving exposure to the risk of contracting certain diseases, which must therefore be duly recognized and compensated by reason of their occupational origin.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Senegal

The Committee notes that the Government's report, received in September 2011, merely states that there has been no change either in the legislation or in the methods of monitoring its application by the competent authorities. The Committee also takes note of the information provided by the Government in its 2010 report submitted under article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, as well as the observations made by the National Federation of Independent Trade Unions of Senegal (UNSAS) received in June 2010.

According to the report under article 19, the Government intends setting up a system of universal social protection to extend social coverage to all categories of persons at present excluded from social protection and has established a national social protection strategy to cover all citizens for this purpose. According to the Government, the issues of minimum income support and medical care for older persons are at present being examined; it also refers to the implementation of the SESAM plan to provide medical care for the elderly. The report specifies that ILO technical assistance is required to reform the social security system and draft the Social Security Code. Hoping that the Government will take the necessary steps to request ILO technical assistance, the Committee would be grateful if it could send a copy of the national social protection strategy drawn up by the Government as well as the plan to put in place a minimum old-age benefit for all Senegalese over 60 years of age.

In this context, the UNSAS points out that the social protection of workers made redundant on account of restructuring or the closing of enterprises is a major concern for the trade union organizations in Senegal but that, until now, no preliminary study has been carried out with a view to introducing unemployment benefit. The Government's report under article 19 mentions, in this respect, the drafting of terms of reference for a feasibility study on introducing an unemployment benefit scheme. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information, in its next report, on the progress made with respect to the feasibility study on introducing an unemployment benefit scheme.

According to the information provided by the Government in its report under article 19, the wage replacement rate for the old-age pension in the public sector is approximately 99 per cent, since pensions are based on officials' contributions (12 per cent of the wage) and those of the State (23 per cent). In the private sector, however, the replacement rate is approximately 20 per cent, which does not provide for decent working conditions upon retirement. According to the Government, this low replacement rate is due to the inadequate resources of the Social Insurance Institute for Old-Age Pensions (IPRES), caused to a large extent by the scheme's demographic imbalance (more retired persons than contributors), by considerable contribution evasion in social security and the low contributions themselves. The UNSAS adds that the existing system encourages contribution evasion and fraud, and that the absence of social security accounts at macroeconomic level means that any financial information is inaccessible. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any studies or actuarial calculations have been recently carried out concerning the financial balance of the general scheme in application of Article 71(3) of the Convention, and to point out any measures taken or envisaged to curb contribution evasion in social security, to combat job insecurity and preserve jobs so that the level of contributions does not continue to decline.

Sierra Leone

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of compensation in the form of periodical payments without limit of time. The Government indicates, in reply to the comments made for many years by the Committee, that a Bill on Workmen's Compensation has been formulated but not adopted as yet. It further states that the abovementioned draft legislation reflects the provisions of the Convention concerning the payment of injury benefits throughout the period of contingency and that copy of the revised legislation will be communicated to the ILO as soon as it is adopted. The Committee notes this information as well as the Government's request for technical assistance from the Office in order to accelerate the implementation process of the revised legislation. The Committee expresses the hope that the draft legislation will soon be adopted and requests the Government to provide a copy of it. On the basis of the new legislation, the ILO would certainly be able to discuss with the Government the terms of the requested technical assistance.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Slovenia

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1992)

In its previous direct request of 2007, the Committee had asked the Government to reply in detail in 2008. In September 2008, the Office had received the Government's report on the application of the Convention for the period from 1 June 1999 to 31 May 2006, which had been already furnished to the ILO in November 2006. No reply has been given to the Committee's previous direct requests of 2006 and 2007. The Committee is bound to draw the Government's attention to its obligation under article 22 of the ILO Constitution to comply with the reporting obligation in good faith. It trusts that the Government will do its utmost to supply a full detailed report on the Convention, according to the report form adopted by the Governing Body, and that this report will also contain a detailed reply on the following points:

Article 8 of the Convention. List of occupational diseases. The Committee notes that the list of occupational diseases adopted in 1983 under a "self-management agreement" is still in use, but that it shall be replaced by a new list which is currently being prepared for the purpose of harmonizing it with the European legislation. The Committee hopes that the new list will also be in compliance with the list of occupational diseases contained in Schedule I to the Convention, in particular as regards the list of work involving exposure to the risk concerned (items 1–12, and 15 of Schedule I), and that the Government will supply a copy of it, when adopted.

Articles 13 (temporary incapacity benefit), 14 (permanent incapacity benefit) and 18 (survivors' benefit), (in conjunction with Article 19). The Committee once again asks the Government to supply, with respect to each of the benefits provided by the abovementioned Articles, the statistical information in the manner set out in the report form adopted by the Governing Body under the corresponding titles of Article 19. The Committee trusts that the Government will have no difficulty to determine the reference wages of a skilled manual male employee as defined in Article 19(6)(d) of the Convention, by using for this purpose the average gross wage in the Republic of Slovenia.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Spain

Unemployment Provision Convention, 1934 (No. 44) (ratification: 1971)

Article 2 of the Convention. Application of the Convention to training contracts. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 35/2010 adopting urgent measures to reform the labour market which, among other effects, amended the Workers' Charter with a view to extending protection against unemployment to persons engaged in training, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention. According to the information provided by the Government, this measure has resulted in a substantial improvement in the legal rules governing training contracts with a view to promoting employment and making this type of contract more attractive for both enterprises and workers.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17) (ratification: 1976)

Article 7 of the Convention. Additional compensation for the constant help of another person. Since 2006, the Government indicates that the Ministry of Labour has undertaken the total revision of labour legislation, including the revision of the Industrial Accidents Act of 10 September 1947 (No. 145 of 1947), in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with international labour standards. The Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the draft provisions revising the said Act, indicating those which aim at ensuring, in line with Article 7 of the Convention, additional compensation in cases where the injury results in incapacity of such a nature that the injured workman must have the constant help of another person.

Workmen's Compensation (Occupational Diseases) Convention (Revised), 1934 (No. 42) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that since 2006, the Government has been indicating that the Ministry of Labour was involved in the total revision of labour legislation, including the revision of the Industrial Accidents Act of 10 September 1947 (No. 145 of 1947, as amended), in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with international labour standards. Taking into account similar statements the Government has been making for the last 20 years, the Committee asks it to supply a copy of the draft provision which should have been prepared in order to complete the list of occupational diseases established by section 25 of this Act, by including among the activities likely to cause anthrax infection the "loading and unloading or transport of merchandise", as required by the Convention.

The Committee notes that section 25 of the Act does not refer to the specific trades, industries or processes mentioned in the Schedule to the Convention with regard to diseases produced by lead and mercury, but covers all activities where workers manipulate these substances. The Committee requests the Government to confirm in its next report that workers employed in activities listed in the Schedule with regard to poisoning by lead and mercury, would not be required to prove the occupational origin of their disease.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Thailand

In its previous observation, the Committee expressed deep concern over the situation of more than 2 million migrants, mainly from Myanmar, working in Thailand. Although the right to equal treatment of foreign workers in case of a work-related accident is recognized by the Workmen's Compensation Act B.E. 2537 (WCA) of 1994, additional conditions for the implementation of this right, established by the Social Security Office (SSO) in circular No. RS.0711/W751 of 2001, have prevented legally employed migrants from affiliating to the Workmen's Compensation Fund (WCF), pending completion of a complex and lengthy nationality verification procedure. Calling attention to the dire humanitarian situation of these workers, the Committee requested the Government to take positive and urgent measures to review the policy and legal framework concerning social security coverage and protection of migrant workers in case of occupational accidents and to instruct the SSO to lift restrictive conditions and facilitate access of migrant workers to the WCF irrespective of their nationality.

The Government states in its report of February 2011 that migrant workers who come to work in Thailand holding a passport and a work permit are fully covered by the WCA on an equal footing with Thai nationals and without any discrimination. If they suffer work-related injuries or sickness, these workers are entitled, in accordance with section 18 of the WCA, to disability benefits, medical care and rehabilitation services, as well as to survivor benefits and a funeral grant for their dependants in case of death, provided by the WCF. The Government further states that irregular migrants, on the contrary, will be arrested, detained and sent back to their countries, in accordance with the Immigration Act B.E. 2522 (1979). However, given the number of irregular migrants waiting for repatriation, the Government had decided, since 1996, to authorize those of them who have undergone registration with the national authorities – 1 million persons approximately – to work temporarily in Thailand pending their repatriation. In case an occupational accident occurs to such registered migrants, the competent official of the SSO adjudicates the case at an amount equal to the compensation paid to Thai employees, in accordance with section 50 of the WCA, and orders the employer to pay compensation directly to the victim. Employers failing to comply are to be prosecuted, and employees or their families may bring the case to the courts.

In an attempt to facilitate the registration of all irregular migrant workers, a Cabinet resolution of 19 January 2010 allowed undocumented migrants from Cambodia, Lao People's Democratic Republic and Myanmar to register until 28 February 2012 and to work legally in Thailand, provided that they engage in the nationality verification process required by the SSO with a view to obtaining temporary passports. For nationals from Lao People's Democratic Republic and Cambodia, their countries of origin have dispatched officials in nationality verification centres located in Thailand. By contrast, the nationals of Myanmar continue to be required by their Government to travel back to their country in order to obtain the necessary documents and complete the nationality verification process, as domestic regulations prevent government officials from operating outside Myanmar. The Thai Government reports that, as of September 2010, 188,323 migrant workers from Myanmar had, nonetheless, completed this process and become eligible to affiliate to the WCF on the same footing as regular migrants and Thai nationals, in accordance with the SSO announcement on the registration of Laotian, Cambodian and Myanmar migrants with verified nationalities, dated 8 October 2010 (B.E. 2553).

With regard to other migrant workers who have not yet completed the nationality verification process, the SSO proposed to set up a separate fund, in order to accord registered migrant workers who suffer work-related injuries, sickness, or death the same protection as that received by Thai workers under the WCF. In an effort to address its labour shortage problem and to decrease the employment of unregistered migrant workers, the Government has also taken measures, through diplomatic channels, aimed at recruiting new, so called "fresh", migrant workers from the neighbouring countries. These "fresh" workers will be able to enter Thailand legally and be allowed to stay and work in the country for a renewable period of two years. Finally, the Ministry of Labour has started a policy of enforcing the law on labour inspection by targeting the risks of forced labour and human trafficking for labour exploitation.

According to the information provided by the State Enterprise Workers Relations Confederation (SERC) in September 2011, irregular migrants in Thailand represented 90 per cent of all migrants in the country and an estimated 5 to 10 per cent of the country's labour force. Some 980,000 migrant workers have registered and obtained work permits from the Thai authorities. These temporary documents delivered by Thai authorities, however, are not recognized by the SSO and the workers concerned are required to complete the nationality verification process.

In many cases, these migrants are left without any guarantee of compensation for a work-related accident. This is because many employers also disregard the SSO orders to pay compensation, while the workers concerned often are unaware of their rights, face language barriers, and are unable to prosecute their employers in courts following a work accident. In some instances reported by the SERC, victims of occupational accidents are denied access to health care institutions with fatal consequences. The numerous cases referred to the Supreme and Administrative Courts by the SERC have so far remained unconsidered for many years, and no national court had accepted competence to review the 2001 SSO circular.

In this situation, the Government has recently taken new amnesty measures allowing more undocumented migrants to register and obtain the work permit. It approved the resolution of 14 June 2011, establishing a new Work Accident Insurance Fund for migrant workers undergoing the nationality verification process. This fund would be separate from the WCF and open to registered migrants possessing identification cards or identity documents issued by the Ministry of Interior or the Ministry of Labour. In contrast to the WCF, the affiliation of migrant workers to the newly established fund would be voluntary and no penalties would be imposed on employers who fail to contribute to this fund. The SERC concludes that the new scheme continues to discriminate against migrant workers by denying them equal access to the WCF and, together with the National Congress of Thai Labour (NCTL), demands that the Government repeal the 2001 SSO circular.

The Committee takes note of the above information and observes that the question of the protection of the rights of migrants in Thailand remains under the constant scrutiny of UN human rights bodies. In October 2011, the Government stated in the framework of the Universal Periodic Review of Thailand, held under the auspices of the Human Rights Council, that migrant workers from neighbouring countries make valuable contributions to the Thai economy and that it will seek to uphold international labour standards while preserving Thailand's economic, social, and national security interests. The Government indicated that it has already taken action to address the problems faced by migrant workers by allocating funds to provide health care subsidies for people without status; launching campaigns to disseminate information on the rights and duties of employers and employees, as well as information pertaining to labour rights published for migrant workers in their native languages; and providing financial assistance for expenses incurred during the judicial process. The Government also indicated that it intends to ratify Conventions Nos 87 and 98 to protect the rights of Thai and migrant workers alike and to fully engage the civil society in the follow-up review aimed at enhancing human rights protection for migrant workers and preventing human trafficking.

The Committee recalls that a key principle on which the right to social security is premised is non-discrimination and pertains to all persons, irrespective of status and origin. The Committee recognizes that extending the right to social security, including the right to medical care to non-citizens is a key challenge for many societies today. With regard to non-citizens, even where they are in an irregular status on the territory of another state, such as undocumented workers, they should have access to basic benefits and particularly to emergency medical care (see General Survey on social security instruments, 2011, paragraph 260). In view of the foregoing, the Committee understands that the Government fully realizes the need to implement effectively the measures announced to protect the human rights and dignity of migrant workers, and that the Government also realizes the determination of the international community to help resolve the problems involved as soon as possible. The Committee urges the Government to ensure that these measures achieve rapid and substantial results on the ground in the near future and, that the measures effectively eliminate cases of denial of emergency medical care and related benefits to uninsured migrant workers suffering industrial accidents referred to by the SERC.

With regard to the question of the affiliation to the WCF of registered migrant workers, the Committee notes that, in law, the SSO circular No. RS.0711/W751 of 2001 continues to require that registered migrant workers who do not hold national passports complete the nationality verification procedure before they can affiliate to the WCF. The Committee regrets that the Government's report is silent regarding the demands to amend or repeal this circular, or at least to instruct the SSO to recognize for affiliation purposes the temporary identity documents and work permits issued by the Government agencies to registered migrant workers. Considering the current legal impasse involving judicial proceedings initiated domestically by the SERC to contest the legality of the circular, the Committee also regrets that the report does not reply to the questions raised in its previous comments with regard to the procedures existing in the Thai legal system to supervise, review and revoke contested circulars issued by a governmental agency.

The Committee observes that the restrictions established by this circular, in contradiction with the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1994, remain a major obstacle to the enjoyment by hundreds of thousands of registered migrant workers from Myanmar of the right to equality of treatment guaranteed to them by Article 1 of the Convention. In this situation, the Committee notes the Government's decisions to re-open the possibility for irregular migrants not yet registered to do so and obtain work permits, and also to create a new Work Accident Insurance Fund (WAIF) specifically intended to ensure their coverage during the nationality verification phase, following which they would be, in principle, entitled to affiliate to the WCF. However, the Committee understands that the affiliation to the WAIF would be left to the discretion of employers. Those deciding not to contract the new insurance would remain directly liable to pay their workers compensation in case of employment injury. In practice, the creation of the WAIF does not bring the Government closer to guaranteeing the right to equality of treatment recognized by the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1994 for migrant workers registered by the Thai authorities and given work permits. The creation of this new fund also risks introducing a double standard of protection, by giving employers a legal opportunity not to insure their migrant workers against occupational accidents.

Moreover, the decision to re-open the registration procedure to new undocumented migrants and provide for their voluntary insurance coverage by the WAIF during the nationality verification process may lead to institutionalizing the discriminatory status of these workers, few of whom end up actually protected by the WCF on a par with Thai nationals. The Committee observes that this long train of factors – the lengthy nationality verification procedure, the SSO prohibition for employers to affiliate their registered migrant workers to the WCF, the paralysis of the judiciary system unable to consider the legality of the SSO circular, the voluntary nature of the affiliation to the WAIF, and the poor enforcement of employer liability to pay compensation to victims of industrial accidents who are not covered by either fund – in effect, incites employers to evade paying any compensation or social insurance costs for their workers and creates vast opportunities for exploitation that have been denounced by trade unions and numerous non-governmental organizations.

The Committee also observes that this state of affairs defies the 2007 ASEAN Declaration on the Protection and Promotion of the Rights of Migrant Workers, signed by Thailand, which calls upon the Thai Government to adopt a comprehensive migration policy promoting, in particular, the welfare of migrant workers through access to social welfare services and to the legal and judicial system in case they are victims of discrimination, abuse, exploitation or violence. The Committee calls on the Government to exercise its general responsibility for the proper functioning of the social security system and to ensure that the SSO adopts a proactive approach that will bring registered migrants under the protection of the existing employment injury scheme and at the same time to enforce the effective functioning of the direct employer liability scheme. The Committee considers that in order to change the current situation for the better and ensure the gradual transition of migrant workers to be under the protection of the WCF on an equal footing with Thai nationals, the Government should take urgent measures to strengthen and integrate all the available means of protection into a comprehensive safety net providing basic protection to all migrant workers in case of employment injury. It should also require employers to take out an insurance policy for each registered migrant worker employed by them, enforced by a regime of sanctions sufficient to dissuade employers from evading their legal obligations. The Committee invites the Government to provide detailed information regarding its plans and actions in this respect together with the complete statistical data on the number of migrant workers registered by the Thai authorities and given work permits, the number of migrant workers subjected to the nationality verification process and voluntarily affiliated to the WAIF, and the number of migrant workers that have completed this process and are compulsorily insured in the WCF.

The Committee also wishes to emphasize that, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, all ratifying members undertake to afford each other mutual assistance with a view to facilitating the application of the Convention and the execution of their respective laws and regulations on workmen's compensation. In this respect, the Government of Thailand reports measures, taken in cooperation with Cambodia and the Lao People's Democratic Republic, to make the nationality verification process easier for registered migrants originating from these countries, facilitating the fulfilment of the conditions for their subsequent affiliation to the WCF. The Committee also notes that the bilateral cooperation framework between Thailand and Myanmar has been reactivated recently on the occasion of a ministerial meeting which took place in June 2011. As part of this reactivation, the Government of Myanmar has committed itself to give all needed assistance through its diplomatic and consular representations and to issue in the near future the remaining temporary passports necessary for the completion of the nationality verification process by Myanmar migrants working in Thailand. The Committee underlines the need to protect the rights of migrant workers and to assist them effectively. In view of the fact that Myanmar and Thailand both have ratified the present Convention, the Committee hopes that they will pursue their cooperation with a view to overcoming the administrative difficulties in the application of the Convention.

Equality of Treatment (Social Security) Convention, 1962 (No. 118) (ratification: 1965)

Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. Old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits in case of residence abroad. In the comments it has been sending to the Government for many years, the Committee has recalled that section 49 of Decree No. 74-499 of 27 April 1974 respecting the old-age, invalidity and survivors' schemes in the non-agricultural sector and section 77 of Act No. 81-6 of 12 February 1981 concerning the organization of social security schemes in the agricultural sector, provide that the granting of the above benefits to nationals of Tunisia is subject to the applicant residing in Tunisia on the date on which the application is made, although this requirement is lifted for foreign nationals of countries bound to Tunisia by a bilateral or multilateral social security treaty. Under this legislation, Tunisian nationals do not benefit from equality of treatment with foreign nationals, in accordance with Article 4(1) of the Convention, and they may be refused old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefits contrary to Article 5(1) of the Convention, if they apply for the benefit when they are residing abroad in a country that has not concluded a bilateral treaty with Tunisia. The Committee had therefore requested the Government to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention by abolishing the above residence requirement for Tunisian nationals.

In its reports received in June 2010 and May 2011, the Government points out that, wishing to bring Tunisian legislation fully into line with the Convention, the competent government services have held in-depth discussions with the ILO. A bill intended to adapt the abovementioned provisions has been put forward with a view to finalizing the reform in respect of the Convention. As an immediate measure, the Government points out that it has instructed the national social security fund to cease requiring the physical presence of the beneficiary who applies for an invalidity, old-age or survivors' benefit or for employment injury and sickness benefits. Furthermore, social security funds have received clear instructions to neutralize the residence requirement provided for under the abovementioned texts, with respect to entitlements and the payment of benefits, both in the case of nationals of Tunisia and nationals of States bound to Tunisia by international agreements, in which the residence clause for the same branches has been lifted.

The Committee notes with interest the measures taken by the Government to bring national practice into line with Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the way in which the instructions given are applied by the social security institutions by supplying statistical information on the transfer of benefits abroad. The Committee hopes that the Government will finalize the reform of the abovementioned provisions with ILO technical assistance in order to anchor the established practice in national legislation.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government reporting the adoption in 2000 of new legislation respecting workers' compensation. In this respect, it notes with satisfaction that, following the many comments that it has made for many years, the Government has taken the opportunity to adopt the above Act in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with certain principles set out in Article 5 of the Convention. This is one of the essential provisions of the Convention which establishes that the compensation payable in the event of employment injury resulting in permanent incapacity or death shall, in principle, be paid in the form of periodical payments and may only be paid in the form of a lump sum when guarantees are provided to the competent authorities of its proper utilization. This provision is intended to protect victims of employment injury or their dependants against the improper use of funds intended to compensate the permanent loss of income resulting from an employment accident.

The Committee accordingly notes that, under section 3(8) of the Workers' Compensation Act of 2000 (Chapter 225), compensation in cases of permanent incapacity or death shall, in accordance with the provisions of the Convention, be paid in the form of periodical payments. In cases of total or partial permanent incapacity, any compensation due shall be paid by the employer to the district labour officer, who then pays such sums to the beneficiaries concerned (section 26). In practice, nevertheless, according to the Government's report, payments are still in the form of a lump sum, except in the case of minors, who receive periodical payments. The Government adds that the Commissioner for Labour decides whether the compensation is to be paid wholly or partially, but no guarantees of the proper utilization of the compensation are usually required.

While welcoming the amendment of the national legislation establishing the principle of compensation due in the event of an employment accident resulting in death or permanent incapacity paid in the form of periodical payments, the Committee invites the Government to take the necessary measures (for example, through circulars addressed to the commissioners for labour in the various districts) to ensure compliance with this principle in practice and to provide information in this respect in its next report. The Committee also observes that, contrary to the provisions of the Convention, sections 5 and 6 of the Act of 2000 limit the amount of compensation to a sum equal to 60 months' earnings or to a percentage of this sum corresponding to the recognized percentage of loss of capacity. In this respect, it is bound to hope that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the near future to give effect in law and practice to Article 5 of the Convention, which provides in the case of both permanent incapacity and death for the payment of benefits in the form of periodical payments without limit of time.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Article 9. Cost-sharing for pharmaceutical products. The Committee regrets to note that no reply was received to its previous observations on the measures taken to include all victims of occupational accidents within the category of insured persons exempt from cost-sharing so that pharmaceutical assistance dispensed outside the hospital is provided free of charge to all victims of occupational accidents. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to further reduce cost-sharing for pharmaceutical products outside the hospital for victims of occupational accidents and provide the corresponding statistical information.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention. Cost-sharing in the cost of medicines and appliances. In its reply, the Government states that cost-sharing constitutes a contribution of the individual towards care and medical supplies and accounts only for a small proportion of the actual costs incurred. In principle, exemptions on cost-sharing should only apply to those who are not able or have a reduced ability to meet the statutory charges, including economically inactive persons or persons who suffer reduced incomes because of occupational accidents. Other exemptions to cost-sharing, which are related to specific conditions or diseases, are currently under review and could well be rationalized or removed in the future. The Government states that it would be inappropriate to seek to add any further exemptions to those currently in place until the review process has been completed. The Committee notes this information and wishes to recall that the purpose of Articles 9 and 10 of the Convention is to relieve victims of occupational accidents from bearing any costs of prescribed medicines and artificial limbs resulting from employment injury. Therefore, the Committee hopes that the Government will seize the opportunity of the current review of cost-sharing to reduce it so as at least not to cause any hardship for persons of small means who fall victims of industrial accidents. Please provide statistical information requested in Part V of the report form.

Workmen's Compensation (Accidents) Convention, 1925 (No. 17)

Articles 5 and 9 of the Convention. Benefits in the form of periodical payments. Free-of-charge medical, surgical and pharmaceutical aid. The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of the Employees' Compensation (Amendment) Ordinance, enacted on 1 July 2009, amending the principal Ordinance so as to bring it into line with the Convention. In accordance with Article 5 of the Convention, section 9 of the Ordinance, as amended, provides that compensation payable where the death or disablement of an employee has resulted from an injury has to be paid by way of periodical payments to persons protected or their dependants. This provision also provides that compensation may be paid in a lump sum in cases where the responsible authority is satisfied that it will be properly utilized, as authorized by the Convention. The Committee also notes that, in conformity with Article 9 of the Convention, section 14 of the revised Ordinance provides that the employer or the insurer bears the cost of all medical aid and such surgical and pharmaceutical aid as is reasonably necessary in consequence of an occupational accident.

Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 [Schedule I amended in 1980] (No. 121) (ratification: 1973)

Articles 13, 14 and 18 of the Convention (in conjunction with Article 19). Calculation of benefits. The Committee notes with regret that, despite repeated previous requests, the Government has not supplied any kind of statistics in its reports to enable the calculation of cash benefits for partial incapacity (Article 13), for loss of earning capacity likely to be permanent (Article 14), and in the event of the death of the breadwinner (Article 18). The Committee would be interested to know what obstacles are preventing the Government from presenting the information required under Articles 13, 14 and 18 of the report form relating to the Convention. The Committee also requests the Government once again to provide information on the application in practice of section 8, second subsection, of Act No. 16074, including statistics on the amount of benefits granted to dependent workers of employers who are not insured.

Article 21. Review of the rates of long-term cash benefits. The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report received in September 2011 does not contain any reply to the comments made in its observations of 1999, 2000 and 2008 concerning the provision of statistics in relation to Article 21 of the Convention. The Committee observes that the Government merely repeats, in its reports of 2008 and 2011 with regard to Article 21, that the form in which, and the interval at which, temporary benefits are paid are adjusted according to variations in the wage used as the basis for calculation. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide the statistical information corresponding to the 2000–11 period, as requested in the report form, so that the Committee is able to assess whether the rates of long-term cash benefits are reviewed following changes in the cost of living or general level of earnings. As the Committee has explained before, an assessment of the information provided for in the report form is essential to enable the Committee to reach conclusions with regard to the application in practice of Article 21 of the Convention.

Article 9. Abolition of the three-day waiting period. Article 11. Medical assistance at home. Referring to its previous comments relating to the three-day waiting period for the payment of cash benefits, provided for in section 19(V) of Act No. 16074 of 1989, the Committee hopes that the Government will take gradual steps to abolish this waiting period and thus bring its legislation into line with Article 9(3) of the Convention. Moreover, the Committee observes that the provisions of section 11(2) of Act No. 16074 of 1989 are not in conformity with the provisions of Article 10(a) of the Convention, because section 11 of the aforementioned Act provides for the transfer of any worker who has suffered an occupational accident from the medical assistance centre to his home and vice versa, whereas the obligation laid down in the Convention refers to the provision of medical assistance at the home of the worker, if necessary. The Committee is therefore bound to reiterate the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to give full effect to the abovementioned provisions of the Convention.

Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128)
(ratification: 1983)

(ratification: 1982)

The Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela is a party to the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102), the Employment Injury Benefits Convention, 1964 (No. 121), the Invalidity, Old-Age and Survivors' Benefits Convention, 1967 (No. 128), and to the Medical Care and Sickness Benefits Convention, 1969 (No. 130). Following the adoption of the new Constitution in 1999, the Government embarked upon a process of the systematic reform of the social security system with the adoption in 2002 of the Organic Act on the social security system (LOSSS), followed in 2005 by the adoption of the Organic Act on prevention, working conditions and the working environment (LOPCYMAT). In 2009, 2010 and 2011, the Confederation of Workers of Venezuela (CTV) and the Independent Trade Union Alliance (ASI) provided comments concerning the social security Conventions ratified by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, reporting dysfunctions in the social security system and problems in the transition to the new system. In view of the need to address in a coherent manner all of the issues related to the reform of the social security system, the Committee has decided to regroup them in a single comment under Convention No. 102, as this is the instrument which establishes, in conjunction with the other social security Conventions, the general framework for the international obligations assumed by the Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela in this field.

I. Establishment of an integrated social security system

The Constitution of 1999 establishes in article 86 the right of all persons to social security, which it defines as a non-profit-making public service providing guarantees for health and ensuring protection against the contingencies of maternity, paternity, sickness, invalidity, catastrophic diseases, incapacity, special needs, employment accidents, loss of employment, unemployment, old age, widowhood, the state of being an orphan, housing, the costs arising out of family life and in any other circumstance of social prevention. The State is assigned the obligation of ensuring that this right is given effect in practice through the establishment of a system of security that is universal, comprehensive, financed on the basis of solidarity, unified, efficient, participatory and based on direct or indirect contributions and regulated by a special organic act.

The LOSSS was adopted in 2002, providing for the establishment of an integrated social security system composed of six benefit schemes regulated by special legislation respecting health benefits, pensions and other cash benefits, social services, occupational safety and health and housing. A period of five years was established for the adoption of this legislation. The LOSSS also envisaged the creation of two new institutions: the Social Security Treasury, responsible for matters relating to affiliation, the collection of contributions and the payment of cash benefits; and the Social Security Supervisory Unit (Superintendencia), responsible for monitoring all the social security schemes providing benefits within the framework of the integrated social security system. The LOSSS represented considerable progress in the sustainable development of social security as it established a clear, firm and coordinated legal framework within which social security schemes were subject to the primacy of law, and accordingly facilitated the sound governance of social security schemes. Furthermore, the establishment of strong institutions responsible for administering and supervising the new social security system offered an important and indispensable guarantee of the operation and sound governance of the social security system.

The Committee notes that legislation has been adopted on social services, occupational health and safety and housing, thereby constituting a new institutional framework for social security. With regard to the two other schemes, namely the health and the pensions schemes, the special legislation envisaged by the LOSSS has still not been adopted, despite the fact that the period of five years established by the Organic Act has elapsed. According to the CTV and the ASI, the Government amended the LOSSS in 2007 to remove the five-year period initially set for the establishment of the integrated social security system. The latest reports provided by the Government in 2011 do not indicate the manner in which it intends continuing the implementation of the structural reform initiated by the LOSSS in relation to the health-care scheme and the pensions and other cash benefits scheme. Moreover, up to now, the two new entities referred to above have not yet been established, with the Government confining itself to indicating that the establishment of the Social Security Treasury was entrusted in 2006 to the People's Ministry for Labour and Social Security. According to the ASI and the CTV, the lack of action by the Government demonstrates the absence of determination to implement the rights recognized both in the Constitution and the LOSSSS. While recalling the positive measures adopted by the Government, the ASI considers that they only constitute fragmentary and partial responses and that they reveal the absence of a legal conception of social security requiring, for its implementation, legislative responses preceded by studies of feasibility and economic necessity. The scarce information provided by the Government on its legislative intentions and the criticisms made by the trade unions lead to doubts with regard to the determination of the Government to continue the establishment of the integrated social security system as a whole. With a view to dissipating these doubts, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate in its next report its political priorities for the implementation of the structures envisaged by the LOSSSS in relation to the two benefit schemes that have not yet been established, with an indication, where appropriate, of whether a new time frame has been established for this purpose. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate in its next report the tangible progress made in the establishment of the new institutions referred to above.

II. Promotion of social dialogue

According to the ASI and the CTV, the difficulty in gaining access to information is the principal problem in evaluating the performance of the management and the results obtained in relation to social security. The fact that it is impossible to gain access to clear, reliable and official information, including statistics, prevents the parties concerned from engaging in effective monitoring of the rate of coverage and the management of the social security system. The organizations add that workers are not represented in either the Venezuelan Social Insurance Institute (IVSS) or the other public institutions, such as the National Institute for Prevention, Occupational Safety and Health (INAPSASEL) and the National Institute for Socialist Educational Cooperation (INCES). The ASI also reports the procedural difficulties encountered by users of the social security system in asserting their rights before the courts, as the Supreme Court of Justice (TSJ) has given contradictory indications with relation to the development that should characterize the implementation of the fundamental right to social security, particularly through delays in procedures and reversals of case law. The Office of the Attorney-General could also discharge its functions better by seeking to identify, where necessary, the responsible state officials and calling for sanctions to be imposed in the event of corruption, investigating user complaints promptly and determining responsibilities for the failure to establish the health and pensions schemes.

The Committee notes that the Government has not provided in its reports, including those for 2011, documented replies to the many comments made by the ASI and the CTV, and there is no indication that it has engaged with the social partners in constructive social dialogue relating to the implementation of the reform of the social security system. Noting that the Constitution recognizes the right and duty of associations to participate in decision-making in relation to the planning, implementation and monitoring of policy on public health institutions (article 84), the Committee wishes to recall that the success of reforms depends on consensus among the social partners and wide social acceptance, involving civil society organizations, the community and local administration. In view of their considerable expertise in the subject, the effective involvement of the social partners in the establishment of the new social security system would contribute to achieving progress in social security through the determination of the appropriate combination of schemes for the country. The time devoted to dialogue therefore represents a good investment and a saving of time when such dialogue results in broad social and political support for the necessary reforms, thereby giving rise to substantial economic and social advantages (see the General Survey on the social security instruments, Report III(1B), ILC, 2011, paragraph 558). The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will accord special attention to the comments and criticisms made by the trade union organizations with a view to completing the establishment of the integrated social security system, the beginnings of which were initiated by the LOSSSS.

III. Health benefits scheme

The 1999 Constitution recognizes that health constitutes a fundamental social right and an obligation upon the State, which is the guarantor of the right to life (article 83). The State is under the obligation to establish, finance and manage a public health system of an inter-sectoral nature, which is decentralized and participatory, integrated into the social security system and governed by the principles of universal free care, integrity, equity, social integration and solidarity (articles 84 and 85). The LOSSSS established the legal framework for the implementation of these constitutional provisions and envisaged the adoption of specific legislation respecting health benefits for this purpose.

Nevertheless, the Government continues to refer to the 1967 Act on social insurance in relation to the legal framework applicable to health care. It also refers to the inclusion in the health programme of the progressive development of new medical consultation centres, comprehensive health services, the modernization of the hospital system and the construction of specialized health centres. According to the Government, this programme has resulted, up to now, in the establishment of some 1,600 consultation centres, 175 comprehensive diagnosis centres, 183 integral rehabilitation centres, six high-technology centres and a children's cardiology hospital, with a view to enabling the 60 per cent of the population currently excluded from health care to be granted protection ultimately. The Government also refers to the establishment of social services in the field of health (misiones sociales Barrio Adentro I, II, III, IV) with the objective of protecting the health of the poorest persons and accordingly giving effect to the constitutional principle of free health care. The report provided by the Government in 2011 under Convention No. 130 is confined to indicating that there has been no change in the manner in which the Convention is applied.

On this subject, the ASI refers to a bill to implement the provisions of the LOSSSS in the field of health, which was adopted on its first reading by Parliament in 2004, but has not become law, as it was not placed on the legislative agenda by the Government. While noting the various positive measures adopted by the Government in the field of health, the ASI considers that they are of an isolated nature and in practice are liable to result in the establishment of a health system under the control of the People's Ministry of Health (MPPS), in parallel to the one administered by the IVSS, which would be in contradiction with the constitutional objective of the integration of the health system into the social security system. The ASI also expresses concern at the practice which consists of public institutions taking out health insurance for their employees with private providers for hospitalization, surgery and maternity. In practice, employees in the public sector continue to prefer using private health insurance because they consider that, in overall terms, the public health system is deficient. Although in 2009 the Government decided that all insurance policies of this type would in future be managed by a state body, it has still not determined the practical procedures for so doing. The consequence has been the transformation of the State into a collector of funding in support of the private health system, which prejudices not only the public social security system, but also workers, who are obliged to use part of their wages to cover health insurance in view of the absence of a public policy guaranteeing the constitutional rights to health and social security.

In light of this information, the Committee requests the Government to explain the reasons for the delays and impediments to the establishment of a public health-care scheme. The Committee recalls that the legislation on this subject, the 1967 Act on social insurance, is not adequate to guarantee that full effect is given to Convention No. 130. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend this Act to bring it into conformity with the obligations deriving from the international social security Conventions ratified by the country. The points raised above concern in particular the following provisions of Convention No. 130: Articles 10 and 19 (in conjunction with Article 5) (the need for effective coverage of either all employees and their dependants, or 75 per cent of the economically active population and their dependants); Article 13 (the need to provide copies of the laws and regulations specifying the medical care provided to the persons protected, in compliance with the minimum levels envisaged by this provision of the Convention); Article 16(1) (the need to bring section 127 of the General Regulations of the Act on social insurance into conformity with the established practice of the IVSS, which consists of providing medical assistance throughout the contingency); Article 16(2) and (3) (the need to provide a copy of any decision, circular or administrative rule of the IVSS setting out the practice which consists of providing medical care when the beneficiary is no longer part of one of the groups of protected persons in the case of sickness which began when the person concerned was still part of that group); Article 28(2) (the need to amend section 160 of the General Regulations of the Act on social insurance, under which the pension is suspended when the contingency is a result of a violation of the law, a crime or an offence against morals or decency; and Article 22, in conjunction with Article 1(h) (concerning the level of cash sickness benefits). While awaiting the implementation of the part of the LOSSSS respecting health, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures adopted to give effect to each of the provisions of the Convention referred to above. The Committee also hopes that the next report will reply to the allegations made by the CTV and the ASI concerning the operation of the health system.

IV. The pensions and other cash benefits scheme

In parallel with the situation regarding health benefits, the Committee notes that social security cash benefits are still governed by the 1967 Act on social insurance. Following the adoption of the new Constitution in 1999, invalidity, old-age and, since 2010, survivors' pensions have been provided at the rate of the minimum wage, which is adjusted each year. The Government adds that it has ensured the provision of all of the financial resources necessary for the social security system and has also assumed the responsibility entrusted to it by the Constitution by extending the coverage of social security and improving the effectiveness and equity of the distribution of public resources. The policy adopted has permitted a better redistribution of household income, an improvement in the situation in the poorest categories and a progression of the country in terms of the Human Development Index. In 2007, Presidential Decree No. 5316 extended old-age coverage to around 100,000 persons aged 70 and above residing in the country, in the context of an exceptional and temporary programme. In 2010, two other exceptional and temporary decrees were also adopted: Decree No. 7401 establishing an exceptional and temporary programme with a view to guaranteeing entitlement to an old-age pension to insured persons of pensionable age who, although they had paid at least a contribution during their professional life, do not fulfil the conditions for entitlement to a pension. Decree No. 7402 places the obligation upon the IVSS to pay old-age benefits to around 20,000 rural workers and fishers who have reached the age of 60 in the case of men and 55 in the case of women. According to the information provided by the Government, during the period covered by the 2006–11 report, the number of pensioners under the social security system is reported to have risen from 944,475 to 1,825,192 persons. The percentage of older persons (women aged over 55 years and men aged over 60 years) covered by the social security system rose from 24.36 per cent in 1998 to 57.06 per cent in 2009.

While emphasizing the efforts made by the Government to extend the coverage of the contributory system (6,701,444 persons covered in 2009) and to ensure old-age coverage to elderly persons who are excluded from it, the ASI recalls that over 1 million persons do not have old-age pensions and it expresses doubts as to the process selected by the Government to guarantee this coverage, through the adoption of different decrees for each of the categories concerned. Measures for the provision of special pensions, in the view of the ASI, represent uncoordinated efforts lacking an integrated legal framework, which are largely inadequate to resolve the structural problem related to the coverage of the contingency of old age. The ASI also refers to the lack of clarity and legal certainty in relation to entitlement to cash benefits and their level, which has serious consequences on the operation of the judicial system and the recognition of acquired rights, both by the administration and by the courts. A ruling by the Supreme Court of Justice in 2005 ordering old-age and survivors' benefits to be calculated on the basis of previous earnings (TSJ, Social Chamber, Case No. 0816 of 26 July 2005) was accordingly ignored by the court entrusted with its enforcement, which approved the reduction of the level of pensions due to that of the minimum wage. Recently, a legal challenge, which is awaiting a ruling on its receivability by the Constitutional Chamber of the TSJ, lodged by the Venezuelan Programme for Education-Action in the Field of Human Rights (PROVEA) is calling for the failure to adopt legislation regulating the pensions system to be declared unconstitutional. According to the ASI, the adoption of the law on the pensions scheme and other cash benefits envisaged in the LOSSS would have the advantage of clarifying the situation in law and re-establishing the link between pension benefits and the previous earnings of beneficiaries. The ASI adds that the LOPCYMAT is still not applied in practice in relation to employment injury pensions, while awaiting the establishment of the new institutions envisaged by the LOSSS.

The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to the detailed allegations made by the CTV and the ASI and that it has confined itself to indicating in its 2011 reports under Conventions Nos 121 and 128 that there is no change to be reported in the manner in which these Conventions are implemented, without indicating the way in which it intends to continue the implementation of the LOSSS. The Committee requests the Government to indicate its political intentions with regard to the adoption of the legislation respecting the pensions and other cash benefits scheme.

With regard to the implementation of the social security Conventions by the legislation that is currently applicable, the Committee notes that the information provided by the Government is confined to referring to the various legislative provisions, even though it has been drawing its attention for many years to the need to provide all the information requested in the report form. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report in relation to the instruments mentioned below, based on the report forms, indicating the manner in which the applicable legislation, including the various exceptional and temporary measures adopted by the Government, gives effect to Conventions Nos 102, 121 and 128.

- With regard to the level of benefits: please demonstrate that cash benefits are of a level that is in conformity with the minimum established by Convention No. 121 in relation to employment injury benefit (Articles 13, 14(2) and 18(1), in conjunction with Article 19); and by Convention No. 128 in relation to old-age, invalidity and survivors' benefit (Articles 10, 17 and 23, in conjunction with Article 26).
- With regard to Convention No. 121: Article 4 (the need to cover effectively all employees (including apprentices) in the public and private sectors, including cooperatives, and, in the event of the death of the family breadwinner, the prescribed categories of beneficiaries); Article 7 (the need to indicate the conditions under which a commuting accident shall be considered to be an industrial accident giving entitlement to compensation under the social security legislation); Article 8 (the establishment of a list of occupational diseases in accordance with the Convention); Article 10(1) (the need to take the necessary measures to determine explicitly in the legislation the types of medical care provided by the IVSS to insured persons, which shall include at least the care enumerated in the Convention); Article 18 (in conjunction with Article 1(e)(i)) (the amendment of section 33 of the Act on social insurance with a view to raising from 14 to 15 years the age up to which children shall be entitled to a survivors' pension); Article 21 (the need to provide the statistical data required in the report form as a basis for assessing the real impact of the adjustment of pensions, taking into account variations in the general level of earnings and in the cost of living); Article 22(1)(d) and (e) and (2) (the need to amend section 160 of the General Regulations of the Act on social insurance, under which the pension shall be suspended when the contingency is due to a violation of the law, a crime or an offence against morals or decency).

Maternity protection

Maternity Protection Convention (Revised), 1952 (No. 103) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain a reply to its previous comments, but indicates that the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Welfare and the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB) are working together on the formulation of the Bill intended to amend the current General Labour Act and which, inter alia, refers to matters relating to benefits for the birth of a child. The Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take this opportunity to bring its legislation into full conformity with the Convention in relation to the matters referred to below, and that it will indicate the progress achieved in this respect in its next report.

Article 1 of the Convention. Agricultural workers. In the absence of a reply by the Government to its previous comments concerning the protection of women agricultural workers, the Committee is bound to express once again the firm hope that the Government will not fail to take all the necessary measures in the very near future to ensure that all these women workers benefit in both law and practice from the maternity protection afforded by the national legislation (General Labour Act and Social Security Code).

Article 3(2). Duration of maternity leave. The Committee observes that the relevant provisions of the labour legislation (section 61 of the General Labour Act and Supreme Decree No. 2291 on women workers in the public administration) would need to be aligned with the social security legislation (section 31 of Decree No. 13214 of 24 December 1975) so as to establish explicitly and without ambiguity the right to maternity leave of at least 12 weeks, in accordance with the Convention.

Article 3(4). Late confinement. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the measures adopted in practice for the inclusion in the General Labour Act, the Social Security Code and the legislation respecting public servants and employees of a provision explicitly establishing the possibility of extending prenatal leave where confinement occurs later than the presumed date, without any reduction in the minimum period of post-natal leave of six weeks prescribed by the Convention.

Article 4(1) and (3). Medical benefits. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the establishment in practice of universal health insurance for mothers and children (Seguro Universal Materno Infantil) and in particular to provide statistics on the number of women workers covered in relation to the total number of employed persons, and the number of women workers who have received care from the health services in the context of the universal health insurance for mothers and children, with an indication of the nature of the medical care received. Please also provide copies of the implementing regulations envisaged in section 10 of the Act of 22 November 2002. The Committee would also be grateful if the Government would provide information in its next report on the results achieved and the difficulties encountered in the implementation of the new health policy.

Article 4(4) and (5) and (8). Entitlement to benefits. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure the provision of maternity benefit: (i) by means of public funds for women who are not yet covered by the social security scheme; and (ii) in the context of public assistance for those who fail to meet the qualifying conditions prescribed by the Social Security Code.

Article 5. Nursing breaks. The Committee is bound to request the Government once again to indicate in its next report the measures adopted or envisaged to supplement the legislation respecting conditions of employment in the public administration with a provision explicitly granting entitlement to nursing breaks to women workers in this sector.

Part V of the report form. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in its next report, including statistics, on the application in practice of the system of maternity benefits, in both cash and in kind (regions and municipalities covered, number of employed persons who in practice benefit from the envisaged protection in relation to the total number of employed persons, summaries of inspection reports, number and nature of the violations reported and any other details relating to the application of the Convention in practice).

Panama

Maternity Protection Convention, 1919 (No. 3) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to its observation of 2009 on Articles 1, 3 and 4 of the Convention.

Article 3(c). Maternity benefits provided to women who do not meet the conditions for entitlement under social insurance. The Committee observes that under section 146 of Organic Act No. 51, the Basic Social Security Fund Act, in order to receive the maternity benefit, fund members must have paid into their individual accounts a minimum of nine monthly quotas in the 12 months preceding the seventh month of pregnancy. For women workers who are not eligible for social security benefits, section 107 of the Labour Code provides that payment of the maternity benefit is to be covered by the employer. The Committee observes, however, that Act No. 51 establishes a "compensation" mechanism (section 1(14)) under which an “economic benefit” is to be provided in a single payment where the requirements for the grant of a pension for the corresponding risk are not met (see provisions on invalidity benefit (section 165) and old-age benefit (section 171)). That being so, the Committee requests the Government to consider the possibility of extending the “compensation” mechanism to pregnant women who do not meet the legal requirements for grant of the maternity benefit by the Social Security Fund, so as to relieve employers of the obligation to cover directly the costs of the benefits due to women they employ.

Article 3(d). Nursing breaks. The Committee observes that section 114 of the Labour Code gives women workers nursing their children the choice between 15-minute breaks every three hours or two half-hour breaks a day. The Committee notes that the Government stated previously that the first option was in practice seldom used, and states in its 2010 report that studies may be conducted to establish which of the two options is the most feasible for women workers in practice. The Committee reminds the Government that in earlier observations, it proposed including a provision in section 114 allowing for working women who are nursing their children a reduction in working time instead of the choice between 15-minute breaks every three hours or two half-hour breaks. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to adopt appropriate measures in the near future to enable nursing mothers to exercise this right in practice.

Sri Lanka

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 100th Session, June 2011)

Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the discussion which took place in 2011 in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards on the implementation by Sri Lanka of Convention No. 103. It observes that both the Worker and Employer members of the Conference Committee expressed the hope that the Government would give greater consideration to the aims and principles of the Convention within the framework of responsibility shared between the public authorities and society at large and amend its legislation in consultation with the social partners. The Government representative indicated that an intra-ministerial committee had been formed to study the discrepancies existing between the national legislation and the Convention and that its findings would be discussed by a high-level tripartite forum, the recommendations of which would then be tabled before the National Labour Advisory Council (NLAC) for endorsement. In its conclusions, the Conference Committee regretted that for a number of years no concrete action had been taken by the Government to advance effectively the solution of the numerous and long-standing problems in the application of the Convention. It expressed the firm hope that the Government would do all in its powers to undertake in the very near future legislative action with a view to ensure compliance of the national legislation with the Convention and advance effectively the solution of all outstanding issues. The Conference Committee also welcomed the Government’s decision to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO to achieve tangible progress in the application of the Convention and requested the Office to provide such assistance.

In its 2011 report, the Government manifested its commitment to engage in an inclusive process aimed at progressively bringing national law and practice in conformity with the requirements of the Convention. It approached the International Labour Standards Department of the ILO with a view to organizing a national tripartite workshop which will establish priorities for legislative and other action in the field of maternity protection necessary to overcome the difficulties in implementation and raise awareness among the tripartite constituents of the main principles underlying the Convention. The Committee expresses its support for the Government’s approach to engage in a constructive process aiming at ensuring full application of the Convention, in association with the social partners and with the technical assistance of the Office. The said tripartite workshop represents a good opportunity for elaborating a roadmap detailing the Government’s efforts aimed at addressing progressively all discrepancies between national legislation and practice and the Convention. The Committee therefore expresses the hope that the national tripartite workshop will take place in 2012 and expects the Government to specify in its next regular report due in 2013 the measures taken or contemplated with a view to ensuring compliance with the Convention with respect to the following points:

Article 3(3). Maternity leave. Compulsory post-natal leave of at least six weeks. For many years, the Committee has been stressing that, unlike the Convention, the national legislation does not establish a compulsory leave of at least six weeks after childbirth for all categories of workers covered by the Convention. The compulsory nature of part of the postnatal leave is aimed at preventing women, following pressures from their employer, from resuming work during the first six weeks following childbirth to the detriment of their health or that of their children. In its latest report, the Government states that maternity leave is regulated differently for the various categories of women workers. Shop and office employees are required to take 28 working days of maternity leave after childbirth (Section 18B, Shop and Office Employees Act No. 19 of 1954). Taking into account the weekly rest days and official holidays, the overall duration of postnatal maternity leave of this category of employees exceeds five weeks. Other private sector employees shall not be employed by their employer during a period of four weeks immediately following confinement (section 2, Maternity Benefits Ordinance of 1939) and public sector employees are granted 70 calendar days postnatal leave. The Government states that the need to raise the duration of the compulsory postnatal leave to at least six weeks necessitates a detailed discussion with trade unions and employers’ organizations and proposes to initiate such consultations in time to come.

The Committee trusts that the Government's next report will indicate the legislative measures taken to ensure compliance with this central provision of the Convention.

Article 3(2) and (3). Limitation on the length of maternity leave based on the number of children. Under section 3(1)(b) of the Maternity Benefits Ordinance a woman worker in the private sector having a third and subsequent child has reduced maternity leave entitlements (six weeks as opposed to 12) while the Convention provides for maternity leave of at least 12 weeks in each case, irrespective of the number of births. In its 2011 report, the Government indicates that the discussions within the Department of Labour and the Ministry of Labour and Labour Relations are taking place with a view to amending the national legislation so as to comply with the Convention and that the final decision will be forwarded to the tripartite NLAC to take suitable measures in the future. The Committee considers that, in order to secure the right to maternity leave to all women workers covered by the Convention, the measures taken by the Government should be based on the sound actuarial evaluations of the financial implications of the extension of maternity leave for third and subsequent child and reminds the Government of possibility to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office in this regard.

Article 3(2) of the Convention. Minimum duration of maternity leave. In accordance with section 18B(2) of the Shop and Office Employees Act, women workers are entitled to 14 days prenatal and 28 days postnatal maternity leave whereas the minimum duration of maternity leave under the Convention is 12 weeks (or 84 calendar days). The Committee hopes that the discussions within the intra-ministerial committee and the NLAC will not fail to consider the concrete ways to bring the above legislation in line with the Convention.

Article 4(4) and (8). Cash and medical benefits. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to reform maternity protection with a view to providing benefits by means of a compulsory social insurance scheme or out of public funds. In Sri Lanka, contrary to Article 4(8) of the Convention, maternity benefits continue to be provided by the employer. During the Conference discussion in June 2011, both the employer and worker members pointed out to the Government that compulsory maternity insurance would improve the situation of women workers on the labour market and avoid their discrimination in the workplace resulting from protection mechanisms based on employer's liability. The Conference Committee hoped that, notwithstanding the difficulties involved, the Government would undertake to replace progressively the direct employer liability system by a social insurance scheme and would initiate the necessary studies for this purpose, bearing in mind the need to avoid any adverse effect on the employment of women and on the enterprises with a high number of women workers. In its 2011 report, the Government stresses that all citizens, including women during pregnancy, up to childbirth and thereafter, are granted free medical services through special clinical arrangements. It would, however, be difficult, according to the Government, to provide cash benefits by means of public funds or government-sponsored social insurance. The Committee wishes to point out that the difficulties invoked by the Government would be largely outbalanced by the social and economic advantages brought by the establishment of a social insurance mechanism to cover maternity benefits. It therefore invites the Government to undertake an actuarial feasibility study necessary for setting up a maternity insurance scheme and to report on the results of such a study and the measures envisaged in this respect.

Article 4(1) (in conjunction with Article 3(4), (5) and (6)). Entitlement to cash benefits during supplementary leave. Neither the Shop and Office Employees Act nor the Maternity Benefits Ordinance contain provisions extending the period of maternity leave in case of illness medically certified arising out of pregnancy or confinement. The Government indicates in its report that, for the employees in the private sector, the Maternity Benefits Ordinance provides security of employment during the prenatal and postnatal stages (section 10A), while public employees are entitled to an extension of maternity leave on a half paid or unpaid basis. The Government agrees however that, with a view to covering any situation of illness arising out of pregnancy or childbirth, the national legislation needs to be amended and hopes to discuss this matter within the NLAC taking into account the implications on the employment of women. The Committee hopes that the discussions within the intra-ministerial committee and the NLAC will permit it to determine the most adequate ways to guarantee cash benefits during any extensions of maternity leave due to delayed childbirth (Article 3(4)) and during a supplementary leave period (to be decided nationally) in case of pregnancy- or childbirth-related complications (Article 3(5) and (6)). The Committee considers that such measures should be based on the sound actuarial evaluations of the financial implications of the extension of maternity leave in these cases.

Article 1. Application of the Convention to women workers in plantations and to domestic workers. The Government indicates that Sri Lanka adequately covers workers in agricultural occupations where a labour relationship exists, stressing at the same time that in practice most rural agricultural workers are self-employed. Action needs however to be taken with a view to repealing redundant provisions relating to alternative maternity benefits in the Maternity Benefits Ordinance, in consultation with the social partners. Discussions on this respect between the Department of Labour and the Ministry of Labour and Labour Relations are currently taking place and the final decision will be forwarded to the NLAC so as to take suitable measures in the future. The Committee trusts that the Government will ensure that the said redundant provisions in the Maternity Benefits Ordinance are repealed in the very near future.

With regard to domestic workers, the Government indicates that, as Sri Lanka remains a developing country, the application of the Convention to domestic workers seems rather difficult. It will however forward this issue to the tripartite NLAC and suitable measures will be taken in the future. The Committee hopes that the roadmap, which the Government intends to establish with a view to ensuring compliance with the Convention, will include concrete steps towards extending maternity protection measures to domestic workers.

Article 5. Nursing. The Government indicates that the issue of ensuring nursing breaks to shop and offices employees will be discussed by the NLAC so as to reach a compromise. The Committee trusts that the Government, in consultation with the NLAC, will put forward proposals for amending the relevant legislation in order to guarantee breaks from work for the purpose of nursing, counted as working hours and remunerated accordingly, in accordance with this provision of the Convention.

Article 6. Protection against dismissal during maternity leave in the public sector. The Committee recalls that the Establishment Code does not protect public employees against dismissal or a notice of dismissal during maternity leave. The Government indicates that there are no reported incidents of government sector employees being dismissed during the maternity period. This issue will however be discussed further with line ministries to get detailed information on the manner in which this provision is applied in practice. The Committee points out that, to apply Article 6 of the Convention, the Establishment Code must ensure that public employees may not be dismissed during maternity leave nor receive notice of dismissal expiring during such leave and requests the Government to keep it informed of measures taken or envisaged to ensure conformity with this provision of the Convention.

In view of the numerous questions raised by the application of the Convention in Sri Lanka, the Committee welcomes the initiative of the Government to seek tripartite agreement aimed at ensuring better implementation of the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will undertake without further delay a thorough study of the state of maternity protection in Sri Lanka and to elaborate a legislative agenda ensuring that women workers could really enjoy the rights and benefits guaranteed to them by the Convention. The Committee notes in this respect that Sri Lanka's Decent Work Country Programme (DWCP) for the period 2008–12 sets the objective of enhancing labour administration and promoting equitable employment practices and specifically requests ILO's assistance to focus on elaborating strategies to expand the outreach of social security schemes. The Committee strongly advises the Government to integrate maternity protection into this Programme as an essential component of a comprehensive strategy focusing on the extension of social security.

Zambia

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Maternity leave. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that section 15(A) of the Employment Act (Cap 268) does not comply with the Convention on the following points: (i) contrary to this provision of the Convention, section 15(A)(1) of the Employment Act, and section 7(1) of the Schedule to the Order of 14 January 2002, submit entitlement to maternity leave to the completion of two years of continuous service from the date of the first engagement or since the last maternity leave taken; and (ii) there is no provision in the national legislation providing for a compulsory period of postnatal leave of not less than six weeks.

In its reply, the Government indicates that the provisions on maternity leave (section 15(A) of the Employment Act (Cap 268)) have been supported by all partners in the Tripartite Consultative Labour Council and therefore no proposals were made to review this section. The Zambia Federation of Employers (ZFE) also states that this provision has been accepted by workers and employers and that so far no complaints have been raised by the workers. Both the Government and the ZFE report that women can take unpaid maternity leave if they do not meet the conditions of section 15(A). The Committee would like the Government to confirm, by reference to the corresponding provisions of the national law, that female workers, who do not fulfil the requirement of two years continuous employment, have the right to unpaid maternity leave in case of pregnancy and confinements, as well as the right to protection against dismissal.

With regard to the compulsory nature of the six-week postnatal leave, the Committee points out to the Government and the social partners that this measure is considered essential to safeguard the health of the mother and child, particularly in view of the fact that women are often compelled to return to work as soon as possible after confinement for economic reasons. Nationwide, compulsory postnatal leave guarantees the preservation of the reproductive health of the population. The Committee refers in this respect to the statistical information of the 2007 Zambia Demographic and Health Survey that 61 per cent of married women are employed (table 16.1 of the Survey) and its conclusions, that mortality related to pregnancy and childbirth remains relatively high in the country (page 259 and table 15.4 of the Survey). The Committee requests the Government to do all in its powers to undertake in the very near future legislative action to bring the provisions of the Employment Act on maternity leave in conformity with the Convention.

Article 4(3). Medical benefits. The Committee notes that no information that it had requested on the nature and scope of medical benefits which are guaranteed to female employees according to Article 4(3) of the Convention was received. In its reply, the Government states that it is still assessing how medical benefits could be managed and paid by the National Pension Scheme Authority. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information in its next report on the progress made in the establishment of free medical benefits to protect women during pregnancy and post-natal leave.

Article 4(4), (6), (7) and (8). Maternity cash benefits. The Government reports that it is considering with the social partners how a scheme that is in conformity with the provisions of the Convention could be maintained and managed in Zambia. The ZFE specifies that it is opposed to amending section 15(A), as long as employers have to continue to bear the burden of paying at the same time a salary to a woman on maternity leave and to someone else to do her work. However, the ZFE specifies that employers may be in a position to reconsider amending the current legislation if the Government sets up a public fund or a compulsory insurance scheme where the costs would be shared between employers and employees, and urges the ILO to provide technical assistance to the Government in this respect. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that a progressive approach is being adopted to the application of the Convention and that it is currently engaged in determining the best way to implement it. Recalling that the maternity cash benefits should be financed collectively by way of insurance contributions or taxes, the Committee hopes that, notwithstanding the difficulties involved, the Government would undertake to replace progressively the direct employer liability system by a social insurance scheme and requests the Government to keep the Committee informed of any measure taken or envisaged in this respect and recalls that the Government might wish to avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

Article 5. Nursing breaks. The Government states that it has taken into consideration the observation of the Committee and incorporated the provision for nursing breaks in the draft Employment Act Bill. The Committee notes with interest this development and requests a copy of the draft provisions with an indication of the time frame for its adoption.

Article 6. Protection against dismissal. The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that section 7(4) of the Schedule to the Order of 14 January 2002, which is reproduced in section 15(B) of the Employment Act, has been repealed and replaced by Statutory Instruments Nos 1 and 2 of 2011 in order to take into consideration the comments of the Committee. As a result, a female employee shall not be dismissed in connection with her pregnancy and she will have six months beyond maternity leave in which she remains a protected employee. The Committee notes that in the previous version of the Employment Act, Section 15(B) the protection against dismissal was effective only during six months after delivery. The Committee requests a copy of the Statutory Instruments Nos 1 and 2 of 2011.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 3 (Guinea); Convention No. 103 (Plurinational State of Bolivia, Ecuador, Equatorial Guinea); Convention No. 183 (Latvia, Luxembourg, Mali, Netherlands).

Social policy

Guinea

Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Parts I and II of the Convention. Improvement of standards of living. The Committee requests that the Government provide indications of the way in which the improvement of standards of living is regarded as the principal objective in the planning of economic development within the strategy to combat poverty (Article 2 of the Convention). In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that, pursuant to Article 1(I) of the Convention, "all policies shall be primarily directed to the well-being and development of the population".

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 82 (United Kingdom: Bermuda, United Kingdom: British Virgin Islands, United Kingdom: Falkland Islands (Malvinas)); Convention No. 117 (Democratic Republic of the Congo).

Migrant workers

China

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (notification: 1997)

The Committee notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), and the Government's response thereto.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that as of 31 May 2010, there were 60,642 foreign professionals, 276,737 foreign domestic workers (4,331 men and 272,406 women), and 1,653 "imported workers" (i.e. workers from mainland China or other countries imported under the Supplementary Labour Scheme (SLS)) in the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (SAR). Half of the number of female domestic workers originate from Indonesia while 47.5 per cent originate from the Philippines. Almost 80 per cent of the male domestic workers originate from the Philippines. Other foreign domestic workers mainly come from Thailand, India and Sri Lanka.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the Tripartite Committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution). Since 2003, the Committee has engaged in a dialogue with the Government on the application of Article 6 of the Convention, in particular in the context of the follow-up to the recommendations of the Governing Body at its 288th Session (November 2003) on a representation made by the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines under article 24 of the ILO Constitution alleging non-observance by China of the Convention with respect to Hong Kong SAR. In this connection, the Committee had welcomed the measures by the Government to suspend, until 31 July 2013, the obligation for employers of "all imported labour" including foreign domestic workers, to pay the employees retraining levy (ERL) of 400 Hong Kong dollars (HKD) and the subsequent increases of the minimum allowable wage (MAW) of foreign domestic workers. With regard to the impact of the levy suspension on pre-existing contracts (before 1 August 2008) and wages of domestic workers, the Committee notes the Government's indication that employers are required to inform the Department of Immigration about any termination of contracts, without having to provide the reasons for such termination. The Government, however, states that the number of cases of premature termination of employment contracts does not indicate any significant changes following the implementation of the levy suspension arrangement. With regard to claims of underpayment by foreign domestic workers, the Committee notes from the Government's report that between 1 June 2007 and 31 March 2010, 1,036 complaints were submitted to the Labour Department. Of those cases, 59 were settled with the assistance of the Labour Department and 506 were subsequently referred to the Labour Tribunal or the Minor Employment Claims Adjudication Board (MECAB). In the remaining cases, the foreign domestic worker was granted ex gratia payments from the Protection of Wages on Insolvency Fund (PWIF) due to bankruptcy of the employer. During this period, the Labour Department also issued 398 summonses involving underpayment of wages or other breaches of the Employment Ordinance by employers of immigrant workers (including foreign domestic workers), 247 of them resulting in conviction. The Committee further notes the Government's confirmation that the policy that operating expenses of the Employees Retraining Board, which is responsible for training and retraining of local workers, should primarily be met by the ERL remains unchanged. Noting that, in practice, this would mean that the ERL is primarily borne by employers of foreign domestic workers, representing 99 per cent of the "imported" labour in Hong Kong SAR, the Committee remains concerned about the potential disproportionate impact of the levy policy on wages of foreign domestic workers, once it again becomes operational. The Committee therefore asks the Government to continue to monitor the situation closely and to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the ERL is not having a disproportionate impact on the wages of foreign domestic workers, once the levy suspension expires (as of 31 July 2013). The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide information, disaggregated by sex and country of origin, on the number of underpayment claims submitted by foreign domestic workers to the Labour Department, the Labour Tribunal and the Minor Employment Claims Adjudication Board, and their outcome for both workers and employers.

Article 6(1). Equality of treatment. The Committee notes that the monthly MAW for foreign domestic workers has been increased to HKD3,740, effective 2 June 2011. It also notes the adoption of the Minimum Wage Ordinance No. 15 of 2010 which does not apply to "a person who is employed as a domestic worker in, or in connection with, a household and who dwells in the household free of charge" (section 7(2)). The Committee understands that the reasons given by the Legislative Council for advising that live-in domestic workers be excluded from the scope of the Ordinance were: (a) their distinctive working patterns; (b) enjoyment of benefits in kind; (c) significant socio-economic ramifications; and (d) the fundamental erosion of the policy on foreign domestic workers. The Committee notes that "distinctive working patterns" is meant to cover "round-the-clock work" and "providing service on demand". The Committee notes that the Minimum Wage Ordinance excludes both local and foreign live-in domestic workers and that according to the latest available statistics, the number of local live-in domestic workers totalled 1,400 in 2006 (Population by census conducted by the Census and Statistics Department) compared to 276,737 foreign domestic workers, of whom 98 per cent are women (2010 data). No information is provided on the number and wages of local live-out domestic workers.

The Committee recalls that, unlike local domestic workers or other foreign workers, foreign domestic workers are obliged to reside with the employer (paragraph 3 of the standard employment contract). The Committee notes that, in this context, ITUC draws attention to the vulnerability of foreign domestic workers, particularly those of Indonesian and Nepali origin, to violations of their statutory rights and employment contracts, including denial of rest days, excessive working hours (average of 16 hours a day), and sexual and physical abuse. ITUC calls on the Government to legislate hours of work, including standby hours, of domestic workers, and to conduct a survey on wage inequalities between local and foreign workers, as recommended by the Governing Body in 2003. ITUC is further concerned that the rule requiring foreign domestic workers to leave Hong Kong SAR, within two weeks of the expiration or premature termination of their employment contract drives foreign domestic workers to remain in or access new employment in abusive conditions. Furthermore, ITUC draws attention to the discriminatory nature of the immigration rules (section 4(a)(vi) of the Immigration Ordinance) specifically preventing foreign domestic workers (primarily women) from being eligible to seek permanent residence. With regard to the two-week rule, the Committee previously noted that the rule was exercised with flexibility and that applications for extensions of stay because of civil or criminal proceedings were generally approved, and that in a number of cases applications had been approved to change employer without returning to the home country. With regard to residency, the Committee understands that a Court of first instance ruled on 30 September 2011 that prohibiting foreign domestic workers from acquiring permanent residency was unconstitutional, but that the Government may have challenged the ruling in the Court of Appeal. The Committee notes the Government's reply that it will study the allegations made by ITUC and, if required, provide additional information regarding the application of the Convention. Noting the Government's commitment to protecting the well-being of its workforce, including foreign domestic workers, the Committee asks the Government to monitor closely whether its overall policy on foreign domestic workers (live-in requirement, wage policy, two-week rule and restrictions on permanent residency) is not in practice leading to less favourable treatment of foreign domestic workers with respect to the matters raised in Article 6(1)(a)–(d) of the Convention, and to provide detailed information on the measures taken in this regard. This should include steps to undertake research on wage inequalities and hours of work between local and foreign workers so as to verify whether the abovementioned reasons for exclusion are justified and do not lead to less favourable treatment. The Committee further asks the Government to provide information on the following:

- (i) the measures taken to address the particular vulnerability of domestic workers including Indonesian and Nepali workers, to discriminatory treatment in respect of their wages, and steps taken or envisaged to legislate hours of work of domestic workers;
- (ii) the number of applications for extension of stay beyond the permissible two weeks due to legal proceedings and the number of applications to change employer, and the reasons for any refusals by the Immigration Department;
- (iii) a copy of the Court of first instance's decision and of the decision of the Court of Appeal, if any, regarding the unconstitutionality of the prohibition for domestic workers to apply for permanent residency, and the outcome of the decisions and their impact on the application of the Convention to foreign domestic workers.

Enforcement. The Committee notes ITUC's comments indicating that the Government is not effectively monitoring conditions of work contrary to Article 6 of the Convention and that long proceedings combined with the fear of deportation results in many domestic workers being discouraged from filing a complaint. ITUC also raises concerns that the prohibition of foreign domestic workers who have filed a complaint and prematurely terminated their contracts to take up employment during the remaining time of their stay, has resulted in workers withdrawing their complaints or accepting lower settlements. The Committee notes the Government's reply that foreign domestic workers can access the range of free services (consultation and conciliation) provided by the Labour Department with branch offices located in various districts to resolve disputes with their employers, and can seek redress through the legal system, including provision of legal aid as long as the eligibility criteria, which are applicable to all, are met. The Committee also notes that the Government has taken measures to prevent abusive treatment of foreign domestic workers through various educational and information activities, and a 24-hour telephone inquiry service about rights and benefits under the Employment Ordinance and the standard employment contract. The Government further indicates that between 1 June 2007 and 31 May 2010 the Labour Department handled 7,082 claims from "imported workers" and foreign domestic workers concerning alleged breaches of the Employment Ordinance or the standard employment contract by their employers (other than the alleged underpayment cases referred to above). Of the cases that could not be settled by the Labour Department's conciliatory efforts, 1,995 were subsequently referred to the Labour Tribunal or MECAB. Regarding claims from domestic workers relating to abuse by their employers in relation to race, indecent assault as well as wounding and serious assault, there were 291 reported cases. No further information has been provided on the outcome of these cases, including the remedies provided for victims. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to further strengthen the inspection and enforcement of the rights of foreign domestic workers under the Employment Ordinance and the standard employment contract, and to ensure that migrant workers who have applied for an extension of their stay due to legal proceedings have access to effective and speedy dispute resolution. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide information on the number and nature of claims submitted by foreign domestic workers for violations of the relevant laws and regulations and the standard employment contract, including indications as to their outcome for both workers and employers.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

France

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee notes the communication from the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), received 30 August 2011, which was sent to the Government for its comments thereon. In its communication, the CGT expresses surprise at the Government's failure to reply in 2010 to the issues raised in the Committee's previous observation, and raises concerns about the increasing rigidity of the legislative and normative framework covering migration and the general situation of migrant workers in France, including Roma migrants originating from certain European Union member States. CGT considers that the application of Article 3 (steps against misleading propaganda), Article 6 (equality of treatment) and 7(2) (free services provided by public employment agencies) of the Convention is unsatisfactory, and calls on the Government to comply with all the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes that the Government's report, received on 5 December 2011, arrived too late to be examined by the Committee at this session. The Committee will therefore examine the Government's report, including its response to the issues raised in the 2010 observation and direct request, as well as any comments the Government may have on the observations submitted by the CGT, at its next session.

Israel

The Committee notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009 and the resulting conclusions of the Conference Committee. It also notes the information in the Government's report, including legislation and statistics. The Committee further notes the communication, received 25 July 2011, from the International Union of Food, Agricultural, Hotel, Restaurant, Catering, Tobacco and Allied Workers' Associations (IUF) and the Government's reply thereto.

The Committee notes from the data provided by the Government that, in 2009, 54,000 temporary migrant workers were lawfully employed in care giving, 25,000 in agriculture, 5,000 in construction, 500 in manufacturing and 500 as ethnic chefs. The majority of the temporary migrant workers in the care giving sector are women, while in the other sectors the great majority of the foreign workers employed are men. The IUF indicates that migrant workers mainly originate from China, India, Nepal, Philippines, Sri Lanka and Thailand. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated statistical information on the actual number of temporary migrant workers present in Israel, disaggregated by sex, country of origin and age, and the sectors in which they work.

Follow-up to the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards (International Labour Conference, 98th Session, June 2009).

Article 6 of the Convention. Equal treatment. The Committee previously noted that following a decision of the High Court of Justice in the case of Kav LaOved Workers Hotline and others v. Government of Israel (2006), the Government had taken measures with a view to increasing the protection of migrant workers employed in the care giving and agricultural sectors, and simplifying the process of changing employers. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee welcomed some of the measures taken by the Government but considered that challenges possibly remained in fully applying the Convention in certain sectors. It requested further information on the impact of the measures in reducing migrant workers' dependence on individual employers, as this is an important aspect in ensuring that equal treatment is applied to migrant workers in practice. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government that under the new employment system, foreign workers are free to change employers and agencies, and that workers deciding to leave their employer no longer have to register with the Minister of Interior, but rather with an employment agency (in the construction industry) or with a licensed recruitment agency (in homecare and agriculture). In the agricultural sector, the Government indicates that, along with issuing additional employment permits, emphasis is placed on concluding bilateral agreements to ensure fair and transparent recruitment of foreign agricultural workers. With respect to caregivers, the Government states that both employers and temporary foreign caregivers are required to register with one of the licensed recruitment agencies, which are obliged to send periodically a representative to the home of the employer to oversee the employment relationship and resolve misunderstandings. The Committee also notes, however, that on 16 May 2011, the Government passed the Entry into Israel Law (Amendment No. 21), 5771-2011, authorizing the Minister of the Interior to determine the foreign workers' field of occupation in his or her visa and residence permit, and to adopt regulations limiting the number of times a foreign worker in the nursing profession may transfer to a new employer and limiting employment of such workers to specific geographical areas. The Committee notes that the implementation in practice of the Entry into Israel Law (Amendment No. 21), 5771-2011 could result in reinstating the “restrictive employment relationship” of migrant workers with their employers previously criticized in the decision of the High Court of Justice (2006). The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide full details on the implementation in practice of the Entry into Israel Law (Amendment No. 21), 5771-2011, including information on the number of transfers of foreign workers in the nursing profession presently allowed, how many transfers have been requested and how many refused, and the reasons for such refusal. The Committee also asks the Government to continue monitoring the impact of the new employment system on migrant workers employed in agriculture, construction, manufacturing and as ethnic chefs, and to provide information in this regard, as well as copies of bilateral agreements concluded for the agricultural sector.

Equal treatment of caregivers (remuneration, hours of work, overtime arrangements). The Committee notes the decision of the High Court of Justice in Yolanda Gloten v. the National Labour Court (HCJ 1678/07) of 29 November 2009 (hereafter the Gloten Judgement). In this case, the High Court decided not to consider an appeal against the ruling of the National Labour Court that no overtime pay could be granted with respect to a case of a foreign worker providing care on a live-in basis since the exceptions regarding the scope of application set out in sections 30(A)(5) and (6) of the Hours of Work and Rest Law 1951 applied. The Committee notes that the High Court of Justice concluded that the current legal framework did not offer a proper mechanism suitable for the unique situation of caregivers, and that a narrow and partial interpretation of the law concerning overtime pay might lead to harmful consequences. The High Court, therefore, rejected the appeal due to the difficulty of applying the Law only partially, and because the Court did not consider that the round-the-clock live-in employment of caregivers corresponded to the general framework of protective labour law. The Committee notes that the IUF expresses concern at the impact of the Gloten Judgement on the situation of the large number of migrant women providing care on a round-the-clock and live-in basis and refers in this regard to several examples of regional labour court judgements rejecting lawsuits by migrant caregivers for overtime pay under the Hours of Work and Rest Law, citing the Gloten Judgement. The IUF also draws attention to the Court’s reasoning according to which in circumstances where the application of the labour law is expected to “harm” migrant workers (based on the assumptions that increasing wages due to overtime worked may reduce their employment opportunities), the possibility of diverging from the provisions of protective labour law should be considered. According to the IUF, the Gloten judgement facilitates the application of a discriminatory and inferior legal regime to the work of women migrants.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply indicating that the exceptions set out in sections 30(A)(5) and (6) of the Hours of Work and Rest Law, on which the High Court of Justice is relying, apply to all caregivers, whether local or foreign workers. The Committee notes that sections 30(A)(5) and (6) provide in general terms that the Law shall not apply “to persons employed in positions requiring a special degree of trust”, and to “employees, the conditions and circumstances of whose employment render it impossible for the employer to control working hours and hours of rest”. The Government also states that an application for an additional hearing in this matter is presently before the High Court of Justice and that it is awaiting its outcome. The Committee notes the High Court’s acknowledgement of the need for an appropriate and clear legislative framework guaranteeing adequate pay and favourable working conditions, which at the time of the decision was apparently being developed by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor (MoITAL). The Committee recalls that the Convention requires ratifying states to undertake to apply to migrant workers lawfully in the country, without discrimination based on nationality, race, sex and religion, treatment not less favourable than nationals, with respect to the matters set out in Article 6(1)(a)(i), in law and in practice. The Committee notes that foreign caregivers, 80 per cent of whom are women, constitute the large majority of migrant workers. While no information has been provided on the actual situation of local caregivers, the Committee notes that only a small number of local citizens are willing to work as caregivers, as acknowledged in the Gloten Judgement, suggesting that the present policy applying to caregivers, may, in practice, affect disproportionately female foreign caregivers. The Committee therefore asks the Government to provide information on the outcome of the additional hearing before the High Court of Justice. Understanding that the Foreign Workers’ Committee of the Knesset has recommended an extensive reform of the care giving sector, the Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on any developments in this regard and hopes that such a reform will ensure that foreign caregivers are treated not less favourably than Israeli caregivers with respect to remuneration, hours of work, overtime arrangements, and other matters set out in Article 6(1)(a)(i) of the Convention. The Committee further asks the Government to indicate all measures taken or envisaged to ensure that, in law and in practice, women migrant workers are treated on an equal footing with their male counterparts, foreign or otherwise, in terms of working and living conditions, work-related tax and access to the justice system.

Equal treatment with respect to social security. Having noted restrictions concerning the health insurance system for migrant workers established under the Foreign Workers Law and the Foreign Workers Order (Prohibition of Unlawful Employment and Assurance of Fair Conditions) (Health Service Basket for Workers) 5761-2001, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify the reasons for establishing a separate health insurance system for migrant workers and for the exclusions or limitations provided under sections 3 and 4 of the Order. The Committee notes that during the Conference Committee’s discussion, concerns were expressed regarding insufficient lack of coverage regarding sickness, unemployment and old-age and care expenses relating to maternity, and that challenges remained with respect to social security. The Committee notes the Government’s reply indicating that the reasons for setting up a separate private health insurance system is due to the relative short stay (usually a period up to five years) of temporary migrant workers coming to work in Israel. The Government affirms that the system contains the same basket of medical services included in the national medical insurance scheme, and indicates that the Inter-ministerial Committee on Social Rights and Obligations with respect to Foreign Workers is considering favourably the inclusion of the rights that have hitherto been excluded in the foreign workers' health basket. The Committee further notes the information provided by the Government regarding the enforcement of the health insurance obligation by the Population, Immigration and Borders Authority (PIBA) and the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labour (MoITAL), and the procedures to be followed by employers and recruitment agencies to prove or confirm that valid medical insurance has been arranged for foreign workers. Noting that no information has been provided on how it is being ensured that all workers admitted to Israel under the Foreign Workers Law fully enjoy the right to treatment not less favourable than Israeli nationals regarding social security in respect of maternity, sickness, unemployment and old age, the Committee asks the Government to provide full details in this regard in its next report. It also requests the Government to indicate the outcome of the discussions of the Inter-ministerial Committee on Social Rights and Obligations with respect to Foreign Workers.

Enforcement and access to legal proceedings. The Committee recalls the importance of dissuasive sanctions and effective enforcement of relevant laws in ensuring equal treatment between foreign workers and nationals. The Committee notes that in the course of 2008 and 2009 the PIBA in the Ministry of the Interior became the new competent authority regarding issues involving migrant workers, thus replacing the Foreign Workers' Unit in MoITAL. It notes from the Government's report that according to enforcement statistics for 2009, 930 investigative files were opened against employers suspected of violations of the Foreign Workers Law and 1,662 administrative fines were imposed on employers for such violations; 196 fines were imposed on employers for violations of the Minimum Wage Law and 171 judgements rendered. The Committee also notes that in March 2010, the Foreign Workers Law was amended to strengthen the institution of the Commissioner for the Rights of Foreign Employees in the sphere of labour laws (section 1V(a)). The Commissioner has the authority to intervene in legal proceedings, to handle complaints of migrant workers against employers, actual employers, employment agencies and labour contractors, and to file civil lawsuits with the labour court or other qualified courts. However, the Committee notes that the Commissioner will not be able to exercise any of these powers with respect to complaints lodged by foreign domestic caregivers against their employers, except in cases of human trafficking, conditions of enslavement or forced labour, and cases of sexual abuse, violence or sexual harassment (section 1(31)(3)). The Committee considers, particularly in light of the recent amendments to the Entry into Israel Law and the Gloten Judgement, that excluding the largest group of foreign workers, primarily also women, from the protection of the Commissioner for the Rights of Foreign Workers while leaving monitoring of the employment relationship between these workers and their employers to licensed recruitment agencies, raises concerns as to whether foreign caregivers are able, on an equal footing with nationals, to enjoy and claim effectively their rights in respect of the matters referred to in Article 6(1)(a)–(c) in practice, as provided for by Article 6(1)(d) of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the reasons for excluding foreign caregivers from the mandate of the Commissioner for the Rights of Foreign Workers, and to provide full information on how foreign caregivers lawfully in the country are able to enjoy equal treatment, in law and in practice, with Israeli nationals with respect to the matters set out in Article 6(1)(a)–(d) of the Convention. Please include in this regard information on the number and nature of complaints submitted by foreign and national caregivers with the different authorities, and their outcome. The Committee also asks the Government to continue to provide enforcement statistics on the number and nature of violations of the relevant laws and regulations identified and addressed by the various responsible authorities, including indications as to the sanctions imposed and the main sectors of employment, including construction, agriculture and manufacturing. Noting further the Government's intention to study and internalize, in cooperation with the social partners, the best practices for the treatment of foreign workers in line with the provisions of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to indicate any progress made in this regard.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Italy

Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143) (ratification: 1981)

The Committee notes the communication from the Italian Union of Labour (UIL), submitted on behalf of the UIL, the Italian General Confederation of Labour (CGIL) and the Italian Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions (CISL), and the Government's reply thereto. The Committee also notes the observations by the Italian Confederation of Workers' Trade Unions (CISL) received 23 September 2010. The Committee recalls that some of the issues addressed by UIL had already been raised during the discussion of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2009, and addressed in the Committee's observation of 2009.

Part I. Articles 2, 3, and 6 of the Convention. Addressing migration in abusive conditions, and the employment of workers having migrated in illegal conditions. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, due to the repercussions of the global economic crisis on the Italian economy, the Programmatic Document 2009–11, which included measures to address the exploitation of immigrants, was not adopted and that instead a moratorium was imposed on the entry of non-seasonal, non-European Union (EU) workers in 2009–10. The Committee welcomes the detailed information on the initiatives to address human trafficking into labour and sexual exploitation and refers in this regard to its comments on the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29). The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the legislative framework will be enhanced through the transposition of European Directive 2009/52/EC of 18 June 2009 providing for standards on sanctions and measures against employers of illegally staying third-country nationals (the Sanctions Directive). Considering that such legislative steps are important in the context of the implementation of measures required under Articles 2, 3 and 6 of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to provide information on any developments regarding the adoption of legislation transposing European Directive 2009/52/EC, including a copy of the relevant texts. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on measures to detect and suppress human trafficking and to prosecute those responsible for human trafficking from wherever the country they operate.

Articles 1 and 9. Minimum standards of protection. The Committee recalls the particular vulnerability of migrant workers in an irregular situation to exploitation and violations of their basic human rights. With regard to previously reported human rights violations and exploitative conditions of undocumented workers coming from Africa, Asia and Eastern Europe, the Committee notes the detailed information, including statistics, on the action taken in 2008 and 2009 under the strategic programme of inspections carried out by the Ministry of Labour and Social Policies and under the "Extraordinary inspection plan for agriculture and construction in the regions of Calabria, Campania, Apulia and Sicily", in January 2010. It notes the particular attention paid to the illegal employment of foreign immigrants, especially in the construction and agriculture sectors, marked by a high incidence of labour exploitation of primarily clandestine non-EU workers. Targeted inspections were also carried out between 1 July and 31 December 2009 (Operation Rainbow) for the purpose of checking manufacturing and commercial business activities. The Committee also notes the data on reported offences and the persons denounced regarding organizing and facilitating clandestine migration, and the illegal employment of foreign workers in 2008 and 2009, indicating, however, few reported offences and perpetrators with respect to employment of seasonal foreign workers in an irregular situation, which could suggest difficulties in effectively monitoring conditions of migrants in an irregular situation in seasonal employment, including in agriculture.

The Committee previously expressed concern that section 10bis of Legislative Decree No. 286/1998, introducing the offence of illegal entry or residence, would further marginalize and stigmatize migrant workers in an irregular situation, and increase their vulnerability to exploitation and violation of their basic human rights. It had also noted that section 10bis combined with section 331(19) of the Code of Criminal Proceedings (obliging public officials to report criminal offences) may prevent these migrant workers, in practice, from filing complaints with regard to violations of their rights. The Committee notes the Government's reply that migrant workers in an irregular situation will in all cases, irrespective of any charge of clandestine immigration or expulsion order against them, have the possibility to apply, through a representative, to the judicial authority with a view to obtaining recognition of any rights due to them or to file a criminal complaint concerning conduct which impairs their basic rights. The Committee notes that, since the entry into force of the legislation until 15 April 2010, of the 37,192 foreigners found to be in an irregular situation, 12,775 were expelled and 24,417 foreigners were not repatriated; of those, 22,027 foreigners, were not repatriated due to non-compliance with the expulsion order. The Committee also notes that inspections carried out under the abovementioned programmes, involved local state police stations in procedures for identifying illegally employed nationals of non-EU countries and subsequent repatriation operations. The Committee also notes from the communication by the CISL regarding Convention No. 29, that migrant workers with an irregular status who are victims of labour exploitation tend to either hide from the authorities fearing deportation or being expelled from the country. The Committee also refers to its comments on the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), noting that labour inspections have been mainly focusing on controlling illegal employment and the legal status of migrant workers under immigration law, rather than conditions of work.

The Committee notes that in 2009 and 2010 (until 31 March) 810 and 146 permits were issued "on humanitarian grounds for reasons of social protection" under section 18 of legislative Decree (Consolidated Statute) No. 286/1998 (in 2010, a large number of permits were issued to women from Nigeria (397), China (38), and some eastern European countries; and to men from Egypt (71) and Morocco (68)). However, no data are provided on the number of migrant workers found in an irregular situation who have sought redress from the courts with respect to violations of their basic human rights or rights arising out of past employment, including unpaid wages. It is therefore difficult to assess whether due process is guaranteed, in practice, to migrant workers who are accused of the crime of illegal immigration and who are subject to an expulsion order, with respect to claims regarding rights provided for in Articles 1 and 9 of the Convention.

While acknowledging the difficulties encountered to manage the significant immigration flows and recognizing the Government's efforts to address migration in abusive conditions, including illegal employment, as required by the Convention, the Committee nonetheless emphasizes that, while such measures are justified, it is also essential to ensure that migrant workers enjoy a basic level of protection even if they have immigrated under irregular conditions or are employed illegally and their status cannot be regularized. The Committee notes that no detailed analysis has yet been undertaken of the impact of legislative initiatives to combat irregular migration, including section 10bis, on the human rights of migrant workers in an irregular situation and their equality of treatment in respect of rights arising out of employment, despite explicit requests by the Conference Committee and this Committee. The Committee also notes the Government's statement that the Constitutional Court has not yet pronounced itself on the referral proceedings pending before it concerning the unconstitutionality of section 10bis. The Committee draws the Government's attention to the important role given by the Convention to the social partners, and in particular Article 7 requiring that representative organizations of workers and employers shall be consulted in regard to laws and regulations and other measures provided for in this Convention and designed to prevent and eliminate the abuses against which the Convention is directed.

Emphasizing that access to justice is a basic human right which must be guaranteed to all migrant workers, in law and in practice, the Committee requests the Government to indicate all measures taken to ensure that effective mechanisms are in place to facilitate complaints by migrant workers in an irregular situation and to inform them of their rights and relevant complaints procedures. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the number of migrant workers in an irregular situation, particularly those in the agriculture and construction sectors, that have sought redress regarding violations of their basic human rights or regarding rights due with respect to remuneration and social security benefits, and the outcome of the cases concerned. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on the activities, including detailed statistics on targeted inspections in agriculture and construction, as well as in other sectors, to detect illegal employment of migrants as well as the employment of migrants in abusive conditions of work, and the results achieved. Please indicate how representatives of organizations of workers and employers have been and are being consulted in regard to matters provided for in Part I of the Convention.

Part II. Articles 10 and 12(c) and (e). National policy on equality of opportunity and treatment of migrant workers lawfully in the country. The Committee previously requested the Government to indicate the specific results of the programmes and initiatives to promote equality of opportunity and treatment of migrant workers lawfully in the country with nationals, with a view to eliminating discrimination against them. The Committee notes the approval on 10 June 2010 of the Plan on Integration in Safety – Identity and Dialogue, which, according to the Government, identifies the main lines of action and mechanisms to be adopted with a view to promoting an effective process of immigrant integration combining safety and acceptance. The Plan covers five main areas including education and learning, employment, housing and local government, access to essential services (health and social welfare services) and under-aged and second generation immigration. The Committee notes in this regard the comments by the CISL drawing attention to the discrepancy between the Plan on Integration in Safety – Identity and Dialogue and the existing laws and policies making distinctions between migrant workers and nationals regarding civil, political and social rights, and questioning the Plan's purpose and effectiveness, and lack of budgetary guarantees for its implementation. The Committee further notes that the Department of Civil Liberties and Immigration of the Ministry of Interior has developed a strategy for the use of resources from the European Integration Fund involving a multi-annual programme for the period 2007–13. The Government also provides extensive information on initiatives by the National Office Against Racial Discrimination (UNAR), such as the establishment of territorial anti-discrimination networks and the Memoranda of Understanding in 2009 and 2010, signed with various municipalities and regional authorities in this context, and interventions to support female immigrants at risk of social marginalization. Finally, the Committee notes the institutional awareness, communication and information campaigns on social integration of immigrants developed by the Ministry of Employment and Social Policies in 2008 and 2009, which, after evaluation, appeared to have been useful to almost 90 per cent of the participants. With a view to assessing progress made over time, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on action taken to implement the national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment for migrant workers lawfully in the country, and the results achieved. Please also provide information on the activities carried out under the Plan on Integration in Safety – Identity and Dialogue, and how its effective implementation will be ensured, including in cooperation with the social partners.

Slovenia

Migration for Employment Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 97) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the observations by the Association of Free Trade Unions of Slovenia (AFTUS) annexed to the Government's report.

Article (6)(1)(a)(i) of the Convention. Equality of treatment with respect to conditions of work. The Committee recalls that under the Employment and Work of Aliens Act (and subsequent amendments until Act 52/07), a foreigner with an employment permit could only take up employment with the employer to which the permit for employment was issued; a personal employment permit with three-year validity, which enables free access to the labour market, could be obtained by an alien with vocational education who was continuously employed for the last two years prior to the application at the same employer. The Committee had noted in this regard AFTUS's concern that allowing foreign workers with an employment permit to work only for the employer who obtained their work permit increased the employer's opportunity to exploit migrant workers with respect to working time, payment, rest periods and annual leave. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate how the concern of the dependency of migrant workers with an employment permit on one individual employer was addressed and to examine the conditions of work of migrant workers in those sectors in which they are primarily employed. The Committee notes the Government's indications that due to observance of increased dependency of migrant workers on individual employers, the Act on Employment and Work of Aliens was amended with a view to allowing greater flexibility to obtain a personal employment permit with three-year validity (giving free access to the labour market). The Committee notes that the amended Employment and Work of Aliens Act No. 26/2011 henceforth allows a foreign worker with vocational training or having acquired a national professional qualification in Slovenia who, in the past 24 months has been employed for at least 20 months, to apply for a personal employment permit (section 22(4)). Noting, however, that the law continues to provide that a foreigner with an employment permit can only take up employment with the employer to which the permit for employment was issued (section 10(4)), the Committee asks the Government to clarify how these amendments help reduce, in practice, the worker's dependency on an individual employer and the risk of non-respect of statutory provisions regarding conditions of work. Noting that the information provided on labour inspection services in 2009 covers violations of the Employment and Work of Aliens Law and the Law on the Prevention of Illegal Work and Employment Act, and not conditions of work, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the specific measures taken to ensure full application to migrant workers of the labour law provisions concerning remuneration, hours of work, overtime arrangements, rest periods and annual leave, as well as information on the number and nature of violations found particularly in sectors or occupations employing workers with an employment permit, and an indication of the sanctions imposed.

Article 6(1)(a)(iii). Equal treatment with respect to accommodation. The Committee previously noted concerns raised by AFTUS regarding substandard housing conditions of migrant workers and the need to strengthen supervision in this regard, to impose dissuasive penalties on potential violators and to establish minimum standards of living for migrant workers at the national level. The Committee notes with interest that pursuant to section 13(1) and (2) of the Employment and Work of Aliens Law No. 26/2011 employers who employ foreigners and provide for their accommodation are obliged to meet minimum accommodation and hygiene standards, the terms of which will be set by ministerial regulations. The Committee notes that the rules on setting minimum standards for accommodation of aliens, who are employed or work in the Republic of Slovenia were published in the Official Gazette of the Republic of Slovenia No. 71/2011 and will enter into force as of January 2012. Supervision will be conducted by the labour inspectorate. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of the labour inspectorate to enforce the rules on setting minimum standards for accommodation of aliens, including any violations detected and sanctions imposed, as well as any other measures taken to ensure that migrant workers are not treated less favourably with respect to accommodation.

Article 6(1)(b). Equal treatment with respect to social security. The Committee notes that AFTUS draws attention to section 5 (unemployment benefits) of the Agreement of Social Security between Slovenia and Bosnia and Herzegovina, the implementation of which prevents the majority of the workers from Bosnia and Herzegovina from exercising the right to unemployment benefits as such benefits are subject to permanent residence. The Committee understands that with a view to addressing this issue the Social Security Agreement has been amended, signed by both parties in 2010 and ratified by Slovenia. Noting that the amended Social Security Agreement will enter into force as soon as it is ratified by the Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Committee hopes that the provisions of the modified Agreement will ensure equality of treatment with respect to unemployment benefits in conformity with Article 6(1)(b) of the Convention, and asks the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

The Committee notes the observations by the Association of Free Trade Unions of Slovenia (AFTUS) annexed to the Government's report.

Articles 10, 12(e) and 14(a). Free choice of employment. The Committee previously noted concerns expressed by AFTUS that under the work permit system established by the Employment and Work of Aliens Act (Acts Nos 66/00, 101/05 and 52/07) foreign workers issued with an employment permit did not have the free choice of employment until they met the conditions for obtaining a personal work permit. The Committee notes that the Employment and Work of Aliens Act was further amended in 2009 and 2011 (Acts 46/2009 and 26/2011) and that under the new legislation citizens from the European Union (EU), the European Economic Area (EEA) and Switzerland, as well as foreigners with a permanent residence permit have free access to the labour market. Third-country nationals with a "personal work permit" have free access to the labour market during the three-year validity period while a foreigner with an "employment permit", issued for a maximum of one year, continues to be tied to the employer to whom the permit is issued (section 10(2) and (3)). The employment permit can be renewed or reissued for a period not exceeding one year (section 25(1)). The Committee further notes that pursuant to section 22(3) a foreign worker with vocational training or who has acquired a national professional qualification in Slovenia who, in the past 24 months has been employed for at least 20 months, can apply for a personal employment permit (section 22(4)). The Government indicates in this regard that the foreigner who does not meet the condition of having at least vocational education may be integrated into the procedure of acquiring a national vocational qualification. Section 30(1) allows for some flexibility for foreigners with higher education for whom an employment permit or permit for work has been issued, to be employed by two or more employers. Recalling that Article 14(a) of the Convention allows the State to make the free choice of employment subject to temporary restrictions during a prescribed period not exceeding two years, and that Article 10 provides for the adoption of a national policy on equality of opportunity and treatment including with respect to access to vocational education, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to inform foreign workers with employment permits or permits for work of the possibility of acquiring a national vocational qualification, and provide information on the number of workers that have participated in such training. The Government is also requested to provide information on the number of migrant workers without vocational training or a national vocational qualification who are working under employment permits for a period exceeding two years.

National equality policy and integration of migrant workers in society. The Committee previously noted the need for systematic measures aimed at the integration of migrant workers and their families in society. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Decree on Aliens Integration No. 65/2008 provides for integration programmes intended for third-country nationals residing in Slovenia with a permanent residency permit and their family members, and for third-country nationals who have been residing in Slovenia on the basis of a temporary residence permit for at least two years and whose permit is valid for at least one year, and for their family members. The Committee also notes that a draft Decree amending and supplementing the Decree on Aliens Integration of 23 July 2010 would allow for inclusion in integration programmes of all third-country citizens residing in Slovenia on the basis of a residence permit issued for at least one year and third-country citizens who are family members of Slovenian citizens or EEA citizens residing in Slovenia on the basis of a residency permit, regardless of its duration. The Committee notes that the programmes cover Slovenian language courses and courses on Slovenian history, culture and constitutional arrangements, and that between November 2009 and the end of May 2010, 600 third-country nationals attended. The Government also indicates that programmes have included workshops going beyond intercultural differences and address reasons for and consequences of discrimination and xenophobia. The Committee notes the observations by AFTUS that an effective integration policy of migrants should be based on the earliest possible integration into suitable programmes of integration and social inclusion and that free participation into language programmes and learning about Slovenia culture, history and constitution should be provided to all foreigners, including those with a temporary residence permit for a period less than a year. The Committee further notes that an Alien Integration Council was created in 2008 with a view to a coordinated and effective implementation of the measures for integration of foreigners, but that according to AFTUS the Council does not fulfil its purpose. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the status of the adoption of the draft Decree amending and supplementing the Decree on Aliens Integration of 23 July 2010, and to indicate whether any consideration is being given to the concerns raised by AFTUS regarding the free participation of all foreigners, including those with a residency permit of less than a year in programmes of integration and social inclusion. Please also provide information on the activities of the Alien Integration Council.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 97 (Armenia, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, Guyana, Israel, Nigeria, Slovenia, United Kingdom: British Virgin Islands); Convention No. 143 (Armenia, Guinea, Italy, Slovenia, Uganda).

Seafarers

Algeria

Food and Catering (Ships' Crews) Convention, 1946 (No. 68) (ratification: 1962)

Article 6 of the Convention. System of inspection. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for over 20 years on the subject of the preparation of the implementing texts envisaged by section 435 of the Maritime Code of 1976 to establish the system of inspection of food and catering on board, in accordance with this Article of the Convention. It notes with regret that the Government has still not taken the necessary measures and that it has confined itself to indicating in its last three reports that the Inter-ministerial Order of 15 December 1984 respecting the food provided to seafarers will be revised and completed to take into account the requirements of this Article. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures without further ado for the adoption of legislation giving full effect to this Article of the Convention.

Article 10. Annual report. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been requesting the Government to provide extracts from inspection reports relating specifically to food and catering on board ships, as well as a copy of the annual inspection report published by the competent authority, as required by this Article of the Convention. In the absence of any relevant information in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide full particulars in its next report on: (i) the number of inspectors assigned to carrying out the required inspections relating to food and catering on board ships; and (ii) the number of inspections carried out per year and the results obtained.

The Committee also takes this occasion to recall that most of the provisions of Convention No. 68 have been incorporated into the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), in Regulation 3.2, Standard A3.2 and Guideline B3.2.1, and that compliance with Convention No. 68 would therefore facilitate the implementation of the corresponding provisions of the MLC, 2006. The Committee invites the Government to consider favourably the ratification of the MLC, 2006, in the very near future and requests it to keep the Office informed of any decision taken in this respect.

Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 6 to 17 of the Convention. Crew accommodation. The Committee notes with regret that the Government is still not in a position to indicate any progress in relation to the adoption of texts regulating the application of section 446 of the Maritime Code of 1976, as amended, in terms of which the minister is required to determine the detailed conditions concerning, among other matters, the arrangements and equipment for the accommodation of crews. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention since 1981 to the fact that, unless texts are adopted to implement section 446, the Convention cannot be properly applied. The Government has indicated on several occasions that draft executive decrees were under preparation although, up to now, no definitive text has been communicated to the Office. The Government has also recently indicated that it does not consider the adoption of such a decree to be timely in view of the examination, with a view to its ratification, of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). The Committee recalls once again that the principal provisions of the Convention have been reproduced and further developed in Regulation 3.1 and the corresponding Code of the MLC, 2006, and that compliance with Convention No. 92 would therefore facilitate the implementation of the respective provisions of the MLC, 2006. The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to adopt the necessary measures without further ado to give full effect to the provisions of the Convention.

Barbados

Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108) (ratification: 1967)

Article 2 of the Convention. Seafarers' identity documents. Since 1999, the Committee has been commenting on the Government's failure to apply the Convention and has been requesting it to: (i) reinstate the identity document for seafarers who are Barbadian nationals; (ii) enact new regulations or amend existing ones so that foreign seafarers may enter Barbados with a valid identity document issued pursuant to this Convention; and (iii) provide copies of the relevant legislative and/or regulatory texts ensuring the application of the Convention. In its latest report, the Government indicates that there are no active seafarers employed, no seafarer or shipowner representative organizations and no formal employment agencies. The Government adds that it has not denounced the Convention and that identity documents would be issued in the future if there is demand for them. While noting the explanations regarding the current situation with respect to Barbadian seafarers, the Committee also notes that the Government has not given any indication as to whether foreign seafarers holding identity documents issued pursuant to the Convention are accorded the facilities provided for in that instrument. Under the circumstances, the Committee concludes that the basic requirements of the Convention are still not implemented in either law or practice. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that its obligations under the Convention are fully respected and to inform the Office of all measures taken in this regard.

Costa Rica

Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134) (ratification: 1979)

Article 2 of the Convention. Statistics and investigations of occupational accidents. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been noting in its observations that the national legislation contains no specific provisions on the prevention of accidents to seafarers as prescribed by the Convention. Despite repeated reminders, the Committee notes that no measures have as yet been adopted to give effect to a number of provisions of the Convention. It notes the information supplied by the Government in its last report to the effect that the collection of statistics of all occupational accidents is the job of the National Insurance Institute (INS), not of the labour inspection services or the Ministry of Labour. The Committee notes that section 292 of the Labour Code does entrust the INS with maintaining a system of statistics of occupational risks allowing comparisons with other national or foreign institutions. In this connection, the Committee takes note of the communication from the INS, enclosed with the Government's report, showing that the number of accidents in fishing and related activities stood at 339 in 2006 and 254 in 2007. It notes that the Government also enclosed statistics collected by the INS in previous reports and that, at the time, the Committee pointed out that according to Article 2(3) of the Convention, the statistics must cover the number, nature, causes and consequences of occupational accidents, indicating the department on board ship – for instance deck, engine or catering – and the area – for instance at sea or in port – where the accident occurred. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to provide with its next report statistics drawn up in accordance with the abovementioned rules, concerning occupational accidents on board vessels. It recalls in this connection that Standard A4.3(5) and Guideline B4.3.5 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), which revises Convention No. 134 and 36 other international maritime labour conventions, likewise require detailed statistics to be kept of occupational accidents and diseases.

The Committee furthermore recalls that Article 2 of the Convention requires investigations into the causes and circumstances of occupational accidents resulting in loss of life or serious personal injury, and such other accidents as may be specified in national laws or regulations. It notes that section 214(c) of the Labour Code requires employers to cooperate with the INS to facilitate any inquiries it may conduct in the event of an occupational accident. The Committee asks the Government to provide more detailed information on the compulsory nature of investigations where the occupational accident has resulted in loss of life or serious personal injury, together with any other relevant information on the organization of such investigations in practice. It recalls in this connection that Standard A4.3(5) of the MLC, 2006, requires an investigation to be held in the event of occupational accident and that Guideline B4.3.6 contains detailed provisions on the subjects that might be investigated.

Article 3. Research. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on research currently under way on general trends in occupational accidents on board ship and such hazards as are brought out by statistics.

Articles 4 and 5. Provisions on the prevention of occupational accidents. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 8436 of 10 February 2005 on fisheries and aquaculture, section 162 of which provides that the Costa Rican Fisheries and Aquaculture Institute (INCOPECA), the Ministry of Health and the Costa Rican Social Insurance Fund (CCSS) shall determine in regulations the measures needed to ensure the occupational safety and health of crew members. It also notes that the Act introduces a section 198bis in the Labour Code under which the Council on Safety at Work (CST) is responsible for establishing lists of safety and protection equipment in the fisheries sector. It notes that INCOPECA must ascertain that the observance of national and international safety standards has been certified by the Ministry of Public Works and Transport before processing any applications for the issuance or renewal of fishing permits. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the regulations provided for in section 162 of Act No. 8436 have been adopted, and if so to provide a copy. The Government is also requested to provide information on the procedure for certifying observance of safety rules referred to in new section 198bis of the Labour Code. The Committee furthermore hopes that the Government will in the near future adopt provisions on the prevention of accidents on board vessels assigned to the merchant marine which are not covered by Act No. 8436. In this connection, it draws the Government's attention to the provisions of Regulation 4.3, Standard A4.3 and Guideline B4.3 of the MLC, 2006, which set forth detailed rules on the measures to be prescribed for the prevention of accidents on board ship.

Article 6(1) to (3). Inspections. The Committee notes the publication in 2008 of an updated handbook of labour inspection procedures. It notes that, according to the handbook, the provisions of the Convention are included among the standards whose application must be monitored by the labour inspection services. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the activities conducted by the labour inspection services to enforce the provisions of the Convention and to provide copies of any official reports on the subject. The Government is likewise requested to indicate how it is ensured that inspectors are trained so as to be familiar with maritime employment and its practices, as required by Article 6(3) of the Convention.

Article 7. Occupational safety and health committees. The Committee notes that Decree No. 18379-TSS of 19 July 1988, adopted pursuant to section 288 of the Labour Code, regulates the organization and operation of the occupational health committees to be established in workplaces employing ten or more workers. Noting that in an earlier report the Government stated that, in practice two crew members, together with the ship's master, are responsible for accident prevention, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any provisions in laws or regulations lay down a requirement to establish such committees on ships covered by the Convention. Furthermore, noting that Decree No. 18379-TSS does not apply where the place of work employs fewer than ten workers, it recalls that, according to Article 7 of the Convention, either a suitable committee or a suitable person or suitable persons is to be appointed to be responsible, under the master, for accident prevention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any provisions require the appointment of suitable crew members to be responsible for the prevention of accidents on board where the crew has fewer than ten members. It recalls in this connection that Standard A4.3(2)(d) of the MLC, 2006, requires the establishment of a ship's safety committee on ships where there are five or more seafarers.

Article 8. Programmes for the prevention of occupational accidents. The Committee notes that according to section 281 of the Labour Code, the CST – a technical body reporting to the Ministry of Labour – is required to produce a national occupational health plan for the short, medium and long term. It requests the Government to provide information on any programmes for the prevention of occupational accidents prepared by the CST and to send copies of any reports or other relevant publications on the subject.

Article 9. Training. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government on the efforts undertaken by the INS and the CST for training on occupational safety in the fishing sector. It notes, in particular, that in 2003 and 2005 two workshops were organized with the participation of the ILO Subregional Office at San José. It also notes that the INS intended to organize in 2009 a course for stakeholders in the fishing sector of the Puntarenas region on occupational risk management systems. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on initiatives of this kind that have been implemented and on the measures taken to include instruction in accident prevention and occupational health in the programmes for seafarers organized by vocational training centres. The Government is also requested to indicate the measures taken to draw seafarers' attention to particular hazards, for instance by means of official notices containing relevant instructions.

Furthermore, from information provided by the Government on the occasion of the Hemispheric Conference on the MLC, 2006, organized by the ILO in September 2009, the Committee understands that the merchant fleet of Costa Rica is virtually non-existent and that the fishing fleet consists largely of foreign-registered vessels. It requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on the number and types of ships flying the flag of Costa Rica, whether merchant or fishing vessels.

Egypt

Shipowners' Liability (Sick and Injured Seamen) Convention, 1936 (No. 55) (ratification: 1982)

Article 11 of the Convention. Equality of treatment for all seafarers. The Committee recalls that since the ratification of the Convention by Egypt in 1982, it has been commenting on section 2(b) of Social Insurance Act No. 79 of 1975, which makes the equality of treatment of seafarers dependent upon reciprocity, contrary to this provision of the Convention. The Committee also recalls that the Merchant Shipping Code (Act No. 8 of 1990), sections 126–128 of which give effect to basic requirements of the Convention, does not appear to establish any similar distinction based on nationality, residence or race. Despite the Government's numerous reassurances that the Social Insurance Act would be amended, the Committee notes with regret that the Government is still not in a position to indicate any concrete progress on this matter. The Committee again expresses the hope that the Government will not fail to take – as a matter of priority – the necessary measures to amend its legislation in order to ensure that the provisions of the Convention are applied to foreigners even in the absence of a reciprocal agreement and whatever the length of their contract of employment.

Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92) (ratification: 1982)

Articles 6 to 17 of the Convention. Crew accommodation requirements. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on the need to adopt laws or regulations implementing the specific requirements of Parts II, III and IV of the Convention. In its last report, the Government merely indicates that it is currently considering the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and that consequently relevant legislation on crew accommodation will be drafted. While noting the Government's intention to ratify the MLC, 2006, the Committee is bound to observe that at present the national legislation does not give effect to any of the technical accommodation standards set out in Articles 6 to 17 of the Convention, such as those on minimum floor area of sleeping rooms, size of berths, lighting, ventilation, heating, mess rooms, sanitary facilities and hospital accommodation. The Committee also recalls that a legislative gap analysis, which was prepared in 2010 with the support of the Office with a view to assisting the Government with its preparations for the ratification of the MLC, 2006, similarly concluded that in a possible amendment to the Maritime Law No. 8 of 1990, provision should be made for practically every aspect of crew accommodation contained in Title 3 of the MLC, 2006. The Committee further observes that most of the provisions of Convention No. 92 have been consolidated in Regulation 3.1, Standard A3.1 and Guideline B3.1 of the MLC, 2006, and therefore ensuring compliance with Convention No. 92 will facilitate the implementation of the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all necessary steps without further delay in order to bring its maritime legislation into conformity with the requirements of this Convention and that in doing so it will also seek to ensure compliance with the accommodation standards of Title 3 of the MLC, 2006. The Committee also requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further progress made in the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Investigation of maritime occupational accidents. The Committee has been drawing for many years the Government's attention to the fact that most of the legal texts that the Government refers to as implementing the Convention do not lay down the specific measures to be taken for the prevention of accidents that are peculiar to maritime employment, and that they are consequently not sufficient to give effect to all the provisions of this Convention. In this connection, the Committee notes that in its last report, the Government indicates that the Higher Consultative Council on Occupational Health and Safety and Security of the Work Environment is only competent to design policies on occupational health and safety at the workplace but it is not responsible for investigating occupational accidents. Recalling that under Article 2(1) of the Convention, the competent authority is required to take measures to ensure that occupational accidents are adequately reported and investigated and comprehensive statistics kept and analysed, the Committee hopes that the Government will consider appropriate action in order to give full effect to this requirement of the Convention. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that the same requirement is incorporated in Standard A4.3(1)(d) and (5)(c) of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006).

Article 2(3). Collection of detailed statistics. Further to its previous comment, the Committee notes the Government's indication that detailed statistics showing the number, nature, causes and effects of on-board occupational accidents will be provided as soon as the Government receives them from the authorities concerned. Recalling that five years have elapsed since that information was requested, the Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to collect and transmit all relevant statistical data, as prescribed by this Article of the Convention. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that the same requirement is incorporated in Standard A4.3(5)(b) and Guideline B4.3.5 of the MLC, 2006.

Article 4(3). Adoption of laws and regulations on health and safety protection and accident prevention. The Committee notes the Government's reference to Order No. 211 of 2003 on safety limits, conditions and requirements for the prevention of physical, mechanical, biological and chemical hazards and those with negative effects and ensuring security of the work environment. The Committee observes, however, that this instrument sets out certain safety and health standards of a general nature, and accordingly does not cover most of the subjects listed in Article 4(3) of the Convention, such as structural features of the ship, special measures on and below deck, anchors, chains and lines, dangerous cargo and ballast or personal protective equipment for seafarers. The Committee again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to give effect to this provision of the Convention. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that the obligation for each ratifying member State to adopt specific laws and regulations setting standards for health and safety protection and accident prevention on board ships that fly its flag is now reflected in Regulation 4.3(3), Standard A4.3(1), (2)(a) and (3) and Guideline B4.3.1(2) of the MLC, 2006.

Article 7. Accident prevention committees. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Order No. 985 of 2003 only refers to the High Consultative Council on Occupational Health and Safety and Security of the Work Environment but does not address the question of establishing committees on accident prevention on board vessels. The Government further explains that the Labour Code does not contain any relevant provisions as this is the responsibility of the General Maritime Safety Authority of the Ministry of Transport. Recalling that the Government has not been in a position to specify whether and how this provision of the Convention is given effect in national law and practice, the Committee once more asks the Government to indicate the legal provisions, if any, for the appointment of suitable crew members, or of suitable committees, responsible under the authority of the master for accident prevention on board Egyptian-registered vessels. The Committee recalls, in this regard, that a similar requirement for the establishment of safety committees on board all vessels with five or more seafarers is incorporated in Standard A4.3(2)(d) of the MLC, 2006.

Guinea

Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134) (ratification: 1977)

Article 2 of the Convention. Prevention of occupational accidents. For many years, the Committee has been asking the Government to indicate the specific instruments that govern the prevention of occupational accidents of seafarers. The Government has so far indicated that appropriate regulatory texts were in preparation and would be reviewed with the technical assistance of the ILO to ensure their compliance with the provisions of the Convention. In its last report, the Government refers only to the provisions of the Labour Code and Merchant Shipping Code, noting that they provide for the adoption of regulations on occupational safety and health. The Government further indicates that the authorities responsible for framing and supervising maritime regulations were also to draft a whole series of texts in this area. The Committee emphasizes that Guinea ratified this Convention more than 30 years ago. It also points out that the provisions of the national legislation are general in nature and do not always ensure that full effect is given to the requirements of the Convention. Consequently, the Committee once again asks the Government to adopt legislative texts giving full effect to the Convention and requests it to provide copies of them as soon as these texts have been enacted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Iraq

Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck) Convention, 1920 (No. 8) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Unemployment indemnity in the event of shipwreck. The Committee notes the Government's succinct report indicating that the points that the Committee has been raising for many years will be dealt with in the context of the new maritime legislation which is currently being drafted. The Committee understands that the Minister of Transportation has approved in May 2010 the final draft of the Maritime Authority Act for the purpose of organizing and developing the maritime sector as well as keeping pace with international standards with regard to safety, environmental protection, and seafarers' conditions of employment. The Committee also understands that initiatives are under way with a view to rebuilding the Iraqi merchant fleet. The Committee requests the Government to specify how the Committee's comments in connection with the payment of unemployment indemnity in the event of shipwreck have been reflected in the new maritime legislation. It also requests the Government to transmit a copy of the new maritime legislation once it has been adopted.

Moreover, the Committee recalls that the main provisions of the Convention are now reflected in Regulation 2.6 and the corresponding Code of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), which requires the payment of compensation in the event of the ship's loss or foundering not only for the resulting unemployment but also for injury or loss. The Committee considers, therefore, that compliance with Convention No. 8 will facilitate the implementation of the respective provisions of the MLC, 2006. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Lebanon

Article 2 of the Convention. Unemployment indemnity in the event of the ship's loss or foundering. The Committee recalls that, practically since the time of ratification of the Convention, it has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to adopt implementing legislation. The Committee notes the Government's statements that the application of the Convention is generally not satisfactory, and that there are no specific provisions in the Code of Maritime Commerce defining the term "loss or foundering of a vessel" or dealing with unemployment indemnity of seafarers in case of shipwreck. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that these issues will be addressed through joint meetings with relevant official departments, and shipowners' and seafarers' organizations. The Committee also notes that, according to the Ministry of Public Works and Transport, seafarers are paid, in practice, an indemnity of two months' wages when income is lost due to the sinking of a ship. Noting that, despite its comments over the past 15 years, the national legislation still does not give effect to the requirements of the Convention, the Committee asks the Government to take all appropriate measures without further delay in order to incorporate the provisions of the Convention into the Code of Maritime Commerce.

Moreover, the Committee reiterates its observation, which it has been repeating for several years, that section 161 of the Code of Maritime Commerce authorizes courts to reduce or withdraw a seafarer's wages if it is proved that the shipwreck is due to the fault or negligence of the seafarer, or if the seafarer did not do everything within the seafarer's power to save the vessel, passengers and goods or to salvage the wreck. The Committee once again notes that these restrictions are not authorized or contemplated by the Convention, and therefore requests the Government to amend the Code of Maritime Commerce accordingly.

Finally, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of the Convention have been incorporated in Regulation 2.6, Standard A2.6 and Guideline B2.6 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and therefore ensuring compliance with the Convention would facilitate compliance with the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Seafarers' Pensions Convention, 1946 (No. 71) (ratification: 1993)

Articles 2 to 4 of the Convention. Pension scheme for seafarers. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to adopt legislation implementing the requirements of the Convention. More concretely, the Committee has requested the Government to take the necessary measures in order to introduce into either the Merchant Shipping Code or the Social Security Act provisions establishing a pension scheme for seafarers on retirement from sea service. The Government's earlier indications were that it was in the process of preparing draft texts regulating the seafarers' pension scheme, in consultation with the Association of Lebanese Shipowners and the Federation of Maritime Transport Unions. However, in its last report, received in November 2010, the Government states that nothing has been done with regard to the implementation of the Convention or the adoption of executive decrees and measures concerning Lebanese workers employed on board Lebanese-registered vessels. Noting therefore that the Convention in its entirety is still not applied in practice, and that no progress has been made for more than 15 years, the Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. Implementing legislation. The Committee has been requesting the Government, since soon after the ratification of the Convention, to specify the legislative or administrative provisions giving effect to the detailed technical requirements of the Convention. The Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that, to date, there is no legislation or administrative regulations applying the provisions of the Convention. The Government also states that the shipowners and the Union of Seafarers have not been informed of any applicable laws or regulations as the administration has not issued any instructions giving effect to the Convention. Moreover, the Government indicates that there is no general appreciation of the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice since no inspection has been carried out on Lebanese ships with respect to accommodation requirements. Under the present circumstances, the Committee concludes that the Convention is not applied in either law or practice. Recalling that Article 4 of the Convention requires that the competent authority undertakes to maintain in force laws or regulations which ensure its application, the Committee asks the Government to take, without further delay, all appropriate measures in order to bring the national legislation into line with the provisions of the Convention. Moreover, recalling that under Article 3 of the Convention a ratifying member State undertakes to comply with the provisions of Parts II and III of the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92), the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to the requirements of Articles 4 (submission of plans of crew accommodation before ship construction or alteration), 5 (inspection following registration, substantial alteration or reconstruction, or complaint), 6 (fire prevention), 7 (ventilation), 8 (heating) and 13 (fresh water supplies) of that Convention.

Finally, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of Conventions Nos 92 and 133 on crew accommodation have been incorporated without significant changes in Title 3 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and therefore ensuring compliance with these Conventions would facilitate the implementation of the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of any further developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Liberia

Minimum Age (Sea) Convention (Revised), 1936 (No. 58) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2 of the Convention. Minimum age for access to maritime employment. The Committee has for the last 15 years been drawing the Government's attention to section 326 of the Maritime Law which sets 15 years as the minimum age for admission to maritime employment but does not expressly limit possible exceptions to persons of not less than 14 years of age, as required by Article 2(2) of the Convention. In its last report, the Government indicates that as part of the ongoing process of implementing the requirements of the ratified Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), it is considering amendments to the Maritime Law and the Liberian Maritime Regulations. The Government specifies, for instance, that under draft Regulation 10.326 (RLM-108), no person below the age of 16 may be employed on a Liberian-registered vessel, a ship's cook must be at least 18 years old, and night work is prohibited for seafarers under the age of 18 – all of which are consistent with Standards A1.1(1), (2) and A3.2(8) of the MLC, 2006. The Government also refers to a draft amendment of section 326 (RLM-107) which purports to allow persons under the age of 15 to be employed on board vessels upon which only members of the same family are employed, school ships and training ships. The Committee is obliged to recall, in this respect, that contrary to Article 2(2) of this Convention, Regulation 1.1(2) and Standard A1.1(1) of the MLC, 2006, explicitly prohibit the employment, engagement or work on board a ship of any person under the age of 16. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to take all appropriate steps in order to ensure that any amendment of section 326 of the Maritime Law is fully consistent with the provisions of the MLC, 2006, which revises Convention No. 58, as well as 36 other international maritime labour conventions. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any progress on this matter and to transmit copies of the revised Maritime Law and Regulations once they have been adopted.

Luxembourg

The Committee notes with interest that on 20 September 2011 Luxembourg ratified the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006). The entry into force for Luxembourg of the MLC, 2006, will result in the denunciation of, inter alia, the present Convention. Pending the entry into force of the MLC, 2006, however, the Committee will continue to examine the conformity of national legislation with the relevant requirements of the present Convention. In this regard, the Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2(a) and (b) of the Convention. Inspection. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt the legislative texts that will give effect to the provisions of the Convention or to indicate the collective agreements that address the following points: preparation and application of regulations concerning food and water supplies; catering; construction; location; ventilation; heating; lighting; water systems and equipment of galleys; storerooms and refrigerated chambers; or for the storage, handling and preparation of food.

Article 7. Inspection at sea. The Committee once again requests the Government to adopt and indicate the texts giving effect to the obligation to provide for inspection at sea.

Article 9(1). Powers of inspectors. The Committee notes that the legislation in force makes no provision for inspectors to be given authority to make recommendations with a view to the improvement of the standard of catering. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in this regard.

Article 12. Information. The Government is once again requested to provide information on the measures taken to give effect to this Article.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

New Zealand

Continuity of Employment (Seafarers) Convention, 1976 (No. 145) (ratification: 1980)

Article 2 of the Convention. National policy to promote continuous employment for seafarers. The Committee has been requesting the Government to provide concrete information on specific measures which might be part of a national policy for the promotion of continuous or regular employment for qualified seafarers, as prescribed by this Article of the Convention. The Government in its previous reports has stated that continuous or regular employment is an issue for individual or collective bargaining. However, to date, the Government has not provided copies of any collective agreement for the maritime sector containing clauses designed to achieve the objectives of the Convention. With specific reference to "employment protection provisions" introduced by the Employment Relations Act, as amended in 2004, with a view to protecting employees in case of restructuring, the Government states that it is unable to determine the number of seafarers covered by such provisions due to technical reasons. The Committee once again draws the Government's attention to its obligation under Article 2 of the Convention to put in place, with due regard to the special characteristics and needs of the maritime industry, a national policy to encourage continuous or regular employment for seafarers, and accordingly requests it to provide more detailed explanations about the scope and content of such policy.

Article 3. Registers of seafarers. The Committee recalls its previous comment in which it noted that, while the establishment of a register of seafarers is not explicitly required under the Convention, it is identified as one of the possible means to achieve a national policy encouraging continuous or regular employment for qualified seafarers. The Committee notes, in this regard, the new comments made by the New Zealand Council of Trade Unions (NZCTU), according to which: (a) maritime unions provide an ad hoc registration service for seafarers seeking work where they can, but this does not capture all eligible seafarers, nor do all employers contact the unions; (b) seafarers tend not to register with the Government for the unemployment benefit so they may not be listed on a government beneficiary register for unemployed jobseekers; and (c) government career and job vacancy services have no specific category for registering seafarers.

In its reply, the Government refers to Work and Income, i.e. the agency of the Ministry of Social Development that provides employment services and social security benefits for those looking for work. The Government adds that Work and Income supports a wide range of employment-related training programmes that assist jobseekers to meet the entry-level requirements of relevant occupations. The Government further indicates that Work and Income entered in November 2008 into a relationship agreement with the New Zealand Shipping Federation on the basis of which it has conducted recruitment campaigns for specific shipping companies.

For its part, the NZCTU considers that Work and Income does not provide a full range of employment services and that it does not have active engagement with shipowners seeking seafarer workers. The NZCTU also maintains that the Government through the Accredited Employers system of the Immigration Service (NZIS) facilitates the hiring of seafarers from overseas instead of supporting the hiring of unemployed or underemployed New Zealand seafarers, thus acting contrary to the spirit of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to further clarify how it is ensured that the specificity of maritime employment is duly taken into account in designing and delivering employment services.

Finally, the Committee wishes to recall that Convention No. 145, together with 36 other international maritime labour Conventions, is revised by the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), which, in Regulation 2.8, Standard A2.8 and Guideline B2.8, shifts the emphasis from continuity of employment to encouragement of employment opportunities and promotion of career and skill development. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Nicaragua

Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck) Convention, 1920 (No. 8) (ratification: 1934)

Article 1(1) of the Convention. Scope of application – Definition of the term “seafarer”. The Committee has been drawing the Government’s attention for a number of years to the need to take measures to ensure the application of the Convention to masters and officers, who are currently excluded from the definition of “maritime workers” under section 161 of the Labour Code. In its last report, the Government again states that masters and officers having an employment relationship with an employer qualify as workers. The Committee observes, however, that section 163 of the Labour Code to which reference is made in the Government’s report, expressly refers to “maritime workers” – a term that is defined in section 161 to mean all persons employed on board a ship with the exception of masters and officers. The Committee is therefore bound to conclude that, in its current reading, Chapter III of Title VIII Special Labour Conditions of the Labour Code (sections 161 to 166) implements only partially the basic requirement of the Convention. The Committee expresses once more the hope that the Government, in accordance with the assurances given in an earlier report, will consider the possibility of amending section 161 of the Labour Code with a view to bringing it into full conformity with the Convention, or envisage other measures, for instance a suitable amendment to the Maritime Transport Act (Act No. 399 of 2001) and its Regulations (Decree No. 4877 of 2006), in order to ensure that masters and officers are entitled to unemployment indemnity in the event of shipwreck, as prescribed by the Convention.

Article 2(2). Payment of the unemployment indemnity. In the absence of the Government’s reply, the Committee is obliged to reiterate that section 166 of the Labour Code gives only partial effect to Article 2(2) of the Convention since it provides for the payment of an indemnity in general terms without specifying neither the nature of the indemnity nor the conditions under which it is granted. The Committee recalls that the Convention requires that the unemployment indemnity due to the seafarer in every case of the loss or foundering of the vessel be paid for the days during which the seafarer remains in fact unemployed, for a period of at least two months. The Committee therefore again asks the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the rate and duration of the unemployment indemnity payable to seafarers in case of shipwreck are specified in accordance with the requirements of this Article of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of the Convention have been incorporated in Regulation 2.6, Standard A2.6 and Guideline B2.6 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and therefore ensuring compliance with the Convention would facilitate compliance with the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Nigeria

The Committee notes with regret that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Investigation into occupational accidents. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to supply copies of relevant extracts of reports of inquiry into occupational accidents, as well as samples of statistics compiled in conformity with the provisions of this Article, drawing the attention of the Government to the obligation of the competent authority to ensure that, in accordance with Article 2(1) and (2) of the Convention, all occupational accidents are adequately reported, that comprehensive statistics shall not be limited to fatalities or to accidents involving the ship, and that statistics of accidents are kept and analysed. Taking into account the Government's indication that accidents on board ships had been reported only when the ship sustained structural damage or when there had been loss of life or serious injury, the Committee earlier expressed the hope that records of minor accidents kept by private and government shipping companies would be integrated into reporting procedures and statistics. The Committee notes that no such information has been provided by the Government. The Committee asks the Government to indicate measures taken to give effect to this Article and to supply copies or relevant extracts of investigation reports of occupational accidents, as well as statistics compiled in accordance with the provisions of the Convention.

Article 3. Research. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking into consideration the Government's indication that the necessary measures would be undertaken for research to be conducted into the causes and prevention of accidents aboard Nigerian ships, expressed the hope that such research would be carried out and that the Government would provide detailed information on progress made in this respect. The Committee once again asks the Government to supply information on any research undertaken into general trends and hazards revealed by statistics, in order to provide a sound basis for the prevention of accidents which are due to particular hazards specific to maritime work.

Articles 4 and 5. Occupational accident prevention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to supply information concerning provisions adopted or contemplated in order to prevent occupational accidents and covering the specific field of stage and mooring ropes (Article 4(3)(h)) as well as the various matters listed in Article 4(3)(a), (b), (c), (d) and (i). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its latest report that the Merchant Shipping (Life-saving Appliances) Rules 1967 provide for occupational accident prevention standards and deal extensively with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to supply detailed information on any provisions related to the prevention of occupational accidents of seafarers and the specific obligations of shipowners and seafarers in this respect, as required under Articles 4 and 5 of the Convention.

Article 7. Accident prevention committees. The Committee asked the Government to supply a copy of a statutory instrument establishing the responsibility of national surveyors and engineers, who are crew members, to conduct inspections on board ships, and the duties of a safety or accident committee on board, chaired by the Master, with the Chief Engineer, the Chief Officer, the Second Engineer and the Radio Officer as members. The Committee again requests the Government to supply a copy of any legal text which may have been adopted to give effect to this Article.

Articles 8 and 9. Programmes and instructions in accident prevention. In previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide details concerning the tripartite establishment and implementation of programmes for the prevention of occupational accidents (Article 8) and the inclusion of instruction in accident prevention and health protection in employment in the curricula of vocational training institutions for all categories and grades of seafarers (Article 9(1)). The Committee again requests the Government to provide information on: (i) programmes which have been undertaken for the prevention of occupational accidents, indicating the manner in which the cooperation and participation of shipowners, seafarers, and their organizations are assured; and (ii) measures ensuring the inclusion, as part of the instruction in professional duties of all categories and grades of seafarers, of instruction in the prevention of accidents and in the protection of health in employment.

Moreover, the Committee understands that a new Merchant Shipping Act 2007 has been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this Merchant Shipping Act repeals any relevant provisions of the Merchant Shipping (Life-saving Appliances) Rules 1967, and to identify any new provisions which give effect to the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Panama

Shipowners' Liability (Sick and Injured Seamen) Convention, 1936 (No. 55) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes that Panama has ratified the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), whose entry into force will entail the automatic denunciation of Convention No. 55. However, pending the entry into force of the MLC, 2006, the Committee will continue to examine the conformity of national legislation with the requirements of the present Convention. The Committee recalls that the main provisions of the Convention have been incorporated in Regulation 4.2 and the corresponding Code of the MLC, 2006, and that therefore compliance with the Convention will facilitate the implementation of the relevant requirements of the MLC, 2006.

Article 5 of the Convention. Payment of wages. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention for a number of years to section 89 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 26 February 1998 concerning work at sea and on navigable waterways which provides for the payment of wages to seafarers remaining on board only in the event of sickness, but not in the event of injury, as prescribed by this Article of the Convention. Recalling that the same requirement has been incorporated in Standard A4.2(3) of the MLC, 2006, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to give full effect to this provision of the Convention. The Committee has also been commenting on two other inconsistencies of the same section of Legislative Decree No. 8, namely the limitation of the shipowner's liability to pay wages (i) until the seafarer's contract of employment expires, and (ii) in the case of passenger ships engaged in international voyages, up to a period not exceeding 30 days. The Government had previously indicated that it was in the process of adopting regulations implementing Legislative Decree No. 8 and that the above provisions would be amended accordingly. Noting that no progress has been made on this matter, and recalling that Standard A4.2(4) of the MLC, 2006, lays down the shipowner's obligation to pay wages for a period of at least 16 weeks in respect of a sick or injured seafarer no longer on board (irrespective of the expiry of the seafarer's contract of employment or the type of vessel on which he or she is engaged), the Committee asks the Government to take appropriate action in order to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Article 7(1). Funeral expenses. The Committee has been requesting the Government to modify section 90 of Legislative Decree No. 8 which in its current reading limits the shipowner's obligation to pay burial expenses only in the case of death occurring on shore provided that at the time of death the person concerned was still receiving medical care at the shipowner's expense. Despite the Government's assurances that the regulations implementing Legislative Decree No. 8 would address this point, no concrete progress has yet been made. Recalling that Standard A4.2(1)(d) of the MLC, 2006 establishes the obligation of the shipowner to defray burial expenses in the case of death occurring ashore during the period of engagement, but also on board irrespective of the cause, the Committee requests the Government to take appropriate action in order to align the national legislation with the requirements of the Convention on this point.

Sickness Insurance (Sea) Convention, 1936 (No. 56) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee notes that Panama has ratified the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), whose entry into force will entail the automatic denunciation of Convention No. 56. In the meantime, however, the Committee will continue to examine the application of Convention No. 56 by Panama.

Article 1 of the Convention. Compulsory sickness insurance scheme for seafarers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that resolution No. 1348-83 J.D. of 1983, which was the subject of previous comments, has been repealed further to the promulgation of Act No. 51 of 27 December 2005 reforming the Organic Act establishing the Social Security Fund (CSS). It requests the Government to send a copy of the law or regulation repealing this resolution. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, under the terms of section 77 of Act No. 51, all workers employed in Panama, whether nationals or foreigners, must be affiliated to the CSS. It notes resolution No. 39489 of 23 March 2007, implementing Act No. 51, section 87 of which states that seafarers employed on board vessels assigned to domestic service are obliged to be affiliated to the CSS and section 88 of which establishes the possibility for seafarers employed on board vessels assigned to international service to be affiliated to the Fund under a voluntary social security scheme. With reference to its previous observation, the Committee recalls that, under the terms of Article 1(1) of the Convention, every person employed on board any vessel, other than a ship of war, registered in the territory of Panama and engaged in maritime navigation or sea-fishing, must be insured under a compulsory sickness insurance scheme. Therefore, the distinction made by the legislation of Panama between vessels assigned to domestic service and those assigned to international service is not permitted under this provision of the Convention. The Committee accordingly hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps as soon as possible to adopt legislative provisions requiring compulsory affiliation to the CSS for all seafarers employed on board vessels flying the Panamanian flag, regardless of whether they are assigned to domestic or international service, the only exceptions being those provided for by Article 1(2) of the Convention.

Articles 2(4) and 3(3). Withholding of sickness benefit payments. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in reply to its previous comment, including further details concerning the employer's obligations with regard to the payment of social security benefits in cases where the employer has failed to affiliate one of his or her employees to the CSS or pay the corresponding contributions. It recalls that benefits in kind (medical care) and daily allowances must be provided by the competent social security institution to persons covered by the Convention, and that failure by the employer to pay social security contributions is not one of the exceptions for which the payment of benefits may be withheld, as listed in Articles 2(4) and 3(3) of the Convention. Noting the Government's indication that it is currently not possible to reach a consensus among the social partners with a view to revising the labour and social security legislation in force, the Committee hopes that efforts will be made in the near future to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point. It also underlines the importance of the monitoring measures aimed at ensuring the regular payment of social security contributions by shipowners, which is recalled in Guideline B4.5(7) of the MLC, 2006.

Peru

Sickness Insurance (Sea) Convention, 1936 (No. 56) (ratification: 1962)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Cash benefits under compulsory sickness insurance scheme. Further to its previous observation, the Committee notes the adoption of Resolution SBS No. 14707-2010 of 15 November 2010 concerning the dissolution of the Fishers' Social Benefits and Social Security Fund (CBSSP). The Government had previously indicated that cash benefits to fishers affiliated to the CBSSP were paid directly by the employers, which nonetheless implied the absence of a sickness insurance scheme administered by a self-governing institution, as required under this Convention. Following the dissolution of the CBSSP, the Committee requests the Government to indicate how it ensures in practice the payment, under all circumstances, of cash benefits for a minimum period of the first 26 weeks of incapacity and also to detail any measures taken or planned for reorganizing and operating an insurance institution responsible for providing the benefits prescribed by the Convention.

In addition, the Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), which were transmitted to the Government on 28 September 2010, concerning the absence of legislative provisions guaranteeing the payment of cash benefits for at least the first 26 weeks of incapacity and also the Government's failure to engage in nationwide consultations with a view to addressing the problems of social security in the fishing sector. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in reply to the observations of the CGTP.

Representation made under article 24 of the Constitution. The Committee notes that at its 310th Session (March 2011), the Governing Body set up a committee to examine the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the Autonomous Confederation of Peruvian Workers (CATP) alleging non-observance by Peru of the Seafarers' Pensions Convention, 1946 (No. 71). In accordance with its usual practice, the Committee has decided to suspend its examination of the application of this Convention, in particular Article 3(2) of the Convention concerning the collective financing of benefits, pending the adoption by the Governing Body of the conclusions and recommendations of the above committee.

Article 3(1) of the Convention. Minimum level of pensions. The Committee recalls its previous observation in which it requested the Government to explain how it ensured the application of Article 3(1)(a)(ii) of the Convention in view of the fact that under the private pension system (SPP) it is not possible to determine the amount of benefits in advance. In its report submitted in 2009, the Government made reference to a system of a minimum pension, introduced by Act No. 27617 of 2001, which permits SPP affiliates to receive a minimum pension provided that they are born on 31 December 1945 at the latest and have contributed to the pension fund for at least 20 years. However, this possibility being limited to a certain number of beneficiaries, the Committee is obliged to reiterate that the current private pension system is not in conformity with this Article of the Convention which requires the State to guarantee the minimum level of pensions established by the Convention to workers having completed the prescribed period of sea service. The Committee once again asks the Government to take appropriate measures in order to give full effect to the requirements of Article 3(1) of the Convention. In this connection, the Committee also asks the Government to refer to its comments made under the Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1952 (No. 102).

Part VI of the report form. Observations of workers' organizations. With regard to the observations submitted in October 2006 by the Federation of Fishing Workers of Peru (FETRAPEP) concerning the difficulties fishers encounter in receiving old-age benefits because of the suspension of their contracts during the veda period every year (closed season for extraction and processing of marine species), the Committee notes the Government's reference to Ministerial Resolution No. 308-2009-PCM of 9 July 2009 establishing a multi-sectoral working group responsible for analyzing possible solutions to the claims put forward by different organizations of pensioners and retired workers. The Government indicates that the problems raised by FETRAPEP will be addressed within the framework of that working group. The Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of the outcome of the working group discussions and any practical solution implemented or envisaged with regard to the issues raised by FETRAPEP.

Moreover, the Committee notes the comments of the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP), received on 2 September 2009 and transmitted to the Government on 16 November 2009, concerning the administration of pension funds by the SPP. According to CGTP, as much as 42 per cent of pension funds are invested in the stock exchange while more than 8 billion Peruvian nuevos soles (PEN) (approximately US$2.9 billion) have already been lost due to the world financial crisis. The Committee requests the Government to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the CGTP.

Poland

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. National policy to encourage continuous employment for seafarers. The Committee notes that the Government has drafted a new Maritime Labour Act which will give effect to the requirements of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and which was to come into force in January 2011. The Committee also notes the comments made by the Polish Shipowners' Association (PSA) and the National Maritime Section of the Independent and Self-Governing Trade Union "Solidarność" (NSZZ) relating to the application of the Convention. Both organizations deplore a general lack of incentives to promote continuity of employment for qualified seafarers. The NSZZ considers that one of the main priorities of the Government's maritime policy is to increase the number of qualified seafarers without any guarantees of employment. In addition, the NSZZ denounces the Government's silence on practices such as the employment of persons under foreign laws on board Polish-flagged vessels and the lack of information concerning the conditions of employment and insurance coverage applicable to them. Moreover, the NSZZ alludes to practices whereby unemployed seafarers are fraudulently presented as taking unpaid leave and therefore not entitled to unemployment benefits. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the content and aims of the national policy designed to promote continuous or regular employment for qualified seafarers and to transmit any comments it may wish to make in response to the observations of the NSZZ. It also requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any development regarding the finalization of the new Maritime Labour Act and to transmit a copy once it has been adopted.

Article 7 and Part V of the report form. Means of implementation of the Convention – Application in practice. The Committee notes the statistical information provided by the PSA, according to which there are currently 14 vessels flying the Polish flag and employing 500 seafarers, while a total of 35,000 seafarers of Polish nationality are employed on board foreign-flagged vessels. Given the promotional character of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to provide up-to-date information on concrete labour policy measures through which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for instance: (i) any initiatives, action plans or other incentives drawn up in consultation with shipowners' and seafarers' organizations and designed to help seafarers strengthen their competencies and promote employment in the maritime sector, as well as the results obtained; (ii) full particulars on specific programmes or activities for the vocational guidance of seafarers, including ongoing training schemes, and the results obtained; (iii) comparative statistics on the evolution of the total number of seafarers in recent years and of the unemployment rate in the maritime sector; (iv) facts and figures concerning seafarers' employment trends, especially in light of the generally reported shortage of officers with high qualifications and experience; (v) copies of applicable collective agreements; (vi) sample copies of different types of seafarers' employment contracts that may be currently in use, both for nationals and foreign seafarers; (vii) details on unemployment benefits for seafarers and the maintenance of registers by recruitment agencies or employment services.

Finally, the Committee wishes to recall that Convention No. 145, together with 36 other international maritime labour Conventions, is revised by the MLC, 2006, which, in Regulation 2.8, Standard A2.8 and Guideline B2.8, shifts the emphasis from continuity of employment to encouragement of employment opportunities and promotion of career and skill development. Recalling the 2007 European Union Council decision authorizing Member States to ratify the MLC, 2006, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Russian Federation

Articles 6 to 15 of the Convention. Crew accommodation requirements. The Committee recalls that, in its report submitted in 2002, the Government had indicated that the maritime legislation in force did not contain specific provisions giving effect to several Articles of the Convention. In subsequent reports, the Government had stated that the Sanitary Rules for seagoing vessels approved by the USSR Chief Medical Officer No. 2641-82 of 25 December 1982 were under consideration for revision with a view to addressing the points raised by the Committee. In its last report, the Government limits itself to reiterating that the Russian Health Ministry is now drafting new health regulations for marine vessels. The Committee is bound to observe that, with the exception of a simple reference to the shipowner's obligation to provide appropriate accommodation (cabins, mess rooms, sanitary rooms, medical stations and recreation rooms) in section 60 of the Merchant Shipping Code, the maritime legislation in force fails to implement a considerable number of substantive requirements of the Convention. The Committee regrets that to date no concrete progress has been made with respect to the revision of the Sanitary Rules for seagoing vessels and accordingly asks the Government to take all necessary action in order to ensure the application of the following Articles of the Convention: Article 6(2), (4), (7), (9) and (10) concerning materials used in sleeping rooms; Article 9(1)–(5) on lighting; Article 10(1), (3)–(6) and (8)–(28) concerning size, equipment and occupancy of sleeping rooms; Article 11(2)–(7), (9) and (10) on mess room accommodation; Article 13(1)–(3), (9), (11)(d) and (e) on sanitary accommodation; Article 14(1), (2) and (4)–(7) on hospital accommodation; and Article 15 on special protective equipment. The Committee also requests the Government to refer to its comments made under the Accommodation of Crews (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1970 (No. 133).

Moreover, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of Convention No. 92 have been consolidated in Regulation 3.1, Standard A3.1 and Guideline B3.1 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and therefore ensuring compliance with Convention No. 92 will facilitate the implementation of the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. While noting the Government's statement that preparations are currently under way for the ratification of the MLC, 2006, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this respect.

Articles 5 to 11 of the Convention. Crew accommodation requirements. The Committee recalls that for the past ten years the Government has been practically repeating that it is preparing technical regulations which would give full effect to numerous provisions of Part II of the Convention. However, to date, there has been no concrete progress as the Government once again indicates that the revision process of the Sanitary Rules for seagoing vessels has not yet been completed. The Committee therefore asks the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay in order to ensure legislative conformity with the Convention in respect of the following points: floor area and maximum occupancy of sleeping rooms (Article 5(1)–(7), (9) and (10)); size and equipment of mess rooms (Article 6(1)–(4)); recreation facilities (Article 7(1)–(4)); and lighting standards (Article 11(4) and (5)). The Committee asks the Government to transmit a copy of the revised Sanitary Rules once they have been issued. The Committee also requests the Government to refer to its comments made under the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92).

Moreover, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of Convention No. 133 have been consolidated in Regulation 3.1, Standard A3.1 and Guideline B3.1 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and therefore ensuring compliance with Convention No. 133 will facilitate the implementation of the corresponding requirements of the MLC, 2006. While noting the Government's statement that preparations are currently under way for the ratification of the MLC, 2006, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments in this respect.

Seychelles

Unemployment Indemnity (Shipwreck) Convention, 1920 (No. 8) (ratification: 1978)

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Unemployment indemnity in the event of shipwreck. The Committee recalls that for several years the Government has not provided information on any progress made with regard to the announced revision of the Merchant Shipping Act 1992 and of the Merchant Shipping Regulations 1995 with a view to bringing them into line with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend section 10 of the Merchant Shipping Regulations, which excludes a seafarer from any entitlement to receive wages in the event of shipwreck if it is proved that the seafarer has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo and stores. In addition, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take measures in order to ensure the application of the Convention to persons employed on vessels excluded from the coverage of the Merchant Shipping Act and also to ensure that masters are entitled – as all other seafarers – to unemployment indemnity in the event of shipwreck. While noting that the Government has undertaken with the assistance of the Office a legislative gap analysis to assess the conformity of the national legislation with the provisions of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), the Committee asks the Government to take the necessary action without further delay and to transmit a copy of the revised Merchant Shipping Act and its Regulations as soon as they are adopted.

In addition, the Committee recalls that the main provisions of the Convention are now reflected in Regulation 2.6 and the corresponding Code of the MLC, 2006, which requires the payment of compensation in the event of the ship's loss or foundering not only for the resulting unemployment but also for injury or loss. The Committee considers, therefore, that compliance with the Convention will facilitate the implementation of the respective provisions of the MLC, 2006. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of any developments regarding the process of the ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Sri Lanka

Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention, 1958 (No. 108) (ratification: 1995)

Articles 3, 4 and 6 of the Convention. Seafarers' identity documents. For several years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the fact that the continuous discharge certificate book, provided for in section 127(1)(r) of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1971, fails to give effect to substantive requirements of the Convention. In its last report, the Government refers to a Tripartite Steering Committee set up in 2008 on the occasion of a national workshop held with the assistance of the ILO in order to review the gaps identified between the national legislation and the provisions of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), and the Seafarers' Identity Documents Convention (Revised), 2003 (No. 185), and ascertain the feasibility of ratification of those instruments. The Government also indicates that the Tripartite Steering Committee intends to take fully into account the Committee's comments although to date no final decisions have been taken on the revision of the continuous discharge certificate book. While recognizing that countries ratifying Convention No. 185 may need a few years to put in place the facilities and systems necessary for the issuance of seafarers' identity documents, especially in view of the highly technical character of certain requirements and recommended procedures, the Committee considers that the provisions of Convention No. 108 call for much less cumbersome measures for their implementation. Referring to its previous comments, therefore, the Committee asks the Government to take prompt action in order to bring its law and practice into line with the Convention, in particular as regards: (i) the requirement that the seafarer's identity document should remain in his or her possession at all times (Article 3); (ii) the statement that should be included in the seafarer's identity document to the effect that this is a document issued pursuant to ILO Convention No. 108 (Article 4(2)); and (iii) the right of a seafarer with a valid identity document to enter a territory for temporary shore leave or for joining a ship (Article 6). The Committee also asks the Government to indicate any progress made towards the ratification of Convention No. 185 based on the work of the Tripartite Steering Committee.

United States

Article 1(1) of the Convention, read in conjunction with Articles 2, 9 and 11. Scope of application and equality of treatment for all seafarers. The Committee has been commenting for many years on the need to amend section 688(b) of the Jones Act in line with the requirements of Article 11 of the Convention, which provides that national laws or regulations relating to sickness or injury benefits have to be so interpreted and enforced so as to ensure equality of treatment to all seafarers irrespective of nationality, domicile or race. The Committee notes the Government's renewed statement that the mere creation of different classes (i.e. foreign nationals as opposed to United States citizens or resident aliens) does not violate the Convention and that foreign seafarers not domiciled in the United States may have remedies available in their home countries or host nations. The Committee further notes the Government's interpretation of section 688(b) of the Jones Act, according to which foreign citizens cannot maintain an action under that Act if they are employed by an enterprise engaged in exploration, development or production of offshore mineral or energy resources, in the territorial waters of a foreign nation and have a remedy available to them under the laws of the country where the injury occurred or their place of citizenship.

Noting that there has been no progress since the Committee first raised this point more than 20 years ago, the Committee is obliged to recall that, while the application of the Convention could possibly be limited with regard to drilling activities – as drilling platforms are not ordinarily engaged in maritime navigation – the Convention remains fully applicable with regard to such other activities as transporting supplies, equipment or personnel. Due to the specificity of maritime employment and the uncertainties of the seafarers' access to legal remedies due to their constant movement, Article 2 imposes the primary liability for the payment of sickness and injury benefits on the shipowner. In case of the shipowner's failure to pay, section 688(a) of the Jones Act allows any seafarer who is a United States citizen or resident alien to sue for damages arising from personal injury suffered in the course of employment. Section 688(b) imposes on seafarers who are neither United States citizens nor resident aliens, an additional precondition, bearing also the burden of proof, that their home countries or the host countries in the territorial waters of which their ships navigate have no available remedy. In the Committee's view, having to prove that the social insurance institutions of the seafarer's home or host country could not provide remedy, constitutes an additional threshold for foreign non-resident seafarers and is therefore inconsistent with Article 11 of the Convention.

The Committee wishes to refer, in this regard, to the preparatory work that eventually led to the adoption of Article 11, which shows that the drafters' intention was to include an explicit affirmation of the principle of equality of treatment in view of the fact that, in practice, non-resident seafarers were not able to receive the same benefits as national or foreign resident seafarers employed on the same ships (see ILC, 1936, 22nd Session, Record of Proceedings, page 257). Despite objections to the effect that, where an exception was not made in respect of foreign workers, equality of treatment was presumed and it was therefore unnecessary to insert a special provision, Article 11 was put to a vote and adopted. In addition, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that an equally comprehensive definition of the term "seafarer" is contained in Article II(1)(f) of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), to mean "any person who is employed or engaged or works in any capacity on board a ship". Moreover, it is also clear from Article 9 that the member State concerned has to secure rapid and inexpensive settlement of disputes concerning the shipowner's liability. It is the member State's responsibility to establish such a system. By requiring non-nationals to pursue their claims in the host or home State, it is not securing the settlement of their disputes, let alone securing that the process is rapid and inexpensive. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in order to amend section 688(b) of the Jones Act, possibly taking into account the distinction between drilling and other activities, so as to ensure that all foreign non-resident seafarers employed on board any vessel registered in the United States and ordinarily engaged in maritime navigation, benefit without any prior condition from the protection accorded by the Convention.

Finally, the Committee takes this opportunity to recall that the Convention, as well as 36 other international maritime labour Conventions, are revised by the MLC, 2006. The main provisions of the Convention are now reflected in Regulation 4.2 and the corresponding Code of the MLC, 2006. The Committee considers, therefore, that compliance with the Convention will facilitate the implementation of the respective provisions of the MLC, 2006. Noting that the Government has initiated the review and consultation process with a view to the future ratification of the MLC, 2006, the Committee requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any further developments with respect to the possible ratification of the MLC, 2006.

Uruguay

Article 3 of the Convention. Crew accommodation requirements – Implementing legislation. The Committee has been drawing the Government's attention since soon after the time of ratification of the Convention to the absence of laws or regulations implementing the specific technical standards set out in Parts II and III of the Accommodation of Crews Convention (Revised), 1949 (No. 92) and Part I of this Convention. The Committee notes with regret that despite the numerous comments, the Government has to date not been in a position to provide any explanations as to whether and how this Convention is applied in law and practice. In its last report, the Government states that there are no ships engaged in maritime navigation to which the Convention would apply whereas in earlier reports it had referred to passenger ferries of over 1,000 tons which make short journeys between Uruguay and Argentina. The Committee requests the Government to provide the necessary clarifications on the size and composition of its merchant fleet in the light of the information contained in the "World Fleet Statistics" of December 2009, which indicates that Uruguay has 129 vessels with a total tonnage of 109,279 tons. Furthermore, to the extent that seagoing ships of 1,000 or more tons are registered in Uruguay, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures it intends to take to ensure compliance with the detailed requirements of the Convention.

Finally, the Committee recalls that most of the provisions of Conventions Nos 92 and 133 concerning crew accommodation have been incorporated without significant changes in Regulation 3.1 and Standard A3.1 of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), which apply only to vessels constructed on or after the date when the MLC, 2006, comes into force for the country concerned whereas for existing vessels the standards relating to ship construction and equipment that are set out in Conventions Nos 92 and 133 should continue to apply. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would keep the Office informed of any further developments regarding the process of ratification and effective implementation of the MLC, 2006.

Liberia

Minimum Age (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 112) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1 of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee notes with regret that, over 50 years after its ratification, the Convention has still not been given effect in its entirety. It recalls that, under the terms of Article 1 of the Convention, the term "fishing vessel" includes all ships and boats, of any nature whatsoever, whether publicly or privately owned, which are engaged in maritime fishing in salt waters. Only fishing in ports or in river estuaries, and individuals fishing for sport or recreation, are excluded from the scope of the Convention. However, the Committee observes that section 326 of the Maritime Act of Liberia, which establishes the minimum age for work on board vessels (including fishing vessels) at 15 years, only applies to vessels registered under the Act. Section 51 of the Maritime Act limits the registration procedure to certain types of vessels. This procedure is open to any vessel under 20 tonnes, the owner of which is a national of Liberia and which only makes voyages between Liberian ports or between Liberia and other West African countries, as well as any vessel of over 1,600 tonnes engaged in international trade, the constructor or owner of which is a national of Liberia. Furthermore, by virtue of section 290 of the Maritime Act, Chapter 10 of the Act, which covers seafarers and includes, among its provisions, the rules respecting minimum age, only applies to persons engaged on board vessels of at least 75 tonnes. The Committee wishes once again to draw the Government's attention to the fact that the scope of the provisions of the national legislation respecting the minimum age required for work on board fishing vessels is much narrower than that of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to adopt the necessary measures without further ado to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point.

Finally, the Committee understands that the tripartite representatives of Liberia participated in a subregional workshop organized in Accra (Ghana) in October 2009 which was intended to promote the ratification of the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188). It requests the Government to keep the Office informed of any measures taken, in the context of the follow-up to this workshop, with a view to the ratification of Convention No. 188.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Medical Examination (Fishermen) Convention, 1959 (No. 113) (ratification: 1960)

Article 3 of the Convention. Nature of medical examination and particulars to be included in the medical certificate. For many years the Committee has asked the Government to indicate whether certain provisions applicable to merchant vessels, i.e. the Requirements for Merchant Marine Personnel (RLM-118) and Maritime Regulation No. 10.325(2), also apply to fishing vessels. The Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will provide full explanations regarding the applicability of the Liberian maritime laws and regulations to the medical examination of fishers. The Government is requested to indicate whether consultations with the fishing-boat owners' and fishers' organizations concerned, if they exist, had taken place prior to the adoption of the applicable laws and regulations on the nature of the medical examination and the particulars to be included in the medical certificate, as required by Article 3(1) of the Convention, and to provide particulars on how the age of the person to be examined and the nature of the duties to be performed are taken into account in prescribing the nature of the examination as required by Article 3(2).

In addition, while noting the Subregional Seminar on the promotion of the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), which was held in Accra in 2009 with the participation of tripartite representatives from Liberia, the Committee requests the Government to give all due attention to this new comprehensive instrument on the working and living conditions of fishers and to keep the Office informed of any decision that it may take with a view to its eventual ratification.

Fishermen's Articles of Agreement Convention, 1959 (No. 114) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 3 to 9 of the Convention. Fishers' articles of agreement. The Committee notes the Government's earlier indication that the Committee's comments have been submitted to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Maritime Affairs for immediate action. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any possible reaction by the Commissioner. It also urges the Government to provide full information on each of the provisions of the Convention and each question in the report form approved by the Governing Body.

In addition, while noting the Subregional Seminar on the promotion of the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), which was held in Accra in 2009 with the participation of tripartite representatives from Liberia, the Committee requests the Government to give all due attention to this new comprehensive instrument on the working and living conditions of fishers and to keep the Office informed of any decision that it may take with a view to its eventual ratification.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Sierra Leone

Fishermen's Competency Certificates Convention, 1966 (No. 125) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 3 to 15 of the Convention. Certificates of competency. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on the absence of laws and regulations giving effect to the Convention. The Government stated in its report communicated in 2004 that progress was being made in this respect and that a national workshop on the formulation of fishing policies was organized. The Government also indicated that copies of the new legislation and the texts defining the new policies would be communicated to the ILO as soon as they were adopted. The Committee asks the Government to provide detailed information on the outcome of the national workshop on the formulation of fishing policies and on any concrete progress made in respect of the adoption of national laws implementing the Convention. The Committee understands that the Office remains ready to offer expert advice and to respond favourably to any specific request for technical assistance in this regard. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to supply up-to-date information concerning the fishing industry, including statistics on the composition and capacity of the country's fishing fleet and the approximate number of fishers gainfully employed in the sector.

The Committee also draws the Government's attention to the new Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), which revises and updates most ILO instruments on fishing. The Committee requests the Government to give all due attention to this new comprehensive instrument on the working and living conditions of fishers and to keep the Office informed of any decision that it may take with a view to its eventual ratification.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Spain

Articles 3 to 11 of the Convention. Fishers' articles of agreement. The Committee notes that the Government, without replying to its previous comment concerning gaps in Act No. 8/1980 of 10 March 1980 issuing general regulations for workers, confirms that the regulations applying to fishers' articles of agreement are identical to those in force for other workers. The Committee understands that, in a 1996 socio-economic analysis of the fishing sector (Report 7/1996 of 27 November 1996), the Economic and Social Council noted the absence in the Spanish legal system of fishing-specific regulations concerning employment contracts. It also understands that a number of Spanish academics have pointed out the gaps in the Spanish social legislation – particularly with respect to fishers' articles of agreement, following the repeal of ordinances on work in fishing. The Committee can only express its concern at the absence, in Act No. 8/1980, of provisions giving effect to the main requirements of the Convention, such as the written form of the articles of agreement (Article 3), the particulars that must be contained in this agreement (Article 6) and the possibility for the fisher to obtain information on board about the conditions of employment (Article 8). Consequently, the Committee requests the Government to provide a detailed report describing the way in which the implementation of the various provisions of the Convention are ensured and, if applicable, the measures it envisages taking in order to guarantee their full application. The Government is also requested to submit a copy of collective agreements applicable to the fishing sector that might contain provisions relating to the articles of agreement.

Finally, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the Work in Fishing Convention, 2007 (No. 188), which revises in an integrated manner most of the existing ILO fishing instruments and sets out a new comprehensive standard on fishers' working and living conditions. In particular, Articles 16 to 20 and Annex II of Convention No. 188 draw upon and expand on the provisions of Convention No. 114. The Committee accordingly invites the Government to consider favourably the ratification of Convention No. 188 and requests it to keep the Office informed of any decision taken in this regard.

Trinidad and Tobago

Fishermen's Competency Certificates Convention, 1966 (No. 125) (ratification: 1972)

Articles 4 to 15 of the Convention. Fishermen's certificates of competency. The Committee recalls that for a considerable number of years it has been commenting on the absence of laws and regulations giving effect to the requirements of the Convention. In its last report, the Government indicates that draft Safety of Fishing Vessel Regulations have been prepared under section 87(1) of the Shipping Act No. 24 of 1987. These regulations, which were expected to be enacted in 2011, will establish, among other matters, standards for the manning of fishing vessels with trained and certified officers. The Committee hopes that upon completion, the new legislation will fully comply with the specific requirements of the Convention regarding fishers' minimum age, professional experience and examinations so that national legislation and practice be brought at last in line with the certification standards set out in the Convention. The Committee would appreciate receiving a copy of the Safety of Fishing Vessel Regulations once they have been issued.

Protection against Accidents (Dockers) Convention (Revised), 1932 (No. 32) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report of 2011 contains no new information and is virtually identical with the one which was sent in 2008. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 12, 13 and 15 of the Convention. Application of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government report does not contain any reply to the Committee's comments despite its repeated requests over a number of years and that the Government still does not appear to have taken the necessary steps to adopt the legislative text concerning ports and dockers pursuant to Act No. 88-07 as planned. However, the Committee notes the Government's efforts to improve the situation relating to occupational safety and health by ratifying the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155). It notes that this Convention applies to all branches of economic activity, including dock enterprises and dockworkers, and that it therefore constitutes a general context for the application of Convention No. 32. However, the Government continues to be bound by its obligation to adopt specific legislative provisions giving full effect to the provisions of Convention No. 32. The Committee requests the Government once again to take the necessary steps in the very near future to give full effect, in law and in practice, to the provisions of the present Convention, particularly Articles 12, 13 and 15, and to send copies of all relevant legislative texts once they have been adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. Article 17(2). Labour inspection. The Committee notes the lack of information concerning the application in practice of the Convention. With specific reference to the provisions of Article 17(2) of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to send its general observations on the manner in which the Convention is applied, including, for example, extracts of the reports of the inspection services, up-to-date statistical information on the number of inspection visits carried out, the number of infringements reported and also the number, nature and causes of accidents recorded, etc.

The Committee takes this opportunity to remind the Government that the ILO Governing Body invited the States parties to Convention No. 32 to envisage ratifying the Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152), which revises Convention No. 32 (GB.268/LILS/5(Rev.1), paragraphs 99–101). Ratification of Convention No. 152 would entail ipso jure the immediate denunciation of Convention No. 32. The Committee would also like to draw the Government's attention to the code of practice recently adopted by the ILO entitled Safety and health in ports (Geneva, 2005), which is available, inter alia, on the ILO website: www.ilo.org/public/english/protection/safework/cops/english/index.htm. The Government is requested to keep the Office informed of all progress made in this field.

The Committee wishes to invite the Government to request ILO assistance with the view to the effective application of the Convention. The Committee hopes that such technical assistance can be carried out and asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken in this respect with the relevant ILO bodies.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

Congo

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 1986)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government according to which a national advisory technical committee on occupational safety and health has been set up pursuant to Decree No. 2000-29 of 17 March 2000 which gives effect to Article 7 of the Convention. It also notes, however, that the information requested concerning Articles 2, 4, 5, 6 and 11–36 are to be provided by the Government subsequently. As regards the further information the Committee has requested the Government to provide, the Committee notes that the Government has either not replied to questions raised by the Committee in its previous comments or it has provided information that is applicable to enterprises in general. The Government appears to imply that dockworkers should be treated in the same manner as other workers and ports be treated like any other enterprise. With reference to Articles 4–7, the Committee wishes to recall that the Government is required to take measures to give effect to the specific provisions in the Convention. The Committee must therefore once again repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee draws the Government's attention to the absence of specific health and safety provisions for dock work. The Committee noted previously that a draft Order on safety and health in dock work had been prepared by the technical departments of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. In its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government repeated this information and added that the draft had been submitted for adoption. The Committee hopes that the provisions of this text will ensure the application of the following provisions of the Convention: Article 4 (objectives and areas to be covered by measures to be established by national laws and regulations, in accordance with Part III of the Convention); Article 5 (responsibility of employers, owners, masters or other persons as appropriate, for compliance with safety and health measures; duty of employers to collaborate whenever two or more of them undertake activities simultaneously at one workplace); Article 7 (consultation of and collaboration between employers and workers). It asks the Government to provide a copy of the above Order as soon as it has been adopted.

In its previous reports, the Government referred to Orders No. 9033/MTERFPPS/DGT/DSSHT on the organization and functioning of the socio-medical centres of enterprises in the People's Republic of the Congo and

No. 9034/MTERFPPS/DGT/DSSHT laying down the procedures for the establishment of socio-medical centres which are common to several enterprises in the People's Republic of the Congo. Since these texts have not been received, the Committee would be grateful if the Government would provide a copy of them.

Article 6. The Committee notes from the Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that briefings are to be organized to inform workers about safety provisions in the place of work at which heads of establishment can alert them about the dangers arising from the use of machinery and the precautions to be taken. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the provisions concerning the organization of these briefings and the measures taken to give effect to paragraph 1(c) of this Article.

Article 8. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that all safety measures are provided for in Chapter II of Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986. The Committee notes that the above part of the Order provides for general protective measures whereas the Convention requires the adoption of measures specific to dock work. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions require the adoption of effective measures (fencing, flagging or other suitable means including, when necessary, cessation of work) to ensure that when the workplace has become unsafe, workers are protected until it has been made safe again.

Article 14. The Committee notes from the Government's report for the period ending 30 June 1993 that the application of this Article is ensured by labour inspectors by means of inspections in enterprises. The Committee asks the Government to indicate which provisions ensure that electrical equipment and installations are so constructed, installed, operated and maintained as to prevent danger, and which standards for electrical equipment and installations have been recognized by the competent authorities.

Article 17. The Committee notes that section 41 of Order No. 9036, cited by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention, includes specific measures only for the use of lifting gear in particular weather conditions (wind). The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure that the means of access to a ship's hold or cargo deck are in conformity with the provisions of this Article.

Article 21. The Committee notes the provisions of sections 47–49 of Order No. 9036 which the Government cites in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993 as giving effect to this Article of the Convention. It notes that the above sections provide for protective measures for some machinery or parts of machines which can be dangerous. It asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that all lifting appliances, every item of loose gear and every sling or lifting device forming an integral part of a load comply with the provisions of the Convention.

Articles 22, 23, 24 and 25. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993, the Government refers to the certification of machinery, including lifting appliances, which is conducted by technical inspectors and advisory bodies, as a general measure to ensure that lifting appliances are sound and in proper working order. However, these Articles of the Convention provide for a set of measures to ensure that appliances and loose gear can be used by workers without any danger or risk: testing of all lifting appliances and loose gear (every five years in ships); thorough examination (at least once every 12 months); regular inspection before use. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the provisions requiring the above measures to be taken in respect of all lifting appliances – on shore and on board – and of all loose gear.

Article 30. The Committee notes that section 43 of Order No. 9036 referred to by the Government, does not relate to the attaching of loads to lifting appliances. It asks the Government to indicate which provisions relate to this matter.

Article 34. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the instructions concerning the wearing of personal protective equipment referred to by the Government in its report for the period ending 30 June 1993.

Article 35. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that section 147 of the Labour Code regulates the evacuation of injured persons who are able to be moved and who are not able to be treated by the facilities made available by the employer. It notes that the Government also refers in its reports to Orders Nos 9033 and 9034 mentioned in paragraph 2 above. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken either under the above texts, or otherwise, to ensure that adequate facilities, including trained personnel, are available for the provision of first aid.

Article 37(1). The Committee recalls that, under this provision of the Convention, committees which include employers' and workers' representatives must be formed at every port where there is a significant number of workers. Recalling the Government's statement that the health and safety committees provided for by the law have not been formed, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the establishment of such committees in ports with a significant number of workers.

Article 38(1). The Government indicates in its report that, in the absence of health and safety committees, instruction and training are entrusted to a specialist in the matter within the enterprise. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the activities of these specialists.

Article 39. The Committee notes that section 61 of Act No. 004/86 of 25 February 1986 establishing the Social Security Code gives effect in part to this Article of the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate the provisions which ensure that this Article is applied to occupational diseases.

Article 41(1)(a). Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government refers to Order No. 9036 of 10 December 1986 as being the text which lays down general obligations for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work (ports being treated as any industrial enterprise) and that no specific measures have been taken in respect of dock work. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to set out the specific obligations taken for the persons and bodies concerned with dock work.

In the absence of any information on the application of the above provisions, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the specific measures which give effect to the following provisions of the Convention:

- Article 9(1) and (2). Safety measures with regard to lighting and marking of dangerous obstacles.
- Article 10(1) and (2). Maintenance of surfaces for traffic or stacking of goods and safe manner of stacking goods.
- Article 11(1) and (2). Width of passageways and separate passageways for pedestrians.
- Article 16(1) and (2). Safe transport to or from a ship or other place by water, safe embarking and disembarking, and safe transport to or from a workplace on land.
- Article 18(1)–(5). Regulations concerning hatch covers.

- Article 19(1) and (2). Protection around openings and decks, closing of hatchways when not in use.
- Article 20(1)–(4). Safety measures when power vehicles operate in the hold; hatch covers secured against displacement; ventilation regulations; safe means of escape from bins or hoppers when dry bulk is being loaded or unloaded.
- Article 26(1)–(3). Members' mutual recognition of arrangements for testing and examination.
- Article 27(1)–(3). Marking lifting appliances with safe working loads.
- Article 28. Rigging plans.
- Article 29. Strength and construction of pallets for supporting loads.
- Article 31(1) and (2). Operation and layout of freight container terminals and organization of work in such terminals.
- Article 38(2). Minimum age limit for workers operating lifting appliances.

Hoping that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the very near future, the Committee invites the Government to solicit technical assistance of the ILO to resolve any problems related to the application of this Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guinea

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 1982)

Article 6(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. Measures to ensure the safety of portworkers. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that sections 170 and 172 of the Labour Code, establishing that workers have a general obligation to use health and safety equipment correctly and that those responsible for workplaces have an obligation to organize appropriate practical training with regard to safety and hygiene issues for the benefit of workers, ensure the application of Article 6(1)(a) and (b) of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the measures taken to ensure that these general provisions are applied to portworkers.

Article 7. Consultation with employers and workers. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government with regard to sections 288 and 290 of the Labour Code, which provide for the establishment of a consultative committee which is to be responsible, amongst other things, for issuing opinions and formulating proposals and resolutions on labour legislation and regulations and social laws. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application, in practice, of the measures taken to ensure the collaboration between workers and employers provided for in Article 7 of the Convention.

Article 12. Fighting fire. The Committee notes that sections 71, 72 and 76 of the Merchant Marine Code briefly touch upon the question of fire protection systems and equipment, but only in the context of inspections of vessels engaged in international voyages. The Committee requests the Government to take the measures necessary to ensure that appropriate and sufficient firefighting measures are made available for use wherever dock work is carried out.

Article 32(1). Dangerous cargoes. The Committee notes that section 174 of the Labour Code states, in general, that vendors or distributors of dangerous substances, as well as those responsible for workplaces where such substances are used, are required to mark and label them. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the measures taken to ensure the application, in practice, of this provision, which is general in scope, in the dock sector.

The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government in its report of May 2005 on the application of Articles 16, 18, 19(1), 29, 30, 35 and 37, are general in nature and do not permit the Committee to ascertain whether they are being applied in the dock sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the measures taken to ensure the application of Articles 16, 18, 19(1), 29, 30, 35 and 37, of the Convention and to attach copies of the relevant national laws and regulations.

The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain replies to its request for further information contained in the previous direct request regarding the application of Articles 19(2) and 33, of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide the information requested, as well as information on the measures taken with regard to the application of these Articles.

The Committee notes that, in its report, the Government does not provide any clarification with regard to the measures taken to give effect to Article 6(1)(c), and Articles 2, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 31, 32(2–5), and 34 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure the application of these Articles and to keep the Committee informed of any action taken in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Guyana

Dock Work Convention, 1973 (No. 137) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee noted the Government's report for the period ending September 2002, according to which there has been no change in the application of the Convention. It requests the Government to give a general appreciation on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including for instance extracts from the reports of the authorities entrusted with the application of the laws and regulations, and the available information on the numbers of dockworkers on the registers of workers in docks maintained in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention and of any variations in their numbers (Part V of the report form).

Peru

Occupational Safety and Health (Dock Work) Convention, 1979 (No. 152) (ratification: 1988)

Legislation. The Committee notes the detailed report provided by the Government and the attached legislation, and particularly Directorial Resolution Agreement No. 010-2007-APN/DIR, the national standard on occupational safety and health in ports and the guidance on obtaining the Safety Certificate in a port installation. The Committee notes that this Resolution establishes the requirement for port administrations and dockworkers to obtain the Certificate of Port Safety and its annual renewal, with the objective of ensuring that the activities undertaken in ports and port installations are carried out within the safety parameters established by national and international standards. The Committee notes with interest that the Resolution sets out and defines principles that are inherent to the modern approach to occupational safety and health, such as the promotion of a culture of the prevention of occupational hazards, the components of the continuous improvement methodology, the principles of consultation, participation and information, among others. It also notes with interest that section 46 of the Resolution referred to above establishes the requirement to conduct a risk assessment once a year as a minimum and that section 62 of the same Resolution requires the port administration to adopt measures allowing workers to interrupt their work in the case of imminent danger and, where necessary, to immediately leave the place in which their work is performed. Nevertheless, it notes that the Directorial Resolution, in relation to certain technical regulations, refers to the rules of each port, which have to cover such matters if certification is to be obtained. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it is ensured that the rules of port installations are in conformity with the Convention, prior to the granting of the Certificate of Port Safety.

Article 7(1) of the Convention. Adoption of legislative measures in consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided information on the consultations envisaged in this Article of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultation mechanisms with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. Furthermore, noting the intense process of the drafting of legislation in this field, such as, for example, a new law on dock work, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held in this respect with the organizations of employers and workers concerned.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Russian Federation

The Committee notes that the information contained in the Government's report contains only a very brief affirmation that the terms of the Convention continue to be applied based on relevant legislative documents and standards. Neither this nor the government's previous reports in 2007 and 2009 constitute the detailed report based on the report form for this Convention that the Government is required to submit following its ratification of this Convention in 2004. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee also notes that no further information is provided this year as regards the technical standard the Government indicated in 2009 was being developed in order to ensure safety in maritime transport and in related infrastructure. The Committee reiterates its hope that the draft technical standard will be adopted soon and that it will give full effect to the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to submit a copy of the draft technical standard giving effect to the Convention as soon as it has been adopted and reiterates its request to the Government to supply a detailed report on the application of the Convention in conformity with the report form indicating in detail how effect is given to the provisions of the Convention.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2012.]

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 27 (The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia); Convention No. 32 (Nigeria, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia); Convention No. 152 (Peru).

Indigenous and tribal peoples

Argentina

The Committee notes the observations of the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), of 29 October 2010, on pending issues, and particularly on the need to establish appropriate consultation machinery, and the observations of the Confederation of Workers of Argentina (CTA), of 31 August 2011, which refer to pending matters, and particularly the use of violence for the removal of indigenous communities from the lands which they traditionally occupy. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these matters.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO). In previous comments, the Committee noted the report adopted in November 2008 by the Governing Body (GB.303/19/7) on the representation made under article 24 of the ILO Constitution by the Educational Workers' Union of Río Negro (UNTER), in which the Governing Body examined matters relating to consultation at the national level, as well as the issues of consultation, participation and the performance of traditional activities by indigenous peoples in the province of Río Negro and requested the Government to:

- (a) continue making efforts to strengthen the Council for Indigenous Participation (CPI) and ensure that, when elections of indigenous representatives are held in all the provinces, all the indigenous communities and all institutions considered by the communities themselves to be representative are invited to participate;
- (b) carry out consultations with regard to the Bills referred to in paragraphs 12 and 64 of the report and to establish mechanisms to ensure that consultations with indigenous peoples take place whenever legislative or administrative measures that may directly affect them are being considered. The consultations should be carried out sufficiently early so as to be effective and meaningful;
- (c) ensure that, in implementing Act No. 26160, all communities and truly representative institutions of the indigenous peoples likely to be directly affected are consulted and able to participate;
- (d) ensure that, in accordance with the principle of concurrent powers of national and provincial authorities, effective consultation and participation mechanisms are established in the Province of Río Negro involving all the truly representative organizations of the indigenous peoples, as set out in paragraphs 75, 76 and 80 of the report of the Governing Body, in particular in the process of implementing national Act No. 26160;
- (e) in implementing Act No. 26160, to make substantial efforts, in consultation with and with the participation of the indigenous peoples of the Province of Río Negro to clarify: (1) the difficulties in the procedures for regularizing land, with a view to developing a rapid and accessible procedure that meets the requirements of Article 14(3) of the Convention; (2) the question of the levy for land use referred to in paragraph 92 of the report of the Governing Body; (3) any problems in obtaining legal personality; and (4) the issue of dispersed communities and their land rights; and
- (f) make efforts to ensure that measures are adopted in the Province of Río Negro, including interim measures, with the participation of the indigenous peoples involved, to ensure that indigenous stockbreeders have easy access to marks and signs certificates and carry on their activities in conditions of equality, and to strengthen that activity in accordance with the terms of Article 23 of the Convention.

The Committee notes that, according to the CTA and the CGT, effect has not been given to the recommendations made by the tripartite committee.

The Committee notes that, with regard to the strengthening of consultation and participation machinery, the Government indicates that, with a view to strengthening the CPI and the participation of all indigenous communities and institutions considered representative by those communities, the communities included in the National Register of Indigenous Communities (RENACI) and in provincial registers were convened. According to the Government, communities which are not registered can also participate with the consent of the majority of the other communities. With a view to ensuring the transparency of the process, the National Institute for Indigenous Affairs (INAI) participates in community assemblies, and the processes of indigenous peoples for the election of their representatives are respected. Moreover, the representatives are provided with a sum of money so that they can travel in their communities and national meetings are organized in which the representatives of all indigenous peoples participate with a view to reaching agreements and setting priorities. Workshops and seminars have also been held.

With regard to the legislative bills that are under examination and consultation with indigenous peoples on that subject, the Committee notes that the Government referred, in the context of the representation, to a series of bills under examination, namely: the Bill amending the Mining Code with regard to the participation of indigenous communities; the Bill declaring the indigenous community property and emergency issue; the Bill establishing the intellectual property rights of indigenous peoples; the Bill to regulate relations between the authorities of the national and federal judicial systems and the authorities of indigenous peoples; the Bill establishing a mechanism for the consultation of indigenous peoples; the Bill establishing penal mediation as an alternative to resolving disputes arising from the penal system; the Indigenous Communities Property Regime: Emergency and Regulation, repealing sections 2, 4, 7, 11 and 12 of Act

No. 23302; and the Indigenous Communities Regime. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Bills have not been examined, with the exception of those resulting in the approval of Act No. 26160, of 2006, declaring indigenous community property an emergency issue and therefore suspending temporarily the implementation of judicial decisions, procedural or administrative acts regarding the eviction or removal from lands traditionally occupied by indigenous communities registered in RENACI. The Act is also mandating INAI to carry out the technical and legal identification of the status of the land occupied by indigenous communities as to its ownership or possession. Decree Regulations No. 1122/07 and INAI Resolution No. 587/07 on the National Programme for the Identification of the Lands of Indigenous Communities were also enacted. The Government indicated that the approval of these pieces of legislation followed processes in which the representatives of CPI participated. With regard to the implementation of Act No. 26160, the Committee notes the Government's indication that indigenous communities participated in the drafting and implementation of the National Programme for the Identification of the Lands of Indigenous Communities referred to above.

With reference to the establishment of effective consultation and participation machinery in the province of Río Negro with all the truly representative organizations of indigenous peoples, the Government indicates that the Mapuche and Mapuche-Tehuelche peoples are organized through the Coordinating Committee of the Mapuche People's Parliament, which assesses and proposes candidates for the positions of advisers and presidents of the Council for the Development of Indigenous Communities (CODECI). The CODECI is a co-management body of the provincial State and the Mapuche people, which participates in the Río Negro Provincial Programme, particularly in the implementation of the Programme for the Identification of the Lands of Indigenous Communities (RETECI).

With regard to the identification of lands, in consultation with the indigenous peoples of the Province of Río Negro, and the difficulties involved in the certification of land, the Committee notes the indication by the Government that an agreement was concluded between the INAI and the CODECI and a budget allocated with a view to the implementation of the Provincial Land Identification Programme, with the identification of 126 communities. The Programme includes technical assistants of indigenous origin. The Government also refers to the various activities undertaken in the province with indigenous participation in 2009.

In relation to the measures adopted so that indigenous stockbreeders can have easy access to marks and signs certificates and exercise their activity under conditions of equality, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the INAI signed an agreement with the Province of Río Negro (Agreement No. 156/01) under the terms of which indigenous communities are registered as legal entities with the Directorate of Legal Personality and the Council for the Development of Indigenous Communities in the province. With reference to marks and signs, the Government indicates that the absence of regularization of land tenure of certain members of indigenous communities makes it difficult to grant them ownership of marks and signs, resulting in difficulties in the circulation of livestock for sale.

Taking into account the information supplied, the Committee requests the Government to:

- (i) continue taking the necessary measures to ensure that indigenous peoples are consulted in an appropriate manner whenever it is planned to adopt administrative or legislative measures that may affect them directly;
- (ii) indicate whether the various Bills referred to above are still under examination or have been shelved and indicate any developments regarding those still under examination;
- (iii) provide information on the impact in practice of the implementation of Act No. 26160 and the National Programme for the Identification of the Lands of Indigenous Communities, and particularly on the number of communities having benefited, and the land regularized;
- (iv) continue providing information on the progress achieved in the process of land identification undertaken with the participation of the indigenous communities concerned and the difficulties encountered in that process, including the issues of levies for land use and dispersed communities and their land rights;
- (v) indicate the number of indigenous communities registered, the number of pending registrations and any cases in which registration has been denied and the reasons for such denial; and
- (vi) take the necessary steps for the adoption of measures, including transitional measures, in the Province of Río Negro, with the participation of the peoples concerned, so that indigenous stockbreeders can have access easily to marks and signs certificates and carry on their activities under conditions of equality, and to strengthen that activity in accordance with Article 23 of the Convention.

Eviction of communities. The Committee notes the observations of the CTA dated 31 August 2010 and 31 August 2011 and of the Association of Health Professionals of Salta (APSADES) dated 12 June 2009 concerning the eviction, sometimes with the use of violence, of indigenous communities, without taking into account Act No. 26160, which had suspended such evictions. The Committee notes that the CTA refers to evictions principally in Tucumán, Neuquén, Formosa and Chaco. In particular, it denounces the violent eviction of the Chuschagasta community in Tucumán on 12 October 2009, resulting in the death of a member of the council of elders and injuries to various other representatives, the eviction of the India Quilmes community, the eviction of the Paichil Antriao community (in respect of which the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) requested precautionary measures on 6 April 2011 (MC 269/08) and the violent eviction of the Toba-Qom de Navogoh La Primavera community in the Province of Formosa on 23 November 2010, during which two members of the community died. The Committee observes that the Government replied to these issues only in general terms in its report.

The Committee also notes that APSADES forwards a report issued by the National Aboriginal Pastoral Team (ENDEPA), which also refers to the eviction of communities from the lands they occupy and delays in certifying land tenure. ENDEPA also refers to a series of specific cases of violations of the rights of indigenous peoples, and particularly: the implementation of contaminating mining exploitation activities without consulting the indigenous peoples who are directly affected in the Province of Chaco; the assignment of ancestral lands as the property of a university in the Province of Misiones; mining exploitation in the Province of Jujuy and the Province of Chubut without prior consultation with the indigenous communities affected; and allegations of discrimination against members of indigenous communities. ENDEPA adds that, following the complaints made concerning all these allegations, the INAI initiated administrative procedure No. INAI-50395-2008. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government confines itself in its reply to summarizing the allegations of ENDEPA, without giving a precise reply. Emphasizing the gravity of the allegations, the Committee requests the Government to:

- (i) take the necessary measures to conduct investigations into the allegations of the violent eviction of the communities referred to and the death of members of the Chuschagasta indigenous community in Tucumán and the Toba-Qom de Navogh indigenous community in Formosa;
- (ii) provide information on the progress made in the procedures relating to file No. INAI-50395-2008, referred to by ENDEPA, concerning the complaints related to the abovementioned acts and the eviction of the Paichil Antriao community; and
- (iii) take measures, in consultation with the indigenous peoples affected, with a view to finding an appropriate solution to each of the disputes referred to, in accordance with Act No. 26160, which provides for the suspension of evictions.

Articles 2 and 33. Coordinated and systematic policy. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the procedures for the election of indigenous representatives to the Coordination Council envisaged in Act No. 23302/85, and to indicate whether such procedures ensure that the indigenous peoples are able to elect their representatives without any interference. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that INAI Resolution No. 41/08 determines the procedures for the designation of indigenous representatives to the Coordination Council through regional community assemblies in which the highest community authorities and the representatives of each people participate. These representatives are elected by each community in accordance with their own procedures. The INAI provides support for these procedures, and the representatives' designations have to be ratified by means of a decree issued by the national executive power. With regard to the designation of members of the CPI, the Committee notes that, according to the CTA, they are elected by the provinces, instead of being elected by the communities, their functions are limited and they lack real participation in the decisions of the INAI. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the CPI is composed of 100 representatives of over 30 peoples. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the composition of CPI is due to be renewed in 2011 with the election of two representatives for each community of the same people in each province, to serve a three-year mandate. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the activities of the Coordination Council, and particularly on the election of the representatives of indigenous peoples and the intervals between the meetings of the Council and its agenda. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the limits to the exercise of its powers when issuing the Decree of ratification of the election of the members of CPI. The Committee requests the Government to attach copies of the reports of the meetings of the Council. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate how indigenous participation councils take part in the decision-making process of INAI. Furthermore, observing that the Government has not provided the requested information on the distribution of responsibilities and the coordination mechanisms established between the Coordination Council and the Advisory Council (envisaged in Act No. 23302/85), on the one hand, and the CPI (envisaged in Act No. 26160) on the other, the Committee reiterates its request to the Government in this regard.

Articles 6 and 7. Consultation and participation. The Committee notes that, with regard to the Plan of Action on Participation and Consultation drawn up in a seminar/workshop held in May 2007, the Government indicates that the Directorate for the Affirmation of Indigenous Rights has been established, and that the appointment to the post will be made upon the proposal of indigenous organizations (National Decree No. 702/201). The Government adds that progress is being made in regulating the right to participation and consultation, for which purpose the INAI will establish a legislative assessment and drafting commission together with indigenous organizations and the CPI. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made in regulating the right to participation and consultation, and requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that such regulations are in conformity with the Convention.

Observations made by the Educational Workers' Union of Río Negro (UNTER), dated 28 July 2008. The Committee notes that, in its observations, the UNTER refers to the following matters: the granting of hydrocarbon exploration and exploitation permits in the Province of Río Negro (the hydrocarbon-bearing fields of Neuquén, Colorado del Ñirihuau and Cañadón Asfalto-Meseta de Somuncurá); the establishment of protected natural areas in the Province of Río Negro without having held consultations with the Mapuche peoples inhabiting the area; and the failure to recognize the rights of the Mapuche communities and eviction from the lands they traditionally occupy (the Quintupuray and Lof Mariano Epulef communities). The Committee regrets that the Government has not provided its comments on this subject, and requests it to do so without further delay.

Article 14. Lands. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on the progress achieved and the difficulties encountered in the process of regularization of the lands traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples, in accordance with Act No. 26160 declaring the ownership and possession of traditionally occupied lands an emergency issue. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the National Programme for the Identification of the Lands of Indigenous Communities (RETECI) has concluded seven specific agreements in various provinces, with a view to carrying out the technical and legal identification of the respective lands. In April 2010, the identification process was completed in the provinces of Córdoba, Entre Ríos, Tierra del Fuego, La Pampa and San Juan, and is awaiting implementation in the provinces of Mendoza, Neuquén, Misiones, San Luis, Formosa, Corrientes and La Rioja. The Government indicates that the implementation of the Programme has given rise to renewed disputes between the communities, on the one hand, and non-indigenous families, economic and local interests, on the other, which has resulted in reticence by provincial bodies in giving effect to it; (2) 13,460,000 hectares are to be identified, of which 4 million hectares have been registered or identified as indigenous lands prior to Act No. 26160, while 2,955,838 hectares have been identified as indigenous lands since the adoption of the Act; (3) Act No. 26554 extended both the time limits envisaged in Act No. 26160 for land identification and the period of suspension of evictions until November 2013, and increased the amount of the special fund to support the demarcation of lands by US$30 million; (4) the Programme for the Regularization and Adjudication of the Lands of the Aboriginal Population of Jujuy (PRATPAJ) has regularized approximately 1,312,645 hectares. Referring to the provincial report, the Government provides detailed information on the manner in which those lands were distributed in the communities in the departments of Cochinoca, Yavi, Susques, Tilcara, Humahuaca and Tumbaya, as well as information on pending procedures; and (5) Presidential Decree No. 700/2010 was issued ordering the establishment of a Legislative Analysis and Drafting Commission composed of representatives of the provincial governments, indigenous peoples and the CPI. The above Commission has prepared a preliminary draft Bill for the recognition of indigenous community possession and property. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on:

- (i) the land regularization processes that have been carried out and are pending, the surface area covered and the beneficiary communities, as well as the difficulties encountered; and
- (ii) the progress made in the preparation and adoption of legislation to recognize indigenous community possession and ownership.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 9 September 2011, and the observations of the Bolivian Central of Workers (COB), of 12 October 2011, which were forwarded to the Government on 27 September and 14 October 2011, respectively. The Committee will examine these observations together with any information the Government wishes to provide in that regard at its next session.

Brazil

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 the Constitution of the ILO). The Committee notes the report of the tripartite committee (GB.304/14/7) set up to examine the representation made by the Union of Engineers of the Federal District (SENGE/DF), referring to Bill No. 62 of 2005 on the administration of public forests (PLC/62 2005) and alleging that the indigenous peoples were not consulted on the impact the adoption of the Bill would have on their rights. The Committee notes that in paragraph 62 of the abovementioned report, the tripartite committee recommended to the Governing Body that it approve the report and:

- (a) request the Government to adopt the measures needed to complement the consultation process concerning the impact of timber concessions envisaged in the Act concerning the administration of public forests on the indigenous people likely to be affected, taking into account the terms of Article 6 of the Convention and the Committee's conclusions set out in paragraphs 42–44 of the Report;
- (b) request the Government to adopt in particular the relevant regulatory and practical measures to implement the consultation process laid down in Article 15(2) of the Convention, including the procedural requirements stipulated in Article 6, before licences are granted for the timber exploration and/or exploitation envisaged in the Act concerning the administration of public forests;

- (c) request the Government to ensure that the consultation process required under Article 15 of the Convention is implemented in relation to the lands referred to in paragraph 52 of the Report, whatever their legal status may be, provided that they comply with the criteria of Article 13(2) of the Convention (lands which the peoples concerned occupy or otherwise use);
- (d) invite the Government, under the terms of Article 7(1) of the Convention, to guarantee the participation of the indigenous peoples in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of plans and programmes related to the logging activities referred to, including the determination of the land to be excluded under the terms of section 11(IV) of the Act concerning the administration of public forests;
- (e) request the Government, in accordance with Article 7(3) of the Convention, to ensure that studies are carried out, in cooperation with the peoples concerned, with a view to assessing the social, spiritual and environmental impact on the peoples concerning of the logging activities envisaged in the Act;
- (f) request the Government to ensure that the indigenous peoples affected by logging activities participate, whenever possible, in the benefits of such activities and receive fair compensation for any loss or damage they may sustain as a result of such activities;
- (g) request the Government to ensure that logging activities do not affect the rights of ownership and possession laid down in Article 14 of the Convention;
- (h) request the Government to adopt special measures to safeguard the persons, institutions, property, labour, cultures and environment of the peoples affected by logging activities;
- (i) recommend that the Government request ILO technical assistance and cooperation, if it considers it appropriate, in order to implement, in cooperation with the social partners, the recommendations set out in the present report, and to promote dialogue among the parties;
- (j) entrust the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations with following up the questions raised in this report with respect to the application of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169); and
- (k) make this report publicly available and close the procedure initiated by the representation of the complainant alleging non-observance by Brazil of the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169).

Called on to follow up on the representation, the Committee observes that the Government has sent no information in this regard. The Committee therefore asks the Government to send detailed information on all the questions raised by the tripartite committee in its report of March 2009 (GB.304/14/7).

Article 1 of the Convention. Self-identification. The Committee welcomes the Government's acknowledgement that the Convention applies in full to the Quilombola communities and in its report sends extensive and detailed information on programmes and policies intended to safeguard the cultural, social and economic integrity of these peoples. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on these matters, including an evaluation of the practical impact of the programmes and policies, particularly their effects on the development of the Quilombola communities, specifying the number of Quilombola communities and its members covered.

Articles 6, 7, 15 and 16. Consultation and participation. Legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government of the obligation to consult the peoples covered by the Convention whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly, and asked it to examine the existing mechanisms for consultation and participation, in cooperation with the indigenous peoples. The Committee notes in this connection that, according to the Government, a tripartite dialogue has been initiated on the establishment of a mechanism for consultation. The Government indicates that although various state bodies already use consultation mechanisms, there is no uniformity in the scope of the consultations or the form they take. Since all sectors have recognized the need for such a mechanism, a seminar was planned for the purpose of drafting, with the participation of the indigenous peoples, a proposal for a law or decree on consultation. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure proper consultation and participation of the indigenous peoples in developing the consultation mechanism and to send information on all progress made in this regard. It also asks the Government to indicate how indigenous peoples are currently consulted whenever consideration is being given to specific legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly.

Quilombola communities of Alcantara. The Committee has for a number of years been referring to the situation faced by the Quilombola communities of the municipality of Alcantara (State of Maranhão) owing to the establishment of the Alcantara Launch Centre (CLA) and the Alcantara Space Centre (CEA) on land traditionally occupied by Quilombola communities, without them being consulted and without their participation (in 1980, 52,000 hectares were expropriated and in 1992 that figure increased to 62,000 hectares). According to the communities, there has never been an environmental impact study. The Committee noted that in the context of a Technical Study on Identification and Demarcation, in which the relevant Government institutions took part, it was established that 78,105.34 hectares would be considered as territory of the Quilombola communities, which would benefit 3,500 families. As the Committee understood matters, the land traditionally occupied by the communities would be reduced as a result. The Committee accordingly concluded that there was a dispute because part of the land claimed by the Quilombola overlapped with land assigned for the CLA and the CEA, to which the Quilombola are denied access on grounds of national security. The Committee notes that according to observations submitted on 6 November 2009 by the Union of Rural Workers of Alcantara (STTR) and the Union of Family Agriculture Workers of Alcantara (SINTRAF), the land demarcated did not include the 8,700 hectares on which the CLA is established. The abovementioned organizations also refer to the impact studies carried out to date with the participation of the indigenous peoples, but which have not been approved as yet by the competent authorities and which have not determined the damages to be awarded to the Quilombola communities. The Committee notes in this connection the Government's statement that: (1) the land regularization process was remanded, in 2009, by the Procurator (AGU) to Federal Arbitration and Conciliation Chambers (CCAF) to settle the matter of overlapping interests between the regularization of Quilombola lands and the extension of the space launch area; (2) several Government entities have participated in these proceedings; (3) according to the Procurator, use of the land for launching could imply the relocation of 1,000 Quilombola families; (4) the Conciliation Chamber held seven meetings prior to October 2010 and suggested, following the finalization of the definitive proposal, holding a ministerial meeting and consulting the Alcantara Quilombola communities on the matter before referring its conclusions to the President of the Republic. The Government further indicates proceedings on the same matter are also pending at the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) and refers the Committee to the Government's submissions to that Commission.

The Committee observes that the information supplied by the Government, although referring to negotiations held between different state bodies (some of them responsible for indigenous affairs), affords no evidence that consultations were held at any stage with the representative organizations of the Quilombola communities about the establishment of the CLA and the CEA, neither on the identification or demarcation of lands, nor about the cooperation agreement concluded with Ukraine in 2002 and 2004 which involves an extension of the area in question, or about settlement of the dispute once it was realized that interests overlapped. There is also no evidence that participation of indigenous peoples was ensured in the decisions that led to the establishment of the CLA and the CEA or in the impact studies carried out in that connection. The Committee must recall that the Government has a duty under Article 6(1)(a) and (2) of the Convention to consult the peoples covered by the Convention through their representative institutions whenever consideration is being given to legislative or administrative measures which may affect them directly, so that agreement can be reached or their consent obtained regarding the measures proposed. The Government must also, pursuant to Article 7(3), ensure that studies are carried out, in cooperation with the peoples concerned, to assess the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact on them of planned development activities. The Committee is bound to emphasize that the results of these studies are to be considered as fundamental criteria for the implementation of such activities. The Committee also refers the Government to Article 16 of the Convention should the need arise to transfer indigenous peoples from the lands they occupy. The Committee requests the Government to send information on the following:

- (i) all the consultations carried out to date in the context of the dispute regarding the lands traditionally occupied by the Quilombola communities of Alcantara and which were assigned for the establishment of the Alcantara Launch Centre (CLA) and Alcantara Space Centre (CEA), particularly the consultations held to follow up to the procedure undertaken by the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Chamber.
- (ii) the manner in which participation by the Quilombola communities was ensured in the Technical Study on Identification and Demarcation of lands, and the progress made in identifying and demarcating lands traditionally occupied by Quilombola communities so as to guarantee the ownership and possession rights of these communities over their traditional lands and safeguard their right to use lands that are not exclusively occupied by them but to which they have traditionally had access for their subsistence and traditional activities; and provisional measures taken pursuant to Article 4 of the Convention to safeguard the persons, institutions, property, labour, cultures and environment of the communities concerned for as long as the recognition and demarcation of their lands is pending.
- (iii) the studies conducted, in cooperation with the peoples concerned, to evaluate the social, spiritual, cultural and environmental impact that the establishment and expansion of the CLA and the CEA may have on the communities affected, and the manner in which the Government guarantees the cultural, social and economic integrity of the Quilombola communities affected in reconciling the conflicting interests of the various parties involved in the matter at hand;
- (iv) the results of any actions pending in this matter before any national judicial authority; and
- (v) the decisions that imply relocation of the communities and the measures taken pursuant to Article 16 of the Convention.

Belo Monte hydroelectric plant. The Committee notes the extensive information supplied by the Government on the Belo Monte hydroelectric plant construction project and the studies and participation processes carried out on the project's implementation. The Committee notes in particular that: (1) construction of the plant is part of the Government's commitment to reduce CO² emissions while maintaining energy production by means of renewable resources; (2) the licence was awarded after the environmental assessment by the competent bodies for implementation in the Xingu river basin; (3) the project is not located on indigenous lands, (as shown by the environmental assessment studies, and after the area to be flooded was reduced from 1,225 km² to 516 km² (-60 per cent), of which 228 km² constitute the current river bed); (4) it does not involve flooding of indigenous lands or relocation of indigenous peoples; (5) the entire process was monitored by the National Foundation for Indigenous Affairs (FUNAI), as well as other governmental bodies and the interested indigenous communities; (6) the Presidential Decree of 19 November 2009 established an Inter-Governmental Working Group (GTI) consisting of 19 federal bodies and entities in addition to 27 bodies of the state of Pará, municipalities and members of civil society, and the group drew up a Sustainable Regional Development Plan for the Xingu river basin. A bipartite committee was given responsibility for the monitoring of the implementation of the plan. The Committee is composed of 15 governmental representatives, and 15 representatives of civil society, two of whom are representatives of indigenous peoples. The enterprise responsible for the construction is, according to the Government committed to the economic development of the Xingu river basin, thus investing 500 million reais in the plan.

As to effective participation by the indigenous peoples in the process, the Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) on 25 May 2005 the environmental impact studies were made available for public consultation, and in 2009, hearings were held in several of the towns affected, and in 2008 and 2009, 20 workshops were organized in which local communities including indigenous peoples participated to allow them to clear up any doubts, and receive information on the project's content and effects and on mitigation measures; (2) the Brazilian Environmental Institute (IBAMA) conducted workshops with indigenous peoples between 19 August and 2 September 2009 to acquaint them with the conclusions of the environmental impact study in which 5,000 people participated, 200 of whom were "indigenous representatives"; (3) on the basis of FUNAI technical studies, Opinion No. 21/CNAM/CGPIMA was issued, analysing the licensing procedure and the impact studies, and imposing certain measures of support for the reinforcement of institutions and the development of communities affected by the project. Lastly, the Committee notes the Government's statement that a case pertaining to the project is pending before the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. The Committee notes that in the course of these proceedings the Inter-American Commission issued precautionary measures on 1 April 2011 (MC-382-10). The Committee notes that the Inter-American Commission asked the Government to suspend the licensing process for the project and prevent the implementation of any works until certain minimum conditions are met, including that of fulfilling the obligation to undertake consultations in accordance with the American Convention on Human Rights. The Committee also notes that by a decision of 28 September 2011, a Federal Judge of Pará issued a provisional order prohibiting the builder from making any alterations to the river bed, whether dams or any other works that would interfere with the natural course of the river and adversely affect the fish fauna as a result. While noting the information supplied, the Committee points out that according to Article 15 of the Convention, the Government has an obligation to consult the indigenous peoples before undertaking or permitting any programmes for the exploitation of resources pertaining to their lands. It further observes that the hydroelectric project could have consequences such as alteration of the navigability of rivers, flora and fauna and climate, that affect the peoples living on the lands where the project will be located, and which go further than the flooding of lands or the displacement of the peoples concerned. The Committee also recalls that, according to Article 6, governments shall consult the peoples concerned in particular through their representative institutions, rather than individuals, and that such consultations are to be undertaken in good faith and in a form appropriate to the circumstances, with the objective of achieving agreement or consent to the proposed measures. In its general observation of 2010, the Committee considered that consultation procedures and mechanisms should allow the full expression of the viewpoints of the persons concerned, in a timely manner and based on their full understanding of the issues involved, so that they may be able to affect the outcome and a consensus can be achieved, and be undertaken in a manner that is acceptable to all parties. In the same general observation, the Committee went on to say that ad hoc consultation on certain measures may not be sufficient to meet the Convention's requirements and that the communities affected should participate even in the preparation of environmental impact studies. On the strength of the documents and information supplied by the Government, the Committee takes the view that the procedures carried out so far, while extensive, fall short of the requirements set in Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention as described above, and that there is no evidence that they enabled the indigenous peoples to take part effectively in determining their priorities, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government as follows:

- (i) to take the necessary steps to carry out consultations with the indigenous peoples affected, in accordance with Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention, on the construction of the Belo Monte hydroelectric plant before the harmful effects of the plant may have become irreversible;
- (ii) in consultation with the indigenous peoples, to take measures to determine whether the priorities of these peoples have been respected and whether their interests will be adversely affected and to what extent, with a view to adopting appropriate mitigation and compensation measures;
- (iii) to provide information on the results of the proceedings pending before the Federal Judge of Pará.

Transposition of the San Francisco river. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government about the San Francisco River Integration Project, under which the San Francisco river is to be joined to the basins of the north-east region, and about FUNAI's participation in the process so that the indigenous peoples can be informed and have their say about the project and so that mitigation and compensation measures may be applied. The Committee notes that both IBAMA and FUNAI issued guidelines for the drafting of an environmental impact study in which they took account of the Truká, Tumbalalá, Pipipan and Kambiwá indigenous lands. The study identified problems and put forward proposals regarding health, education, infrastructure, economic activities and indigenous organization among other subjects. Observing, however, that the Government provides no information on the consultations with indigenous peoples carried out in accordance with Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention, or on the participation of these peoples in the impact studies and various measures and programmes as provided by Article 7 of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on these matters.

Proposal for a law on the construction of a hydroelectric plant on the Cotingo river in the indigenous territory of Raposa Serra Do Sol. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the debate on Legislative Decree No. 2540/06 on the dam project has resumed in Congress and the Bill is currently before the Mines and Energy Committee and will eventually be submitted to the Justice and Constitution Committee. Once approved by the committees, it will be referred for examination to the plenary of Congress. The Government indicates that the Decree seeks to consolidate the right of indigenous peoples to consultation and participation in the discussions and provides for hearings for the indigenous communities affected, approval by Congress of agreements proposed to these communities, the establishment of measures to protect the physical, socio-economic and cultural integrity of the communities and for environmental impact studies to be carried out. According to the Government, FUNAI has defended before Congress the need for free and informed consultation with the indigenous peoples before there is a vote on the Bill. The Committee notes that according to the note issued by FUNAI, No. 560/COLIC/CGGAM/10, included with the Government's report, the indigenous peoples who occupy the areas affected by the project are opposed to it. The note emphasizes that the project would have irreversible effects on the peoples concerned and FUNAI accordingly advises consulting them. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the indigenous peoples are fully consulted on the project and that their views, priorities and interests are taken into account when decisions are adopted. The Committee hopes that the peoples concerned will be able to cooperate in the impact studies to be carried out, in accordance with Article 7 of the Convention. It asks the Government to send detailed information on all progress in this regard.

Mining on the lands of the Cinta Larga indigenous people. The Committee notes that the Government states that the measures adopted are aimed at recovery of the traditional indigenous lands by expelling the invading prospectors and miners, in cooperation with the indigenous peoples. FUNAI operates controls in the area with the assistance of the affected peoples themselves and studies are being conducted on their development. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information in this regard.

Article 14. Lands. Situation of the Quilombola communities. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, pursuant to Ordinance No. 98/2007, which empowers the Palmares Cultural Foundation to set up an administrative procedure for certifying lands and to organize the land register of self identified indigenous or tribal communities, 1,635 land titles have been certified and awarded since 2003 to Quilombola communities. The National Institute on Settlement and Agrarian Reform (INCRA) has opened a total of 996 land titling processes since 2003. The Government also sends abundant information on the programmes and policies devised for these communities. The Committee asks the Government to continue to send information on land certification and titling processes for the Quilombola communities, pursuant to Article 14 of the Convention. It also asks the Government to provide information on the specific measures taken to safeguard the persons, institutions and assets of the peoples concerned pending the titling of the lands.

Situation of the Guaraní peoples in Mato Grosso do Sul. Guaraní Kaiowá peoples. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the extremely serious situation facing the Guaraní Kaiowá communities with respect to the lands they traditionally occupy. The Committee notes that in observations dated 1 September 2010, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) stated that procedures for demarcating the lands traditionally occupied by these peoples were slow and that soya and sugar cane cultivation was encroaching on these lands, causing the displacement of the peoples affected. The ITUC also refers to acts of violence – including murder – and threats against members of the Kaiowá community. It also refers to violations of the labour rights of indigenous peoples working on the plantations. The Committee notes in this connection that the Government acknowledges that disputes over lands have led to violations of human rights of the members of this community and indicates that since 2000, there have been 13 court cases pertaining to serious disputes between indigenous people and plantation owners. It also acknowledges their plight as victims of poverty. The Government states that the proceedings for the protection of indigenous lands in Mato Grosso are slow and that FUNAI is in the meantime dealing with emergency situations. It has established six working groups for identifying and demarcating traditional lands. On 24 April 2011, on the basis of Ordinance No. MJ/GMN 499 the Guaraní Kaiowá community were granted permanent possession of Jatayvary land in the municipality of Ponta Porã covering a surface area of 8,800 hectares. The Government indicates that these communities occupy some 30,000 hectares and that FUNAI will undertake the necessary measures to demarcate the indigenous land and obtain approval from the President, in accordance with the law. The Government also provides information on the various demarcation processes conducted so far. The Committee notes in this context the Report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous people, which refers to the extreme poverty and marginalization plaguing the Guaraní Kaiowá peoples, the high infant mortality rate and acts of violence, including homicide, perpetrated against their members (A/HRC/12/34/Add.2, 26 August 2009). The Committee requests the Government to:

- (i) take the necessary measures to secure, without delay and in collaboration with the indigenous peoples affected, the demarcation of the lands they traditionally occupy with a view to recognition of their rights to ownership and possession, in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention;
- (ii) adopt the necessary specific measures to safeguard the persons, institutions and assets of the peoples concerned pending demarcation of the lands, including measures to provide adequate protection of the physical integrity and safety of the members of the communities against threats or acts of violence;
- (iii) take the necessary steps to investigate the acts of violence reported; and
- (iv) send information on all these matters.

The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the situation of the Guaraní Mbyá community of Eldorado do Sul referred to in the observations of 19 September 2008 by the Workers' Union of the Federal University of Santa Catarina (SINTUFSC), to which the Committee referred in earlier comments.

Colombia

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the Government's reply of 12 November 2010 pertaining to the observations of the Union of Workers of the National Mining Enterprise "Minercol Ltda." (SINTRAMINERCOL) dated 28 August 2010. The Committee also notes the Government's replies, received at the Office on 7 and 22 October and 2 November 2011, to the observations of 30 August 2010 and 30 August 2011 by the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT) and the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC).

The Committee also notes the communications of 31 August 2011 from SINTRAMINERCOL.

It also takes note of the communication of 31 August 2011 from the National Employers Association of Colombia (ANDI). The Committee likewise notes the observations of 19 October 2011 from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE). The Committee requests the Government to send its comments thereon.

The Committee also notes the report of the High-level Tripartite Mission that visited the country at the invitation of the Government in February 2011 and which refers, inter alia, to issues related to measures to combat violence.

In view of the abundant and detailed recent information supplied by the Government, particularly in the communications received on 22 October and 2 November, the Committee proposes to examine all the issues raised at its next session. At the present session, the Committee will examine only certain issues.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Coordinated and systematic policy to protect the rights of indigenous peoples. In its previous comments the Committee took note of the climate of violence in the country affecting among others the indigenous and Afro-Colombian communities. It notes that the observations submitted by the abovementioned organizations give an account of specific situations of violence, harassment and threats to indigenous peoples. The CUT and the CTC further assert that access to the legal system is difficult for indigenous peoples and that the response of state bodies to the complaints and offences committed against indigenous peoples is inadequate.

The Committee notes the information by the Government concerning the measures that it has been adopting to combat violence and, in particular, violence affecting the indigenous peoples. The Government also provides information on: (1) the preparation of national development plans; (2) the design and implementation of the Democratic Security Policy, in force since 2002; (3) the preparation of the National Action Plan for Human Rights; (4) the creation of the Committee on Regulation and Evaluation of Risks for Ethnic Groups, in which indigenous and Afro-Colombian representatives participate; and (5) the establishment of a programme for the protection of the fundamental rights of displaced indigenous women. The Government also refers to the preparation of a guarantee programme and to safeguard plans for 34 peoples in particular, which, according to the Constitutional Court (Resolution No. 4 of the Constitutional Court, noted by the Committee in its previous comments) are at serious risk of disappearing, both physically and culturally. The Government states that "a set of remedial and urgent actions, measures and instruments have been proposed to respond to the gravity of a situation in which the indigenous peoples of Colombia are facing impairment and massive violations of multiple rights and are in one way or another affected acutely by armed conflict and forced displacement".

The Committee also notes that the Government provides detailed information on the investigations conducted by the Office of the Public Prosecutor with respect to the concrete cases referred to by the CUT and the CTC in their communications and, in particular, that an investigation procedure has been devised for instances of violations of the rights of indigenous peoples, that measures were adopted to combat impunity in such cases which include the possibility of reopening closed cases. The Committee also notes the information provided concerning the appointment of dedicated human rights prosecutors. The Government provides detailed information on the number of cases referred to the human rights unit of the Office of the Public Prosecutor. The Committee notes with interest that fact-finding commissions to investigate homicides in various communities have been appointed, which have enabled the offenders to be identified and has moved investigation forward; and that care has been provided for 40,256 victims, which include numerous members of the indigenous peoples.

The Committee welcomes the adoption of the Act on victims and the restitution of lands (Act No. 1448 of 10 June 2011), the objective of which is to compensate, restore and indemnify victims of the armed conflict in Colombia. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that a Decree is being drafted to implement the Act, in consultation with indigenous peoples. The Committee hopes that the Decree will be in conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to provide information in this regard.

While acknowledging the efforts made by the Government to improve the situation of violence in general and in particular against indigenous peoples, including their leaders, the Committee notes with concern that, according to the observations submitted by the abovementioned organizations and in view of the measures that the Government has had to take, the situation continues to be serious. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to continue its efforts in a coordinated and systematic manner, to ensure protection of the physical, social, cultural, economic and political integrity of the indigenous and Afro-Colombian communities and their members. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to take the necessary measures to ensure that the acts of violence reported are investigated.

Article 6. Legislation on consultations. In its observation of 2009 the Committee referred to the legislation in force concerning the right of consultation, which is not in line with the Convention in terms both of its content and of the adoption process. The Committee previously urged the Government to ensure the participation and consultation of indigenous peoples in the preparation of the provisions for regulating the consultation process. The Committee notes the indication in the observations from the ANDI that mechanisms, programmes and activities promoted by the State have been set up to ensure effective protection of the rights of indigenous peoples at national, departmental and municipal levels. ANDI adds that the right of prior consultation established in the National Constitution is a prerogative of the indigenous peoples which cannot affect the general interests of the nation or hamper sustainable social and economic development.

The Committee notes according to the CUT and the CTC, the Presidential Directive No. 001 of 2010 concerning consultation, the procedure was not the subject of consultation with the indigenous peoples. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a working group has been set up within the Ministry of the Interior on the subject of prior consultation and is drawing up preliminary draft legislation to regulate the fundamental right to prior consultation, which itself has to be submitted for consultation with the indigenous peoples. The Government also indicates that the Presidential Directive contains instructions for the executive authority concerning the consultation procedure. The Government adds that the existing legal framework establishes the obligation of prior consultation and points out that recent Decree No. 2893 of 2011 provides that the Directorate for Indigenous, Roma and Minority Affairs shall have the function of coordinating and implementing the prior consultation processes relating to the presentation of legislative and administrative initiatives at national level. The Directorate has already adopted measures with a view to undertaking consultations on various items of draft legislation, namely: the Bill on levies; the Bill on the regional environmental council; the Bill on rural development; the Legislative Decree on victims and land restitution; the decree on access to genetic resources and related traditional knowledge; and the Bill on territorial entities and levies. The Government also indicates that the 2010–14 Development Plan provides for institutionalization of the prior consultation mechanism.

The Committee notes in particular that the Government, with the participation of the Vice-President of the country, is undertaking consultation on different issues with the indigenous communities and has requested the Office to participate as an observer in these consultations.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on the following matters:

- (i) the progress made on the preliminary draft of the bill concerning the right to consultation which is due to be submitted to the indigenous peoples and the state body which is responsible for that process;
- (ii) developments in the processes implemented by the Directorate for Indigenous, Roma and Minority Affairs for the consultation of the indigenous peoples in relation to the various pieces of draft legislation mentioned above; and
- (iii) the measures taken with a view to the institutionalization of the mechanism for prior consultation and the participation of the indigenous peoples in that process.

Article 15. Consultation regarding exploration and exploitation projects in indigenous territories. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the existence of a number of disputes between the indigenous communities, the State and private companies linked to projects for the exploration and exploitation of natural resources in which it is alleged that adequate consultation of the indigenous peoples affected by those projects have not been undertaken. The Committee notes with interest recent Rulings T-769 of 2009 and T-129 of 2011 in which the Constitutional Court referred to the need to undertake consultations with the indigenous peoples concerning projects which may directly affect their rights and established the requirements to be fulfilled by such consultations. In this respect, taking account of the decisions of the Constitutional Court, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, when a project for the exploration and exploitation of natural resources in territories traditionally occupied by indigenous peoples is planned, consultations are held with the indigenous peoples concerned as required by the Convention. On this particular issue, the Committee draws the attention of the Government and the social partners to its general observation of 2010.

Representativeness. The Committee notes the references in the observations from the CGT, CUT, CTC and SINTRAMINERCOL to problems of representativeness concerning some of the leaders representing the Afro-Colombian communities. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any specific information on this subject. The Committee recalls that the principle of representativeness is a key component in the obligation of consultation. Even though it may be difficult in many cases to determine who represents a community in particular, the Committee considers that if there is no adequate consultation process with the indigenous or tribal institutions or organizations with are truly representative of the communities affected, the consultations held would not comply with the requirements of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate whether there are reasonable and objective criteria established at national level, in consultation with the indigenous peoples concerned, for determining the representativeness of the leaders of the indigenous peoples and what measures are taken in the event of any dispute to identify those who actually represent the communities.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2012.]

El Salvador

Articles 11 to 14 of the Convention. Land rights. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to take the necessary measures to recognize and promote the rights of the indigenous populations with regard to lands traditionally occupied by them and to provide information on the state of the proceedings instituted by the indigenous populations of Panchimalco and Izalco. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Programme for Landless Rural Inhabitants (CST) undertaken by the Salvadorian Institute for Agrarian Reform (ISTA) has benefited approximately 290 members of four indigenous associations. The Government also refers to the "Policy for Indigenous Peoples" and the "Social reform for the identity and rights of indigenous peoples", set out in the Government Plan 2009–14. With regard to the proceedings instituted by the indigenous populations of Panchimalco and Izalco concerning the pollution and sale of their lands, the Committee notes that, with regard to the sale of the lands, the last decision issued on 22 October 2009 referred to a hearing between the Public Prosecutor and the Director of the National Fund for People's Housing (FONAVIPRO) in the context of a process of mediation initiated earlier. With regard to the pollution of the lands, the Committee notes the reference by the Government to a decision of the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman, which ordered a review of the consultation processes undertaken going back to 2006. In this respect, the Committee notes the concluding observations of the United Nations Human Rights Committee and the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD) in which they express concern that indigenous peoples are still unable to fully enjoy their economic, social and cultural rights, in particular regarding land ownership and access to drinking water (CCPR/C/SLV/CO/6, of 18 November 2010, and CERD/C/SLV/CO/14-15, of 14 September 2010). The Committee recalls that Article 11 of the Convention establishes the obligation to recognize the right of ownership, collective or individual, of the members of the populations concerned over the lands which they traditionally occupy. The Committee, therefore, once again urges the Government to take practical steps for the recognition and promotion of the rights of indigenous populations with regard to lands traditionally occupied by them in order to bring an end to their current situation of vulnerability. The Committee also requests the Government to take steps with a view to giving effect to the measures requested by the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman in the context of the proceedings instituted by the indigenous populations in Panchimalco and Izalco concerning the pollution and sale of their lands. The Committee finally requests the Government to provide information on the content and impact in practice of the "Policy for Indigenous Peoples", the "Social reform of the identity and rights of indigenous peoples" and the Programme for Landless Rural Inhabitants (CST), and on the Government Plan 2009–14, which refers to indigenous peoples.

The Committee once again encourages the Government to consider the possibility of ratifying the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), in accordance with its general observation of 1992, and requests it to continue to keep it informed of any progress in this respect.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Guatemala

The Committee notes the observations from the Indigenous and Rural Workers Trade Union Movement of Guatemala (MSICG) and the National Union of Health Workers of Guatemala (SNTSG) dated 30 August 2010. The Committee also notes the observations from the Coordinating Committee of Agricultural, Commercial, Industrial and Financial Associations (CACIF) of 30 August 2010 and 30 August 2011. The Committee further notes the observations of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) dated 19 October 2011. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations in this regard.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO, GB.299/6/1, June 2007). The Committee recalls that the representation refers to the lack of prior consultation of the peoples concerned with regard to the licence for exploratory mining for nickel and other minerals (No. LEXR-902) awarded to the Mineras Izabal SA company in December 2004 for starting mining exploration activities in the territory of the Maya Q'eqchi indigenous people. The Committee notes with regret that the Government once again has not sent its observations on this matter. The Committee urges the Government to send detailed information in its next report on the action taken further to the recommendations of the Tripartite Committee.

Articles 6, 7 and 15. Right to consultation. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to establish institutional mechanisms for consultation and participation. The Committee notes that the MSICG and the SNTSG, on the one hand, and the CACIF, on the other, refer in their comments to the need to establish a consultation procedure. The Committee observes that the national legislation contains provisions which regulate the right of consultation in a fragmented or incomplete manner, namely: the 1995 Agreement on Identity and Rights of Indigenous Peoples (Peace Agreements); article 173 of the Constitution of the Republic; section 26 of the Act concerning urban and rural development councils (Decree No. 11-2002, which provisionally regulates consultation pending the adoption of national legislation) and the Municipal Code (Decree No. 12-2002). The Committee notes that the municipal authorities and indigenous communities, on the basis of the abovementioned provisions, have undertaken a series of consultations at the communal level which were not conducive to effective dialogue among the interested parties and resulted in conclusions that were not recognized by the national public authorities or the enterprises. This situation has resulted in greater unrest. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest the ruling of the Constitutional Court of 21 December 2009 (case No. 3878-2007), which examines this issue and establishes that although these consultations are useful for understanding the general views of those consulted with regard to the exploration and exploitation project while also constituting a kind of citizens' participation, they do not give effect to the right of consultation established in the Convention. The Committee notes the Court's affirmation that it is for the State to guarantee the effective application of the right of consultation, which, according to the Court, must take the form of prior consultation and not be restricted to mere information, must consist of a genuine dialogue between the parties with the aim of reaching a joint agreement, and must take place in good faith as part of a procedure that enjoy the confidence of the parties and involving the representative authorities of the indigenous peoples.

Legislation relating to consultation and participation. In its previous comments the Committee noted the existence of various legislative drafts relating to consultation which were awaiting examination by the Congress of the Republic. The Committee understands that these bills are currently being examined by Congress. The Committee notes that, further to a request from the Government on 26 July 2010, an ILO technical assistance mission visited the country from 23 to 27 August 2010 in order to provide assistance with drawing up a roadmap so that both the indigenous communities and the authorities have a better understanding of the Convention and to offer guidance on the drafting of a bill and its regulations for the application of the Convention. The Committee notes that, according to the report, the mission had the opportunity to meet numerous government entities, social partners, indigenous organizations and their representatives, and two private companies. The Committee notes with concern the high degree of social conflict observed by the mission, and recognized by all sectors, relating to the exploitation of natural resources. The Committee notes that, according to the mission report, all sectors also recognize that the lack of a consultation mechanism and the lack of specific consultation with regard to the abovementioned draft legislation as provided for in the Convention are the main reason for the existing unrest. The Committee also notes that during the technical mission the Government presented a draft of the "Regulations governing the ILO Convention No. 169 consultation process" on which the ILO made comments. This draft was already presented to the public by the President of the Republic on 23 February 2011 and opened for a period of consultation with the indigenous peoples. However, on 24 May 2011 the Constitutional Court granted provisional amparo (legal protection of constitutional rights) and temporarily suspended the consultation procedure launched by the President of the Republic with regard to the regulations. The Committee understands that the Constitutional Court has not issued a definitive ruling on this issue. The Committee notes that the CACIF refers to the draft regulations and indicates that these were drawn up with the participation of the indigenous peoples and the employers. The CACIF regretted that some sectors of the indigenous peoples instituted amparo proceedings, thereby causing the suspension of the consultation procedure regarding the regulations.

While noting the decision of the Constitutional Court resulting in the suspension of the consultation process, the Committee stresses that despite the time that has elapsed no consultation mechanisms have yet been adopted, as provided for in the Convention. Even though it considers that the right of indigenous peoples to be consulted on each occasion that measures are planned which are likely to affect them directly derives directly from the Convention, regardless of whether or not this right is reflected in any specific national legislation, the Committee considers that this legal vacuum prevents the interested parties from holding a constructive dialogue with regard to projects for the exploration and exploitation of natural resources. The Committee considers that the establishment of effective consultation and participation mechanisms contributes towards preventing and resolving disputes through dialogue and reduces social tensions. The Committee recalls that in order to establish this mechanism and for any specific consultations it is essential that there is a climate of mutual trust. The Committee also emphasizes that the obligation to ensure that indigenous peoples are consulted in conformity with the Convention rests with the Government (see general observation 2010). It also underlines the fact that the provisions of the Convention regarding consultation must be read in conjunction with Article 7, which establishes the right of indigenous peoples to decide their own priorities for the process of development and to participate in the formulation, implementation and evaluation of plans and programmes for national and regional development which may affect them directly. The Committee therefore:

- (i) requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to establish an adequate mechanism for consultation and participation in conformity with the Convention, taking account of the general observation of 2010;

- (ii) requests the Government to ensure that indigenous peoples are consulted and can participate in an appropriate manner, through their representative bodies, in the establishment of this mechanism in such a way as to be able to express their opinions and influence the final outcome;
- (iii) requests all the parties concerned to do their utmost to participate in good faith in the abovementioned process, with a view to pursuing a constructive dialogue that enables positive results to be achieved;
- (iv) requests the Government to send information on any further developments in this respect, on progress made with regard to the pending draft legislation before the Congress of the Republic and on the final decision of the Constitutional Court concerning the amparo appeal against the consultation procedure on the “Regulations governing the ILO Convention No. 169 consultation process”;
- (v) observing that section 26 of the Act concerning urban and rural development councils provides for a provisional mechanism for consultation of the indigenous peoples pending settlement of the issue at the national level, requests the Government to supply information on the application of the aforementioned section in practice;
- (vi) requests the Government to take the necessary measures to bring existing legislation, including the Mining Act, into conformity with the Convention.

Development of the consultation process in specific cases: San Juan de Sacatepéquez (cement company), municipalities of Sipacapa and San Miguel de Ixtahuacán (Marlin mine). With regard to the construction of the cement manufacturing company in San Juan de Sacatepéquez, the Committee referred in its previous comments to the permit granted by the municipality of San Juan de Sacatepéquez for the installation of the company despite opposition from most of the local population expressed in the course of public consultation. The Committee notes that the MSICG refers to this matter in its observations. The Committee also notes that the technical assistance mission visited the municipality of San Juan de Sacatepéquez and the cement company and observed that there was an extremely conflictual situation in which dialogue was hampered by the total lack of mutual trust between the parties. The Committee notes the Government’s statements that: (1) the permit for installation of the cement company was granted after the technical studies and the environmental impact study had been carried out; (2) it does not recognize the public consultation conducted in the municipality and refers to the ruling of the Constitutional Court mentioned above; (3) under the National Dialogue System, an extended process of dialogue and information between the company and representatives of the local communities was launched in April 2008. Since that date four round tables for dialogue have been held and numerous meetings have taken place at which various agreements have been reached; (4) owing to the intransigence of one sector of the indigenous communities it has not been possible to build “on the state decision-making processes” and the Government emphasizes that the construction of the cement manufacturing plant has not yet started. The Committee notes that the CACIF observations corroborate the information supplied by the Government and refer to the high quality standards of the company, whose sole focus at present is on social investment in the region, skills training for the population and local reforestation.

As regards the award of a mining exploration and exploitation licence to the Montana Exploradora de Guatemala SA company without consultation of the indigenous peoples concerned, the Committee notes the technical assistance mission’s observation that this is another situation of great conflict which it witnessed. The Committee notes the indication in the observations from the CACIF that the exploitation licence was awarded in 2003 after the submission of the environmental impact study, which was made public and encountered no opposition; that the company began its operations in 2005, generated 9.1 million dollars in levies for 2005–09, paid 31.5 million dollars in taxes and is implementing more than 150 social investment projects relating to educational, sports and healthcare infrastructure. The CACIF adds that the company obtained certification in 2009 from the International Cyanide Management Institute (ICMI) to the effect that the company fulfils the requirements of the International Cyanide Management Code, that it recycles 99 per cent of the water that it uses, undertakes monthly monitoring of water and air quality and noise levels, and has adopted measures for the reforestation and rehabilitation of the land used. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the exploitation of the Marlin mine does not affect the lakes of Atitlán and Izabal in any way, contrary to claims made, since the lakes are a long distance from the mine, and that the company undertook a thorough process of communication and consultation with the communities in the area affected by the mine. The Government includes detailed information on the process and also the list of information meetings held with the communities concerned. It also adds that the mining operations are inspected closely.

The Committee also notes that the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR), in Decision No. MC 260/07 of 20 May 2010, imposed protective measures with regard to this issue and requested the State of Guatemala to suspend mining operations connected with the Marlin I project and other activities connected with the licence awarded to Goldcorp/Montana Exploradora de Guatemala SA and to take effective measures to prevent environmental pollution pending the adoption of a decision by the IACHR concerning the substance of the petition linked to the application for protective measures.

While recognizing the forums for company-community dialogue promoted by the Government in both cases and also the numerous measures and activities implemented by the companies in question for informing the communities about the projects, the Committee considers that these cannot be deemed to constitute the full-scale procedures for consultation of indigenous peoples prescribed by Article 6 of the Convention. As the Committee has indicated on numerous occasions, consultation is not just the holding of mere information meetings but necessarily entails genuine dialogue between the parties concerned involving communication and understanding, mutual respect and good faith, and the sincere desire to reach a joint agreement. The Committee underlines the importance of mining projects yielding tangible benefits for all parties concerned and that these parties have a clear perception of such benefits. The Committee therefore:

- (i) urges the Government once again, in the context of the existing disputes relating to the planned installation of the cement company in San Juan Sacatepéquez and the mining exploration project in the municipalities of Sipacapa and San Miguel de Ixtahuacán (Marlin mine), to establish mechanisms for dialogue which have the confidence of the parties and, through good faith negotiations and in accordance with Articles 6 and 15 of the Convention, enable appropriate solutions to be found to each of these situations that take account of the interests and priorities of the indigenous peoples. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on any further developments in this regard;
- (ii) requests the Government to take the necessary steps to encourage all parties concerned with the two projects to participate in a constructive manner in such a dialogue;
- (iii) urges the Government to ensure that neither of these two projects has a harmful impact on the health, culture and property of the communities living in the areas affected by the implementation or planning of the projects and draws the Government's attention to Article 7(3) and (4) of the Convention;
- (iv) requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to guarantee the integrity of persons and property in the regions affected by the projects and ensure that all the parties concerned refrain from any acts of intimidation or violence against persons who do not share their views on the projects.

The Northern Transversal Strip project. The Committee notes the observations from the MSICG concerning the lack of consultation of the indigenous peoples concerned with regard to the Northern Transversal Strip (Franja Transversal del Norte) project, which entails the construction of a 362 km road network which will affect the departments of Izabal, Alta Verapaz, Quiché and Huehuetenango. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on this matter.

Articles 2 and 33. Coordinated and systematic action. In its previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to adopt, in cooperation with the peoples concerned, the necessary measures and to establish the mechanisms provided for in Articles 2 and 33 with a view to developing coordinated and systematic action for the implementation of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's reference to the National Council for Urban and Rural Development, the National Council for the Peace Agreements, the High-Level Commission for Human Rights and Indigenous Peoples, the Inter-Institutional State Coordinator for Indigenous Affairs and the Guatemalan Indigenous Development Fund. However, the Committee observes that the Government does not provide any information on the operation of these bodies, on how the participation of indigenous peoples in them is ensured or on how coordination occurs between them in order to guarantee the effective protection of the rights of indigenous and tribal peoples. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to ensure the effective application of Articles 2 and 33 of the Convention by establishing a mechanism, in cooperation with the indigenous and tribal peoples, for developing coordinated and systematic action for the implementation of the Convention.

Article 14. Lands. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the transitional measures adopted to protect the land rights of indigenous peoples pending further progress on the regularization of land tenure. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the situation in various estates, namely Finca Termal Xauch, Finca Sataña Saquimo and Finca Secacnab Guatiquim. The Committee notes that the MSICG refers to other similar conflicts at Finca La Perla and Finca San Luís Malacatán.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the Land Information Registry is conducting a survey to identify communal lands and possibly declare them to be irregularly held lands if they are not entered in the Register in the names of the communities concerned; (2) Decree No. 41-2005 defines communal lands and establishes a legal and social process for identifying and declaring them as such and in May 2009 Decision No. 123-2009 was adopted, establishing specific regulations for them; (3) the Secretariat for Agrarian Affairs and other public bodies that deal with land issues have drawn up a draft Act concerning the regularization of land tenure, which is being discussed within the National Dialogue System; (4) a land access system is being promoted by means of credits for purchase and lease; (5) communities which only function as social entities are being encouraged to establish themselves as associations in law in order to qualify for land awards. As regards the situation at Finca Termal Xauch, the Government indicates that the community members reached an agreement with the owner of the estate and in the other two cases the community members expressed their willingness to purchase the lands that they occupy and that FONTIERRA still has to find the owners. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Decree No. 41-2005 and its regulations of 2009 concerning communal lands. Noting that the Act concerning the regularization of land tenure has still not been adopted, the Committee also requests the Government to adopt transitional measures without delay, pending the adoption of the aforementioned Act, to give adequate protection to the land rights of the indigenous peoples in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed information on any further developments in this respect. The Committee also requests the Government to send information on the situation at Finca La Perla and Finca San Luis Malacatán and send a copy of the National Policy for Comprehensive Rural Development and provide information on its implementation.

Article 24 et seq. Health. The Committee notes the report of the United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination (CERD), which expressed concern at the fact that “the highest maternal and infant mortality figures are in the departments of Alta Verapaz, Huehuetenango, Sololá and Totonicapán, where the indigenous population accounts for between 76 and 100 per cent of the population.” The CERD also expressed concern about “the lack of adequate and accessible health services for these communities ...” (CERD/C/GTM/CO/12-13, 19 May 2010, paragraph 13). While noting the recent extension in coverage provided by the sickness and maternity programmes of the Guatemalan Social Security Institute, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to ensure that these programmes are effective in reaching the peoples concerned so that in practice they are on an equal footing with the rest of the population regarding access to health care. The Committee requests the Government to send detailed information in this regard.

India

Bauxite mining project. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it took note of the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 27 August 2009 concerning the situation of the Dongria Kondh indigenous community and the bauxite mining project to be developed in the lands traditionally occupied by them. On that occasion, the Committee had expressed its concern over the reported adverse impact on the Dongria Kondh of the bauxite mining and expressed serious concern at the apparent lack of involvement of the tribal communities affected in matters related to the project which affected them directly. The Committee urged the Government to take the measures necessary to ensure that their rights and interests were fully respected and guaranteed and to report on the implementation of the rehabilitation and development measures ordered by the Supreme Court and the measures taken to ensure the involvement of the communities themselves in the design and implementation of such measures. In this regard, the Committee takes note of the Government’s indication according to which the Special Purpose Vehicle (SPV) for Scheduled Area Development of Lanjigarh Project, which was established following the order from the Supreme Court, is mandated to undertake a wide range of projects within a radius of 50 km of the Lanjigarh project for the development of the region. These projects concern health, education, children’s and women’s development, child care, upgrading of skills, communication, irrigation, agriculture, infrastructure development, etc. Moreover, the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Development Department of the State has prepared a comprehensive conservation and development plan for the Dongria Kondhs for the period 2007–12. The SPV will adapt its programme to this plan. The Committee further notes that in its report, received in September 2010, the Government indicates that the final approval for the diversion of forest land into the bauxite mining project has not been agreed yet and it highlights that without the final environmental clearance, which has not been issued yet, work cannot be carried out. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information regarding any new developments with respect to the development of the bauxite mining project including on any judicial proceedings. The Committee requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the rights and interests of the Dongria Kondhs are fully respected and guaranteed and to indicate any measures taken in this respect. The Committee further requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation and development measures ordered by the Supreme Court as well as the comprehensive conservation and development plan for the period 2007–12 for the Dongria Kondhs prepared by the Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Development Department of the State, and the measures taken to ensure the involvement of the communities themselves in the design and implementation of such measures.

Articles 2, 5 and 27 of the Convention. Coordinated and systematic action. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the Draft National Tribal Policy was submitted for public comments and suggestions including to the Scheduled Tribes and is currently under consideration by the Government. The Government further indicates that the main issues covered in the Draft policy refer to the following: alienation of tribal land; tribal-forest interface; displacement; resettlement and rehabilitation; enhancement of human development index; creation of critical infrastructure; violent manifestations; conservation and development of particularly vulnerable tribal groups; empowerment and gender equity, among others. This policy, once approved will, according to the Government, be the first comprehensive policy document developed for empowering the Scheduled Tribes of India and improving their Human Development Index. The Government refers also to the collaboration undertaken with the International Fund for Agriculture Development (IFAD) and the World Food Programme (WFP) for the implementation of food security and livelihood programmes in the States of Jharkhand, Chattisgarh and Orissa. The Government further indicates that it has requested ILO assistance in order to develop workshops and training programmes concerning tribal peoples’ rights that will help to identify best practices. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the progress made in adopting the National Tribal Policy, including information on the collaboration with and consultation of tribal groups and their representatives in the process of developing the policy. The Committee hopes that the activities indicated by the Government will be undertaken with ILO technical assistance, and asks the Government to provide information in this regard.

Articles 11–13 Land rights. Legislative developments. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the adoption of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006, and the Scheduled Tribes and Other Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Rules, 2007 and requested the Government to provide information on their implementation. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Tribal Affairs has requested the state and union territories governments, in November 2008, to initiate action for the implementation of the Act with a time-bound schedule. They were also requested to create awareness about the objectives, provisions and procedures of the Act among the forest dwelling scheduled tribes and other traditional forest dwellers and the concerned authorities under the Act. The Government further indicates that translation and publication of the Act and Rules in all the regional languages and their distribution among Gram Sabhas (assembly of all men and women in the village above 18 years of age), forest rights committees and all the departments of government will be ensured. The Office of the Prime Minister, the Cabinet Secretariat and the Planning Commission monitor the progress of the implementation. The Government indicates that as of 31 March 2010, 274,400 claims have been filed, 782,000 land titles distributed and more than 31,000 titles were ready for distribution. The Government further indicates that taking into account that the Scheduled Tribes and Other Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006, provides for a comprehensive legal framework to protect land and common resource rights of the tribal peoples, no further legislative initiatives are envisaged in this regard. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the Scheduled Tribes and Other Traditional Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Act, 2006, as well as the Scheduled Tribes and Other Forest Dwellers (Recognition of Forest Rights) Rules, 2007. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of claims processed and title deeds issued as well as any grievances brought against decisions made under the Act and their outcomes.

Article 12. Removal of populations. The Committee referred in its previous comments to the possibility of relocating forest dwellers, under certain conditions and after completion of appropriate procedures, provided for in the Forest Rights Act. Noting that the Government does not reply to the Committee's request, it again asks the Government to indicate whether any relocation has taken place in the country, and, in such cases, whether resettlement has been undertaken in compliance with Article 12(2) and (3) of the Convention.

The Sardar Sarovar Dam Project. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide updated information on the number of persons belonging to the tribal population displaced from the land they traditionally occupied as a result of the Sardar Sarovar Dam Project and the measures taken to guarantee their resettlement and compensation in conformity with Articles 12(2) and (3) of the Convention. The Committee notes in this regard the Government's indication, that until 31 December 2009, out of 46,700 families, only 322 remained to be resettled. The Government provides additional information concerning land allocation and other financial allowances granted to the displaced families. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures for the rapid resettlement of the remaining families and to continue to provide information on any developments thereon.

Part III–VI of the Convention. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the education of Scheduled Tribes, including the implementation of a "Post Matric" Scholarship to promote higher education, the establishment of Vocational Tribal Centres in tribal areas, the establishment of 14 educational complexes for Scheduled Tribe girls, as well as financial assistance to non-governmental organizations for those projects covering schools, hospitals, mobile dispensaries and computer training, among others. The Government further indicates that the Directorate General of Employment and Training has set up 23 Coaching and Guidance Centres for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes in States. Moreover, the Central and State governments have made provisions for the allocation of posts and services within the Government for Scheduled Tribes. In this regard, their representation in government employment has increased from 2.25 per cent in 1965 to 6.83 per cent in 2008. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide updated information on the various measures taken in the areas of education, training and employment and other areas covered in Parts III–VI of the Convention, to the benefit of the tribal population, including statistical information on the participation of men and women belonging to tribal groups in education and employment. In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide updated information on the implementation and the impact of the Tribal Sub Plan as well as national programmes such as the National Rural Employment Guarantee Programme (NREGP), the Integrated Child Development Services (ICDS), National Rural Health Mission (NRHM) and Sarva Shiksha Abhiyan (SSA) with respect to the rights set out in the Convention.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Mexico

The Committee notes the observations made by the Independent Workers' Union of "La Jornada" Newspaper (SITRAJOR), of 4 August 2010, referring to matters raised previously, and the Government's reply thereto.

Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO (GB.272/7/2)). Community of San Andrés de Cohamiata. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that full effect is given in practice to Article 14 of the Convention through the resolution of the case relating to the Bancos community, and in particular to ensure that account is taken of traditional occupation as a source of land rights, including through negotiations. Taking into account the fact that the claims of the Huichol community of Cohamiata also include the reincorporation of areas other than Bancos, the Committee also requested the Government to take steps to ensure that there are adequate procedures to settle land claims which are still pending and to contemplate the possibility of modifying existing procedures relating to land claims in order to resolve problems relating to the full application of Article 14 of the Convention, such as those which have arisen in the case of San Andrés de Cohamiata.

In this regard the Committee notes that, in its communication of 25 September 2009, the National Union of Education Workers (SNTE) refers to the court decisions which the Committee noted in its previous comments. The SNTE indicates, in particular, that the amparo (judicial means for the protection of constitutional rights in Mexico) ruling No. 46/2009 of the Administrative Collegial Tribunal of 17 June 2009 and the decision of the Higher Agrarian Tribunal of 11 August 2009, benefiting them by acknowledging that the President's decisions which granted formal land titles to the San Lucas de Jalpa community did not take into account the claims of the Cohamiata community, treated those legal titles in equal footing with the historical land titles (stemming from traditional occupation) to which the Cohamiata community is entitled, and which the Bancos de San Hipólito community considers to have inherited. The trade union emphasizes that the ruling authority failed to realize that those former legal titles were precisely the reason for the dispute and that existing judicial procedures do not allow recognition of titles derived from traditional occupation.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) the dispute concerning an area of approximately 10,720 hectares between the Bancos de San Hipólito community and the agrarian unit of San Lucas de Jalpa comes within the competence of agrarian tribunals and the secretariat of the Agrarian Reform through the Programme to Address Social Conflicts in Rural Areas (COSOMER); (2) the lands in question were not returned to Bancos de San Hipólito on the grounds that, according to the decisions of the agrarian tribunals, among other reasons, it was for San Andrés de Cohamiata to seek the return of that area; (3) the National Commission for the Development of Indigenous Peoples (CDI) in collaboration with the governments of the federated states in which the Huichol are settled, have undertaken various actions to strengthen and update the rights of that people; (4) COSOMER has given this dispute priority among all the pending matters, but has not been able to achieve conciliation, nor a negotiated settlement, as it has not been accepted by the parties to the dispute; (5) at the present time, the claim for amparo lodged by the San Lucas de Jalpa community against the decision of the agrarian superior tribunal that decided that the rights of Bancos had not been taken into account is still pending; (6) the Office of the Agrarian Public Prosecutor has not undertaken procedures in the context of any programme for the certification of rights, as that has not been requested by the interested parties. In this regard, while acknowledging the measures adopted so far by the agrarian tribunals with the aim of resolving the dispute, as well as the activities undertaken by the Government for the protection of the Huichol communities, the Committee notes with regret that this dispute, which has been continuing for many years, has not yet been resolved. The Committee observes that the decisions of the agrarian tribunals have not settled the dispute, and that a claim for amparo filed by the community of San Lucas de Jalpa is still pending examination. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take all necessary measures to settle this conflict that has continued for many years. The Committee once again emphasizes the Government's obligation to recognize the rights of the peoples concerned to the lands they traditionally occupy and to which they have traditionally had access, in accordance with Article 14 of the Convention. The Committee once again urges the Government to take all necessary steps to ensure full compliance in practice with this provision in resolving the case of the Bancos community and, in particular, to ensure that account is taken of traditional occupation as a source of land rights, including by means of negotiation. The Committee suggests, in this regard, that the Government endeavour to resolve the dispute through a system of conciliation and negotiation which enjoys the confidence of both parties. The Committee reminds the Government of the recommendation made in report GB.272/7/2 concerning the possibility of assigning additional lands to the Huichol people when they do not have the area necessary for providing the essentials of a normal existence, or for any possible increase in their numbers, as provided for in Article 19. The Committee also requests the parties to the dispute to make every effort to endeavour to reach a solution that is satisfactory for both parties and to bring an end to this dispute which has been going on for decades and that jeopardizes peace in the area.

In more general terms, the Committee requests the Government to consider the possibility, in consultation with the indigenous peoples, of establishing adequate procedures to resolve land claims with a view to giving full effect to Article 14 of the Convention, and to provide detailed information on the measures adopted in this respect.

Articles 2, 3 and 7. Forced sterilization. Follow-up to the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO (GB.289/17/3)). In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to: (1) provide information on the measures taken to guarantee that the decision to take permanent contraceptive measures is indeed a free choice and to ensure that the persons concerned are fully aware of the permanent nature of the contraceptive measures concerned; (2) provide statistical information disaggregated by sex, age and ethnic origin on the persons who have adopted such methods; (3) provide information on the manner in which indigenous peoples participate and are consulted with regard to reproductive health and family-planning programmes and policies; (4) carry out appropriate investigations into the allegations of forced sterilization and supply information on the results of the investigations and, where applicable, the penalties imposed and the measures taken to compensate the victims; and (5) provide information on the steps taken to promote community health services for indigenous peoples with their full participation.

The Committee notes the Government's denial of the existence of a state policy or systematic practice to promote violations of the sexual and reproductive rights of the population. However, a policy does exist to promote broader knowledge of reproductive health among the members of indigenous peoples. The Government provides information on the reproductive health programmes implemented, which the Government states also benefit indigenous peoples, and emphasizes that contraceptive methods are used with the full knowledge and consent of the users. The Government also refers to the persons receiving advice from family-planning services and provides information on the number of persons who have opted for temporary and definitive contraceptive methods. The Government indicates that the IMSS-Opportunities Programme is in constant contact with traditional care providers who use local therapeutic resources to treat various health problems, and that it promotes referral to medical units when the problem requires institutional care. The Government adds that, at the request of the CDI Gender Equity Board, it is intended to carry out a national consultation on the situation of indigenous women in their peoples and communities, which will include reproductive rights among its principal subjects. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact on indigenous peoples of the reproductive health measures and programmes adopted. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that whenever contraceptive methods are being made available to members of indigenous peoples, such methods are undertaken only with their free and full consent and full knowledge of the effects, particularly in the case of permanent contraceptive measures. The Committee also requests the Government to continue providing statistical data on the persons who use permanent contraceptive methods, disaggregated by sex and age. Finally, while recognizing the Government's indication that there is no state policy or systematic practice that results in a violation of sexual and reproductive rights of indigenous peoples, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted with a view to investigating the allegations of SITRAJOR based on the reports of the Human Rights Defence Commission and the National Human Rights Commission of 2002.

Follow-up of the recommendations of the tripartite committee (representation made under article 24 of the Constitution of the ILO) (GB.296/5/3). In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide detailed information on the follow-up measures taken in relation to the recommendations made by the Governing Body concerning the representation made in 2002 by the Union of Metal, Steel, Iron and Allied Workers (STIMAHCS) alleging the absence of consultation and participation of indigenous peoples in relation to the work carried out by the Government in connection with the Oaxaca-Istmo-Huatulco road. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the CDI, through its Directorate for Indigenous Participation and Consultation, held a consultation meeting in 2004 on a regional development plan which would include possible solutions to the adverse effects and situations which might arise from the construction of the Oaxaca-Istmo-Huatulco road, and especially the Salina Cruz-Huatulco section. The Directorate also took the necessary measures to resolve situations giving rise to claims relating to the development projects and plans during the meeting, based on the Indigenous Consultation System. The Committee requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the specific claims made in relation to the work carried out by the Government in connection with the Oaxaca-Istmo-Huatulco highway, the manner in which they were resolved and whether they gave rise to the payment of compensation.

Comments made by SITRAJOR. The Committee notes that, in its communications dated 7 September 2009 and 4 August 2010, SITRAJOR refers to the appointment in May 2009 of a non-indigenous governmental delegate for the State of Guerrero to the National Commission for the Development of Indigenous Peoples (CDI) without consulting the representatives of indigenous peoples. SITRAJOR indicates that, nevertheless, in 2001 the Guerrero Council "500 Years of Indigenous Resistance" had been allowed to appoint an indigenous member as representative. The same occurred in 2008, when a state indigenous convention provided a shortlist, from which the indigenous delegate was appointed. This gave rise to protests by the indigenous peoples of Guerrero, who occupied the premises of the CDI for five weeks. For this reason, according to the trade union, four criminal proceedings were initiated against five indigenous leaders. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the designation of the CDI delegate in the State of Guerrero was carried out in accordance with sections 58 and 59 of the Federal Act on parastatal bodies and section 11 of the Act respecting the National Commission for the Development of Indigenous Peoples. The Government indicates that none of these provisions require the designation of state delegates of the CDI to be undertaken through consultation with indigenous peoples. It adds that there are currently no criminal proceedings pending against the indigenous leaders who occupied the premises of the CDI. In this regard, while recognizing that there is no legal obligation to undertake consultations with indigenous peoples before designating governmental delegates, the Committee notes that the indigenous peoples had participated on two previous occasions in the designation of the delegate and it emphasizes the importance, for the discharge of her or his duties, for the state delegate to enjoy the confidence of the parties. The Committee therefore invites the Government to ensure that in future, when state delegates are appointed, the importance of ensuring that the person who is designated enjoys the confidence of the indigenous peoples is taken into account so that the state delegate is able to discharge her or his duties in the best possible manner.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Paraguay

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 31 August 2011, transmitting the observations of the National Union of Workers of Paraguay (CNT), according to which indigenous peoples are exploited and have to work more than 12 hours each day, only receiving meals in exchange. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations thereon.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that in 2006 the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards urged the Government to take measures to enable it to send full information on the questions raised by the Committee of Experts on a regular basis. In 2008 the Committee noted with regret that the Government's report had not been received and therefore repeated its previous comments. Noting that the Government's report was received in September 2009, the Committee hopes that the Government will continue its efforts to provide regular reports.

Article 20 of the Convention. Recruitment and conditions of employment. The Committee refers to its previous comments concerning discrimination relating to wages and treatment based on the indigenous origin of workers, particularly those working on ranches within the country and for Mennonite communities, which in certain cases constitute situations of forced labour. The Committee notes the conclusions of the report on the Mission to Paraguay by the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues in 2009 that a system of servitude and forced labour exists in the Chaco region. It notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Justice and Labour has established, under Resolution No. 230 of 2009, a tripartite committee, the Committee on Fundamental Rights at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour, which has been entrusted with the task of drawing up an action plan on fundamental rights at work and the prevention of forced labour involving the participation of the Paraguayan Indigenous Institute (INDI). Furthermore, it notes that in September 2008, the Regional Labour Directorate opened an office in the town of Teniente Irala Fernández (Chaco region). It also notes that the eradication of forced labour is one of the priorities of the 2009 Decent Work Country Programme and that the Decent Work Country Programme includes the promotion of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide further information on the implementation of the above action plan and its impact on the eradication of forced labour involving indigenous peoples, including information on the extent to which the indigenous peoples concerned were consulted and participated in the development of that plan. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the results of the inspections carried out by the Office of the Regional Labour Directorate for the Chaco region, the action taken and penalties imposed, and on any other initiatives undertaken by that Office with the aim of eradicating forced labour of, and discrimination against, indigenous peoples, particularly those working on ranches or in Mennonite communities. The Committee also refers to its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).

Articles 2, 6 and 33. Coordinated and systematic action and consultation. The Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the INDI can rely on the collaboration of a series of indigenous organizations and the support of several coordinating bodies, such as the Coordinating Committee for the Self-Determination of Indigenous Peoples (CAPI). In this regard, the Committee notes that in April 2009, the CAPI drew up, with the participation of 15 indigenous organizations, a series of "proposals for public policies on indigenous peoples". It also notes the creation under Decree No. 1945 of the National Programme on Indigenous Peoples (PRONAPI) coordinated by the INDI, under which, according to the report, consultations will be held with indigenous peoples so that they can define their own needs. The Committee understands that based on the outcome of the consultations held in the context of the PRONAPI and on the CAPI initiative, an indigenous policy could be defined and a legislative reform carried out which includes the creation of a State body on indigenous affairs with the participation of indigenous peoples with regard to both its definition and composition. Noting the various organizations which collaborate with the INDI and its different coordinating bodies, the Committee emphasizes the importance of institutionalizing the participation of the peoples covered by the Convention in devising, implementing and overseeing the public policies which affect them, in accordance with Articles 2 and 33 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the outcome of the consultations held in the context of the PRONAPI and on the CAPI initiative and on any resulting initiatives relating to legislative reform, including with regard to the institutionalization of indigenous participation. Noting that the Executive Authority's Human Rights Network, created in June 2009, is competent to draw up a schedule of proposed measures, such as laws incorporating the international instruments ratified by the State, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the initiatives undertaken by the Network in relation to the Convention and on the measures taken to ensure coordination with the INDI and the participation of the peoples concerned.

Article 14. Rights to land. The Committee notes that, according to the report on the Mission to Paraguay by the United Nations Permanent Forum on Indigenous Issues, 40 per cent of the indigenous communities in Paraguay still have no legal title to their lands. The Committee also notes that in July 2009, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights filed an application with the Inter-American Court under Case No. 12420 concerning the land rights of the indigenous community Xákmok Kásek of the Enxet-Lengua People whose land claim has been pending since 1990. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the legislation in force with regard to land claims by indigenous communities and the difficulties encountered in practice due to their geographical dispersion and creation of new communities. The Committee also notes the indigenous land regularization project, which is based on an agreement signed between the INDI and the World Bank; implementation of which began in 2008. The Committee requests the Government to take all the necessary measures, including measures of a procedural nature, to make rapid progress, in consultation with the peoples concerned, with regard to the regularization of indigenous lands and requests it to provide information on the following:

- (i) the progress made in the context of the INDI/World Bank project in that regard;
- (ii) the initiatives undertaken by the Inter-Institutional Committee responsible for the implementation of the measures necessary to carry out international rulings (CICSI);

(iii) the particulars and the percentage of indigenous communities whose lands have still not been regularized.

The Committee also refers to its previous comments and requests the Government to provide information on the application of Acts Nos 1372/88 and 43/89 establishing a procedure for the regularization of settlements of indigenous communities, in particular with regard to resolving cases in which the land occupied is insufficient given the number of indigenous claims, and on the establishment of adequate procedures within the national legal system, in accordance with Article 14(3).

Article 15. Natural resources. With regard to the exploitation of forestry resources, the Committee notes that under Resolution No. 1324 of 2008, the INDI suspended indefinitely the application of Resolution No. 139/07 on environmental and forestry management in relation to lands assigned to indigenous communities until adequate consultations with indigenous peoples determine whether the Resolution concerned will be amended or repealed. The Committee notes that Resolution No. 139/07 was adopted with the aim of “curbing the obvious plundering taking place in several communities” and that it was suspended because “in many circles there is a confusion between the authorization to implement management plans and the plundering of forest resources”. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held for the purpose of amending Resolution No. 139/07 in relation to lands assigned to indigenous communities and their outcome, and on the measures taken to protect the rights of indigenous peoples to the natural resources existing on their lands, including their rights to participate in the use, management and conservation of those resources. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the penalties imposed by the Office of the Environmental Prosecutor at the request of the INDI in cases of ecological offences, and on applications submitted to the INDI by exploration companies seeking information on the existence of indigenous communities in certain areas of the country.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Peru

Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the observations from the Single Confederation of Workers of Peru (CUT) and the General Union of Wholesalers and Retailers of the Grau Tacna Commercial Centre (SIGECOMGT) dated 28 April 2011, and the observations from the General Confederation of Workers of Peru (CGTP) dated 25 July 2011. The Committee also notes the observations from the International Organisation of Employers (IOE) dated 19 October 2011. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on these observations.

The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee, at its 2010 session, welcomed the adoption by the Congress of the Republic of the Act concerning prior consultation and expressed its confidence that the Act would be promulgated by the President in the very near future. However, the Committee noted at its last meeting that the President had not promulgated the Act and had made a series of observations on it. In this regard, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption by the Congress of the Republic on 23 August 2011 of the “Act regulating the right of indigenous and original peoples to prior consultation as recognized by ILO Convention No. 169”, which was promulgated by the President of the Nation on 7 September 2011. Under section 1, the new Act must be interpreted in conformity with the Convention. Noting that the aforementioned Act requires the adoption of implementing regulations within a period of 180 days, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that any regulations adopted take full account of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to send information on this matter and on any measures relating to implementation of the Act. Such information will be examined by the Committee at its next session together with other pending issues.

Tunisia

Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government’s brief report indicating that the Berbers are the first inhabitants of Tunisia, a fact which is accepted by Tunisians who generally recognize their Berber origins. The Government adds that Tunisian society is homogenous and there is no phenomenon of racial discrimination.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it requested the Government to reply in detail to those comments. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to give effect to the relevant provisions of the Convention in relation to Berber communities, and more specifically the measures adopted to seek the collaboration of the representatives of these populations (Article 5(a) of the Convention).

Furthermore, recalling that the present Convention has been revised by the Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169), the Committee encourages the Government to envisage ratifying the latter instrument.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 107 (El Salvador, India); Convention No. 169 (Argentina, Guatemala, Mexico, Paraguay).

Specific categories of workers

Guinea

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Articles 2 to 7 of the Convention. Employment and working conditions of nursing personnel. The Committee notes that the information provided by the Government in its last report remains fragmentary, and estimates that, in the interest of maintaining a meaningful dialogue on the application of the Convention in law and practice, the Government should make a genuine effort to collect and transmit all relevant information, including legislative texts or other official documents, dealing with health care policy and nursing services. For instance, despite repeated requests in the last ten years, the Committee has still not received a copy of Decree No. 93/043/PRG/SGG of 26 March 1993, establishing general regimes for hospitals; nor has it received copies of the statutory texts and collective agreements applicable to nursing staff, particularly as regards remuneration and hours of work. Moreover, the Government has been referring since 1992 to ongoing negotiations on two sets of general regulations, one for medical and paramedical staff and another for nurses, without any indication as to the time frame for the possible conclusion of those negotiations. In addition, the Committee notes with concern the Government's last statement to the effect that there is no specific policy concerning nursing services and that accordingly there are no particular texts or provisions addressing the special nature of nursing work.

Under the circumstances, the Committee asks the Government to prepare a detailed and fully documented report on the effect given to the main requirements of the Convention, particularly as regards: (i) the formulation of a national policy on nursing services designed to improve the quality standards of public health care but also to create a stimulating environment for the exercise of the nursing profession (Article 2(1)); (ii) measures relating to nursing education and training as may be taken in consultation with the National Nurses Association (ANIGUI) (Article 2(2)(a) and Article 3); (iii) the institutional framework and practical modalities of the process of consultation with employers' and workers' organizations in matters of nursing policy (Article 2(3) and Article 5(1)); (iv) sufficient protection for nursing personnel, in light of the constraints and hazards inherent in the profession, especially in terms of hours of work and rest periods, paid absence and social security benefits (Article 6); and (v) measures to improve the occupational safety and health conditions of health workers, including any specific initiative aimed at protecting nursing personnel from HIV/AIDS infection (Article 7).

Kyrgyzstan

Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Policy concerning nursing services and personnel. Noting that the Government has not communicated a report on the application of the Convention for more than ten years, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information concerning the application of all the provisions of the Convention, especially in the light of the Labour Code (Act No. 106 of 4 August 2004) and of Act No. 6 of 9 January 2005 on the protection of citizens' health.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 110 (Côte d'Ivoire); Convention No. 149 (Congo, Fiji, Guyana, Kenya); Convention No. 172 (Guyana); Convention No. 177 (Albania, Ireland).

II. Observations concerning the submission to the competent authorities of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the International Labor Conference (article 19 of the Constitution)

Albania

The Committee hopes that the Government will soon announce that the remaining instruments adopted by the Conference at its 82nd Session (the Protocol of 1995 to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947), 90th Session (Recommendations Nos 193 and 194), and all the instruments adopted at the 78th, 86th, 89th, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions were submitted to the Albanian Parliament.

Angola

The Committee recalls the communication provided by the Government in June 2010 in which the Ministry of Public Administration, Employment and Social Security indicated that it encountered difficulties in forwarding the submission files to the competent authorities. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will soon be in a position to provide the required information on the submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted at the 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference (2003–11). The Committee also recalls that the Government is requested to provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the Protection of Workers' Claims (Employer's Insolvency) Recommendation, 1992 (No. 180) (79th Session, 1992), the 1995 Protocol to the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (82nd Session, 1995), and the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189) (86th Session, 1998).

Antigua and Barbuda

The Committee notes with interest that the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, (MLC, 2006), was registered on 11 August 2011. In the same way as the Conference Committee, it urges the Government to supply the relevant information concerning the submission to the Parliament of Antigua and Barbuda of 22 instruments adopted by the Conference during 12 sessions held between 1996 and 2011 (83rd, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Azerbaijan

The Committee notes with interest that the ratification of Conventions Nos 156 and 183 was registered in October 2010. It refers to its previous observations and requests the Government to provide information with regard to the submission to the Milli Mejlis (National Assembly) of Recommendation No. 180 (79th Session), and the instruments adopted at the 83rd, 84th, 89th, 90th, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference. Please also indicate the date of submission of Recommendation No. 195 to the National Assembly.

Bahamas

The Committee asks the Government to supply information on the submission to Parliament of the 19 instruments adopted by ten sessions of the Conference held between 1997 and 2011 (85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Bahrain

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative at the Conference Committee in June 2011. It further notes the detailed replies provided by the Government in September 2011 recalling that, with the beginning of parliamentary life in 2002 and the establishment of a National Assembly – composed of the Consultative Council (Majlis Al-Shura) and the Council of Representatives (Majlis al-Nuwab) – there was a need to establish a new mechanism to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the National Assembly. The Committee therefore urges the Government, as did the Conference Committee, to provide information indicating that the 18 instruments adopted by the Conference at ten sessions held between 2000 and 2011, were submitted to the National Assembly.

Bangladesh

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in October 2011 indicating that it will take gradual steps to submit the instruments adopted at different sessions of the Conference to the competent authority through the process of tripartite consultation. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted at the 77th Session (Convention No. 170 and Recommendation No. 177), the 79th Session (Convention No. 173 and Recommendation No. 180), the 84th Session (Convention No. 179 and Recommendations Nos 185, 186 and 187), and the 85th Session (Recommendation No. 188), as well as all the instruments adopted at the 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 36 pending instruments to Parliament.

Belize

Serious failure to submit. The Committee refers to its previous observations and asks the Government to provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the 43 instruments adopted by the Conference at its 84th (Maritime) Session (October 1996), and during the other 19 sessions held between 1990 and 2011. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 43 pending instruments to the National Assembly.

Plurinational State of Bolivia

The Committee recalls that the international labour Conventions adopted by the Conference from 1990 to 2003 were submitted to the National Congress on 26 April 2005. The Committee reiterates its request that the Government report on the decision taken by the National Congress with regard to the Conventions submitted. It also requests the Government to indicate the representative organizations of employers and workers to which the information forwarded to the Director-General concerning the submission of the abovementioned Conventions was communicated. The Committee again asks the Government to provide all the information required on the submission to the National Congress of the remaining Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference between 1990 and 2011.

Brazil

The Committee notes that the ratification of Convention No. 151 was registered in June 2010. It recalls that Conventions Nos 128, 129, 130, 149, 150, 156 and 157 and the other instruments adopted at the 52nd, 78th, 79th, 81st, 82nd (1995 Protocol), 83rd, 84th (Conventions Nos 179 and 180; 1996 Protocol, Recommendations Nos 186 and 187), 85th, 86th, 88th, 90th, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference are still waiting to be submitted to the National Congress. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon report on other measures that have been taken to submit the 40 pending instruments to the National Congress. In this regard, the Committee again recalls that the Tripartite Committee on International Relations (CTRI) requested the Ministry of External Relations in March 2006 to take the necessary steps to submit to the National Congress the Tenants and Share-croppers Recommendation, 1968 (No. 132), the Job Creation in Small and Medium-Sized Enterprises Recommendation, 1998 (No. 189), the Promotion of Cooperatives Recommendation, 2002 (No. 193), the List of Occupational Diseases Recommendation, 2002 (No. 194), and the Human Resources Development Recommendation, 2004 (No. 195).

Cambodia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative of Cambodia at the Conference Committee in June 2011, recalling that, owing to the technical assistance provided by the ILO, the instruments to be submitted to the competent authorities had been translated into Khmer. The Government representative also indicated that the instruments have been submitted to the Cabinet of the Council of Ministers for consideration and preparation of submission to the National Assembly. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the instruments to the National Assembly.

Cape Verde

Côte d'Ivoire

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the Government's communication received in October 2011 indicating that the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference between 1995 and 2010 were submitted to the Economic and Social Council on 25 August 2011. The Committee invites the Government, in the same way as the Conference Committee, to complete the steps to submit to the National Assembly the 30 instruments (Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols) adopted by the Conference at the 14 sessions between June 1996 and 2011 (83rd, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Croatia

The Committee invites the Government to take appropriate measures in order to ensure that the 18 remaining instruments adopted by the Conference at ten sessions between 1998 and 2011 are submitted soon to the Croatian Parliament.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Serious failure to submit. The Committee recalls that the Ministry of Labour prepared submission reports for the instruments adopted by the Conference from its 83rd to its 98th Sessions with a view to forwarding them to the competent authorities for examination and adoption. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to provide other relevant information on the effective submission to Parliament of the 30 instruments adopted at the 14 sessions of the Conference held between 1996 and 2011.

Djibouti

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with serious concern that the failure of submission by Djibouti concerns the instruments adopted at the 28 sessions of the Conference held between 1980 and 2011. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, requests the Government to make every effort in a tripartite framework to ensure that it is in a position in the near future to provide the required information on the submission to the National Assembly of the 64 instruments adopted at the 28 sessions of the Conference held between 1980 and 2011 (66th, 68th, 69th, 70th, 71st, 72nd, 74th, 75th, 76th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Dominica

Serious failure to submit. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. In the same way as the Conference Committee, it reiterates its hope that the Government will soon announce that the 37 instruments adopted by the Conference during 17 sessions held between 1993 and 2011 (80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions) have been submitted to the House of Assembly.

El Salvador

In its previous comments, the Committee observed the failure to submit to the Congress of the Republic the instruments adopted at the 62nd, 65th, 66th, 68th, 70th, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th and 89th Sessions of the Conference, as well as the remaining instruments from the 63rd (Convention No. 148 and Recommendations Nos 156 and 157), 67th (Convention No. 154 and Recommendation No. 163) and 69th (Recommendation No. 167) Sessions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the Congress of the Republic of all the remaining instruments, including Recommendations Nos 193 and 194 (90th Session, 2002) and the instruments adopted at the 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions (2003–11).

Equatorial Guinea

Serious failure to submit. The Committee recalls the communication dated 9 May 2008 in which the Ministry of Labour and Social Security requested the Head of Government to proceed with the submission to the House of People's Representatives of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 13 sessions held between 1993 and 2006. The Committee asks the Government to provide the other relevant information on compliance with the obligation of submission, and particularly the date on which the instruments adopted between 1993 and 2006 were in fact submitted to the House of People's Representatives. The Committee requests the Government to report on the submission to the House of People's Representatives of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th and 100th Sessions (2010–11).

Ethiopia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee asks the Government to provide the relevant information on the submission to the House of People's Representatives of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 88th (Recommendation No. 191), 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions.

Fiji

The Committee recalls the information provided by the Government in May 2010 indicating that Fiji has not had a Parliament since 2006. The Government further stated that it is committed to adopt a progressive and democratic Constitution by 2013 and to hold for the first time a non-race based election in 2014 after which a Parliament will be constituted. The Committee thus notes that the Government will be able to submit all instruments adopted by the Conference at its 84th Session (Maritime, October 1996) and at its 83rd, 85th, 86th, 88th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions to Parliament only after its establishment. The Committee therefore requests information about any developments in regard to the submission to Parliament of 26 instruments adopted by the Conference at 13 sessions held between June 1996 and June 2011, as required by article 19 of the ILO Constitution.

Gabon

The Committee notes with interest that the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), was registered in May 2011. In its previous comments, the Committee invited the Government to report on Parliament's decision regarding Conventions Nos 142, 155, 176, 177, 179, 181, 184 and 185. The Committee invites the Government to provide information concerning the submission to Parliament of the other Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols not yet submitted to Parliament that were adopted at the 74th, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference.

Georgia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the communication received in November 2011, indicating that the instruments adopted at the 100th Session of the Conference were submitted to the Parliament of Georgia. The Committee refers to its previous observations and asks the Government to report on the submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference at the 14 sessions held between 1993 and 2011 (80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th and 99th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the instruments to Parliament.

Ghana

The Committee notes with interest the ratification of Conventions Nos 138, 144 and 184 was registered in June 2011. It also notes that the Government submitted Conventions Nos 183, 187 and 188 as well as Recommendation No. 191 to Parliament on 23 September 2011. The Committee invites the Government to report on the submission of the 21 instruments adopted by the Conference between June 1993 and 2011 that have still not been submitted to Parliament.

Guinea

Serious failure to submit. The Committee refers to its previous comments and, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to provide the information requested regarding the submission to the National Assembly of the 28 instruments adopted at the 13 sessions held by the Conference between October 1996 and June 2011 (84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Guinea-Bissau

The Committee notes the communication received from the Government in August 2011 indicating that the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), has been approved by the Council of Ministers and is pending tabling in the National People's Assembly. The Government also intends to request support from the ILO Subregional Office in Dakar in order to conclude the process of submission of 15 pending instruments adopted by the Conference. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to report that the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions were submitted to the National People's Assembly.

Haiti

Serious failure to submit. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, hopes that the Government will make every effort in the near future to be in a position to announce the submission to the National Assembly of the following instruments:

- (a) the remaining instruments from the 67th Session (Conventions Nos 154 and 155, and Recommendations Nos 163 and 164);
- (b) the instruments adopted at the 68th Session;
- (c) the remaining instruments adopted at the 75th Session (Convention No. 168, and Recommendations Nos 175 and 176); and
- (d) the instruments adopted at 21 sessions of the Conference held between 1989 and 2011.

Iraq

The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the submission to the Council of Representatives established under the 2005 Iraqi Constitution of the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference from 2000 to 2011.

Ireland

Serious failure to submit. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observation. In the same way as the Conference Committee, it urges the Government to provide information on the submission to the Oireachtas (Parliament) of the instruments adopted by the Conference at the ten sessions held between 2000 and 2011 (88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Jamaica

The Committee invites the Government to provide the relevant information regarding the submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions (2004–11).

Kazakhstan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee refers to its previous observations and requests the Government to supply the requested information on the submission to Parliament of the 34 instruments still pending submission which were adopted by the Conference between 1993 and 2011. It urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the pending instruments to Parliament.

Kiribati

The Committee notes with interest that the ratification of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), was registered in October 2011. In the same way as the Conference Committee, the Committee invites the Government to submit to Parliament the other 17 instruments adopted by the Conference at nine sessions held between 2000 and 2011 (88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Kuwait

The Committee recalls the information provided by the Government in September 2009, indicating that it will solicit the views of the social partners on the possibility of ratifying Conventions before referring the matter to the National Assembly. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon complete the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions to the National Assembly (Majlis al-Ummah).

The Committee hopes that the Government will also provide the date of submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted at the 77th Session (1990: Conventions Nos 170 and 171, Recommendations Nos 177 and 178, and the Protocol of 1990), 80th Session (1993: Recommendation No. 181), 86th Session (1998: Recommendation No. 189) and 89th Session (2001: Convention No. 184 and Recommendation No. 192) of the Conference.

Kyrgyzstan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with serious concern that the Government has not communicated information on the submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference at the 18 sessions held between 1992 and 2011.

The Committee notes that Kyrgyzstan has been a Member of the Organization since 31 March 1992. It recalls that, under article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, every Member undertakes to bring the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies “for the enactment of legislation or other action”. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office has adopted a Memorandum concerning the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, asking for particulars on this subject. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide all the information requested by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum about the competent authority, the date on which the instruments were submitted and any proposals made by the Government on measures to be taken with regard to the instruments that have been submitted.

The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to make every effort to comply with the constitutional obligation of submission and recalls that the Office can provide technical assistance to overcome this serious delay.

Liberia

The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. The Committee recalls the information provided by the Government in May 2009 indicating that the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 88th, 89th, 90th, 92nd and 95th Sessions, as well as the Protocols of 1990 and of 1995, have yet to be submitted to the National Legislature. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will soon be in a position to submit to the National Legislature the 18 remaining instruments adopted by the Conference between 2000 and 2011, as well as the 1990 and 1995 Protocols.

Madagascar

The Committee notes the Government’s communication received in November 2011 indicating that the submission procedure is not yet possible. The Government will take the necessary arrangements as soon as the national circumstances permit. The Committee would appreciate being kept informed of any developments with regard to the submission to the National Assembly of 13 instruments adopted by the Conference at seven sessions held between 2002 and 2011.

Mali

The Committee asks the Government to provide the relevant information concerning the submission to the National Assembly of the Protocols of 1996 and 2002, as well as of the instruments adopted at the 86th, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference.

Mongolia

Submission to the State Great Hural. The Committee notes with interest that, on 10 February 2011, the Government submitted to the State Great Hural seven Conventions, 11 Recommendations and one Protocol adopted by the Conference between the 82nd Session (June 1995) and the 99th Session (June 2010). It also notes that the texts of the instruments were made available to the Cabinet members and the members of the State Great Hural in Mongolian, English and Russian. The Committee welcomes this progress and hopes that the Government will continue to provide regularly the required information on the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the State Great Hural.

Mozambique

Serious failure to submit. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, hopes that the Government will be in a position to provide the relevant information on the submission to the Assembly of the Republic of the 30 instruments adopted by the Conference at the 14 sessions held between 1996 and 2011.

Niger

The Committee invites the Government to provide the information required concerning the submission to the National Assembly of the 26 instruments adopted by the Conference at 13 sessions (83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th (for the Employment Relationship Recommendation, 2006 (No. 198)), 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions) held between 1996 and 2011.

Pakistan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. The Committee asks the Government to report on the measures taken to submit to Majlis-e-Shoora (Parliament) the instruments adopted by the Conference at 16 sessions held between 1994 and 2011 (81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 34 pending instruments to Parliament.

Papua New Guinea

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative at the Conference Committee in June 2011. In the same way as the Conference Committee, the Committee urges the Government to comply with this constitutional obligation and to quickly submit to the National Assembly the 18 instruments adopted by the Conference at ten sessions held between 2000 and 2011.

Peru

Serious failure to submit. The Committee recalls its previous observations and requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted for the submission to the Congress of the Republic of the remaining instruments adopted at the 84th, 88th and 90th Sessions of the Conference, and at the sessions held between 2002 and 2011.

Russian Federation

Serious failure to submit. The Committee recalls the communication dated 17 June 2009 that was sent by the Chair of the Committee on Labour and Social Policy of the State Duma to the Ministry of Health and Social Development of the Russian Federation requesting the Government of the Russian Federation to comply in a timely manner with its obligations under article 19 of the ILO Constitution. The Committee further recalls the resolution adopted by the State Duma on 29 June 2007 requesting the Government of the Russian Federation to take additional measures to ensure unconditional observance of article 19 of the ILO Constitution with regard to the mandatory and timely submission to the State Duma of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference. In conformity with article 19 of the ILO Constitution, the Committee again asks the Government to take appropriate measures to comply with the requirement of the submission to the State Duma of the instruments adopted by the Conference at nine sessions held between 2001 and 2011 (89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Rwanda

Serious failure to submit. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. The Committee asks the Government to report on the submission to the National Assembly of the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference at 16 sessions held between 1993 and 2011 (80th, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 35 pending instruments to the National Assembly.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

Serious failure to submit. The Committee refers to its previous observations and asks the Government to provide the required information on the submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 14 sessions held between 1996 and 2011 (83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure full compliance with the constitutional obligation to submit.

Saint Lucia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not replied to its previous comments. It recalls that, in accordance with article 19, paragraphs 5 and 6, of the Constitution of the Organization, Saint Lucia, as a Member of the Organization, has the obligation to submit to Parliament all the remaining Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference from 1980 to 2011 (66th, 67th (Conventions Nos 155 and 156 and Recommendations Nos 164 and 165), 68th (Convention No. 157 and Protocol of 1982), 69th, 70th, 71st, 72nd, 74th, 75th, 76th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure full compliance with the constitutional obligation to submit.

Saint Vincent and the Grenadines

The Committee recalls that the ratification of Conventions Nos 122, 129, 144 and of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006), was registered on 9 November 2010. It also recalls that, under the 1979 Constitution of Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, the Cabinet is the executive authority which has the responsibility for making final decisions on ratification and for determining any matter that is brought before the House of Assembly for legislative action. The Committee asks the Government to fulfil its obligations under article 19, paragraphs 5 and 6, of the ILO Constitution by submitting to the House of Assembly the 24 instruments (Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols) adopted by the Conference at 12 sessions held from June 1995 to June 2011 (82nd, 83rd, 85th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions).

Samoa

The Committee notes that, as of 7 March 2005, the Independent State of Samoa became a Member of the Organization. In accordance with article 19, paragraphs 5(a) and 6(a), of the ILO Constitution, the Office communicated to the Government the text of the Conventions and Recommendations adopted by the Conference at its 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions held in 2006, 2007, 2010 and 2011. It hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the submission to the Legislative Assembly of these instruments. It recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office, if it so wishes, to help in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution relating to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Legislative Assembly.

Sao Tome and Principe

Serious failure to submit. The Committee regrets that the Government has not replied to its previous observation. The Committee recalls that the Government has not provided the required information on the submission to the competent authorities of 44 instruments adopted by the Conference between 1990 and 2011 (77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee requests the Government to make every effort to fulfil the constitutional obligation of submission and recalls that the ILO is available to provide the necessary technical assistance to give effect to this essential obligation.

Seychelles

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative at the Conference Committee in June 2011 indicating that, following the training received from the ILO, the Employment Department is better equipped to comply with the obligation to submit. The Committee further notes that the information provided in September 2011, indicating that the Government intends to bring the instruments to the attention of the Tripartite National Consultation Committee on Employment before endorsement by the Council of Ministers and the National Assembly. In the same way as the Conference Committee, the Committee urges the Government to comply with this constitutional obligation and to quickly submit to the National Assembly the instruments adopted by the Conference at nine sessions held between 2001 and 2011.

Sierra Leone

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with serious concern that the Government has not replied to its previous comments. The Committee asks the Government to report on the submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference in October 1976 (Convention No. 146 and Recommendation No. 154, adopted at the 62nd Session) and the instruments adopted between 1977 and 2011. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 94 pending instruments to Parliament.

Solomon Islands

Serious failure to submit. ILO technical assistance. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in September 2011 indicating that, following ILO technical assistance, a draft document was prepared to submit the 60 instruments adopted by the Conference between 1984 and 2011 to Cabinet. The Government further indicates that Cabinet will approve ratifications and review the instruments. The Committee notes with interest that the Government intends to promptly ratify the eight fundamental Conventions as well as Convention No. 144 and the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 (MLC, 2006).

The Committee recalls that, under the relevant provisions of article 19, paragraphs 5 and 6, of the ILO Constitution, the Members of the Organization have undertaken to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the authority within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action. In the Memorandum concerning the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, the Governing Body indicated that the competent authority is the authority which, under the Constitution of each State, has the power to legislate or to take other action in order to implement Conventions and Recommendations. The competent national authority should normally be the legislature. Even in the case of instruments not requiring action in the form of legislation, it would be desirable to ensure that the purpose of submission, which is also to bring Conventions and Recommendations to the knowledge of the public, is fully met by submitting these instruments to the parliamentary body.

The Committee therefore requests the Government to make every effort to comply with its constitutional obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference between 1984 and 2011 to the National Parliament. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 60 pending instruments to the National Parliament.

Somalia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee trusts that, when the national circumstances permit, the Government will provide information on the submission to the competent authorities with regard to the instruments adopted by the Conference between October 1976 and June 2011.

Sudan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not replied to its previous comments. The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 35 pending instruments adopted by the Conference between 1994 and 2011 to the National Assembly.

Suriname

Serious failure to submit. The Committee recalls the information provided by the Government in August 2010 indicating that the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 90th to 96th Sessions were submitted to the Council of Ministers. The Government also indicated that efforts will be made to submit the instruments to the newly elected National Assembly. The Committee invites the Government to indicate if the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 90th to 96th Sessions have been submitted to the National Assembly. It also requests the Government to provide information on the submission to the National Assembly of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 99th and 100th Sessions held in 2010 and 2011.

Syrian Arab Republic

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not replied to its previous observations. The Committee recalls that 42 of the instruments adopted by the Conference are still waiting to be submitted to the People's Council. The Committee hopes that the Government will be in a position to announce that the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 66th and 69th Sessions (Recommendations Nos 167 and 168) and at its 70th, 77th, 78th, 79th, 80th, 81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 90th (Recommendations Nos 193 and 194) 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions have been submitted to the People's Council.

Tajikistan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in July 2011 indicating that the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200), has been translated into Tajik and was submitted to the relevant ministries and national committees for its approval. The Committee recalls that only Conventions are communicated for ratification in conformity with article 19(5)(a) of the ILO Constitution. It further recalls that the Government is required to provide information on the submission to the Supreme Council (Majlisi Oli) of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 12 sessions held between October 1996 and June 2011 (84th, 85th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the 27 pending instruments to the Supreme Council (Majlisi Oli).

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not provided the information concerning the submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference at 14 sessions held between 1996 and 2011 (83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the pending instruments to the competent authorities.

Togo

Serious failure to submit. The Committee refers to its previous comments and requests the Government to indicate the date on which the instruments on maternity protection (88th Session, 2000) were submitted to the National Assembly and the representative employers' and workers' organizations to which the information supplied to the Office was communicated. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether the instruments adopted by the Conference at eight sessions held between 2002 and 2011 have been submitted to the National Assembly.

Turkmenistan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes with serious concern that the Government has not provided information on the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 16 sessions held by the Conference between 1994 and 2011.

The Committee notes that Turkmenistan has been a Member of the Organization since 24 September 1993. It recalls that, under article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization, every Member undertakes to bring the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies “for the enactment of legislation or other action”. The Governing Body of the International Labour Office adopted a Memorandum concerning the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, asking for particulars on this subject. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide all the information requested by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum about the competent authority, the date on which the instruments were submitted and any proposals made by the Government on the measures to be taken with regard to the instruments that have been submitted.

The Committee, in the same way as the Conference Committee, urges the Government to make every effort to comply with the constitutional obligation of submission and recalls that the Office can provide technical assistance to overcome this serious delay.

Uganda

Serious failure to submit. The Committee requests the Government to provide the required information on the submission to Parliament of the instruments adopted by the Conference at 16 sessions held between 1994 and 2011 (81st, 82nd, 83rd, 84th, 85th, 86th, 88th, 89th, 90th, 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). In the same way as the Conference Committee, it urges the Government to take steps without delay to submit the pending instruments to Parliament.

Ukraine

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not responded to its previous observation. The Committee recalls the reply provided by the Government, in May 2009, to its previous comments indicating that the instruments adopted by the Conference between 2003 and 2007 were referred to the competent bodies of the executive authority in order to examine the possibility of their ratification. The Government further stated that these instruments were not submitted to the Supreme Rada of Ukraine since no proposals were made with regard to their ratification.

The Committee notes that, by virtue of the relevant provisions of article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution, the Members of the Organization have undertaken to submit the instruments adopted by the Conference to the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies for the enactment of legislation or other action. In the Memorandum concerning the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities, the Governing Body indicated that the competent authority is the authority which, under the Constitution of each State, has the power to legislate or to take other action in order to implement Conventions and Recommendations. The competent national authority should normally be the legislature. Even in the case of instruments not requiring action in the form of legislation, it would be desirable to ensure that the purpose of submission, which is also to bring Conventions and Recommendations to the knowledge of the public, is fully met by submitting these instruments to the parliamentary body.

The Committee also notes that for many years the Government has provided information on the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Supreme Rada. Submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Supreme Rada does not imply any obligation for the Government to propose the ratification of a Convention or Protocol, or the application of a Recommendation. Governments have complete freedom as to the nature of the proposals to be made when submitting instruments to the competent authorities. Furthermore, the proposals to be made to the competent authority or authorities in connection with submission have to be the subject of consultation in accordance with the tripartite procedures required in Article 5(1)(b) of the Tripartite Consultation (International Labour Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 144), which has been ratified by Ukraine.

The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will be in a position in the near future to provide all the information requested in the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum on the submission to the Supreme Rada of Ukraine regarding the 11 instruments adopted at the 91st, 92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions of the Conference (2003–11).

Uzbekistan

Serious failure to submit. The Committee notes the statement made by the Government representative at the Conference Committee in June 2011 on the work undertaken by an inter-ministerial team responsible for reporting obligations. It further notes the information provided by the Government indicating that all the instruments adopted by the Conference were referred to the Council of the Federation of Trade Unions and the Chamber of Trade and Industry. The Committee recalls that compliance with the constitutional obligation does not only require the instruments to be communicated to the social partners; the instruments adopted by the Conference must also be submitted to the competent authorities, that is, the Supreme Assembly (Oliy Majlis) in the case of Uzbekistan, following article 19, paragraphs 5 and 6, of the ILO Constitution. The Committee notes with serious concern that the Government has not communicated information on the submission to the Supreme Assembly of 37 Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the Conference during 16 sessions held between 1993 and 2011. The Committee urges the Government, as did the Conference Committee, to make every effort to comply with the constitutional obligation of submission and recalls that the Office can provide technical assistance to overcome this serious delay.

Vanuatu

The Committee recalls that, as of 22 May 2003, Vanuatu became a Member of the Organization. It further recalls that the ratification by Vanuatu of the eight fundamental Conventions was registered in July 2006. The Committee invites the Government to provide information on the submission to the Parliament of Vanuatu of the five Conventions and six Recommendations adopted by the Conference at the six sessions held between 2003–11 (92nd, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions). It recalls that the Government may request the technical assistance of the Office to help in achieving compliance with its obligations under article 19 of the Constitution relating to the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the Parliament of Vanuatu.

Yemen

The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to provide the requested information on the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 90th, 94th, 95th, 96th, 99th and 100th Sessions, as well as Recommendations Nos 191 and 192 (88th and 89th Sessions) to the House of Representatives (Majlis El-Nouwab).

Direct requests

Appendices

Appendix I. Table of reports received on ratified Conventions as of 9 December 2011
(articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

Article 22 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization provides that “each of the Members agrees to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which it is a party. These reports shall be made in such form and shall contain such particulars as the Governing Body may request”. Article 23 of the Constitution provides that the Director-General shall lay before the next meeting of the Conference a summary of the reports communicated to him by Members in pursuance of article 22, and that each Member shall communicate copies of these reports to the representative organizations of employers and workers.

At its 204th Session (November 1977), the Governing Body approved the following arrangements for the presentation by the Director-General to the Conference of summaries of reports submitted by governments under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution:

- (a) the practice of tabular classification of reports, without summary of their contents, which has been followed for several years in respect of reports subsequent to first reports after ratification, should be applied to all reports, including first reports;
- (b) the Director-General should make available, for consultation at the Conference, the original texts of all reports received on ratified Conventions; in addition, photocopies of the reports should be supplied on request to members of delegations.

At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body approved new measures for rationalization and simplification.

Reports received under articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution appear in simplified form in a table annexed to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations; first reports are indicated in parentheses.

Requests for consultation or copies of reports may be addressed to the secretariat of the Committee on the Application of Standards.

Appendix IV. Summary of information supplied by governments with regard to the obligation to submit the instruments adopted by the International Labour Conference to the competent authorities

Article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization prescribes, in paragraphs 5, 6, and 7, that Members shall bring the Conventions, Recommendations and Protocols adopted by the International Labour Conference before the competent authorities within a specified period. Under the same provisions, the governments of member States shall inform the Director-General of the International Labour Office of the measures taken to submit the instruments to the competent authorities, and also communicate particulars of the authority or authorities regarded as competent, and of any action taken by them.

In accordance with article 23 of the Constitution, a summary of the information communicated in pursuance of article 19 is submitted to the Conference.

At its 267th Session (November 1996), the Governing Body approved new measures to rationalize and simplify proceedings. As a result, the summarized information appears in an appendix to the report of the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations.

The present summary contains the most recent information on the submission to the competent authorities of the HIV and AIDS Recommendation, 2010 (No. 200), adopted by the Conference at its 99th Session (June 2010). The Conference adopted no international labour Conventions or Recommendations at two consecutive sessions, in June 2008 and 2009 (97th and 98th Sessions). In addition, the present summary contains information supplied by governments with respect to earlier adopted instruments submitted to the competent authorities in 2011.

The summarized information also consists of communications which were forwarded to the Director-General of the International Labour Office after the closure of the 100th Session of the Conference (Geneva, June 2011) and which could not therefore be laid before the Conference at that session.

In the next report, the Appendix IV summary will contain information showing how far governments have progressed in the submission to the competent authorities of the Domestic Workers Convention (No. 189) and Recommendation (No. 201), adopted by the Conference at its 100th Session (June 2011).

Viet Nam. The Convention and Recommendations adopted at the 96th and 99th Sessions were submitted to the National Assembly on 13 September 2010. The instruments adopted at the 100th Session were submitted to the National Assembly on 23 September 2011.

Zimbabwe. The instruments adopted at the 100th Session were submitted to Parliament on 12 October 2011.

The Committee has deemed it necessary, in certain cases, to request additional information on the nature of the competent authorities to which the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted, as well as other particulars required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum of 1980, as revised in March 2005.

Appendix V. Information supplied by governments with regard to the obligation to submit Conventions and Recommendations to the competent authorities

(31st to 99th Sessions of the International Labour Conference, 1948-2010)

Note. The number of the Convention or Recommendation is given in parentheses, preceded by the letter "C" or "R" as the case may be, when only some of the texts adopted at any one session have been submitted. The Protocols are indicated by the letter "P" followed by the number of the corresponding Convention. When the ratification of a Convention was registered, that Convention and the corresponding Recommendation are considered as submitted.

Account has been taken of the date of admission or readmission of States Members to the ILO for determining the sessions of the Conference whose texts are taken into consideration.

The Conference did not adopt any Conventions or Recommendations at its 57th Session (June 1972), 73rd Session (June 1987), 93rd Session (June 2005), 97th Session (June 2008) and 98th Session (June 2009).
