Plenary Session 1: Care Jobs and the Care Economy – an opportunity for the future of decent work - GB room (R3 south) (09:30-11:00)

Background

Care is crucial for well-being—every person needs to be cared for in order to survive and thrive. Around the world, women, especially those with low-income, migrant and from ethnic minorities, do most of the unpaid care work—the activities that meet the physical and emotional needs of children, the elderly and able-bodied adults performed in households and communities. Because this work is unpaid, it typically falls below the radar of social and economic policies. Yet, that does not mean it is costless. The unequal distribution of the unpaid care work remain among the key drivers of gender inequalities in the labour market, impacting women’s labour force participation, access to decent work and social protection and to leadership positions. The extent of the unpaid care work is such that it also typically offsets coverage and quality gaps in social protection systems.

Access to good-quality employment is the most important factor leading to women’s economic empowerment (SDG 5), but the lack of adequate paid parental leave, access to childcare and social services, and family-friendly work arrangements pushes women to leave the labour market, to reduce their time in paid employment or to take up lower-quality jobs to address their dependants’ care needs, resulting in gender gaps in the labour force.

The flipside of this imbalance between women’s and men’s work and family responsibilities are the working conditions of care workers around the world – the doctors, nurses, teachers, nannies or domestic workers, to name but a few of care occupations. Very frequently, these occupations are highly feminized and lowly paid, while there are glaring gaps in coverage and access. Paid care provision also increasingly relays on “global care chains”, namely the care work of migrant women leaving their families behind in lower income countries that enable household members – mostly women – to take up paid work in higher income countries. Yet, creating care jobs that are decent and enough to cover the future care needs will be crucial to a “high road” to care, and bears implications for the future of work, as the care economy, along with the green economy, are estimated as the two main sources for future job growth, both in developed and developing countries (ILO,

Objectives

The panel aims at unpacking four main dimensions of the care economy: first, it will address the question of recognizing unpaid care work and the ways the “care economy” –the totality of care work, both paid and unpaid– can be integrated into labour market analyses. Second, drawing on examples from regional experiences, the panel will explore social protection policies and public care services, looking at specific measures or “policy mixes” to achieve a “high road” to care. Third, the discussion will focus on decent jobs in care economy as a condition for quality care and a driver of job creation. The issue of “global care chains” – in a context of demographic changes and quality job crisis – and the role of coherent care, employment and migration policies will be highlighted. The role of the labour movement in representing care work and promoting decent jobs in the care economy will also be covered. Finally, the discussion will conclude on how macroeconomic frameworks can solve the care conundrum in enabling the recognition, reduction and redistribution of unpaid care work.

Lunch break: hosted by Durham University - Espace Gobelin (13:00-14:00)

Lunchtime side event: THE FUTURE OF WORK AND THE INDIVIDUAL - VII (R2 south) (13:00-14:00)

In the framework of the ILO centenary celebrations, the Director-General has proposed to address, through the Future of Work initiative, the implications of the transformational change that is impacting the world of work. This reflection is carried out under the prism of four main "conversations" related to work and society, decent jobs for all, the organization of work and production and the organization of work. The future of work will certainly have concrete consequences on the individual. We will examine these consequences from the point of view of "the individual of the future" taking into account the four conversations mentioned.

Firstly, there might be a change in the role of the individual in the society of the future. Will the individual work or not? If yes how much and if not where would the livelihood come from? (With a regional perspective). There is a need to reflect on the nature of work and the impact of the work performed on society and on the individual. The characteristics of the jobs of the future have to be examined too, particularly concerning paid and unpaid work.

Secondly, how will the individual find a job in the labour market of the future? Will the jobs s/he has been trained for subsist? Will s/he have the capacities to enter the new world of work? Which are the sectors s/he is more likely to work in in the future. Is the future world of work including her/him whatever his circumstances (man, woman, young, old, migrant, worker with family responsibilities, worker with disabilities, etc.)?

Thirdly, how is our individual going to work? Traditional structures are changing, how will this impact on the manner work is performed? Technology will bring a wealth of new possibilities in the way s/he will organize her/his work. The frameworks within which the individual will carry out her/his work will substantially change: platforms and projects, time and space, small and big structures. Which are the consequences on the individual's rights, including freedom of association and collective bargaining, working conditions, social protection, and taxes?

Fourth, changes in the world of work will also involve changes in the manner in which societies at local, national and international level organize themselves. How will the new systems in place ensure that our individual is better off? How will standards take the individual into account and how will the individual participate in the construction of the system (dialogue). Which are the structures s/he will participate in? How can society ensure equality in the implementation of individual rights?

Plenary Session 2: Can a universal basic income resolve future income security challenges? - GB room (17:00-18:30)

Universal basic income approaches are currently high on the agenda as possible policy options to resolve the income security challenges that emerge on the one hand from new forms of work in the wake of digitalization and automation, as well as from informal and precarious employment. There is however a wide diversity of proposals on the table, which drastically differ in terms of the level of the proposed basic income, the prospective recipients, financing modalities, and the benefits and services that such a universal basic income would replace, as well as on the expected economic and social impacts. One of the ongoing pilot tests of a universal basic income approach is currently conducted by the Finnish Social Insurance Institution (KELA), which will be presented and discussed in this session.

Plenary Session 3: The governance of work: labour regulation's complex future - GB room (16:00-17:30)

Effective governance of work is essential for socially just development. This session focuses on the role of the nation state as a central actor in that endeavour. The point of departure is that despite the changes wrought in recent decades, the nation state remains the basic constituent of the international order. In this conception, therefore, the state remains the essential actor: only the state is both authorised and required to mediate between global economic and political evolution, on the one hand, and the citizen and the firm, on the other.
