Multinational enterprises, development and decent work: the approach of the ILO MNE Declaration

Rationale

Globalization brings substantial benefits, but also poses challenges to achieve improved and fair outcomes for all. On the one hand, globalization has helped a number of countries to benefit from high rates of economic growth and employment creation, to absorb many of the rural poor into the modern urban economy, to advance their developmental goals, and to foster innovation in product development and production processes.

On the other hand, global economic integration has caused many countries and sectors to face major challenges of income inequality, continuing high levels of unemployment and poverty, vulnerability to external shocks, and the growth of both unprotected work and the informal economy, which impact on the employment relationship and the protections it can offer.

Multinational enterprises (MNEs) play a key role in today's globalized economy, both through their investment decisions in host countries and through their purchasing activities within integrated production systems or global supply chains. MNEs have the potential to contribute to the advancement of decent work and achievement of development priorities through their corporate policies and business operations. To accompany this process and the involvement of the different actors, the ILO Tripartite Declaration of Principles concerning Multinational Enterprises and Social Policy (the MNE Declaration¹) provides guidance to enterprises, governments and employers' and workers' organizations on how to maximize the positive contribution of MNEs and larger national enterprises to economic and social development and minimize and resolve possible negative impacts.

The MNE Declaration is the only instrument of its kind, adopted in a tripartite manner and global in its application. It is founded on international labour standards and clarifies the responsibilities of the different parties (multinational enterprises, governments, employers' and workers' organizations). Dialogue between the different actors is at the heart of this tripartite instrument.

Objectives

This course will look at the potential of MNEs and national enterprises to contribute to the respect of labour rights and the achievement of "decent work" for all. It will introduce participants to the guidance set out in the MNE Declaration for enterprises, governments, employers' and workers' organizations. Through case studies, dialogues with MNEs and a company visit, participants will gain a better understanding of the roles and responsibilities of government and enterprises in realizing workers' rights, fostering job creation and skills development, and supporting development of SMEs through business linkages.

Breakout discussions will provide space for the participants to speak more openly about some of the opportunities and challenges related to foreign direct investment (FDI) and operations of MNEs. This exchange among peers will stimulate strategic thinking on how they – as a government institution or employers' or workers' organization – can engage more effectively with MNEs on national development and decent work priorities and among themselves about the legal and policy environment needed to achieve this. Role plays will be used to introduce participants to ILO instruments that can assist them when engaging in dialogue on and with multinational enterprises on public policy objectives and issues of mutual concern.

The course is aimed primarily at strengthening the capacity of ILO constituents. It is also open to managers of large enterprises, in particular those currently in charge of or interested in working more closely with government and social partners on socio-economic issues and in assessing their company's social footprint in countries of operations and sourcing. Corporate participants will gain insights through discussions and small group exercises in how to closer align their company's social policies with principles of international labour standards as well as national and local development priorities and to engage in public-private dialogue and action to tackle issues of mutual concern. Corporate participants will be better equipped to look at the impact of companies operations on workers' rights and to engage with government on labour and development issues.

General objective

The course aims to strengthen the capacity of government institutions, employers' and workers' organizations and enterprises to apply the principles of the MNE Declaration and closer align private actions with public policy objectives, including in light of the Sustainable Development Goals and the broader Post-2015 Development Agenda.

Specific objectives

At the end of the course, participants will:

- be knowledgeable of the provisions of the MNE Declaration;
- be able to assess the impact of business operations on workers' rights;
- understand the different roles of governments, the private sector, employers' and workers' organizations in maximizing the economic and social development impacts of MNEs;
- gain insights into how to foster a public-private collaborative approach on issues of mutual concern;

- be able to better serve their institutions, organizations or enterprise in the area of social policy.

Participants' profile

The course is designed for representatives of governments, employers' organizations and workers' organizations responsible for policies related to socio-economic development, FDI and operations of MNEs. It also targets managers in enterprises responsible for social policy and interested in developing more collaborative approaches to address their labour-related human rights impacts as well as socio-economic development issues in their operations.
