The publication of information concerning action taken in respect of international labour Conventions and Recommendations does not imply any expression of view by the International Labour Office on the legal status of the State having communicated such information (including the communication of a ratification or declaration), or on its authority over the areas or territories in respect of which such information is communicated; in certain cases this may present problems on which the ILO is not competent to express an opinion.

ILO publications can be obtained through major booksellers or ILO local offices in many countries, or direct from ILO Publications, International Labour Office, CH-1211 Geneva 22, Switzerland. A catalogue or list of new publications will be sent free of charge from the above address.

The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations is an independent body composed of legal experts charged with examining the application of ILO Conventions and Recommendations in ILO member States. The annual report of the Committee of Experts covers numerous matters related to the application of ILO standards. The structure of the report, as modified in 2003, is divided into the following parts:

- (a) The Reader's note provides indications on the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference (their mandate, functioning and the institutional context in which they operate) (Part 1A, pages 1–4).
- (b) Part I: the General Report describes the manner in which the Committee of Experts undertakes its work and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards, and it emphasizes the principal aspects of the relationship between the work of the Committee of Experts and the multilateral system (Part 1A, pages 5–27).
- (c) Part II: Observations concerning particular countries cover the sending of reports, the application of ratified Conventions (see section I), and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (see section II) (Part 1A, pages 33–713).
- (d) Part III: General Survey, in which the Committee of Experts examines the application of ILO standards, whether or not they are ratified, in a particular subject area. The General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)) and this year examines the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention (No. 94) and Recommendation (No. 84), 1949 (Part 1B).

Finally, the Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities is published by the Office and supplements the information contained in the report of the Committee of Experts. This document primarily provides an overview of recent developments in international labour standards, the implementation of special procedures and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It contains, in tabular form, information on the ratification of Conventions and Protocols, and “country profiles” (Part 2).

Reader's note

Overview of the ILO supervisory mechanisms

Since its creation in 1919, the mandate of the International Labour Organization (ILO) has included adopting international labour standards and promoting their ratification and application in its member States as a fundamental means of achieving its objectives. In order to monitor the progress of its member States in the application of international labour standards, the ILO has developed supervisory mechanisms which are unique at the international level.<sup>1</sup>

Under article 19 of the ILO Constitution, a number of obligations arise for member States upon the adoption of international labour standards, including the requirement to submit newly adopted standards to national competent authorities and the obligation to report at intervals on measures taken to give effect to the provisions of unratified Conventions and Recommendations.

A number of supervisory mechanisms exist whereby the Organization examines the standards-related obligations of member States deriving from ratified Conventions. This supervision occurs both in the context of a regular procedure through annual reports (article 22 of the ILO Constitution),<sup>2</sup> as well as through special procedures based on complaints or representations to the Governing Body made by ILO constituents (articles 24 and 26 of the Constitution). Moreover, since 1950, a special procedure has existed whereby complaints relating to freedom of association are referred to the Committee on Freedom of Association of the Governing Body. The Committee on Freedom of Association may also examine complaints relating to member States that have not ratified the relevant freedom of association Conventions.

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

As a natural consequence of its tripartite structure, the ILO was the first international organization to associate the social partners directly in its activities. The participation of employers' and workers' organizations in the supervisory mechanism is recognized in the Constitution under article 23, paragraph 2, which provides that reports submitted by governments in accordance with articles 19 and 22 must be communicated to the representative organizations.

In practice, the representative employers' and workers' organizations may submit to their governments' comments on the reports concerning the implementation by the latter of ratified Conventions. They may, for instance, draw attention to a discrepancy in law or practice regarding a Convention and thus lead the Committee of Experts to request further information from the government. Furthermore, any employers' or workers' organization may submit comments on the application of Conventions directly to the Office. The Office will then forward these comments to the government concerned, which will have an opportunity to respond before the comments are examined by the Committee of Experts.

Origins of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

During the early years of the ILO, both the adoption of international labour standards and the regular supervisory work were undertaken within the framework of the plenary sitting of the annual International Labour Conference.

<sup>2</sup> Reports are submitted every two years for so-called fundamental and priority Conventions, and every five years for others. Since 2003, reports have been due for groups of Conventions according to subject matter.

However, the considerable increase in the number of ratifications of Conventions rapidly led to a similarly significant increase in the number of annual reports submitted. It soon became clear that the plenary of the Conference would not be able to examine all these reports at the same time as adopting standards and discussing other important matters. In response, the Conference in 1926 adopted a resolution<sup>3</sup> establishing on an annual basis a Conference Committee (subsequently named the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards) and requesting the Governing Body to appoint a technical committee (subsequently named the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations) which would be responsible for drawing up a report for the Conference. These two committees have become the two pillars of the ILO supervisory system.

Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations

Composition

The Committee of Experts is composed of 20 members<sup>4</sup> who are outstanding legal experts at the national and international levels. The members of the Committee are appointed by the Governing Body upon the proposal of the Director-General. Appointments are made in a personal capacity from among completely impartial persons of competence and independent standing drawn from all regions of the world, in order to enable the Committee to have at its disposal first-hand experience of different legal, economic and social systems. The appointments are made for renewable periods of three years. In 2002, the Committee decided that there would be a limit of 15 years' service for all members, representing a maximum of four renewals after the first three-year appointment. The Committee also decided to elect a Chairperson for a non-renewable period of five years and, at the start of each session, a Reporter.

Mandate

The Committee of Experts meets annually in November–December. In accordance with the mandate given by the Governing Body,<sup>5</sup> the Committee is called upon to examine the following:

- the annual reports under article 22 of the Constitution on the measures taken by member States to give effect to the provisions of the Conventions to which they are parties;
- the information and reports concerning Conventions and Recommendations communicated by member States in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution;
- information and reports on the measures taken by member States in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution.<sup>6</sup>

The task of the Committee of Experts is to indicate the extent to which each member State's legislation and practice are in conformity with ratified Conventions and the extent to which member States have fulfilled their obligations under the ILO Constitution in relation to standards. In carrying out this task, the Committee adheres to its principles of independence, objectivity and impartiality.<sup>7</sup>

The comments of the Committee of Experts on the fulfilment by member States of their standards-related obligations take the form of either observations or direct requests. Observations contain comments on fundamental questions raised by the application of a particular Convention by a member State. These observations are reproduced in the annual report of the Committee of Experts, which is then submitted to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June every year. Direct requests usually relate to questions of a more technical nature or of lesser importance, or contain requests for information. They are not published in the report of the Committee of Experts, but are communicated directly to the government concerned.<sup>8</sup> In addition, the Committee of Experts examines the application of ILO standards, ratified or not ratified, in a particular subject area decided by the Governing Body. This examination takes the form of a General Survey. This year's General Survey covers labour clauses in public contracts.

Report of the Committee of Experts

As a result of its work, the Committee produces an annual report. The structure of the report is divided into the following parts:

<sup>7</sup> In its 1987 report, the Committee stated that in its evaluation of national law and practice in relation to the requirements of international labour Conventions: "... its function is to determine whether the requirements of a given Convention are being met, whatever the economic and social conditions existing in a given country. Subject only to any derogations, which are expressly permitted by the Convention itself, these requirements remain constant and uniform for all countries. In carrying out this work, the Committee is guided by the standards laid down in the Convention alone, mindful, however, of the fact that the modes of their implementation may be different in different States".

<sup>8</sup> Observations and direct requests are accessible through the ILOLEX database which is available on CD-ROM and via the ILO web site (www.ilo.org/normes).

- Part I: the General Report describes, on the one hand, the progress of the work of the Committee of Experts and specific matters relating to it that have been addressed by the Committee and, on the other hand, the extent to which member States have fulfilled their constitutional obligations in relation to international labour standards (Report III (Part 1A)).
  - Part II: Observations concerning particular countries on the fulfilment of obligations in respect of the submission of reports, the application of ratified Conventions grouped by subject matter and the obligation to submit instruments to the competent authorities (Report III (Part 1A)).
  - Part III: the General Survey is published as a separate volume (Report III (Part 1B)).
- Furthermore, an Information document on ratifications and standards-related activities (Report III (Part 2)) accompanies the report of the Committee of Experts.<sup>9</sup>

Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference

Composition

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards is one of the two standing committees of the Conference. It is tripartite and therefore comprises representatives of governments, employers and workers. At each session, the Committee elects its Officers, which includes a Chairperson (Government member), two Vice-Chairpersons (Employer member and Worker member) and a Reporter (Government member).

Mandate

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards meets annually at the June session of the Conference. Pursuant to article 7 of the Standing Orders of the Conference, the Committee shall consider:

- measures taken to give effect to ratified Conventions (article 22 of the Constitution).
- reports communicated in accordance with article 19 of the Constitution (General Surveys).
- measures taken in accordance with article 35 of the Constitution (non-metropolitan territories).

The Committee is required to present a report to the Conference.

Following the independent technical examination carried out by the Committee of Experts, the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards provide an opportunity for the representatives of governments, employers and workers to review together the manner in which States are fulfilling their standards-related obligations, particularly with regard to ratified Conventions. Governments are able to elaborate on information previously supplied to the Committee of Experts, indicate any further measures taken or proposed since the last session of the Committee of Experts, draw attention to difficulties encountered in the fulfilment of obligations and seek guidance as to how to overcome such difficulties.

The Conference Committee on the Application of Standards discusses the General Report and the General Survey of the Committee of Experts, and the documents submitted by governments. The work of the Conference Committee starts with a general discussion on the standards system, as well as a discussion on the General Survey. The Conference Committee subsequently examines cases of serious failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations. Finally, the Conference Committee embarks upon its main task, which is to examine a number of individual cases concerning the application of ratified Conventions which have been the subject of observations by the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee invites the government representatives concerned to attend one of its sessions to discuss the observations in question. After listening to these government representatives, the members of the Conference Committee may ask questions or make comments. At the end of the discussion, the Conference Committee adopts the conclusions on the case in question. Furthermore, in accordance with the resolution adopted by the Conference in 2000, the Conference Committee holds, at each of its sessions, a special sitting on the application by Myanmar of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29).<sup>10</sup>

In its report submitted to the plenary sitting of the Conference for adoption, the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards may invite the member State whose case has been discussed to accept a technical assistance mission by the International Labour Office to increase its capacity to fulfil its obligations, or may propose other types of missions. The Conference Committee may also request a government to submit additional information or address specific concerns in its next report to the Committee of Experts. The Conference Committee also draws the attention of the Conference to certain cases, such as cases of progress and cases of serious failure to comply with ratified Conventions.

<sup>9</sup> This document provides an overview of the recent developments in international labour standards, the implementation of special procedures, and technical cooperation in relation to international labour standards. It also contains, in the form of tables, full information on the ratification of Conventions, together with “country profiles” containing key information on standards for each country.

Relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

In numerous reports, the Committee of Experts has stressed the importance of the spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility which has always existed in relations between the Committee of Experts and the Conference Committee. In recent years, it has become the practice for the Chairperson of the Committee of Experts to attend the general discussion of the Conference Committee and the discussion on the General Survey as an observer, with the opportunity to address the Conference Committee at the opening of the general discussion and the opportunity to make remarks at the end of the discussion on the General Survey. In a similar fashion, the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee are invited to meet the Committee of Experts and discuss issues of common interest during a special session for that purpose.

Part I. General Report

I. Introduction

1. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, appointed by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office to examine the information and reports submitted under articles 19, 22 and 35 of the Constitution by States Members of the International Labour Organization on the action taken with regard to Conventions and Recommendations, held its 78th Session in Geneva from 22 November to 7 December 2007. The Committee has the honour to present its report to the Governing Body.

2. The composition of the Committee is as follows: Mr Mario ACKERMAN (Argentina), Mr Anwar Ahmad Rashed AL FUZAIE (Kuwait), Mr Denys BARROW, SC (Belize), Ms Janice R. BELLACE (United States), Mr Lélío BENTES CORRÊA (Brazil), Mr Halton CHEADLE (South Africa), Ms Laura COX, QC (United Kingdom), Ms Blanca Ruth ESPONDA ESPINOSA (Mexico), Mr Abdul G. KOROMA (Sierra Leone), Ms Robyn A. LAYTON, QC (Australia), Mr Pierre LYON CAEN (France), Ms Angelika NUSSBERGER, MA (Germany), Ms Ruma PAL (India), Mr Miguel RODRIGUEZ PIÑERO Y BRAVO FERRER (Spain), Mr Amadou SÔ (Senegal), Mr Yozo YOKOTA (Japan). Appendix I of the General Report contains brief biographies of all the Committee members.

3. The Committee noted with regret that Ms Esponda Espinosa was unable to participate in its work this year.

4. Mr Sô informed the Committee of his decision not to continue contributing to its work after the expiry of his mandate. The Committee expresses its great appreciation for the outstanding manner in which Mr Sô has carried out his duties throughout his service on the Committee.

5. The Committee was deeply saddened to learn of the death, on 25 August 2007, of Mr Benjamin Aaron, former member of the Committee. A celebrated jurist and specialist in industrial relations, with a formidable talent as negotiator and arbitrator, all those who had the privilege of knowing or working with Mr Benjamin Aaron will remember him as a person with an extraordinary sense of equity who worked tirelessly for the promotion of social justice. The Committee wishes to express the esteem and friendship which those of its members who knew him felt for Mr Benjamin Aaron, as well as its gratitude for the devotion and competence he brought to the cause of international labour standards.

6. As the mandate of Ms Layton, QC, as Chairperson had come to an end, the Committee elected Ms Bellace as Chairperson as of its next session. The Committee re-elected Mr Al-Fuzaie as Reporter.

Working methods

7. The Committee has in recent years undertaken a thorough examination of its working methods. In order to guide this reflection on working methods efficiently, a subcommittee was set up in 2001. The mandate of the subcommittee includes examining working methods of the Committee and any related subjects, in order to make appropriate recommendations to the Committee.<sup>1</sup> The subcommittee met on three occasions from 2002 to 04. During the 2005–06 sessions, issues relating to its working methods were discussed by the Committee in plenary sitting.

8. This year, the subcommittee held two meetings to examine a number of issues arising from recent discussions both in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and in the Governing Body. These meetings were chaired by Mr Yokota.<sup>2</sup> In considering the recommendations made by the subcommittee, the Committee agreed on the elements below.

- (1) With respect to measures to assist governments to follow up on its particular comments, the Committee recognized this as a crucial and ongoing issue, and decided to revisit it at its next session. The Committee provided guidance to the secretariat for the preparation of its work. This guidance included a more consistent implementation of the existing criteria to distinguish observations from direct requests; and, where comments were lengthy, possible ways to help governments identify which requests to address in the first instance in order to facilitate their timely reply to the Committee.

- (2) With respect to its General Report, the Committee agreed: (a) to insert a new section highlighting cases which are examples of “good practices”, to enable governments to emulate these in advancing social progress, and to serve as a model for other countries to assist them in the implementation of ratified Conventions; (b) to resume publication next year of a section concerning highlights and major trends on topical issues arising from the Committee’s examination of reports, when such issues emerge.
- (3) The Committee discussed the request from the Workers’ group of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards regarding the reproduction of certain previous comments in its report of the following year (i.e. a non-reporting year). This issue was also raised during its special sitting with the Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee. In the course of discussions on this topic, concerns were raised about whether such a request would need to come from the Conference Committee as a whole, how it could be considered by the Committee and importantly whether there would be a process whereby a government would be able to submit any additional elements.
- (4) The Committee took note of the Governing Body’s request that the Office review existing report forms. For this purpose, the Committee designated three of its members to contribute their expertise on Conventions for which they were initially responsible in order to assist the Office’s review.

Relations with the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

9. A spirit of mutual respect, cooperation and responsibility has consistently prevailed in the Committee’s relations with the International Labour Conference and its Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee of Experts takes the proceedings of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards into full consideration, not only in respect of general matters concerning standard-setting activities and supervisory procedures, but also in particular of specific matters concerning the way in which States fulfil their standards-related obligations. In this context, the Committee again welcomed the participation of its Chairperson as an observer in the general discussion of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 96th Session (May–June 2007) of the International Labour Conference. It noted the request by the Conference Committee for the Director-General to renew this invitation for the 97th Session (May–June 2008) of the Conference. The Committee of Experts has accepted this invitation.

10. The Chairperson of the Committee of Experts once again invited the Employer and Worker Vice-Chairpersons of the Committee on the Application of Standards of the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (Mr Edward Potter and Mr Luc Cortebeek, respectively) to participate in a special sitting of the Committee at its present session. Both accepted this invitation and discussed matters of mutual interest with the Committee.

11. The interactive format for this special sitting, initiated last year, was utilized again this year. The two Vice-Chairpersons of the Conference Committee provided information on the recent changes in its working methods. These changes included measures implemented to improve transparency and effectiveness of its work. Matters relating to the Committee of Experts’ report were then discussed, particularly the possibility of reproducing certain comments at the Workers’ group’s request. Within the framework of this sitting, a representative of the Director-General provided information regarding the current discussion on strengthening the ILO’s capacity to assist its Members’ efforts to reach its objectives in the context of globalization. Explanations were provided on the possible implications and ramifications for normative action, and more specifically on the work of both committees concerning General Surveys.

II. Compliance with obligations

Follow-up to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards

12. The Committee recalls that, at the instigation of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 93rd Session (June 2005) of the International Labour Conference, the two committees, with the assistance of the Office, strengthened the follow-up given to cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations with a view, in so far as possible, to identifying more accurately the difficulties underlying these failures and enabling appropriate solutions to be identified. As both committees have recalled on numerous occasions, such failures hinder the functioning of the supervisory system, which is based primarily on the information provided by governments in their reports. Therefore, in cases where a report has not been submitted for a number of years, which are the most serious cases, supervision of the application of ratified Conventions cannot begin or is limited by the lack of up to date information. Cases of failure to fulfil reporting obligations therefore have to be given the same level of attention as those relating to the application of ratified Conventions.

13. The Committee notes the discussions held in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session (May–June 2007) of the International Labour Conference, with particular reference to the general discussion and the discussions and conclusions of the special sitting on cases of serious failure by member States to fulfil their reporting and other standards-related obligations. The Committee was informed that, to follow up the discussions of the Conference Committee, the Office sent targeted letters to the 45 member States mentioned in the relevant paragraphs of the report of the Conference Committee concerning their failure to fulfil the respective obligations (there were 49 such member States in 2006 and 53 in 2005). The technical assistance activities undertaken in the context of this individualized follow-up were continued and strengthened through closer coordination between all the Office units concerned. The work of the two committees accordingly contributes to determining the priorities of the technical assistance provided primarily by the standards specialists in subregional offices, with the support, where appropriate, of national correspondents.

14. The Committee was informed that the great majority of the member States mentioned in the report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, namely 38 member States, had already been mentioned in the reports of the Committee on the Application of Standards in 2005 and 2006 for at least the same failings. The subregional offices have therefore been invited to make contact as a priority with these 38 member States. The information available this year (discussions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, information from subregional offices) confirms that the difficulties most commonly experienced by member States in fulfilling their obligations are of an institutional nature. In this respect, the difficulties encountered are caused both by the lack of resources of the authorities principally responsible for sending reports (inadequate staff numbers or staff with little knowledge of reporting procedures, frequent staff movements requiring renewed assistance from the Office) and inadequate coordination between this authority and the other authorities required to contribute to the reports. Less frequently, the difficulties can be explained by more deep-rooted reasons relating to national circumstances which go well beyond the sending of reports. In view of the nature of the difficulties encountered, the Committee hopes that reporting issues will rapidly be incorporated, where appropriate, into the Organization's broader technical cooperation programmes, as announced in the context of the new interim plan of action to enhance the impact of the standards system, recently approved by the Governing Body at its 300th Session (November 2007). The Committee also emphasizes that, in certain cases, problems that are to some extent similar to those referred to above persist or reoccur in relation to the sending of reports on the application of Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories. This is confirmed by the low percentage of reports received this year for these territories.<sup>3</sup> The Committee hopes that the governments concerned will be able to identify appropriate measures to find a lasting solution to these problems, where necessary with the assistance of the Office.

15. The Committee notes that certain of the 45 member States referred to in the report of the Conference Committee have, frequently with the assistance of the Office, fulfilled their reporting and other standards-related obligations, in full or in part, since the end of the 96th Session of the Conference. In this respect, the Committee wishes firstly to welcome the action taken by certain member States to make up the accumulated backlog by submitting all the reports due.<sup>4</sup> It also welcomes the fact that other member States have made use of the period between the Conference and the present session of the Committee of Experts to provide most or all of the reports requested.<sup>5</sup> Finally, it notes that, according to information provided by the subregional offices, a steadily increasing number of member States have taken action to overcome their difficulties in this regard. The Committee firmly hopes that these latter States will pursue their efforts and will follow up on the matter with the assistance of the Office. The Committee's observations on compliance with reporting obligations by member States and the information provided concerning the submission of the instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities are contained in Part II of its report.<sup>6</sup>

16. The Committee reminds governments that they are required to comply with all the reporting and other standards-related obligations that they accept upon becoming Members of the Organization. Compliance with these obligations is essential for dialogue on the effective implementation of ratified Conventions. Governments that request technical assistance may benefit from it, yet such assistance is only useful if it focuses on the specific difficulties faced. For such assistance to be appropriate and effective, governments must be prepared to inform the Office of the specific problems that they are encountering and to give effect to lasting solutions. Finally, the Committee welcomes the effective collaboration that it maintains with the Committee on the Application of Standards, on matters of mutual interest that are essential to the proper discharge of their respective tasks, in relation to improved compliance with reporting obligations.

Reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35 of the Constitution)

A. Supply of reports

17. The Committee's principal task consists of the examination of the reports supplied by governments on Conventions that have been ratified by member States and that have been declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories.

18. In accordance with the changes in the reporting system adopted by the Governing Body in November 2001 and March 2002,<sup>7</sup> particularly with a view to facilitating the collection of information on related subjects at the national level, requests for reports on Conventions covering the same subject are grouped together and addressed simultaneously to each country.<sup>8</sup> In addition, in the case of the 12 fundamental and priority Conventions, as well as for certain other groups of Conventions containing a large number of instruments, reports are requested, with a view to balancing their submission, in accordance with the English alphabetical order, the first year by member States beginning with the letters A to J, and the

<sup>5</sup> Albania (submission of first reports on Conventions Nos 174, 175 and 176 due since 2005), Armenia (submission of the majority of the reports due, including first reports on Conventions Nos 100, 135 and 151 due since 1996, on Convention No. 174 due since 1998, and on Conventions Nos 17 and 98 due since 2005), Cambodia (submission of some of the reports due), Côte d'Ivoire (submission of first report on Convention No. 138 due since 2005), Kyrgyzstan (submission of first report on Convention No. 105 due since 2001, on Conventions Nos 150 and 154 due since 2005, and on Convention No. 182 due since 2006), Russian Federation (submission of first report on Convention No. 152 due since 2006), Saint Kitts and Nevis (submission of first report on Convention No. 100 due since 2002), Saint Lucia (submission of the majority of the reports due, including first reports on Conventions Nos 154 and 158 due since 2002), San Marino (submission of some of the reports due), Sao Tome and Principe (submission of the majority of the reports due), Serbia (submission of first reports on Conventions Nos 27, 113 and 114 due since 2003, and on Conventions Nos 8, 16, 22, 23, 53, 56, 69, 73 and 74 due since 2005), The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (submission of some of the reports due, including the first report on Convention No. 105 due since 2005), United Kingdom (Montserrat) (submission of some of the reports due). The following countries have since replied to all or the majority of the Committee's comments: Albania, Bahamas, Botswana, Burkina Faso, Comoros, Cyprus, Dominica, Eritrea, Estonia, Grenada, Haiti, Indonesia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Jordan, Kazakhstan, Kiribati, Republic of Korea, Malawi, Malta, Papua New Guinea, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, South Africa, Swaziland, United Republic of Tanzania, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia and Trinidad and Tobago.

<sup>6</sup> Part II of the present report refers to certain cases of failure to fulfil reporting and other standards-related obligations within the framework of general observations (pp. 33–39) and observations on the submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference (pp. 701–713).

second year by those whose names begin with the letters K to Z, or the converse<sup>9</sup> (for a list of Conventions grouped by subject see page v).

19. The Committee also had before it reports especially requested from certain governments on other Conventions for one of the following reasons:

- (a) a first detailed report was due after ratification;
- (b) important discrepancies had previously been noted between national law or practice and the Conventions in question;
- (c) reports due for the previous period had not been received or did not contain the information requested;
- (d) reports were expressly requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

The Committee also had before it a number of reports which it was unable to examine at its previous session.

20. In some cases, reports are not accompanied by copies of the relevant legislation, statistical data or other documentation necessary for their full examination. In cases where this material was not otherwise available, the Office, as requested by the Committee, has written to the governments concerned asking them to supply the necessary texts to enable the Committee to fulfil its tasks.

21. Appendix I of this report lists the reports received and not received, classified by country/territory and by Convention. Appendix II shows, for each year in which the Conference has met since 1932, the number and percentage of reports received by the prescribed date, by the date of the meeting of the Committee of Experts and by the date of the session of the International Labour Conference.

Reports requested and received

22. A total of 2,477 reports were requested from governments on the application of Conventions ratified by member States (article 22 of the Constitution). At the end of the present session of the Committee, 1,611 of these reports had been received by the Office. This figure corresponds to 65.04 per cent of the reports requested, compared with 66.47 per cent last year.

23. In addition, 304 reports were requested on Conventions declared applicable with or without modifications to non-metropolitan territories (article 35 of the Constitution). Of these, 109 reports, or 35.86 per cent, had been received by the end of the Committee's session, in comparison with 67.71 per cent last year.

24. The Committee expresses its deep dismay that the total number of reports received on the application of ratified Conventions has decreased further this year, even though there has been a significant rise in the number of reports received within the time limits.<sup>10</sup> The Committee is also concerned at the low number of reports received for Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories. The Committee urges governments, with the assistance of the Office if they so wish, to make every effort to remedy this situation. It draws the attention of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in this respect. The Committee firmly hopes that measures already taken by the Office to strengthen its assistance to governments in relation to compliance with their reporting obligations will be pursued and intensified.

Compliance with reporting obligations

25. Most of the governments from which reports were due on the application of ratified Conventions have supplied most or all of the reports requested (see Appendix I). However, no reports due have been received for the past two or more years from the following 16 countries: Bolivia, Cape Verde, Congo, Denmark (Faeroe Islands), Equatorial Guinea, Iraq, Kiribati, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Tajikistan, Togo, Turkmenistan, United Kingdom (Anguilla, St. Helena) and Uzbekistan. In addition, all or the majority of the reports due this year have not been received from the following 32 countries: Antigua and Barbuda, Barbados, Cambodia, Chad, Democratic Republic of the Congo, France (French Guiana, French Southern and Antarctic Territories, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Réunion, St. Pierre and Miquelon), Gambia, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Ireland, Kyrgyzstan, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Malaysia, Malaysia (Sabah), Malaysia (Sarawak), Mauritania, Mongolia, Netherlands (Netherlands Antilles), Nigeria, Peru, Saint Kitts and Nevis, San Marino, Senegal, Seychelles, Slovenia, Sudan, United Republic of Tanzania (Zanzibar), The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Uganda, United Kingdom (Bermuda, British Virgin Islands, Falkland Islands (Malvinas), Gibraltar, Guernsey, Montserrat) and Zambia.

26. The Committee urges the governments of these countries to make every effort to supply the reports requested on ratified Conventions. The Committee is aware that where no reports have been sent for some time, it is likely that administrative or other problems are preventing the government concerned from fulfilling its obligations under the ILO Constitution, and it recalls that in cases of this kind, assistance from the Office, in particular through the specialists on international labour standards in the subregional offices, can help the government to overcome such difficulties, as recalled by the Office in the letters that it sent to certain member States cited in the report of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

Late reports

27. The reports due on ratified Conventions should be sent to the Office between 1 June and 1 September of each year. Due consideration is given, when setting this date, to the time required to translate the reports, where necessary, to conduct research into legislation and other documents necessary for the examination of reports and legislation.

28. Once again this year, the Committee is bound to express concern at the numbers of reports that are received after the prescribed time period. The supervisory procedure can function adequately only if reports are communicated in due time. This is particularly true in the case of first reports or reports on Conventions where there are serious or continuing discrepancies, which the Committee has to examine in greater depth.

29. However, the Committee observes that by 1 September 2007, the proportion of reports received was 34.2 per cent, compared with 28.8 per cent at its previous session. While this percentage has risen slightly each year since 2005, there has been a clear increase this year, attaining a level that has not been achieved for many years, as shown in Appendix II to this report. The Committee trusts that this trend will be maintained through the continued efforts of the member States and the Office so that the percentage of reports received by 1 September, which is nevertheless fairly low, will continue to rise.

30. Furthermore, the Committee notes that a number of countries sent some or all of the reports due by 1 September 2006 on ratified Conventions during the period between the end of the Committee's December 2006 session and the beginning of the May–June 2007 session of the International Labour Conference, or even during the Conference.<sup>11</sup> The Committee emphasizes that this practice also disturbs the regular operation of the supervisory system and makes it more burdensome. It wishes to provide herein the list of countries which followed this practice in 2006–07, as requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards: Algeria (Conventions Nos 81, 182); Armenia (Conventions Nos 29, 81, 95, 98, 100, 105); Bahamas (Conventions Nos 81, 138); Belize (Conventions Nos 11, 23, 26, 29, 87, 88, 99, 105); Bosnia and Herzegovina (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 13, 19, 29, 90, 97, 105, 113, 126, 129, 131, 135, 138, 142, 143, 155, 156, 159, 161, 182); Botswana (Conventions Nos 29, 95, 105, 173, 176); Burkina Faso (Conventions Nos 29, 105, 129, 131, 138); Central African Republic (Conventions Nos 94, 138, 182); Côte d'Ivoire (Conventions Nos 138, 159); Denmark – Greenland (Convention No. 126); Djibouti (Conventions Nos 6, 9, 11, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17, 18, 29, 44, 45, 52, 77, 78, 81, 89, 94, 95, 98, 99, 105, 115, 120); Dominica (Conventions Nos 11, 16, 26, 29, 81, 87, 94, 95, 98, 100, 105, 108); Eritrea (Conventions Nos 29, 100, 105, 111, 138); Estonia (Conventions Nos 5, 6, 10, 11, 29, 105, 129, 147, 182); Fiji (Convention No. 159); France (Conventions Nos 94, 102, 113, 114, 125, 126, 156, 158, 163, 164, 166, 178, 179); France – French Guiana (Conventions Nos 112, 113, 114, 125, 126); France – French Southern and Antarctic Territories (Convention No. 87); France – Guadeloupe (Conventions Nos 112, 113, 114, 125, 126); France – Martinique (Conventions Nos 112, 113, 114, 125, 126); France – Réunion (Conventions Nos 112, 113, 114, 125, 126); France – St. Pierre and Miquelon (Conventions Nos 125, 126); Greece (Conventions Nos 95, 102, 124, 156, 182); Grenada (Conventions Nos 11, 26, 94, 95, 99); Indonesia (Conventions Nos 81, 138, 182); Islamic Republic of Iran (Conventions Nos 29, 100, 105, 122, 182); Jordan (Conventions Nos 29, 105, 124, 138, 147, 182); Republic of Korea (Conventions Nos 19, 100, 111, 122, 144, 156); Kyrgyzstan (Conventions Nos 105, 138, 150, 154, 160); Malta (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 19, 42, 87, 98, 100, 111, 141); Netherlands – Aruba (Convention No. 118); Netherlands – Netherlands Antilles (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 17, 25, 42, 118, 122); Panama (Conventions Nos 87, 100, 111, 122); Papua New Guinea (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 19, 42, 87, 98, 100, 111, 122, 158); Peru (Convention No. 44); Russian Federation (Conventions Nos 11, 29, 81, 87, 98, 100, 111, 113, 122, 150, 156); Saint Kitts and Nevis (Convention No. 100); San Marino (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 105, 160); Sao Tome and Principe (Conventions Nos 17, 18, 19, 81, 87, 88, 98, 100, 106, 111, 144, 159); Slovakia (Conventions Nos 34, 88, 144, 156); Swaziland (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 19, 87, 98, 100, 111, 144); Sweden (Convention No. 158); United Republic of Tanzania (Conventions Nos 11, 12, 17, 19); United Republic of Tanzania – Tanganyika (Convention No. 45); Thailand (Conventions Nos 19, 88, 100, 122, 138); The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (Conventions Nos 87, 98); Trinidad and Tobago (Conventions Nos 19, 87, 98, 125, 144); Turkey (Convention No. 115); United Kingdom – Isle of Man (Convention No. 122); United Kingdom – Montserrat (Conventions Nos 11, 19, 26, 87, 98).

Supply of first reports

31. A total of 118 of the 212 first reports due on the application of ratified Conventions were received by the time that the Committee's session ended, compared to last year when 60 of the 179 first reports due had been received. However, a number of countries have failed to supply first reports, some of which are more than a year overdue. Thus, certain first reports on ratified Conventions have not been received for a certain number of years from the following 16 member States:

- since 1992 – Liberia (Convention No. 133);

<sup>11</sup> For the reports received and not received by the end of the Conference, see report of the Committee on the Application of Standards, Part Two, II, Appendix I (Provisional Record No. 22, 96th Session, ILC, 2007). See also information on article 22 reports requested and received on the ILO web site: <http://webfusion.ilo.org/public/db/standards/normes/appl/index.cfm>

- since 1994 – Kyrgyzstan (Convention No. 111);
- since 1995 – Armenia (Convention No. 111), Kyrgyzstan (Convention No. 133);
- since 1998 – Equatorial Guinea (Conventions Nos 68, 92);
- since 1999 – Turkmenistan (Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105, 111);
- since 2001 – Armenia (Convention No. 176);
- since 2002 – Gambia (Conventions Nos 29, 105, 138), Saint Kitts and Nevis (Conventions Nos 87, 98), Saint Lucia (Convention No. 182);
- since 2003 – Dominica (Convention No. 182), Gambia (Convention No. 182), Iraq (Conventions Nos 172, 182);
- since 2004 – Antigua and Barbuda (Conventions Nos 122, 131, 135, 142, 144, 150, 151, 154, 155, 158, 161, 182), Dominica (Conventions Nos 144, 169), The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (Convention No. 182);
- since 2005 – Antigua and Barbuda (Convention No. 100), Liberia (Conventions Nos 81, 144, 150, 182), Uganda (Convention No. 138); and
- since 2006 – Albania (Convention No. 171), Dominica (Conventions Nos 135, 147, 150), Georgia (Convention No. 163), Kyrgyzstan (Conventions Nos 17, 184), Nigeria (Conventions Nos 137, 178, 179).

32. The Committee, like the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, wishes to emphasize the importance of first reports. They provide the basis on which the Committee makes its initial assessment of the observance of ratified Conventions. The Committee urges the governments concerned to make a special effort to supply these reports.

Replies to the comments of the supervisory bodies

33. Governments are requested to reply in their reports to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee, and the majority of governments have provided the replies requested. In accordance with the established practice, the Office has written to all the governments which failed to provide such replies requesting them to supply the necessary information. Of the 32 governments to which such letters were sent, only eight have provided the information requested.

34. The Committee regrets that there are still many cases of failure to reply to its comments, either:

- (a) of all the reports requested from governments, no reply has been received; or
- (b) the reports received contained no reply to most of the Committee's comments (observations and/or direct requests), and/or did not reply to the letters sent by the Office.

35. In all, there were 555 cases of no response (concerning 49 countries).<sup>12</sup> There were 415 such cases (concerning 47 countries) last year. Under these conditions, the Committee is bound to repeat the observations or direct requests already made on the Conventions in question.

36. The failure of the governments concerned to fulfil their obligations considerably hinders the work of the Committee of Experts and that of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee cannot overemphasize the importance of ensuring the dispatch of the reports and replies to its comments.

B. Examination of reports

37. In examining the reports received on ratified Conventions and Conventions declared applicable to non-metropolitan territories, in accordance with its normal practice, the Committee assigned to each of its members the initial responsibility for a group of Conventions. Reports received early enough are sent to the members concerned in advance of the Committee's session. The members submit their preliminary conclusions on the instruments for which they are responsible to the Committee in plenary sitting for discussion and approval. Decisions on comments are adopted by consensus.

Observations and direct requests

38. In many cases, the Committee has found that no comment is called for regarding the manner in which a ratified Convention has been implemented. In other cases, however, the Committee has found it necessary to draw the attention of the governments concerned to the need to take further action to give effect to certain provisions of Conventions or to supply additional information on given points. As in previous years, its comments have been drawn up in the form either of "observations" which are reproduced in the report of the Committee, or "direct requests", which are not published in the Committee's report, but are communicated directly to the governments concerned.<sup>13</sup>

39. The Committee's observations appear in Part II (sections I and II) of this report, together with a list under each Convention of any direct requests. An index of all observations and direct requests, classified by country, is provided in Appendix VII to the report.

40. As in the past, the Committee has indicated by special notes at the end of the observations (traditionally known as footnotes) the cases in which, because of the nature of the problems encountered in the application of the Conventions concerned, it has seemed appropriate to ask the government to supply a report earlier than would otherwise have been the case.<sup>14</sup> Under the present reporting cycle,<sup>15</sup> which applies to most Conventions, such early reports have been requested after an interval of either one or two years, according to the circumstances. In some instances, the Committee has also requested the government to supply full particulars to the Conference at its next session in May–June 2008.<sup>16</sup> In addition, in certain cases, the Committee has requested governments to furnish detailed reports when simplified reports would otherwise be due.

41. In order to identify cases for which it inserts special notes, the Committee uses the basic criteria described below, while taking into account the following three general considerations. First, these criteria are indicative. In exercising its discretion in the application of these criteria, the Committee may also have regard to the specific circumstances of the country and the length of the reporting cycle. Second, these criteria are applicable to cases in which an earlier report is requested, often referred to as a “single footnote”, as well as to cases in which the government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference, often referred to as a “double footnote”. The difference between these two categories is one of degree. Finally, a serious case otherwise justifying a special note to provide full particulars to the Conference (double footnote) might only be given a special note to provide an early report (single footnote) when there has been a recent discussion of that case in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards.

<sup>15</sup> After the first report, subsequent reports are requested every two years for the fundamental and priority Conventions and every five years for other Conventions (GB.258/6/19).

42. The criteria to which the Committee has regard are the following:

- the seriousness of the problem; in this respect, the Committee emphasizes that an important consideration is the necessity to view the problem in the context of a particular Convention and to take into account matters involving fundamental rights, workers’ health, safety and well-being as well as any adverse impact, including at the international level, on workers and other categories of protected persons;
- the persistence of the problem;
- the urgency of the situation; the evaluation of such urgency is necessarily case-specific, according to standard human rights criteria, such as life-threatening situations or problems where irreversible harm is foreseeable; and
- the quality and scope of the government’s response in its reports or the absence of response to the issues raised by the Committee, including cases of clear and repeated refusal on the part of a State to comply with its obligations.

43. At its 76th Session (November–December 2005), the Committee decided that the identification of cases in respect of which a government is requested to provide detailed information to the Conference would be a two-stage process: first, the expert initially responsible for a particular group of Conventions recommends to the Committee the insertion of special notes; second, in light of all the recommendations made, the Committee will, after discussion, take a final, collegial decision once it has reviewed the application of all the Conventions.

Practical application

44. It is customary for the Committee to note the information contained in the governments’ reports allowing it to appreciate the application of the Conventions in practice, such as information relating to judicial decisions, statistics and labour inspection. The supply of this information is requested in almost all report forms, as well as the specific terms of some Conventions.

45. The Committee notes that 362 reports received this year contain information on the practical application of Conventions. Of these, 52 reports contain information on national jurisprudence. Such information has been communicated mostly concerning equality and opportunity of treatment (Conventions Nos 100 and 111) and the worst forms of child labour Convention (Convention No. 182). The Committee also notes that 310 of the reports contain information on statistics and labour inspection. The majority of this information relates to Conventions concerning the elimination of child labour (Conventions Nos 138 and 182), equality and opportunity of treatment (Conventions Nos 100 and 111), labour inspection (Convention No. 81) and employment policy (Convention No. 122).

46. The Committee must stress to governments the importance of submitting such information, since it is indispensable for completing the examination of national legislation and for helping the Committee to identify the issues arising from real problems of application in practice. The Committee also wishes to encourage employers’ and workers’ organizations to submit clear and up to date information on the application of the Conventions in practice.

Cases of progress

47. Following its examination of the reports supplied by governments, and in accordance with its standard practice, the Committee refers in its comments to cases in which it expresses its satisfaction or interest at the progress achieved in the application of the respective Conventions. Over the years, the Committee has developed a general approach, described below, concerning the identification of cases of progress. First, the Committee emphasizes that an expression of progress can refer to different kinds of measures. In the final instance, the Committee will exercise its discretion in noting progress having regard in particular to the nature of the Convention as well as to the specific circumstances of the country.

48. Since first identifying cases of satisfaction in its report in 1964,<sup>17</sup> the Committee has continued to follow the same general criteria. The Committee expresses satisfaction in cases in which, following comments it has made on a specific issue, governments have taken measures through, either the adoption of an amendment to the legislation or a significant change in the national policy or practice, thus achieving fuller compliance with their obligations under the respective Conventions. The reason for identifying cases of satisfaction is twofold: to place on record the Committee’s appreciation of the positive action taken by governments in response to its comments, and to provide an example to other governments and social partners which have to address similar issues. In expressing its satisfaction, the Committee indicates to governments and the social partners that it considers the specific matter resolved. In so doing, the Committee must emphasize that an expression of satisfaction is limited to the particular issue at hand and the nature of the measure taken by the government concerned. Therefore, in the same comment, the Committee may express satisfaction on a particular issue, while raising other important issues which in its view have not been addressed in a satisfactory manner. Further, if the satisfaction relates to the adoption of legislation, the Committee may also consider appropriate follow-up on its practical application.

49. As regards the visibility and impact that cases of progress may have, the Committee welcomed the discussion at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session (May–June 2007) of the application of the Occupational Safety and Health Convention, 1981 (No. 155), in Spain, which permitted ILO member States to learn from an instructive case of good practice.

50. Details concerning these cases are to be found in Part II of this report and cover 65 instances in which measures of this kind have been taken in 52 countries. The full list is as follows:

51. Thus the total number of cases in which the Committee has been led to express its satisfaction at the progress achieved following its comments has risen to 2,620 since the Committee began listing them in its report.

52. Within cases of progress, the distinction between cases of satisfaction and cases of interest was formalized in 1979.<sup>18</sup> In general, cases of interest cover measures that are sufficiently advanced to justify the expectation that further progress would be achieved in the future and regarding which the Committee would want to continue its dialogue with the government and the social partners. This may include: draft legislation before parliament, or other proposed legislative changes not yet forwarded or available to the Committee; consultations within the government and with the social partners; new policies; and, the development and implementation of activities within the framework of a technical cooperation project or following technical assistance or advice from the Office. Judicial decisions, according to the level of the court, the subject matter and the force of such decisions in a particular legal system would normally be considered as cases of interest unless there was a compelling reason to note a particular judicial decision as a case of satisfaction. The Committee may also note as cases of interest progress made by a State, province or territory in the framework of a federal system. The Committee's practice has developed to such an extent that cases in which it expresses interest may now also encompass a variety of new or innovative measures which have not necessarily been requested by the Committee. The paramount consideration is that the measures contribute to the overall achievement of the objectives of a particular Convention.

Questions concerning the application of certain Conventions

54. The question of the application of the Marking of Weight (Package Transported by Vessels) Convention, 1929 (No. 27) in relation to modern methods of cargo handling, with particular reference to containers is addressed in a general observation which appears as an introduction to individual examination of the reports under this Convention.

55. The necessity for effective cooperation between the system of labour inspection and the judicial system is also emphasized in a general observation on the application of the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), and of the Labour Inspection (Agriculture) Convention, 1969 (No. 129).

Role of employers' and workers' organizations

56. At each session, the Committee draws the attention of governments to the important role of employers' and workers' organizations in the application of Conventions and Recommendations. Moreover, it highlights the fact that numerous Conventions require consultation with employers' and workers' organizations, or their collaboration in a variety of measures. The Committee notes that almost all governments have indicated in the reports supplied under articles 19 and 22 of the Constitution the representative organizations of employers and workers to which, in accordance with article 23, paragraph 2, of the Constitution, they have communicated copies of the reports supplied to the Office.

Comments made by employers' and workers' organizations

57. Since its last session, the Committee has received 532 comments (compared to 518 last year), 40 of which were communicated by employers' organizations and 492 by workers' organizations. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to this contribution by employers' and workers' organizations to the work of the supervisory bodies. This contribution is essential for the Committee's evaluation of the application of ratified Conventions in law and in practice.

58. The majority of the comments received (508) relate to the application of ratified Conventions (see Appendix III).<sup>19</sup> Some 281 of these comments relate to the application of fundamental Conventions and 252 concern the application of other Conventions. Moreover, 24 comments concern reports provided by governments under article 19 of the Constitution on the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention (No. 94) and Recommendation (No. 84), 1949.<sup>20</sup>

59. The Committee notes that, of the comments received this year, 352 were transmitted directly to the Office which in accordance with the practice established by the Committee referred them to the governments concerned for comment. The Committee emphasizes that comments submitted by employers' and workers' organizations should be received by the Office by 1 September at the latest to allow governments to have a reasonable time to respond, thereby enabling the Committee to examine the issues in question at its session in November the same year. Comments received later than 1 September will be examined by the Committee at its session the following year. In 173 cases, the governments transmitted the comments with their reports, sometimes adding their own comments.

60. The Committee also examined a number of other comments by employers' and workers' organizations, consideration of which had been postponed from its previous session because the comments of the organizations or the replies of the governments had arrived just before, during or just after the session. It again had to postpone until its next session, the examination of a number of comments, when they were received too close to or even during the Committee's present session, in particular to allow reasonable time for the governments concerned to make comments.

61. The Committee notes that in most cases the employers' and workers' organizations endeavoured to gather and present elements of law and fact on the application in practice of ratified Conventions. The Committee recalls that it is important for the organizations, when referring specifically to the Convention or Conventions deemed relevant, to provide detailed information that has real additional value with regard to the information provided by the governments and the issues addressed in the Committee's comments. Such information should help to update or renew the analysis of the application of Conventions and emphasize real problems concerning application in practice. The Committee hopes that the Office can provide adequate assistance in this regard to the organizations concerned.

62. At its 77th Session (November–December 2006), the Committee gave the following guidance to the Office as to the usual procedure to be followed in determining the treatment of comments received from workers' and employers' organizations in a non-reporting year.

63. Where these comments simply repeat comments made in previous years, or refer to matters already raised by the Committee, they will be examined in the normal two-year or five-year cycle, when the government's report is due, and there will be no request for a report outside that cycle. This procedure will apply also in the case of comments which provide additional information on law and practice concerning matters already raised by the Committee, or on minor legislative changes.

64. The position is different where the comments raise serious allegations of important acts of non-compliance with particular Conventions. In this case, where the allegations appear sufficiently substantiated, there will be a request for the government to reply to these allegations outside the normal cycle and the Committee will consider the comments in the year in which they have been received. This procedure will apply also to comments referring to important legislative changes, or to proposals which have a fundamental impact on the application of a Convention; and, further, to comments which refer to minor, new legislative proposals or draft laws, not yet examined by the Committee, where its early examination may assist the government at the drafting stage.

65. The aim of this guidance is to provide assistance and to achieve consistency in dealing with such comments.

66. Part II of this report contains most of the observations made by the Committee on cases in which the comments raised matters relating to the application of ratified Conventions. Where appropriate, other comments are examined in requests addressed directly to the governments.

Submission of instruments adopted by the Conference to the competent authorities (article 19, paragraphs 5, 6 and 7, of the Constitution)

67. In accordance with its terms of reference, the Committee this year examined the following information supplied by the governments of member States pursuant to article 19 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization:

- (a) information on the steps taken to submit to the competent authorities the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, adopted by the Conference at its 94th (Maritime) Session on 23 February 2006;

<sup>20</sup> See Report III (Part 1B) of the present report containing the General Survey.

- (b) information on the steps taken to submit to the competent authorities the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 95th Session (Convention No. 187 and Recommendations Nos 197 and 198) on 16 June 2006;
- (c) replies to the observations and direct requests made by the Committee at its 77th Session (November–December 2006).

68. At its 96th Session (June 2007), the Conference adopted the Work in Fishing Convention (No. 188) and Recommendation (No. 199). A number of governments have already sent the Office information on the steps taken to submit these instruments to the competent authorities. Appendix IV of Part Two of the report contains a summary indicating the name of the competent authority to which the instruments adopted by the Conference at its 94th, 95th and 96th Sessions were submitted and the date of submission.

69. Other statistical information is to be found in Appendices V and VI of Part Two of the report. Appendix V, compiled from information sent by governments, shows where each member State stands in terms of its constitutional obligation of submission. Appendix VI shows the overall situation of instruments adopted since the 51st Session (June 1967) of the Conference. The statistical data in Appendices V and VI are regularly updated by the competent branches of the Office and can be accessed via the Internet.

94th Session

70. The Maritime Labour Convention, 2006, was to be submitted to the competent authorities within 12 months or, under exceptional circumstances, within 18 months of the closure of the session of the Conference, that is, by 23 February 2007 or 23 August 2007, respectively. In all, 66 governments out of the 178 member States concerned have sent information on steps taken in this regard: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Australia, Austria, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Belgium, Benin, Bulgaria, Burkina Faso, Canada, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Gabon, Germany, Greece, India, Indonesia, Israel, Italy, Japan, Jordan, Republic of Korea, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malaysia, Malta, Mauritius, Morocco, Mozambique, Myanmar, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Oman, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Slovakia, Switzerland, United Republic of Tanzania, Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela, Viet Nam and Zimbabwe.

71. The Committee welcomes the two ratifications of the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006 by Liberia and Marshall Islands registered on 7 June 2006 and 25 September 2007, respectively. It further welcomes the information received to date on the technical measures already taken at national level and on the tripartite consultations held to examine the Maritime Labour Convention, 2006. This information enables the Office to target the technical assistance requirements of States wishing to ratify and apply this important Convention.

95th Session

72. At its 95th Session in June 2006, the Conference adopted the Promotional Framework for Occupational Safety and Health Convention (No. 187) and Recommendation (No. 197) and the Employment Relationship Recommendation (No. 198). The 12-month period for submission to the competent authorities of Convention No. 187 and Recommendations Nos 197 and 198 ended on 16 June 2007, and the 18-month period, on 16 December 2007. In all, 59 governments out of the 178 member States concerned have sent new information on steps taken in this regard: Afghanistan, Albania, Algeria, Argentina, Armenia, Barbados, Belarus, Benin, Botswana, Bulgaria, Burundi, China, Cyprus, Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Iceland, Indonesia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Israel, Italy, Japan, Republic of Korea, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Malawi, Malta, Mauritania, Mauritius, Morocco, Myanmar, Netherlands, New Zealand, Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Romania, San Marino, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, Slovakia, Switzerland, Syrian Arab Republic, United Republic of Tanzania, Thailand, Tunisia, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, United Kingdom, Uruguay and Viet Nam.

73. The Committee welcomes the first ratification of Convention No. 187 by Japan, registered on 24 July 2007.

Progress noticed

74. The Committee notes with interest the information sent in 2007 by the Governments of Afghanistan, Armenia, Islamic Republic of Iran, Madagascar and Swaziland. It welcomes the efforts made by these governments to make up for the significant delay in submission and thus fulfil their obligation to submit to their parliamentary bodies the instruments adopted by the Conference over a number of years.

Special problems

75. To facilitate the work of the Committee on the Application of Standards, this report mentions only the governments which have not provided any information on the submission to the competent authorities of instruments adopted by the Conference for at least the seven sessions held from June 1999 (i.e. from the 87th Session to the 94th (Maritime) Session in February 2006). This time frame was deemed long enough to warrant inviting Government delegations to a special sitting of the Conference Committee so that they may account for the delays in submission.

76. The Committee notes that at the closure of its 78th Session, i.e. 7 December 2007, five governments are in this category: Solomon Islands, Uzbekistan, Sierra Leone, Somalia and Turkmenistan. The Committee is aware of the exceptional circumstances that have affected these countries for many decades and knows that they often lack the appropriate institutions to discharge the obligation of submission.

77. The Committee has already indicated that the Director-General has requested the member States to give top priority to the ratification of the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). In this regard, the Committee noted its concern about the fact that by simply submitting and ratifying Convention No. 182, certain governments avoid being placed in the category of States that have not submitted any of the instruments adopted over the “last seven sessions” of the Conference, even though they are significantly behind with regard to submission.

78. Indeed, at present, it appears that more than 50 governments have failed to provide any information on submission to the competent authorities of the instruments adopted by the Conference over the seven sessions to be considered as the period of reference in 2008 (i.e. from the 88th Session in May–June 2000 to the 95th Session in June 2006).

79. These countries have been identified in the observations published in this report and the instruments which have not been submitted are indicated in the statistical appendices. There is therefore a danger that a significant number of countries not mentioned in paragraph 76 may, in reality, be experiencing considerable difficulties. The Committee therefore considers it useful to attract the attention of these countries, listed in the footnote, so that they can immediately, as a matter of urgency, take appropriate measures to bring themselves up to date.<sup>21</sup>

80. The Committee also hopes that the government authorities and the social partners in these countries will be the first to benefit from the measures taken by the Office within the framework of the new interim plan of action to enhance the impact of the standards system, recently approved by the Governing Body at its 300th Session (November 2007).

Comments of the Committee and replies from governments

81. As in its previous reports, the Committee makes individual observations, in section III of Part Two of this report, on the points that should be brought to the special attention of governments. Observations are made in cases where there has been no information provided for five or more sessions of the Conference. Furthermore, requests for additional information on other points have been addressed directly to a number of countries (see list of direct requests at the end of section III).

82. The Committee hopes that these 81 observations and 47 direct requests that it is addressing this year to governments will enable them better to discharge their constitutional obligation of submission and so contribute to the promotion of the standards adopted by the Conference.

83. As the Committee has already pointed out, it is important that governments provide the information and documents required by the questionnaire at the end of the Memorandum adopted by the Governing Body in March 2005. The Committee must receive, for examination, a summary or a copy of the documents by which the instruments have been submitted to the parliamentary bodies and be informed of the proposals made as to the action to be taken on them. The obligation of submission is discharged only once the instruments adopted by the Conference have been submitted to parliament and the competent authorities have taken a decision on them. The Office has to be informed of this decision as well as of the submission of instruments to parliament.

84. The Committee hopes to be able to note progress in this matter in its next report. It again reminds governments that they may seek technical assistance from the ILO, particularly through the standards specialists in the field.

Instruments chosen for reports under article 19 of the Constitution

85. In accordance with the decision taken by the Governing Body,<sup>22</sup> governments were requested to supply reports under article 19 of the Constitution on the Labour Clauses (Public Contracts) Convention (No. 94) and Recommendation (No. 84), 1949.

86. A total of 301 reports were requested and 146 were received.<sup>23</sup> This represents 48.5 per cent of the reports requested.

87. The Committee notes with regret that, for the past five years, none of the reports on unratified Conventions and Recommendations requested under article 19 of the Constitution has been received from the following 29 countries: Antigua and Barbuda, Armenia, Cape Verde, Congo, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Djibouti, Equatorial Guinea, Gambia, Guinea, Haiti, Iraq, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Liberia, Pakistan, Paraguay, Russian Federation, San Marino, Sao Tome and Principe, Sierra Leone, Solomon Islands, Somalia, Tajikistan, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Togo, Turkmenistan, Uganda, Uzbekistan, Yemen.

88. The Committee once again urges governments to provide the reports requested so that its General Surveys can be as comprehensive as possible.

89. Part III of this report (issued separately as Report III (Part 1B)) contains the General Survey on labour clauses in public contracts. In accordance with the practice followed in previous years, the survey has been prepared on the basis of a preliminary examination by a working party comprising three members of the Committee.

III. Collaboration with other international organizations and functions relating to other international instruments

A. Cooperation in the field of standards with the United Nations, the specialized agencies and other international organizations

90. In the context of collaboration with other international organizations on questions concerning supervision of the application of international instruments relating to subjects of common interest, the United Nations, certain specialized agencies and other intergovernmental organizations with which the ILO has entered into special arrangements for this purpose, are asked whether they have information that it might be useful for the Committee to examine on how certain Conventions are being applied. The list of the Conventions concerned and the international organizations that were consulted is as follows:

- Indigenous and Tribal Populations Convention, 1957 (No. 107): United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO), Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States, United Nations, office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) and World Health Organization (WHO);
- Radiation Protection Convention, 1960 (No. 115): International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA);
- Social Policy (Basic Aims and Standards) Convention, 1962 (No. 117): FAO, United Nations, office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and UNESCO;
- Prevention of Accidents (Seafarers) Convention, 1970 (No. 134), and Merchant Shipping (Minimum Standards) Convention, 1976 (No. 147): International Maritime Organization (IMO);
- Rural Workers' Organizations Convention, 1975 (No. 141): FAO, United Nations and office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights;
- Human Resources Development Convention, 1975 (No. 142): UNESCO;
- Migrant Workers (Supplementary Provisions) Convention, 1975 (No. 143): United Nations, office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, UNESCO and WHO;
- Nursing Personnel Convention, 1977 (No. 149): WHO;
- Indigenous and Tribal Peoples Convention, 1989 (No. 169): FAO, Inter-American Indian Institute of the Organization of American States, United Nations, office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, UNESCO and WHO.

B. United Nations treaties concerning human rights

91. The Committee recalls that international labour standards and the provisions of related United Nations human rights treaties are complementary and mutually reinforcing. It emphasizes that continuing cooperation between the ILO and the United Nations with regard to the application and supervision of relevant instruments is necessary, particularly in view of the approach to development based on human rights adopted by the United Nations. The Committee welcomes the adoption of the Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples by the General Assembly of the United Nations on 13 September 2007.

92. The Committee notes the efforts made by the Office to provide written and oral information to United Nations treaty bodies on a regular basis, which ensures that these bodies can continue to refer to international labour standards and to recommend measures that follow up on the Committee's comments. The Committee of Experts also continued to follow the work of the United Nations treaty bodies and to take their comments into consideration where appropriate. As in previous years, this has particularly been the case in the areas of child labour, forced labour and discrimination.

93. The Committee's annual meeting with the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights took place on 22 November 2007, at the invitation of the Friedrich Ebert Stiftung. This year, the right to freedom of association was selected as the theme for discussion, with particular reference to the links between Article 8 (on freedom of association) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and Convention No. 87, the ongoing negotiations at the open-ended working group concerning an optional protocol to the Covenant and the need for close collaboration between the ILO and the United Nations in addressing issues relating to freedom of association.

94. The Committee welcomes the continuing cooperation and dialogue with the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, as well as other relevant human rights treaty bodies, in order to promote coherent international monitoring as a basis for action to enhance the enjoyment of and compliance with economic, social and cultural rights at the national level.

C. European Code of Social Security and its Protocol

95. In accordance with the supervisory procedure established under Article 74(4) of the Code, and the arrangements made between the ILO and the Council of Europe, the Committee of Experts examined 21 reports on the application of the European Code of Social Security and, as appropriate, its Protocol. At the sitting in which the Committee examined the reports on the Code and its Protocol, the Council of Europe was represented by Ms Ana Gomez Heredero. The conclusions of the Committee regarding these reports will be sent to the Council of Europe for examination by the Committee of Experts on Standard-Setting Instruments in the Field of Social Security. Once approved, the Committee's comments should lead to the adoption of resolutions by the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the application of the Code and the Protocol by the countries concerned.

96. With its dual responsibility for the application of the Code and international labour Conventions relating to social security, the Committee seeks to develop a coherent analysis of the application of European and international instruments and to coordinate the obligations of the States parties to these instruments. The Committee also draws attention to the national situations in which recourse to technical assistance of the Council of Europe and the Office may prove to be an effective means of improving the application of the Code.

97. Lastly, the Committee would like to express its appreciation for the invaluable assistance again rendered to it by the officials of the Office, whose competence and devotion to duty make it possible for the Committee to accomplish its increasingly voluminous and complex task in a limited period of time.

Geneva, 7 December 2007.

Chairperson.

Part II. Observations concerning particular countries

I. Observations concerning reports on ratified Conventions (articles 22 and 35, paragraphs 6 and 8, of the Constitution)

General observations

Albania

The Committee notes that most of the reports due have been received and, in particular, the first reports on the application of Conventions Nos 174, 175 and 176. The Committee wishes to acknowledge the efforts made by the Government this year, while underlining that the first report on Convention No. 171 remains due since 2006. To fulfil its obligation, the Government has continued to benefit from the assistance of the Office. The Committee notes, in particular, that the Government has clarified the procedure followed for the preparation of reports within the Ministry of Labour, while the Office has taken steps to integrate the submission of reports within the broader context of ILO technical cooperation activities. The Committee has been informed that additional assistance is planned in order to enhance the knowledge and capacities of all the ministries involved in the preparation of reports as well as of the social partners. Such assistance should enable the Government to put in place sustainable institutional arrangements for the preparation of reports. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will pursue its efforts with the necessary support of the Office, to comply fully with its constitutional obligation concerning the submission of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Antigua and Barbuda

The Committee notes with regret that the efforts initiated last year by the Government to resume the communication of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been pursued this year. Indeed, none of the reports requested have been received, including, in particular, the first reports on the application of the following Conventions: Conventions Nos 122, 131, 135, 142, 144, 150, 151, 154, 155, 158, 161 and 182, due since 2004, and Convention No. 100, due since 2005. The Government received training on the submission of reports within the framework of a workshop organized by the Office in February–March 2007. The Committee hopes that the new standards specialist in the subregion will be able to assist the Government, if there are still specific difficulties preventing it from submitting the reports due, as was pointed out by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007). The Committee requests the Government to take, without further delay, the necessary measures, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Armenia

The Committee notes that the Government has submitted most of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions and, in particular, the first reports concerning the application of Conventions Nos 17, 18, 98, 100, 135, 151 and 174. The Committee wishes to acknowledge the efforts made by the Government this year, while underlining that the first reports on the application of the following Conventions remain due: Convention No. 111 (due since 1995); Convention No. 176 (due since 2001). To fulfil its obligations, the Government has continued to benefit from the assistance of the Office. The Committee notes in particular that, since its last session, the Office has provided technical advice to the working group in charge of the preparation of reports. The Committee has been informed that the Office has pledged to continue its assistance to the Government and the social partners. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will pursue its efforts, with the necessary support of the Office, to comply fully with its constitutional obligation concerning the submission of reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Bolivia

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the second consecutive year. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the Office's technical assistance to overcome any difficulties encountered in the submission of the reports due, as was pointed out by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Cape Verde

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the second consecutive year. The Government has benefited from the assistance of the Office over the past years and in August 2007 received technical advice on the submission of reports. In these circumstances, as the Office did in its letter of 20 July 2007 to follow up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee reminds the Government that the Office's technical assistance is still available to help overcome the difficulties which appear to persist. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Congo

The Committee notes with regret that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the third consecutive year. The Government undertook to send the reports in time before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) and, thereafter, when the Office visited the country in August 2007 and met with representatives of the Ministry of Labour. The Government did not indicate any particular difficulties in submitting the reports due other than delays in their transmission. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to fulfil without further delay its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Denmark

Faeroe Islands

The Committee notes with concern that, for the third consecutive year, the reports due have not been received.

The Committee notes the explanations given by the Government's representative before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) concerning, in particular, its ongoing discussions with the non-metropolitan territory on the reports due. As was pointed out in the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee hopes that these discussions will lead to sustainable solutions concerning the submission of reports on the application of Conventions declared applicable to this non-metropolitan territory, so that the Government will fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due.

Dominica

The Committee notes that the first reports on the application of the following Conventions have not been received: Convention No. 182 (due since 2003); Conventions Nos 144 and 169 (due since 2004); Conventions Nos 135, 147 and 150 (due since 2006). The Government has received training within the framework of a workshop organized by the Office in February–March 2007. The Committee hopes that the new standards specialist in the subregion will be able to assist the Government, if there are still specific difficulties preventing it from submitting the reports due, as was pointed out by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures without further delay, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Equatorial Guinea

The Committee notes that, for the second year in succession, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports due since 1998 on Conventions Nos 68 and 92. As a result of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), a working session on the submission of the reports was organized in September 2007 by the Office with the Ministry of Labour and Social Security. The Committee has been informed that, at the request of both the Government and the social partners, the Office will explore the possibility of further strengthening its assistance and that, within this framework, the continuation of the assistance concerning the submission of reports is considered by the Government to be a priority. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that, with the necessary support of the Office, the Government will soon fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Gambia

The Committee notes that the reports due this year on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports due since 2002 on Conventions Nos 29, 105 and 138 and that due since 2003 on Convention No. 182. On recent occasions, and in particular before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Government explained that it very much needed the Office's technical assistance, in particular to build capacity within the Department of Labour. In its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Office expressed its willingness to explore the possibility of organizing a national tripartite activity in 2008. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that, with the necessary support of the Office, the Government will soon fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Georgia

The Committee notes that the first report due since 2006 on Convention No. 163 has not been received. The absence of this first report has prevented any examination of the application of this Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the Office's technical assistance, in particular by indicating the specific difficulties which are preventing it from submitting the report due. The Committee requests the Government to take, without further delay, the necessary measures, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the first report due on the application of Convention No. 163.

Iraq

The Committee notes with regret that, for the fifth year in succession, the reports due have not been received, including the first reports due since 2003 on Conventions Nos 172 and 182. As was pointed out by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee hopes that as soon as national circumstances permit, the difficulties encountered in the submission of reports will be addressed within the broader framework of the ILO's technical cooperation activities, in order to enable the Government to fulfil its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Kiribati

The Committee notes that, for the second consecutive year, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received. The Committee has been informed that, as a result of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Government has requested the assistance of the Office to submit the reports due. Technical advice has already been provided and the Committee hopes that the Office will be able to provide further assistance so as to enable the Government to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Kyrgyzstan

The Committee notes that some of the reports due have been received and, in particular, the first reports on the application of Conventions Nos 105, 150 and 154. The Committee wishes to acknowledge the efforts made by the Government this year, while underlining that the majority of reports remains outstanding, including the first reports concerning the following Conventions: Convention No. 111 (due since 1994); Convention No. 133 (due since 1995); and Conventions Nos 17 and 184 (due since 2006). The Office provided in July 2007 assistance to the Government in the form of a tripartite seminar, involving representatives of all the ministries concerned, followed by a two-day workshop specifically designed for officials responsible for the preparation of reports. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will pursue its efforts to tackle the backlog of reports due and that, with the continued support of the Office if it so wishes, it will fulfil in due course its constitutional obligation to supply all the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Liberia

The Committee notes with regret that, for the eighth year in succession, the reports requested on the application of Conventions have not been received, including the first reports due since 1992 on Convention No. 133 and those due since 2005 on Conventions Nos 81, 144, 150 and 182. In the light of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee notes that the Government is committed to resolving its difficulties relating to the submission of reports and the Office considers that assistance should be provided as a matter of priority. The Committee welcomes this positive development and firmly hopes that the necessary steps will be taken without further delay so as to enable the Government to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply, in due course, the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Nigeria

The Committee notes that the reports due this year on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first reports due since 2006 on Conventions Nos 137, 178 and 179. The absence of these first reports has prevented any examination of the application of these three Conventions. The Committee reminds the Government that it can avail itself of the Office's technical assistance, in particular by indicating the specific difficulties which are still preventing it from submitting the reports due. The Committee requests the Government to take, without further delay, the necessary measures, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Saint Kitts and Nevis

The Committee notes that the first report on the application of Convention No. 100, due since 2002, has been received this year. Nonetheless, all the other reports requested remain outstanding and, in particular, the first reports on the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98, due since 2002. The Government has received training within the framework of a workshop organized by the Office in February–March 2007. The Committee hopes that the new standards specialist in the subregion will be able to assist the Government, if there are still specific difficulties preventing it from submitting the reports due, as was pointed out by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007). The Committee requests the Government to take, without further delay, the necessary measures, including by requesting assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Saint Lucia

The Committee notes that the Government has resumed the communication of the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, after three years of interruption, by submitting nearly all the reports requested. The Committee wishes to acknowledge the efforts made by the Government this year, while underlining that the first report on Convention No. 182 remains due since 2002. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon submit the two remaining reports due, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Sierra Leone

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the second consecutive year. The Committee hopes that as soon as national circumstances permit, the difficulties encountered in the submission of the reports due will be addressed. It wishes to request the Office to provide technical assistance to the Government, if the latter so accepts, as a matter of priority in order to enable the Government to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Solomon Islands

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the second consecutive year. The Committee notes the detailed explanations given by the Government's representative before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) for the delays encountered in the submission of reports. The Government has requested the Office's technical assistance and, in particular, specific training for the official responsible for the submission of reports. The Committee hopes that, with the necessary support of the Office, the Government will soon fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Somalia

The Committee notes that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the second consecutive year. The Committee notes the explanations given by the Government's representative before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) concerning the difficulties encountered in this respect. The Government's representative expressed the hope that, in addition to the training received this year, the Office's assistance would continue in order to strengthen the capacity of both the Government and the social partners in relation to the submission of reports. The Committee hopes that, as soon as national circumstances permit, and as indicated in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards, the Office will be able to provide the necessary assistance in order to enable the Government to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Tajikistan

The Committee notes that the reports due have not been received for the second consecutive year. In the light of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee notes that positive developments have occurred over the last year and that at its request the Government has benefited from the Office's technical assistance. A two-day workshop on reporting obligations was held in April 2007 and the issue of the submission of reports has been included in the ILO technical cooperation programmes. In these circumstances, the Committee hopes that the Government will take additional steps, including by requesting further assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

The Committee notes that the Government has resumed this year the communication of reports due, after nine years of interruption, in particular by submitting the first report on Convention No. 105 and the detailed reports on Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee acknowledges the efforts made by the Government, while underlining that most of the reports requested remain outstanding, including, in particular, the first report due since 2004 on Convention No. 182. As underlined in the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee welcomes the Government's commitment to addressing the backlog of reports due and meeting its obligations. This commitment is demonstrated by the ongoing dialogue maintained by the Government with the Office and the substantial assistance received, the last instance of which is a tripartite seminar organized in September 2007 to enhance the knowledge and capacity of all the ministries concerned and the social partners. In these circumstances, and drawing the Government's attention once again to the importance of tackling the backlog of reports at a regular pace, the Committee hopes that the Government will continue the efforts made this year so as to submit, in due course, all the reports due, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Togo

The Committee notes with regret that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the third consecutive year. The Committee notes the explanations given by the Government's representative before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) concerning the difficulties encountered in this respect and in particular the lack of qualified staff in the Ministry of Labour. The Government's representative requested the Office's technical assistance to train the officials concerned. The Committee hopes that the Government and the Office will be able to agree without further delay on arrangements for the organization of the training, as indicated by the Office in its letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards. The Committee requests the Government to make every effort to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Turkmenistan

The Committee notes with regret that, for the ninth year in succession, the first reports due since 1999 on the application of the following fundamental Conventions have not been received: Conventions Nos 29, 87, 98, 100, 105 and 111. The Committee is concerned by the lack of information on the application of ratified Conventions since the country became a member of the Organization. On the other hand, the Committee notes that the Government requested assistance in the form of training on international labour standards this year. The two-day workshop, which was organized as a result of this request in April 2007, is the first activity relating to the submission of reports ever organized in the country. It therefore constitutes an important first step. The Committee hopes that the Government will take additional measures, including by requesting further assistance from the Office if it so wishes, so as to comply with its constitutional obligation to provide the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Uganda

The Committee notes that the reports due this year on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received, including the first report on Convention No. 138, due since 2005. The Committee has been informed that, as a result of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Office has been in contact with the Government and that technical assistance should be provided before the end of 2007 to enable the Government to overcome its difficulties in discharging its obligations. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions, in accordance with its constitutional obligation.

Anguilla

The Committee notes that the reports due have not been received for the second consecutive year.

Bermuda

The Committee notes that the reports due this year have not been received.

British Virgin Islands

The Committee notes that the reports due this year have not been received.

Falkland Islands (Malvinas)

The Committee notes that the reports due this year have not been received.

Gibraltar

The Committee notes that the reports due this year have not been received.

Guernsey

The Committee notes that most of the reports due this year have not been received.

Montserrat

The Committee acknowledges the efforts made this year to resume the communication of the reports after two years of interruption. It notes nonetheless that most of the reports due this year have not been received.

St. Helena

The Committee notes with regret that the reports due have not been received for the fourth year in succession.

The Committee has taken due note of the explanations given by the Government's representative before the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007) concerning the submission of reports regarding some of the abovementioned non-metropolitan territories. The difficulties are linked to a question of capacity and the Government is closely and actively working with the local authorities in this respect. The Committee has been informed that the Office is in contact with the Government, in particular, to provide any information it may require that would be of assistance in its ongoing discussions with the non-metropolitan territories. The 4Committee hopes that the steps taken by the Government will yield sustainable solutions so that it will be able to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due.

Uzbekistan

The Committee notes with regret that the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions have not been received for the third consecutive year. As a result of the Office's letter of 20 July 2007 following up on the conclusions of the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (May–June 2007), the Committee notes that a tripartite workshop was held in November 2007 to build the capacity of both Government representatives and social partners. The Committee welcomes this positive development. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps, including by requesting further assistance from the Office if it so wishes, to fulfil its constitutional obligation to supply the reports due on the application of ratified Conventions.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Barbados, Cambodia, Chad, Democratic Republic of the Congo, France: French Guiana, French Southern and Antarctic Territories, Guadeloupe, Martinique, Réunion, St. Pierre and Miquelon, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Guyana, Haiti, Ireland, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Malaysia, Malaysia: Sabah, Sarawak, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Mongolia, Netherlands: Netherlands Antilles, Peru, Russian Federation, Rwanda, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, San Marino, Senegal, Seychelles, Slovenia, Sudan, United Republic of Tanzania: Zanzibar, Zambia.

Freedom of Association, Collective Bargaining, and Industrial Relations

Albania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report as well as of the observations made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania (KSSH) and the Government's reply thereto. It also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning issues already raised by the Committee and the Government's response thereto.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right to strike. 1. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to ensure that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State are able to exercise the right to strike, given the comprehensive prohibition of this right for all workers in the public service. The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that an amendment of the law on civil employees' status is being envisaged so as to provide authorization to stage a strike, subject to a minimum service requirement. The Committee recalls that the establishment of minimum services in the case of strike action should only be possible in: (1) services, the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (essential services in the strict sense of the term); (2) services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term but where the extent and duration of a strike might be such as to result in an acute national crisis endangering the normal living conditions of the population; and (3) in public services of fundamental importance. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made with a view to amending the law on civil employees' status so as to allow public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State to exercise the right to strike and to communicate a copy of the draft amendment as soon as it is adopted.

2. The Committee observes that section 197/7(4) of the Labour Code provides that a sympathy strike shall be lawful if it is staged in support of a lawful strike, which is organized against an employer who is actively supported by the employer of the sympathy strikers. The Committee emphasizes that workers should be able to stage sympathy strikes provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 168). The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or envisaged with a view to amending section 197/7(4) of the Labour Code in line with the above.

3. Finally, noting that the Government's report does not contain the information previously requested with regard to section 197/4 of the Labour Code, the Committee once again requests the Government to clarify the meaning of "extraordinary situation" in which a strike may be suspended and the body responsible for making the relevant determination.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the information contained in the Government's report. The Committee also takes note of the observations made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Albania (KSSH) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) as well as the Government's reply thereto.

1. Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to specify the authority which has the competence to hear complaints of anti-union discrimination and impose relevant sanctions, and to provide statistical information on the number of complaints examined in the last five years, the decisions reached, etc. The Committee notes from the Government's report that currently, sections specializing in industrial relations have been attached to the civil tribunals in order to hear labour disputes. It also notes that according to the KSSH, the arbitration tribunal and the labour court envisaged in the Labour Code of 2003 have still not been set up and this is causing delays in the resolution of disputes by the civil courts where three years are needed to issue a ruling. The Committee further notes that the ITUC refers in its comments to the existence of a high number of anti-union dismissals and transfers, while the Government responds that the tribunals are the only bodies authorized to decide whether such acts took place; moreover, tripartite training activities have taken place in this regard with ILO participation.

The Committee recalls that the basic regulations that exist in the national legislation prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination are inadequate when they are not accompanied by procedures to ensure that effective protection against such acts is guaranteed. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report steps taken to ensure a mechanism of rapid and effective protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, in particular, with a view to the establishment of the arbitration tribunal and the labour court envisaged in the Labour Code of 2003.

2. Articles 4 and 6. Right to collective bargaining of public employees. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify the nature of the functions discharged by civil servants considered to be at the “implementing level” and the institutions other than the ministries to which civil servants are assigned, with a view to specifying whether they are engaged in the administration of the State for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee notes from the Government’s report that the terms and conditions of civil servants in Ministries, the Parliament, the Presidency and town halls, are governed by Act No. 8549 on civil servants’ status. Other public servants such as those working for prefectures, customs, teachers, doctors etc., whose terms and conditions are governed by the Labour Code, are entitled to collective bargaining. The Committee further notes from the Government’s report under Convention No. 151, that collective bargaining takes place in state-owned enterprises.

3. Article 4. Measures to promote collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to section 161 of the Labour Code, a collective agreement can be entered into at the enterprise or branch levels, and requested the Government to indicate whether collective bargaining is possible at the national level. The Committee notes the Government’s statement that it is willing to promote collective bargaining at the national level but to no avail so far; since 1993, only one Memorandum of Understanding has been concluded at the national level between the KSSH, the Independent Trade Union of Miners and the Union of Independent Trade Unions of Albania (BSPSH). The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, national-level negotiations only take place in the tripartite National Labour Council which has not functioned recently. The Committee also notes, however, that according to the Government, the National Labour Council functions again since July 2006. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide in its next report information on any collective agreement concluded at the national level.

Algeria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government’s report. It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 concerning issues already examined by the Committee. Also, the ITUC condemns steps taken to obstruct the registration of trade unions, the arrest of trade unionists and reprisals against strikers ... (in the course of the judicial procedures). In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government indicates, among other things, that no trade unionists have been harassed for the reason of their trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the allegations of arrests and reprisals of teachers-trade unionists, following strike and to transmit copies of the relevant judicial decisions.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right to form organizations. The Committee observes that section 6 of Act No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990, as modified, limits the right to establish a trade union to persons who have been Algerian nationals for at least ten years. The Committee recalls that the right to organize must be guaranteed to workers and employers without distinction or discrimination whatsoever, with the exception of those categories contained in Article 9 of the Convention, and that foreign workers must also be able to establish organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that section 6 of Act No. 90-14 conforms to the principles guaranteed by the Convention.

Articles 2 and 5. Right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization and to establish and join federations and confederations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to keep it informed of measures taken to: (1) amend the legislative provisions preventing workers’ organizations from forming federations and confederations of their own choosing, irrespective of the sector to which they belong (see sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14); and (2) consult the social partners in order to eliminate any difficulties which might arise in practice from the interpretation of certain legislative provisions on the formation of federations and confederations and particularly, in this case, which might hinder the recognition of the Algerian Confederation of Autonomous Trade Unions (CASA). In its reply, the Government states that Act No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990 is inspired by Convention No. 87 and that the labour legislation does not in any way restrict either the freedom to form a trade union organization or its activities. With regard to the aspects relating to the establishment of federations and confederations under section 4 of Act No. 90-14 of 2 June 1990, the Government states that it is aware of the need to clarify the wording of this provision by introducing a definition of the notions of federation (or union) and confederation, and indicates that the section concerned is under examination so that this concern can be dealt with. With regard to the specific case of CASA, the Government states that this organization has been invited to bring its statutes into line with the provisions of the legislation currently in force. The competent authority is currently awaiting a response from CASA founders. Moreover, the Committee observes that, in Case No. 2153 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association (see 336th Report), the Government had specified that the joint application of sections 2 and 4 of Act No. 90-14 signifies that the coming together of two different sectors, as is true in the case of the membership of the National Air Navigation Trade Union in this confederation of public administration sector unions, does not comply with the aforementioned section 2 of the Act. The Committee asks the Government to take concrete steps to amend the legislative provisions preventing workers’ organizations from forming federations and confederations of their own choosing, irrespective of the sector to which they belong. The Committee asks the Government to keep it informed of any measures taken in this respect.

Article 3. Exercise of the right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee also requested the Government to limit the scope of Legislative Decree No. 92-03 of 30 September 1992 (section 1 of which, read together with sections 3, 4 and 5, defines as subversive acts offences directed, in particular, against the stability and normal functioning of institutions through any action intended to: (i) obstruct the operation of establishments providing public services; or (ii) impede traffic or freedom of movement in public places or thoroughfares, under penalty of severe sanctions, including imprisonment for up to 20 years), through the adoption of legislative measures or regulations to ensure that this text may not in any event be applied to workers who have exercised the right to strike peacefully. While noting the Government's comments on the reasons for adopting this Decree, the Committee notes that Ordinance No. 95-11 of 25 Ramadhan 1415 corresponding to 25 February 1995, amending and completing Ordinance No. 66-156 of 8 June 1966 issuing the Penal Code, repeals, in its section 2, the abovementioned Legislative Decree No. 92-03 of 30 September 1992 concerning action taken to combat subversion and terrorism. The Committee notes that section 87bis of the Penal Code amended by the above Ordinance continues to define as subversive any act directed against the stability and normal functioning of institutions through any action intended to: (i) obstruct the operation of establishments providing public services; or (ii) impede traffic or freedom of movement in public places or thoroughfares, under penalty of sanctions including the death penalty, when the sanction provided for by law is life imprisonment. The Committee therefore reiterates its opinion that the very general wording of certain provisions involves a risk of infringing the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes in defence of the interests of their members particularly through strike action. The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the Penal Code (section 87bis) so as to ensure that this text may not in any event be applied to workers who have exercised the right to strike peacefully. The Committee asks the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

The Committee also requested the Government to amend section 43 of Act No. 90-02 of 6 February 1990, which bans strikes not only in essential services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population, but also where the strike is likely to give rise to a serious economic crisis, with collective disputes in such cases being subject to the conciliation and arbitration procedures provided for by the law. The Committee also requested the Government to amend section 48 of the same Act, which authorizes the Minister or the competent authority, where the strike persists or after the failure of mediation, to refer the dispute to the National Arbitration Commission, after consulting the employer and the workers' representatives. The Committee notes the Government's reply, according to which the expression "give rise to a serious economic crisis" set forth in section 43 of the Act is similar to the expression used by the Committee which refers to "strikes which, by reason of their scope and duration, could lead to a national crisis". The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the legislation or adopt a regulatory text that would clarify this point along the lines indicated by the Government. Moreover, with regard to section 48 of the Act, the Government states that intervention is not made in a spirit of interference in the legal exercise of the right to strike, but in a spirit of conciliation of the two parties, and that this intervention only occurs when "required by pressing economic and social needs" and "after consulting the employer and the workers' representatives". The Committee reiterates that referral to arbitration to end a collective dispute is only acceptable if it is at the request of both parties and/or in the event of a strike in essential services in the strict sense of the term, or in the case of a strike the extent and duration of which are likely to give rise to a serious national crisis, or in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee therefore urges the Government to amend its legislation in the manner indicated above so as to guarantee in full the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities and to formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities, in accordance with Article 3, and to keep it informed of any developments in this regard.

Angola

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments sent by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), of 10 August 2006 according to which the Government is the most important employer in the country and as such fixes wages unilaterally through the Ministry of Labour, Public Administrations and Social Security. The Committee notes the Government's indication that social partners take part in the National Council for Social Dialogue, within which a tripartite technical group on minimum wage fixing was created. Moreover, the social partners also participate in the National Council for Social Security, the National Committee for the ILO and the National Committee for Employment and Professional Training, as well as in the discussions concerning the drafting of any new labour legislation.

The Committee also notes the comments sent by the National Union of Angolan Workers-Trade Union Confederation (UNTA-CS) on the application of the Convention.

Referring to its previous comments, the Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to:

- amend sections 20 and 28 of Act No. 20-A/92 on the right of collective bargaining which provide that collective labour disputes in public utility enterprises may be settled by the Ministry of Labour, Public Administration and Social Security after the parties have been heard, taking into account that the list of public utility activities

(section 1.3) is broader than the concept of essential services in the strict sense of the term (those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the National Tripartite Commission for the ILO elaborated drafts modifying Trade Union Act No. 21-C/92, Strike Act No. 23/91 and Collective Bargaining Act of No. 20-A/92 which are before the competent authorities for approval. The Committee recalls once again that, in general, arbitration imposed at the initiative of the authorities is admissible only in essential services or for the purpose of concluding a first collective agreement when the trade union so requests. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the National Assembly will soon approve the new draft legislation which will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed on this subject;

- indicate whether the legislation guarantees the right to collective bargaining of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State and, if so, to indicate the relevant provisions. The Committee also requested the Government to specify which public services are not organized in the form of an enterprise whose employees, according to the terms of section 2 of Act No. 20-A/92, are not covered by the Act. The Committee observes with regret once again that the Government's report contains no indication thereupon and requests the Government to provide it with this information.

Antigua and Barbuda

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee had recalled the need to amend sections 19, 20, 21 and 22 of the Industrial Court Act, 1976, which permit the referral of a dispute to the court by the Minister or at the request of one party with the consequent effect of prohibiting any strike action, under penalty of imprisonment, and which permit injunctions against a legal strike when the national interest is threatened or affected, as well as the overly broad list of essential services in the Labour Code.

On the matter of essential services, the Committee notes the inclusion of the government printing office and the port authority in the list and considers that such services cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term. In this respect, the Committee would draw the Government's attention to paragraph 160 of its General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining wherein it states that, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in other services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which would be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. As concerns the Minister's power to refer disputes in cases of acute national crisis, the Committee notes that the power of the Minister to refer a dispute to the court under sections 19 and 21 of the Industrial Court Act would appear to apply to situations going beyond the notion of an acute national crisis. Under section 19(1), this authority of the Minister appears to be discretionary since, under section 21, this power may be used in the national interest which would appear to be broader than the strict notion of a specific situation of acute national crisis where the restrictions imposed must be for a limited period and only to the extent necessary to meet the requirements of the situation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 152).

In light of the above, the Committee once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the power of the Minister to refer a dispute to binding arbitration resulting in a ban on strike action is restricted to strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term, to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in case of an acute national crisis. It further requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that a binding referral of a collective dispute to the court can only be made at the request of both parties, and not any one of the parties as appears to be the case in section 19(2).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Argentina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also notes the comments by the Central of Argentine Workers (CTA) dated December 2006 and 30 August 2007, those by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 and those of the General Confederation of Labour of Argentina (CGT) dated 4 September 2007, which refer to matters the Committee has already raised. The Committee notes with concern that in its communication of August 2007, transmitted to the Government on 21 September 2007, the CTA refers to computer theft in trade union headquarters and in the offices of the CTA's legal advisor, raids on the home of a CTA official and the CTA headquarters in Buenos Aires, and assaults on demonstrators – as a result of which one worker died and several were injured – in the provinces of Neuquén, Salta, Santa Cruz and the Autonomous City of Buenos Aires. The Committee observes that no observations from the Government have been received on these comments. Therefore, the Committee asks the Government to undertake the necessary investigations to clarify the facts and punish the guilty parties. The Committee further notes the comments of 4 June 2007 by the Federation of the Professional Staff of the Government of the Autonomous City of Buenos Aires. Lastly, it takes note of the Government's reply to the CTA's comments of December 2006.

The Committee also notes the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007, and in particular the Conference Committee's conclusions: (1) urging the Government to reply to the CTA's application for trade union status, and (2) requesting the Government, with all the social partners and the assistance of the ILO, to elaborate draft legislation for the full application of the Convention, taking into account all the comments of the Committee of Experts. The Committee notes the information from the Government that following the conclusions of the Conference Committee, it is implementing various measures for the purpose of seeking alternative solutions with the participation of the various players concerned, that in October 2007 a meeting was held with representatives of workers (CGT and CTA) and the employers and that, in its opinion, the outcome was satisfactory and there will be further meetings to pursue the said objectives.

The CTA's application for trade union status

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the CTA's application for trade union "status" was pending and had been awaiting a decision since 2004. It urged the Government to take a decision on the matter without delay. In its comments, the CTA states that there has not as yet been any decision on its application.

The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that the file is still active and formalities are ongoing without any delays except for the time spent waiting for submissions, which is unavoidable in so complex a case. The Government also indicates that: (a) it has observed every aspect of the principle of freedom of association and complied with the procedure laid down in the legislation – including the participation of the trade union associations entitled to take part in the proceedings, and the complainant expressly accepted this legislation by filing its application for trade union status under Act No. 23551 and its implementing decree; (b) in administrative proceedings in which first-, second- and third-level organizations are involved in an adversarial process, the fact of complying with procedure and ensuring that all concerned have their say necessarily implies a period of time commensurate with the case itself; (c) in the discussions prior to the adoption of Convention No. 87, freedom of opinion and right to defence as part of a whole complex of fundamental standards on human rights was one of the main subjects addressed, and it is not a matter of delaying proceedings but of giving all parties the opportunity to express their views and to put their case on the basis of their legitimate interests; (d) the ILO has accepted the system of representativeness and acknowledges comparison of representativeness as a means of determining trade union status; and (e) the CGT's interests as well as those of the CTA must be taken into account in a complex situation that calls for discussion and indeed implies comparing the representativeness of first-, second- and third-level organizations, and given the number of unions in Argentina with trade union status, this takes time and means examining how matters have evolved. There is no delay on the part of the administration, but a rational use of administrative resources in proceedings in which interests are disputed.

The Committee once again notes with regret that despite the length of time that has elapsed – more than three years – the administrative authority has not come to a decision on the CTA's application for trade union status. In these circumstances, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that a decision is reached without delay, and to keep the Committee informed.

Act on Trade Union Associations and its implementing decree

For many years the Committee has referred in its comments to certain provisions of the Act on Trade Union Associations (No. 23551) of 1988 and the decree regulating it (No. 467/88). The Committee notes the Government's statement that: (1) the provisions of the Act draw on the best principles of social justice, since account was taken of the interpretations in the ILO of the scope of the concept of freedom of association, and the technical assistance from the Office in 1984; and (2) there are currently more than 2,800 first-, second- and third-level trade union organizations in Argentina; and that there is one trade union organization for every 3,500 wage workers, which clearly indicates that freedom of association is not only a right but is widely and fully exercised. The Committee observes that the Government's only response regarding the specific provisions addressed by the Committee is a general repetition of its past observations. Taking account of the last observations of the Government, the Committee is bound to reiterate its comments on the following provisions:

Trade union status

- section 28 of the Act, under which, in order to challenge an association's trade union status, the petitioning association must have a "considerably larger" membership; and section 21 of the implementing Decree No. 467/88, which qualifies the term "considerably larger" by laying down that the association claiming trade union status should have at least 10 per cent more dues-paying members than the organization which currently holds the status. According to the Government, the legislation does not offend against the principles laid down in the Convention, since a registered trade union need only be more representative in order to claim status. The Committee points out that a requirement of a "considerably larger" membership amounting to 10 per cent more members than the union holding most representative status is too high a requirement and is contrary to the Convention. In practice, it stands in the way of trade unions that are merely registered and that wish to claim trade union status;
- section 29 of the Act, under which an enterprise trade union may be granted trade union status only when another first-level organization does not already operate in the geographical area, activity or category concerned; and section 30 of the Act, under which, in order to be eligible for trade union status, unions representing a trade, occupation or category must show that they have different interests from the existing trade union and the latter's status must not cover the workers' concerned.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates, in respect of section 29, that enterprise trade unions exist and function freely. They exercise the rights granted to them by law; as concerns section 30, the Government indicates that this provision had put an end to a flagrant violation of freedom of association, comprised of a “de facto” law prohibiting the presence, in a trade union, of officials and members lacking this status. The Committee nonetheless reiterates that the requirements that unions representing enterprises, trades or categories have to meet in order to obtain trade union status are excessive, and in practice restrict their access to trade union status and give preferential treatment to existing organizations even where unions representing enterprises, trades or categories of workers are more representative, according to section 28.

Benefits which derive from trade union status

- section 38 of the Act, under which check-off of trade union dues is allowed only for associations with trade union status, and not associations that are merely registered. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, most first-level trade union associations are members of federations which have trade union status, so the first-level unions receive the trade union dues of their members through the federation, which receives them from the employer, who deducts them directly. The Government adds that there is nothing to prevent organizations which are merely registered from arranging with the employer to have the dues deducted directly from the workers’ wages. The Committee reminds the Government that for unions that obtain it, “most representative” status should not imply privileges other than priority of representation in collective bargaining, in consultations with the authorities and in the appointment of delegates to international bodies. Consequently, the Committee considers that such discrimination against organizations that are merely registered cannot be justified;
- sections 48 and 52 of the Act give special protection (trade union immunity) only to representatives of organizations that have trade union status. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, all workers or trade unions enjoy the general protection established under section 47 and may commence an action “in amparo” in case of violation of their freedom of association rights guaranteed by law. The law contains no restrictions respecting this matter. The Committee nevertheless considers that sections 48 and 52 provide preferential treatment for representatives of organizations with trade union status in the event of anti-union discrimination, and that this exceeds the privileges that may be granted to the most representative organizations, as noted in the previous paragraph.

The Committee points out that it has been making these comments for many years and that although the Government has received technical assistance from the ILO on several occasions, the necessary measures to make the requested changes have not been taken. The Committee accordingly once again requests the Government to take steps to amend all the provision referred to in order to bring them fully into conformity with the Convention. It trusts that it will be able to note tangible progress in the very near future.

Determination of minimum services

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the CTA had referred to Decree No. 272/2006 regulating section 24 of Act No. 25877 on collective labour disputes, and that specifically, it objected that by virtue of section 2(b) of the Decree, the Guarantees Commission, which establishes minimum services, and which comprises representatives of employers’ and workers’ organizations as well as independent members, may act only in an advisory capacity since the final decision as to essential minimum services lies with the Ministry of Labour when “the parties have come to no agreement” or “when the agreements are inadequate”. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice of the new provision, and more specifically information on the number of instances in which the administrative authority has changed the terms of the Guarantees Commission’s opinion regarding minimum services.

The Committee notes that information sent by the Government on section 2(b) of Decree No. 272/2006 to the effect that: (1) this provision must be analysed in conjunction with the rest of the regulations, since section 10 of the Decree establishes that “if the parties fail to meet the obligations laid down in sections 7, 8 and 9 of this Decree within the time limits prescribed thereby, or if the minimum services agreed by the parties are inadequate, the implementing authority, in consultation with the Guarantees Commission, shall establish the minimum services that are essential to ensure performance of the service, the number of workers to be assigned for their provision, the work schedules and the assignment of functions and equipment, while endeavouring to safeguard both the right to strike and the rights of the users affected”; (2) section 24 of Act No. 25877 empowers the Guarantees Commission to determine as essential only services that are not provided for in the law, and it is inappropriate in legal terms to extend the Commission’s authority by regulation beyond assigning to it supplementary and consultative duties as provided, and (3) the authority ultimately assigned to the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security cannot be described as unilateral and discretionary since section 10 and section 2(b) of the regulatory decree state that the implementing authority shall consult the Guarantees Commission on the establishment of minimum services, and the Ministry’s discretion is expressly limited by a requirement to “safeguard both the right to strike and the rights of the users affected”.

The Committee requests the Government to send information on the cases in which the Guarantees Commission has intervened regarding minimum services and in particular the number of instances in which the administrative authority has changed the terms of the Commission’s opinion.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes the Government’s first report.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction that, following the ratification of the Convention, the legislative provisions contained in the Constitution of the Republic of Armenia of 1995, the Labour Code of 2004, as amended in 2006, the Law on trade unions of 2000 and the Criminal Code of 2003 establish prohibitions and provide for dissuasive sanctions and means of redress in case of acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

Australia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's reports dated 22 December 2006 and 15 January, 13 July, 20 September and 5 October 2007, in reply to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 for a detailed report on the provisions of the Workplace Relations Amendment (Work Choices) Act 2005 (the Work Choices Act), which introduced extensive legislative amendments to the Workplace Relations Act 1996 (the WR Act). The Committee also notes that the Government's report of 22 December 2006 provides a reply to the comments made by the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 17 May 2006, which were noted in the Committee's previous observation. The Committee finally takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2007 with regard to issues already raised by the Committee and the Government's reply thereto dated 18 October 2007.

With regard to the building and construction industry in particular, the Committee notes the comments made by ACTU in a communication dated 9 October 2006, as well as the communication of the Trade Unions International of Workers of the Building, Wood and Building Materials Industries (UITBB) in support of the ACTU submission and the comments made by ITUC in a communication dated 27 August 2007. It further notes the Government's observations in this respect contained in a communication dated 13 July 2007 as well as the communication of 18 April 2007 on the tripartite consultations which have taken place on this subject. The Committee finally notes the ACTU comments dated 14 September 2007 on this subject, as well as the Government's communication of 9 November 2007 indicating that the upcoming elections prevent it from responding to the ACTU comments at this time. It requests the Government to provide its observations at the appropriate time.

The Committee recalls that in June 2006 the Conference Committee had requested the Government to: (i) provide a detailed report to this Committee for examination in 2006 on the impact of the amendments introduced by the Work Choices Act to the WR Act on the Government's obligation to ensure respect for freedom of association both in law and in practice; (ii) engage in full and frank consultations with the representative employers' and workers' organizations with respect to all the matters raised during the debate and to report back to this Committee in this regard. In previous communications, the Government had announced the conclusion of a tripartite agreement between the Government, ACTU and the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (ACCI) on the following process: the Government would provide a report to this Committee focusing on key issues identified by the social partners, i.e. the level and substance of bargaining rights and the right to strike; the ACCI and ACTU would provide separate comments on the Government's report, once submitted to the Committee and copied to them; the report and observations of the Committee would then be used as a basis for further tripartite consultations. However, as explained by the Government in subsequent communications, it was not possible to provide a report to the Committee on time for examination in 2006 due to a range of factors. The Committee further notes that in its report of 5 October 2007, the Government provides a summary record of the consultations held with the social partners on 20 August 2007. The Committee observes from the records that the consultations did not lead to any new element as all sides appear to maintain their respective positions. The Committee requests the Government to continue the consultation process so as to allow sufficient time for the parties to discuss their views in full with a view to eventually reaching commonly acceptable solutions, and to provide information on this issue in its next report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right to strike. The Committee's previous comments concerned numerous discrepancies between the provisions of the WR Act – as amended by the Work Choices Act – and the Convention. In particular, the Committee had raised the need to amend the following provisions of the WR Act with a view to bringing them into conformity with the Convention: provisions which lift the protection of industrial action in support of: multiple business agreements (section 423(1)(b)(i)); "pattern bargaining" (section 439); secondary boycotts and generally sympathy strikes (section 438); negotiations over "prohibited content" (sections 356 and 436 of the WR Act in connection with the Workplace Relations Regulations 2006); strike pay (sections 508 of the WR Act); and provisions which prohibit industrial action in case of danger to the economy (sections 430, 433 and 498 of the WR Act) through the introduction of compulsory arbitration at the initiative of the Minister (sections 500(a) and 504(3) of the WR Act). Finally, the Committee had raised the need to amend section 30J of the Crimes Act 1914, which prohibits industrial action threatening trade or commerce with other countries or among States and section 30K of the Crimes Act 1914, prohibiting boycotts resulting in the obstruction or hindrance of the performance of services by the Australian Government or the transport of goods or persons in international trade.

The Committee notes that the Government provides detailed information on the economic justification of the provisions in question which are the result of successive reforms of the workplace relations framework since 1996. The aim of these reforms has been, according to the Government, to promote more jobs and better pay through improvements in productivity so as to maintain Australia's economic prosperity and strength. The Government states that, as a result, real wages have grown by 21.5 per cent since 1996. The reforms ensured that the primary focus of the workplace relations system is agreement-making at the workplace level, as an increased emphasis on direct bargaining between employers and workers is key to greater productivity. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, accepting the Committee's comments on the need to lift restrictions over industrial action in case of multiple-business agreements (section 423(1)(b)(i)), pattern bargaining (section 439), or secondary boycotts and generally sympathy strikes (section 438) would have the effect of diminishing the focus of the entire system on agreement-making at the workplace level and would in certain respects be unfair to the employer who has reached agreement with its staff but might be subject to industrial action aimed at other employers. Moreover, the provisions on "prohibited content" (sections 356 and 436 of the WR Act in connection with the Workplace Relations Regulations 2006) largely represent, according to the Government, a continuation of the limits that the Australian workplace relations system has always placed on the content of binding industrial instruments, which should be limited to matters pertaining to the relations between employers and employees, to the exclusion of academic, political or social matters. Furthermore, the provisions which lift the protection of industrial action in support of strike pay (section 508 of the WR Act) are reasonable. The provisions prohibiting industrial action in case of danger to the economy (sections 430, 433 and 498 of the WR Act) through the introduction of compulsory arbitration at the initiative of the Minister (sections 500(a) and 504(3) of the WR Act) do not lead to a blanket prohibition of industrial action; since the commencement of the Work Choices Act reforms in March 2006 there have been only eight applications seeking suspension or termination of a bargaining period and the bargaining period was terminated in only three of these instances. Finally, with regard to sections 30J and 30K of the Crimes Act, 1914 (prohibition of industrial action threatening transport, trade and commerce), the Government indicates that the repeal of these sections remains under consideration, but as no action has been taken under the relevant sections of the Crimes Act for over 50 years, any such amendment would be given low legislative priority.

The Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that it is not intending to adopt amendments along the lines of the Committee's previous comments. It also notes the statistical information provided by the Government according to which the proportion of employees who are trade union members has been steadily declining from the August 1986 figure of 45.6 per cent to the August 2006 figure of 20.3 per cent and that only 15.2 per cent of employees in the private sector are trade union members compared to 42.6 per cent in the public sector and expresses its concern as to the effect that the Work Choices Act may have on trade union membership. The Committee once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention on all the points raised above and to continue to provide information on the impact of the Work Choices Act both in law and in practice on the Government's obligation to ensure respect for freedom of association.

Building industry. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking note of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2326 (338th Report, paragraphs 409-457), had raised the need to rectify several discrepancies between the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act 2005, and the Convention.

The Committee notes that in its communication of 9 October 2006, ACTU emphasizes that the BCII Act makes it practically impossible to declare a legal strike, renders virtually all forms of industrial action in the building and industrial sector unlawful and introduces severe financial penalties, injunctions and actions for uncapped damages in case of "unlawful" industrial action (unions are "deemed" legally liable for certain conduct by their members); moreover, it establishes a new enforcement agency known as the Australian Building and Construction Commission (ABCC) which is not sufficiently independent from the Government, has wide-ranging coercive powers akin to an agency charged with investigating criminal matters (capacity to compel a person to attend, produce documents and answer questions under oath without being able to refuse answers which might incriminate the witness and power to publicize "findings" against union members and officials without the guarantees of an impartial judicial procedure; on one occasion, the ABCC denied legal representation to a worker on the basis that his/her legal representative had acted for another person who had also been interrogated over the same industrial matter). According to ACTU, the ABCC has standing to bring legal proceedings in its own right, irrespective of the views of the parties to the industrial relationship, a power it exercised for instance, against 107 workers in the Perth to Mandurah New Metro City Rail construction project in Western Australia; these workers faced fines up to AU$22,000 under the BCII Act plus 6,600 under the WR Act. Moreover, ITUC refers in its communication dated 27 August 2007 to several instances where proceedings were initiated against trade unions and individual workers for their participation in industrial action in the construction industry including a case in which a trade union meeting which ran 15 minutes too long was considered to be unlawful industrial action, and the individual workers faced the prospect of fines up to AU$28,600 each and possible jail sentences while the unions faced penalties of up to AU$220,000. According to ACTU, the ABCC warned trade unions through public statements not to participate in the "National day of community protest" of 15 November 2005, organized by ACTU, by reinforcing the prospect that such action would be deemed unlawful and that workers would face a real threat of prosecution by the ABCC.

The Committee takes note of the Government's position as set out in its communication of 13 July 2007 that: (i) the right to strike is not unqualified and can be subject to restrictions to be developed with regard to national conditions.

These conditions in Australia, as reported by the Royal Commission into the Building and Construction Industry and other independent reports, are that industrial action in the building and construction industry can cause more harm to more people than similar action in other industries and that, over the last 20 years, this industry has been undermined by conflict, lawlessness and inefficiency, which demonstrated an urgent need for structural and cultural reform. (ii) Consequently, the restrictions on industrial action introduced in the BCII Act are reasonable and intentionally broad so as to encompass all conduct that adversely affects the performance of building work, since both employer and employee interests are disadvantaged by strike action. Moreover, penalties are increased so as to ensure a strong deterrent against unlawful industrial action in the industry. (iii) The Government adds that it continues to provide construction employees and their unions with a qualified right to strike. The right to take protected industrial action is restricted to disputes between the parties to the employment relationship and the Government does not intend to enact provisions that would enable parties to take protected action in support of multiple-business agreements; this is, according to the Government, consistent with the Convention; employees can still protest in pursuit of broader industrial, political or economic objectives, like the 15 November 2005 national protest organized by ACTU, if they obtain first the permission of their employer to be absent from work on that day. (iv) The Government also reports that there is a consistent declining trend in trade union membership in the construction industry with only 22 per cent of construction industry employees being trade union members in August 2006. On the contrary, since the entry into force of the BCII Act, wages rose at an above-average rate, output and employment also increased while the number of working days lost to industrial dispute fell to levels consistent with other industries. Notwithstanding the positive indicators of the success of the reforms, the Government considers it necessary to maintain the existing arrangements to address the deeply entrenched culture of disregard for the law. (v) The Government adds that the ABCC is an independent regulatory body aimed to address the culture of lawlessness and intimidation evident in the building and construction industry. For that reason, it is vested with the ability to undertake legal proceedings in its own right, as an independent statutory authority. In the Australian national context, it helps the building industry participants achieve better compliance with their obligations under the Convention. More than 67 per cent of complaints received by the ABCC concern trade unions; of 59 prosecutions brought by the ABCC and concluded by 4 April 2007, 29 involved unions only, 20 involved employers only, six involved both unions and employers, two involved employees only, one involved unions, employers and employees and one involved the Victorian State government. To date, no person has been jailed as a result of any ABCC prosecution, or in relation to the exercise of the ABCC's compliance powers. The Federal Court ruled on 12 October 2006 that the decision to exclude a solicitor was lawful and reasonable in the circumstances of the case. The decision is now subject to further appeal. To date, the ABCC has used its power to publicize non-compliance with the BCII Act and the WR Act by building industry participants only once, after a work stoppage at a building site in Port Melbourne, Victoria, and the decision has not been challenged in any court by the union. With regard to the proceedings initiated by the ABCC to which ACTU refers, the Government indicates that the intervention of the ABCC was motivated by a dispute caused by continued disruptions to building work including "numerous unauthorized meetings, bans on overtime and strikes of more than two hours". Even though the parties reached a settlement on penalties amounting to AU$150,000 to be paid by the Construction, Forestry, Mining, Energy Union (CFMEU), this settlement had to be "accepted" by a judge who decided the allocation of the amount among different branches of the CFMEU and its individual members/leaders; in addition to this penalty, a damages claim by the employer is still pending. (vi) Finally, the Government reports on the consultations with building and construction industry participants which took place on 12 December 2006 in Canberra. The Committee notes from the minutes of these consultations that all parties appeared to maintain their positions.

The Committee notes with regret the Government's statements indicating that there is no intention to amend the BCII Act, as well as the severe penalties imposed on trade unions and individual members for industrial action, including strikes lasting more than two hours, the prosecutions initiated by the ABCC which appear to be targeted on numerous occasions against trade unions and workers, and the declining rate of trade unionism in the industry which, in the Committee's view, may not be unrelated to impediments placed over collective bargaining in the BCII Act. The Committee wishes to emphasize that the exercise of the right to organize presupposes that trade unions have the right to freely organize their activities and formulate their programmes for furthering and defending the interests of workers, without interference from the authorities. The Committee therefore once again urges the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated with a view to: (i) amending sections 36, 37 and 38 of the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Act 2005, which refer to "unlawful industrial action" (implying not simply liability in tort vis-à-vis the employer, but a wider responsibility towards third parties and an outright prohibition of industrial action); (ii) amending sections 39, 40 and 48–50 of the Act so as to eliminate any excessive impediments, penalties and sanctions against industrial action in the building and construction industry; (iii) introducing sufficient safeguards into the Act so as to ensure that the functioning of the Australian Building and Construction (ABC) Commissioner and inspectors does not lead to interference in the internal affairs of trade unions – especially provisions on the possibility of lodging an appeal before the courts against the ABC Commissioner's notices prior to the handing over of documents (sections 52, 53, 55, 56 and 59 of the Act); and (iv) amending section 52(6) of the Act which enables the ABC Commissioner to impose a penalty of six months' imprisonment for failure to comply with a notice to produce documents or give information so as to ensure that penalties are proportional to the gravity of any offence.

The Committee has been informed by the Government of Australia, newly elected on 24 November 2007, that it is committed to making substantial amendments to Australia's Workplace Relations Act and its legislative framework and to addressing issues the Committee has raised with regard to the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Act 2005. The Committee expresses the hope that its comments will prove useful to the Government in its deliberations on legislative revision.

[The Government is asked to report in detail in 2008.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee takes note of the discussion that took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 and June 2007 and notes that, in its conclusions, the Conference Committee requested the Government to pursue full and frank consultations with the representative employers' and workers' organizations regarding the impact of the Workplace Relations Act 1996 (the WR Act) as amended by the Workplace Relations Amendment (Work Choices) Act 2005 (the Work Choices Act), on the rights afforded by the Convention, in particular regarding the promotion of the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining, and to report to this Committee in 2007 in this regard.

The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's reports dated 22 December 2006 and 15 January, 13 July, 20 September and 5 and 18 October 2007, including the Government's observations on the comments made by the Australian Council of Trade Unions (ACTU) in a communication dated 17 May 2006, which were examined in the Committee's previous observation. The Committee also takes note of the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2007 with regard to issues already raised by the Committee and the Government's reply thereto dated 18 October 2007.

On issues concerning the education industry, the Committee takes due note of the Government's communication of 16 November 2006 containing the Government's observations on the comments made by the National Tertiary Education Industry Union (NTEU).

On issues concerning the building and construction industry, the Committee notes the comments made by the ACTU in communications dated 9 October 2006 on the Building and Construction Industry Improvement (BCII) Act as well as the comments made by the Trade Unions International of Workers of the Building, Wood and Building materials Industries (UITBB) in support of the ACTU submission. It further notes the Government's observations in this respect contained in a communication dated 13 July 2007 as well as the communication of 18 April 2007 on the tripartite consultations which have taken place on this subject. The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC in its communication dated 27 August 2007 as well as the Government's reply to certain of these comments. The Committee finally notes the ACTU comments dated 14 September 2007 on this subject as well as the Government's communication of 1 November 2007 indicating that the upcoming elections prevent it from responding to the ACTU comments at this time, and requests the Government to provide its observations at the appropriate time.

A. Federal jurisdiction. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to rectify the possible exclusion from protection against anti-union dismissals (section 659 of the WR Act) of the particular classes of employees covered by section 693 of the WR Act (employees "in relation to whom the operation of the provisions causes or would cause substantial problems because of: (i) their particular conditions of employment; or (ii) the size or nature of the undertaking in which they are employed"). The Committee notes that according to the Government, this section allows the Government to make regulations excluding specific classes of employees in certain limited circumstances; as no regulations have been made under this section, all Australian employees are protected from termination. The Committee notes that section 693 of the WR Act does not preclude future regulations excluding particular classes of employees from protection against anti-union dismissals. Recalling once again that the Convention requires that all workers be protected from anti-union dismissals, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 693 of the WR Act so as to ensure that there is no possibility of introducing exceptions from the right to be protected against anti-union dismissal.

2. The Committee also notes that the new section 643 introduced in the WR Act by the Work Choices Act excludes from protection against harsh, unjust or unreasonable dismissals establishments with less than 100 employees. The Committee notes that according to the ITUC, this means that around two-thirds of private sector workers have lost their right to challenge an unfair dismissal. The Committee also notes that the ITUC refers to dismissals of trade union leaders and members – including migrant workers – because of legitimate trade union activities, such as expressing concerns about health and safety issues at a company meeting, or simply joining a union. Noting that the Government has not provided specific replies to these comments and recalling that no one should be subjected to discrimination or prejudice with regard to employment because of legitimate trade union activities or membership, and that the persons responsible for such acts should be punished, the Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the above comments by the ITUC.

3. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to repeal section 400(6) and amend sections 793 and 400(5) of the WR Act so as to ensure sufficient protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and, in particular, rectify situations where offers of employment conditional on the signing of an Australian Workplace

Agreement—(AWA) (“AWA or nothing”) are considered by the courts as not amounting to duress. The Committee notes that according to the Government, section 400(6) which was recently introduced in the WR Act by the Work Choices Act so as to explicitly provide that offering an “AWA or nothing” does not amount to duress, did nothing more than confirm the position established by the Federal Court in Schanka v. Employment National (Administration) Pty Ltd ([2001] FCA 579); in that case, the Federal Court of Australia held that merely offering employment conditions upon acceptance of an AWA was not duress because an employee remained free to refuse that employment; according to the Government, this situation is not different from an employee declining an offer of employment because the conditions of employment provided for by an award or collective agreement were either inadequate and/or unacceptable to the individual. The Government adds that, on the contrary, it was found in Schanka that an employer that required a transferring employee to enter into an AWA as a condition of engagement in a transmission of business situation applied illegitimate pressure and therefore, the WR Act, as amended by the Work Choices Act, introduced substantial pecuniary penalties for persons applying duress in connection with an AWA in such situations. Moreover, according to the Government, in general, offering an “AWA or nothing” does not amount to discrimination because AWAs are not anti-union and can be negotiated with workers irrespective of whether they are union members. Workers may even appoint a union official as bargaining agent to negotiate an AWA on their behalf.

The Committee once again emphasizes that workers who refuse to negotiate an AWA at the time of recruitment do not appear to enjoy adequate legal protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and that their right to join the organization of their own choosing with the objective of determining their conditions of employment through collective bargaining, does not appear to be fully protected. It therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to repeal section 400(6) of the WR Act and to amend sections 793 and 400(5) of the WR Act so as to ensure that workers are adequately protected against any discrimination at the time of recruitment related to their refusal to sign an AWA.

4. In its previous comments, the Committee had raised the need to amend sections 423 and 431 of the WR Act so as to ensure adequate protection against anti-union discrimination, especially dismissals for industrial action taken in the context of negotiations of multiple business agreements and “pattern bargaining” (i.e. negotiations seeking common wages or conditions of employment for two or more proposed collective agreements with different employers or even different subsidiaries of the same parent company). The Government indicates that pattern bargaining and multiple business agreements would have the effect of diminishing the focus of Australia’s workplace relations system on agreement-making at the workplace level and therefore, the restrictions established in the WR Act with regard to industrial action in pursuance of pattern bargaining or multiple business agreements are reasonable. According to the Government, the jurisprudence has tightly confined the elements of the definition of “pattern bargaining” so that where a person seeks common wages and conditions in two or more proposed collective agreements, the expression “common” has been held to mean “same” or “identical”. The Full Bench of the Australian Industrial Relations Commission (AIRC) in Trinity Garden Aged Care and another v. Australian Nursing Federation ((PR973718), 21 August 2006) held that a range of alternative meanings of “common” such as “frequent” “similar” or “prevalent”, were too broad and would introduce a substantial element of judgement into the application of section 421(1)(b) of the WR Act, which would cause the parties to be unsure of their rights and would “substantially deny employees access to protected industrial action in the real industrial context in which common market circumstances and common bargaining objectives (such as at least maintaining the real value of wages) will naturally result in claims for similar wages and conditions”.

The Committee once again recalls that action related to the negotiation of multiple business agreements and “pattern bargaining” is legitimate trade union activity for which adequate protection should be afforded in the law and that the choice of the bargaining level should normally be made by the parties themselves. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 423 and 431 of the WR Act, so as to ensure that workers are adequately protected against acts of anti-union discrimination, in particular dismissal for negotiating collective agreements at whatever level deemed appropriate by the parties.

5. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to establish a mechanism for the rapid and impartial examination of allegations of acts of interference in the context of the selection of a bargaining partner in the enterprise under section 328(a) of the WR Act, if one did not already exist. The Government indicates that it has not established such a mechanism. It adds that regardless of which union, if any, the employer chooses to make an agreement with, its employees have an ultimate right of veto over that decision because under subsection 340(2) of the WR Act, a collective agreement is approved only if it has the support of a majority of employees to which it will apply. The Committee recalls that section 328(a) of the WR Act gives an employer the widest possible discretion to select a bargaining partner as it enables it to negotiate with organizations which have “at least one member” in the enterprise. It also considers that the possibility to put the outcome of negotiations to a vote does not afford a sufficient safeguard against interference, as the employer has the ability to abandon negotiations altogether if the collective agreement is not approved, thereby excluding any real choice for the workers. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report measures taken or contemplated with a view to setting up safeguards against acts of interference by the employer in the context of the selection of a bargaining partner in the enterprise.

6. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to address various provisions of the WR Act which give preference to individual agreement-making over collective bargaining and in particular, amend section 348(2) of the WR

Act so as to ensure that AWAs may prevail over collective agreements only to the extent that they are more favourable to the workers.

The Committee takes note in this respect of the request made by the Conference Committee for information on the impact of the amendments introduced by the Work Choices Act into the WR Act on the Government's obligation to ensure the promotion of the effective recognition of the right to collective bargaining in law and in practice, as well as the holding of full and frank consultations with the representative employers' and workers' organizations in this regard.

The Committee notes the detailed information contained in the Government's report on the economic justification of the successive reforms of the workplace relations framework introduced since 1996. The aim of these reforms has been, according to the Government, to promote more jobs and better pay through improvements in productivity so as to maintain Australia's economic prosperity and strength. The reforms ensured that the primary focus of the workplace relations system is agreement-making at the workplace level, gave Australian employers and employees greater choice in negotiating working conditions and simplified overly prescriptive awards. The object of the WR Act does not preference one form of agreement-making over another. Rather, the WR Act enables employers and employees to choose the most appropriate form of agreement for their particular circumstances. Indeed, the latest data from the Australian Bureau of Statistics shows that more employees are employed under collective agreements than any other arrangement. In particular, as of May 2006, 41.2 per cent of employees nationally were employed under collective agreements; 19.0 per cent under awards; 34.6 per cent under individual agreements; and 5.1 per cent as working proprietors. Moreover, since the commencement of the 27 March 2006 workplace relations reforms, over 8,300 collective agreements have commenced covering about 735,000 employees. In addition to this, at the federal level, as at 31 August 2007, AWAs regulated the terms and conditions of an estimated 830,000 employees, whereas collective agreements covered some 1,773,600 employees, a fact which clearly demonstrates that collective agreements continue to be the norm in Australia. The Committee also notes that the Government reiterates its position on its obligations under Article 4 of the Convention to the effect that measures for the encouragement and promotion of collective bargaining should be taken only "where necessary" and only where they are "appropriate to national conditions". The Government maintains that the key components of Article 4 are all reflected in Australia's federal workplace relations system in a way which is appropriate to national conditions. Specifically, the WR Act promotes bargaining since this constitutes one of the principal objects of the Act; it provides that bargaining is voluntary so that under the WR Act an employer cannot compel an employee to enter into an agreement; and does not prefer one form of agreement over another in light of the fact that collective bargaining continues to be the norm in Australia. The Committee also notes from the summary record of the consultations held with representatives of the ACTU and the Australian Chamber of Commerce and Industry (ACCI) on 20 August 2007 – communicated by the Government – that the consultations did not lead to any new element as all sides appear to maintain their respective positions.

The Committee notes with deep regret that the Government's report is confined to largely reiterating the position it has already stated on numerous occasions. The Committee further notes with concern that although the statistical information provided by the Government as to the number of employees covered by AWAs and collective agreements as at 31 August 2007 (830,000 and 1,773,600 employees respectively) shows that collective agreements continue to be the norm in Australia, it also shows that the number of employees covered by AWAs has increased exponentially since the introduction of these instruments in 1986 (in 2004, the Government had reported 352,531 AWAs in force in the first seven years since their introduction (1997–2003); see 2004 direct request, 75th Session). Moreover, as will be seen in the next section, one quarter of collective agreements are concluded with non-unionized workers regardless of whether trade unions exist in an enterprise. The Committee considers that these statistics are not unrelated to the legal provisions of the WR Act which promote AWAs over collective agreements negotiated with trade unions, and also correlate with the information noted under Convention No. 87, according to which trade union membership has been halved in the last 20 years. The Committee once again recalls that giving primacy to AWAs, which are individual agreements, over collective agreements, is contrary to Article 4 of the Convention which calls for the encouragement and promotion of voluntary negotiations with a view to the adoption of collective agreements. As noted in the Committee's previous observation, although the expressions "where necessary" and subject to "national conditions" found in Article 4 of the Convention allow for a wide range of different national practices in the implementation of measures for the encouragement and promotion of collective bargaining, they were not intended to authorize in any way the introduction of disincentives, obstacles to and even prohibitions of negotiations (as will be seen further below) amounting to a negation of the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention.

The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements, as called for by Article 4 of the Convention. Considering that full and frank consultations with the social partners could be particularly appropriate in this regard, and while noting that the consultations already held have not led to any outcome, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any further consultations held and the impact they may have in ensuring greater respect for the effective exercise of the right to collective bargaining.

With regard to the specific request of the Committee for an amendment to section 348(2) of the WR Act, so that AWAs prevail over collective agreements only to the extent that they are more favourable to the workers, the Committee notes that according to the comments made by the ITUC, the incentives for employers to prefer AWAs instead of collective agreements have been greatly increased as a result of the Australian Fair Pay and Conditions Standard; AWAs must now include only five minimum conditions (minimum wage, annual leave, sick leave, unpaid parental leave and maximum weekly working hours) rather than being measured against comprehensive industrial awards, meaning that they can substantially undercut employees' previous wages and working conditions. The ITUC also refers to one incident – on which the Government has not provided comments – concerning pressure put on workers to renounce their collective agreement before its expiration and sign individual contracts under which they faced pay cuts and penalties for taking sick leave or career's leave; the incident is under investigation by the Workplace Rights Advocate for the State of Victoria. The Committee also recalls the extensive comments made by the ACTU on this issue, which were summarized in the Committee's previous observation, to the effect that: (i) the previously applicable "no disadvantage test" has been replaced by a "fairness test"; (ii) AWAs can now override collective agreements irrespective of whether they were made before or after the collective agreement; (iii) award conditions can be displaced by inferior AWAs not only for new employees but also for existing employees so that their acquired rights are not protected; (iv) the primacy given to AWAs makes the purported ability of unions to bargain collectively nugatory.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that it is difficult to objectively determine what constitutes an "inferior" AWA compared to a collective agreement, as individual agreements may contain terms and conditions which might appear at first sight to be less beneficial (variations in the payment or type of penalty rates for work undertaken at certain times) but might be accompanied by other terms considered as being superior or more generous by the employee (higher base rate of pay, more flexible working hours at the request of the employee, leave arrangements and the opportunity to receive performance-based pay and incentives) to those contained within a collective agreement. Furthermore, a fairness test has been introduced by the Australian Fair Pay and Conditions Standard to provide a safety net of minimum terms and conditions that all employers must provide, regardless of the industrial instrument applicable to employees. The Act requires the Workplace Authority to apply the fairness test to ensure that workplace agreements provide fair compensation in lieu of protected award conditions such as penalty rates; it is not the intention of the Government to have protected award conditions traded off without proper compensation.

The Committee once again recalls that employers and workers bound by a collective agreement should be able to include in contracts of employment stipulations which depart from the provisions of the collective agreement only if these stipulations are more favourable to the workers. The Committee observes that the "fairness test" presumes a comparison between two instruments of the same nature; however, AWAs are not collectively negotiated and therefore should not be subject to an evaluation of the whole instrument and all of its specific parts as if they were part of a negotiated trade-off. AWAs should rather be re-adjusted to the provisions of the collective agreement, where one is in force, so as to allow those specific conditions that are more favourable in the collectively negotiated instrument to prevail. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 348(2) of the WR Act so as to ensure that AWAs may prevail over collective agreements only to the extent that they are more favourable to the workers. It further requests the Government to provide information/observations on the incident under investigation by the Workplace Rights Advocate of the State of Victoria mentioned by the ITUC in its comments.

7. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to ensure that "employee collective agreements" do not undermine workers' organizations and their ability to conclude collective agreements, and that negotiations with non-unionized workers take place only where there is no representative trade union in the enterprise (sections 326–327 of the WR Act). The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC to which the Government has not responded, according to which, the WR Act does not require employers to negotiate with unions at all, even when all the employees are union members and wish to be represented in bargaining by their union. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this regard.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, in a context of declining trade union density, the WR Act balances the right of employees to be represented by a trade union and an employer's right to pursue their preferred form of industrial instrument. Since the implementation of the reforms in March 2006, 64 per cent of employees covered by new federal workplace agreements were covered by collective agreements (as at the end of August 2007); 49 per cent of employees were covered by agreements negotiated with unions and 15 per cent by agreements negotiated by employers directly with their employees; in other words, over three-quarters (76 per cent) of employees covered by collective agreements, made following the workplace relations reforms, are covered by union collective agreements.

The Committee once again recalls that Article 4 of the Convention refers to voluntary negotiations between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations. It therefore once again requests the Government to take measures to ensure that employee collective agreements do not undermine workers' organizations and their ability to conclude collective agreements, and to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated with a view to ensuring that negotiations with non-unionized workers take place only where there is no representative trade union in the enterprise.

8. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to repeal or amend sections 151(1)(h), 152, 331(1)(a)(ii) and 332(3) of the WR Act so as to ensure that multiple business agreements are not subject to a requirement of prior authorization at the discretion of the employment advocate and that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority. The Government indicates that from the commencement of the workplace relations reforms in March 2006 to July 2007, there were 22 applications for authorization to make a multiple business agreement. Of these, six were approved, two were approved in principle (subject to amendments reflecting the provisions of the Fair Pay and Conditions Standard and the removal of prohibited content), five have been abandoned, and four were being assessed. Five applications were refused. Furthermore, with regard to “pattern bargaining” (which might lead to a form of multi-employer business agreement), the Government indicates that this form of bargaining is prohibited if there are no genuine attempts to negotiate an agreement which takes into account the individual circumstances of the employer in determining wages and conditions of employment.

The Committee once again recalls that the level of collective bargaining should be decided by the parties themselves and not be imposed by law and that legislative provisions which make the entry into force of a collective agreement subject to prior approval by the administrative authority at its discretion, is incompatible with the Convention and a violation of the principle of the autonomy of the parties. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend sections 151(1)(h), 152, 331(1)(a)(ii) and 332(3) of the WR Act, so as to ensure that multiple business agreements are not subject to the requirement of prior authorization at the discretion of the employment advocate and that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority. The Committee also requests the Government to keep it informed of any regulations adopted in relation to this matter.

9. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend the Workplace Relations Regulations 2006 so as to ensure that any “prohibited content” of collective agreements is in conformity with the principle of the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining and to consider in this context, tripartite discussions for the preparation of collective bargaining guidelines. The Government indicates that the provisions on “prohibited content” are based on the fact that some content is not germane to the employment relationship and therefore inappropriate to be included in workplace agreements; such restrictions are a continuation of the limits that the Australian workplace relations system has always placed on the content of binding industrial instruments.

The Committee recalls that the issues listed in the Workplace Relations Regulations 2006 as constituting “prohibited content” (e.g. provisions which require a person to encourage trade union membership or indicating support for such membership; or requiring or permitting payment of a bargaining services fee; payroll deduction systems for union dues; leave to attend training provided by a trade union; paid leave to attend union meetings; process for renegotiating the agreement on its expiry; right of entry to the premises for union officials; union representation rights in disputes procedures, unless specifically requested by the employee; restrictions on the use of contractors and labour hire; forgoing of annual leave other than in accordance with the Act; encouragement or discouragement of trade union membership; allowing of industrial action; remedies for unfair dismissal; direct or indirect restrictions on AWAs); represent to a large extent the type of matters that have traditionally been subjects for collective bargaining. As a general rule, negotiation over such matters should be left to the discretion of the parties. Measures taken unilaterally by the authorities to restrict the scope of negotiable issues are often incompatible with the Convention and the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining. In the event of doubt as to the matters falling within the purview of collective bargaining, tripartite discussions for the preparation on a voluntary basis, of guidelines for collective bargaining could be a particularly appropriate method for resolving such difficulties. The Committee once again requests the Government to consider tripartite discussions for the preparation of collective bargaining guidelines and to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to amend the Workplace Relations Regulations 2006, and to ensure that any “prohibited content” of collective agreements is in conformity with the principle of the free and voluntary nature of collective bargaining enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention.

10. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the need to amend section 330 of the WR Act so as to ensure that the choice of bargaining agent, even in new businesses, may be made by the workers themselves and that they will not be prohibited from negotiating their terms and conditions of employment in the first year of their service for the employer even if an “employer greenfields agreement” has been registered (enabling the employer to unilaterally determine the terms and conditions of employment in a new business including any new activity by a government authority, or a body in which a government has a controlling interest or which has been established by law for a public purpose as well as a new project which is of the same nature as the employer’s existing business activities). The Government indicates that “employer greenfields agreements” aim at allowing the employer to unilaterally establish a set of terms and conditions of employment that will operate in new projects or enterprises for a maximum of 12 months, during which time, negotiations can take place for subsequent workplace agreements. Even if the employer determines the terms and conditions unilaterally, the “agreement” should comply with the Australian Fair Pay and Conditions Standard and is subject to a fairness test. Moreover, the Government indicates that the definition of “new business” recently introduced in the WR Act by the Work Choices Act, did not aim at expanding the definition of new business where greenfields agreements may be made, but rather clarifying a situation of legal uncertainty as to what constitutes a new business, due to various decisions taken on this subject by the AIRC. As for the concern expressed by the ACTU that employees may be moved to AWAs during the life of greenfields agreements, the Government highlights the substantial protections contained in the WR Act against an employer applying duress to employees to make them enter into an AWA.

The Committee once again observes that the provisions on employer greenfields agreements in combination with the total exclusion of any attempts at good-faith bargaining, the much enlarged definition of new business to further include the very broad concept of “new activity”, and the greater primacy accorded to AWAs, would appear to seriously hinder the possibility of workers in such circumstances to negotiate their terms and conditions of employment. It therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 323 and 330 of the WR Act so as to ensure that the choice of bargaining agent, even in new businesses, may be made by the workers themselves and that they will not be prohibited from negotiating their terms and conditions of employment in the first year of their service for the employer even if an employer greenfields agreement has been registered.

B. Building industry. In its previous comments, the Committee, taking note of the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2326 (338th Report, paragraphs 409–457), had raised the need to rectify several discrepancies between the BCII Act and the Convention.

The Committee notes the comments made by the ACTU according to which the BCII Act is framed so as to operate in conjunction with the uniquely harsh measures introduced under the WR Act by the Work Choices Act. In particular, in addition to restrictions introduced in parallel with the WR Act, section 64 of the BCII Act also prohibits project agreements which have been a common feature of the building industry and are particularly suited to its nature as an efficient means of ensuring that all employees on a building site, who may be employed by a large number of small subcontractors, are covered by one agreement setting standard wages and conditions. The ACTU finally indicates that the BCII Act purports to grant the capacity to the Minister for Workplace Relations to regulate industrial affairs in the building and construction industry by Ministerial Decree through a device referred to as a building code which escapes parliamentary scrutiny. In fact, the code which has been applicable in the industry since 1999 is inconsistent with the Convention on several points as noted by the Committee in its previous comments. This system is now combined with an accreditation scheme (foreseen in Chapter 4 of the BCII Act) for contractors who wish to enter into Commonwealth contracts so as to ensure that they apply the code.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the focus of the BCII Act is on bargaining at the enterprise or workplace level. Thus, it is not appropriate to have project agreements negotiated between head contractors and unions that impose common arrangements on any subcontractor working on the project, as the employer and employees who will be covered by a workplace agreement have the right to determine the content of their working arrangements themselves. Subcontractors providing at least 90 per cent of all labour in the building and construction industry should not be denied the possibility to determine themselves whether particular terms and conditions should apply. According to the data provided by the Government, 84 per cent of employees covered by federal collective agreements in the construction industry have been employed under union negotiated collective agreements. Since the Work Choices amendments, 68 per cent of construction employees covered by new federal collective agreements were employed under union negotiated collective agreements. The remaining 32 per cent were employed under the other agreement-making options available under the WR Act such as employee collective agreements or employer greenfields agreements. Finally, the Government indicates with regard to the absence of parliamentary scrutiny over the provisions of the National Code of Practice for the Construction Industry, that the Code can be challenged before the Federal Court and any sanctions imposed under the Code are subject to judicial review or an internal administrative review, or a complaint to the Commonwealth Ombudsperson.

Noting with regret that the Government reiterates the same position in respect of the issues raised under both the WR Act and the BCII Act with regard to collective bargaining, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to bring the BCII Act into conformity with the Convention with regard to the following points: (i) the revision of section 64 of the Act so as to ensure that the determination of the bargaining level is left to the discretion of the parties and is not imposed by law or by decision of the administrative authority; (ii) the promotion of collective bargaining, especially by ensuring that there are no financial penalties or incentives linked to undue restrictions of collective bargaining (sections 27 and 28 of the Act authorize the Minister to deny Commonwealth funding to contractors bound by a collective agreement that, although lawful, does not meet the requirements of the building code; the latter: (i) excludes a wide range of matters from the scope of collective bargaining; and (ii) contains financial incentives to ensure that AWAs may override collective agreements).

C. Higher education sector. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the need to amend section 33-5 of the Higher Education Support Act 2003, and the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements (HEWRRs) which raise obstacles to collective bargaining similar to those raised by the WR Act and the BCII Act, by: (1) providing economic incentives to ensure that collective agreements contain exceptions in favour of AWAs; and (2) allowing for negotiations with non-unionized workers even where representative trade unions exist in the unit.

The Committee notes the Government’s reply to the comments made by the NTEU, which were summarized in the Committee’s previous observation. With regard to the relationship between collective agreements and AWAs, the Committee notes that the Government reiterates its position on its obligations under Article 4 of the Convention. As to the example of impediments to collective bargaining provided by the NTEU, the Government describes it as an isolated incident which bears no relevance to the HEWRRs.

Noting with regret that the Government reiterates once again its position on questions of collective bargaining, the Committee can only request the Government once again to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 33-5 of the Higher Education Support Act 2003, and the HEWRRs which raise obstacles to collective bargaining similar to those raised by the WR Act and the BCII Act, by: (1) providing economic incentives to ensure that collective agreements contain exceptions in favour of AWAs; and (2) allowing for negotiations with non-unionized workers even where representative trade unions exist in the unit.

The Committee has been informed by the Government of Australia, newly elected on 24 November 2007, that it is committed to making substantial amendments to Australia's workplace relations legislative framework and to addressing issues the Committee has raised with regard to the Building and Construction Industry Improvement Act 2005. The Committee expresses the hope that its comments will prove useful to the Government in its deliberations on legislative revision.

A request on another point is being addressed directly to the Government.

[The Government is asked to report in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the Government's observations on the comments made by the National Tertiary Education Industry Union (NTEU).

1. Comments concerning the eviction from trade union premises. The Committee notes that according to the NTEU, the Higher Education Support Act in combination with the Higher Education Workplace Relations Requirements (HEWRRS) gives universities financial incentives to evict NTEU branches from their university accommodation. The Committee notes from the Government's reply, that it has not encouraged the eviction of union representatives but that universities are not permitted to use federal government funding to subsidize the operations of unions; nevertheless, universities may make office space available at market rates and this is a matter for the university to decide, in accordance with its efficient operation. The Committee recalls that according to Article 2 of the Convention, such facilities in the undertaking shall be afforded to workers' representatives as may be appropriate in order to enable them to carry out their functions promptly and efficiently, account being taken of the characteristics of the industrial relations system of the country and the needs, size and capabilities of the undertaking concerned. Although the Convention does not enumerate specific facilities, the Committee understands that the NTEU had been enjoying the use of premises in various universities. Taking into account the consequences of the eviction of the NTEU from such premises, the Committee invites the Government to engage in dialogue with the organization concerned so as to find a commonly accepted solution and to ensure in any case, including by revising the HEWRRS if necessary, that no obstacles are raised to the respect of collective agreement clauses which provide for the use of premises by trade unions.

2. Comments concerning negotiations with non-unionized workers' representatives. The Committee examines the question of negotiations with non-unionized workers' representatives in its observation under Convention No. 98.

The Committee will examine the other questions raised in previous comments (2004 direct request, 75th Session) in 2009, in the framework of the regular reporting cycle.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1950)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it has been referring to the need to amend section 53(1) of Industrial Relations Act No. 22/1974 (IRA) to allow foreign workers to be eligible for election to works councils.

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the amendment to section 53(1) of the IRA was published in Federal Legislative Gazette I No. 4/2006 so as to amend section 53(1) of the IRA and extend the right to stand for election to works councils to all employees irrespective of their nationality. The Committee further notes that the amendment also extended the right to stand for election to general meetings of the Chamber of Labour to all employees irrespective of their nationality (section 20(1), Chamber of Labour Act). The amendment took effect on 14 January 2006.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007, reiterating the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) alleging: (1) the ban on strikes in the public transport sector; (2) the legislative restriction on all types of political activities by trade unions; and (3) difficulties in forming trade unions in multinational enterprises.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that according to section 281 of the Labour Code, strikes are prohibited in the railway and air transport sectors. In this connection, the Committee notes that section 233 of the Criminal Code penalizes strikes in public transport with penalties of up to three years of imprisonment. The Committee recalls that restrictions or prohibitions on the right to strike should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term, i.e. those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee considers that public transport, including air and railway transport, are not essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee considers, however, that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 160). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 281 of the Labour Code and section 233 of the Criminal Code so as to ensure that workers of public transport, including those employed in air and railway transport, can exercise the right to strike, and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee recalls that for many years, it had been requesting the Government to amend section 6(1) of the Act on Trade Unions of 1994, so as to eliminate the absolute prohibition of all types of political activity by trade unions. The Committee regrets that no measures have been taken in this respect. The Committee believes that the development of the trade union movement and the increasing recognition of its role as a social partner in its own right mean that workers' organizations must be able to voice their opinions on political issues in the broad sense of the term and, in particular, to express their views publicly on a government's economic and social policy (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 131). It therefore once again requests the Government to amend section 6(1) of the Act on Trade Unions so as to strike a balance between, on the one hand, the legitimate interests of organizations to express their point of view on issues of economic and social policy affecting their members and workers in general and, on the other hand, the separation of political activities in the strict sense of the term from trade union activities. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Finally, with regard to the exercise of the right to organize in multinational enterprises, the Committee notes that the Government confirms the existence of this problem. According to the Government, only in a few such enterprises have workers been able to establish a trade union. The Government further indicates that all attempts by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Azerbaijan (CTUA) to establish social partnership with multinational companies, where labour rights are often violated bore no results. Establishment by the CTUA of a trade union organization at these companies became impossible. The Committee recalls that it is the responsibility of the Government to ensure the application of international labour Conventions concerning freedom of association. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that multinational enterprises operating on its territory respect freedom of association norms and principles. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government's report.

The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007, referring to the issues it had raised last year. In particular, the ITUC alleges that despite the law, an effective system of collective bargaining between unions and enterprise managements has not yet been established: employers often delay negotiations, unions rarely participate in determining wage levels and are often bypassed in the conclusion of bilateral agreements between the Government and multinational enterprises. The ITUC further alleges cases of anti-union discrimination and interference which take place in multinational enterprises. The Committee notes that the Government recognizes that multinational enterprises operating in the country often violate labour and trade union rights and that the conclusion of collective labour agreements or industrial collective accords with such enterprises is not widespread. The Committee recalls that it is the responsibility of the Government to ensure the application of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that multinational enterprises operating on its territory respect freedom of association norms and principles. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken in this respect. It further requests the Government to provide its observations on the remaining issues raised by the ITUC.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the legislation made a distinction between a "collective agreement", concluded at the enterprise level following bipartite negotiations between workers and employers, and a "collective accord", concluded at industry, territorial or national levels following tripartite negotiations between trade unions of appropriate level, the National Confederation of Entrepreneurs' (employers') Organization and the authorities. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that it considers that the participation of the state bodies in the conclusion of collective accords corresponds to the principle of tripartism. In that respect, the Committee recalls that while tripartism is particularly appropriate for the regulation of questions of a larger scope (drafting of legislation, formulating labour policies), the principle of tripartism should not replace the principle of autonomy of workers' organizations and employers (or their organizations) in collective bargaining on conditions of employment. The Committee also recalls that, according to Article 4 of the Convention, free and voluntary bargaining with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment should be conducted between workers' organizations and an employer or employers' organizations and therefore, requests the Government to take measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee reminds the Government that ILO technical assistance remains at its disposal on the abovementioned issues.

Bahamas

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and of the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), on 28 August 2007, concerning issues already raised and the administrative authority's refusal to allow casino workers to form a union.

Article 2 of the Convention. (a) Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee recalls that in its previous direct request it noted that the Labour Relations Act does not apply to the prison service (section 3) and requested the Government to guarantee these workers the right to organize. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it is currently reviewing the provisions of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) with a view to address the right of prison staff to organize. The Committee expresses the hope that the IRA will be amended in the near future so as to formally and expressly recognize the right to organize to prison staff and asks the Government to provide a copy of the amended text as soon as it has been adopted.

(b) Right of workers and employers to establish organizations without previous authorization. In its previous direct request, the Committee noted that, according to section 8(1)(e) of the IRA, the Registrar shall refuse to register a trade union if he considers, after applying the rules for the registration of trade unions, that the union should not be registered. The rules for registration are provided in Schedule I. According to section 1 of the Schedule, in applying the rules of the registration of trade unions, the Registrar shall exercise his discretion. The Committee notes the Government's statement that this provision is intended to ensure that there is no confusion or ambiguity regarding the rights of workers to certain information (finances and related matters) and that trade unions do not adopt names that are similar in nature and thereby confusing to the bargaining unit. As already stated, it is the Committee's view that provisions which confer on the competent authority a genuinely discretionary power to grant or reject a registration request, or to grant or withhold the approval required for the establishment and functioning of an organization, are tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization which is not compatible with Article 2 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 74). The Committee therefore asks the Government once again to take the necessary measures to ensure that no discretionary power is conferred to the Registrar to refuse the registration of trade unions or employers' organizations and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives freely. The Committee noted, in its previous direct request, that section 20(2) of the IRA, according to which the secret ballot for election or removal of trade union officers and for amendment of the constitution of trade unions should be taken under the supervision of the Registrar or a designated officer, was contrary to the principles of freedom of association. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that it concurs with the Committee's view regarding this section and that recommendation for its amendment is in the process of being submitted to Cabinet for consideration. The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken to amend section 20(2) of the IRA so as to ensure that trade unions could conduct a ballot without interference from the authorities. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

Other issues. Noting that the Government did not communicate its observations concerning other issues raised in the previous direct request, the Committee reiterates its previous comments:

Article 3. (a) Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw their constitutions and rules and to elect their representatives freely. The Committee notes that the constitution of every trade union should provide that executive committees and officers of trade unions should be elected at intervals not exceeding three years (section 9(4)(1) of Schedule I). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this section implies that trade union officers cannot be re-elected for a consecutive term.

The Committee notes that, according to section 9(4)(3) of Schedule I, the constitution of a trade union should include a provision to the effect that every officer must be a person who is legally entitled to be employed in the Bahamas in the industry, or as a member of the craft or category of employees, which the union represents. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the meaning of this provision and, in particular, to indicate whether only nationals of the Bahamas could be elected to the posts of trade union officers.

(b) Right to strike. 1. The Committee notes section 20(3) requiring a strike ballot to be taken under supervision by an officer of the Ministry. If this section is not complied with, a strike is unlawful. The Committee considers that, with a view to ensuring freedom from any influence or pressure by the authorities, which might affect the exercise of the right to strike in practice, the legislation should not provide for supervision of a ballot by the authorities. The Committee requests the Government to amend section 20(3) accordingly to the above principle and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

2. The Committee notes that, under the terms of section 73, the Minister shall refer the dispute to the Tribunal if the parties to the dispute, within non-essential services, failed to reach a settlement. It is unlawful to recourse to strike action once the dispute is referred to the Tribunal (section 77(1)). Furthermore, according to section 76(1), a strike which, in the opinion of the Minister, affects or threatens the public interest, might be referred to the Tribunal for settlement. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted, even banned, i.e. in the case of a dispute in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in the event of an acute national emergency, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely those services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

3. The Committee notes that section 75 restricts the objective of a strike. It appears to the Committee that protest and sympathy strikes are illegal under the terms of section 75. In the view of the Committee, organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living. Furthermore, the Committee considers that a general prohibition on sympathy strikes could lead to abuse and that workers should be able to take such action, provided the initial strike they are supporting is itself lawful (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 165 and 168). The Committee requests the Government to ensure the right of workers' organizations to recourse to this type of strikes and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

4. The Committee notes that, when a strike is organized or continued in violation of the abovementioned provisions, excessive sanctions, including imprisonment for up to two years are provided (sections 74(3), 75(3), 76(2)(b) and 77(2)). The Committee recalls that all penalties in respect of illegitimate actions linked to strikes should be proportionate to the offence or fault committed and the authorities should not have recourse to measures of imprisonment for the mere fact of organizing or participating in a peaceful strike. Therefore, the Committee requests the Government to amend the Labour Relations Act so as to bring it into conformity with freedom of association principles on this point.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. 1. The Committee notes section 4 of Schedule I concerning the registration of federations, etc. The Committee asks the Government to explain how this provision is applied in practice.

2. The Committee notes section 39 concerning control of foreign connections of unions and federations. Under the terms of this section, it shall not be lawful for a trade union to be a member of any body constituted or organized outside the Bahamas without a licence from the Minister, who has discretionary power to grant or refuse it and/or to accompany it with certain conditions. The Committee recalls that Article 5 of the Convention stipulates that first-level organizations, as well as federations and confederations, have the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and employers. Legislation which restricts the right of international affiliation by requiring prior authorization by the public authorities, or by permitting it only in certain conditions established by law, poses serious difficulties with regard to the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Finally, with reference to its previous direct request, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the situation with regard to the draft Trade Union and Labour Relations Act and the draft Industrial Tribunal and Trade Disputes Act.

The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the issues raised above in its next report.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report which replies to some of the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

Prison guards. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that measures to allow for the organization of prison guards are currently under consideration and that it is envisaged to review the relevant provision. The Committee hopes that, as the Government stated that amendments to the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) were under review, the future legislation will recognize prison guards' right to organize and to collective bargaining. The Committee asks the Government to keep it informed in this regard.

Fire brigade workers. The Committee further notes the Government's view that, as far as the fire brigade is concerned, it is not desirable that its members be allowed to organize in view of the fact that it consists exclusively of police officers, i.e. members of a disciplined force, who double as trained firefighters. The Committee requests the Government to clarify whether they are police agents which also have functions of firefighters or whether they are exclusively firefighters covered by police status.

Other questions. The Committee regrets to note that the Government has not replied to the questions raised in its previous comments concerning Article 2 of the Convention (acts of interference). The Committee had requested the Government to adopt legislative provisions to protect workers' and employers' organizations against acts of interference by each other or each other's agents, accompanied by effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions. In a previous comment, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that provisions strengthening this protection were contained in the Trade Unions and Industrial Relations Bill, 2000, a copy of which would be sent to the ILO after its adoption by the Legislative Assembly. The Committee hopes that the future legislation will guarantee an adequate protection against acts of interference and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Representativeness for collective bargaining. The Committee also takes note of the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the ITUC criticizing the requirement for a trade union to represent 50 per cent of the workers plus one in a unit in order to be recognized for bargaining purposes and the fact that an employer may, after 12 months of unsuccessful negotiations, apply for a union's recognition to be revoked (with some employers deliberately dragging out negotiations for that purpose). The ITUC adds that the Government has failed to honour industrial agreements. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the ITUC's observations.

The Committee requests the Government to address, in its next report, all the points mentioned and hopes that it will be soon in a position to note significant improvements in the legislation.

Bangladesh

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in 2006. It also takes note of the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006, which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969, and on which it comments further below.

The Committee also notes the comments sent by the ITUC in a communication dated 27 August 2007 with regard to legislative issues already raised by the Committee and serious allegations of civil rights violations committed in 2006: (i) the killing of a striker by the police on 23 May 2006 in the context of a strike in the garment sector at Gazipur, which led to a riot on the same day, in particular in the Savar EPZ and the districts of Uttara, Mirpur, Kafrul, Old Dhaka, and Tejgaon; according to the ITUC, the riot was followed by a harsh crackdown by the army's rapid action battalion with hundreds of workers arrested; (ii) the raiding of the offices of the Bangladesh Independent Garment Workers' Union Federation (BIGUF) on the same day (23 May 2006), the arrest of two BIGUF union organizers (Rashedul Alom Faju and Rebecca Khatun) and an office staff person (Minara) and their physical abuse while in police custody; their subsequent charging with destruction of property, vandalism and other charges connected to the labour unrest of that day; (iii) the arrest on the same day (23 May 2006) of Moshrefa Mishu, President of the Garment Workers' Union Forum and her detention for five days (allowed bail on 26 May) and the filing of 19 charges against her in connection with the same events; (iv) the arrest on 13 October 2006 of Chandon, International Secretary of BIGUF and his interrogation throughout the night about BIGUF's activities to organize workers in the EPZs; (v) police harassment against the American Center for International Labor Solidarity, set up by AFL-CIO, after publishing a pamphlet for EPZ workers; (vi) the arrest of three top leaders of the Bangladesh Cha Sramik Union (BCSU) on 24 March 2006 on charges which had already been investigated and found groundless the year before (released on bail on 13 April 2006) and brutal dispersion by the police of the BCSU members gathered outside the police station; (vii) assault against and serious injury of Roy Ramesh Chandra, General Secretary of the Bangladesh National Council of Textile, Garment and Leather Workers and an executive committee member of ITGLWF-TWARO on 14 April 2006; (viii) shots fired on 10 May 2006 against Mohammed Firoz Mia, President of the Bangladesh Telejogajog Sramik Karmochari Union which represents workers at the Bangladesh Telephone and Telegraph Board, who was actively campaigning against privatization. Recalling that freedom of association can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of workers' organizations and that detention of trade unionists for reasons connected with their activities in defence of the interests of workers constitutes a serious interference with civil liberties in general and with trade union rights in particular, the Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations on the very serious comments made by the ITUC.

With regard to additional civil liberties violations communicated by the ICFTU in previous communications, including harassment of unions by the intelligence authorities, police violence against protesting workers, arrest of trade unionists, as well as the difficulty in establishing trade unions in the ship recycling industry, the Committee notes the Government's observations according to which trade unions have not been harassed by the law enforcement agencies but rather the law enforcement agencies were obliged to perform their duties in cases where trade union leaders leading a procession, rally or demonstration were not in control of the mob so that unruly people would start to rampage, damage property, barricade highways, etc.; moreover, although workers in any sector have the right to establish trade unions under the new Labour Law of 2006, workers in the shipbreaking sector are casual workers and do not get an opportunity to form unions, because of the limited period of their employment (connected to the breaking of a specific ship). The Committee recalls that Article 8 of the Convention provides that workers and their organizations, like other persons or organized collectivities, shall respect the law of the land and that the law of the land shall not be such as to impair, nor shall it be so applied so as to impair, the guarantees provided for in this Convention. In this regard, the Committee wishes to emphasize that the authorities should resort to the use of force only in situations where law and order is seriously threatened. The intervention of the forces of order should be in due proportion to the danger to law and order that the authorities are attempting to control and governments should take measures to ensure that the competent authorities receive adequate instructions so as to eliminate the danger entailed by the use of excessive violence when controlling demonstrations which might result in a disturbance of the peace. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that, by virtue of Article 2 of the Convention, workers without distinction whatsoever, including casual and informal sector workers in the shipbreaking industry, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken, including instructions given to the law enforcement authorities, so as to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations, and ensure that arrests are made only where criminal acts have been committed.

With regard to its previous comments concerning the arrest of 350 women trade unionists including the General Secretary of the JSL Women's Committee, the Committee notes from the Government's report that in 2004, in order to maintain law and order, the law enforcement agencies had to detain a few women from a mob while they were on a rampage, damaging a number of factories, barricading a highway, etc.; specific charges had been brought against them immediately after the incident as per the law of the land. The case (No. 7 of 2004) is still pending and a copy of judicial decisions may be communicated to the Committee as and when pronounced. The Committee requests the Government to communicate details as to the charges brought in 2004 against 350 women trade unionists, including the General Secretary of the JSL's Women's Committee, Shamsur Nahar Bhuiyan and to provide a copy of all judicial decisions taken in this matter. Moreover, noting with regret that the Government does not provide any information on the registration of Immaculate (Pvt.) Ltd Sramik Union despite previous requests to this effect, the Committee once again requests the Government to report on the measures taken to ensure the prompt registration of the union.

The Committee further recalls that its previous comments concerned the following issues:

1. Right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs). The Committee recalls that the EPZ Workers' Associations and Industrial Relations Act, 2004, contains numerous and significant restrictions and delays in relation to the right to organize in EPZs and in particular: (i) contained a blanket denial of the right to organize in EPZs until 31 October 2006 after which workers' associations may be established (section 13(1)); the Committee notes that this deadline has been met and takes note of the latest communication of the ITUC, according to which, on 1 November 2006, workers had the right to apply to form workers' associations but the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) failed to devise and provide the prescribed form needed by the workers to this effect, thus preventing in practice the establishment of such associations; (ii) provides that workers' associations will not be allowed in industrial units established after the commencement of the Act, until a period of three months has expired after the commencement of commercial production in the concerned unit (section 24); (iii) provides that there can be no more than one workers' association per industrial unit (section 25(1)); (iv) establishes excessive and complicated minimum membership and referendum requirements for the establishment of workers' associations (a workers' association may be formed only when a minimum of 30 per cent of the eligible workers of an industrial unit seek its formation, and this has been verified by the executive chairperson of BEPZA, who shall then conduct a referendum on the basis of which the workers shall acquire the legitimate right to form an association under the Act, only if more than 50 per cent of the eligible workers cast their vote, and more than 50 per cent of the votes cast are in favour of the formation of the workers' association sections 14, 15, 17 and 20); (v) confers excessive powers of approval of the constitution drafting committee to the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA (section 17(2)); (vi) prevents steps for the establishment of a workers' association in the workplace for a period of one year after a first attempt failed to gather sufficient support in a referendum (section 16); (vii) permits the deregistration of a workers' association at the request of 30 per cent of the workers even if they are not members of the association and prevents the establishment of another trade union for one year after the previous trade union was deregistered (section 35); (viii) provides for the cancellation of the registration of a workers' association on grounds which do not appear to justify the severity of this sanction (such as contravention of any of the provisions of the association's constitution) (section 36(1)(c), (e)–(h) and 42(1)(a)); (ix) establishes a total prohibition of industrial action in EPZs until 31 October 2008 (section 88(1) and (2)); (x) prevents workers' associations from obtaining or receiving any fund from any outside source without the prior approval of the Executive Chairperson of the BEPZA (section 18(2)); (xi) provides for severe restrictions of strike action, once recognized (possibility to prohibit a strike if it continues for more than 15 days or even before this deadline, if the strike is considered as causing serious harm to productivity in the EPZ – section 54(3) and (4)); (xii) establishes an excessively high minimum number of trade unions to establish a higher level organization (more than 50 per cent of the workers' associations in an EPZ – section 32(1)); (xiii) prohibits a federation from affiliating in any manner with federations in other EPZs and beyond EPZs (section 32(3)); and (xiv) does not seem to afford guarantees against interference with the right of workers to elect their representatives in full freedom (e.g., the procedure of election shall be determined by the BEPZA, etc. – sections 5(6) and (7), 28(1), 29, 32(4)). Noting that the Government's report does not provide any new information in respect of the above, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the EPZ Workers' Associations and Industrial Relations Act so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to provide detailed information in its next report in this respect. It also requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments made by the ICFTU concerning obstacles to the establishment of workers' associations in EPZs after 1 November 2006 and to provide statistical information on the number of workers' associations established in the EPZs after that date.

2. Other discrepancies between national legislation and the Convention. The Committee recalls that for many years it had been referring to serious discrepancies between the national legislation and the Convention. It now notes the adoption of the Bangladesh Labour Act, 2006 (the Labour Act) which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance, 1969 (section 353(1)(x)).

The Committee notes with deep regret that the new Act does not contain any improvements in relation to the previous legislation and in certain regards contains even further restrictions which run against the provisions of the Convention. Thus, the Committee notes the following:

- the need to repeal provisions on the exclusion of managerial and administrative employees from the right to establish workers' organizations (section 2 XLIX and LXV of the Labour Act) as well as new restrictions of the right to organize of fire-fighting staff, telex operators, fax operators and cipher assistants (exclusion from the provisions of the Act based on section 175 of the Labour Act);
- the need to either amend section 1(4) of the Labour Act or adopt new legislation so as to ensure that the workers in the following sectors, which have been excluded from the scope of application of the Act including its provisions on freedom of association, have the right to organize: offices of or under the Government (except workers in the Railway Department, Posts, Telegraph and Telephone Departments, Roads and Highways Department, Public Works Department and Public Health Engineering Department and the Bangladesh Government Press); the security printing press; establishments for the treatment or care of the sick, infirm, aged, destitute, mentally disabled, orphans, abandoned children, widows or deserted women, which are not run for profit or gains; shops or stalls in public exhibitions which deal in retail trade; shops in any public fair for religious or charitable purposes; educational, training and research institutions; agricultural farms with less than ten workers; domestic servants; and establishments run by the owner with the aid of members of the family; in case any of the above sectors are already covered by existing legislation, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect;
- the need to repeal provisions which restrict membership in trade unions and participation in trade union elections to those workers who are currently employed in an establishment or group of establishments, including seamen currently engaged in merchant shipping (section 2 LXV and 175, 185(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal or amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of a worker or trade union, an act aimed at “intimidating” any person to become, continue to be or cease to be a trade union member or officer, or “inducing” any person to cease to be a member or officer of a trade union by conferring or offering to confer any advantage and the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(2)(a) and (b) and 291 of the Labour Act); the Committee considers that the terms “intimidating” or “inducing” are too general and do not sufficiently safeguard against interference in internal trade union affairs, since, for instance, a common activity of trade unions is to recruit members by offering advantages, including with regard to other trade unions;
- the need to repeal provisions which prevent workers from running for trade union office if they were previously convicted for compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to agree to any demand by using intimidation, pressure, threats, etc. (sections 196(2)(d) and 180(1)(a) of the Labour Act);
- the need to lower the minimum membership requirement of 30 per cent of the total number of workers employed in an establishment or group of establishments for initial and continued union registration as well as the possibility of deregistration if the membership falls below this number (sections 179(2) and 190(f) of the Labour Act); the need to repeal provisions which provide that no more than three trade unions shall be registered in any establishment or group of establishments (section 179(5) of the Labour Act) and that only one trade union of seamen shall be registered (section 185(3) of the Labour Act); finally, the need to repeal provisions prohibiting workers from joining more than one trade union and the consequent penalty of imprisonment in case of violation of this prohibition (sections 193 and 300 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions denying the right of unregistered unions to collect funds (section 192 of the Labour Act) upon penalty of imprisonment (section 299 of the Labour Act);

- the need to lift several restrictions on the right to strike: requirement for three-quarters of the members of a workers' organization to consent to a strike (sections 211(1) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes which last more than 30 days (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); possibility of prohibiting strikes at any time if a strike is considered prejudicial to the national interest (sections 211(3) and 227(c) of the Labour Act) or involves a public utility service including the generation, production, manufacture, or supply of gas and oil to the public, as well as railways, airways, road and river transport, ports, and banking (sections 211(4) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); prohibition of strikes for a period of three years from the date of commencement of production in a new establishment, or an establishment owned by foreigners or established in collaboration with foreigners (sections 211(8) and 227(c) of the Labour Act); penalties of imprisonment for participation in – or instigation to take part in unlawful industrial action or go-slow (sections 196(2)(e) and 291, 294–296 of the Labour Act);
- the need to repeal provisions which provide that no person refusing to take part in an illegal strike shall be subject to expulsion or any other disciplinary measure by the trade union, so as to leave this matter to be determined in accordance with trade union rules (section 229 of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend new provisions which define as an unfair labour practice on the part of workers, an act of compelling or attempting to compel the employer to sign a memorandum of settlement or to accept or agree to any demand by using “intimidation”, “pressure”, “threat” so as to ensure that there is no interference with the right of trade unions to engage in activities like collective bargaining or strikes, and to repeal the consequent penalty of imprisonment for such acts (sections 196(d) and 291(2) of the Labour Act);
- the need to amend provisions which impose a penalty of imprisonment for failure to appear before the conciliator in the framework of settlement of industrial disputes (section 301 of the Labour Act).

The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to bring the Labour Act, 2006 into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee also notes that it is not clear from the provisions of the Labour Act whether Rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules, 1977 (IRO) which previously granted the Registrar of Trade Unions overly broad authority to enter trade union offices, inspect documents, etc., without judicial review, has been repealed. It would appear from section 353(2)(a) that the rule remains in force, as the section in question provides that any rule under any provision of the repealed laws (including the IRO) shall have effect until altered, amended, rescinded or repealed, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions of the Labour Act, 2006. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether Rule 10 of the Industrial Relations Rules, 1977 has been repealed by the entry into force of the Labour Act, 2006 and, if not, to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to its repeal or amendment.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in 2006.

The Committee further notes the entry into force of the Labour Act 2006, which replaced the Industrial Relations Ordinance 1969 (IRO). It also notes with regret however, that the new law does not appear to contain any significant improvement in relation to the Committee's previous comments.

1. Article 1 of the Convention. Protection of workers in export processing zones (EPZs) against anti-union discrimination. In its previous comments, the Committee, recalling the request by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 for full information on the situation of workers in EPZs who, for more than 20 years, have not enjoyed the rights set out in the Convention, requested the Government to take all necessary measures to eliminate the obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights in law and in practice in EPZs and to provide statistics on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination and of collective agreements concluded in EPZs. The Committee notes from the Government's report that nowadays the people of Bangladesh enjoy the highest freedom to form associations and engage in collective bargaining as the new Labour Act of 2006 enables workers without distinction whatsoever, to form trade unions and therefore, to raise industrial disputes and to go to the court for redress of termination for trade union activities (sections 182 and 176); moreover, through the EPZ Workers' Association and Industrial Relations Act 2004, the Government is taking all measures to keep a sound industrial situation in EPZs.

The Committee notes the latest comments received from the ITUC, in a communication dated 27 August 2007, with regard to serious violations of Article 1 of the Convention in EPZs in practice, in particular in the garment and textile industries. The ITUC refers to numerous instances of anti-union discrimination against workers who attempted to establish workers' associations in the EPZs since 1 November 2006 when the establishment of such associations was authorized on the basis of the EPZ Worker Association and Industrial Relations Act of 2004; in particular, the ITUC refers to dismissals and suspensions of Worker Representation and Welfare Committee (WRWC) leaders, as well as systematic harassment, intimidation and violence against such leaders and members by employers with total impunity. According to the ITUC, the Bangladesh Export Processing Zones Authority (BEPZA) has failed to protect trade unionists, thus significantly undermining the extension of associational rights to workers in EPZs. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the latest observations of the ITUC dated 27 August 2007. Noting moreover that the Government has not provided the previously requested data, the Committee requests the Government to furnish statistical information on the number of anti-union discrimination complaints submitted to the competent authorities since November 2006 when workers' associations were authorized in the EPZs, and the outcome of such complaints, as well as the number of collective agreements concluded in EPZ enterprises and their coverage.

2. Article 2. Lack of legislative protection against acts of interference. The Committee has been raising for a number of years the need to amend the law so as to ensure sufficient protection against acts of interference. The Committee notes from the Government's report that acts of interference envisaged in Article 2 of the Convention are rare in Bangladesh and workers' organizations have every right to complain in this regard. Acts of interference constitute an unfair labour practice and a punishable offence under sections 195 and 196 of the Labour Act, 2006. The Committee notes that section 195 of the Labour Act 2006, which replaced the IRO, introduces certain improvements in relation to the previous legislation in that it does not explicitly authorize an employer to require that a person appointed to managerial posts cease to be a member or officer of a trade union and introduces as an unfair labour practice, any transfer of the president, general secretary, organizing secretary or treasurer of any registered trade union without their consent. However, this provision still does not contain a prohibition of acts of interference designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or their organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means, with the object of placing them under the control of employers or their organizations. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to adopt a specific prohibition, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference in the establishment and functioning of workers' organizations by employers and vice versa.

3. Article 4. Legal requirements to collective bargaining. The Committee observes that section 202 of the Labour Act 2006, contains a slight amendment in relation to the previous section 22 of the IRO to the effect that if there is only one trade union in an establishment, that trade union shall be deemed to be the collective bargaining agent for the establishment without explicitly requiring any longer that the trade union in question represent at least one-third of the workers in the establishment. The Committee also notes, however, that the Labour Act maintains the old section 7(2) of the IRO (now section 179(2) of the Labour Act to which the Government refers in its report) to the effect that a trade union may only obtain registration if it represents 30 per cent of the workers in an establishment. Moreover, section 202(15) of the Labour Act reiterates the old provision of section 22(15) IRO to the effect that if there is more than one trade union in an enterprise, no trade union shall be declared to be the collective bargaining agent unless it obtains the votes of at least one-third of the employees in a secret ballot. Noting once again that the percentage requirements set for registration of a trade union and for the recognition of a collective bargaining agent (sections 179(2) and 202(15) of the Labour Act 2006) may impair the development of free and voluntary collective bargaining, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated so as to lower these requirements.

4. Tripartite wages commissions in the public sector. The Committee recalls from its previous comments that it has requested the Government to take the necessary legislative or other measures to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment in the public sector by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions (section 3 of Act No. X of 1974). The Committee notes from the ICFTU's comments that, being deprived of the right to organize, workers in the public sector and state enterprises with the exception of railway, postal and telecommunication services cannot exercise the right to collective bargaining through trade unions (an issue also raised in relation to the right to organize under Convention No. 87). The Committee notes from the Government's report that tripartite commissions in which all the social partners, including representatives of workers, participate, were established to ensure uniform wages in the state-owned enterprises. The Committee once again recalls that Article 4 of the Convention relates to free and voluntary negotiations between employers or their organizations and workers' organizations with a view to the regulation of wage rates and other conditions of employment by means of collective agreements, including with regard to public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. It therefore once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated to end the practice of determining wage rates and other conditions of employment of public servants not engaged in the administration of the State by means of government-appointed tripartite wages commissions, so as to favour free and voluntary negotiations between workers' organizations and employers or their organizations, who should be able to appoint freely their negotiating representatives.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. The Committee recalls that for many years it has advised the Government to amend section 4 of the Better Security Act, 1920, according to which any person who wilfully broke a contract of service or hiring, knowing that this could endanger real or personal property, is liable to a fine or up to three months' imprisonment, so as to eliminate the possibility of invoking it in a case of future strikes. Once again, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to make every effort to take the necessary action in order to amend the Act in the very near future and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government once again to provide information on developments in the process of reviewing legislation regarding trade union recognition which began in 1998. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 28 August 2007 which mainly refer to issues concerning the application of Convention No. 98.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous comments and to recall that Article 1 of the Convention guarantees workers adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, in taking up employment and throughout the course of employment, including at the time of termination and covers all measures of anti-union discrimination (dismissals, demotions, transfers and other prejudicial acts). The Committee considers, moreover, that legislation prohibiting acts of discrimination is inadequate if not coupled with effective, expeditious procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions to ensure their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 223–224). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that its legislation provides adequate protection against all acts of anti-union discrimination as well as adequate and dissuasive sanctions.

The Committee also takes note of the set of comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which refers to recognition of trade unions and anti-union discrimination. The Committee notes that the Government in its reply only refers to a case concerning the hotel industry and requests the Government to reply to the whole set of ITUC's comments.

Belarus

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report, the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in its review of the measures taken by the Government to implement the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry (345th Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 298th Session) and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007. The Committee also takes note of the reports of the missions carried out in Belarus in January 2007 (to participate in a seminar for judges and court prosecutors' officers) and June 2007 (in response to the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007). The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice. Finally, the Committee notes from the Government's report that consultations relating to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry were held in Geneva in February and May 2007 between the Government's representatives and the Office.

The Committee recalls that all of its outstanding comments have raised issues directly relating to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted that Presidential Decree No. 605 on certain issues of state registration of public associations and their unions (confederations) of 6 October 2006, abolished the Republican Registration Commission. It further noted that responsibility for registration now lies with the Ministry of Justice, departments of justice of the regional executive councils and the Minsk City Executive Committee, and requested the Government to keep it informed of the manner in which registration is carried out by these authorities, as well as of any practical obstacles noted in relation to the right of workers to form and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee regrets that no information was provided by the Government in this respect, except for an indication that in 2006–07, four out of six trade unions affiliated to the Radio and Electronic Workers' Union (REWU), which submitted applications for registration, were registered. The Committee understands that two organizations remain unregistered. Furthermore, the Committee notes from the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association contained in its 345th Report, that no progress had been made in respect of the Commission's recommendations to register the primary-level organizations that were the subject of the complaint. The Committee further notes that the non-registration of primary trade organizations has led to the denial of registration of three regional organizations of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) (organizations in Mogilev, Baranovichi and Novopolotsk-Polotsk). The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all necessary measures for the immediate re-registration of these organizations both at the primary and the regional level so that these workers may exercise their right to form and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. It once again further requests the Government to keep it informed of the process of registration before such bodies and to provide information on the number of organizations registered and those denied registration.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that in order to improve legislation and practice with regard to the establishment and registration of trade unions, a draft trade union law has been prepared with the participation of the social partners and the assistance of the ILO. With the adoption of that law, Presidential Decree No. 2 of 1999 will cease to have effect. The Committee takes note of the draft law on trade unions in its May 2007 version and wishes to raise the following points.

The Committee notes that the draft provides for a simplified procedure for the establishment of trade unions at the enterprise level for unions without legal personality, which would simply be placed in the register (recorded), as opposed to those with legal personality, which must be registered. However, the practical distinction in Belarus between trade unions with and those without legal personality is not sufficiently clear to the Committee. The Committee must once again recall that, when legislation makes the acquisition of legal personality a prerequisite for the existence and functioning of organizations, the conditions for acquiring legal personality must not be such that they amount to a de facto requirement for previous authorization to establish an organization, which would be tantamount to calling into question the application of Article 2 (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 76). The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide full details on the envisaged distinction between unions with legal personality and those without, as well as on the impact that this distinction would have upon the functioning of trade unions.

The Committee further notes that the draft proposes to maintain the 10 per cent membership requirement to be registered at the enterprise level (section 15 of the draft law). Recalling that for a number of years it has been requesting the Government to amend this minimum membership requirement, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to lower this requirement, which it considers too high, particularly in large enterprises.

The Committee also notes that the legal address requirement is maintained for all those enterprise-level trade unions wishing to register, as well as for all higher-level trade unions. Those trade unions at the enterprise level not seeking legal personality would need to provide a contact address. The Committee notes that the draft does not provide for a clear definition of "contact address" and "legal address". In this respect, the Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry had noted that the requirement of legal address has created obstacles to trade union registration due, among other reasons, to the absence of clear rules on what may be an appropriate location for an organization's legal address if the location with a qualified legal address is not provided by the employer. In light of the frequency with which requests for registration at all levels had been denied on the basis of an unacceptable legal address, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that any new legislation allows registration of all workers' organizations requesting registration on the basis of simplified requirements concerning the provision of a valid address, regardless of the level.

In addition, the Committee notes that the draft law maintains a strong link between representativeness and the rights of trade unions, which had been previously criticized by the Committee, as well as by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee considers that the extent of such privileges to representative unions could unduly influence the choice of organization by workers and compromise the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 98 and 104). The Committee further considers that the granting of such extensive privileges to representative unions combined with the uncertainty around the status that may be obtained by unions without legal personality could give rise to undue influence on the choice made by workers of the organization they wish to join. The Committee refers to the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association contained in paragraph 93 of its 345th Report, where the latter recalled that on several occasions, it had advised the Government against introducing changes to the trade union legislation in respect of representativeness. It considered that before establishing the notion of representativeness, the Government should ensure an atmosphere in which trade union organizations, whether within or outside the traditional structure, are able to flourish in the country. The Committee, like the Committee on Freedom of Association, urges the Government to abandon this approach and to ensure that the new law on trade unions will fully and truly ensure freedom of association and the rights of all workers to form and join organizations of their choosing.

The Committee notes that the registration (recording) procedure provided for in Chapter 3 of the draft law appears to be excessively detailed. The Committee considers that while member States remain free to provide such formalities on their legislation as appears appropriate to ensure the normal functioning of occupational organizations, the registration formalities should not impair the guarantees laid down by the Convention in practice (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 74). The Committee recalls that the Commission of Inquiry considered that the main problem encountered by trade unions during the registration process was the application of the legislation by the registering authorities in practice. The Committee considers that with an overly regulated registration procedure, there is a risk that the registration authorities could easily find a pretext for not registering a union. In particular, pursuant to section 21 of the draft law, the state registration may be postponed in the case of "shortcomings in the preparation of documents", which may be broadly interpreted by the registration authorities. The Committee recalls that problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when competent administrative authorities make excessive use of their discretionary powers and are encouraged to do so by the vagueness of the relevant legislation (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 75). The Committee therefore requests the Government to ensure that registration formalities are not such as to give rise, in practice, to impediments to the guarantees laid down in the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it had carried out consultations on the proposed draft with the social partners under the auspices of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social and Labour Spheres (Council of Experts). All interested parties, including the representatives of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) and the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU), had an opportunity to express their views on the new Law. An ILO mission, which visited Belarus in June 2007, took part in a meeting of the Council of Experts. The Government states that during the examination of the draft law on trade unions, the ILO representatives expressed the view that it would not be helpful at the present stage to introduce amendments to legislation which are not supported by all the parties involved in social dialogue. The Government adds that it was emphasized, in particular, that the text of the Trade Unions Act, as drawn up by the Government, raises a number of important and difficult questions (for example, the representativeness of trade unions), which will inevitably require time for further examination. In this regard, the ILO mission proposed that the Government consider the possibility of an alternative approach: not adopting the new law for the time being but focusing on the key issue, namely, registration of trade unions. The results of the ILO mission in Minsk were subsequently discussed by the Government. In the light of the mission's recommendations, the decision has been taken to continue with efforts to improve trade union legislation with a view to achieving consensus between the parties. The Committee notes, however, from the mission report, the serious concerns raised by the mission in respect of: (i) the issue of registration, (ii) the difference between trade unions with legal personality and those without, and (iii) the issue of representativeness. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the future draft law on trade unions will be further developed in full consultation with all the trade unions concerned and that the final law will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to transmit a copy of the draft trade union law as soon as it has been finalized so that it may assess its conformity with the Convention.

Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee notes that according to section 41(3) of the draft law on trade unions, officials of the relevant registration authorities and local executive and management are entitled to request and obtain information on questions relating to the statutory activities of trade unions and to examine their documents and decisions. It is not clear to the Committee whether the control over trade union activity could be conducted at any time at the discretion of the competent authorities. In this respect, it considers that supervision should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should not infringe upon the principles of freedom of association). Similarly, there is no violation of Convention No. 87 if such verification is limited to exceptional cases, for example, in order to investigate a complaint, or if there have been allegations of corruption. Both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should always be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording the necessary guarantees of impartiality and objectivity. Problems of compatibility with the Convention arise when the law gives the authorities powers of control, which go beyond the principles set forth in the previous paragraph, for example, if the administrative authority has the power to examine the books and other documents of an organization or conduct an investigation and demand information at any time (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 125 and 126). The Committee requests the Government to ensure that the draft law is in conformity with the above principle.

The Committee notes with regret that no information has been provided in respect of the steps taken to amend the Law on Mass Activities and sections 388, 390, 392 and 399 of the Labour Code, and to ensure that National Bank employees may have recourse to industrial action, without penalty. The Committee must therefore once again recall that it has been asking the Government to amend these provisions for several years now. Considering that the abovementioned legislative provisions are not in conformity with the right of workers to organize their activities and programmes free from interference by the public authorities, the Committee reiterates its previous requests and asks the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken in this respect.

Articles 3, 5 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee regrets that no information has been supplied by the Government in respect of the measures taken to amend section 388 of the Labour Code, which prohibits strikers from receiving financial assistance from foreign persons, and Decree No. 24 concerning the use of foreign gratuitous aid, so that workers' and employers' organizations may effectively organize their administration and activities and benefit from assistance from international organizations of workers and employers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Decree No. 24 does not prohibit receiving foreign aid, including from international trade unions, but only provides for conditions of its use and for the procedure of its registration. The Government reiterates that the provision in the Decree for dissolution of a trade union in case of violation has never been used; thus there is no basis for amending the existing procedure of receiving foreign aid. The Committee must recall that it does not consider that the fact that the dissolution provision has not been used can lead to the conclusion that trade union activities have not been hindered, as the mere existence of this prohibition and its legal consequences are sufficient to hinder trade unions from using financial assistance in this manner. The Committee must therefore reiterate that restrictions on the use of foreign aid for legitimate trade union activities is contrary to the right of national workers' and employers' organizations to receive financial assistance from international workers' and employers' organizations in pursuit of these aims and once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend both Decree No. 24 and section 388 of the Labour Code so that workers' organizations are not prohibited to use such aid to support industrial action or any other legitimate activity.

The Committee considers that the current situation in Belarus remains far from ensuring full respect for freedom of association and the application of the provisions of the Convention. Noting the indications made by the Government in its report that it would continue with its efforts to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry and would actively involve the social partners and seek cooperation with the Office in that process, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps for the full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry without delay and will ensure that any new legislation in the field of trade union rights is in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

It further expresses the firm hope that any acts of interference by the public authorities in the internal activities of trade unions will be publicly condemned.

The Committee requests the Government to respond to the comments made by the ITUC dated 3 October 2007.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 97th Session.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report, the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in its review of the measures taken by the Government to implement the recommendations made by the Commission of Inquiry (345th Report, approved by the Governing Body at its 298th Session) and the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007. The Committee also takes note of the report of the mission carried out in Belarus in June 2007, in response to the requests made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on the application of the Convention in law and in practice. Finally, the Committee notes from the Government's report that consultations relating to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry were held in Geneva in February and May 2007 between the Government's representatives and the Office.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to review and redress all complaints of anti-union discrimination that had been raised in the complaint filed under article 26 of the ILO Constitution or had come to light in the examination of the follow-up given by the Government to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. It further urged the Government rapidly to adopt new, improved mechanisms and procedures to ensure effective protection against all types of anti-union discrimination and to indicate the progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that Mr Dolbik, whose contract had not been renewed following his contacts with the Commission of Inquiry, was hired in his position of air traffic controller by the "Belaeronovigatsia" and that a three-year contract was concluded with him. The Committee nevertheless regrets that no information was provided in respect of the other persons and therefore once again reiterates its previous request to redress their situations and to provide information as to their current contractual status.

The Committee notes that the Government once again indicates that the current legal framework provides for adequate measures to protect citizens from acts of anti-union discrimination. The Government once again refers to the tripartite General Agreement for 2006–08 wherein it was recommended that collective agreements include provisions setting out additional guarantees for workers elected to trade union bodies. The Government further indicates that the draft Law on trade unions maintains the rights of trade union members established in the current Law on trade unions. In addition, the new Law would include a provision establishing disciplinary, administrative, criminal and other liability for violations of the rights of trade unions and their associations.

The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in Social/Labour Spheres (Council of Experts), which includes the representatives of the Federation of Trade Unions of Belarus (FPB) and the Congress of Democratic Trade Unions (CDTU), was assigned a role of an independent body, having the confidence of the parties concerned, to consider complaints of interference in trade union affairs, as well as the cases of workers who believe they have been subjected to anti-union discrimination (without duplicating the work of existing judicial procedures or of the prosecution services and other state supervisory bodies). The Government indicates that, at a meeting held on 25 January 2007, the Council examined a complaint brought by the Belarusian Independent Trade Union (BITU) on the situation at the "Grodno Azot" and the "Belshina" enterprises and adopted unanimous conclusions. As a result, on 2 February 2007, the dispute concerning the accession of the BITU primary organization to the collective agreement at "Grodno Azot" was settled.

While noting this information, the Committee recalls that, in its previous observation, it noted the case of the Belarusian Free Trade Union (BFTU) in which enterprise management received warnings following violations of the BFTU's rights, and requested the Government to confirm whether, following the warning, the BFTU officials have actually been allowed access to the premises of the enterprise concerned. The Committee regrets that the Government provides no information in this respect. The Committee further notes with regret from the 345th Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association new allegations of interference in trade union internal affairs, anti-union pressure and anti-union discrimination at the Mogilev Plant of Artificial Fiber ("Mogilev ZIV") and "Avtopark No. 1". In respect of the latter enterprise, the Committee notes with concern that, according to the allegations, the Prosecutor's Office refused to investigate a complaint alleging the use of anti-union tactics by the management and that, instead of conducting proper inquiries into the matter, the Prosecutor applied to the Ministry of Justice for an opinion as to whether it was legal for workers of “Avtopark No. 1” to belong to the Radio and Electronic Workers’ Union (REWU). The Committee requests the Government to ensure an independent investigation into the alleged instances of interference and anti-union discrimination at the “Mogilev ZIV” and “Avtopark No. 1” and to ensure that the rights of any workers who suffered anti-union discrimination in these enterprises are fully redressed. It also asks the Government to provide previously requested information with regard to the BFTU and the outcome of the discussion at the level of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in Social/Labour Spheres of the case concerning the “Belshina” enterprise.

Finally, the Committee notes with interest that, upon an invitation of the Government, a high-level Office mission went to Minsk to attend a seminar entitled “The issues of trade unions’ protection in the activity of Belarusian courts and prosecutor’s authorities of the Republic of Belarus” during which the conclusions and recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry were disseminated and discussed. The Committee further notes the Government’s statement that, in January 2007, the National Council for Social and Labour Issues (NCSLI) discussed the issue of collaboration between employers and unions at the enterprise level and drew the attention of representatives of employers’ and workers’ organizations to the importance of strict observance of the principle of social partnership and to the inadmissibility of interference by employers in the internal affairs of trade unions. While noting the Government’s information on the measures taken to implement the relevant recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry (seminar for judges and prosecutors, the use of the Council for the Improvement of Legislation in the Social/Labour Spheres to review complaints concerning specific enterprises and the discussion at the level of the NCSLI), in view of the recent allegations submitted to the Committee on Freedom of Association, as examined in its 345th Report, the Committee considers that the measures taken so far by the Government are insufficient. The Committee also regrets that the Government has not been able to provide any statistics relating to the cases of complaint of anti-union discrimination and the decisions rendered. In these circumstances, the Committee once again urges the Government to pursue vigorously, on the one hand, the instructions to be given to enterprises in a more systematic and accelerated manner so as to ensure that enterprise managers do not interfere in the internal affairs of trade unions and, on the other, instructions to the Prosecutor-General, Minister of Justice and court administrators that all complaints of interference and anti-union discrimination are thoroughly investigated.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes the detailed information contained in the Government’s report. It also notes the Government’s reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), on 10 August 2006 concerning dismissals of trade unionists following strikes and the adoption of a circular by the Minister of the Interior and the resulting orders with a view to limiting recourse to strike pickets. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government’s comments according to which the Labour Court has ordered the reinstatement of a trade union delegate. Moreover, according to the Government, a strike in the automobile sector was characterized by intimidation and violence. The Committee recalls that no one should be subjected to discrimination with regard to employment because of legitimate trade union activities. Moreover, the action of pickets organized in accordance with the law should not be subject to interference by the public authorities. However, the Committee has considered legitimate a legal provision that prohibited pickets from disturbing public order and threatening workers who continued to work. The Committee also notes the observations by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 28 August 2007 relating to the same issues as the ICFTU’s communication.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments have for many years concerned the need to take measures for the adoption of objective, pre-established and detailed legislative criteria determining rules for the access of the occupational organizations of workers and employers to the National Labour Council, and that in this respect, the Organic Act of 29 May 1952 establishing the National Labour Council still contains no specific criteria on representativeness, but leaves broad discretionary power to the Government. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that no amendment has been made to the relevant legislation with regard to the criteria for the representativeness of the most representative organizations of employers and workers which have access to the various levels of social dialogue. This situation of socio-political consensus is based, according to the Government, on the de facto situation of the massive and undeniable representativeness of the organizations concerned. The Committee once again recalls that, irrespective of the de facto situation in each country, the determination of the most representative organization must be based on objective, pre-established and precise criteria so as to avoid any possibility of bias or abuse (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 97). The Committee once again expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to adopt legislative provisions establishing specific and appropriate criteria of representativeness in the very near future and it requests the Government to indicate the measures adopted in this respect in its next report.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It recalls that for several years it had been requesting the Government to amend the Settlement of Disputes in Essential Services Act of 1939, amended on several occasions, which empowers the authorities to refer a collective dispute to compulsory arbitration, to prohibit a strike or to terminate a strike in services that are not to be considered essential in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the last amendment to the abovementioned Act was S.I. No. 117 of 1998 and that currently, the services listed under the Act as essential are:

- airports (civil aviation and airport security services);
- electricity services;
- health services;
- hospital services;
- monetary and financial services (banks, Treasury, Central Bank of Belize);
- the national fire service;
- the port authority (pilots and security services);
- postal services;
- sanitary services;
- the social security scheme administered by the Social Security Board;
- telecommunications services;
- telephone services;
- water services; and
- services in which petroleum products are sold, supplied, transported, conveyed, handled, loaded, unloaded or sold.

The Committee considers that the banking sector, civil aviation, port authority (pilots), postal services, social security scheme and petroleum sector cannot be considered as essential services in the strict sense of the term in which a strike could be prohibited. Nevertheless, the Committee considers that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in other services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 160). In the view of the Committee, such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161).

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Settlement of Disputes in Essential Services Act taking into consideration the abovementioned principles and to provide information on any development in this respect in its next report.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 3 and 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that, under the provisions of section 27(2) of the Trade Unions and Employers' Organizations (Registration, Recognition and Status) Act, Chapter 304, a trade union could be certified as a bargaining agent if it received 51 per cent of the votes and that problems might arise from such a requirement of an absolute majority since, where this percentage was not attained, the majority union would be denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to report on any measures taken or contemplated to amend the legislation so as to ensure that when no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights are granted to all the unions in this unit, at least on behalf of their own members.

Comments of the ICFTU. The Committee notes that in its communication of 10 August 2006, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) indicates that the fines imposed in cases of anti-union discrimination are not sufficiently dissuasive. According to the ICFTU, cases of anti-union discrimination occur in practice in the banana plantation sector and in export processing zones, where employers do not recognize any unions. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on this subject.

The Committee is addressing a request directly to the Government on another matter.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Benin

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the information in the Government's report. It also notes the comments of 28 August 2007 of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which concern matters already raised by the Committee in its previous observation.

1. Article 2 of the Convention. Right to form trade unions without prior authorization. In its last observation, the Committee requested the Government to indicate the measures taken to amend the provisions of the Labour Code requiring the filing of trade unions by-laws in order to obtain legal personality from the authorities, including the Ministry of the Interior, under penalty of a fine. The Committee notes the Government's indication that its comments, particularly on the need to amend section 83 of the Labour Code will be taken into account during the present revision of the labour legislation. The Committee trusts that the revision of the labour legislation will be completed shortly. It asks the Government to indicate in its next report all amendments made to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention.

2. Article 2. Right of workers without distinction whatsoever to form trade unions. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to revise Ordinance No. 38 PR/MTPTPT of 18 June 1968 issuing the Merchant Navy Code, which gives seafarers neither the right to organize nor the right to strike and provides for prison sentences for breaches of labour discipline. In its report, the Government states that a new Merchant Navy Code is currently being considered by the National Assembly. Noting that under section 78 of the General Regulations of Seafarers of the Republic of Benin (Act No. 98-015) all seafarers have the right to organize, the Committee hopes that the new Merchant Navy Code will likewise grant to seafarers all the guarantees laid down in the Convention and requests the Government to provide a copy of the text with its next report.

Bolivia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee observes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes the comments of 28 August 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to matters already raised by the Committee.

For many years, in its comments on the application of the Convention the Committee has referred to:

- the exclusion of agricultural workers from the scope of the General Labour Act of 1942 and hence from the guarantees afforded by the Convention (section 1 of the General Labour Act of 1942 and Regulatory Decree No. 224 of 23 August 1943 issued under the Act);
- the denial of the right to organize of public servants (section 104 of the Act);
- the requirement that 50 per cent of the workers in an enterprise must give their agreement in order to establish a trade union if the latter is industrial (section 103 of the Act);
- the broad powers conferred upon the labour inspectorate to supervise trade union activities (section 101 of the Act);
- the requirement that candidates for trade union office must be Bolivian (section 138 of the Regulatory Decree) and permanent employees in the enterprise (sections 6(c) and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of June 1951);
- the possibility of dissolving trade unions by administrative decision (section 129 of the Regulatory Decree);
- restrictions on the right to strike: (i) majority of three-quarters of the workers in order to call a strike (section 114 of the Act and section 159 of the Regulatory Decree); (ii) the unlawfulness of general and sympathy strikes, subject to penal sanctions (sections 1 and 2 of Legislative Decree No. 2565); (iii) the unlawfulness of strikes in the banking sector (section 1(c) of Supreme Decree No. 1959 of 1950); (iv) the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration by decision of the Executive in order to end a strike, including in services other than those that are essential in the strict sense of the term (section 113 of the Act).

The Committee draws attention to the gravity of these breaches of the Convention which have persisted for many years, and notes with regret that, despite assistance from the Office in 2004, there has been no progress on the issues raised. It reminds the Government that it is important to take measures to ensure that the Convention is fully applied and requests it to send information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes the comments of 28 August 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to matters raised by the Committee and complain of the sluggishness of legal proceedings concerning the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the above.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take steps to update the amount of the fines (from 1,000 to 5,000 bolivianos) established in Act No. 38 of 7 February 1944 (former Legislative Decree No. 38) to make them sufficiently dissuasive against acts of anti-union discrimination or interference.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee observed previously that the legislation denies public employees the right to organize and requested the Government to take steps to have it amended so that public employees not engaged in the administration of the State have the right to bargain collectively through their organizations.

The Committee draws attention to the gravity of these breaches of the Convention which have persisted for many years, and notes with regret that, despite assistance from the Office in 2004, there has been no progress on the issues raised. It reminds the Government that it is important to take measures to ensure that the Convention is fully applied and requests it to send information in its next report on any developments in this respect.

Lastly, because there were so few collective agreements, the Committee had asked the Government to take measures, in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for collective bargaining between employers and their organizations and workers' organizations. The Committee reiterates that request and asks the Government to send information on the number of collective agreements concluded and the subjects they cover.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report, as well as the discussion concerning the application of the Convention which took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007. Furthermore, the Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 and those made by the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSSBiH) dated 13 October 2007. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in respect of the matters raised in these two communications in its next report.

The Committee also takes note of the report of the mission to Bosnia and Herzegovina following the request made by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007. It notes with interest the cooperation extended by the Government to the mission. It observes from the mission report the multifaceted elements involved in resolving the outstanding registration matters, which arise within a highly complex political system. It expresses the firm hope that concrete steps will be taken in the very near future, through the full commitment of all the parties concerned, so as to ensure full respect for the right to organize throughout the territory.

Articles 2 and 4 of the Convention. 1. Requirement of previous authorization for the establishment of employers' and workers' organizations and dissolution or cancellation of registration. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had noted that section 32 of the Law on the Associations and Foundations of Bosnia and Herzegovina authorizes the Minister of Justice to accept or refuse a request for registration and provides that the request shall be considered as rejected if the Minister does not adopt a decision within 30 days. The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report the concrete steps taken by the Ministry of Justice to amend this Law taking into account the Committee's previous comments and so as to provide for a simpler and faster registration procedure with more reasonable deadlines. It notes that the pre-draft Law on this matter has now been forwarded to the Council of Ministers for consideration and the adoption of the draft Law. Due to the current stoppage of the functioning of the Council of Ministers, the Government was not in a position to indicate when consideration of the pre-draft would be completed.

The Committee recalls that legislation which makes the registration and acquisition of legal personality a prerequisite for the existence and functioning of organizations and, at the same time, does not clearly define the reasons for refusal to grant a registration request, confers on the competent authority a genuinely discretionary power which is tantamount to a requirement for previous authorization. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Council of Ministers will be able to conclude their review of the pre-draft to amend the Law on Associations and Foundations in the very near future so that the necessary amendments to ensure that workers and employers can freely establish organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization may be adopted shortly in the Parliament. It further hopes that the necessary amendments will be made to sections 30(2), 34 and 35 as regards dissolution or cancellation of registration along the lines of its previous requests. In the meantime, it requests the Government to send a copy of the proposed amendments transmitted to the Council of Ministers so that it may examine their conformity with the Convention.

2. Registration of the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina (SSSBiH). The Committee further recalls that in its previous observation it had noted the unreasonable period which had elapsed since the filing of a registration request by the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina and had requested information on the measures taken or contemplated in order to grant registration to this organization as soon as possible. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report that resolution of this matter has been stalled because the current legislation requires that any refusal to register an organization must be first reviewed by a second instance internal body called the Appeals Commission. This Commission, appointed by the Council of Ministers, has not been convened due to a lack of internal capacity. The Committee notes with interest, however, that the Ministry of Justice has undertaken concrete measures to inform the Council of Ministers of this difficulty and has emphasized the need to establish the Appeals Commission, as, in its absence, the appellants are denied a right to an effective legal remedy. In response to a request from the Council of Ministers once apprised of this situation, the Ministry of Justice drafted a proposal for the decision on the appointment of the Appeals Commission, which has been forwarded to the competent bodies for their views prior to submitting a pre-draft decision to the Council of Ministers for consideration and adoption.

The Committee must nevertheless observe with regret that the question of the registration of the SSSBiH has still not been resolved, nor has the SSSBiH been assured of an appeal process to resolve the issue. The Committee notes from the mission report that the SSSBiH's appeal to the ordinary courts had been rejected on procedural grounds, as the law required a second instance administrative appeal prior to having access to the judicial system. The Committee considers that such a situation, which has lasted for five years now, is unacceptable in that it provides no recourse for the defence of workers' basic right to organize. The Committee further notes from the mission report that the practical obstacles to registration appear to emanate from a number of different sources and for a variety of non-legal reasons. The Committee emphasizes that the right to organize is a fundamental right which must be ensured for the good of the nation as a whole and that any other considerations can be addressed within the framework of respect for this right. The Committee recalls that Article 2 of Convention No. 87 guarantees workers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. While duly noting the current stoppage of the functioning of the Appeals Commission established by the Council of Ministers, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken in the very near future to register the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions of Bosnia and Herzegovina. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in this respect. Further noting with deep concern the absence of judicial recourse due to the non-functioning of the Appeals Commission for several years now, the Committee requests the Government to give serious consideration to amending the Law on Foundations and Associations so as to eliminate the requirement of a second administrative appeal step and to permit appeals directly to the judicial system.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007.

Article 4 of the Convention. Measures to encourage and promote the development of voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated in order to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers' and workers' organizations, including at the level of the Republic as a whole. The Committee notes the information provided in the Government's report that it has made efforts in promotion and improvement of voluntary bargaining by the establishment of the economic and social councils at the entity level, while the mid-term development strategy 2004–07 provides for the passage of a Law on the Economic and Social Council at the state level. The Government further indicates that labour, employment and social policy is under the exclusive jurisdiction of the entities and the Brcko district and collective bargaining at state level can only be carried out in respect of employees in state institutions. While no collective agreements exist currently at the state level, a trade union of local administration, police and judicial organs has been established and will submit a recommendation to the Council of Ministers to initiate a bargaining process. The Committee requests the Government to provide it with any available statistics on the number and coverage of collective agreements that have been concluded throughout the territory.

The Committee is addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a communication dated 28 August 2007, that refer mainly to matters previously raised by the Committee and to allegations of ongoing violations of trade union rights, primarily in the mining sector, including the mass dismissals of strikers. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations respecting the ITUC's comments, as well as those of the ICFTU contained in its previous comment.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to:

- amend section 2(1)(iv) of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (TUEO) (Amendments) Act, 2003 and section 2(11)(iv) of the Trade Disputes Act, both of which deny employees of the prison service the right to organize, as well as section 35 of the Prisons Act – which similarly prohibits prison officers from becoming members of a trade union or any body affiliated to a trade union;
- amend section 48B(1) of the TUEO Act, which grants certain facilities (access to an employer's premises for purposes of recruiting members, holding meetings or representing workers; the deduction of trade union dues from employees' wages, recognition by employers of trade union representatives in respect of grievances, discipline, and termination of employment) only to unions representing at least one third of the employees in an enterprise;
- amend section 10 of the TUEO Act, so as to afford industrial organizations the opportunity to rectify the absence of some of the formal registration requirements provided for in that section, and to repeal sections 11 and 15, which result in the automatic dissolution and banning of activities of non-registered organizations;
- amend sections 9(1)(b), 13 and 14 of the Trade Disputes Act, which empower the Commissioner and the Minister to refer a dispute in essential services to arbitration, or to the Industrial Court for determination; and to amend the list of essential services specified in the Schedule of the Trade Disputes Act, which includes, among others, the Bank of Botswana, railway services, and the transport and telecommunications services necessary to the operation of all of these services.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it has taken note of its comments, and that consultations with the social partners on the legal provisions referred to therein are ongoing. Recalling that consultations with the social partners with regard to legislative amendments had commenced last year, the Committee requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress made with respect to the points previously raised.

Finally, the Committee recalls that it had previously asked the Government to amend the following sections of the TUEO Act, so as to ensure that trade unions enjoy autonomy and financial independence from the authorities: section 43, providing for the inspection of accounts, books and documents of a trade union by the Registrar "at any reasonable time"; and sections 49 and 50, providing for the inspection by the Minister "whenever he considers it necessary in the public interest" of the financial affairs of a trade union. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Minister's power to inspect trade union finances under sections 49 and 50 of the TUEO Act is limited to exceptional circumstances in order to investigate a complaint by members of the union or allegations of embezzlement. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the practical application of sections 49 and 50 of the TUEO Act, including the frequency with which these sections are invoked to inspect trade union finances. Recalling, moreover, that the control by the public authorities over trade union finances should, except when exercised on the basis of a complaint from a certain percentage of workers, normally not exceed the obligation to submit periodic reports, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the measures necessary to amend section 43 of the TUEO Act.

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer mainly to legislative issues raised in its previous observation. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's comments.

The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government:

- to amend section 2 of the Trade Disputes Act, section 2 of the Trade Union and Employers' Organizations (Amendment) Act, and section 35 of the Prisons Act so as to ensure that prison staff are afforded all the guarantees provided under the Convention;
- to amend its legislation by adopting specific provisions ensuring adequate protection against acts of interference by employers or employers' organizations in the establishment, functioning or administration of trade unions, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions;
- to repeal section 35(1)(b), of the Trade Disputes Act, which permits an employer or employers' organization to apply to the Commissioner to withdraw the recognition granted to a trade union on the grounds that the trade union refuses to negotiate in good faith with the employer.

In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it has taken note of its comments, and that consultations with the social partners on the legal provisions referred to therein are ongoing. Recalling that consultations with the social partners with regard to legislative amendments had commenced last year, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the progress made with respect to these previously raised points and expresses the firm hope that next year it would be in a position to note substantive progress.

Finally, the Committee had noted that section 18(1)(e) of the Trade Disputes Act empowers the Industrial Court to direct the Commissioner to refer disputes before it to arbitration; section 20(3) provides on the other hand that a party to a trade dispute may make an urgent application to the Industrial Court for the determination of the dispute in question. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Industrial Court may refer disputes of interest to arbitration, including where one of the parties to a dispute has made an urgent application to the Industrial Court. Further noting the Government's statement that the intention of the law is to have disputes of interest resolved through arbitration, the Committee recalls that, as regards arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party, it considers that it is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in Convention No. 98, and thus the autonomy of the bargaining partners. An exception might however be made in the case of provisions which, for instance, allow workers' organizations to initiate such a procedure on their own, for the conclusion of a first collective agreement. As experience shows that first collective agreements are often one of the most difficult steps in establishing a sound bargaining relationship, these types of provisions may be said to be in the spirit of machinery and procedures which facilitate collective bargaining (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee recalls, moreover, that recourse to compulsory arbitration is also legitimate for disputes arising in the public service and in essential services in the strict sense of the term. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 20 of the Trade Disputes Act in accordance with the principles noted above and to keep it informed of the progress made in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it noted the comments from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), referring to the exclusion of collective bargaining in subcontracting enterprises; the imposition of court awards in collective bargaining at the request of a single party; the dismissal of trade union leaders in violation of their trade union immunity; the formulation of blacklists; the murder of leaders of rural workers' organizations and one trade unionist in the footwear sector. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government: (1) states that the national legislation does not prevent workers in subcontracting enterprises from forming trade unions and, once registration has been obtained from the Ministry of Labour and Employment, they can engage in collective bargaining. Numerous service enterprise trade unions exist in the country, including those which provide services by means of subcontracting; (2) states that, by virtue of Constitutional Amendment No. 45 of 2004, the agreement of both parties is required for resorting to "dissidio coletivo" (judicial arbitration); and (3) refers to the legislative provisions which afford protection to unionized workers. The Committee observes that the Government has not supplied any information on the alleged acts of violence, and it recalls that freedom of association may only be exercised in a situation where fundamental human rights are fully respected and guaranteed, in particular those relating to human life and safety. The Committee requests the Government to launch investigations in this respect, with a view to clarifying the facts and imposing penalties on the perpetrators.

Article 4 of the Convention. Compulsory arbitration. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that under Constitutional Amendment No. 45 of 8 December 2004 (reform of the judiciary; amendment of section 114) it was established that "dissidio coletivo" may only be resorted to if both parties agree (the judiciary may not be unilaterally called on to intervene) and requested the Government to provide information on the application of this constitutional amendment in practice. The Committee notes that the Government states that under the draft trade union reform, prepared in the context of the National Labour Forum (FNT), one of the priorities for which provision is made is the encouragement of collective bargaining at all levels and in all spheres of representation, removing the dialogue between workers and employers from the scope of the State, thereby strengthening the autonomy of the parties, and maintaining the State in its role of mediator. Under the trade union reform, labour tribunals are designed to become bodies for the voluntary settlement of disputes. The Government states that, the discussions in the FNT led to the consolidation of a proposal for a constitutional amendment, which is before the National Congress, and a proposal for a preliminary draft Act on trade union relations. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all progress made with regard to the draft trade union reform and, in particular, on any provisions adopted in relation to arbitration as a means of dispute settlement, and to supply statistical information on the number of collective disputes (dissidios coletivos) dealt with by the labour tribunals since the adoption of the Constitutional Amendment of 2004.

Right to collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the need for public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State to have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee observes that the Government has not supplied any information in this respect. The Committee therefore urges the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures adopted to ensure that public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State have the right to collective bargaining. In particular, recalling that it noted in its previous observation that the Government had indicated the existence of constitutional limitations on the public administration's freedom of action, making collective bargaining in the public sector difficult, and that in June 2003, in the federal public service, the Permanent National Negotiation Board (MNNP) was formed, composed of the representation of eight ministries and all the representative bodies of federal public servants, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any constitutional amendments have been proposed in this regard, and to provide information on the issues addressed by the MNNP.

The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it also referred to the need to repeal section 623 of the Consolidation of Labour Laws (CLT), under the terms of which the provisions of an agreement or accord in conflict with the orientations of the Government's economic and financial policy or the existing wages policy shall be declared null and void. The Committee notes that the Government has not supplied any information in this respect, and emphasizes that, except in exceptional circumstances required by economic stabilization policies, it is the parties to the collective bargaining process who are best placed to determine wages and should be the ones to do so, and considers that the restriction contained in section 623 of the CLT affects the independence of the social partners during collective bargaining and impedes the development of voluntary collective bargaining procedures between employers or their organizations and organizations of workers for the establishment of conditions of employment. The Committee once again requests the Government to take steps to repeal the aforementioned legislative provision and to inform it in its next report of any measure adopted in this respect.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments from the ITUC, dated 28 August 2007, reiterating some of the comments previously submitted by the ICFTU concerning the application of the Convention. The ITUC also indicates that the decisions of the National Labour Forum (FNT) submitted to the National Congress were rejected and that no government initiative exists for changing trade union structures and, in addition, refers to acts of anti-union discrimination in the education sector. The Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations in this respect.

The Committee is raising a number of other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Bulgaria

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007 that refer to matters already raised by the Committee.

Article 3 of the Convention. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their activities freely without interference by the public authorities. 1. The Committee recalls that, on previous occasions, it had requested the Government to amend section 11(2) and (3) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act; section 11(2) provides that the decision to strike shall be taken by a simple majority of the workers of the enterprise or the unit concerned, whereas section 11(3) stipulates that the duration of the strike must be declared. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that no amendments to these provisions have been made. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures presently being taken or envisaged to amend section 11(2) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act to ensure that, in strike ballots, only the votes cast would be counted and the quorum would be fixed at a reasonable level, as well as to amend section 11(3) of the Act so as eliminate the obligation to notify the duration of a strike.

2. Previously, the Committee had asked the Government to amend section 51 of the Railway Transport Act of 2000, which provides that, where industrial action is taken under the Act, workers and employers must provide the population with satisfactory transport services of no less than 50 per cent of the volume of transportation that was provided before the strike. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Transport had expressed the will to amend section 51 of the Act, and had proposed a modification providing that in case of a strike, the employees and the employers "shall be obliged, by a written agreement signed before the start of the strike, to assure 50 per cent of the implementation of the confirmed schedule for the movement of the trains on the day of the action". The Committee observes, in this respect, that the proposed modification preserves the 50 per cent requirement contained in section 51 of the Railway Transport Act, which, as the Committee had previously pointed out, may considerably restrict the right of railway workers to undertake industrial action. The Committee had also recalled that since the establishment of a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, workers' organizations should be able to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and public authorities. Noting the Government's statement that the proposed text was still being discussed by the competent institutions, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that workers' organizations may participate in negotiations on the definition and organization of a minimum service and that, where no agreement is possible, the matter will be referred to an independent body.

3. The Committee had previously referred to the provision of compensatory guarantees for workers in the energy, communications and health sectors, whose right to strike was denied under section 16(4) of the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that, by the amendment to the Collective Labour Disputes Settlement Act, SG No. 87/27.10.2006, the prohibition on strikes in these sectors has been repealed; workers in the energy, communications and health sectors now enjoy the right to strike. The Committee notes this information with interest and requests the Government to transmit a copy of SG No. 87/27.10.2006 repealing the ban on strikes with its next report.

4. With regard to the restricting of the exercise of the right to strike by civil servants, pursuant to section 47 of the Civil Servant Act, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the Ministry of the State Administration and the Administrative Reform (MSAAR) maintains the position that the denial of the right to strike to civil servants is reasonable, as the interruption of their work would place the functioning of the State in danger and bear negative consequences for all sectors of public life. The Government adds that it was nevertheless considering possible legislative amendments to overcome the existing restrictions on the right to strike of civil servants, in accordance with its international obligations. The Committee notes this information and expresses the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to amend section 47 of the Civil Servant Act, so as to effectively guarantee the right to strike to all civil servants who cannot be considered to be exercising authority in the name of the State. The Committee requests to be kept informed of the measures taken in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer mainly to matters previously raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC's comments, particularly those concerning the lengthiness of anti-union discrimination proceedings.

Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information on the provisions which protect against acts of interference by employees' and employers' organizations in each other's affairs. The Committee notes that the Government refers to section 33 of the Labour Code – which provides for the autonomy of workers' and employers' organizations in formulating their statutes, electing their representatives, and adopting their programmes of action. In this respect, the Committee recalls that under Article 2 of the Convention, all acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial means with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations, shall be deemed to constitute acts of interference. The Committee further recalls that legislation should explicitly prohibit all such acts of interference and make express provision for rapid appeals procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, in order to ensure the application in practice of Article 2. Moreover, to ensure that these measures receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down these substantive provisions, as well as appeals and sanctions to guarantee their application (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). Noting that the legislation contains no provisions concerning such protection as described above, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure adequate protection, including by means of dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference by employers' organizations.

Article 4. The Committee had previously noted that section 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code provides that collective agreements at the level of the branch or industry are concluded between the representative workers' and employers' organizations on the basis of an agreement between the national organizations to which they are respectively affiliated, and had requested the Government to specify whether a majority organization in the industry or the branch can conclude a collective agreement, even if it is not affiliated to a national representative organization, as well as to provide a copy of the general framework agreement concluded between national organizations of employers and workers on collective bargaining at the branch or industry levels. The Committee notes the Government's statement that organizations not affiliated to a national representative organization cannot conclude collective agreements at the branch and sectoral levels, though they may do so at the enterprise level. The Government further states that there is no framework agreement providing for collective agreements at the sectoral and branch levels. The Committee considers, in this regard, that requiring organizations to be affiliated with a national organization in order to be able to conclude sectoral and branch level agreements is incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining established in Article 4 of the Convention; it requests the Government to amend section 51(b)(1) and (2) of the Labour Code so as to eliminate this requirement.

Articles 4 and 6. The Committee had previously taken note of the comments made by the ITUC and the Confederation of the Independent Trade Unions of Bulgaria (CITUB) on the denial of collective bargaining rights to public servants. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, despite the absence of the right of collective bargaining in the narrow sense of the term, under section 44(3) of the Civil Service Act trade unions are able to represent and defend the rights of civil servants on civil service and social security issues through proposals, requests, and participation in the drafting of relevant internal regulations and ordinances, as well as in the discussion of issues of economic and social interest. The Government adds that representatives of organizations of civil servants may take part in the competition commission for the selection of candidates to the civil service, as well as participate in the process for the appraisal of civil servants. Issues related to income and social security in the public service, however, are discussed in the National Council for Tripartite Cooperation, in which all nationally representative employers' and workers' organizations are represented. While taking note of this information, the Committee nevertheless recalls that, although Article 6 of the Convention allows public servants engaged in the administration of the State to be excluded from its scope, other categories of public servants should enjoy the guarantees of the Convention and therefore be able to negotiate collectively their conditions of employment, including wages (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 262). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the steps necessary to amend the Civil Service Act so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining of all public servants, with the only possible exception being those engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee notes the comments of the Bulgarian Industrial Association (BIA) on the application of the Convention. The BIA states that section 52 of the Labour Code does not promote the voluntary implementation of negotiations, but rather obliges employers to negotiate with and submit information to trade unions. Furthermore, section 54 of the Labour Code obliges employers to start negotiations for the conclusion of a new collective agreement no later than three months prior to the expiry of the collective agreement in force. The BIA adds that section 51(a), (b) and (c) of the Labour Code grants workers' organizations the right to submit draft collective agreements. This same right, however, is not extended to employers' organizations. The Committee notes that the Government, in its reply to the BIA, indicates that although section 52 of the Labour Code obliges employers to negotiate with and provide relevant financial information to trade unions with a view to concluding collective agreements, the legislation does not require the parties to collective bargaining to conclude an agreement, and there are no limits imposed upon the duration of negotiations; the purpose of section 52, as such, is the promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee takes due note of the above information. Noting however that the Government does not respond to the BIA's comments concerning section 51(a), (b) and (c) of the Labour Code, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether employers' organizations enjoy the same right as workers' organizations to submit draft collective agreements in the course of negotiations.

Burkina Faso

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the reply to its previous observation. It also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007, which relate to issues already raised by the Committee in its previous observation and report acts of intimidation and threats against the leaders of the principal national trade union federations on the grounds of their participation in a national strike on 23 and 24 May 2006, and the requisitioning of many workers. The Committee notes the Government's reply, in which it stated that it would have liked to receive more information on the allegations made before providing its reply. The Committee recalls that, in general terms, the rights of workers' organizations can only be exercised in a climate that is free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations and requests the Government to conduct an inquiry into these allegations.

Article 3 of the Convention. Powers of requisitioning. In its previous comments, the Committee referred in particular to section 353 of the Labour Code, which provides that the competent administrative authority may, at any time, proceed to the requisitioning of workers in private enterprises and public services and establishments occupying jobs that are indispensable for the safety of persons and property, the maintenance of public order, the continuity of the public service or the satisfaction of the essential needs of the community. In this respect, the Committee indicated that it would be necessary to restrict the powers of the public authorities to requisition workers to cases in which the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited, namely: (1) public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; (2) essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population; and (3) in the event of an acute national crisis. In its reply, the Government contends that section 353 of the Labour Code merely establishes the principle of the requisitioning of workers in the event of a strike. However, it indicates its readiness to take into account the recommendations of the ILO in determining the list of jobs which could be covered by requisitioning in the event of a strike. Taking due note of this statement, the Committee requests the Government to establish by regulation the list of jobs determined under section 353 of the Labour Code and to provide this list with its next report. It trusts that the principles that it has recalled above will be taken into account in the determination of this list.

Furthermore, in its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to specify the provisions applicable to public servants and state employees in relation to strikes and the powers of requisitioning of the authorities. Taking into account the fact that, under the terms of section 4 of the Labour Code, officials in the public service, inter alia, are not governed by the provisions of the Labour Code, the Committee requested the Government to indicate whether officials in the public service who go on strike are governed by Act No. 45-60/AN of 25 July 1960 regulating the right to strike of public servants and state employees. In this respect, the Committee had recalled the need to amend sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN which establish, among other provisions, that, with a view to ensuring the continuity of the administration and the safety of persons and property, public servants may be required to perform their duties. The Committee is of the opinion that it would be advisable to restrict the powers of the public authorities to requisition workers to cases in which the right to strike may be limited or even prohibited (see above). In its reply, the Government indicates that Act No. 45-60/AN is still in force and that its revision is envisaged following revision of section 353 of the Labour Code. The Committee takes note of this information and trusts that the Government will be in a position to inform it of the amendment or the repeal of sections 1 and 6 of Act No. 45-60/AN in the near future.

Taking due note of the Government's indication that it has commenced the revision of the Labour Code in September 2007, the Committee trusts that it will take the points raised above into account in this process, and more generally, in any process of the revision of labour regulations, both for the private sector and the public service. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report all the amendments made and to provide copies of the new texts adopted, where appropriate.

The Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the provisions of the Labour Code are not explicit on trade union rights of apprentices, governed by sections 24–37 of the Labour Code. While noting that the Government refers to the provisions relating to the trade union rights of minors of at least 15 years of age contained in section 257 of the Code, the Committee suggests the Government to envisage, in the framework of revision of the Labour Code, inclusion of an explicit provision guaranteeing trade union rights to apprentices. It requests the Government to keep it informed of any measures taken in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's report and the replies to the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in 2006.

The Committee notes with interest the information that a Directorate of Labour Relations and the Promotion of Social Dialogue has been established within the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to promote collective bargaining. It also notes that, according to the Government, this Directorate initiated dialogue between employers and workers on wages in July 2007. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect and to provide copies of the collective agreements in force, with an indication of the approximate number of workers covered by them (including in the bakery, road transport and media sectors, in relation to which the Committee requested information in its previous observation).

Article 4 of the Convention. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee takes note of Decree No. 98-375/PRES/PN/MFPDI/MFF of 15 September 1998 on the composition, functioning and competence of the advisory bodies of the public service, including the Public Service Advisory Council in relation to concertation (section 51 of Act No. 013/98/AN of 13 April 1998 respecting the public service). The Committee requests the Government to specify the categories of public servants not exercising authority in the name of the State who enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

Burundi

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the information provided in reply to its previous comments. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received in August 2007 and relating to matters already raised by the Committee.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of public employees without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. With regard to the right to organize of magistrates, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, even though the Minister of Justice considered that the registration of the Union of Magistrates of Burundi (SYMABU) was not valid as section 14 of the Labour Code excludes magistrates from its scope, the current Government recognizes the SYMABU as a partner which it meets to discuss its claims. Moreover, the Government refers to section 33 of Law No. 1/001 of 29 February 2000 on the reform of the regulations governing magistrates, which recognizes the right to organize to magistrates, including the right to strike for professional reasons, which they exercise in accordance with the legislative provisions of the regulations governing magistrates. The Government adds that these regulations have not yet been adopted. The Committee once again notes with regret the lack of the statutory provisions on the right to organize of magistrates and observes that this situation is the reason behind difficulties of registration of the SYMABU. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures without delay in order to adopt such statutory provisions so as to ensure and clearly define the right to organize of magistrates.

Right to organize of minors. For several years, the Committee has been raising the matter of the compatibility of section 271 of the Labour Code with the Convention, as this section provides that minors under the age of 18 may not join a trade union without the explicit permission of their parents or guardians. The Committee requests the Government to recognize the right to join trade unions of minors under 18 years of age who are engaged in an occupational activity without the permission of their parents or guardians being necessary.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to draw up their constitutions and rules, elect their representatives in full freedom, organize their administration and activities and formulate their programmes without interference by the public authorities. Election of trade union officers. The Committee recalls that its previous comments related to section 275 of the Labour Code which sets the following conditions for holding the position of trade union officer or administrator.

- (a) Criminal record. Under section 275(3) of the Labour Code, holders of trade union office may not have been sentenced to imprisonment without suspension of sentence for more than six months. The Committee recalls that conviction for an act which, by its nature, does not call into question the integrity of the person and implies no real risk for the performance of trade union duties should not constitute grounds for exclusion from trade union office.
- (b) Belonging to the occupation. Section 275(4) of the Labour Code requires trade union leaders to have belonged to the occupation or trade for at least one year. The Committee previously requested the Government to make the legislation more flexible by allowing persons who had previously worked in the occupation to stand for office or by lifting this requirement for a reasonable proportion of trade union officers.

The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 275(3) and (4) of the Labour Code, taking fully into account the principles recalled above.

Right to strike. In its previous comments, the Committee raised the matter of the succession of compulsory procedures to be followed before calling a strike (sections 191 to 210 of the Labour Code), which appear to authorize the Minister of Labour to prevent all strikes. The Committee notes that the Government confines itself to indicating that the provisions to be issued under the Labour Code respecting the modalities for the exercise of the right to strike have not yet been issued. Recalling that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members, the Committee urges the Government to adopt and provide it with a copy of the text to be issued under the Labour Code on the modalities for the exercise of the right to strike, taking into account the principles recalled above.

The Committee also noted that, under section 213 of the Labour Code, strikes are lawful when they are called with the approval of a simple majority of the employees of the workplace or enterprise. The Committee recalled that, when voting on strikes, the ballot method, the quorum and the majority required should not be such that the exercise of the right to strike becomes very difficult in practice. If a member State sees fit to establish in its legislation provisions requiring a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should ensure that account is taken only of the votes cast and that the required majority and quorum are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 170). The Committee urges the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to amend section 213 of the Labour Code in the light of the comments made above.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the Government had adopted a legislative decree prohibiting the exercise of the right to strike and to demonstrate throughout the national territory during the period of the elections. According to the Government, this legislative decree has not been used in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this legislative decree was repealed following the elections.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted the information provided by the Confederation of Burundi Trade Unions (COSYBU) reporting grave violations of trade union rights in relation to several trade union leaders, including the President of COSYBU, and also interference in the representativeness and everyday administration of COSYBU. In addition, according to the COSYBU, workers who endeavour to organize in the private sector are threatened with dismissal or demotion by their employers. The Committee notes that the ITUC reiterates these grave allegations in its communication of 2007. The Committee notes the Government's reply indicating that the majority of COSYBU's grievances took place under previous authorities and are regrettable and that the new Government is ready to cooperate closely with trade union organizations and that the COSYBU can attest to the positive steps taken in this regard. Finally, the Government indicates that there are no pending judicial proceeding concerning the COSYBU's allegations. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that trade union organizations can exercise fully their right to organize their activities freely without interference from the public authorities.

The Committee notes that the Government has set up a tripartite committee responsible for rapidly proposing new provision of the Labour Code which would take into account the claims of the social partners, the reports of the labour inspection and the comments of the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the progress made in revising the Labour Code and recalls that technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

Furthermore, a request relating to other issues is being addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) received in August 2007, which refer to issues already examined and the fact that workers in the informal sector are deprived of trade union rights. The Committee notes the Government's response to the 2006 comments of the Confederation of Trade Unions of Burundi (COSYBU) concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee urges the Government to send its observations in response to the comments of the ITUC.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. Non-dissuasive nature of the sanctions established by the Labour Code for violations of Article 1 (protection of workers against acts of anti-union discrimination) and Article 2 (protection of employers' and workers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other) of the Convention. In its past comments, the Committee noted that, according to the Government, the provisions in question would be amended with the collaboration of the social partners. The Committee regrets that no amendments have been made to the legislation and, recalling the need to establish sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, hopes that the Government will be able to make the necessary amendments to the legislation in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any progress achieved in this respect.

Article 4. Right of collective bargaining in practice. The Committee noted previously that there was only one collective agreement in Burundi. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, it is for the social partners to take the initiative to propose collective agreements and that in practice they limit themselves to concluding enterprise agreements of which there are many in para-public enterprises. The Committee recalls that, although nothing in the Convention places a duty on the Government to enforce collective bargaining by compulsory means with the social partners, this does not mean that governments should abstain from any measure whatsoever aiming to establish a collective bargaining mechanism. The Committee notes the launch of a capacity-building programme for the social partners and once again asks the Government to provide information on the precise measures adopted to promote collective bargaining, together with information of a practical nature on the situation with regard to collective bargaining and, in particular, to indicate the number of collective agreements concluded up to now and the sectors covered. The Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate substantial progress in its next report.

Article 6. Right of collective bargaining for public servants not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee previously requested the Government to specify whether provisions that imply restrictions on the scope of collective bargaining for the public service as a whole are still in force in Burundi, particularly as regards the determination of wages, such as: (1) section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 of 26 July 1988, which provides that, following approval by the relevant ministry, the governing councils of public establishments set the level of remuneration for permanent and temporary posts and determine the conditions for appointment and dismissal; and (2) section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24, which provides that governing councils of public establishments draw up staff regulations for personalized administrations subject to the approval of the competent minister. The Committee noted that, in its reply, the Government indicated that these provisions were still in force, but that, in practice, state employees participate in determining their terms and conditions of employment. According to the Government, they are aware of the right of collective bargaining, and this is the reason for the existence of agreements in the education and health sectors. In the case of public establishments and personalized administrations, the employees participate in the determination of remuneration as they are represented on the governing councils, and wage claims are submitted to the employer by enterprise councils or trade unions, with the competent minister only intervening to safeguard the general interest; in certain ministries, trade union organizations have obtained bonuses to supplement wages. The Committee once again asks the Government to take measures to align the legislation with practice and, in particular, to amend section 45 of Legislative Decree No. 1/23 and section 24 of Legislative Decree No. 1/24 so as to ensure that organizations of public servants and employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State can negotiate their wages and other terms and conditions of employment.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report, and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication of 28 August 2007. The Committee further notes the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007, and in particular that the Conference Committee had deplored the failure on the part of the Government to provide full reports to the Committee of Experts and expressed its deep concern at the statements made concerning the assassination of the trade unionists Chea Vichea, Ros Sovannareth, and Hy Vuthy; death threats; and the emerging climate of impunity in the country. The Conference Committee had also recalled that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations could only be exercised in a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations and called upon the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure respect for this fundamental principle and bring an end to impunity; to this end, it urged the Government to take steps immediately to ensure full and independent investigations into the murders of the abovementioned Cambodian trade union leaders so as to bring not only the perpetrators, but also the instigators of these heinous crimes to justice.

The ITUC refers to the obstruction of the activities of the Cambodian Independent Teachers' Association (CITA); the conviction, despite a lack of evidence, of union leaders Lach Sambo, Yeom Khun and Sal Koem San for the crime of illegal confinement in connection with a strike; and the refusal by employers to comply with arbitration council orders to reinstate dismissed trade unionists. The ITUC also refers to numerous acts of harassment and violence against trade union leaders and affiliates, including the detainment by the authorities of a Free Trade Union of Workers of the Kingdom of Cambodia (FTUWKC) leader, in connection with a 2006 May Day march organized by his union; as well as attacks on FTUWKC officials Chi Simun, Lem Semret, Em Chhay Tieng, Chey Rithy and Yeng Vann Yuth. Finally, the ITUC alleges the introduction of new evidence proving the innocence of the two men convicted in 2005 of the murder of Chea Vichea, president of the FTUWKC. The said evidence includes eyewitness testimony absolving the two men of the murder and testimony from the ex-Chief of the Phnom Penh police corroborating that the two men were framed for the murder. It recalls that it had, on many occasions, stressed the interdependence between civil liberties and trade union rights, emphasizing that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights. The exercise of civil liberties in relation to trade union rights should be examined on the basis of the provisions contained in Article 3 of Convention No. 87, and it is in connection with this standard that the respect of certain basic human rights acquires its full importance for trade union life (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 26). The Committee deeply regrets the Government's lack of reply to the ITUC's comments, particularly in the light of the gravity of the allegations. In these circumstances, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, including the initiation of judicial inquiries, to bring an end to the acts of violence and intimidation against trade union officials and members.

The Committee notes that the Conference Committee had urged the Government to accept an ILO direct contacts mission in respect of the serious freedom of association matters raised. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's communication of 2 November 2007, wherein the Government indicates that, following a high-level ILO mission to Cambodia in October, it has agreed to an ILO direct contacts mission in March or April 2008. The Committee notes this development with interest and expresses the firm hope that the direct contacts mission will achieve significant results with respect to the serious matters referred to above.

The Committee is addressing a request directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to matters already under examination, as well as to extremely serious and numerous acts of anti-union discrimination and interference – including instances where employers had violated trade union rights with impunity – and obstacles to collective bargaining. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In previous comments, the Committee had noted that in Case No. 2443 the Committee on Freedom of Association had referred to the need for appropriate legal protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, including sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, and had requested the Government to inform it of the measures adopted in order to modify the legislation so as to provide for such sanctions. In this connection, the Committee notes with regret that the Government provides no information concerning this matter. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the steps necessary to provide adequate protection in its legislation against all acts of anti-union discrimination, including by means of sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

Article 4. Recognition of trade unions for purposes of collective bargaining. The Committee takes note of Prakas No. 13 of 2004, which lays down the procedure for granting most representative status to professional organizations at the enterprise or institutional level. The Committee notes in particular that section 1 of Prakas No. 13 provides that the Ministry of Social Affairs, Labour, Vocational Training and Youth Rehabilitation (MOSALVY) may refuse to grant most representative status to a trade union when an objection is put forward from a member of the Labour Advisory Committee, or from enterprises, institutions, or a concerned third party. The Committee considers, in this respect, that permitting the objections of third parties as grounds for refusing a union most representative status runs counter to the principle of promoting collective bargaining expressed in Article 4 of the Convention. It requests the Government to amend section 1 of Prakas No. 13 accordingly, and to keep it informed of the progress made in this respect.

Articles 4 and 6. Public servants. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 1 of the Labour Law, certain categories of workers, which include persons appointed to a temporary or a permanent post in the public service, are not covered by this legislation. It had further noted that the Committee on Freedom of Association (see 334th Report, paragraphs 202–226) had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Common Statutes of Civil Servants so as to guarantee the right to collective bargaining of civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State, and requested the Government to indicate whether the categories of workers in question benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention under other legal provisions and, if not, to take the necessary measures in order to ensure the application of the Convention to these categories of workers. In this regard the Committee notes with regret the Government's statement that the rights of judges, teachers, and temporary and permanently appointed officials in the public service are provided for by separate laws pertaining to public ministries or institutions, and that it was unable therefore to amend the labour law in accordance with the Committee's previous comments. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the laws pertaining to all public sector workers, so as to ensure the right to collective bargaining for all public servants, with the exception of those engaged in the administration of the State.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that it is preparing amendments to the labour law with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee expresses the hope that these amendments will bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention, in accordance with its comments above, and requests the Government to keep it informed of developments in this regard.

Cameroon

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It notes the Government's indications replying to the observations received in 2006 from the General Confederation of Labour – Liberty of Cameroon (CGT–Liberté) and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which concerned restrictions on the process of establishing trade union organizations, including the requirement for government authorization, and the prohibition for unions to organize their activities within the National Centre for Studies and Experiments in Agricultural Mechanization (CENEEMA). In this respect, the Government indicates that the CENEEMA was merely reminded to comply with the obligation to register set out in the Labour Code until such time as the legislative provisions in question, which are currently being revised, are brought fully into conformity with the Convention. The Government adds that the initiation of an ILO project (PAMODEC) in 2007 will help it to address the difficulties identified and to better apply the Convention.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC), dated 7 August 2007, CGT–Liberté dated 27 August 2007 and the ITUC dated 28 August 2007 concerning the dismissal of 163 workers from the enterprise DTP Terrassement for calling a strike; the arrest and imprisonment of Barnabé Paho of the Confederation of Cameroon Trade Unions; the dismissal of Jean Marie N'Di, Secretary-General of the Federation of Health, Pharmaceutical and Allied Unions (FESPAC), due to his trade union activities; the difficulties involved in the organization of elections for staff delegates in several enterprises; and the need to amend the procedure for the registration of unions. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on all these observations in its next report.

Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee has been recalling for many years that Act No. 68/LF/19 of 18 November 1968, under which the existence in law of a trade union or occupational association of public servants is subject to prior approval by the Minister for Territorial Administration, section 6(2) of the Labour Code of 1992, under which persons forming a trade union which has not yet been registered and who act as if the said union has been registered shall be liable to prosecution, and section 166 of the Labour Code, establishing heavy fines, are all in contradiction with Article 2 of the Convention. With regard to the provisions of the Labour Code, the Committee notes the Government's indication, in its reply to the ICFTU's observations, that it has submitted a Bill to the National Assembly to amend the Labour Code which would replace the current system for the registration of unions by a system consisting of mere notification. It adds that the adoption of this new system would imply the elimination of penalties and/or fines in the event of the violation of the law. The Committee trusts that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report the progress achieved in this respect. It also requests the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to amend Act No. 68/LF/19 so as to guarantee public servants the right to establish organizations of their own choosing without prior authorization and to provide a copy of the legislative texts in question.

Article 5. Prior authorization for affiliation to an international organization. The Committee has been pointing out for several years that section 19 of Decree No. 69/DF/7 of 6 January 1969, which provides that trade unions or associations of public servants may not join a foreign occupational organization without obtaining prior authorization from the minister responsible for "supervising public freedoms", is inconsistent with Article 5 of the Convention. Recalling that Article 5 guarantees all occupational organizations the right to affiliate freely with international organizations of workers and employers, the Committee regrets to note that the provision in question has still not been repealed despite the assurances in this respect given by the Government in previous reports. The Committee once again urges the Government to amend the legislation as soon as possible so as to remove the requirement of prior authorization for the affiliation of trade unions of public servants to an international organization.

Emphasizing that many of the issues referred to above have been raised for very many years, both by the Committee of Experts and by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Committee urges the Government to lift all obstacles to the full exercise of freedom of association without further delay by adopting the necessary amendments to the legislation and ensuring that they are given full effect in practice. The Government is requested to provide copies of all legislative texts adopted in this respect.

Other issues

With regard to the situation of the trade unionist Mr B. Essiga, the Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on developments in the judicial procedures against the latter and to provide a copy of any ruling handed down.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments made by the General Union of Workers of Cameroon (UGTC), dated 7 August 2007, by CGT-Liberté, dated 27 August 2007, and by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007. The Committee observes that the Government merely indicates in reply to these comments that it cannot verify at government level the allegations of anti-union discrimination in certain enterprises. It adds that, for the moment, it is adopting an attitude of neutrality to avoid being accused of interference in the internal affairs of trade unions. The Committee would like to reiterate in this respect that it is the responsibility of the Government to ensure the application of international labour Conventions concerning freedom of association which have been freely ratified and which must be respected by state authorities at all levels. The Committee requests the Government to supply its observations in reply to comments on the lack of true collective bargaining in the country since 1996, on the dismissals and other detrimental measures which affect trade unionists on account of their activities concerning workers' representation and, more generally, on the allegations of lack of protection of trade union representatives.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that, since the adoption of the Labour Code in 1992, it has been asking the Government to amend or delete section 6(2) and section 166 of the Code, which allow the imposition of fines ranging from 50,000 to 500,000 francs on members responsible for the administration or management of a non-registered trade union who act as if the union had been registered, in breach of Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government, in a communication dated 5 October 2006 in reply to the observations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning the application of Convention No. 87, states that it submitted to the National Assembly a draft act amending the Labour Code which would replace the current system of trade union registration with a system of mere declaration. It also indicates that the adoption of this new system would imply the abolition of the abovementioned sentences and/or fines. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will be in a position to indicate in its next report the progress made in repealing the abovementioned provisions, and that it will send copies of the legislative texts adopted to this end.

Canada

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), now International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), in a communication dated 10 August 2006 as well as the Government's reply thereto.

The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in numerous cases concerning allegations of interference into the right to organize and carry out trade union activities, including collective bargaining, in various provinces of Canada. (Cases Nos 2314 and 2333, 340th Report, paragraphs 373–432; Case No. 2324, 336th Report, paragraphs 233–284; Cases Nos 2403, 2401 and 2343, 338th Report, paragraphs 536–603; Case No. 2349, 337th Report, paragraphs 361–407; Case No. 2405, 340th Report, paragraphs 433–457, and 343rd Report, paragraphs 318–338; Case No. 2430, 343rd Report, paragraphs 339–363; and Case No. 2467, 344th Report, paragraphs 461–587).

At the same time, the Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that on 8 June 2007 the Supreme Court of Canada overruled 20 years of previous Supreme Court decisions in order to hold unanimously that freedom of association encompasses a measure of protection for collective bargaining under section 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Association v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27). The Committee notes that in reaching its decision the majority of the Court referred to Convention No. 87 as well as the International Covenants on Civil and Political Rights, and on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, noting that the “interpretation of these Conventions, in Canada and internationally, not only supports the proposition that there is a right to collective bargaining in international law, but also suggests that such a right should be recognized in the Canadian context under section 2(d)” (at paragraph 72). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the implications of the Supreme Court decision for the application of the Convention.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the exclusion of wide categories of workers from statutory protection of freedom of association and restrictions on the right to strike in several provinces.

A. Article 2 of the Convention. Right to organize of certain categories of workers. 1. Workers in agriculture and horticulture (Alberta, Ontario and New Brunswick). The Committee recalls from its previous comments that workers in agriculture and horticulture in the Provinces of Alberta, Ontario and New Brunswick are excluded from the coverage of labour relations legislation and thereby deprived of statutory protection of the right to organize.

The Committee notes with regret from the Government's report that there are no plans for a legislative review in Alberta and New Brunswick (the Alberta government indicates that this issue may be addressed in the next review of the Labour Relations Code and the New Brunswick government maintains that limiting the scope of the law to workplaces with five or more agricultural employees is fair and equitable). As for Ontario, the Committee notes from the Government's report that in December 2001, the Supreme Court of Canada declared the exclusion of agricultural workers from the Labour Relations Act, 1995, to be unconstitutional in the absence of any other statutory protection of their freedom of association (Dunmore v. Ontario/Attorney-General, 2001, 207 DLR (4th) 193 (SCC)). The Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002 (AEPA), which was promulgated in June 2003 pursuant to the Supreme Court finding, gives agricultural employees the right to form or join an employees' association but does not provide a right to a statutory collective bargaining regime and maintains the exclusion of agricultural employees from the Labour Relations Act. In April 2004, the United Food and Commercial Workers (UFCW) filed an appeal challenging the constitutionality of this Act. The application was dismissed by the Superior Court on 10 January 2006. The UFCW advised that it intends to appeal the decision to the Ontario Court of Appeal; this appeal has not been heard yet. The Government adds that it is currently reviewing the impact that the subsequent decision by the Supreme Court of 8 June 2007 (see above) may have on Ontario's labour laws.

The Committee recalls once again that all workers without distinction whatsoever (with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police) have the right to organize under the Convention. It further notes the conclusions reached by the Conference Committee in June 2004, recalling the need to amend the legislative texts in different provinces with a view to guaranteeing the full application of the Convention in relation to the effective right of association in agriculture which has suffered from restrictions for many years. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the governments of Ontario, Alberta and New Brunswick, with a view to amending their legislation so as to guarantee the right of agricultural workers to organize. It requests the Government in particular to assess the implications of the Supreme Court decisions of December 2001 (Dunmore) and June 2007 (Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Association) with regard to the exclusion of agricultural employees from statutory protection of the right to organize in Ontario, Alberta and New Brunswick.

2. (a). Domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors (Ontario). The Committee recalls that, taking note of the conclusions and recommendations reached in Case No. 1900 by the Committee on Freedom of Association, it has been raising for a number of years the need to ensure that wide categories of workers in Ontario, who have been excluded from statutory protection of freedom of association under section 3(a) of the amended Labour Relations Act, 1995 (domestic workers, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors), enjoy the protection necessary, either through the Labour Relations Act, or by means of occupationally specific regulations, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing (see Case No. 1900, 308th Report, paragraphs 139–194).

The Committee notes with regret that, according to the Ontario government, no legislative amendments are planned in this respect. With regard to domestic workers in particular, the Ontario government indicates that they have been defined narrowly by the Ontario Labour Relations Board (OLRB) so that their exclusion from statutory protection of freedom of association concerns individuals who reside with a family and provide childcare, cleaning and other domestic services, but does not include, as found by the OLRB, attendants employed to care for individuals with disabilities in their own apartments, or maintenance, dietary, infirmary and housekeeping staff employed in the residence of a religious order. With regard to professionals, such as architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors, the government of Ontario reiterates previously provided information and indicates that they have professional organizations that represent their interests and in some cases negotiate collectively (e.g. the Ontario Medical Association bargains on behalf of its members with the Province of Ontario on the issue of fee schedules).

The Committee recalls, from the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1900, that the exclusion of these categories of workers from the Labour Relations Act, 1995, has had as a result that, although they can still exercise their right to associate under the Common Law, their associations are devoid of the higher statutory protection provided for in the Labour Relations Act, 1995, and this can function as an impediment to their activities and discourage membership. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated by the government of Ontario to amend section 3(a) of the amended Labour Relations Act, 1995, so as to ensure that several categories of workers (domestic workers, including those who provide childcare, cleaning and other domestic services, architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors) are able to benefit either from the general collective labour rights system or specific legislation which allows them to form organizations that enjoy the same rights, prerogatives and means of recourse as other workers' organizations. The Committee also requests the Government to assess the implications of the Supreme Court decisions of December 2001 (Dunmore) and June 2007 (Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Association) with regard to the exclusion of the above categories of employees from statutory protection of the right to organize.

(b). Alberta, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan. The Committee further notes that, according to information provided by the Government, domestic workers are excluded from legislation in the following provinces in addition to Ontario: Alberta (section 4(2)(f) of the Labour Relations Code); New Brunswick (section 1(1) of the Industrial Relations Act); Newfoundland and Labrador, unless the employer has two or more employees (section 2(1)(x) of the Labour Relations Act); Nova Scotia, unless the employer has two or more employees (section 2(1)(x) of the Trade Union Act); and Saskatchewan, unless the employer has three or more employees (not covered if at least one of the three employees is a member of a trade union that includes as members employees of more than one employer (section 2(g) of the Trade Union Act).

The Committee also notes from information provided by the Government that the exclusion of architects, dentists, land surveyors, lawyers and doctors is not limited to Ontario; other provinces contain similar exclusions in their labour laws, which extend moreover to include engineers: Alberta (section 1(1) of the Labour Relations Code); Nova Scotia (section 2(2) of the Trade Union Act); and Prince Edward Island (section 7(2) of the Labour Act). Moreover, these workers might be excluded also in Newfoundland and Labrador and Saskatchewan if the employer has less than two or three employees respectively. The Committee finally notes that the government of Alberta indicates that it has no intention to amend these exclusions and that the professionals in question can establish associations which function in ways similar to a labour union in representing the interests of their members, including through bargaining.

The Committee refers to the comments made above with regard to Ontario and requests the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated by the governments of Alberta, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Saskatchewan to remedy the exclusion of the above categories of workers from the statutory protection of freedom of association, and to assess the implications of the Supreme Court decisions of December 2001 (Dunmore) and June 2007 (Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Association) in this regard.

3. Nurse practitioners (Alberta). The Committee's previous comments concerned the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2277 (see 333rd Report, paragraphs 240–277, and 337th Report, paragraphs 347–360) to the effect that nurse practitioners have been deprived of the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing by the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act in Alberta, as well as comments by the ICFTU on this issue. The Committee notes from the Government's report that there are no planned reviews of the status of nurse practitioners who constitute an emerging and important health-care occupation and play an important role, especially in rural areas, between that of a physician and a registered nurse. The Committee once again recalls that the words "without distinction whatsoever" used in Article 2 of the Convention mean that freedom of association should be guaranteed without discrimination of any kind. The Committee, therefore, once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the government of Alberta to amend the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act so that nurse practitioners recover the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

4. Principals, vice-principals in educational establishments and community workers (Ontario). The Committee further recalls, with regard to Ontario, that its previous comments concerned the need to ensure that principals and vice-principals in educational establishments as well as community workers have the right to organize, pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1951 (see 325th Report, paragraphs 197–215) and Case No. 1975 (see 316th Report, paragraphs 229–274, and 321st Report, paragraphs 103–118).

The Committee notes with regret that the Ontario government reiterates previously provided information and indicates that it has no plans to amend the existing legislation. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Ontario government to amend the legislation so as to guarantee to principals and vice-principals in educational establishments as well as community workers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

5. Public colleges part-time employees (Ontario). The Committee further takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2430 (see 343rd Report, paragraphs 339–363) with regard to the provisions of the Colleges Collective Bargaining Act, RSO 1990, Chapter 15 that denies all public colleges part-time employees the right to join a union for collective bargaining purposes. The Committee, following the conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, recalls that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, whether they are employed on a permanent basis, for a fixed-term or as contract employees, should have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Ontario government to ensure that academic and support part-time staff in colleges of applied arts and technology fully enjoy the right to organize, as any other workers.

6. Education workers (Alberta). With regard to the right to organize of education workers in Alberta, the Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to repeal the provisions of the University Act which empower the board of governors to designate the academic staff members who are allowed, by law, to establish and join a professional association for the defence of their interests. In the Committee's view, these provisions allow for future designations to exclude faculty members and non-management administrative or planning personnel from membership of the staff associations whose purpose is to protect and defend the interests of these categories of workers.

The Committee notes with regret that, according to the government of Alberta, there are no plans to amend this legislation; the government adds that post-secondary employees who are not represented by a faculty association are in fact represented by a support staff union at the same institution. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Alberta government with a view to ensuring that all university staff are guaranteed the right to organize without any exceptions.

7. Workers in social, health and childcare services (Quebec). The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2333 and 2314 concerning two Acts (Act modifying the Act on health and social services (LQ, 2003, c.12) and Act modifying the Act on early childhood centres and other nursery services (LQ, 2003, c.13)) by which the Government redefined workers in social and health services and childcare services as “independent workers”, thus divesting them of the status of “employee” and denying them the right to unionize, leading to the cancellation of their trade union registrations. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the issue is pending before the domestic courts and therefore it reserves its comments until a judgement has been rendered. The Committee notes that the Convention does not exclude any of the above categories of workers who should have the right to establish and join organizations of their choosing and hopes that, in rendering their judgement, the courts will take into account the provisions of the Convention. The Committee, following the recommendations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2333 and 2314, requests the Government to indicate in its next report the outcome of the judicial proceedings under way as well as any measures taken or contemplated by the Quebec government so as to amend the provisions of the Act modifying the Act on health and social services (LQ, 2003, c.12) and the Act modifying the Act on early childhood centres and other nursery services (LQ, 2003, c.13), in order for the workers concerned to be able to benefit either from the general collective labour rights system or specific legislation which allows them to form organizations that enjoy the same rights, prerogatives and means of recourse as other workers’ organizations.

8. Prosecutors (Quebec). The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2467 (see 344th Report, paragraphs 461–587) with regard to the Prosecutors Act (as amended by the Act amending the Act respecting Attorney-General’s Prosecutors and the Labour Code, LQ 2004, c.22) which denies prosecutors the right to join a trade union and deprives them of protection against hindrances, reprisals or sanctions related to the exercise of trade union rights. The Committee notes that the Government does not provide specific information on this issue. The Committee, following the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, requests the Government to indicate in its next report measures taken or contemplated by the government of Quebec so as to ensure that prosecutors have the right to join the organization of their choice.

B. Article 2. Trade union monopoly established by law (Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario). The Committee’s previous comments concerned the specific reference to the trade union recognized as the bargaining agent in the law of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario (Prince Edward Island Civil Service Act, 1983; Nova Scotia Teaching Professions Act; Ontario Education and Teaching Professions Act).

The Committee notes with regret from the Government’s report that there are no plans to amend the legislation in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario. The Ontario government indicates that teachers’ bargaining agents were identified in legislation for the first time in 1975, thus capturing existing practices at the time with the agreement of school boards and unions. The Committee once again emphasizes that, although a system in which a single bargaining agent can be accredited to represent workers in a given bargaining unit and bargain on their behalf is compatible with the Convention, a trade union monopoly established or maintained by the explicit designation by name of a trade union organization in the law is in violation of the Convention and other trade unions which have in the meantime become majority organizations should be able to request accreditation to represent workers. The Committee requests once again the Government to indicate any measures taken or contemplated by the governments of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario to repeal from their respective legislation the designation by name of individual trade unions as bargaining agents and suggests giving consideration to a neutral reference to the most representative organization.

C. Article 3. Right to strike of workers in the education sector. The Committee recalls from its previous comments that problems remain in several provinces with regard to the right to strike of workers in the education sector (British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario).

1. British Columbia. With respect to British Columbia, the Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to repeal the provisions of Bill No. 18 (the Skill Development and Labour Statutes Amendment Act) which declared education to be an essential service, and to adopt provisions ensuring that workers in the education sector may enjoy and exercise the right to strike, pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2173 (see 330th Report, paragraphs 239–305). The Committee notes with regret from the Government’s report that there have been no measures to amend or repeal the provisions in question and that the British Columbia government continues to hold the position that teachers represent an essential service that permits children to have full access to their education throughout the school year. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the British Columbia government with a view to amending the legislation so as to ensure that essential services, in which strikes may be restricted or even prohibited, are limited to those services the interruption of which could endanger the life, personal safety or health of the population and ensuring that workers in the education sector, which does not qualify as an essential service in the strict sense of the term, may enjoy and exercise the right to strike without undue restrictions. The Committee suggests that the British Columbia government give consideration to establishing an effective and voluntary dispute settlement mechanism in this regard, on the basis of consultations with all organizations concerned.

The Committee further recalls that in its previous comments concerning British Columbia it had requested information on the new collective bargaining regime for support staff in certain provincial school commissions after the repeal of an Act, which had served to end a collective dispute in these commissions, in July 2000. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the parties have subsequently successfully negotiated collective agreements.

2. Manitoba. With regard to Manitoba, the Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 110(1) of the Public School Act which prohibits strikes by teachers. The Committee notes with regret from the Government's report that there are no plans to make amendments to the Public Schools Act at this time. The current system has existed since 1956 and had the agreement of the social partners. The Committee once again notes that the right to strike should only be restricted for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and in essential services in the strict sense of the term. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Manitoba government to amend its legislation so that schoolteachers, who do not provide essential services in the strict sense of the term and do not qualify as public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, may exercise the right to strike without undue restrictions, and suggests that the Manitoba government give consideration to the establishment of a voluntary and effective dispute settlement mechanism in this regard, on the basis of consultations with all organizations concerned.

3. Ontario. The Committee further recalls from its previous comments concerning Ontario that it had emphasized, pursuant to the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2025 (see 320th Report, paragraphs 374–414) and Case No. 2305 (see 335th Report, paragraphs 471–512), the need to consider establishing a voluntary and effective dispute prevention and resolution mechanism rather than having recourse to back-to-work legislation. It further requested the Government to ensure that recourse to arbitration for the settlement of disputes be voluntary and that such arbitration be truly independent (see 335th Report, paragraphs 505 and 512).

The Committee notes with interest from the Government's report that in addition to the fact that all bargaining agents in the education sector have the right to establish a voluntary and effective dispute prevention and resolution mechanism based on the voluntary recourse to independent arbitration machinery, the new government in Ontario has been successful in replacing a confrontational environment between the government and teachers with a collaborative one. Thus, for the first time in the history of Ontario, teacher unions and school boards settled four-year collective agreements in all 72 publicly funded school boards (for the period September 2004 to August 2008) without any strikes. In addition, the government has established an "Educational Partnership Table" in which representatives from unions and employers in the education sector as well as students, parents and school principals undertake to work toward consensus. The first meeting was held on 6 March 2004 and meetings are held on a quarterly basis. The Government has also established the Provincial Stability Commission (PSC) to assist the parties should disputes arise regarding the implementation of provisions contained in collective agreements. The Commission will maintain an environment of good will and proactively address any issues that may arise from the implementation of the four-year collective agreements; promote problem solving over formal or adversarial dispute resolution; and solve problems and develop best practices concerning teacher supervision of students to ensure student safety. As a first step, the PSC will be providing effective dispute resolution mechanisms for the parties to the 31 teacher collective agreements in the public elementary sector. Three out of six teacher bargaining agents have agreed to refer to the PSC issues around teacher supervision of students that cannot be resolved at the local level. The Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report information on the functioning of the Educational Partnership Table and the Provincial Stability Commission as well as any other voluntary mechanisms for effective dispute prevention and resolution in the education sector.

D. Article 3. Right to strike of certain categories of employees in the health sector (Alberta). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the prohibition on strikes to all employees within the regional health authorities, including various categories of labourers and gardeners under the Labour Relations (Regional Health Authorities Restructuring) Amendment Act. In previous comments, the Committee took note of the relevant conclusions and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2277 (see 333rd Report, paragraphs 240–277) as well as the comments of the ICFTU according to which this Act put an end to the right to strike for the remaining 10 per cent of health-care workers in Alberta who still had that right.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Act in question did not take away the right to strike for the vast majority of gardeners and labourers in the health-care sector, but rather prohibited these employees from striking as staff members of facilities on the designated hospitals list. The Committee recalls its view that gardeners and labourers do not provide essential services in the strict sense of the term. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report all measures taken or contemplated by the Alberta government in order to ensure that those workers in the health and hospital sectors who are not providing essential services, in the strict sense of the term, are not deprived of the right to strike.

E. Article 3. Right to strike in the public sector (Quebec). The Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2467 (see 344th Report, paragraphs 61–587) with regard to Act 43 putting a unilateral end to negotiations in the public sector by imposing collective agreements for a determined period, and thereby depriving the employees concerned, including teachers, of the right to strike (labour law in Quebec prohibits strikes during the term of a collective agreement); imposing severe and disproportionate sanctions in the event of an infringement of the provisions prohibiting recourse to strike action (suspension or deduction of trade union dues merely by the employer declaring that there has been an infringement of the Act for a period of 12 weeks for each day or part of a day that the infringement is observed (section 30, Act 43); reduction of employees' salary by an amount equal to the salary they would have received for any period during which they infringe the Act, in addition to not being paid during that period – a measure applicable also to employees on trade union release during the period in question (section 32, Act 43); facilitation of class actions against an association of employees by reducing the conditions required by the Civil Procedures Code for such an action (section 38, Act 43); severe penal sanctions (sections 39–40, Act 43)). The Committee notes that according to the Government, Act 43 is currently under appeal before the domestic courts. The Committee, following the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, requests the Government to indicate in its next report the outcome of the appeal pending on Act 43 before the domestic courts as well as any measure taken or contemplated by the government of Quebec with a view to: (i) ensuring that, where the right to strike may be restricted or even prohibited, adequate compensatory guarantees are afforded to the workers concerned, for example, conciliation and mediation procedures leading, in the event of deadlock, to arbitration machinery seen to be fully impartial and independent by the parties concerned and leading to binding awards which should be implemented rapidly and fully; (ii) reviewing the excessive sanctions provided for in Act 43 in order to ensure that they may be applied only in cases where the right to strike may be limited in accordance with the principles of freedom of association and that they are proportionate to the infringement committed; (iii) reviewing the provisions facilitating class actions against an association of employees, as there is no reason, in the Committee's view, to treat such actions differently from other class actions in the Civil Procedures Code.

F. Article 3. Arbitration imposed at the request of one party after 60 days of work stoppage (article 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act) (Manitoba). The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend article 87.1(1) of the Labour Relations Act which allowed a party to a collective dispute to make a unilateral application to the Labour Board so as to initiate the dispute settlement process, where a work stoppage exceeded 60 days. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Manitoba government reiterates its previous position according to which the alternative dispute settlement mechanism set out in the Labour Relations Act is reasonable and justifiable; having an impartial third party settle the dispute will likely result in a fair and reasonable settlement and will bring an end to the hardships that a work stoppage creates.

Notwithstanding the effects of lengthy work stoppages, the Committee recalls that provisions which allow for one of the parties to refer a dispute to compulsory arbitration seriously limit the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members as well as their right to organize their activities and formulate their programmes (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 148 and 153). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures taken or contemplated by the Manitoba government to amend the Labour Relations Act so that an arbitration award may only be imposed in cases of essential services in the strict sense of the term, public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or where both parties agree.

Cape Verde

Very low number of collective agreements. The Committee had noted that the Government has sent copies of two collective agreements (telecommunications and private security) and indicated that collective bargaining must be voluntary and that the Government's role is to promote it without forcing it. The Government added that the Office's technical assistance to strengthen the capacities of the social partners in collective bargaining techniques would contribute to improving the situation. The Government indicates that the social partners are in agreement to request this technical assistance.

The Committee requests again the Government to continue its efforts to promote collective bargaining and hopes that the technical assistance requested by the Government with the agreement of the social partners will be provided in the near future.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Central African Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), on 10 August 2006.

The Committee recalls that, in its observations, the ICFTU criticized compulsory arbitration in the case of disputes not resolved by conciliation, as well as the arrest of a trade union leader and police intervention to prevent the right of assembly. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's reply, under the terms of which: (1) the preliminary draft text of the Labour Code has taken into account the various concerns of the social partners, including those relating to compulsory arbitration in the case of disputes not resolved through conciliation; (2) with regard to the arrest of the trade union leader Noël Ramandan and his detention for one day, the Government states that there is no relation between his trade union activities and the arrest, which was the outcome of a monitoring operation initiated by the Government with a view to combating fraud in public finances; and (3) in relation to the occupation of the labour exchange by the forces of order, which prevented the holding of a trade union meeting, it indicates that this was done with the aim of taking security measures and that the reason for this intervention was to separate political activities from trade union activities. The Committee recalls that the arrest and detention of trade unionists without any charges being laid or court warrants being issued constitutes a serious violation of trade union rights, that freedom of assembly is an essential element of freedom of association and that the authorities should refrain from any interference which would restrict this right or impede its lawful exercise, unless public order is disturbed thereby or imminently endangered.

Furthermore, the Committee recalls that for several years it has been requesting the Government to amend or repeal various legislative provisions relating to restrictions on freedom of association. More specifically, the Committee requested:

- (1) the amendment of sections 1 and 2 of Act No. 88/009 amending the Labour Code, which provide that any person having lost the status of worker cannot either belong to a trade union or participate in its leadership or administration, and that trade union officers must be members of a trade union, with a view to ensuring that qualified persons, such as persons employed by trade unions or retirees, may hold trade union office;
- (2) the amendment of section 11 of Order No. 81/028 respecting the Government's powers of requisition in the event of a strike when so required in the general interest and to restrict powers of requisitioning to cases in which the right to strike may be limited, or even prohibited, that is in the public service in respect of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, in essential services in the strict sense of the term and in a situation of acute national crisis; and
- (3) the repeal of section 4 of Act No. 88/009, which provides that occupational trade unions formed into federations and confederations may join together in a single central national organization. On this point, the Committee notes the Government's indication that occupational trade unions formed into federations and confederations may indeed join together in a single central organization.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the effect that an important process of reforms of the legislation, which will take into account the observations made by the Committee, has been initiated with regard to the preliminary draft of the Labour Code, the review of the general conditions of service of the public service and the revision of Order No. 81/028 and Act No. 88/009. The Committee further notes that the preliminary draft of the reform of the Labour Code has been validated by the social partners. The Committee hopes that the legislative reforms referred to by the Government will be adopted rapidly so as to bring the national legislation into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in its next report on any progress achieved in this respect.

Finally, the Committee notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 28 August 2007 concerning: matters already raised by the Committee, as well as the restrictions on the freedom of association of state officials engaged in positions of responsibility and persons who have lost the status of worker; the obstruction by the police of a meeting convened by the Central African Customs Union (SYNDOUCAF); and the restrictions placed by employers on trade union meetings. The Committee requests the Government to provide its reply to the observations of the ITUC.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It notes with regret that the Government has not replied to its previous comments in which it asked the Government to:

- send its observations on the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) to the effect that wages in the public sector are determined by the Government after consultation with the unions but without any negotiation. The Committee requests the Government to send its reply to these comments;
- take steps to amend the legislation so that negotiations by “professional groupings” are only possible where no trade union exists. The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention promotes collective bargaining between employers' and workers' organizations and requests the Government once again to amend the legislation accordingly.

The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of all measures taken in this regard.

Chad

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It notes the observations of 28 August 2007 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to the situation of unionized workers in an enterprise in the petroleum sector already raised by the Committee in its previous observation. According to the ITUC, the security forces used violence against a protest by members of the Union of Trade Unions of Chad (UST) in the petroleum sector, there were reprisals against these workers (including dismissal of UST representatives), and the UST's status as representative organization was withdrawn. The Committee reminds the Government that the rights of workers' and employers' organizations can be exercised only in a climate free from violence and from any kind of pressure or threat against the leaders and members of such organizations and that governments have a duty to enforce this principle. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on these serious allegations in its next report.

In its earlier comments the Committee has raised the following matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers without distinction whatsoever to establish and join organizations without prior authorization. The Committee noted previously that, according to section 294(3) of the Labour Code, fathers, mothers or guardians may oppose the right to organize of young persons under the age of 16. In its report the Government indicates that section 294(3) should be amended in the course of the complete revision of the Labour Code and its alignment with the Uniform Act of the labour law of the OHADA and in the course of implementing the recommendations adopted following the Summit of the African Union on employment and poverty reduction. The Committee once again expresses the hope that section 294(3) of the Labour Code will shortly be amended to ensure that minors who have access to the labour market, whether as workers or apprentices, can exercise their right to organize without parental authorization. It asks the Government to indicate all progress made in this respect in its next report.

Article 3. Right of workers' and employers' organizations to organize their administration and activities in full freedom. The Committee noted previously that section 307 of the Labour Code continues to provide that the accounts and supporting documents for the financial transactions of trade unions must be submitted without delay to the labour inspector, when so requested. It pointed out that the public authorities' supervision of union finances should be confined to an obligation to submit periodic reports. In its report, the Government indicates that no labour inspectors have supervised the financial management of trade unions and, furthermore, the Director of Labour and Social Security has ordered all labour inspectors and heads of labour offices not to carry out such supervision pending amendment of section 307 of the Labour Code. The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the instructions issued by the Director of Labour and Social Security on supervision of the financial transactions of trade unions, and to indicate in its next report the amendments made to section 307 of the Labour Code.

In previous comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the application in practice of Decree No. 96/PR/MFPT/94 of 29 April 1994 regulating the exercise of the right to strike in the public service. As the Committee points out, this Decree provides for a conciliation and arbitration procedure prior to the calling of a strike, and a compulsory minimum service in certain public services the interruption of which would result in extremely serious disruption of the life of the community. The Committee has pointed out before that the restriction or prohibition of the right to strike should be confined to instances where public servants exercise authority in the name of the State or to essential services in the strict sense of the term, that is services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population, or to acute national crises. Furthermore, in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damage to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in other services which are of public utility. In its report, the Government indicates that the abovementioned Decree prompted such opposition that it has fallen into abeyance. It further indicates that a new draft decree to regulate the exercise of the right to strike in the public service – which will repeal the provisions of Decree No. 96/PR/MFPT/94 of 29 April 1994 – has been drafted and is currently under consideration by the Government. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take immediate measures to repeal or amend Decree No. 96/PR/MFPT/94 in order to ensure full observance of the principles of freedom of association in the exercise of the right to strike in the public service. It also asks the Government in its next report to send the implementing Decree (of 23 June 2003) of Act No. 017/PR/2001 issuing the General Public Service Regulations.

Chile

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments of the National Inter-enterprise Trade Union of Metallurgy, Communications, Energy and Allied Workers (SME), dated 9 January 2006, and of the National Confederation of Municipal Employees of Chile (ASEMUCH), dated 25 May 2006, which refer to matters already raised by the Committee and to other issues covered below.

The Committee recalls that it has been asking the Government for several years to amend or repeal various legislative provisions, or to take steps to ensure that certain workers are afforded the guarantees laid down in the Convention. Specifically, the Committee asked the Government in its previous observation to take steps to:

- repeal section 11 of Act No. 12927 on the internal security of the State, which provides that any interruption or collective suspension, stoppage or strike in public services or services of public utility, or in production, transport or commercial activities which is not in accordance with the law and results in prejudice to the public order or to compulsory legal functions or damage to any vital industries shall constitute an offence and be penalized with imprisonment or banishment;
- ensure that officials of the judiciary are afforded the guarantees set forth in the Convention;
- amend article 23 of the Political Constitution, which provides that the holding of trade union office is incompatible with active membership in a political party and that the law shall lay down sanctions for trade union officials who participate in party political activities;
- amend sections 372 and 373 of the Labour Code, under which an absolute majority of the workers of the enterprise is required for a decision to strike;
- amend section 374 of the Labour Code, under which a strike must be carried out within three days of the decision to call it, otherwise the workers of the enterprise concerned shall be deemed to have refrained from going on strike and so accept the employer's final offer;
- amend section 379 of the Labour Code, which provides that at any time the group of workers concerned by the negotiations may be called upon to vote, by at least 20 per cent of them, for the purpose of taking a decision, by absolute majority, to censure the negotiating committee, in which case a new committee shall be elected forthwith;
- amend section 381 of the Labour Code containing a general prohibition on the replacement of striking workers, but which provides for the possibility of such replacement subject to compliance by the employer with certain conditions in the final offer during the negotiating process. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the amendment introduced by Act No. 19759 limits that possibility, requiring the payment of a bond of four units of account (UF) for each worker hired as a replacement. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the contracting of workers to break a strike in a sector not considered as essential in the strict sense of the term for the purposes of prohibiting strikes, constitutes a serious violation of the freedom of association;
- amend section 384 of the Labour Code which provides that strikes may not be called by workers in enterprises which provide public utility services or services the interruption of which would seriously endanger the health, public supply, the national economy or national security (the third paragraph of section 384 provides that, in such cases, if no agreement is reached between the parties to the bargaining, the matter shall be referred to compulsory arbitration). The Committee noted that the definition of services in which strikes may be prohibited, as set out in section 384, as well as the list drawn up by the government authorities, is too broad and goes beyond services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the list containing the establishments covered by section 384 is drawn up jointly by the Ministries of Labour and Social Security, National Defence and the Economy, Development and Reconstruction in July each year and that the list for 2006 was much shorter than in previous years, with the removal of sanitary services and port enterprises from the list and the extension to them of the right to strike. Nevertheless, the Committee observes that the list includes some private port terminals and also the Arica–La Paz railway, which cannot be considered as essential services in the strict sense of the term;
- amend or repeal section 385 of the Labour Code, which provides that, in the event of a strike which by its nature, timing or duration causes a serious risk to health, the supply of goods or services to the population, the national economy or national security, the President of the Republic may order the resumption of work;
- amend section 254 of the Penal Code, which provides for penal sanctions in the event of the interruption of public services or public utilities or the abandonment of their posts by public employees; and
- amend section 48 of Act No. 19296 which grants broad powers to the Directorate of Labour for supervision of the accounts and financial and property transactions of associations.

The Committee observes that the Government states that it has noted the Committee's observations in this respect and that these will be taken into consideration in forthcoming discussions for bringing the legislation into conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee regrets that, for several years since the ratification of the Convention, numerous restrictions have continued to be placed on the exercise of the rights established by the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on all measures taken in this respect.

Moreover, with regard to the preparation of a draft revision of the Constitutional Organic Act on Municipalities, No. 18695, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort in the accompanying consultation process to take account of the principle whereby the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to officials exercising authority in the name of the State and hopes that the final text will take account of this principle.

Finally, the Committee notes the communication dated 28 August 2007 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refers to the issues raised by the Committee and also to the prohibition of the right to strike imposed on agricultural workers during harvest time. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and its response to the comments of 8 January 2006 by the National Inter-Enterprise Union of Metal, Energy, Communication and Allied Workers (SME), which referred to the following matters:

- Section 82 of the Labour Code which provides that “in no event may the remuneration of apprentices be determined by means of collective agreements or contracts, or arbitration awards issued in the context of collective bargaining”, and section 305(1), which provides that workers governed by an apprenticeship contract and those engaged solely for a specific task or activity, or for a specific period, may not engage in collective bargaining. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the reason for this prohibition is that services are provided on a temporary basis and in any event for a shorter time than the period of validity of a collective instrument (two years). The Government adds that section 314(2) of the Labour Code allows unions of temporary or casual workers to come to agreements with one or more employers on common conditions of work and pay for certain temporary or seasonal tasks or activities. Furthermore, despite the limitation, apprentices' wages are protected within the framework of the statutory definition of “minimum wage”. While noting the Government's statement that it will take account of the SME's comments in future legal discussions, the Committee would again point out that, according to Articles 5 and 6 of the Convention, only the armed forces, the police and public officials engaged in the administration of the State may be excluded from collective bargaining.
- Section 334(b) provides that two or more unions of different enterprises, an inter-enterprise union or a federation or confederation may submit draft collective labour contracts on behalf of their members and the workers who agree to the contracts, but in order to do so it shall be necessary in the enterprise concerned for an absolute majority of the worker members who are entitled to engage in collective bargaining to accord representation to the trade union concerned in an assembly, by secret ballot and in the presence of a public notary. In the Committee's view, these requirements are difficult to meet and do not adequately promote collective bargaining, and should accordingly be abolished or amended.
- Section 334bis, which provides that for employers, bargaining with the inter-enterprise union shall be voluntary or optional and that where an employer refuses, the workers who are members of the inter-enterprise union may submit draft collective contracts in accordance with the general rules set forth in Book IV (on collective bargaining). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the rules on collective bargaining for groups of workers other than the enterprise union are optional for the employer, who chooses whether or not to initiate the bargaining procedure. The employer must notify his decision within ten days of the submission of the draft agreement, otherwise the negotiating process is initiated. While noting the Government's statement that it will take into account the SME's comments in future legal discussions, the Committee considers that these provisions do not, generally speaking, adequately promote collective bargaining with trade union organizations.

The Committee has also, for several years, been commenting on the following matters:

- Section 304 of the Labour Code, which does not allow collective bargaining in state enterprises dependent on the Ministry of National Defence or that are connected to the Government through this Ministry, and in enterprises in which it is prohibited by special laws, or in public or private enterprises or institutions in which the State has financed 50 per cent or more of the budget of either of the last two calendar years, either directly or through duties or taxes. The Committee observes that the Government indicates that it has taken note of these observations and will take them into account in future legal discussions.
- Section 1 of the Labour Code, which provides that the Code does not apply to officials of the National Congress or the judiciary, or to workers in state enterprises or institutions, or those in which the State contributes or in which it participates or is represented, provided that such officials or workers are subject by law to special regulations. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, Act No. 19673 incorporates officials of the National Congress in the regime established for officials of the State Administration (Act No. 19296), which allows them to set up their own associations of public servants. The Committee nonetheless observes that the abovementioned regime does not envisage a right to collective bargaining, and again points out that, except for officials engaged in the administration of the State, workers in the service of the National Congress and the judiciary, like workers in state enterprises or institutions or those to which the State contributes or in which it participates or is represented, should enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

- Sections 314bis and 315 of the Labour Code, which provide that groups of workers, other than unions, may submit draft collective agreements. The Committee notes that the Government gives the legislative origin of these provisions and indicates that under them, a union of an enterprise or establishment may, by reason of its trade union status, bargain collectively, whereas groups of workers who join forces in order to negotiate have to meet quorum and percentage requirements established by law in order to form a union in the enterprise or one of its establishments. Although the legislation authorizes collective bargaining for groups of workers, it also lays down a number of minimum conditions and formalities allowing a presumption that there is a collective will to negotiate on the part of the workers involved. The Government adds that, at present, in many enterprises collective agreements and contracts concluded indifferently by groups of workers or trade unions exist side by side. The Committee points out that direct bargaining between an enterprise and its workers, over and above representative organizations where these exist, may in some cases be to the detriment of the principle that collective bargaining between employers' and workers' organizations is to be encouraged, and that groups of workers should be able to negotiate collective agreements or accords only in the absence of such organizations.
- Section 320 of the Labour Code, which places an obligation on employers to notify to all workers in the enterprise the submission of a draft collective agreement so that they can propose draft texts or agree to the draft submitted. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the purpose of this provision is to allow the greatest possible number of authorized workers to negotiate collectively. The Committee refers the Government to its comment in the previous paragraph.

The Committee notes with regret that, although the Convention was ratified some years ago, there are still numerous restrictions on the exercise of the rights enshrined in the Convention. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to amend the current legislation on all the points mentioned above, in order to allow workers to enjoy fully the safeguards established in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of all measures adopted to this end.

Lastly, the Committee notes the communication of 28 August 2007 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to a number of issues examined by the Committee, and to the dismissal of trade unionists and the pressure exerted to get members to give up union membership and the collective agreement, and threats to workers to get them to sign a collective agreement followed by subsequent pressure for them to conclude individual agreements in one company. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the above.

Hong Kong Special Administrative Region

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (notification: 1997)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government representative to the Conference Committee in June 2004 and the discussion that followed. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee took note of the Government's statement that it was in the process of examining measures to guarantee a better application of the Convention, in particular with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining, and expressed the firm hope that measures would be taken without delay to guarantee the full implementation of the Convention.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to provide further protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee had noted the information provided by the Government to the effect that it had been working on the drafting of an amendment Bill that would empower the Labour Tribunal to make an order of reinstatement/re-engagement in cases of unreasonable and unlawful dismissal without the need to secure the employer's consent – an approach endorsed by the tripartite Labour Advisory Board.

The Committee notes that the Government has been working on a draft amendment bill on this issue but given the complexity of the matter more time is needed. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in the adoption of the bill. Noting that this issue has been under examination since 1999, the Committee hopes that the bill will be adopted as soon as possible.

Article 4. 1. Measures to promote collective bargaining. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to strengthen the collective bargaining framework, pursuant to comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) and the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) and the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1942 with regard to low levels of coverage of collective agreements which are moreover not binding on the employer, as well as the absence of an institutional framework for trade union recognition and collective bargaining.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it subscribes fully to Article 4 of the Convention and is committed to promoting voluntary and direct negotiations between employers and employees or their respective organizations. It also notes the measures described by the Government with a view to the promotion of collective bargaining, including promotion of effective communication at enterprise level, notably through seminars and promotional materials, an informal survey on the mode of labour-management communication, and encouragement of voluntary negotiations, by promoting tripartite dialogue at the industry level through industry-level tripartite committees (in the catering, construction, theatre, logistics, property management, printing, hotel and tourism, cement and concrete as well as retail industries). The Government emphasizes with regard to the tripartite committees that they are not merely advisory bodies. They provide, on the contrary, an effective forum for major employers' and employees' organizations to discuss labour issues of mutual concern and hence facilitate voluntary communication and negotiations between them. During the reporting period, as a further measure to promote voluntary negotiation, special efforts were made by these tripartite committees to focus on industry-specific people management issues. As a result, employers' and employees' organizations in some industries, such as property management and hotel and tourism industries, have agreed on industry-specific good people management guidelines which place specific emphasis on the importance of effective communication between employers and employees. In September 2004, the three tripartite committees on catering, retail and hotel and tourism industries jointly organized a large-scale labour relations seminar for employers and employees of these industries.

The Committee also notes from the Government's report that, although statistics on collective bargaining are not available, collective agreements are quite common in some trades such as printing, construction, public bus and air transport industries as well as ship maintenance and the goods loading and unloading industries. Many of these agreements have benefited from the Labour Department's conciliation services.

The Committee takes note of this information, in particular, the adoption of collective agreements in the abovementioned sectors. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report any further sectors covered by collective agreements, as well as the level of coverage (number of collective agreements and workers covered). Noting, moreover, that effective communication and tripartite dialogue cannot function as a substitute for bipartite negotiations, although they may be useful tools for the promotion of a positive industrial relations climate at the highest level, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on measures adopted or contemplated for the promotion of new bipartite collective agreements through the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations.

2. Measures to promote collective bargaining for civil servants not engaged in the administration of the State. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take all necessary measures so as to guarantee the right of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State to negotiate collectively their conditions and terms of employment.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Government has established within the civil service an elaborate three-tier staff consultation mechanism which operates in compliance with the spirit and principles of Article 4 of the Convention for consultation between management and staff on various issues of concern to civil servants, including terms and conditions of employment of public employees, regardless of whether they are engaged in the administration of the State. The Government will build on this machinery and put in place customized procedures or forums to engage staff representatives in more intensive consultation on the terms and conditions of employment of civil servants, where necessary and appropriate. It is now working closely with staff on the development of an improved civil service pay adjustment mechanism to underpin the established policy of maintaining civil service pay at a level broadly comparable to that of the private sector. To this end, in April 2003, the Government set up a consultative group which already functions as a regular forum for intensive discussions with the participation of the staff sides of the four central consultative councils and the four major service-wide staff unions.

Taking due note of this information, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measures discussed or adopted as a result of the work of the consultative group on an improved civil service pay adjustment mechanism. Moreover, noting once again that public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State have the right to negotiate collectively their conditions and terms of employment, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate, in its next report, any measures taken with a view to extending the right to collective bargaining to this category of civil servants. The Committee finally requests the Government to provide further information on the various activities covered by the civil service with a view to determining those categories of civil servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Colombia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also notes the communication addressed by the Ministry of Social Welfare to the Director-General of the ILO which was read out in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in 2007. In it, the Ministry reaffirms its commitment to the Tripartite Agreement on Freedom of Association and Democracy, signed by the Government and representatives of the employers and workers in Geneva on 1 June 2006, and expresses its resolve to further the implementation of the Agreement. The Government also notes the Director-General's reply, indicating that the Office will provide all possible assistance for effective implementation of the measures announced and proposing that a high-level mission, appointed by himself, should be sent by the International Labour Office to identify new needs with a view to ensuring effective application of the Tripartite Agreement and the technical cooperation programme. The Committee further notes the numerous cases concerning Colombia currently before the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted on 28 August 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and those from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the General Confederation of Labour (CGT), the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Confederation of Pensioners of Colombia (CPC) in a communication of 28 May 2007, and those of 31 August 2007 from the CUT which refer to matters the Committee has been raising, particularly acts of violence against trade union leaders and trade unionists including killings, abductions, attempts on their lives and disappearances. They likewise refer to the serious impunity surrounding these acts; the use of associated work cooperatives so that workers are unable to form and join unions; the arbitrary refusal to register new trade union organizations or new statutes or executive boards of unions; and the prohibition on strikes and certain services other than essential services.

Situation of violence and impunity

Regarding the acts of violence against trade union members and leaders, the ITUC states that most of such acts are associated with industrial disputes. It again observes that paramilitary groups view the trade union movement as sympathetic to guerrillas and the extreme left and that this makes it very vulnerable. According to the ITUC, the efforts made by the Government to ensure the security of trade union leaders are insufficient. In 2006, 78 murders were reported, the education sector being the most affected, with a total of 49 murders. The ITUC also refers to numerous threats and attacks. The Colombian central organizations, for their part, refer to systematic anti-union violence, alleging the involvement of several state institutions that have links with paramilitary groups and drug traffickers responsible for the murders of several well-known trade union leaders. They further state that in most cases, responsibility for the killings can be attributed to paramilitary groups. According to the ITUC, although to a lesser extent, the guerrillas have also participated significantly in acts of violence against trade unionists.

The Committee notes that in responding, the Government refers to the protective measures adopted under the protection programme set up in 1997. It adds that the programme's budget has been consistently increased, and provides a detailed list of the number of protection measures authorized, pointing out that at present, 25.25 per cent of such protection goes exclusively to the trade union movement in the form of reinforcement of their headquarters, escorts, armoured cars and bulletproof vests, among other protective measures. Furthermore, a policy for the protection and security of democracy has been devised to provide effective protection for the rights of Colombians which is being implemented in coordination with all government bodies, with the result that the number of homicides has dropped, including the killings of trade unionists. In view of the fact that education is the sector most affected by the murders, the Government states that in cooperation with the Colombian Federation of Educators (FECODE), a national working party on teachers under threat has been set up in which the Ministry of Social Welfare, the Ministry of National Education, the Ministry of the Interior and Justice, the national police and the Presidential Human Rights Programme participate. Under the latter programme, numerous teachers have been relocated. The Government states that there were 18 murders in 2007, and reiterates its resolve to reduce this figure to zero.

The Committee notes with concern that members of trade unions continue to be the target of serious acts of violence because of their union membership. The Committee notes that the Government made significant efforts to ensure protection for trade union members and leaders and for trade union headquarters. It nonetheless observes that the number of persons being protected has declined and considers that the protection effort needs to be strengthened. Consequently, it points out once again that a truly free and independent trade union movement can develop only in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 26) and that employers' and workers' organizations can carry on their activities freely and meaningfully only in a climate free from violence. Accordingly, the Committee again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure the right to life and security of trade union leaders and members so that they may fully exercise the rights guaranteed by the Convention. With regard to protective measures in particular, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to provide for all trade unionists who so request, measures for their protection which are adequate and which command their trust.

As to the measures against impunity, the Colombian central unions acknowledge the efforts of the Attorney-General to secure progress in the investigation of serious human rights violations against trade unionists, though they emphasize that only a minute percentage of investigations reach the trial or sentencing stage.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that in the context of the commitment made under the Tripartite Agreement, on 15 September 2006 the Government and the Attorney-General signed Inter-administrative Agreement No. 15406 to further the investigation of violations of the human rights of trade unions, the aims of which are: (1) to devise strategies to clarify the facts; (2) to identify and punish the perpetrators and accomplices; (3) to prevent offences that abuse the human rights of trade unions by adopting the necessary institutional, national and local plans and programmes. To this end, the Attorney-General has appointed 13 public prosecutors, with a group of criminal police investigators and a technical investigation unit comprising 78 persons, plus 24 lawyers to back up the investigations. The investigations are devoted in particular to the murders reported in the context of Case No. 1787, currently before the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Government adds that the Higher Council of the Judiciary appointed three dedicated judges to hear cases referred by the Attorney-General. The Government has sent a long list of investigations (48) that ended with the conviction of the perpetrators of acts of violence against trade union leaders. The sentences were pronounced between June 2002 and the beginning of 2007.

While observing that since 2002 the number of sentences imposed continues to be quite modest, the Committee notes the efforts made by the Government, and acknowledged by the trade union organizations, to further the investigation of abuses of the human rights of trade unionists. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to continue to take the measures within its reach to secure progress in investigations into acts of violence against the trade union movement. It expresses the firm hope that the measures adopted recently in connection with the appointment of new prosecutors and judges will lead to an improvement in combating the impunity situation and shed light on the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, and enable the perpetrators to be captured.

In previous comments the Committee asked the Government to keep it informed of the manner in which Act No. 975 on Justice and Peace is applied, particularly in cases involving trade union leaders and members. The Committee notes in this connection that the Constitutional Court reached a decision on the challenges to the Act: it declared the Act enforceable but ruled that some of its provisions were unconstitutional and unenforceable. Observing that the Government has not sent the information requested, the Committee repeats its request.

Practical and legislative matters pending

The Committee has been commenting, in some instances for many years, on the following matters:

- various types of contractual arrangements, such as associated work cooperatives and service, civil or commercial contacts which are a cover for actual employment relationships and are used to carry out functions and work that are within the normal activities of the establishment, and under which workers may not form or join trade unions. The Committee notes the Government's response to the effect that: (a) Decree No. 4588 of 2006 has been issued and provides that cooperatives may not be used as a means of labour intermediation and that where they are used improperly, simulating activities of temporary service enterprises, this denies workers the guarantees of the Labour Code, and that Circular No. 0036 of 2007 determines the scope of the abovementioned Decree; (b) the Supervisory Authority for Economic Solidarity investigates and sanctions any departure from the social purpose of associated work cooperatives, while the Ministry of Social Welfare determines when there shall be labour intermediation and when there is non-compliance with comprehensive social security standards; and (c) the Special Unit for the Inspection, Monitoring and Control of Labour carried out 1,067 visits to associated work cooperatives, and 961 investigations were opened as a result of which penalties were imposed on 118 associated work cooperatives found to have been misused for the purpose of labour intermediation. The Committee points out that Article 2 of the Convention provides that workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization. The Committee reiterates that when workers in cooperatives or those covered by other types of civil or commercial contracts have to perform work within the normal activities of the establishment in the context of a relationship of subordination, they should be treated as employees in a real employment relationship and should therefore enjoy the right to join trade unions. Consequently, the Committee once again asks the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that full effect is given to Article 2 of the Convention so that all workers without distinction whatsoever enjoy the right to establish and join organizations.
- The arbitrary refusal to register new trade union organizations, new trade union rules or the executive committee of a trade union at the discretion of the authorities for reasons that go beyond the express provision of the legislation. The Committee notes the Government's statement that a resolution has been issued (No. 1651 of 2007) amending sections 2, 3 and 5 of resolution No. 1875 of 2002 in order to speed up the procedure for entering trade union organizations in the register. The Committee observes that one of the grounds for denying registration set out in Decree No. 1651 of 2007 is "that the trade union organization has been established not to guarantee the fundamental right of association but to secure labour stability". The Committee reminds the Government that Article 2 of the Convention, guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations "without previous authorization" from the public authorities and that regulations governing the constitution of organizations are not in themselves incompatible with the provisions of the Convention provided that they are not equivalent to a requirement for previous authorization and do not constitute such an obstacle that they amount in practice to a prohibition (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 68 and 69). The Committee further considers that the administrative authority should not be able to deny registration of an organization merely because it considers that it might devote itself to activities that go beyond normal trade union activities or that it might not be able to fulfil its functions. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend this provision of Decree No. 1651 of 2007 and to make sure that the administrative authority does not have discretionary powers that are inconsistent with Article 2 of the Convention and that it registers new organizations or executive committees, as well as amendments to rules, without undue delay.
- The prohibition on the calling of strikes by federations and confederations (section 417(i) of the Labour Code). The Committee repeats once again that higher-level organizations ought to be able to resort to strikes in the event of disagreement with the Government's economic and social policy. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to amend section 417(i) of the Labour Code.
- The prohibition of strikes, not only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, but also in a very broad range of services which are not necessarily essential (section 430(b) as it pertains to transport, (d), (f), (g) and (h); section 450(1)(a) of the Labour Code and Decrees Nos 414 and 437 of 1952; 1543 of 1955; 1593 of 1959; 1167 of 1963; 57 and 534 of 1967) and the possibility to dismiss trade union leaders who have intervened or participated in an unlawful strike (section 450(2) of the Labour Code), even when the unlawful nature of the strike is a result of requirements that are contrary to the principles of association. The Committee notes that the Government acknowledges that section 430 is not consistent with the provisions of the Convention and states that the Ministry has seldom declared strikes to be unlawful and that such decisions are reviewed by the State Council. Moreover, the Committee notes with interest that the Government has transmitted a copy of a draft law submitted to Congress, providing that the illegality of a suspension or of a collective agreement will be decided by a labour court judge. Mindful that the Government acknowledges the need to amend some of these provisions and that it had presented a draft law to Congress providing for several amendments to the Labour Code, the Committee asks it to take the necessary steps to avail itself of the fact of the draft law's presentation to Congress to amend all the legal provisions on which it has commented, and invites it to seek technical assistance from the Office.

- The authority of the Minister of Labour to refer a dispute to arbitration when a strike exceeds a certain period – 60 days – (section 448(4) of the Labour Code). The Committee takes due note of the Government's indications of the submission to Congress of a draft law that amends this section, providing that the parties may agree to a conciliation mechanism or arbitration to resolve their dispute, as well as the fact of the intervention of the subcommittee of the committee of consultation on wage policy and labour. However, the Committee notes that the draft law provides that if a definitive solution cannot be found, both or one of the parties may petition the Ministry of Social Welfare to convene an arbitration tribunal. The Committee reiterates that compulsory arbitration to end a strike, except when at the request of both parties, is acceptable only in instances where the strike may be restricted, or even prohibited, i.e. in disputes in the public service involving public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term, namely services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend this principle in keeping with the principle noted above.

Observing that it has been making comments for many years, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps without delay to amend the legislative provisions so as to align them with the Convention. The Committee further hopes that the high-level mission undertaken in November 2007 will be useful in assisting the Government in its efforts to comply with the Convention. It requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

The Committee is addressing a request on other matters directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee also notes the communication from the Minister for Social Security addressed to the Director-General which was read in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, reaffirming the Government's commitment to the Tripartite Agreement for the Right of Association and Democracy, signed by the Government and the employers' and workers' representatives on 1 June 2006 in Geneva, and expressing the wish to reinforce its implementation. The Committee also notes the reply sent by the Director-General indicating that the Office will provide all possible assistance to ensure the effective application of the stated measures. In this respect, it was proposed to send an ILO high-level mission, appointed by the Director-General, in order to identify new needs in relation to ensuring the effective application of the Tripartite Agreement and of the technical cooperation programme. The Committee also notes the numerous cases concerning Colombia which are being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

Moreover, the Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, and also the comments from the Single Confederation of Workers (CUT), the General Confederation of Workers (CGT), the Confederation of Workers of Colombia (CTC) and the Confederation of Pensioners of Colombia (CPC), dated 28 May 2007, and of the CUT, dated 31 August 2007, referring to issues which have been under examination by the Committee.

Pending issues

- Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee recalls that for many years it has been referring to the need to give effective recognition to the right to collective bargaining of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, under Act No. 411, public employees have the right to submit respectful claims to their respective entities and the latter must reply to the said claims, as guaranteed by article 23 of the Constitution. According to the Government, by virtue of this procedure, a significant number of agreements on conditions of work have been achieved. However, the Committee emphasizes that, under the provisions of Convention No. 98, public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State shall enjoy the right to collective bargaining. In this respect, the Committee notes Constitutional Court ruling C-1234/05 of 29 November 2005, which declared as enforceable the expression "trade unions of public employees may not submit claims or conclude collective agreements” contained in section 416 of the Substantive Labour Code, provided that, in order to implement the right to collective bargaining established in article 55 of the Political Constitution, and in conformity with ILO Conventions Nos 151 and 154, trade unions of public employees may have recourse to other means of concertation regarding conditions of work, on the basis of the claim made in this respect by these trade unions, pending the regulation of the procedure for this purpose by the Congress of the Republic. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary steps, in conformity with the ruling of the Constitutional Court, to take legislative measures to ensure the right to collective bargaining of public employees and in the meantime, to promote means of concertation regarding conditions of work. The Committee requests the Government to supply information in its next report on all measures adopted in this respect, in the hope that it will be able to note tangible progress in the near future, and reminds it that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

- Collective accords with non-unionized workers. The Committee recalls that in its previous observation it referred to the need to ensure that collective accords are not used to undermine the position of trade union organizations and ensure the possibility in practice to conclude collective agreements with them, and asked the Government to provide information on the total number of collective agreements and collective accords and the respective number of workers covered by them. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that in conformity with Colombian legislation: (a) collective accords and collective agreements can coexist; (b) collective accords may not exceed the benefits laid down in the collective agreements of the same enterprise; and (c) even where a collective accord exists, an employer is obliged to negotiate with the trade union and, in the absence of any agreement, the union is entitled to take the collective dispute to a court of arbitration. The Government points out that the Ministry of Social Security has participated in consultation processes and concluded a satisfactory agreement on various occasions, in the form of either a collective agreement or a collective accord. The Committee observes that, under section 481 ff. of the Substantive Labour Code, collective accords may only be concluded in cases where the membership of the trade union does not include over one third of the workers and refers once again to Article 4 of the Convention respecting the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation with workers’ organizations with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements. The Committee emphasizes that direct negotiations with workers should only be possible in the absence of trade union organizations. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to guarantee that collective accords are not used to undermine the position of trade union organizations and the possibility in practice of concluding collective agreements with them. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the total number of collective agreements and collective accords, and on the respective number of workers covered by them.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government’s statement that, in the context of the Standing Advisory Committee on Wage Policies, the Special Committee on the Settlement of Disputes relating to the ILO was reactivated, with a view to handling disputes arising from matters regulated by the ILO Conventions, and giving priority to those relating to freedom of association.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report.

In its previous comments, the Committee expressed its concern at the state of collective bargaining in the country and pointed out the importance of taking steps to encourage voluntary negotiation between employers and organizations of workers.

The Committee takes note of the Government’s reply. The Government states that since its last report, there has been no noteworthy progress on collective negotiation between employers and workers. Two draft collective agreements, one on pharmacies and the other on the bread, pastry-making and allied industries have not as yet been concluded.

The Committee notes with regret that these two draft agreements have not progressed. It notes that the Government has expressed the wish to receive technical assistance from the ILO, and expresses the firm hope that following such assistance, it will be able to note that significant progress has been made in the number of collective agreements and accords concluded in the country. Meanwhile, it requests the Government to take every measure it can to promote collective bargaining in both the public and the private sectors. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this regard.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It is therefore bound once again to reiterate its earlier observation, which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to amend the legislation on the minimum service organized by the employer to be maintained in the public service that is indispensable for safeguarding the general interest (section 248-15 of the Labour Code), in order to limit the minimum service to operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population, within the framework of a negotiated minimum service. In this respect, the Committee noted that, according to the Government, section 248-15 had been amended, but that it was not able to provide a copy of the text amending the provisions of this section. The Committee recalls that, since the definition of a minimum service restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowerment to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). The Committee expresses the hope that the text amending section 248-15 of the Labour Code takes these principles into account and requests the Government to send it a copy of the text as soon as possible.

Finally, the Committee requested the Government to keep it informed of developments in the revision of the Labour Code in its next report and to send it a copy of any draft amendment to that Code in order to ensure its conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the revision process had been completed and that the draft text had been submitted to the National Labour Advisory Commission for its opinion. The Committee requests the Government to send it a copy of the draft revised Labour Code and to continue to keep it informed in this regard

The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not sent its comments on the observations of 10 August 2006 of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) concerning the eight trade union representatives arrested on 27 October 2005 and remanded for 24 hours. It again asks the Government to send its comments on this matter.

Costa Rica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the observations made by the Public and Private Enterprise Workers' Union (SITEPP) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 21 May and 28 August 2007, on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the report of the high-level technical assistance mission which visited San José from 2 to 6 October 2006 in the context of Convention No. 98.

1. Prohibition upon foreigners from holding office or exercising authority in trade unions (article 60, second paragraph, of the Constitution and section 345(e) of the Labour Code). The Committee noted previously that Bill No. 13475 (currently on the agenda of the Legislative Assembly) amends section 345(e) of the Labour Code so that it no longer provides that the members of the executive board of a trade union must be of Costa Rican nationality or of Central American origin, or foreign nationals married to a Costa Rican wife and having completed five years of permanent residence in the country. Nevertheless, the Bill provides that the bodies of trade unions must comply with the provisions of article 60 of the Constitution, which provide that "foreigners are barred from positions of management or authority in trade unions". The Committee noted previously that a draft reform of the Constitution, prepared with the assistance of the ILO, had been submitted to the Plenary of the Legislative Assembly in 1998, but it appears not to be on the current agenda of the Legislative Assembly. The Committee drew the Government's attention to the importance of amending not only section 345 of the Labour Code, but also article 60, second paragraph, of the Constitution in order to abolish the excessive restrictions that are currently placed on the right of foreign nationals to hold trade union office, which are inconsistent with Article 3 of the Convention.

2. Obligation for the trade union assembly to appoint the executive board each year (section 346(a) of the Labour Code). The Committee noted previously that Bill No. 13475 no longer establishes a requirement for the executive board to be appointed each year.

3. Restrictions on the right to strike: (i) requirement of "60 per cent of the persons who work in the enterprise, workplace or establishment concerned" – section 373(c) of the Labour Code; and (ii) prohibition of the right to strike for "workers engaged in rail, maritime and air transport enterprises" and "workers engaged in loading and unloading on docks and quays" – section 373(c) of the Labour Code.

The Committee previously noted with interest that, according to the Government, on 25 August 2005 the Judiciary referred to the Executive for submission to the Legislative Assembly a Bill on the reform of labour procedures, which benefited from ILO technical assistance. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, the above Bill takes into account the ruling of 27 February 1998 by the Constitutional Chamber and the recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association, and has been endorsed by the trade union organizations and employers' associations, except with regard to certain provisions. The Committee observed that the Bill:

- proposes 40 per cent of workers in order to call a strike (the employers' associations rejected this percentage, citing the principle of democratic participation);
- the right to strike is restricted only in essential services in the strict sense of the term, although these include the loading and unloading of perishable goods in ports; transport is considered to be an essential service only as long as the journey has not been completed;
- strikes may no longer be deemed unlawful before they have occurred;
- arbitration is introduced for disputes in essential services;
- a special and very short summary procedure is introduced for workers with trade union immunity.

Moreover, in a direct request, the Committee observed that the Bill establishes a requirement for 40 per cent of the workers in order to call a strike and subjects strikes to a limit of 45 calendar days (after which arbitration is compulsory).

Furthermore, with regard to the right to strike, the Committee noted previously that a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice had indicated that of the 600 or so strikes that had occurred over the past 20 or 30 years, no more than ten had been declared lawful. Furthermore, according to the trade union federations, the procedure to set a strike in motion could last up to three years.

Need for Bill No. 13475, in amending section 344 of the Labour Code, to establish a specific and short period within which the administrative authority is to reach a decision on the registration of trade unions and after which, in the absence of a decision, legal personality is deemed to have been obtained. The Committee notes the Government's indication that in practice registration applications are processed without delay and, if they fall short of documentary requirements, applicants are asked to remedy the matter and are entitled to appeal. The Department of Trade Union Organizations has 15 days within which to respond and, if it issues a favourable report within that period, the Ministry of Labour issues its decision as soon as possible thereafter and in any event within one month of the report being issued. The Committee requested the Government to have these deadlines established explicitly in Bill No. 13475.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government: (1) expresses its complete readiness and will to resolve the problems referred to and reiterates the statements made in its report in 2005; (2) has supported in the Legislative Assembly a draft reform of the Constitution formulated with the technical assistance of the ILO to overcome the prohibition on foreign nationals from having access to trade union office, and forwarded the comments of the Committee of Experts to the President of the Legislative Assembly; (3) in practice, the Ministry of Labour guarantees the full autonomy of trade union organizations to determine the duration of the mandate of trade union executive boards and the amendment of the legislation on this point is contained in Bill No. 13475; (4) with regard to the restrictions on the right to strike, the Bill to reform labour procedures (No. 15990) is undergoing the legislative process and the Government has convened a forum, with ILO assistance and with the participation of the authorities and the social partners, with a view to achieving consensus; Plenary Accord (Supreme Court of Justice) No. 16-2000 determines the judicial body competent as the depository of strike notifications, and the time scale and appeal procedures (very rapid) to which such a procedure is subject; and (5) with regard to the need to establish a specific and short period of time for the administration to issue an opinion on the registration of trade unions, in practice this problem has been resolved (decisions relating to administrative appeal procedures have to be notified within 15 days); nevertheless, a copy of the Committee's comment has been forwarded to the President of the Legislative Commission which is responsible for the analysis of Bill No. 13475.

The Committee notes the initiatives taken by the high-level mission with a view to expediting the draft texts submitted to the Legislative Assembly on the matters raised by the Committee of Experts in the context of Convention No. 98. It notes with interest that, when attending a special session of the Higher Labour Council (a dialogue body composed of some of the most important representatives of trade unions and employers, and the Minister of Labour), the mission consulted its members on whether they would be prepared to conclude an agreement to facilitate the adoption of the Bill to reform labour procedure, call for the establishment of a joint commission in the National Assembly to agree on aspects of this Bill on which divergencies persist and subsequently consider facilitating other legislative texts also related to matters falling within the terms of reference of the mission. This agreement was concluded as follows: it was agreed unanimously to call on the Legislative Assembly to establish a joint commission with the technical assistance of the ILO to examine the Bill to reform labour procedure. It was also resolved that the Council would examine the other draft texts pending on labour matters with a view to studying them and facilitating their passage to the extent to which consensus was achieved. The Minister proposed that the request to the Assembly should be formulated in a joint note by the Executive, the Judiciary and the Higher Labour Council. The Minister undertook to seek the rapid examination of the Bill to reform labour procedure, the establishment of the joint commission and, finally, the agreement of the President of the Republic to receive the members of the Higher Labour Council.

The Committee hopes that the above joint commission in the National Assembly will be established without delay and will address all the pending matters. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government has requested the technical assistance of the ILO to ascertain the conformity of the Bill to reform labour procedure (No. 15990) with the principles of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 and hopes that such assistance will be provided as soon as possible.

The Committee notes that the SITEPP indicates that the unionization rate in the country is only 2.5 per cent in the private sector and that the commitments made to the ILO over many years relating to the draft legislation submitted to the Legislative Assembly have only been vain promises. The SITEPP refers in particular to matters relating to the application of Convention No. 98. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations made by the ITUC relating to the application of the Convention, and recalls that the legislative issues referred to concern a series of issues relating to the application of the Convention in practice. The Committee emphasizes that certain of these comments refer to acts of violence against trade union premises and death threats against a trade union leader and it requests the Government to order the appropriate investigations and to keep it informed in this respect.

The Committee emphasizes once again that the matters pending raise important issues relating to the application of the Convention. Taking into account the various ILO missions that have visited the country over the years and the gravity of the problems, it hopes to be in a position to note substantial progress in the near future in both law and practice. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the report and other communications from the Government and the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006 on the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the comments on the application of the Convention made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the Union of Public and Private Enterprise Employees (SITEPP), which relate mainly to issues that are already under examination. The Committee noted in its previous observation the report of the High-level Mission which visited the country from 2 to 6 October 2006. The Committee further notes Cases Nos 2490 and 2518 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association at its November 2007 meeting, which confirm a high number of dismissals of trade unionists, as well as the new rulings of the Supreme Court which find that certain clauses of collective agreements in public sector institutions or enterprises are unconstitutional.

The Committee recalls that the problems relating to the application of the Convention which it raised in its previous observation were as follows:

- the slowness and ineffectiveness of recourse procedures and compensation in the event of anti-union acts (according to the High-level Mission, the slowness of procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination results in a period of not less than four years to obtain a final ruling);
- restrictions on the right to collective bargaining in the public sector as a result of various rulings by the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court; according to the SITEPP, the judiciary has maintained the stance that there is no right to collective bargaining in the public sector in a collective dispute against the Ministry of Education; however, the Government has emphasized in its communications that the very fact that the judiciary has found to be unconstitutional certain clauses of collective agreements in the public sector shows that the right to collective bargaining is recognized;
- the subjection of collective bargaining in the public sector to criteria of proportionality and rationality in accordance with the case law of the Constitutional Chamber, which has declared unconstitutional a considerable number of clauses of collective agreements in the public sector at the instigation of the public authorities (the Ombudsperson, the Office of the Public Prosecutor) or of a political party;
- the enormous imbalance in the private sector between the number of collective agreements concluded with trade unions (much lower) and the number of direct agreements concluded with non-unionized workers (the Committee previously called for an independent investigation into this matter).

The Committee notes that the Government refers to the statements made in its previous report to the effect that: (1) the Government possesses the will and commitment to resolve the problems raised by the Committee of Experts; (2) it has requested the ILO's technical assistance and trusts that this will enable it to overcome the problems raised; (3) the Government's efforts (many of them supported by tripartite agreement) relating to these problems have included the submission of several legislative proposals to the Legislative Assembly and their reactivation: a draft constitutional amendment to article 192, a Bill on collective bargaining in the public sector, and the addition of subsection 5 to section 112 of the General Act on Public Administration (the three initiatives are intended to strengthen collective bargaining in the public sector); a draft amendment to the chapter of the Labour Code on freedom of association; approval of ILO Conventions Nos 151 and 154; draft texts to revise various sections of the Labour Code, Act No. 2 of 26 August 1943, and sections 10, 15, 16, 17 and 18 of Legislative Decree No. 832 of 4 November 1949 and its amendments; an Act to reform labour procedures (aimed at the elimination of delays and introducing the principle of hearings, and the establishment of summary procedures for cases of anti-union discrimination); (4) the Government's efforts have also included other types of initiatives, such as the intervention of third parties to defend collective agreements (coadyuvancia) in legal actions of unconstitutionality brought in order to annul specific clauses in the agreements; and the reinforcement of alternative dispute settlement procedures through the Centre for Alternative Settlement of the Ministry of Labour, which increased the number of persons dealt with in 2005 to 3,329. The Government indicated that in 2005 complaints against anti-union discrimination related to 38 cases.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that the unionization rate rose from 4.2 per cent in 2005 to 4.6 per cent in 2006 in the private sector, while the rate is 9.3 per cent in the public sector. There are currently 244 active trade union organizations, made up of 228 unions, 11 federations and five confederations. With regard to the Committee's concern at the persistence of significant problems in relation to the application of the Convention, the Government states that it does not share this concern, since many of the complaints presented to the Committee on Freedom of Association and the High-level Mission which visited the country in October 2006 are unknown to the Government, are unfounded or have been resolved through conciliation. The Committee notes that the Government understands its concern at the lack of political will by previous governments to push forward draft legislation to resolve pending problems. The current Government has the will to do so and has maintained contact with the Executive, including the Ministry of the Presidency, and the Legislative, including deputies from various parties, as well as the leaders of the principal opposition party which also supports the reforms sought by the ILO, for the reactivation of the draft texts in question. The Government states that it has sent reports to the judiciary forwarding the observations and positions of the Committee of Experts. The Government lays emphasis on the follow-up meetings held by the Minister of Labour and Social Security, on occasions with the technical assistance of the ILO Subregional Office, with this assistance including the gathering of information on matters relating to Conventions Nos 151 and 154 on collective bargaining. The Government adds that it held a meeting with numerous representatives of all the sectors involved (the authorities, civil society, etc.) to analyse and seek consensus for the draft legislation to reform labour procedures which is awaiting the opinion of the Legal Affairs Commission of the Legislative Assembly.

The Committee further notes that the Government formally requested the technical assistance of the ILO Subregional Office in July 2007 in the context of the follow-up to the recommendations of the High-level Mission. In accordance with the proposal of the Mission, the advice of the Subregional Office is focused on promoting an internal and continuous process of training, promotional and information activities for political officials and the social partners to improve understanding of bargaining, disputes and legislative provisions, as well as the higher values involved. During the fourth quarter of 2007, it is planned to hold a seminar on technical issues and to exchange experiences with a view to promoting social dialogue in a tripartite context, with a view to benefiting from international cooperation in seeking solutions to problems relating to the application of the Convention. As a result of all of the measures described, the Government hopes that solutions will be found to the pending problems. The Committee notes the emphasis placed by the Government on the fact that some of those problems broadly coincide with the recommendations for Costa Rica contained in the White Paper formulated by the Central American Deputy Ministers of Labour, which includes voluntary undertakings. A plan has also been developed for the implementation of the recommendations with the participation of the judiciary covering the period 2007–09, on which an evaluation is to be carried out every six months.

With regard to the problem of collective bargaining in the private sector, in view of the existence of more direct agreements than collective agreements, in relation to which the Committee requested an independent investigation, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the administrative instruction of 4 May 1991 requires the labour inspectorate to ascertain that there is no union recognized for bargaining in the enterprise concerned before a direct agreement with non-unionized workers is deposited. Nevertheless, the Government adds that in August 2006 a total of 67 collective agreements were in force in the public sector and 13 in the private sector, while the number of direct agreements was 69.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that it gave its consent for an independent technical expert designated by the ILO to investigate the issue and is grateful that the Government gave the expert every facility. In the view of the High-level Mission of 2006, only a convincing and shared assessment of the phenomenon will make it possible to formulate public policies, in terms of legislation, promotion and information, designed to overcome the negative implications. The Government collaborated with all the assistance and logistical and technical support required by the expert, including the planning of the meetings requested. The Committee appreciates that, as indicated in the study of the independent expert, all those interviewed gave their kind support.

The Committee notes that, according to the study carried out by the independent expert, "according to the statistics provided by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security, there are now in force 74 direct agreements, while only 13 collective agreements remain in force"; "it is also an established fact, as well as being clear and evident, that it is the latter (employers) who propose, defend and claim them and who, in particular, take the initiative for their conclusion". The study also refers to the phenomenon of intervention by employers in the election of standing committees, including the imposition of candidates, public disqualification or vetoes, etc.; ballots are not secret and electors can be intimidated. According to the mission report, "although it is not correct to say that in all cases the election of the members of standing committees is a result of processes that are fixed and not authentic, which would not be in line with the truth, it can be said that the very conception of standing committees and the practices universally adopted for their establishment clearly lack the elementary guarantees of democratic authenticity ..., and the indispensable conditions of independence and representativeness are not present". The expert's report indicates that standing committees lack resources and the capacity to maintain a dialogue with employers that ensures a certain balance in negotiations. In general, the expert's study shows that standing committees have been used to prevent the establishment of trade union organizations or to impede their activities.

The Committee notes these conclusions with concern and draws the Government's attention to the importance of these matters being submitted for tripartite examination so as to remedy the existing imbalance between the number of collective agreements and of direct agreements with non-unionized workers and so as to facilitate the formulation of the legal and other means necessary to prevent standing committees and direct agreements from having an anti-union impact in practice, and also from being established where there is already a trade union organization. The Committee recalls once again that, under the terms of Article 2 of the Convention, the State is under the obligation to guarantee adequate protection against any acts of interference by employers in workers' organizations, and that Article 4 of the Convention enshrines the principle of the promotion of collective bargaining between workers' organizations and employers' organizations.

The Committee continues to consider that the situation of trade union rights remains delicate. The Committee welcomes the desire shown by the current Government to push forward draft legislation, in many cases with tripartite support, with a view to complying with the Convention and giving effect to the Committee's comments. The Committee hopes that the various draft texts that are currently under examination will be adopted in the very near future and that they will be fully in conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect and hopes that an improvement in the application of the rights and guarantees set forth in the Convention will be the outcome of this political will.

[The Government is asked to reply in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

Côte d'Ivoire

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report containing its reply to the observations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006 concerning acts of repression of workers and in particular on the occasion of the demonstration of public employees organized by the National Union of Public Finance Workers (SINAFIG) on 27 September 2005, which was alleged to have been brutally repressed by the police, a number of officials having been injured on that occasion.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that the public employees taking part in the demonstration were illegally occupying a public thoroughfare. The demonstration, which did not observe the relevant procedures, was dispersed by the police (not by armed bands) since it was causing a public disturbance and restricting freedom of movement and the freedom of other workers to reach their workplaces.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that the right to organize public meetings or demonstrations in support of social and economic demands, constitutes an important aspect of trade union rights. Nevertheless, organizations must observe the general provisions relating to public meetings, which are applicable to everyone. The prohibition of demonstrations or processions on public streets, when it is feared that disturbances might occur, does not necessarily constitute an infringement of trade union rights, but the authorities should strive to reach agreement with the organizers of meetings to enable them to be held in some other place or under agreed upon conditions so as to minimize the likelihood of disturbances. While reasonable restrictions are acceptable, they should not result in breaches of fundamental civil liberties (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 37). The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of these principles.

Finally, the Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, concerning the occupation of the headquarters of the National Union of Secondary School Teachers (SYNESCI) by the government authorities, recruitment of a militia by the maritime police to intimidate strikers and threats of penalties against primary-school teachers on strike. The Committee asks the Government to send its reply to the observations of the ITUC.

The Committee notes the Government's report, in which it replies to the comments from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006 alleging the arbitrary application of collective agreements and the anti-union dismissals of three activists and the General Secretary of the National Union of Employees of SODEFOR (SYNACOS).

The Committee notes that the Government denies these allegations and sends numerous documents to support its point of view. The Government explains that conciliation was attempted through the labour inspector but failed, that the dismissal of the General Secretary of the union was authorized by the labour inspector and that the origin of the dismissal of the four persons was not the exercise of their trade union rights but the defamation of the enterprise management for two years preceding their dismissal. The Committee notes that the dismissed workers took the matter to court and that no decision has yet been issued. The Committee requests the Government to notify it of any court decision issued and send any information in this respect.

Finally, the Committee notes the latest comments dated 28 August 2007 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) claiming that the Government interfered in the affairs of the National Union of Secondary School Teachers (SYNESCI) by challenging the legitimacy of its leader and occupying its premises. The Committee requests the Government to send it its reply to the comments made by the ITUC.

Croatia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee recalls that it had previously requested the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), dated 10 August 2006, referring to issues of the distribution of trade union assets and to obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights by organizations in the commercial sector. The Committee notes the Government's statement that, for the division of trade union assets to be addressed, it is first necessary to establish the exact criteria for determining the representativeness of trade unions. The criteria for determining representativeness of trade unions and their participation in the Economic and Social Council (ESC) is currently established by the Act on the Method of Determining the Representation of Trade Union Associations of a Higher Level in Tripartite Bodies at the National Level of 1999. Currently, only six out of 24 higher level associations meet the criteria of representativeness. Furthermore, the ESC is yet to decide how to determine the number of representatives of any given trade union who should participate in negotiations. The Coordinating Body of Trade Union Confederations has gathered a working group to draw a proposal for the Trade Union Representativity Act. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting on the issue of the distribution of trade union assets since 1996 and regrets that no significant progress has been made to date in this regard. Recalling that the transmission of trade union assets is an extremely serious issue for the viability and free functioning of trade unions, the Committee once again urges the Government to determine the criteria for the division of assets in consultation with workers' organizations and to fix a specific time frame for completing the division of the property. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007, which concern obstacles to the deduction of trade union dues, sanctions against strikers in the power, chemistry and non-metal sectors. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon, as well as on the ICFTU's previous allegation of obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights by organizations in the commercial sector.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging restrictions on collective bargaining in the public sector and the weakness of the legal system in dealing with cases of anti-union discrimination. The ITUC further refers to the case of a trade unionist unjustly dismissed and not reinstated despite a court order to that effect and to several cases of violations of collective bargaining rights at various enterprises.

While noting with interest the Government's indication that a Basic Collective Agreement for Public Servants and Employees was concluded in July 2007 and that the Agreement introduced 12 new rights for public service employees, the Committee notes that the ITUC refers to the Act on the Realisation of the Government's Budget of 1993, which allows the Government to modify the substance of a collective agreement in the public sector for financial reasons. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the legislative provisions allowing the Government to modify the substance of collective agreements in the public service and to provide information on their application in practice. The Committee recalls that, in general, a legal provision which allows one party to modify unilaterally the content of signed collective agreements is contrary to the principles of collective bargaining.

The Committee further requests the Government to provide its observations on the remaining issues raised by the ITUC.

Cuba

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) on 10 August 2006, which related to pending issues of law and practice, as well as the detention and imprisonment of trade union leaders.

The Committee notes that the Government once again reiterates that the process of revising the Labour Code is continuing and that, for this purpose a broad consultation procedure is being carried out, including with the 19 national branch unions and the Confederation of Cuban Workers. In this respect, the Committee observes that this process has been going on for many years without tangible results as yet being achieved. The Committee hopes that the revision of the Labour Code will be completed in the near future and that the comments made on the application of the Convention, which are examined below, will be taken into account. The Committee reminds the Government that the technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal and requests it to provide a copy of the draft text to which it refers.

I. Trade union monopoly

Articles 2, 5 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee observes that it has been referring for many years to the need to delete the reference to the Confederation of Cuban Workers from sections 15 and 16 of the Labour Code of 1985. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the legislation in force and every day practice in all work units guarantees the full exercise of trade union activities and the broadest application of the right to organize. According to the Government, there is no prohibition in the Labour Code on workers being able to opt for the form and structure of trade union of their own choosing and that section 15 of the Labour Code essentially reaffirms the provisions of Article 3 of the Convention. The statutes, rules and principles governing the activity of the 19 national branch unions and the Confederation of Cuban Workers in which they are federated of their own will are discussed and approved by their own congresses, and there is no provision in law setting standards relating to trade union structure. The Government also emphasizes that the Cuban tradition of unity in the trade union movement culminated in the establishment of the Confederation of Cuban Workers in 1939, not under the terms of any legislative provision, but by the free will of the workers. According to the Government, neither the 19 branch unions, nor the Confederation of Cuban Workers nor the trade union chapters numbering over 70,000 have had to seek authorization to exercise their activities freely in work units. The Committee is nevertheless bound to emphasize once again that trade union pluralism must remain possible in all cases and that the law must not institutionalize a factual monopoly by referring to a specific trade union confederation; even in a situation where at some point all workers have preferred to unify the trade union movement, they should still remain free to choose to set up unions outside the established structures should they so wish and to join the organization of their own choosing (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 96). In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers, without distinction whatsoever, are able to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee further requests the Government to take measures to amend the above sections of the Labour Code and to provide information in its next report on any measure adopted in this respect.

Article 3. The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the need to amend section 61 of Legislative Decree No. 67 of 1983, which confers upon the Confederation of Cuban Workers the monopoly to represent the workers of the country on government bodies. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that this provision was amended by Legislative Decree No. 147 of 1994 and that Agreement No. 4085 of 2 July 2001 is currently in force. In this respect, the Committee observes that Legislative Decree No. 147 of 1994 does not explicitly repeal the above section and that a copy of Agreement No. 4085 has not been provided by the Government and is not available to the Committee. In these circumstances, the Committee firmly urges the Government to amend section 61 of Legislative Decree No. 67 of 1983 so as to guarantee trade union pluralism, for example by replacing the reference to the Confederation of Cuban Workers by the expression "most representative organization". The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of Agreement No. 4085 of 2 July 2001.

II. Right to strike

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the fact that the right to strike is not recognized in the legislation and that its exercise in practice is prohibited and it requested the Government to take measures to ensure that no one is discriminated against or prejudiced in their employment for having peacefully exercised this right, and to keep it informed in this connection. The Committee notes the Government's repeated statement that Cuban legislation does not establish any prohibition on the right to strike, nor does the legislation establish any penalty for the exercise of this right, and that it is the prerogative of trade union organizations to take the respective decisions. Cuban workers benefit from participatory and democratic social dialogue at all levels of decision-making, and an approach based on collaboration rather than conflict has been strengthened, leading to the improvement of wage levels, social security benefits and safety and health measures, among others, as well as the continued development of their capacities. Trade union representatives participate in all processes of the formulation of labour and social security legislation and on many occasions draft texts are sent for consultation to workers' assemblies in work units. According to the Government, if Cuban workers ever decided to have recourse to strike action, nothing could prevent them from exercising it. The Committee recalls that the right to strike is one of the essential means through which workers and their organizations may defend their economic and social interests and requests the Government once again to guarantee explicitly in law that no one is discriminated against or prejudiced in their employment for the peaceful exercise of this right.

III. Trade union rights and civil liberties. The conviction of trade unionists

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to trade union leaders being sentenced to between 12 and 26 years in prison for treason and conspiracy and it requested the Government to take the necessary measures for the immediate release of the trade union leaders sentenced to severe penalties of imprisonment. The Committee notes that in its comments of 2006 the ICFTU referred to: (1) the detention of Juan Antonio Salazar of the Free Cuban Workers Union on 10 January 2006 under the accusation of alleged threats of which he had no knowledge; and (2) six of the seven independent trade union leaders convicted to sentences of between 12 and 26 years of imprisonment remained in prison and that the seventh had to serve his sentence at home or in hospital for health reasons. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that Mr Salazar was not detained, because he was not representing any group of Cuban workers, but that he had been without work since 1995 with a long criminal record for common offences, and had been prosecuted on several occasions. The Government adds that Mr Salazar left the country on 29 November 2005. With regard to the convictions of the trade union leaders, the Committee notes the Government's indication that: (1) none of those convicted were trade union leaders as, by their own decision, they had had no employment relationship for several years; (2) those sentenced were engaged in activities to overthrow the political, economic and social system decided upon by the Cuban people and enshrined in the Constitution; (3) the responsibility of all of them was proven for actions that amounted to crimes intended to undermine the sovereignty of the nation and they were penalized under section 91 of the Penal Code and Act No. 88 of 1999 to protect the national independence and economy of Cuba; (4) none of them were convicted or sentenced for exercising or defending freedom of opinion or expressions; (5) all of them had taken action prejudicial to the human rights of the Cuban people, and particularly against the exercise of their rights to free determination, development and peace; (6) at the present time, most of those convicted remain in prison serving the corresponding sentences, although some of them have benefited from extra-penal leave for humanitarian reasons; and (7) the human dignity and physical and psychological integrity of those convicted have been rigorously respected, and the detainees have received in prison the full benefits available to the entire prison population in Cuba.

The Committee nevertheless observes that the Government refers to generic charges, without indicating the tangible acts which gave rise to the conviction of these persons, whose release has furthermore in many cases been requested by the Committee on Freedom of Association. The Committee recalls once again that the freedom of industrial association is but one aspect of freedom of association in general, which must in itself form part of the whole range of fundamental human liberties, all interdependent and complementary one to another which were enumerated by the Conference in the resolution of 1970, and consist in particular of: (a) the right to freedom and security of person and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention; (b) freedom of opinion and expression and in particular freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers; (c) freedom of assembly; (d) the right to a fair trial by an independent and impartial tribunal; and (e) the right to protection of the property of trade union organizations. In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to secure the immediate release of the trade union leaders sentenced to severe penalties of imprisonment.

Finally, the Committee notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 28 August 2007, which refer to the issues of law and practice that are already examined and to specific cases of the detention of workers who are members of the Independent National Workers' Confederation of Cuba (CONIC), persecution and threats of imprisonment against delegates of the Light Industry Workers' Union (SITIL) and the confiscation of materials and humanitarian aid sent from abroad to the Single Council of Cuban Workers (CUTC). The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these specific cases, in view of the fact that its reply does not specifically address them.

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to issues which were already addressed, as well as the state control of the employment market, by fixing wages and conditions of work in the state sector.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that section 9 of Legislative Decree No. 229/2002 establishes the content of collective labour agreements, including specifications with regard to income, promotion, permanent employment in the entity, hours of work and rest periods.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it referred to the need to amend section 14 of Legislative Decree No. 229 on collective agreements and section 8 of the implementing regulations, which require any disputes about the content that arise in the drafting phase of a collective labour agreement (including when first-level unions are concerned) to be referred to the highest levels of the parties concerned (Confederation of Workers of Cuba), with the participation of those affected; and section 17 of Legislative Decree No. 229 and sections 9, 10 and 11 of the implementing regulations, which require any disputes that arise once the agreement has been concluded to be referred, upon exhaustion of the conciliation procedure, for arbitration by the National Labour Inspection Office, with the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and the interested parties, the office's decision being binding. The Committee notes that, according to information reiterated by the Government, this system ensures complete autonomy and independence for trade union representatives, workers and administrations with regard to the submission, discussion and approval of draft collective agreements; that the Decree provides for a conciliation procedure between the administration and the trade union with participation of the highest levels for examining and solving disputes that arise to which the parties may, by agreement, have recourse at any stage of the negotiations; that no request for arbitration has been submitted to the National Labour Inspection Office in the five years that the Legislative Decree has been in force. According to the Government, the possibility of arbitration by the National Labour Inspection Office laid down in section 17 of the Decree can only be taken up once the conciliation procedure has been exhausted and with the consent of both parties concerned, in accordance with section 4(a) of resolution No. 20/2007 establishing the national labour inspection system and specifying arbitration with the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and the parties concerned for the settlement of disputes which arise with regard to collective agreements. As regards the participation of the Confederation of Workers of Cuba in the negotiation and arbitration process, the Government indicates that this is not external interference since the Confederation is not outside the negotiating process, being the trade union organization that, by the wish of its own workers, represents workers and retirees in the various decision-making bodies of the country.

The Committee observes, however, that section 17 of the Legislative Decree and section 11 of the implementing regulations show that the possibility exists in law for just one of the parties to request disputes to be submitted for arbitration to the National Labour Inspection Office, as was also indicated by the Government in a previous report. In this respect, the Committee repeats that arbitration imposed at the request of only one of the parties is contrary to the principle of voluntary negotiation of collective agreements laid down in Convention No. 98 and, hence, contrary to the autonomy of the parties to bargaining. In the Committee's view, problems of incompatibility with the Convention arise when the law requires collective bargaining to be referred to a higher level (in this case, participation by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba). The Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend the legislation so that in case of disagreement between the parties to the collective bargaining process, the intervention by the authorities or the Confederation of Workers of Cuba is not compulsory and that referral to binding arbitration is possible only with the agreement of all the negotiating parties.

The Committee also referred to the need to amend section 11 of Legislative Decree No. 229 – which states that “discussion of the draft labour collective agreement at a general assembly of workers shall proceed in accordance with the methodology determined for that purpose by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba” – by deleting the express reference to the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and ensuring the autonomy of the parties to collective negotiations. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the methodology for discussion of the draft collective labour agreement is established by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba with the aims and objectives which it is obliged to fulfil in relation to the trade union movement and in conformity with its interests and that it is not for the Government to take measures in this respect. With regard to section 11, the Government points out that this is an affirmation of the fact that it is the trade union which has to prescribe the way in which workers' assemblies are organized and the way in which collective agreements are drawn up and discussed. The Committee considers, however, that section 11 imposes a methodology established by the Confederation of Workers of Cuba on all trade unions under a system of trade union monopoly established by law (see observation on the application of Convention No. 87), and this, together with the existence of provisions that are too detailed as to how collective agreements are to be concluded, do not afford sufficient encouragement to free and voluntary collective bargaining in accordance with Article 4 of the Convention. Consequently, the Committee asks the Government once again to take the necessary measures to amend section 11 of Legislative Decree No. 229 by deleting the express reference to the Confederation of Workers of Cuba and ensuring the autonomy of the parties to collective bargaining.

The Committee also requested the Government to take measures to repeal section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 229 and section 3 of the implementing regulations under which the National Labour Inspection Office approves the conclusion of collective labour agreements in the units provided for in the budget and in the production and services activities of bodies, sectors, branches and activities that share the same characteristics, when so agreed by the head of the body and the general secretary of the corresponding federation, so as to ensure that full effect is given to the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates that these sections apply only to exceptional cases involving units in the budget which, with the consent of the head of the entity and of the corresponding federation, decide to request the approval of the National Labour Inspection Office, the aim being to avoid duplicating or copying agreements of centres with similar characteristics so that agreements are adopted to the specific characteristics of each entity. The Committee recalls that the Government indicated, in a previous report, that the provision applied to units in the budget with similar characteristics, such as bakeries, schools, hairdressers, service centres and polyclinics. The Committee considers that the law subjects a wide range of collective agreements to approval by the National Labour Inspection Office and finds this to be contrary to the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining. The Committee asks the Government once again to take the necessary measures to repeal section 5 of Legislative Decree No. 229 and section 3 of the implementing regulations to ensure that full effect is given to the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining.

Cyprus

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006.

The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to amend sections 79A and 79B of the Defence Regulations which grant the Council of Ministers discretionary power to prohibit strikes in the services that they consider essential. The Committee notes with satisfaction that sections 79A and 79B of the Defence Regulations are now repealed by Order No. 366/2006 published in the Official Gazette on 22 September 2006.

Czech Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2006. The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC dated 28 August 2007, on issues already under examination by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to amend section 17 of the Act on collective bargaining so as to ensure that balloting for industrial action only takes account of the votes cast and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level.

The Committee notes with interest from the report of the Government that section 17 of the Act on collective bargaining, which deals with the right to strike, has recently been amended so as to lift the obligation to submit the names of the employees who will participate in the strike and ensure that balloting for industrial action only takes account of the votes cast, subject to a quorum requirement of 50 per cent of employees concerned by the agreement.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2006 and by the Czech-Moravian Confederation of Trade Unions (CMKOS). The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC dated 28 August 2007, with regard to alleged acts of anti-union discrimination and requests the Government to send its observations thereon.

The Committee notes the recent adoption of the new Labour Code (Act No. 262/2006), with a view to a better application of the Convention. The Committee notes that according to the latest comments by the ITUC, the new Labour Code opens up new opportunities for collective bargaining both in the public and private sectors.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned measures taken to increase the efficiency of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference. The Committee had taken note in this context of the adoption of Act No. 251/2005 on labour inspection and the possibility of out-of-court settlement of labour law disputes set up through third (neutral) party mediation.

The Committee notes that the ICFTU and the CMKOS refer to frequent cases of violations of trade union rights, such as anti-union practices that clearly undermine freedom of association, especially in newly established companies.

The Committee notes from the Government's reply to these comments, that the labour inspection has not registered any proven case of anti-union discrimination (which is prohibited in the Labour Code) since the entry into force of the Labour Inspection Act No. 251/2005 and that there are only two allegations of anti-union discrimination which are currently under investigation.

Given the divergence between the information provided by the Government and the comments made by workers' organizations, the Committee requests the Government to provide in its next report an overall assessment of the effectiveness of the system of protection against anti-union discrimination and interference, in consultation with the most representative employers' and workers' organizations, including data on the number of complaints brought to the labour inspection and the courts, as well as the duration of proceedings and their outcome.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August and 4 September 2007 concerning, in particular, the obstruction of trade union activities in certain administrations and enterprises (ban on holding meetings, ban on access to installations, etc.) and repeating the allegations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) in 2006 concerning cases of abduction, torture, threats, intimidation and harassment against trade union leaders. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the allegations made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of Congo (CSC) also relating to the arrest of trade unionists and threats by the public authorities towards trade union delegates, particularly in public enterprises. The Committee recalls that a climate of violence in which the murder and disappearance of trade union leaders go unpunished constitutes a serious obstacle to the exercise of trade union rights and that such acts require that severe measures be taken by the authorities. The arrest and detention, even for short periods, of trade union leaders and members engaged in their legitimate trade union activities, without any charges being brought and without a warrant, constitute a grave violation of the principle of freedom of association (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 29 and 31).

Noting the seriousness of the allegations, the Committee trusts that the Government will give its full attention to the comments made by the ITUC and the ICFTU and urges it to send its observations on the matters raised. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it emphasized the need to launch an investigation into the matters raised by the CSC in relation to the cases of arrest and detention.

Articles 2 and 5 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 1 of the Labour Code excludes from its scope of application magistrates, career officials in the state public services governed by the general conditions of service, and career employees and officials of the state public services governed by specific conditions of service. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the laws and regulations governing magistrates and career employees and officials of the state public services governed by specific conditions of service so as to ascertain their rights relating to the establishment of organizations. It also asked the Government to provide information on the right to establish organizations of career employees in the state public services governed by the general conditions of service. The Committee recalls the Government's indication that, by virtue of section 56 of Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of the state public services, public officials and employees were affiliated automatically to the then Union of Workers of Zaire (UNTZA). Pending the amendment of these conditions of service, the Minister for the Public Service issued Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./105/94 of 13 January 1994 issuing provisional regulations respecting trade union activities within the public administration. This Order was amended by Order No. CAB.MIN/F.P./0174/96 of 13 September 1996. The Committee once again requests the Government to supply copies of the Orders concerned and take the necessary steps to repeal section 56 of Act No. 81-003 and to ensure the conformity of the legislation with the provisions of the Convention.

Article 3. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to reinstate trade union elections as soon as possible in enterprises and establishments of all types in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to keep it informed of the measures adopted in this respect. The Committee noted that in April 2004 the Government organized an extraordinary session of the National Labour Council during which a recommendation was formulated calling for an order to be issued lifting the suspension of trade union elections, and that the Council adopted a number of texts, including one establishing the electoral schedule (Ministerial Order No. 12/CAB.MIN/TPS/055 of 12 October 2004). On the basis of this Order, trade union elections were held throughout the country between 1 February and 30 April 2005 and, in view of the high number of enterprises and establishments which did not organize elections, this period was extended until 31 July 2005. The results of the trade union elections were announced on 22 November 2005. However, the Committee noted that, according to the ICFTU, exemptions were granted to certain private communication enterprises, which therefore refused to organize elections. The Committee requests the Government to take steps to ensure that trade union elections are organized in the near future in the sectors referred to by the ICFTU or, if elections have been held, to provide specific information regarding the election results.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1969)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

1. Comments of the Trade Union Confederation of the Congo (CSC, now ITUC, International Trade Union Confederation), the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) and the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee notes with regret that the Government has not replied to the grave issues raised by the ITUC, nor to any of the comments made by the CSC or the WCL concerning: (1) acts of discrimination and anti-union interference in private enterprises (including threats of dismissal against union members despite the fact that section 234 of the Labour Code prohibits acts of anti-union discrimination); (2) the existence of many unions established and financed by employers; and (3) failure to comply with collective agreements. The Committee requests the Government to order independent inquiries into these allegations and to provide specific information on protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in practice (number of complaints made, penalties imposed, duration of procedures, etc.).

2. Article 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee noted previously that, according to the Government, the National Labour Council has not yet adopted the draft Order prohibiting acts of interference. The Committee recalled that, although section 235 of the new Labour Code prohibits all acts of interference by organizations of employers and workers in each others' affairs, section 236 provides that acts of interference must be defined more precisely. The Committee once again requests the Government to send a copy of the Order that is adopted on this issue.

3. Article 6. Collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee noted previously that section 1 of the Labour Code explicitly excludes from the Code career members of the state public services who are governed by the general conditions of service (Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 issuing the conditions of service of career members of state public services) and career employees and officials of state public services who are governed by specific conditions of service. The CSC indicated in its comments of 31 May 2004 the existence of measures allowing the establishment of mechanisms for the promotion of collective bargaining in the public sector. The Committee noted the Government's reply concerning the right of public employees not engaged in the administration of the State to engage in collective bargaining, and particularly: (1) the agreement of 11 September 1999 on basic wages concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration at a meeting of the joint committee; (2) the "social contract for innovation" of 12 February 2004 concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration; and (3) the agreement concluded by the Government and the unions of the public administration following a strike by SYECO and SYNECAT (education sector) in 2005. The Committee inferred that, in practice, there are wage negotiations and agreements in the public sector and it noted that Act No. 81-003 of 17 July 1981 explicitly provides for the establishment of institutions ensuring the representation of the personnel. Recalling that collective bargaining should be able to cover all working conditions, and taking into account the ITUC's comments that the Government establishes wages by decree and disregards negotiated agreements, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to ensure that the legislation regulates this right, as set out in Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention, for public employees not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary measures in the near future.

Denmark

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that, in its previous observations, it requested the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to ensure that Danish trade unions may represent all their members – residents and non-residents employed on ships sailing under the Danish flag – without any interference from the public authorities, in accordance with Articles 3 and 10 of the Convention and whether, in particular, these unions may freely represent seafarers who are not Danish residents in respect of their individual grievances. Noting that the Government does not provide information in this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide it in its next report.

The Committee is also addressing a request on other points directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

1. Article 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 10 of Act No. 408 – the Danish International Ships Register Act (DIS) – has the effect of, on the one hand, restricting the scope of negotiable issues by Danish trade unions by excluding from their bargaining power seafarers working on ships under the Danish flag who are not Danish residents and, on the other hand, preventing these seafarers from freely choosing the organization they wish to represent their interests in the collective bargaining process.

In its previous report the Government had indicated that the framework agreement between the social partners – the agreements on mutual information, coordination and cooperation concerning DIS ships, concluded since 1997 – had been prolonged to 31 December 2007. The Government indicated that this prolongation had taken the form of two agreements of 16 January 2004 (collective agreement with protocol attached) and of 15 December 2005 (collective agreement with protocol incorporated). The Government indicated in its report that two unions representing seafarers of a lower rank had wished not to be parties to the agreements: the United Federation of Danish Workers (3F) and its branch organization, the Union of Danish Seafarers, and the Union of Restaurant Workers (RBF) which had from 1 July 2006 been part of 3F. The Government had also indicated that the agreements still dealt with the conditions for seafarers and contained objectives concerning employment of Danish seafarers at an internationally competitive level, training of Danish seafarers and coverage of collective agreements between Danish shipowners and foreign unions, etc.

The Committee notes from the Government's latest report that Danish trade unions that are parties to the agreement have since 1997 had the right to be represented in negotiations between the Danish shipowners/organizations of shipowners and foreign trade unions, with a view to ensuring that a negotiated result for the foreign seafarers is in accordance with internationally accepted standards of pay.

According to the previous report by the Government, the 2004 agreement between the social partners and the attached protocol also implied a continuance of special provisions which ensure in greater detail that conclusion of a collective or individual agreement with foreign seafarers without Danish residence was at an internationally acceptable level. The 2004 protocol thus stipulated minimum standards that must be included in collective agreements concluded with foreign trade unions in relation to, for instance, pay, working time, period of service on board, repatriation, sickness, etc., safety and health, holiday and complaint procedures. In order to ensure that the Danish contracting parties could represent a foreign trade union, the 2004 protocol had been extended with a provision to the effect that foreign seafarers on board DIS ships could hold double membership, for example be a member of one of the Danish unions party to the agreement and be, at the same time, a member of a trade union in the home country. These provisions had been incorporated in the agreement of 15 December 2005.

In previous comments, the Committee had taken note of the Government's indication that, if Denmark was to maintain a merchant fleet with quality ships that could compete internationally, there was a continuous need to ensure that DIS constantly constituted an attractive and competitive ships' register.

The Committee had also taken note of the communications of the Danish Confederation of Trade Unions (LO), the 3F and the Confederation of Danish Employers (DA), attached to the Government's report. The 3F indicated that all Danish seafarers' organizations agreed that paragraph 10 of the DIS Act should be amended and that the contact committee agreement did not exist because of the DIS Act but, in spite of the Act, and that it presupposed that participating unions accepted the shipowners' rights under the Act; it therefore could not take the place of necessary amendments to the Act with a view to respecting Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee noted that 3F indicated that neither 3F nor RBF were part of the agreements and that, according to 3F, the present system privileged the number of unions and not their representativity.

In its previous comments, the Committee welcomed the renewal of the agreements between the social partners and the adoption of the 2004 protocol, and, in particular, the new provision to which the Government had referred, but observed that the legislative aspect of the matter had not been resolved and that two trade union organizations had again decided not to be bound by the new agreements. The Committee underlined that section 10 of Act No. 408 had the effect of restricting the activities of Danish trade unions by prohibiting them from representing, in the collective bargaining process, those of their members who were not considered as residents in Denmark. Taking due note of the figures presented by the Government concerning the Danish shipping industry, and, in particular, that as of 30 September 2005, out of a total of 8,714 seafarers, 3,042 were foreigners and, stressing that this issue has been examined since 1989, the Committee requests, once again, the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to amend section 10 of Act No. 408 so that Danish trade unions may freely represent all their members – Danish residents and non-residents – working on ships sailing under the Danish flag in the collective bargaining process, in conformity with Article 4 of the Convention.

2. Collective bargaining rights of majority organizations. This issue relates to the application of section 12 of the Conciliation Act and had been raised in previous comments following an examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 1971 in 1999. Section 12 makes it possible for an overall draft settlement, made by the Public Conciliator and sent out for ballot, to cover collective agreements involving an entire sector of activity, even if the organization representing most of the workers in that sector rejects the overall draft settlement. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to review the legislation, in consultation with the social partners, and to keep it informed of these consultations.

In its previous report, the Government had indicated that the central organizations, LO and DA, had discussed the rules on the linking of agreements of different occupational sectors and were of the opinion that section 12 should be seen in the light of the wording of Article 4 of the Convention and that the conciliation service must be said to be "a machinery for voluntary negotiation" as one of its most important purposes was to offer independent assistance in connection with the renewal of collective agreements and recommend concessions which seemed appropriate for a peaceful settlement of a dispute. According to the Government's report, the opinion of the central organizations was underpinned by the fact that it was often a judge who exercised the function, that conciliators were not subject to instructions from the Government, and no financial considerations were taken in connection with submissions of compromise proposals. The Government indicated that the central organizations found that the conciliation service could not be said to be an element in the general exercise of public powers. The Committee noted that section 12 did not bar the social partners from negotiating and exerting their influence. All organizations negotiated the renewal of their own agreements and a compromise proposal could not be made by the Public Conciliator until all bargaining possibilities had been exhausted. The individual member was guaranteed influence in that the compromise was sent out for ballot and the linking rule did not mean that the collective agreement would apply to the entire sector; it was thus not a matter of an erga omnes principle. The adoption of a compromise proposal did not mean that the agreements concluded lapsed but, on the contrary, that they could be individually maintained. The rules served the purpose of avoiding that a number of occupational fields would become involved in a dispute because a single field that constituted a minority – maybe even a very small minority – was, for some reason or other, dissatisfied with the compromise result and had rejected the proposal. The Government stressed that the linking rule was a necessary element of the special organizational structure of the Danish labour market, characterized by many different agreements in the same enterprise and for the same occupation. On the one hand, it was thus not a matter of a system based on industrial unions but, on the other hand, the agreements for the same occupational field were, typically, negotiated together and at the same time. It was important to stress that a change in this generally well-functioning state of law would require basic changes in the Danish union and bargaining structures; changes that were not wished by any of the parties.

While taking note of the Government's arguments, the Committee stressed in its previous comments that section 12 of the Conciliation Act could, in some cases, have the result of excluding the most representative trade union organization from the outcome of the negotiations of collective agreements or from the resolution of a conflict.

The Committee once again encourages the Government to engage in dialogue with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations on this issue in order to find the means to solve it. The Committee requests to be kept informed of any development in this regard. The Committee trusts that every effort will be made to fully ensure the collective bargaining rights of the most representative organizations and the principles of free and voluntary collective bargaining.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

1. Comments from workers' organizations. The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, reiterating those of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) of 2006 concerning violations of the Convention in law (and particularly the new Labour Code) and practice. The ITUC also denounces the brutal repression of strikes, arrests of trade union leaders and the expulsion from the country of the members of an international trade union solidarity mission and an ILO official. The Committee regrets to note that the Government, in a communication of 15 October 2007, confines itself to rejecting the observations made by the ITUC, without providing information on these grave allegations. The Committee recalls that the ICFTU denounced numerous arrests of trade unionists, physical aggression against demonstrators and strikers, measures to banish unionists from their homes, acts of anti-union harassment and, finally, the prohibition to hold trade union elections in the National Mint. The Committee recalls that civil liberties and trade union rights are interdependent and that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights.

The Committee also notes the communication dated 11 August 2007 of the General Union of Djibouti Workers (UGTD), also relating to restrictions on trade union rights contained in the new Labour Code.

The Committee urges the Government to order inquiries into the acts of violence that are denounced and to provide without delay its reply to the observations relating to the very serious acts referred to by the ITUC.

The Committee notes Case No. 2450 of the Committee on Freedom of Association (348th Report, November 2007, paras 533 to 560) which relates, among other matters, to the issues raised by the ICFTU and the ITUC.

The Committee also notes the discussion which took place in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2007) concerning the application of the Convention by Djibouti. It notes in particular that the Government accepted a direct contacts mission in order to clarify the situation with regard to all the issues raised. The Committee trusts that it will be possible for this mission to take place in the near future and that the Government's next report will show real progress in the application of the Convention in both law and practice.

2. New labour regulation since 2006. The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 133/AN/05/5thL of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. It notes that, according to the ITUC, this Act, which challenges fundamental rights relating to freedom of association, was prepared and adopted without the participation of the social partners. The Committee notes that, in a communication of March 2007 provided by the Government in the context of Case No. 2450 pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Government indicates that the social partners were fully consulted at all stages of the process. According to the Government, consultations were held on several occasions with the social partners and, although comments were received from the employers' association, the trade union confederations (UDT and UGTD) did not provide their comments on the grounds that they did not have the necessary technical expertise.

While noting that certain of the provisions referred to below are also the subject of observations by the ITUC and the UGTD, the Committee wishes to make the following comments on certain provisions of the new Labour Code:

- sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code concerning the suspension of employment contracts. Section 41 provides that the employment contract shall be suspended, among other cases, for the duration of any regular, political or trade union office held by the worker which is not compatible with paid employment (subsection 8). Section 42 provides in addition that the period during which the employment contract is suspended shall not be counted for the purpose of determining the worker's seniority within the undertaking. In this respect, the Committee considers that the holding of trade union office is not incompatible with paid employment, and consequently any worker holding trade union office should be able to remain employed. The Committee therefore considers that sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code, in providing for a more or less automatic suspension of the employment contract when a worker holds trade union office, are likely to be detrimental to the rights of all workers to establish and to join the organization of their own choosing or to hold trade union office (Article 2 of the Convention). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend sections 41 and 42 of the Labour Code by providing that the possibility of suspending the employment contract during a period of trade union office where such office is incompatible with the demands of work is a matter for negotiation between the parties concerned, who must establish the relevant modalities, and that in any event such suspension cannot be automatic.
- section 214 of the Labour Code, under which a person sentenced “by any court” may not hold office as a trade union leader. In this respect, the Committee recalls that a law which generally prohibits access to trade union office because of any conviction is incompatible with the principles of freedom of association (Article 3 of the Convention), when the activity condemned is not prejudicial to the aptitude and integrity required to exercise trade union office. In this case, the Committee considers that section 214 of the Labour Code, in deeming any person who has been convicted to be unsuitable for trade union office, is formulated too broadly and would cover situations in which the nature of the conviction is not inherently such as to rule out the holding of trade union office. The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 214 of the Labour Code, in consultation with the social partners, so as to ensure that only court sentences for offences which by their nature are prejudicial to the integrity of the individual are deemed to be incompatible with the holding of trade union office.
- section 215 of the Labour Code concerning the formalities for the registration and verification of the legality of a trade union. Under the terms of this section, the founders of any occupational trade union are required to deposit their by-laws and the list of persons responsible for their administration and management; within a period of 30 days following their deposit, copies of the by-laws and the list of persons responsible for the administration and management of the union are transmitted by the labour inspector to the Labour Minister and the Attorney-General of the Republic; the documents are accompanied by a report prepared by the labour inspectorate; the Labour Minister then has 15 days to issue a receipt granting legal recognition to the union; the Attorney-General of the Republic then has 30 days to verify the by-laws and review the situation of each of the officials responsible for the administration and management of the union and to notify the Minister of the Interior, Minister of Labour and the union officials concerned of her/his conclusions; any modification to the by-laws and any changes to the composition of the officials responsible for the management or administration of the trade union have to be brought to the knowledge of the same authorities and are subject to verification under the same conditions. The Committee firstly wishes to recall that Article 2 of the Convention guarantees the right of workers and employers to establish organizations “without previous authorization” by the public authorities. The Committee therefore considers that national legislation which requires the deposit of the by-laws of organizations is compatible with this provision if it is a mere formality intended to ensure that the by-laws are available to the public. Nevertheless, problems of compatibility with the Convention may arise if the registration procedure is lengthy or complicated, or if the rules concerning registration are applied in such a way as to defeat its purpose and the registration authorities make excessive use of their discretionary power. The Committee notes that section 215 of the Labour Code, under which the decision of the Minister of Labour requires not only the deposit by the founders of the trade union of the relevant documents, but also a detailed report by the labour inspector, would appear to grant the administration more or less discretionary power in deciding whether or not an organization meets the registration criteria. This situation could amount in practice to denying the right of workers and employers to establish organizations “without previous authorization”, in contravention of Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee therefore requests the Government, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers, to amend section 215 of the Labour Code so as to guarantee the right to establish workers' and employers' organizations without previous authorization, to remove the provisions which give de facto discriminatory powers to the administration and to ensure that the registration procedure is merely a formality.

Finally, the Committee refers to its previous comments and also reminds the Government of the need to repeal or amend the following provisions of the legislation:

- section 5 of the Act on associations, which requires organizations to obtain authorization prior to their establishment as trade unions (Article 2 of the Convention); and
- section 23 of Decree No. 83-099/PR/FP of 10 September 1983, which confers upon the President of the Republic broad powers to requisition public servants who are indispensable to the life of the nation and the proper operation of essential public services, with a view to restricting the power of requisition to public servants who exercise authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term (Article 3 of the Convention).

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures, in full consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers, to revise and amend the legislative provisions, including provisions of the Labour Code, taking into account the above comments. It trusts that the Government will be in a position to indicate the progress achieved in this respect in its next report.

A request on certain other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), the Labour Union of Djibouti (UDT) and the General Workers' Union of Djibouti (UGTD) regarding the anti-union dismissal of numerous trade union leaders and members and concerning acts of anti-union interference.

The Committee once again notes with regret that the Government has not provided any reply to the comments. The Committee reminds the Government that it has the responsibility to prevent all acts of anti-union discrimination and ensure that complaints regarding discriminatory practices of this nature are examined according to a procedure which must be prompt, impartial and considered as such by the parties concerned. The Committee therefore requests the Government once again to order without delay an independent investigation into the anti-union dismissals and acts of discrimination and interference referred to in the communications from the ITUC, UDT and UGTD, and ensure that the measures and penalties laid down by the legislation are applied if violations of the rights established by the Convention are proven.

The Committee notes the adoption of Act No. 133/AN/05/5ème L of 28 January 2006 issuing the Labour Code. It notes that the Labour Code prohibits anti-union discrimination and interference and lays down significant penalties (section 290 of the Code). The Committee also notes the establishment, under sections 280–282 of the Code, of the Joint National Committee on Collective Agreements and Wages, the duties of which include issuing opinions and making recommendations with regard to collective labour agreements (section 280 of the Code). The Committee requests the Government to send a copy of the Decree establishing the structure and procedures of the Joint National Committee on Collective Agreements and Wages and also any relevant information on its work.

Dominica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. The Committee has been referring, for a number of years, to the need to amend legislation so as to exclude the banana, citrus and coconut industries as well as the Port Authority, from the schedule of essential services annexed to Act No. 18 of 1986 on industrial relations, which makes it possible to stop a strike in these sectors by compulsory arbitration.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that the Minister for Labour received the recommendations of the Industrial Relations Advisory Committee (IRAC) for the removal of the citrus and coconut industries from the list of essential services (the registered trade unions were consulted and the majority concurred with the IRAC on the matter). Furthermore, the Committee notes the Government's indication that no further action has been taken by the political directorate in this regard and that the Government hopes that when a new committee is appointed another attempt will be made to draw to the attention of the competent authority the need for immediate action on this matter. The Committee recalls that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). Nevertheless, the Committee recalls that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 160). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made in eliminating citrus and coconut industries from the list of essential services as well as the measures taken or envisaged to amend the list of essential services in respect of the banana industry and the Port Authority or to establish a requirement of a minimum service, in the determination of which relevant employers' and workers' organizations should be involved.

The Committee has also noted on several occasions that sections 59(1)(b) and 61(1)(c) of the Act empowered the Minister to refer disputes to compulsory arbitration if they concerned serious issues in his or her opinion. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that there was only one significant dispute referred to compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration to end a collective labour dispute and a strike is acceptable only if it is at the request of both parties involved in a dispute, or if the strike in question may be restricted or prohibited (as mentioned above, i.e. for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State or in essential services in the strict sense of the term). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to amend the legislation in this regard.

Dominican Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the reply to the 2005 and 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), which includes information concerning the registration of a trade union and the Haitian workers' right to organize. The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC of 28 August 2007, which refer to the matters under consideration and the imprisonment of and imposition of excessive fines on two trade union leaders from the National Transport Confederation (CONATRA) and the National Dominican Transport Federation (FENATRADO) for having organized a strike in the transport sector. The Committee asks the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the following legislative matters:

- the requirement that federations must obtain a two-thirds majority vote by their members to be able to establish a confederation (section 383 of the Labour Code of 1992);
- the statutory requirement of a majority of 51 per cent of workers' votes in the enterprise in order to call a strike (section 407(3) of the Labour Code);
- the express exclusion from the scope of the Labour Code (Principle III) and the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act of employees of autonomous and municipal state institutions (section 2);
- the requirement of 40 per cent of the total number of employees in the institution in order for public servants to be able to establish organizations (section 142(1) of the Regulations adopted under the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act).

With regard to these legislative matters, the Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that on 18 July 2007 the Advisory Council of the Secretariat of Labour held a session, within the framework of social dialogue, at which the Government and the social partners decided to work together on the legislative amendments. To this end, a team of three delegates was established for each sector to examine the respective proposals and send them to the National Congress. While emphasizing that the matters in question have been outstanding for many years, the Committee hopes that the working group will submit its proposals to the National Congress in the very near future, so that the legislation can be amended in pursuance of the provisions of the Convention. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on any measures taken in this respect and reminds it that technical assistance from the Office remains at its disposal.

The Committee has also been referring for a number of years to the following matters:

- The opposition of certain enterprises in export processing zones to the establishment of trade unions and the disregard for trade union immunity. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that: (1) in the past five years, an average of 12 trade unions have been registered each year in export processing zones; (2) in 2006, within the framework of the "Cumple y Gana" project sponsored by the US Department of Labor, two workshops aimed at employers and workers were held on labour law and satisfactory dispute settlement in the export processing zone sector; (3) a radio and written campaign was launched on labour rights and the fundamental ILO Conventions, with emphasis on freedom of association and collective bargaining; and (4) a dispute settlement system was introduced which allowed for the considerable improvement of relations between enterprises and trade unions.
- Respect for trade union rights on sugar plantations, in particular the right of trade union officers to have access to and meet with workers in accordance with the principles of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that, in May 2006, the Secretariat of State for Labour launched a campaign for the promotion, dissemination and observance of labour law in sugar refineries; that the director of the National Labour Inspectorate visited all sugar-producing areas, to which two labour inspectors are assigned on a permanent basis; that there has been a considerable improvement in working conditions in sugar refineries and that work-related entitlements have been paid to the workers of the refineries that were closed down. The Committee notes, however, that the Government does not refer in a specific manner to the observance of trade union rights. The Committee asks the Government to ensure that full effect is given to the Convention on sugar plantations.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 28 August 2007, which refer to various acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee asks the Government to send its comments in this regard.

Article 4 of the Convention. 1. Majorities required to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for many years on the fact that, in order to engage in collective bargaining, a trade union must represent an absolute majority of the workers in an enterprise or the workers in a branch of activity (sections 109 and 110 of the Labour Code). The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that on 18 July 2007, the Consultative Committee on Labour held a meeting with a view to establishing consensual proposals between the social partners and the Government for amending the legislation. The Committee regrets to note that despite the amount of time that has elapsed, no specific progress has been made with regard to amending the legislation. The Committee asks the Government to take the necessary steps to bring its legislation fully into line with the provisions of the Convention and to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

2. Coverage of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors in practice. The Committee notes that the Government has not sent any information in this respect. The Committee asks the Government to provide statistics on the collective agreements concluded in the private and public sectors, including in export processing zones, indicating the number of workers covered by these agreements.

3. Comments by the ITUC. The Committee previously noted the comments by the ITUC on the absence of effective sanctions for acts of anti-union discrimination, the dismissal on trade union grounds of leaders in sugar plantations, the drawing up of blacklists of trade unionists in export processing zones and the dismissal of all the founding members of a trade union which the administrative authority had refused to register. In this regard, the Committee notes that the Government has provided information on the campaigns for the promotion, dissemination and observance of labour legislation in sugar refineries, the labour inspections carried out on sugar plantations, the workshops on labour law and the satisfactory settlement of labour disputes in export processing zones, the campaign to disseminate information on labour rights and fundamental Conventions, and the effective registration of the trade union which the administrative authority had previously refused to register, but that it has not provided any concrete information on the allegations made by the trade union. The Committee reminds the Government that in the event of allegations of acts of anti-union discrimination, investigations should be carried out without delay, and that if the allegations are confirmed, sufficiently dissuasive sanctions should be imposed. The Committee therefore asks the Government to carry out a full investigation into the matters referred to by the ITUC and to inform it of the outcome. It also requests the Government to provide further information on the absence of effective sanctions for acts of anti-union discrimination.

Ecuador

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee notes the Government's report and observes that it does not contain specific information on the legislative measures that are under examination. The Committee also notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) referring to issues that are under examination by the Committee, particularly in relation to the exercise of the right to strike and the repression by the police and the army of a demonstration organized by the trade union confederations and a strike in the banana sector on 11 February 2006. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect and on the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC), which it noted in its previous observation.

Pending matters

The Committee recalls that for many years its observations have been referring to the following matters:

- the need to reduce the minimum number of workers (30) required to establish associations, works committees or assemblies to organize works committees (sections 450, 459 and 466 of the Labour Code);
- the need to amend section 60(g) of the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act prohibiting the establishment of unions so as to ensure that public servants have the right to establish organizations to further and defend their occupational and economic interests. The Committee notes with interest the abolition of this prohibition by virtue of the adoption of the codified version of the Framework Act respecting civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of associations which have been established to further and defend the interests of public servants, the sectors covered and the approximate number of members under the terms of the recently adopted codified version of the Framework Act respecting civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration, which amends section 60(g) of the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act;
- the need to amend article 35(10) of the Political Constitution, which prohibits the stoppage on any grounds of public services which may not be considered essential in the strict sense of the term (education, social security, the refining, transport and distribution of fuel and public transport). The Committee also notes that section 26(9) of the codified version of the Framework Act respecting civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration, which was adopted recently, lays down the same prohibition;

- the need to amend section 522(2) of the Labour Code respecting the determination of minimum services by the Ministry of Labour in case of disagreement between the parties in the event of a strike;
- the implicit denial of the right to strike by federations and confederations (section 505 of the Labour Code);
- the imposition of prison sentences for participation in illegal work stoppages or illegal strikes (Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967); and
- the requirement to be of Ecuadorian nationality to serve as a trade union officer (section 466.4 of the Labour Code).

Noting that it has been commenting on these provisions for many years, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the near future to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any development in this respect.

Draft constitutional reform

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Minister of Labour and Employment announced that draft provisions would be presented to the President for inclusion in the new Political Constitution of the Republic in the section on "Labour" for analysis and possible submission for consideration by the Constituent National Assembly. The Government is facilitating the passage of the draft text, section 32(11) of which maintains the prohibition set out in the current Constitution which has been criticized by the Committee relating to the exercise of the right to strike in non-essential public services. The Committee reiterates its previous comments. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments relating to the draft text of the new Political Constitution and expresses the hope that it will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Draft reform of the Labour Code

The Committee was informed previously of the existence of a draft text to reform the Labour Code which had been formulated with ILO assistance. The Committee understands that the examination of this text is suspended in view of the constitutional reform process. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments relating to this draft legislation.

Finally, the Committee reminds the Government that, in the context of the current legislative and constitutional reforms, it may benefit from ILO technical assistance with a view to ensuring the conformity of the reforms with the Convention.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes the Government's report and observes that it does not contain specific information relating to the legislative issues that have been under examination. The Committee also notes the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) according to which the penalties established in law against violations of the labour legislation are not sufficiently dissuasive, which prevents workers from being able to exercise their trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

Pending matters. The Committee once again recalls that it has been making comments for several years on the following matters:

- the need to include provisions in the legislation that guarantee protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in relation to recruitment;
- the need to amend section 229, second paragraph, of the Labour Code respecting the submission of the draft collective agreement, so that minority trade union organizations including not more than 50 per cent of the workers subject to the Labour Code may negotiate, on their own or jointly, on behalf of their own members;
- the need for public teaching staff and the heads of educational institutions, and for staff who perform technical and occupational duties in the education sector who are governed by the Higher Education Act (Act No. 2000-16) and the Act on educational careers and posts in the public teaching sector (Act No. 94 of 1990) to benefit from the right to organize and collective bargaining, not only at the national level, but also at the local and establishment levels. The Committee noted in its previous observation that, under the terms of section 5(d) of Act No. 94, teachers enjoy the right to freedom of association for the purposes of studying, participation in the planning and implementation of education policy and for the defence of their occupational interests. The Committee nevertheless notes that the legislation does not establish the right of teachers to collective bargaining. The Committee recalls that all personnel in the public administration who are not engaged in the administration of the State should enjoy the right to collective bargaining and, in this respect, considers that teachers are not engaged in functions related to the administration of the State and that they should therefore be able to engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating their terms and conditions of employment through collective agreements;
- the need to amend section 3(g) of the Civil Service and Administrative Careers Act so that workers in government departments and other public sector institutions and in private sector institutions that pursue social or public objectives enjoy the rights guaranteed in the Convention. The Committee notes with interest the deletion of this provision as a result of the recent adoption of the codified version of the Organic Act respecting civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration.

Noting that it has been commenting on these provisions for many years, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in the near future to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments in this respect.

Furthermore, in its previous observation the Committee requested the Government to provide a copy of the Bill on the Organic Act respecting the civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration and the ruling by the Constitutional Court on its conformity with the Constitution. The Committee notes that the Government has provided a copy of both documents. The Committee notes that the above Organic Act was declared constitutional and that subsequently the codified version of the Organic Act respecting the civil service and administrative careers and the unification and standardization of public sector remuneration was approved supplementing and replacing the Bill, which was also declared constitutional. While noting that the above text repeals the prohibition on the establishment of trade unions, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, under the terms of the text, public servants and public sector workers in general may negotiate collective agreements and, if so, to explain the envisaged procedure for wage bargaining.

The Committee recalls that it noted previously that section 94 of Chapter XII of the Basic Act of 29 February 2000 on the economic transformation of Ecuador, which relates to amendments to the Labour Code, explicitly prohibits any revision or increase of the supplementing bonus or the compensation for cost-of-living increases, or the introduction of any other wage or remuneration supplement. The Committee also observed that section 95 of the same Act provides that the current amendments to the Labour Code are mandatory, unless there are provisions to the contrary in existing collective agreements or legally concluded contractual arrangements, for as long as they remain in force and unless otherwise agreed. In this respect, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether, under sections 94 and 95 of the above Act, employers or their organizations and workers' organizations continue to be subject to the limitations referred to above in freely concluding wage adjustment clauses through collective agreements.

Draft constitutional reform

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Minister of Labour and Employment announced that draft provisions would be submitted to the President for inclusion in the new Political Constitution of the Republic in the section on "Labour" for analysis and possible submission for consideration by the Constituent National Assembly. The Government is facilitating the examination of the draft text of this section, some of the provisions of which are not in full conformity with the Convention:

- section 32(13) provides that employers with 15 or more workers who are members of a trade union organization shall be obliged to conclude a collective agreement when the organization so requests. In this respect, the Committee recalls that Article 4 of the Convention establishes the obligation to promote collective bargaining; and
- section 32(14) provides that collective disputes shall be submitted to conciliation and arbitration tribunals, which shall be the only bodies competent for the classification, examination and resolution of claims. In this respect, the Committee recalls that, in general terms, recourse to compulsory arbitration when the parties have not reached an agreement through collective bargaining is only acceptable in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or in the case of public servants engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments relating to the draft text of the new Political Constitution and hopes that the latter will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

Draft reform of the Labour Code

The Committee has been informed of the existence of a draft reform of the Labour Code, formulated with the assistance of the ILO. The Committee understands that its examination is suspended in view of the constitutional reform process. This being the case, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments relating to the examination of this legislative text.

Pending comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC)

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it requested the Government to send its observations concerning the comments made by the ICFTU concerning the lack of collective bargaining rights of subcontracted or outsourced workers, the use of "blacklists" in the province of Los Ríos and anti-union dismissals.

The Committee notes that the Government provides a copy of the Act amending the Labour Code (Act respecting outsourcing and supplementary services) of 23 June 2006, regulating employment mediation services and the outsourcing of supplementary services, and setting out the obligations of new enterprises devoted to employment mediation and the users of such services. The Committee requests the Government to confirm that workers in enterprises engaged in employment mediation and the outsourcing of supplementary services enjoy the right to organize and collective bargaining. The Committee also requests the Government to reply to the ICFTU's other comments.

Finally, the Committee reminds the Government that in the context of the current legislative and constitutional reforms it may benefit from the technical assistance of the ILO with a view to ensuring their conformity with the Convention.

Egypt

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2006 on the application of the Convention. It further notes the comments submitted by the ITUC in a communication of 28 August 2007, which mainly refer to matters previously raised by the Committee as well as to acts of government interference in union elections and violent intervention by security forces against trade union members participating in the elections. The Committee requests the Government to transmit its observations on the ITUC's allegations.

The Committee recalls that for several years its comments have been referring to the discrepancies between the Convention and the national legislation – i.e. the Trade Union Act No. 35 of 1976, as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995, and the Labour Code No. 12 of 2003 – on the following points:

Article 2 of the Convention. The institutionalization of a single trade union system under Act No. 35 of 1976 (as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995), and in particular sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52. The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the trade union structure is one the workers themselves had chosen upon the realization that disparate trade union set-ups are ineffective and do not constitute a pressure group aimed at meeting their interests. In these circumstances the Committee once again recalls that Act No. 35, and in particular sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52, are at variance with Article 2 of the Convention since trade union unity, directly or indirectly imposed by law, runs counter to the standards expressly laid down in the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 91). The Committee requests the Government to amend sections 7, 13, 14, 17 and 52 of Act No. 35 of 1976 (as amended by Act No. 12 of 1995) so as to secure the right of workers to establish and join organizations of their own choosing at all levels outside the existing trade union structure.

Article 3. The control granted by law to higher level trade union organizations, and particularly the Confederation of Trade Unions, over the nomination and election procedures to the executive committees of trade unions (sections 41, 42 and 43 of Act No. 35, as amended by Act No. 12). The Committee recalls that procedures for the nomination and election to trade union office should be fixed by the rules of the organization concerned, without any interference by public authorities or by the single trade union central organization designated by the law. Legislative provisions can require, in a manner compatible with the Convention, that organizations specify in their statutes and rules the procedure for appointing their executive bodies, and rules ensuring the proper conduct of the election process. Furthermore, if any supervision is deemed necessary, it should be exercised by a judicial authority (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 114 and 115). Finally, the Committee would like to point out that any removal or suspension of executive bodies which is not the result of an internal decision of the trade union, a vote by members or normal judicial proceedings, seriously interferes in the exercise of the trade union office to which officers should be freely elected by members of their trade union. Legislative provisions which permit the appointment of temporary administrators by the single central organization are incompatible with the Convention. Measures of this kind should only be possible through judicial proceedings (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 122 and 123). The Committee thus expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure that each workers' organization is able to elect its representatives in full freedom in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

The control exercised by the Confederation of Trade Unions over the financial management of trade unions (sections 62 and 65 of Act No. 35, as amended by Act No. 12). The Committee notes the Government's statement that the funding structure in place does not contravene any international convention or law, and is the main source of funding for trade unions at the international level. The Committee nevertheless recalls that it had previously pointed out that workers' organizations should have the right to organize their administration without any interference from public authorities, which means, among other things, that they should enjoy autonomy and financial independence. The control granted by the law to a single central organization constitutes, as such, interference with the free functioning of workers' organizations, contrary to Article 3. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that section 62, which provides that the Confederation shall determine the financial rules of trade unions and obliges lower level unions to pay a certain percentage of their income to higher level organizations, and section 65, which provides that the Confederation shall control all trade union activities, are amended so that workers' organizations have the right to organize their administration, including their financial activities, without interference, in accordance with Article 3 of the Convention.

Right to strike. The Committee notes the Government's statement that strikes are prohibited at strategic undertakings, as a legitimate and necessary safeguard to protect public safety and security; the Government adds that the restrictions placed by the law on the holding of strikes are measures similarly aimed at ensuring public security and the country's economic welfare. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited in the public service only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, or in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). In these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation concerning:

- the removal from office of the executive committee of a trade union which has provoked work stoppages or absenteeism in a public service or community services (section 70(2)(b) of Act No. 35 of 1976);
- the requirement for the prior approval of the Confederation of Trade Unions for the organization of strike action (section 14(i) of the same Act);
- restrictions on the right to strike and recourse to compulsory arbitration in services which are not essential in the strict sense of the term (sections 179, 187, 193 and 194 of the Labour Code); and
- penalties for breaches of section 194 of the Labour Code (section 69(9) of the Code).

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1954)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in 2007, which principally refer to matters previously raised by the Committee. The Committee requests the Government to transmit its observations on those comments.

Previously, the Committee had taken note of the allegations made by the ITUC in 2006 concerning provisions of the 2002 law on special economic zones that exempt investment companies newly established in the zones from the legal provisions on the organization of labour, and to anti-union acts in a number of enterprises in the zones, including pressure on members to leave unions. The ITUC had stated that most workers in the Tenth of Ramadan City zone were forced to sign letters of resignation before beginning employment so that they could be fired at the employers' convenience. Moreover, the ITUC alleged several instances of anti-union discrimination, including the dismissal, or the threatening with dismissal, of trade unionists in different enterprises. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, in cases where employers are said to have forced the resignation of workers, section 119 of the Labour Code provides that all resignations must be in writing, and that the worker concerned shall have the right to change his or her mind regarding the resignation tendered. The Government further states that employers who force workers to sign resignation letters in violation of section 119 may be punished by a fine of 200–500 Egyptian pounds per worker, with multiple fines for repeated violations. The Committee notes, nevertheless, that the Government has not provided any information respecting investigations into the acts of anti-union discrimination alleged by the ITUC. In this connection, the Committee recalls that the existence of general legal provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is inadequate if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. Accordingly, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to initiate an impartial inquiry into the matters referred to by the ITUC.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that the levels, mechanisms, and legal system for collective bargaining are determined by Labour Code No. 12 of 2003. The Government adds that collective agreements that have been concluded and that are not contrary to the law shall be accepted, and that, in 2005, 21 collective agreements were concluded – including one agreement at the national level. While taking note of the Government's indications in this respect, the Committee notes with regret that the Government has not substantially replied to its previous comments referring to several restrictions on collective bargaining. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide full information in its next report on the matters previously raised concerning collective bargaining, which are as follows:

- as regards section 154 of the new Labour Code, under which any clause of a collective agreement contrary to the law on public order or general ethics shall be null and void, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the scope of this section and the impact the broad wording of this section may have on the implementation of the principle of voluntary negotiation. Further noting that section 154 referred to a law that was still in its preparatory phase, the Committee asked the Government to provide a copy of the relevant provisions of the law, once adopted, in order to assess their compatibility with the principle of voluntary negotiation contained in Article 4 of the Convention;
- the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 158 of the new Labour Code so as to ensure that the approval of a collective agreement may only be refused if: (1) it is tainted with a procedural flaw; or (2) it does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by the labour legislation;
- the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal sections 148 and 153 of the Labour Code, as these provisions enable higher level organizations to interfere in the negotiation process conducted by lower level organizations, and had also requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the Labour Code in order to enable the parties to have recourse to arbitration only by mutual agreement (articles 179 and 187, in conjunction with sections 156 and 163 of the Labour Code).

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring the legislation into full conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to keep it informed of the progress made in this regard.

Finally, the Committee takes note of the Labour Consultative Council, established in 2003 for the purpose of consultation and collaboration with the social partners. Noting that the Labour Consultative Council's functions include, among others, the issuance of opinions on bills related to labour relations and comments on international labour Conventions before their signature, the Committee expresses the hope that this body will be associated with the process of legislative reform.

Equatorial Guinea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes the comments from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 concerning legislative issues which are under examination and denouncing once again the administrative authority's refusal to register a number of trade unions, including the Trade Union of Workers of Equatorial Guinea (UST), the Independent Services Union (SIS), the Teachers' Trade Union Association (ASD) and the Agricultural Workers' Organization (OTC). The Committee recalls that it noted that, owing to the lack of a trade union tradition, there were still no workers' unions operating in the country. The Committee expresses its concern at the circumstances described above and reminds the Government that, under the provisions of Article 2 of the Convention, all workers without distinction shall have the right to establish trade union organizations of their own choosing. The Committee requests the Government to register without delay the trade union organizations the registration of which was refused and keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that workers are able to establish organizations of their own choosing.

With reference to its previous comments, the Committee recalls that it asked the Government to:

- amend section 5 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that sectoral employees' organizations shall bring together employees of two or more enterprises engaged in similar activities, so as to allow the establishment of enterprise trade unions;
- amend section 10 of Act No. 12/1992, which provides that for an occupational association to obtain legal personality it must, inter alia, have 50 employees as a minimum, in order to reduce the number of workers required to a reasonable level;
- confirm that, as a result of the revision of the Fundamental Act in 1995 (Act No. 1 of 1995), the right to strike is recognized in public utilities and is exercised in the conditions laid down by law;
- provide information on the services deemed to be essential, and on how the minimum services to be ensured are determined;
- state whether public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State enjoy the right to strike.

The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the legislation in order to bring it into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and reply to the requests for information. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of all measures taken in this respect. Finally, the Committee points out to the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 97th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes that no report has been received from the Government.

Article 4 of the Convention. 1. Collective bargaining. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, referring in particular to the impossibility of establishing any trade union organization which the authority considers to be "too independent". The Committee emphasizes once again that the existence of trade unions is a prerequisite for the application of the Convention and for exercising the right to collective bargaining. The Committee urges the Government once again to adopt without delay the necessary measures to create appropriate conditions for the establishment of trade unions which can engage in collective bargaining with a view to regulating conditions of employment. The Committee reminds the Government that it may avail itself of the technical assistance of the Office.

2. The Committee also recalls that in its previous observation it noted that section 6 of Act No. 12/1992 on trade unions and collective labour relations provides that the organization of officials of the public administration shall be regulated by a special Act and that the Act has not yet been adopted. The Committee requests the Government once again to indicate whether the special Act has been adopted and ensures public officials' right to organize, and to provide detailed information on the application of the Convention with regard to public officials who are not engaged in the administration of the State.

3. The Committee requests the Government to reply to the comment by the ITUC to the effect that no provisions exist for protecting workers against acts of anti-union discrimination.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 97th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

Eritrea

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report. With reference to the communication of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) of 10 August 2006 concerning the arrest of three trade union leaders in 2005, the Committee notes from Case No. 2449 concerning Eritrea pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association that the three trade union leaders were released in April 2007 (see 347th Report). The Committee recalls that the arrest and detention of trade unionists without any charges being laid or court warrants being issued constitutes a serious attack on trade union rights.

Finally, the Committee notes the comments of the ITUC of 28 August 2007, referring to legislative issues raised by the Committee in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to its previous direct request.

The Committee notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 28 August 2007, which refer to the legislative issues under examination by the Committee, in particular, restrictions to trade union rights in the public sector.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 23 of the Labour Proclamation, which protects workers against dismissal linked to trade union membership or trade union activities, so as to broaden the protection to cover acts of anti-union discrimination committed at the time of recruitment or during the course of employment (transfers, relocations, demotions, etc.). The Committee notes the Government's indication that in line with the provisions of the Convention, trade union leaders are well protected in Eritrea. Section 28(3) of the Labour Proclamation provides for reinstatement in case of an unjustifiable dismissal. The Government states, however, that the possibility to broaden the application of section 23 of the Labour Proclamation, so as to bring it in conformity with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention, was being considered by the Minister of Labour and Human Welfare. The Committee recalls that the Convention requires protection against anti-union discrimination to cover recruitment and all prejudicial acts during the course of employment, including dismissal, transfer, relocation, demotion, deprivation and restrictions of all kinds (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 212). The Committee hopes that section 23 of the Labour Proclamation will be amended accordingly in the near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this regard.

2. The Committee recalls that it had previously considered that a fine of 1,200 nafka, set out in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation, to punish those guilty of anti-union discrimination or acts of interference, did not constitute an adequate protection and had noted the Government's indication that section 692 of the Transitional Penal Code became applicable in cases where an offence was considered severe or repeated. In this respect, the Committee had requested the Government to provide information concerning the cases, means and method by which an offence of anti-union discrimination or interference by employers' and workers' organizations in each other's internal affairs was deemed to become severe so as to attract higher penalties than those provided for in section 156 of the Labour Proclamation. The Committee had further requested the Government to indicate whether, by referring solely to breaches by employers' associations, section 156 of the Proclamation only provided for sanctions against employers' organizations and not against individual employers who may or may not be members of organizations. The Committee regrets that the Government confines itself to stating that the Ministry of Labour and Human Welfare is studying the possibility of bringing the legislation into conformity with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee recalls once again that the existence of general legislative provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough, if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 214). The Committee hopes that the legislative amendments will take into account the Committee's observations and requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Articles 1, 2, 4 and 6. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee had expressed the strong hope that the Ministry would issue a regulation in the near future that ensured that domestic employees were entitled to exercise their trade union rights, guaranteed under Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee notes the Government's indication that drafting of a regulation, which would adequately deal with different working conditions of domestic employees, needs sufficient time and effort; while this question is under consideration by the Ministry of Labour and Human Welfare, it will take time before a comprehensive regulation with regard to domestic employees is developed. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any development in this regard.

2. The Committee had further requested the Government to provide specific information concerning the status of the draft Civil Service Proclamation. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the drafting of the Civil Servants' Code (which would guarantee the right to organize to civil servants) reached its final stage and will be communicated to the ILO once adopted. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures, in consultation with the social partners, in order to improve its legislation in respect of the matters raised above and will transmit copies of the relevant legislative acts upon their adoption.

Estonia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 28 August 2007 reiterating the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) concerning issues already raised by the Committee on the restrictions to the right to strike of public servants. The Committee notes the Government's communications in reply to the ICFTU's comments and regrets that no information was provided by the Government on the question of the right to strike of public servants.

The Committee recalls that for a number of years it had been raising the issue of the prohibition of the right to strike in government institutions and other state or local authority departments (section 21(1) of the Collective Dispute Resolutions Act (1993)). It had also been requesting the Government to provide a "list of enterprises and agencies which satisfy the primary needs of the population and economy", where minimum services must be maintained during a strike (section 21(3) and (4) of the Collective Dispute Resolutions Act). The Committee recalls that in its previous direct request, the Government had indicated that amendments to the Act, which would ensure that strikes in the public service would be prohibited only with regard to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and would provide for the list of services where the rights to strike would be restricted (essential services), were about to be adopted. The Committee hopes that the Collective Dispute Resolutions Act will soon be amended and requests the Government to keep it informed in its next report on the progress made in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1994)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) concerning the allegations of violation of trade union rights and the Government's reply thereon. In particular, the Committee notes that according to the Government, two cases in connection with the violation of trade union rights were examined by the tripartite labour dispute committees of the National Labour Inspectorate and no such cases were brought before the courts in 2006–07.

Ethiopia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee regrets that the Government's report is limited to the indication of legislative provisions which, according to the Government, ensure the application of the Convention, despite the fact that the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, after noting the non-application of the Convention over many years, had requested the Government in June 2007 to provide detailed information to the Committee of Experts.

The Committee regrets that the Government provided no reply to the previous comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) and the Education International (EI), which concerned similar allegations and specifically the following: (1) Ethiopian Teachers' Association's (ETA) offices closed, documents and electronic equipment confiscated from offices in 2005 and its financial assets frozen since 1993; (2) nine teachers from the ETA's Addis Ababa branch arrested and two badly beaten on 25 September 2005 following a meeting to discuss preparations for World Teachers' Day; (3) approximately 24 teachers/ETA members detained in November 2005; (4) charges including conspiracy, armed insurrection, high treason and genocide brought against ETA's leaders carrying sentences ranging from three years to the death penalty; (5) 58 teachers and ETA members believed to be still in prison, denied release on bail and prevented from meeting their lawyers at the end of 2005. The Committee takes note of the comments of the ITUC dated 28 August 2007 on the application of the Convention referring to the issues raised by the Committee above and alleging violations of teachers' trade union rights (creation of a union controlled by the Government, disruption of trade union meetings, harassment, arrests, detention, torture and abduction of members of the ETA).

Furthermore, the Committee takes note of the discussion held on the application of the Convention in the Conference Committee in June 2007. The Committee notes the observations of the Government provided during the discussion on the allegations concerning the ETA with regard to the detention of some of its members, the alleged closure of its office and the alleged confiscation of the association's property and documents provided by the Government to the Conference Committee. According to the Government, the allegations that it was supporting one ETA over the other, illegally transferring ETA union funds, detaining members of the other association and confiscating its property were utterly false and unfounded. Concerning the alleged detention of Mr Kebede, Chair of the Addis Ababa's branch of the ETA, the Committee notes the Government's statement that in April 2007, the Federal High Court ruled that Mr Kebede was to be released without charge, as he had no case to answer to. The Government indicated that there were no teachers in custody. While welcoming the acquittal and release of Mr Kebede and his colleagues, the Committee expresses deep concern over the new allegations made relating to recent arrests of trade unionists, their torture and mistreatment when in detention, and continuing intimidation and interference. The Committee recalls that when disorders have occurred involving loss of human life or serious injuries, the setting up of an independent judicial inquiry is a particularly appropriate method of fully ascertaining the facts, determining responsibilities, punishing those responsible and preventing the repetition of such actions. Judicial inquiries of this kind should be conducted as promptly and speedily as possible, since otherwise there is a risk of de facto impunity which reinforces the climate of violence and insecurity and which is therefore highly detrimental to the exercise of trade union activities (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 29). The Committee urges the Government to conduct a full and independent inquiry without delay into all of the allegations made by the ITUC and earlier by the ICFTU and EI and to keep it informed of the outcome. The Committee firmly encourages the Government to accept a direct contacts mission to the country, as requested by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards and the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had addressed the following matters.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish organizations of their own choosing. The Committee had previously noted that according to the Labour Proclamation of 2003, by virtue of its section 3, was not applicable to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care, rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes, managerial employees, as well as to employees of state administration, judges and prosecutors, who were governed by special laws. Recalling that the only exceptions authorized by Convention No. 87 are the members of the police and armed forces, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate how the right to organize of the abovementioned categories of workers is ensured in law and in practice and to transmit with its next report any specific legislation in this respect.

The Committee notes Case No. 2516 pending before the Committee on Freedom of Association. It notes, in particular, that teachers employed in the public sector and civil servants are excluded from the right to form and join trade unions and that the Government is in the process of revision of the Civil Servant Proclamation, which would protect and guarantee the right of civil servants (including teachers in public schools). The Committee therefore urges the Government to ensure the right to freedom of association of civil servants, including teachers in the public sector, and to keep it informed of any progress made in this respect.

Article 3. Right of workers' organizations to organize their programme of action without interference from public authorities. The Committee had previously noted that air transport and urban bus services were listed as essential services in which strike action is prohibited (section 136(2) of the Labour Proclamation). The Committee considers that these services do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee therefore suggests that the Government give consideration to the establishment of a system of minimum service in these services of public utility, rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee requests that the Government take the necessary measures so that the abovementioned services are deleted from the list of essential services and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously raised a concern over the compulsory arbitration imposed at the request of one party. The Committee had noted that section 143(2) of the Labour Proclamation allowed the aggrieved party to the labour dispute to take the case to the Labour Relations Board for arbitration or to the appropriate court. In this case, the strike is considered unlawful (section 160(1)). In the case of essential services, as listed in section 136(2), the dispute is referred to an ad hoc board for arbitration (section 144(2)). The Committee recalls that, except in situations concerning essential services in the strict sense of the term, acute national crisis and public servants exercising authority in the name of the State, recourse to arbitration should only be allowed upon the request of both parties. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to amend its legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously noted that section 158(3) of the Labour Proclamation concerning a strike ballot provided that the strike vote should be taken by the majority of the workers concerned in a meeting in which at least two-thirds of the members of the trade union were present. The Committee recalls that, if the legislation requires a vote by workers before a strike can be held, it should be ensured that account is taken only of the votes cast, and that the required quorum and majority are fixed at a reasonable level (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 170). The Committee once again requests the Government to amend section 158(3) so as to lower the quorum required for a strike ballot and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Article 4. Dissolution of trade unions. The Committee had also noted that section 120(c) of the Labour Proclamation allows the cancellation of an organization's certificate of registration where an organization was found to have engaged in activities which were prohibited under the Labour Proclamation. As the Committee has already noted above, some of the provisions of the Labour Proclamation restrict the right of workers to organize their activities contrary to the Convention. It therefore requests the Government to ensure that these provisions are not invoked to cancel an organization's registration until they have been brought into conformity with the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's reports received in 2006 and 2007. The Committee further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 referring to the issues raised by the Committee below and reiterating the 2006 comments of the Education International (EI) concerning specific violations of the Convention regarding teachers' trade union rights in the public sector, including interference in trade union activities of the Ethiopian Teachers Association (ETA) by way of creation and control by the Government of a teachers' trade union, and the harassment of teachers (dismissals, transfers, etc.) in connection with their union affiliation. The Committee regrets that no observation thereon was provided by the Government. The Committee recalls that governments should refrain from interference in the establishment and functioning of trade unions. It therefore requests the Government to provide detailed information on the EI's and ITUC's allegations with its next report.

Scope of application of the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that, according to its section 3, Labour Proclamation No. 377/2003 was not applicable to the employment relations arising out of a contract concluded for the purpose of upbringing, treatment, care of rehabilitation, education, training (other than apprenticeship), contract of personal service for non-profit-making purposes and managerial employees. The Committee had requested the Government to provide information about the trade union rights of the abovementioned categories of workers. The Committee notes the Government's explanation that the first type of contracts are not covered by the labour proclamation because these types of contract are established solely for the purpose of upbringing or treatment of persons involved, once the person is totally rehabilitated or the child reaches maturity, the contract is terminated. As for the second type of contracts, i.e. those concluded for personal service, the Government indicates that, pursuant to section 3(3)(c), the Council of Ministers is expected to issue a regulation governing this type of contract of employment. The regulation would address the trade union rights of this category of workers. The Committee considers that all workers, whether they are employed on a permanent basis, for a fixed term or as contract employees, should have the rights afforded by the Convention and once again recalls that the only exceptions authorized by Convention are the members of the police and armed forces, and civil servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that categories of workers excluded from the scope of the Labour Proclamation enjoy the rights under the Convention, either by amending the Labour Proclamation or by adopting specific legislative provisions. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend its legislation by adopting specific provisions coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions, providing for protection of organizations of employers and workers against acts of interference by each other's agents or members in their establishment, functioning or administration so as to give full effect to Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the Government reiterates its previous statement to the effect that section 14(1) of the Labour Proclamation adequately protects against acts of interference. The Committee observes that this legislative provision deals with trade union rights for individual workers, while Article 2 of the Convention requires that protection be granted to organizations of workers and employers against acts of interference by each other or each other's agents and, in particular, acts which are designed to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means, with the object of placing such organizations under the control of employers or their organizations. Therefore, the Committee reiterates its previous request and asks the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the above principle.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 130(6) of the Labour Proclamation, as amended by Proclamation No. 494/2006, providing that, if the negotiation to modify or replace a collective agreement is not finalized within three months from the expiry date of the collective agreement, the provisions of the collective agreement relating to wages and other benefits shall cease to be effective. In view of the absence of the Government's reply on that issue, the Committee considers that this provision does not take into account the reasons behind a failure to finalize a new agreement nor the eventual responsibility of one or the other party for this failure and could therefore in some cases not be conducive to promoting collective bargaining. The Committee also considers that it is up to the parties to decide on the moment when the collective agreement becomes inapplicable after the date of its expiration. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to bring it into full conformity with the Convention and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had further taken note of article 4 of the draft regulation concerning employment relations established by religious or charity organizations, which provided that “employment relation established by religious or charity organizations with a person for administrative or charity work shall not be obliged to enter into collective bargaining concerning salary increment, fringe benefits, bonus and similar other benefits which may incur financial expense upon the organization”. The Committee once again recalls that collective bargaining should be promoted also in respect of these categories of workers and that no restrictions on the scope of bargaining should be imposed on workers by religious or charity institutions. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether this draft was brought into conformity with the Convention.

Articles 4 and 6. In its previous observation, the Committee had noted the Government’s statement to the effect that efforts were being made to explore experiences of other countries, with a view to draft, in due course, the legislation guaranteeing the right of civil servants, as well as of public teachers – who, contrary to privately employed teachers, to whom the right to unionize and engage in collective bargaining is guaranteed, can only form professional associations – to defend their occupational interests through collective bargaining. The Committee once again expresses the hope that legislation in this respect will be adopted without delay. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2002)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report as well as its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in a communication of 10 August 2006 mainly concerning issues already raised. The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 28 August 2007 with regard to violations of the Convention in 2006. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the ITUC comments.

The Committee takes note of the text of the Employment Relations Act No. 36 of 2007 (ERA) which went into effect on 1 October 2007 and repealed the Trade Unions Act, the Trade Disputes Act, the Trade Union (Recognition) Act and the Employment Act (section 265 of the Employment Relations Act).

Trade union registration. 1. In its previous comments the Committee had requested that the Government limit the Registrar’s discretionary power to approve a trade union amalgamation (sections 42 and 46 of the Trade Unions Act). The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 123 of the ERA limits the Registrar’s power to refuse an application for amalgamation to cases where the proposed rules of the amalgamated union do not make adequate provision for all matters enlisted in the Schedule to the Act or where any the purposes of the trade union is unlawful. Moreover, section 139 of the ERA provides for a right to appeal the decision of the Registrar to the Employment Relations Tribunal.

2. The Committee notes that in its comments, the ICFTU refers to delays in the registration of trade unions since the previous legislation did not provide for a time frame within which the registration should be concluded. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 120(2) of the ERA establishes a 21-day deadline from receipt of an application for registration within which the Registrar must decide on the application.

Right to strike. 1. The Committee had requested the Government to restrict the list of essential services in which the right to strike may be prohibited. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Schedule 7 of the Act defines essential services in line with the Convention.

2. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend the provisions which gave the authorities permanent powers of supervision over trade union ballots, including in case of strikes, in a way which constituted interference in trade union activities, and to indicate in this framework whether the enactment of the ERA would lead to the replacement and repeal not only of clause 13 of the Schedule to section 37 of the Trade Unions Act but also section 10(1) and 10(A)(a) of the Trade Unions Regulations. The Committee notes with interest that, in addition to section 265 of the ERA, which repeals the Trade Unions Act, section 265(7) provides that any subsidiary legislation like the Trade Unions Regulations continues only to the extent that it is consistent with the Act. The Committee requests the Government to confirm that section 10(1) and 10(A)(a) of the Trade Unions Regulations are no longer applicable.

The Committee notes that several discrepancies remain between the provisions of the ERA and the Convention. These are raised in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). It also notes the latest comments by the ITUC dated 27 August 2007 with regard to violations of the Convention in 2006 and requests the Government to send its observations on this issue.

The Committee notes the text of the Employment Relations Act No. 36 of 2007 (ERA) which came into effect on 1 October 2007 and repealed the Trade Unions Act, the Trade Disputes Act, the Trade Unions (Recognition) Act, the Wages Councils Act and the Employment Act (section 265 of the Employment Relations Act).

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union discrimination. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the need to ensure adequate protection against anti-union discrimination in the new legislation. The Committee notes that according to the ITUC, to date, not a single employer has been prosecuted despite numerous cases reported to the Ministry each year about victimization of workers who show any inclination to join a union; moreover, the courts have usually taken the position that reinstatement is not the remedy when employers interfere in union activities. The Committee notes with satisfaction from the Government's reply and the text of the ERA, that section 77 contains a comprehensive prohibition of acts of anti-union discrimination for all types of trade union activity, at all stages of the employment relationship, including recruitment. Part 13 provides for a redress system to address unfair dismissals. Part 20 allows trade unions to raise grievances through mediation services, the Employment Relations Tribunal and the Employment Relations Court. The Tribunal and Court have under section 230 the power to order remedies including reinstatement, reimbursement and/or compensation for humiliation, loss of benefit or loss of property.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to introduce adequate protection, including sufficiently rapid machinery and dissuasive sanctions, against acts of interference by employers or their organizations into workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee notes with satisfaction that protection is envisaged in section 125(1)(f) of the ERA as well as section 4 (definition of "duress" and "employment grievance") in conjunction with Part 20 of the ERA on the redress machinery which may be triggered in case of trade union grievances relative to acts of interference.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. 1. The Committee notes that the ITUC refers to: difficulties faced by minority unions in obtaining recognition for collective bargaining purposes, as such recognition is mandatory only for unions with absolute majority in the unit; and difficulties in concluding collective agreements in EPZs. The Committee notes with satisfaction that according to the Government, the ERA removed the absolute majority requirement for recognition so as to establish a duty to negotiate regardless of whether the union represents the absolute majority of workers in the unit, including in EPZs.

2. The Committee notes that the ITUC referred to a case of denial of access to a workplace by trade union representatives. The Committee notes with satisfaction that section 145 of the ERA (2007) now provides access to workplaces to trade union representatives with the consent of the employer which shall not be withheld unreasonably, in order to discuss union business with members, recruit members or provide information on the union and union membership to any worker on the premises.

Articles 1 and 4. With regard to its previous comments on the dispute in the Vatukoula Mining Company (refusal to recognize a union and dismissal of striking workers 15 years ago), the Committee, noting that the Government has not provided any information in this regard, once again requests the Government to give consideration to the recommendation of the Senate Select Committee for assistance to help the remaining workers re-establish themselves.

The Committee addresses a request on another point directly to the Government.

France

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1951)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It notes that, in a communication of 31 August 2007, the Confédération générale du travail–Force ouvrière (CGT–FO) indicates that the Act respecting social dialogue and continuity of the public service in scheduled land passenger transport of 21 August 2007 (Act No. 2007-1224) is not in conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that, by virtue of section 5 of this Act, transport enterprises, the employer and the representative trade unions shall engage in bargaining with a view to the conclusion, before 1 January 2008, of a collective agreement on the service to be envisaged in the event of the disturbance of traffic or a strike. This provision also establishes that, in the absence of an applicable agreement as of 1 January 2008, a plan of the envisaged services shall be determined by the employer. In this respect, the Committee recalls that the determination of a negotiated minimum service should be limited to the operations that are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, as it restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests. The Committee emphasizes that workers' organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining the minimum service, along with employers and the public authorities. The Committee also recalls that, in the event of disagreement, the parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body (or recourse to a judicial body by the mutual consent of parties) responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 161). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 5 of Act No. 2007-1224 taking into account the principles relating to the determination of a negotiated minimum service referred to above as well as to provide for a reasonable period of time for the negotiation of a minimum service.

The Committee requests the Government to transmit its replies to the observations of the CGT-FO.

The Committee is addressing a request on other issues directly to the Government.

Gabon

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) which referred largely to legislative issues already addressed by the Committee and restrictions on trade union rights, particularly acts of violence by the police against trade unionists. In its reply, the Government states that, in the cases of strike action referred to by the ICFTU where security forces were obliged to intervene (forestry sector, Ministry of Foreign Affairs), the dispute has been brought to an end through conciliation. The Committee recalls that strikes are one of the essential means available to workers and their organizations for the promotion and defence of their economic and social interests and trusts that in the future the Government will ensure that recourse to law enforcement only occurs in situations of a serious nature in which public order is seriously threatened.

The Committee notes the comments of the ITUC of 28 August 2007 which refer to the arrest and arbitrary imprisonment of representatives of the Free Trade Union Confederation of Gabon (CGSL) over recent years. The Committee also notes the communication from the Trade Union Congress of Gabon (CSG) dated 25 September 2007, which states that the problematic issue of trade union representation has been the object of intensive ILO technical assistance to Gabon, but that at present the Government refuses to address the issue. The CSG states that the designation of the most representative organizations is carried out in violation of the Convention and requests that professional elections be held. The Committee asks the Government to reply to the comments made by the ITUC and the CSG in its next report.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in a communication dated 10 August 2006 concerning issues already raised.

Scope of the Convention. The Committee notes that Labour Act No. 12 of 1990 (the Act) does not apply to workers engaged in civil service, prison service and domestic service. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill empowers the Secretary of State to extend the scope of the bill to cover any category of worker excluded. While recalling that only the armed forces, the police and public servants engaged in the administration of the State can be excluded from the guarantees of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to guarantee that the rights afforded by the Convention are ensured for the abovementioned categories of worker.

Article 1 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee had noted that section 75 of the Act provides that any term or condition in a contract of employment, whether express or implied, prohibiting an employee from becoming or remaining a member of any trade union, or purporting to subject the employee to any penalty, loss of benefit or detriment by reason of such membership, shall be null and void. However, according to section 73(1), not all workers are entitled to a written contract of employment, this type of contract being reserved to specific cases of employment, in particular, fixed-term employment of six months or more. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the way in which workers are guaranteed protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in cases where the employment relationship is not based on a written contract of employment.

The Committee had noted that Part IX, sections 109–125 of the Bill by which the Act was introduced to Parliament contained provisions on protection against dismissal by reason of union membership or because of participation in trade union activities, including strikes, and provided for compensation and reinstatement as remedies for such acts. However, the corresponding provisions are missing from the copy of the Labour Act adopted by Parliament, which the Committee has at its disposal. The Committee therefore requests the Government to transmit a complete copy of the Act.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee had noted that there is no provision in the Act concerning protection against acts of interference by workers' and employers' organizations (or their agents) in each other's affairs. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill provides protection against acts of interference. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the text of any provisions of the new labour bill that prohibit acts of interference (such as the establishment or financial support of workers' organizations with the object of placing them under the control of employers or employers' organizations) and guarantee sufficiently rapid appeal procedures and dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Measures to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or their organizations and workers' organizations. The Committee had observed that section 161 of the Act provides that voluntary agreements may be registered by the Commissioner upon the application of both parties to the agreement. Noting that the wording of this section seems to allow discretionary power to deny registration, the Committee recalls that the registration of the collective agreement can be refused only if it has a procedural flaw or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour law. The Committee notes that according to the Government the new labour bill does not give discretionary power to the Commissioner. It requests the Government to transmit a copy of the relevant provisions.

The Committee had noted that, according to section 168, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union must be registered as "efficient", within the meaning of sections 128(5) and 142 of the Act (i.e. the Registrar should be satisfied that the trade union is and is likely to remain independent and is capable of efficiently representing its members and conducting the trade union affairs). Considering that provisions which allow such great discretionary power to the Registrar are contrary to the principle of the autonomy of the parties in collective bargaining and therefore are not in conformity with the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to repeal or amend sections 128(5), 142 and 168, accordingly.

The Committee also noted that according to section 168, in order to be recognized as a sole bargaining agent, a trade union should represent a certain percentage of employees under a contract of service (30 per cent in the case of a single union and at least 45 per cent if the establishment in question employs at least 100 people; in this case, the bargaining agent could be composed of two or more trade unions). The Committee recalls that where, under a system for nominating an exclusive bargaining agent, there is no union representing the required percentage to be so designated, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members and requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee further noted that section 168(6) provides that an employer may, if he or she wishes, organize a secret ballot upon receiving an application to establish a sole bargaining agent. The Committee considers that the organization of a ballot for determining representativeness should be carried out by the authorities or an independent party upon a request presented by a union. While taking note of the Government's statement according to which the appropriate authorities will be informed of the Committee's comments in order to make the necessary changes, the Committee requests the Government to amend section 168(6) in accordance with the above.

The Committee had noted that under section 167, a work committee could be set up at an establishment where at least 100 employees are employed. The Committee notes that the Government has communicated the text of the relevant provisions of the new labour bill. The Committee requests the Government to clarify the role of such committees and more specifically to indicate: (1) whether trade union representatives can be elected to such committees; and (2) whether these committees can negotiate and conclude collective agreements even when a union exists in the undertaking.

Article 6. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether public servants not engaged in the administration of the State are granted collective bargaining rights and to specify the relevant legislative provisions. The Committee notes that according to the ICFTU, these categories of worker do not have the right to form unions and therefore do not have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes that according to the Government the relevant authorities will be advised to grant the right to collective bargaining to civil servants in the new labour bill.

The Committee trusts that the Government will take all necessary steps to bring its national law into conformity with the Convention and requests the Government to keep it informed of any measures taken or envisaged in this respect, in particular those concerning the adoption of the new labour bill.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Georgia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as its reply to the 2005 and 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation).

It further notes the comments of the ITUC and of the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) dated 28 and 31 August 2007, respectively, referring to the issues previously raised by the ICFTU and the Committee.

Labour Code (2006). The Committee had previously noted the adoption in 2006 of the new Labour Code. In this respect, the Committee had noted that while the new Labour Code repealed the Law on collective contracts and agreements and the Law on collective labour disputes, it did not regulate all aspects of freedom of association and that it appeared that by repealing the abovementioned legislation, there were numerous aspects of freedom of association that would not be sufficiently protected in law. The Committee had asked the Government to indicate whether it intended to adopt additional legislation to this end. The Committee notes the Government's indication that Chapter X of the Labour Code regulates the matters in connection with collective agreements and Chapter XII – labour disputes. It further notes the Government's statement that the Constitution and the Law on trade unions provide for protection of trade union rights. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Affairs has prepared draft amendments to the Labour Code so as to bring it into closer conformity with international labour standards. The draft amendments shall be submitted to Parliament pursuant to the procedure provided for in the national legislation. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the developments in this regard.

Law on trade unions. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend section 2(9) of the Law on trade unions so as to lower the minimum trade union membership requirement set at 100. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this requirement concerns establishment of trade union confederations (associations) and that the legislation does not provide for a minimum membership requirement for establishing a trade union, while 15 members are required to establish a primary trade union. While noting the Government's statement, the Committee notes that section 2(9) of the Law on trade unions refers expressly to "trade union" and not to "confederation of trade unions", while section 3(9) refers to the "primary trade union" and to the minimum requirement of 15 members. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 2(9) so as to lower the minimum trade union membership requirement and to ensure that the right to organize is effectively guaranteed. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee had asked the Government to indicate whether federations of trade unions may call a strike action in defence of their members' interests. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the legislation does not limit the right to strike of trade union confederations (associations).

Finally, the Committee recalls that it had previously noted the ICFTU's comments with regard to the dispute over trade union property and urged the Government to engage in consultations with trade union organizations in order to settle the question of the assignment of property. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the property dispute, previously referred to by the ICFTU, had been resolved.

With regard to the specific provisions of the Labour Code, the Committee is addressing a request directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and of the Georgian Trade Union Confederation (GTUC) which refer to the adoption of the Labour Code without prior consultation with trade unions and insufficient protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference, and insufficient regulation of collective bargaining matters.

The Committee notes the Government's statement that representatives of trade unions and employers' organizations were involved in the discussion of the Labour Code.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. Acts covered. The Committee had noted that section 11(6) of the Law on trade unions and section 2(3) of the new Labour Code prohibited, in very general terms, anti-union discrimination, and did not appear to constitute sufficient protection against anti-union discrimination: (i) at the time of recruitment of workers; and (ii) at the time of termination of their employment.

- (i) Recruitment. The Committee had noted that, pursuant to section 5(8) of the Labour Code, the employer was not required to substantiate his/her decision for not recruiting the applicant. Considering that the application of this section in practice might result in placing on a worker an insurmountable obstacle when proving that he/she was not recruited because of his/her trade union activities, the Committee requested the Government to amend section 5(8) of the Code. The Committee welcomes the Government's indication that discussions are taking place on reformulating this provision. The Committee expects that this provision will be soon amended so as to provide adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of hiring.
- (ii) Termination of employment. The Committee had noted that, according to sections 37(d) and 38(3) of the Code, the employer had a right to terminate a contract at his/her initiative with his/her employee provided that the employee was given one month's pay, unless otherwise envisaged by the contract. While the Government refers to the general prohibition of anti-union discrimination provided for in section 11(6) of the Law on trade unions, in light of the absence of explicit provisions banning dismissals by reason of union membership or participating in union activities, as noted above, the Committee considers that the legislation is unclear as to the regulation of cases of anti-union dismissals and does not offer sufficient protection against anti-union dismissals as called for by Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure that there is a specific prohibition of anti-union dismissals. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

Means of redress and sanctions. With regard to the Committee's previous request to provide for sufficiently dissuasive sanctions in cases of anti-union discrimination, the Committee notes the Government's statement that section 42 of the Code of Administrative Violations, punishes violations of labour legislation and labour protection rules by a penalty equivalent to a minimum of 100 times the labour remuneration and that the same violation committed within one year following the imposition of an administrative penalty is punishable by a penalty equivalent to 200 times the labour remuneration. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the relevant provisions regulating the procedure under the Code of Administrative Violations, its duration and the possibilities of means of redress available to workers, victims of acts of anti-union discrimination, including dismissals, transfers, downgrading, etc. (particularly, considering the GCTU's allegation of absence of procedures of redress in the national legislation). The Committee further notes that the Government indicates that, according to section 142 of the Criminal Code, "violations of the equality based on membership of any public association” is punishable by imprisonment for a period of up to two years. The Committee observes, however, that the Criminal Code (1999) at its disposal does not refer to discrimination based on membership of an association. It requests the Government to provide clarifications in this respect.

Article 2. Protection of workers’ organizations against acts of interference by employers. The Committee had previously noted that Georgian legislation prohibited acts of interference from employers in trade union activities. However, no express provisions for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference, existed in legislation. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to adopt specific legislative provisions in this respect.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. The Committee had previously noted that according to section 13 of the Labour Code, the employer (unilaterally) is authorized to specify the duration of a business week, the daily schedule, shifts, the duration of breaks, the time and place of remuneration payment, the duration of and the procedure for granting a leave and unpaid leave, the rules for complying with labour conditions, the type and the procedure for work-related incentives and responsibilities, the procedures for consideration of complaints/applications and other special rules subject to the specifics of the business of the organization. The Committee had further noted Chapter XII of the Code (sections 41–43), which concerns collective labour relations. Under section 41(1), “a collective contract shall be concluded between an employer and two or more employees”. According to section 42(1) and (3), for the purposes of concluding, changing or terminating a collective contract, or for the purpose of protecting the employees’ rights, the unions of employees act through their representatives, defined as any physical person. Furthermore, in accordance with section 43(2), an employee may conclude individual and/or several collective contracts with one employer. Pursuant to subsections (4) and (5) of the same section, if one of the parts of the contract is annulled on the initiative of either party, this could cause the termination of labour relations pursuant to the Labour Code; and the existence of collective contracts does not limit the right of the employee or the employer to terminate the contract. The Committee considers that sections 13 and 41–43 read together are in contradiction with the notion of collective agreements in the sense of Convention No. 98, i.e. agreements regulating terms and conditions of employment negotiated between employers or their organizations and workers’ organizations; moreover, the legislation seems to put in the same position collective agreements concluded with trade union organizations and agreements between an employer and non-unionized workers (sections 41–43). Furthermore, the Committee considers that with the Law on trade unions containing one general provision on the right of trade unions to collective bargaining, and the Law on collective contracts and agreements repealed, it is clear that collective bargaining is not sufficiently regulated (section 41 even stipulates that collective agreements follow the same principles as individual agreements). The Committee notes that the Government recognizes the need to improve the legislation, as Georgia does not have a collective agreement tradition and there are not too many collective agreements concluded in practice. Considering that the provisions of the new Labour Code do not promote collective bargaining as called for by Article 4 of the Convention, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures, either by amending the Labour Code or by adopting specific legislation on collective bargaining, so as to promote collective bargaining and to ensure the regulation by legislative means of the right of employers’ and workers’ organizations to bargain collectively in full conformity with Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that the Ministry of Labour, Health and Social Affairs has prepared draft amendments to the Labour Code so as to bring it into closer conformity with international labour standards; the draft amendments shall be submitted to the Parliament pursuant to the procedure provided for in the national legislation. The Committee hopes that all legislative modifications requested above will be reflected in the draft amendments to the Labour Code and requests the Government to keep it informed of the developments in this regard. The Committee recalls that the technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal.

Germany

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report and its reply to the 2006 comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation). The Committee further notes the comments submitted by the ITUC of 28 August 2007 concerning issues already raised by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that it has been requesting for a number of years the adoption of measures so as to recognize the right of public servants (“Beamte” including postal workers, railway employees and teachers among others) who are not exercising authority in the name of the State, to have recourse to strike action. In this respect, the Committee had noted in previous comments that innovative developments took place with a view to devising draft legislation on the comprehensive modernization of the law governing civil servants, in collaboration with the trade unions concerned, in order to gain broad support for the considerable changes in conditions of employment involved in the new draft legislation.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that: (1) the draft legislation concerning public servants was dropped following the change in Government: (2) Convention No. 87, by virtue of its very origin, does not have any bearing on the prohibition of strike action by civil servants and strike action for civil service is subject to a general prohibition under the terms of constitutional law: (3) the legal status of civil servants must, under constitutional law, be the same for all and there can be no distinction in respect of the ban of strike according to the functions of individual categories of civil servants and there is no differentiation by functional category with regard to the extent to which they are bound by their obligations. (4) Civil servants have no particular right to carry out a particular task or to continue to carry out what they regard as their particular function and it is for their superiors to decide where to deploy them, and to transfer them within a department as required. (5) The mobility required by the public administration would be significantly impaired if the legal status of civil servants differed according to their particular functions. (6) The call to accord some civil servants the right to strike, depending on their particular functions, is therefore not consonant with the fundamental principles of the German civil service and would be detrimental to the effective and responsible discharge of the administration's duties in the general public interest.

The Committee recalls that it has always considered that the right to strike is one of the essential means available to workers and their organizations for the promotion and protection of their economic and social interests. While accepting that the right to strike may be restricted or even prohibited in the public service, the Committee has clearly established that such a limitation may be applied only in the case of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State. In the Committee's view, postal workers, railway employees and teachers among others are not included in this category and should therefore have the right to strike, although the maintenance of a minimum service may be foreseen in the event of strikes in these sectors.

In light of the foregoing, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that public servants who do not exercise authority in the name of the State can have recourse to strike action in defence of their economic, social and occupational interests. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any concrete measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report and its observations on the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

The Committee's previous comments concerned the procedures through which the conditions of employment of civil servants, including teachers, are determined. The Committee had noted in 2005 that a major reform of the civil service was under way and that consultations and dialogue with public servants' trade unions had been an important element in the context of the preparation of draft legislation on the public service. It further notes from the Government's reply of 2006 to the comments of the ITUC that the conditions of employment of civil servants, including teachers, are, according to constitutional law principles, laid down in national laws and that, consequently, there is no provision for collective bargaining, even for individual categories of civil servants. The Government underlines that section 94 of the Federal Public Service Act (Bundesbeamtengesetz) and the relevant Länder legislation provides for the participation of public servants' unions in drawing up the regulations applicable to civil servants which constitute more than mere consultation but less than binding co-determination. The Government stresses that teachers are subject to the jurisdiction of the individual Länder administrations and that the latter decide whether to hire teaching staff as civil servants or as normal employees who have the right to collective bargaining. The Committee also notes from the Government's latest report that the draft legislation on comprehensive modernization of the law concerning public servants was dropped following the change in Government.

The Committee recalls that it is contrary to the Convention to exclude from the right to collective bargaining those categories of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State. In this respect, the Committee considers that teachers carry out different duties from officials engaged in the administration of the State, and therefore should enjoy the guarantees provided for under Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee recalls that negotiations need not necessarily lead to legally binding instruments so long as account is taken in good faith of the results of the negotiations in question. The Committee expresses the hope that the positive experience recently acquired through close consultation and dialogue with the public servants' trade unions will provide further opportunities to ensure that teachers can engage in formal negotiations and fully exercise the right to collective bargaining.

In the light of the above comments, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report measures taken or contemplated to study, together with the trade union organizations concerned, ways in which the current system could be developed so as to ensure a proper application of the Convention.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 28 August 2007. The ITUC's comments mainly refer to matters previously raised by the Committee.

The Committee had previously taken note of the comments submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) in 2006, which concerned allegations of the police firing shots and tear gas to disperse protesting miners and the dismissal of 17 workers, including five union executives, following a strike. In respect of the police shootings, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the workers concerned, who were employed on short-term contracts, were denied severance awards by their employer following the expiry of their contracts. They then commenced a demonstration and blocked the road leading to the employer's worksite, following which the police intervened to control the situation. The Government adds that no workers were injured, and that the workers concerned subsequently reached a settlement with their former employer in July 2003; a copy of the settlement, which was approved by the High Court of Justice, is attached to the Government's report.

As regards the alleged dismissals following a strike, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, following deadlocked contract negotiations, the union and enterprise concerned had resorted to the mediation procedure to resolve the dispute over salaries and remuneration. When mediation failed to resolve the dispute over salaries, the parties chose to submit the matter to arbitration, which in turn resulted in an arbitration award. The Government adds that the union local rejected the terms of the arbitration award, despite pleas from the National Labour Union Commission and the National Union, and embarked on an illegal strike on 17 October 2005. The employer then lawfully dismissed the workers in accordance with section 168(4) of the Labour Act, 2003 (Act 651). A tripartite investigation board was subsequently established to investigate the illegal strike, and following a request from the National Union the local union secretary was reinstated. The Committee takes due note of the above information.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC).

The Committee had previously taken note of the comments submitted by the ITUC in 2006, which referred to acts of anti-union discrimination in many companies. The Committee notes the Government's statement, in its reply to the ITUC's 2006 comments, that it has received no reports of complaints of anti-union discrimination and that the legislation provides adequate protection, including sanctions, against such acts.

Prison staff. The Committee notes the Government's indication in the Convention No. 87 report that while no legal provisions set forth the right to organize of prison staff, prison service staff have formed an association to protect and promote their interests. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to amend the Labour Act so as to ensure that prison service staff expressly enjoy the right to organize and to collective bargaining.

Collective bargaining certification. Finally, the Committee had previously noted that sections 99–100 of the Labour Act, 2004, regulate the issue of trade union recognition for collective bargaining purposes by providing that the Chief Labour Officer shall issue, upon request by a trade union, a certificate appointing that trade union as the appropriate representative to conduct negotiations on behalf of the class of workers specified in the collective bargaining certificate (section 99). The Chief Labour Officer shall, subject to regulations made by the minister, determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate in a situation where there is more than one trade union at the workplace (section 99(4)), and may issue an amending certificate after consultation with the trade union named in the certificate and the appropriate employers' organization (section 100).

It seems to the Committee that the Chief Labour Officer has full discretion to decide whether to grant recognition to a trade union and that the criteria upon which this decision should be based are not specified. The Committee considers that in cases in which a system of "compulsory" recognition has been established, where the employer must recognize the existing trade union(s) under certain conditions, it is important for the determination of the trade union in question to be based on objective and pre-established criteria so as to avoid any opportunity for partiality or abuse. Furthermore, when national legislation provides for a compulsory procedure for recognizing unions as exclusive bargaining agents, certain safeguards should be attached, such as: (a) the certification to be made by an independent body; (b) the representative organization to be chosen by a majority vote of the employees in the unit concerned; (c) the right of an organization, which in a previous trade union election failed to secure a sufficiently large number of votes, to request a new election after a stipulated period; and (d) the right of any new organization other than the certified organization to demand a new election after a reasonable period has elapsed (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 240). Noting also that the comments submitted by the ITUC refer to the refusal to grant trade union recognition in two enterprises, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any regulations adopted or envisaged under section 99 of the Labour Act with a view to setting up procedures and criteria relevant to the Chief Labour Officer's competence to determine which union shall hold a collective bargaining certificate.

Guatemala

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), of 31 August 2005, and the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA) of 26 August 2006. The Committee also notes the comments made by the ITUC, dated 28 August 2007, which refer to legislative matters and issues relating to the application of the Convention in practice which have already been raised by the Committee and, particularly, threats and harassment against a trade union leader, the attempted murder of a leader of the teaching sector and the kidnapping for two hours of a trade union leader. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments in this respect.

The Committee also notes the comments made by the Guatemalan Trade Union Movement, which groups together many trade union organizations (CTC, CGTG, CUSG, CNOC, CNSP, FENASTEG, FESEBS, FESTRAS, FESOC, FNL, SITRADOCSA, SITRADEORSA, SITRAPDEORSA and UNSITRAGUA), dated 27 August 2007. The Committee further notes the various cases that are being examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association, some of which relate to serious allegations concerning the murder of a trade union leader. The Committee also notes the conclusions of the technical assistance mission which visited the country from 26 to 28 February 2007.

Acts of violence against trade unionists

The Committee recalls that in previous observations it noted acts of violence against trade unionists and requested the Government to provide information on developments in this respect. The Committee notes that the Government provides information supplied by the Office of the Special Investigator into crimes against journalists and trade unionists of the Office of the Public Prosecutor concerning complaints relating to acts of violence against trade unionists. In accordance with this information, seven complaints were made in 2007, compared with 37 in 2006 and 43 in 2005. In addition, two rulings have been handed down, one in 2004 and another in 2006, with one person convicted in each case. There have also been cases of settlements through conciliation and 13 cases prepared and awaiting examination by the courts. In this respect, the Committee notes the conclusions of the technical assistance mission which emphasized the existence of situations of anti-union violence against trade unionists, including death threats, acts of intimidation and even the murder of a trade union leader in 2007. According to the information received by the mission, 17 trade unionists are benefiting from official security measures. In this respect, the mission welcomed the fact that, at its request, the Government provided protection measures for the Secretary-General of the Union of Workers of the Quetzal Port Enterprise, and the headquarters of the union. The Committee notes that the Office of the Public Prosecutor provided information to the mission on the situation with regard to complaints and criminal proceedings relating to crimes against trade unionists. The Committee notes that, in its conclusions, the mission indicated that the complaints made only lead in very few cases to the identification and punishment of those responsible. In this respect, while noting certain protection measures for trade unionists, the Committee once again expresses deep concern at the acts of violence against trade union leaders and members, and in particular deeply regrets the murder of a trade union leader in 2007. It recalls that trade union rights can only be exercised in a climate that is free of violence. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to guarantee full respect for the human rights of trade unionists and will continue providing protection measures to all trade unionists who so request. The Committee also asks the Government to take the necessary measures without delay to conduct the investigations with a view to identifying those responsible for acts of violence, prosecuting and penalizing them in accordance with the law. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any development in this respect.

Legislative problems

The Committee recalls that for many years it has been commenting on the following provisions which raise problems of conformity with the Convention:

- restrictions on the establishment of organizations in full freedom (the need to have half plus one of those working in the occupation to establish industry trade unions, under section 215(c) of the Labour Code), delays in the registration of trade unions or refusal to register them. In this respect, the Committee notes the indication by the technical assistance mission in its conclusions that “the legislation in force raises obstacles to the adequate development of trade unionism, starting with the impossibility in practice to establish industry unions, in view of the requirement in law for such organizations only to be accepted when their founders demonstrate that they represent 50 per cent plus one of the workers in the sector, which is clearly impossible to achieve”. The mission also referred to the lack of detailed statistics on trade unions and higher-level organizations;
- restrictions on the right to elect trade union leaders in full freedom (the need to be of Guatemalan origin and to be a worker in the enterprise or economic activity in order to be elected a trade union leader, under sections 220 and 223 of the Labour Code);
- restrictions on the free financial administration of trade union organizations under the Basic Act on supervision by the tax administration, which in particular allows inspections without prior notice. In this respect, the Committee notes that the technical assistance mission indicated in its conclusions that over the past eight years only one inspection of trade union accounts has been carried out and that financial investigations are exclusively based on disparities detected through information technology;

- restrictions on the right of workers' organizations to organize their activities freely (under section 241 of the Labour Code, strikes are declared not by a majority of those casting votes, but by a majority of the workers); the possibility of imposing compulsory arbitration in the event of a dispute in the public transport sector and in services related to fuel, and the need to determine whether strikes for the purpose of inter-union solidarity are still prohibited (section 4(d), (e) and (g) of Decree No. 71-86, as amended by Legislative Decree No. 35-96 of 27 March 1996); labour, civil and penal sanctions applicable to strikes involving public servants or workers in specified enterprises (sections 390(2) and 430 of the Penal Code and Decree No. 71-86). The Committee notes the emphasis placed by the technical assistance mission on the fact that there have not been any legal strikes since the 1970s. Indeed, according to the mission, "the problem lies in the excessive judicial basis of labour relations law, which in other countries is a matter for the labour administration and not the judiciary. Rulings by judges tend to hold sway when collective solutions are being sought and there is an absence of typical trade union action. It noted accordingly that the last lawful strike was held in 1975 and that for over ten years there has not been any type of strike".

With reference to these matters, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the technical assistance mission was extremely useful. The Government reports that following the mission tripartite meetings were held in the Tripartite Legal Reform Subcommittee, the pending issues were reviewed and a priority was established among the issues. A number of meetings have been held and the proposals made by the Committee have been reviewed, some of which had already achieved consensus in 2001. These issues include the amendment of section 390 of the Penal Code. The Government requests continued technical assistance in this respect.

In general terms, the Committee notes that the technical assistance mission also found that "the basis of the Guatemalan problem in the field of freedom of association and collective bargaining lies in the existence of a labour law system which, in both substantive and procedural terms, prevents and raises obstacles to the appropriate development of trade union activity and accordingly to collective bargaining and, as indicated by the ILO supervisory bodies, is in objective violation of Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Without the reform of the system, it is very difficult to propose an appropriate solution, particularly since both the social partners and the Government are imbued with a culture that follows very closely procedures arising out of this legal system". The Committee observes with concern that the serious problems on which it has been commenting for many years continue to persist and that, despite the tripartite discussion at the national level and the technical assistance provided on various occasions, there has not been significant progress. The Committee considers that a reform of existing legislation is needed in order for the guarantees expressed in the Convention. The Committee strongly hopes that the new Government, with the assistance of the mission which will be held at the end of April in 2008, will show the political will to resolve these issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any positive developments in relation to the various issues raised.

Other matters

Export processing sector. The Committee previously requested the Government to provide information on any complaints relating to violations of trade union rights in the export processing sector over the past two years, and on their outcome. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Government attaches information provided by the General Directorate of Labour according to which there are seven active trade union organizations. The Government also forwards information supplied by the general labour inspectorate relating to complaints of violations of Conventions Nos 87 and 98 between July 2006 and June 2007, of which one in 2006 related to the export processing sector. In 2007, there have not been complaints relating to the export processing sector. The Government indicates that since the establishment of the Export Processing Inspection Unit in 2003, the latter is responsible for addressing all types of complaints and labour disputes in the sector. Two workshops have been held and it is coordinating with the CGTG the organization of workshops addressing the subject of trade union rights. The Committee notes the Government's indication that technical and financial assistance has been requested from the ILO Subregional Office in San José in Costa Rica to hold monthly tripartite seminars on freedom of association and collective bargaining in the export processing industry. The Committee welcomes this initiative and hopes that the necessary technical assistance will be provided. In this regard, noting that in their latest communication the trade union organizations refer to significant problems relating to trade union rights, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give full effect to the Convention in export processing zones and to continue providing information in this respect.

Civil Service Bill. In its previous observation, the Committee noted a Civil Service Bill which, according to the UNSITRAGUA and the National State Union Workers' Federation (FENASTEG), requires a percentage that is too high to establish unions and restricts the right to strike. The Committee requested the Government to keep it informed of legislative developments in this respect. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the legislative initiative proposing amendments to the Civil Service Act was the subject of broad consultation and has received one favourable and another unfavourable opinion in the various commissions of the Congress of the Republic. The Government indicates that it requested technical assistance from the Office to assess and make the necessary recommendations and proposals on the compatibility of this legislative initiative with Conventions Nos 87 and 98. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, with the contribution of the requested technical assistance, the Civil Service Bill will be in full conformity with the provisions of the Convention. It requests the Government to keep it informed on this subject.

Situation of many workers in the public sector who do not benefit from trade union rights. The Committee notes that, according to the technical assistance mission, there are a high number of workers classified as temporary, daily or occasional and that these classifications are not set out in the law, but in the General State Budget, as indicated in the Manual of Budget Classifications for the public sector in Guatemala. These workers (they are under contracts under item 029 and others of the budget), who should have been recruited for specific or temporary tasks, are engaged in ordinary and permanent functions and often do not benefit from trade union rights and other employment benefits apart from wages, and are not covered by the social security nor by collective bargaining where it exists. In this connection, the Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention, all workers, without distinction whatsoever, with the sole possible exception of the armed forces and the police, shall have the right to establish and to join organizations of their own choosing. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all workers in the public sector, including those engaged under item 029 of the general state budget, benefit from the rights and guarantees set out in the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed on this subject.

Tripartite National Committee. Finally, the Committee previously requested the Government to examine in the Tripartite National Committee the issues raised by UNSITRAGUA in 2005. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, due to the new composition of the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs and the failure to appoint one of its members, it has not been possible to make progress in the work assigned to the tripartite subcommittees and councils. The pending issues raised by UNSITRAGUA will be examined in the context of the Legal Reform Subcommittee, which has just started to meet again; the pending agenda will be reviewed and it has been agreed on a tripartite basis that this issue will be re-examined by the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs. The Government is awaiting the communication from UNSITRAGUA to update the list of pending cases. It is also hoped to address the cases raised by UNSITRAGUA, in relation to which the Committee on Freedom of Association has recommended that investigations be undertaken, in the context of the Tripartite Committee. In this connection, the Committee notes that, according to the technical assistance mission, the Tripartite Committee requires technical assistance to improve its operation. The mission noted that the Tripartite Committee plays a valuable role in social dialogue and in slowing down undesirable legislative initiatives and draft texts, as well as in examining and resolving collective disputes, but that it does not succeed in putting forward joint proposals in relation to most of the pending problems. The Committee also notes the appreciation expressed by the mission that the Government (and the Labour Commission of the Congress) have requested additional technical assistance from the ILO to overcome the pending problems. The Committee requests the Government to continue keeping it informed of the work of the Tripartite Committee on International Labour Affairs, as well as that of the Legal Reform Subcommittee and the mechanism for rapid intervention in cases. The Committee invites the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that the issues raised by the Guatemalan Trade Union Movement in its communication of 27 August 2007 are also examined by the Tripartite Committee.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee notes the Government's report, the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007 and the cases under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee also notes the Government's reply to the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 12 July 2007, which mainly refer to matters that are already under examination by the Committee, as well as those covered in the cases under examination by the Committee on Freedom of Association.

The Committee also notes the conclusions of the technical assistance mission which visited the country from 26 to 28 February 2007 and the Government's acceptance of a new mission at the end of April 2008.

The Committee recalls that for various years it has been raising the following problems relating to restrictions on the exercise of trade union rights in practice.

Failure to comply with orders to reinstate dismissed trade unionists. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, together with magistrates from the Supreme Court of Justice, the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance has initiated an investigation into all the complaints of failure to comply with orders to reinstate dismissed trade unionists, with particular reference to the cases that are before the Committee on Freedom of Association. In this respect, the Government indicates that in cases in which reinstatement has not been carried out, this is recorded and the employers are prosecuted for failure to comply with court orders. In the case of mayors or ministers who have not complied with court orders, it is necessary to wait until the preliminary procedures are initiated before proceeding with the prosecution. According to the Government, certain cases are before the courts on appeals or recourse for the protection of constitutional rights (amparo). The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, as a result of these proceedings and court cases, compliance is achieved with reinstatement orders.

Slowness of the procedure to impose penalties for breaches of labour legislation. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that meetings have been held with magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice with a view to exchanging impressions and information, with a view to making tangible proposals to seek improvements in the application of labour law through the orders issued by labour courts. In this respect, the Government indicates that greater flexibility has been achieved in the penalties applied by the labour courts for labour-related offences and the respective fines have been imposed. Studies and analyses have been carried out according to the tripartite proposal for the recruitment of an official exclusively assigned to monitoring the implementation of sentences for labour and social security offences. The tripartite proposal to carry out training for labour judges with a view to unifying the criteria applied will be studied and analysed. It is also intended to carry out activities in the context of the project for the strengthening of labour courts in Central America and the Dominican Republic, which is currently being implemented by the ILO Subregional Office and is financed by the Government of the United States.

The Committee also notes that in its conclusions the technical assistance mission considered that court procedures are slow in view of the low number of courts and the possibility for those found guilty, following the ruling of the court of second instance, to challenge the ruling through a procedure for the protection of constitutional rights (amparo). This procedure impedes prompt action by the courts and means in practice that a new body becomes involved, thereby doubling the time required for the proceedings. It adds that the roots of the problem lie in the excessive reliance on the courts to assert collective labour rights. There is a tendency to defer to the courts when seeking collective solutions, and an absence of typical trade union action.

Need to promote trade union rights (and particularly collective bargaining), especially in export processing zones. The Committee notes the Government's indication that two tripartite seminars were undertaken on freedom of association and collective bargaining in the export processing sector, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee. The Government adds that due to the high level of demand and the need to promote trade unionism and collective bargaining in this sector, and with a view to continuing this work, technical and financial assistance has been requested with a view to holding a monthly tripartite seminar on freedom of association and collective bargaining in the export processing industry. The Government adds that, in the context of a draft national policy of free advice for workers wishing to organize, 15,000 information leaflets have been issued. Furthermore, there is a free legal advice service for workers wishing to organize, including the regular dissemination of labour and social security laws. Labour inspectors are continually holding training seminars. The Government adds that the dispute prevention body in the export processing zone has carried out two seminars covering the subjects of labour law and "complaint procedures". Workshops are also being organized on the subject of freedom of association.

The Committee further notes that the technical assistance mission indicated that it received contradictory information on the situation with regard to collective bargaining in export processing zones, where there are only two collective agreements in force, although it is not known how many workers they cover. There are now no more than three trade unions existing in export processing zones. The Committee requests the Government to continue promoting trade union rights in export processing zones and to provide information on this subject, particularly taking into account the reference in their latest communication by the national trade union organizations to substantial problems relating to trade union rights.

Numerous anti-union dismissals and violations of collective agreements. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's indication that, as a result of an investigation carried out by the labour courts it was found that there are very few complaints relating to anti-union dismissals. The Committee nevertheless emphasizes that the trade union organizations of the country in their latest communication refer to many cases of anti-union dismissals and that there are complaints before the Committee on Freedom of Association on this subject. With regard to the violation of collective agreements, according to a joint investigation undertaken by the Ministry of Labour and Social Security and the labour courts, it was found that in the few complaints that are made the parties to the conflict use the Joint Board to reach a settlement directly through conciliation.

According to the conclusions of the technical assistance mission, the fall in trade union membership has very different causes, although emphasis should be placed on the excessive slowness of procedures in cases of anti-union discrimination, the abuse of the appeal procedure for constitutional rights (amparo) and the inefficiency of the system of penalizing violations of labour and trade union legislation. The mission also concluded that cases of failure to comply with collective agreements can be taken through the usual court procedures, but that in practice this process, in the same way as the penalization of violations of labour law, can also take years. The Committee notes that the problems referred to persist and requests the Government to provide information on the complaints made.

Inadequacy of guarantees in the procedure for the termination of public officials (section 79 of the Civil Service Act; section 80 of the Regulations issued under this Act; Decree No. 35-96 amending Decree No. 71-86 of the Congress of the Republic; and Government decision No. 564-98, of 26 August 1998). In this context, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the relevant provisions are contained in the Political Constitution of the Republic, the Labour Code, the Civil Service Act and its Regulations, and the Act on unionization and regulation of the right to strike by state employees. To impose a penalty, which may range from a verbal warning to termination of employment, it is necessary to comply with the requirements set out in the law, without which the penalties may be void. This shows that there are adequate guarantees in the procedures for the termination of public officials from the view point of the right of defence and the remedies available to workers. The Committee notes this information and understands that this issue was raised years ago by trade union organizations which were calling for a system of termination of employment in the public sector similar to the one set out in the Labour Code.

Need for the Code of Labour Procedures to be subject to in-depth consultations with the most representative organizations of workers and employers. In this connection, the Committee notes the Government's view that it is not necessary to amend the Code of Labour Procedures. The Government adds that the magistrates of the Supreme Court of Justice maintain constant and productive dialogue with all the labour court judges in the country and that the objective is to make labour procedures more efficient and entirely oral, so that they can be more expeditive. The Government adds that the Extraordinary Commission for reforms in the judicial sector of the Congress of the Republic prepared a draft text which approves amendments to the Act respecting the protection of constitutional rights (amparo) which has received a favourable opinion and that the text was discussed and approved in the plenary of the Congress of the Republic in two readings. This proposed reform was the subject of broad consultation with the magistrates of the Supreme Court, the National Commission to follow up and support the strengthening of justice, officials of the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the public criminal defence service, representatives of the college of advocates and sectors of civil society. The reform is intended to make the process of seeking constitutional protection (amparo) more flexible and convert it into a system that is only used in special circumstances, brief and effective in its function of protecting fundamental human rights. In this way, it is intended to minimize the problems that are currently occurring in which the process of the protection of constitutional rights has given rise to delays and increased the workload of the courts through abusive actions. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on developments in this draft reform.

Bill on civil service reform. On this subject, the Committee notes that the initiative to reform the Civil Service Act was the subject of broad consultations. The Bill has received one favourable opinion and another that is unfavourable in the Congress of the Republic. The Government indicates that it has requested technical assistance to assess and make the necessary recommendations and proposals on the compatibility of the initiative with the Convention. The Committee hopes that this technical assistance will be provided in the near future.

Other matters. The Committee previously requested the Government, in the context of the Tripartite Commission, for an evaluation to be made of the various specific issues on which the institutional system for the defence of trade union rights remains deficient. In this respect the Committee notes the Government's indication that meetings were initiated recently in the Tripartite Subcommittee on Legal Reforms, which will examine this issue.

The Committee further notes that, in general, the mission considered that the legislation that is in force raises obstacles to the appropriate development of trade union activities. In its report, it indicates that in 2005 and 2006, a total of 13 and 17 agreements were concluded respectively. The mission considered that the roots of the problem in Guatemala in relation to freedom of association and collective bargaining are to be found in the existence of a legal labour system, in both substance and procedural terms, which prevents and hinders the appropriate development of trade union activity, and accordingly of collective bargaining, as indicated by the ILO supervisory bodies in relation to Conventions Nos 87 and 98. Without their reform, it is very difficult to propose an appropriate solution and, moreover, the social partners and the Government display an approach that is entwined with attitudes arising out of this legal system. The Committee notes that this system gives priority to labour stability in collective disputes, which can last for years when they go to the courts. In a certain way, collective bargaining has been exchanged for labour stability, which does not ensure the effective application of Article 4 of the Convention.

The mission also considered that the Ministry of Labour is very weak for various reasons (budget, staffing, facilities, etc.), and even more so since a ruling by the Constitutional Court that it cannot judge and penalize violations of labour rules. This decision relieved the labour administration of the little enforcement capacity that it had. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the General Labour Inspectorate is competent to receive complaints of violations of the trade union rights of state workers and: (a) to participate as a conciliator, in accordance with the ruling by the Jurisdictional Disputes Tribunal of the Supreme Court of Justice of Guatemala; or (b) to submit them to the courts. The Government adds that the first of these channels is currently used to find alternative settlements to the innumerable collective disputes between the public administration and its employees.

With regard to the Tripartite Committee, the Committee notes the view of the mission that the Tripartite Committee requires technical assistance to improve its operation. It requests the Government to forward this assessment to the Tripartite Committee. According to the report of the mission, the Tripartite Committee fulfils a very valuable role of social dialogue and of slowing down undesired legislative initiatives and proposals, and of examining and resolving collective disputes, but it does not manage to make joint proposals in the case of most pending problems. The main conclusion of the mission is that in recent years, despite the various ILO missions, the serious problems raised by the Committee of Experts persist and that dialogue in the Tripartite Committee has not resolved them. In the meantime, the unionization rate, according to the trade unions, is between 0.5 and 1.88 per cent and the number of collective agreements is very low. In any case, detailed statistics of trade union membership and collective bargaining, including the number of workers covered, do not exist and it would be necessary to find a solution to this situation. The Committee observes that the mission welcomed the request by the Government (and the Labour Commission of the Congress) for additional ILO assistance to overcome the remaining problems, and for the organization of tripartite seminars on trade union rights in export processing zones.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that the mission was very useful. As a result of its work, the Committee notes the Government's indication that tripartite seminars have been carried out on freedom of association and collective bargaining in the export processing sector and that meetings were convened of the Legal Reform Subcommission, the pending issues were reviewed and priorities established, in terms of the subjects to be considered. The comments made by the Committee have been reviewed, and certain of them had already been reviewed and obtained consensus in 2001. The Committee notes the Government's request for continued technical assistance.

Nevertheless, the Committee observes with concern that the serious problems on which it has been commenting for numerous years persist and that, despite the tripartite discussion at the national level and the technical assistance provided on various occasions, there has been no major progress. The Committee strongly hopes that the new Government, with the assistance of the mission suggested by the Conference Committee that will take place at the end of April 2008, will provide evidence of the political will to resolve these issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in its next report on any positive development that occurs in relation to the various issues referred to above.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1959)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the comments of 28 August 2007 by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) reiterating the comments made in 2006 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) on matters already raised by the Committee. The ITUC reports recurring intimidation and threats against trade union leaders and violent repression of strikes by the police. The Committee hopes that the Government will do its utmost to ensure that henceforth the rights of workers' and employers' organizations are fully observed in a climate free from violence and pressure or threats of any kind against the leaders and members of these organizations. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC's comments.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments the Committee raised a number of points about the national legislation as follows:

- the need for measures to set up an independent body that has the trust of the parties and is able to rule promptly on difficulties encountered in defining the minimum service where the parties are unable to agree as to the minimum service in transport and communications (which are not deemed essential in the strict sense of the term); and
- the need for measures to ensure that compulsory arbitration (established in section 342, 350 and 351 of the Labour Code) is restricted to cases where the two parties agree to request it, in essential services in the strict sense of the term or in the event of acute national crisis.

While noting the difficulties the country is facing, the Committee reminds the Government that in its last report it undertook to take account of the Committee's comments when revising the Labour Code. The Committee trusts that the Government will address these matters very shortly, in consultation with the representative organizations of employers and workers concerned, and asks it to keep it informed of any developments in the situation.

The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office.

1. The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 28 August 2007 concerning legislative matters already raised by the Committee and denouncing recurrent acts of anti-union discrimination and interference.

2. The Committee refers again to the points contained in its previous comments concerning the need to amend the national legislation.

Article 1 of the Convention. Need to include in the national legislation specific provisions: (a) to protect all workers, and not only trade union delegates as set out in the Labour Code, against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during employment; (b) to explicitly provide for appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference; (c) to provide for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions for violations of section 3 of the draft new Labour Code, which provides that no employer may take into consideration membership of a trade union and trade union activities of workers in making decisions with regard to recruitment, performance and distribution of work, termination of the employment contract, etc.

Article 2. Request to include in the draft Labour Code specific provisions prohibiting acts of interference in the internal affairs of workers' and employers' organizations accompanied by efficient and speedy procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions.

The Committee hopes that the provisions of the future Labour Code will be in full conformity with Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of all developments in this regard.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1977)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which refer to the issues examined by the Committee.

The Committee recalls that for several years it has been referring to the following matters.

1. Articles 4 and 6 of the Convention. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that it intended to pursue the process of revision of the General Labour Act, Title XI of which contains provisions on collective bargaining, and to take steps to give agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights envisaged in the Convention. The Committee notes that according to the ITUC's comments, there are only bilateral negotiations between employers and workers, and the Tripartite National Council for National Consultation has not managed to negotiate wages. The Committee notes that the Government only states that collective bargaining is regulated by Chapter XI of Act No. 2/86 and makes no reference to the process of revision of the General Labour Act, in particular the provisions of Title XI on collective bargaining, nor to steps taken to give agricultural workers and dockworkers the rights envisaged in the Convention. In these circumstances, the Committee expresses its concern about the situation and once again asks the Government to provide information in this regard.

2. The Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on measures taken to secure the adoption of the special legislation which, under section 2(2) of Act No. 8/41 on freedom of association, was to regulate the right to collective bargaining for public servants who are not engaged in the administration of the State. Consequently, the Committee once again asks the Government to provide information in this respect.

3. Finally, the Committee previously requested the Government to keep it informed of any developments with regard to the promotion of collective bargaining in the public and private sectors (training and information activities, seminars with the social partners, etc.) and to send statistics on the collective agreements concluded (by sector) and the number of workers they cover. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there are two collective agreements for the banking and telecommunications sectors, and agreements concluded between the Government and the National Union of Workers of Guinea (UNTG). The Committee considers the number of collective agreements in force to be very low. The Committee reminds the Government that Article 4 of the Convention provides that "measures appropriate to national conditions shall be taken, where necessary, to encourage and promote the full development and utilization of machinery for voluntary negotiation between employers or employers' organizations and workers' organizations, with a view to the regulation of terms and conditions of employment by means of collective agreements". The Committee asks the Government to take specific steps to promote the greater utilization in practice of collective bargaining in the private and public sectors and to keep it informed of any developments in this respect, the number of new agreements concluded and the number of workers covered by such agreements.

Guyana

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1967)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. The Committee recalls that its previous observation referred to the following questions:

- the need to amend the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act (Chapter 54:01) in respect to: (1) conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer a dispute in the services listed in the schedule to a tribunal for compulsory arbitration and the sanction (fine or imprisonment) imposed on workers who take part in an illegal strike (section 19); (2) the schedule listing the essential services (which may be revised at the discretion of the Minister) that contains some services that go beyond those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (dockage, wharfage, discharging, loading or unloading of vessels, the services provided by the Transport and Harbours Department and the National Drainage and Irrigation Board cannot be considered essential services in the strict sense of the term). The Committee recalled that the authorities may establish, with the participation of workers' and employers' organizations, a system of minimum service in those services considered to be of public utility; and
- section 19 of the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration (Amendment) Bill 2006 that sets higher fines than those provided for in the previous Act and maintains the imprisonment for those workers who take part in an illegal strike.

The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that there is no restriction on the right to strike and that workers who choose to strike are protected by the law. The Committee once again reminds the Government that, by conferring on the Minister broad powers to refer to compulsory arbitration disputes in services, not all of which are essential, and by providing for sanctions (fine or imprisonment) in the event of an illegal strike, the Public Utility Undertakings and Public Health Services Arbitration Act and the Bill introduced to amend it compromise the workers' right to strike which the Committee considers to be one of the essential means available to them to protect their interests.

The Committee expresses the hope that necessary measures will be taken to amend the legislation so as to bring it in conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the Government's detailed reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation).

The Committee notes that the Government did not deny the ICFTU's comment to the effect that, in December 2005, it set the level of the public sector pay raise without consulting the Guyana Public Service Union (GPSU) – in breach of the collective agreement with the union. The Committee recalls the importance it attaches to the respect of collective agreements and requests the Government to ensure that collective agreements are respected in the future.

In its previous observation, the Committee referred to the recognition of only those unions claiming 40 per cent support of the workers, as set out in the Trade Union Recognition Act. The Committee takes note of the Government's statement that, at the request of the Trades Union Congress, the Trade Union Recognition Act provided for the recognition of unions that were recognized prior to the Act without having to prove that they had majority support (section 32). All unions benefited from this provision which the Government says is no longer applicable as all certificates applicable under this section have been issued. Given that the representativeness of unions might change, the Committee recalls once again that, if no union covers more than 40 per cent of the workers in the bargaining unit, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their members (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 241). The Committee hopes that significant progress respecting this issue will be made in the near future and requests the Government to keep it informed of the results of the consultative process.

Haiti

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

1. Comments from the ICFTU (now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) and the ITUC. In its previous observation, the Committee noted a communication from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) dated 10 August 2006, which referred to a raid carried out by armed policemen at the premises of a higher level trade union organization, the Trade Union Confederation of Haiti (CSH). The Committee notes the communication from the ITUC dated 28 August 2007, which refers to legislative issues already addressed by the Committee in relation to dispute settlement mechanisms and the exercise of the right to strike. The Committee requests the Government to send its comments on the observations of the ICFTU and the ITUC and to indicate whether an inquiry has been launched into the murder of trade union delegate Guillaume Lafontant and, if so, to inform it of the outcome of the inquiry and any subsequent action taken.

2. Amendment of the legislation. The Committee recalls that for many years now its comments have referred to the need to:

- take steps to amend section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983, which gives the Government broad powers of supervision over trade unions, and sections 185, 190, 199, 200 and 206 of the Labour Code, which allow for compulsory arbitration at the request of only one party to a labour dispute;
- bring national legislation into line with the provisions of article 35 of the Constitution of 1987, which guarantees freedom of association and protection of workers' rights in both the public and the private sectors;
- amend sections 233, 239 and 257 of the Labour Code, so as to remove all impediments to the right of association of minors and domestic workers and give foreign workers access to trade union office, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country; and
- repeal or amend section 236 of the Penal Code, under which government consent is required for the establishment of an association of more than 20 members.

The Committee recalls the Government's indication that the Labour Code has been under revision since April 2000, but that, due to political troubles and the absence of Parliament, it has not been possible to complete the new draft. The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will indicate that progress has been made in reviewing national legislation for the purposes of bringing it into line with the Convention and trusts that all the points mentioned will be taken into consideration. The Committee reminds the Government that it may request technical assistance from the Office.

3. Finally, the Committee previously noted that certain categories of workers, such as public service employees, workers in the rural sector, independent workers and domestic workers, were excluded from the scope of the Labour Code. It asked the Government to specify the texts ensuring and governing the trade union rights of workers in the rural sector, independent workers and domestic workers. It also asked the Government to provide a copy of the Decree of 17 July 2005 amending the Act of 1982 regulating the public service. The Committee urges the Government to provide the information and text requested.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received.

1. Comments by the ITUC. The Committee takes note of a communication of 28 August 2007 from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on matters already raised concerning legislative issues relating to the dispute settlement machinery and acts of discrimination and interference in certain enterprises which have not been sanctioned. According to the ITUC, workers in rural areas and the informal economy, self-employed workers and domestic workers are not covered by the Labour Code and have no trade union rights. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, the labour inspectorate is unable to operate and the courts system is dysfunctional.

2. Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention. In its previous comments the Committee asked the Government to keep it informed of any developments concerning: (i) the adoption of a specific provision establishing protection against anti-union discrimination in hiring practices; (ii) the adoption of provisions providing in general adequate protection for workers against acts of anti-union discrimination, accompanied by efficient and swift procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions; and (iii) the revision of section 34 of the Decree of 4 November 1983 empowering the social organizations branch of the Department of Labour and Social Welfare to intervene in the drafting of collective agreements.

The Committee recalls that in its 2005 report, the Government stated its intention of taking all necessary measures to protect workers against all forms of anti-union discrimination, provide workers' and employers' organizations with adequate protection against acts of interference in each other's affairs, and establish the conditions for encouraging and promoting the development and broadest possible use of voluntary bargaining procedures. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC, the new Government has reiterated these commitments but no progress has been noted as yet.

While noting the difficulties the country is confronting, the Committee expresses the hope that the Government will be in a position to report progress in the near future in the adoption of legislative measures to bring the national legislation into line with the Convention and reminds it that the technical assistance of the Office is at its disposal. It also asks the Government to provide detailed information in response to the ITUC's observations and on developments in the situation.

Honduras

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments sent by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) on 10 August 2006, which referred to issues of law that are currently under examination and the murder of Francisco Cruz Galeano, a trade union leader of the General Workers' Confederation (CGT) in December 2005. With regard to the latter, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Secretariat of Labour and Social Security has undertaken a full investigation through the competent bodies, which concluded that the trade union leader concerned was not murdered by reason of his position as a trade union leader, but was mistaken for the leader of a group of delinquents by two members of a rival group, of whom one was murdered in May 2006 and the other is on the run.

The Committee observes that for many years it has been referring to the need to reform the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee recalls that in its observation in 2005 it noted the preparation of a draft reform of the Labour Code, which included several amendments requested by the Committee, and which had been preceded by a tripartite study. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Economic and Social Council is envisaging in its plan of activities for the present year the harmonization of the Labour Code with international labour Conventions, thereby achieving consensus with the social partners. The Committee recalls that its comments referred to:

- the exclusion from the scope of the Labour Code, and consequently from the rights and guarantees of the Convention, of workers in agricultural and stock-raising enterprises which do not permanently employ more than ten workers (section 2(1));

- the prohibition of more than one trade union in a single enterprise, institution or establishment (section 472 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement of more than 30 workers to establish a trade union (section 475 of the Labour Code);
- the requirement that the officers of a trade union, federation or confederation must be of Honduran nationality (sections 510(a) and 541(a) of the Labour Code), be engaged in the corresponding activity (sections 510(c) and 541(c) of the Labour Code) and be able to read and write (sections 510(d) and 541(d) of the Labour Code);
- the following restrictions on the right to strike:
  - the ban on strikes being called by federations and confederations (section 537 of the Labour Code). The Committee however notes the Government's indication that federations and confederations exercise this right without any interference by the State;
  - the requirement of a two-thirds majority of the votes of the total membership of the trade union organization in order to call a strike (sections 495 and 563 of the Labour Code);
  - the power of the Ministry of Labour and Social Security to end disputes in oil production, refining, transport and distribution services (section 555(2) of the Labour Code);
  - the need for Government authorization or a six-month period of notice for any suspension or stoppage of work in public services that do not depend directly or indirectly on the State (section 558 of the Labour Code). In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's indication that this provision refers to services that are essential for society and is intended to offer the appropriate conciliation machinery to resolve disputes occurring in these sectors;
  - the submission to compulsory arbitration, without the possibility of calling a strike for as long as the arbitration award is in force (two years), of collective disputes in public services that are not essential in the strict sense of the term, that is those the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (sections 554(2) and (7), 820 and 826 of the Labour Code).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that the harmonization of the Labour Code with the Convention will be undertaken in the near future and that all the issues raised by the Committee will be taken into account. The Committee reminds the Government that the Office's technical assistance is at its disposal.

Finally, the Committee notes the new comments by the ITUC, dated 28 August 2007, which refer to legislative issues that are still pending, as well as to the impossibility of establishing unions in export processing zones; the formulation by the President of a Bill to reform the Procedural Penal Code establishing more severe penalties for action on the public thoroughfare (blockages of roads, bridges and streets, for example), which may affect the activities of trade unions; obstacles to the establishment of trade unions, the promotion of unions by the management of private enterprises and the detention of union members in the banking sector when they wished to participate in a wage claim. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on these matters.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's report and its reply to the comments of 10 August 2006 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), which referred mainly to issues relating to the legislation and the application of the Convention in practice which have already been examined, as well as the failure to comply with a collective agreement in the mining sector. With regard to the latter issue, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Secretariat of Labour and Social Security has not received any complaint in this respect. Nevertheless, the Secretariat is engaged in a procedure relating to other complaints against the mining company concerned.

The Committee recalls that it has been referring for many years in its comments to:

- the lack of adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, since the penalties established in section 469 of the Labour Code for persons who prejudice the right to freedom of association range between 200 and 10,000 lempiras (200 lempiras being equivalent to around US$12), which were deemed inadequate by one workers' confederation; and
- the lack of adequate and full protection against any acts of interference, and of sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for such acts. Article 2 of the Convention provides for protection for workers' and employers' organizations against any acts of interference by each other (or their agents), with particular reference to acts that are intended to promote the establishment of workers' organizations under the domination of employers or employers' organizations, or to support workers' organizations by financial or other means with the objective of placing such organizations under the control of employers or employers' organizations. This protection is considerably broader than that envisaged in section 511 of the Labour Code, which is confined to providing that members of a union whose tasks entail representing the employer or who hold positions of management or personal trust, or who are easily able to exert undue pressure on their colleagues, may not hold trade union office.

In this respect, the Committee recalls that in its observation of 2005 it noted the preparation of a draft reform of the Labour Code incorporating a number of the amendments requested by the Committee, which had been preceded by a tripartite study. The Committee notes that in its report the Government reiterates its commitment to considerably strengthening tripartite dialogue as a tool for social and equitable development with a view to improving the labour legislation, with particular reference to section 469 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that it is more effective and thereby guarantees respect for the freedom to organize and to engage in collective bargaining. The Government retains the firm hope that the Economic and Social Council, which serves as a concerted social dialogue body, will serve as the forum in which all matters relating to the necessary and urgent reforms of the labour legislation will be analysed and discussed with a view to harmonizing it with ratified ILO Conventions.

The Committee expresses the firm hope that in the near future the Government will take the necessary measures to include in the national legislation adequate and full protection against any acts of anti-union discrimination or interference and will establish sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against such acts. The Committee reminds the Government that the Office's technical assistance is at its disposal.

Finally, the Committee notes the communication dated 28 August 2007 from the ITUC which refers to pending issues relating to the legislation and the application of the Convention. Furthermore, according to the ITUC, public employees are prohibited from concluding collective labour agreements, the Labour Code restricts the matters which may be covered by bargaining and empowers the Ministry of Labour to approve the content of a collective agreement. The ITUC also refers to the dismissal of numerous trade union leaders and members following the establishment of a trade union. The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on these matters.

Iceland

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1952)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It observes that the Government refers to two collective agreements which improve the situation of foreign and disabled workers.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the issue of compulsory arbitration which has been repeatedly imposed through legislative intervention (Acts Nos 10/1998 and 34/2001) into the collective bargaining process for the determination of the terms and conditions of employment of fishermen. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that this was incompatible with the principle of free and voluntary collective bargaining set out in Article 4 of the Convention and requested the Government: (i) to avoid having recourse to legislative intervention to impose on the parties a solution which should be the result of free and voluntary collective bargaining; and (ii) noting the Government's indications that it would consult the social partners on actions to be taken, to take concrete steps so as to re-examine thoroughly its current machinery and procedures.

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report with regard to the activities of the State Conciliation and Mediation Service – which operates under the Trade Unions and Industrial Disputes Act, No. 81/1938 as subsequently amended. The Committee notes from the Government's report that most collective agreements in Iceland, including in the fishing sector in which compulsory arbitration had been imposed in the past, came up for review in the period 2003–04, were extended for two years and will therefore come up again in 2007 and 2008.

The Committee also recalls that the Conference Committee had expressed the hope in June 2004 that the Government would carry out, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, a review of the implementation in practice in the fishing sector of the mechanisms and procedures in the area of collective bargaining in order to improve those mechanisms.

The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of the renegotiation of the collective agreements which come up for review in 2007 and 2008, including in the fishing sector. The Committee also requests the Government to continue to keep it informed of any progress made in adopting measures, in consultation with the social partners concerned, with a view to improving the current machinery and procedures for collective bargaining so as to promote free and voluntary collective bargaining and ensure that the introduction of compulsory arbitration is avoided in the future.

Indonesia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1998)

The Committee takes note of the information contained in the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2006. The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 27 August 2007 with regard to police violence, dismissals and acts of retaliation against strikers. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee takes note of the entry into force of the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004.

1. Civil liberties. The Committee's previous comments concerned the issuance of Guidance on the Conduct of Indonesian Police concerning Law Enforcement and Order in Industrial Relations Disputes with ILO technical assistance, and the need to ensure its practical implementation.

The Committee notes that in its 2006 comments, the ICFTU refers to continuing police interference in industrial disputes in order to break up strikes in various companies and the interrogation of trade union leaders on the basis of an old colonial law prohibiting vague and unspecified "unpleasant acts" against employers.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that the cases to which the ICFTU refers have been settled by the parties and adds that pursuant to the issuance of the Guidance, the police are allowed to be present during the settlement of industrial disputes but their role is to remain at a distance strictly for security purposes. The Government states that the police no longer play any part in the settlement of the disputes.

The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on measures taken, including the specific instructions given to the police so as to ensure that the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations is avoided, that arrests are made only where serious violence or other criminal acts have been committed, and that the police are called in a strike situation only where there is a genuine and imminent threat to public order.

2. Right to organize of civil servants. In previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to specify any act or regulation ensuring the implementation of the right to organize of civil servants pursuant to section 44 of Act No. 21 of 2000, which proclaims that civil servants shall enjoy freedom of association and that the implementation of this right shall be regulated in a separate Act. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard. In previous communications the Government had indicated that such Act had not yet been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken for the adoption of an Act guaranteeing the exercise of the right to organize to civil servants pursuant to section 4 of Act No. 21 of 2000, and to indicate the manner in which civil servants organize in practice, while the adoption of legislation is pending, including statistics on the number of civil servants' organizations at various levels.

3. Right to organize of employers. The Committee had requested the Government to provide a copy of any rulings made concerning the right to organize of employers pursuant to section 105(1) of Manpower Act No. 13 of 2003, which grants this right to employers and adds that "rulings concerning entrepreneurs' organizations shall be determined and specified in accordance with valid statutory legislation". The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard. In previous communications, the Government had indicated that employers' organizations are regulated by Act No. 1 of 1987, concerning the Chamber of Commerce and Industry (KADIN). The basic internal regulation of KADIN states that APINDO (the main employers' association) is a branch of KADIN dealing with industrial relations and labour issues. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Act No. 1 of 1987, as well as the internal regulation of KADIN, in its next report and to specify whether in general, other employers' organizations can be established independently of the KADIN.

4. Conditions for the exercise of the right to strike. In previous comments, the Committee had noted that for a strike to be considered legal it must be carried out subsequent to "failed negotiations" (section 3 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP. 232/MEN/2003) and that negotiations shall be considered failed only if both sides make a declaration to this effect in the negotiation minutes (section 4 of the abovementioned Decree). Noting from the Government's report that the right to strike is a basic right that should be carried out legally, orderly and peacefully as a consequence of failed negotiations, the Committee once again recalls that the conditions stipulated in the law for the exercise of the right to strike should not be such that the exercise of this right becomes very difficult or even impossible in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 4 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP. 232/MEN/2003 so that a finding as to whether negotiations have failed, which is a condition for the lawful staging of strikes, can be made either by an independent body or be left to the unilateral determination of the parties to the dispute.

5. The Committee further notes that the ICFTU indicates that the law contains further restrictive conditions for the exercise of the right to strike; for instance, a requirement to indicate the ending time of the strike before its commencement. Noting that the Government has not responded to these comments, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations in this respect.

6. Exhaustion of mediation/conciliation procedures. The Committee notes from the comments made by the ICFTU that the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004 imposes as a precondition for the lawful staging of strikes, a lengthy mediation procedure. The Committee notes from the Government's reply to the ICFTU comments that the strike is a basic right that should be carried out legally, orderly and peacefully as a consequence of failed negotiations, and as long as these conditions are fulfilled, the worker does not break the law. The Committee observes that sections 3(2), 4(4), 15 and 25 of the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004, appear to establish: (i) an initial period of 30 working days during which an attempt should be made to settle disputes through bipartite negotiations (section 3(2)); (ii) an (unspecified) time period during which the parties are invited to file their dispute to the Manpower Office and select either conciliation or arbitration, and if they fail to select either one, seven working days within which the Manpower Office will transfer their dispute to mediation (section 4(4)); (iii) an additional 30 working days reserved to mediation (section 15); (iv) 30 working days reserved to conciliation (section 25); or (v) if mediation/conciliation fails, sections 5 and 14 provide that one of the parties may refer the dispute to the Industrial Relations Court for arbitration (see in this regard, the Committee's comments under Convention No. 98).

The Committee notes that the text of Act No. 2 of 2004 does not explicitly indicate whether the parties may stage strikes while mediation/conciliation is under way or whether they should wait for these lengthy procedures to be concluded before they may lawfully stage industrial action. The Committee notes that the requirement to exhaust procedures extending beyond 60 working days (three months), as a precondition for a strike to be staged lawfully, would render the exercise of the right to strike very difficult or even impossible in practice. The Committee requests the Government to indicate measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 3(2), 4(4), 15 and 25 of the Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement Act No. 2 of 2004 in a way that: (i) reduces the time period accorded to mediation/conciliation proceedings in cases where the exhaustion of mediation/conciliation constitutes a condition for the lawful exercise of the right to strike; or (ii) ensures that the exhaustion of mediation/conciliation is not a precondition for the lawful exercise of the right to strike.

7. Objectives of strikes. The Committee had asked the Government to indicate whether workers may exercise industrial action in protest of social and economic policy without penalty. It notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard. It observes, however, that it would appear from sections 3 and 4 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP. 232/MEN/2003 (see above), that the possibility of strikes is linked to the negotiation of an enterprise-level collective agreement; moreover, it would appear from information provided by the Government in its report under Convention No. 98 that federations and confederations do not engage in negotiations at above-enterprise levels. The Committee observes that the above appears to exclude the possibility of staging industrial action on general, social and economic policy questions. The Committee recalls that although purely political strikes do not fall within the scope of freedom of association, organizations responsible for defending workers' socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living (General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 165.) The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to allow trade union federations and confederations to engage in industrial action linked to questions of general social and economic policy.

8. Restrictions on the right to strike in essential services. The Committee notes from the ICFTU comments that section 5 of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003 provides that strikes at "enterprises that cater to the interests of the general public and/or enterprises whose activities would endanger the safety of human life if discontinued are declared illegal" (Ministerial Decree KEP.232/MEN/2003), without specifying what types of enterprises are included in this classification, thus leaving the matter to the Government's discretion. According to the ICFTU, strikes have been prohibited in practice in the public sector, essential services and enterprises serving the public interest. The Committee notes that according to the Government, in line with the explanatory note on section 139 of Manpower Act No. 13 of 2003, enterprises serving the public interest and/or enterprises whose activities when interrupted by strikes endanger the safety of human life, are hospitals, the fire department, the railway service, enterprises in charge of sluices, those in charge of regulating air traffic and those in charge of sea traffic. In this regard, the Committee refers the Government to its comments below concerning the railway service.

9. Restrictions on the right to strike in the railway service. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures so as to ensure that railway employees may fully exercise the right to strike without penalty. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard. In previous reports, the Government had indicated that the explanatory note on section 139 of Manpower Act No. 13 of 2003, provides that only railway intersection officers are included among the workers that relate to public safety since they have specific duties which differ from those of other railway workers; consequently, they can go on strike as long as someone is on duty. Recalling that railway services generally cannot be considered as an essential service, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that section 139 of Manpower Act No. 13 can only be used to restrict the right to strike of railway intersection workers.

10. Sanctions for strike action. In previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend its legislation so as to ensure that the sanctions for illegal strike action are not disproportionate, given that heavy sanctions can be imposed, under section 185 of the Manpower Act, for violations of section 139 of the Manpower Act (one to four years' imprisonment and/or a fine from Rp.100,000,000 to Rp.400,000,000). The Committee notes that the Government's report does not provide information in this regard and once again requests it to amend the sanctions imposed under section 185 of the Manpower Act for illegal strike action in violation of section 139 of the Manpower Act so as to ensure that such sanctions are not disproportionate to the seriousness of the offence. The Committee would point out in this regard that any violent act can always be punished under the general penal law. However, penal sanctions for participation in a peaceful strike action should not be resorted to.

11. The Committee notes from the ICFTU comments that according to section 6(2) and (3) of Ministerial Decree No. KEP.232/MEN/2003, in case of an illegal strike, the employer may make two written appeals within a period of seven days for workers to return to work, and if the workers do not respond, they are considered as having resigned. According to the ICFTU, such appeals are commonly used by employers as intimidation tactics against strikers. The Committee notes from the facts of cases brought before the Committee on Freedom of Association (e.g. Case No. 2472, 348th Report), that employers have the possibility to issue written appeals, and in case of non-response, consider workers as having resigned, pending a final finding as to the legality of the strike by an impartial body; in these cases, the employer may suspend the workers in question while waiting for the finding of illegality by the competent body, at which point, the employer is authorized to dismiss the workers retroactively. The Committee observes that as a result of this practice, along with the numerous and stringent legal requirements which make the staging of legal strikes very difficult if not impossible in practice, workers run the risk of dismissal within a context of uncertainty as to the lawfulness of their strike; all of this is likely to intimidate workers into abandoning the strike. Under these conditions, the Committee is of the view that the issuing of back-to-work appeals by the employer should be possible only after a final finding by an independent body that a strike is indeed illegal and not pending such a decision. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to amend section 6(2) and (3) of Ministerial Decree No. KEP 232/MEN/2003 to ensure that employers may not issue appeals to striking workers to return to work prior to a finding by an independent body that a strike is illegal.

12. Dissolution and suspension of organizations by administrative authority. The Committee had noted that if trade union officials violate either section 21 or 31 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act No. 21 of 2000 – by either failing to inform the Government of any changes in the union’s constitution or by-laws within 30 days or failing to report any financial assistance coming from overseas sources – serious sanctions can be imposed under section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act, namely, the revocation and loss of trade union rights or suspension. The Committee had requested the Government to repeal the reference to sections 21 and 31 in section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act so as to provide for means other than suspension of trade union rights for rectifying delays in notification. The Committee further noted that legislation requiring authorization for a national trade union to accept financial assistance from an international organization of workers infringes the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and to benefit from such affiliation, and requested the Government to provide further details on the manner in which the obligation to report any financial assistance coming from overseas is applied in practice. The Committee notes that the Government’s report does not contain any information in this regard. The Government had indicated in the past that it still applied regulations obliging trade unions to report any financial assistance coming from overseas, according to section 31 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act, in order to secure that the assistance is utilized for the improvement of the welfare of the union members and not for other improper purposes. Moreover, the sanction provided under section 42 is aimed to ensure that trade unions have administrative discipline and has never been applied until now.

While noting the fact that section 42 has never been applied and that according to the Government it mainly serves a dissuasive purpose, the Committee considers that the sanction of suspension for a failure to report a change in the trade union’s constitution or by-laws (as a result of sections 21 and 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act) is clearly disproportionate and that section 31(1) read together with section 42 is tantamount to requiring previous authorization for the receipt of funds from abroad, which is contrary to Articles 3 and 6 of the Convention (on the contrary, there is no infringement of the Convention if, for example, the supervision is limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 125)). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal the reference to sections 21 and 31 in section 42 of the Trade Union/Labour Union Act.

13. In previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 42 of Trade Union/Labour Union Act No. 21 of 2000, also provides for the administrative sanction of revocation of a trade union’s record number (and consequent loss of trade union rights) in the event of trade union membership falling below the required minimum. In particular, the Committee had noted that there is a possibility to appeal to a judicial body against the governmental institutions that take such a decision under Act No. 5 of 1986 on the Administrative Court, and had requested the Government to indicate whether the appeal suspends the effect of the sanction until a judgement has been handed down and to provide a copy of Act No. 5 of 1986. In previous reports, the Government had indicated that the appeal did not have the effect of suspending the sanction and that Act No. 5 of 1986 had been amended by Act No. 9 of 2004.

The Committee, noting that the latest report by the Government does not provide any information in this regard, once again notes that measures of dissolution and suspension of trade unions by administrative authority involve a serious risk of interference in the very existence of organizations and should therefore be accompanied by all the necessary guarantees, in particular due judicial safeguards, in order to avoid the risk of arbitrary action. Thus, the organization affected by such measures must not only have the right of appeal to an independent and impartial judicial body, but the administrative decision should not take effect until that body hands down a final decision (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 185). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to ensure that measures of dissolution or suspension of trade unions by the administrative authority do not take effect until a final decision has been handed down by the Administrative Court in case of appeal.

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government's report as well as its reply to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2006. The Committee notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 27 August 2007 and requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to improve the system of protection against anti-union discrimination. In particular, the Committee had expressed the hope that Act No. 2 of 2004 concerning industrial relations dispute settlement would strengthen the effectiveness of the mechanism of protection against anti-union discrimination upon its entry into force in 2006, and requested the Government to provide information on steps taken by the labour inspectorate to this effect (number of visits, types of violations found, steps taken including penalties imposed, etc.), as well as any cases brought to the judicial bodies against alleged acts of anti-union discrimination and the decisions reached.

The Committee notes with interest the entry into force of Act No. 2 of 2004 which sets up a new system of tripartite labour courts, replacing the previous system of labour dispute committees. Under the new law, settlement of industrial disputes is first to be sought through bipartite negotiation. If no resolution is reached at this level, a mediator or conciliator can be brought in within 30 days. If that too fails, the dispute can be brought before the Industrial Relations Court and a verdict should be issued within 50 working days of the first hearing of the case. In case of acts of dismissal, an appeal is acceptable to the Supreme Court, which must make its ruling within 30 days.

The Committee also notes the numerous instances of anti-union discrimination and interference enumerated by the ICFTU and the ITUC in their comments. The Committee notes that although the Government's report refers to approximately 15,000 company visits by the labour inspectorate from 1 January 2006 to 1 June 2007, it also indicates that no finding of anti-union discrimination was made and that the various instances of discrimination and interference alleged by the ICFTU were either due to illegal activity on the part of the trade unionists concerned, or that the disputes have been settled by the parties with the assistance of the competent bodies. The Committee also recalls from previous comments that the Government had indicated in its previous report that there had been no anti-union discrimination cases judged by the courts and no proposal, complaint, permission or dismissal because of workers' membership in a trade union. The Committee finally notes that in its report the Government refers to the need to provide training on the provisions of Act No. 2 of 2004 to all stakeholders, including the judiciary, trade unions and employers, in order to widely understand the substance of the Act and ensure its implementation.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in a series of recent cases concerning acts of anti-union discrimination and interference (Cases Nos 2236, 2336, 2441, 2451, 2472 and 2494). The Committee observes that on all cases brought before it the Committee on Freedom of Association observed, often with regret, that the administrative authorities failed to make an investigation into allegations of anti-union discrimination and interference, that the industrial dispute settlement bodies failed to address these allegations, and that the proceedings pending in some cases were excessively long; as a result, the Committee on Freedom of Association repeatedly urged the Government to take additional measures to ensure effective and comprehensive protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and in particular, ensure that the role of the Government in relation to such acts is not confined to mediation and conciliation but also includes, where appropriate, investigation and enforcement.

The Committee notes that there is a stark contrast between, on the one hand, the text of the laws, for example, Acts Nos 21/2000 and 2/2004, which appear to conform with the Convention, and on the other hand, the communications of workers' organizations and the findings of the Committee on Freedom of Association which depict a different situation, akin to a substantial failure to provide protection against anti-union discrimination and interference in practice. In these circumstances, the Committee observes that the apparent lack of findings of anti-union discrimination on behalf of the labour inspectorate and the courts in a number of cases, constitute grounds for a certain concern and deserve closer attention and analysis in a tripartite context.

In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report concrete measures taken, after discussions with the most representative workers' and employers' organizations, to ensure effective and rapid protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and employer interference in practice. It also requests the Government to provide data on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination filed with the labour inspectorate and the courts, and the steps taken to investigate these complaints and impose remedies where appropriate, as well as the average duration of proceedings. The Committee recalls that technical assistance is at the Government's disposal and invites the Government to make full use of such assistance, including for training purposes, so as to ensure the practical implementation and eventual improvement of the new system for the resolution of industrial disputes under Act No. 2/2004.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to amend section 122 of the Manpower Act so as to discontinue the presence of the employer during a voting procedure held in order to determine which trade union shall have the right to represent the workers in an enterprise. Furthermore, noting that the ICFTU referred to an important number of acts of interference in trade unions' affairs, the Committee had requested the Government to supply statistics on the number of complaints lodged and the most frequent problems examined.

The Committee notes that the Government does not provide any statistical information and indicates that it does not intend to amend this Article which has been in force for only three years. The Government adds that in practice there is no problem, as there has been no case where employer interference has been observed; the relations between employers and workers at the company level in the context of the country is one of family relationships and the role of the employer during the voting process is to offer assistance when required.

The Committee refers to the comments made above with regard to the need to ensure adequate protection against acts of interference in practice. It once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the steps taken to amend section 122 of the Manpower Act so as to suppress the presence of the employer during voting procedures.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to amend sections 5, 14 and 25 of Act No. 2/2004 concerning Industrial Relations Dispute Settlement, which enable either of the parties to an industrial dispute to file a legal petition to the Industrial Relations Court for final settlement of the dispute if conciliation or mediation failed.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that it has no intention of amending these provisions as, so far, there is no indication that anybody is being treated unfairly in the process of settling industrial disputes. The mechanism established by Act No. 2/2004 privileges bipartite settlement of disputes, and in practice 80 per cent of all cases are settled in this manner (in 2006, out of approximately 115,000 industrial conflicts, 90,000 were settled through bipartite negotiations).

The Committee once again recalls that compulsory arbitration at the initiative of one of the parties to an industrial dispute raises problems from the point of view of Convention No. 98 as it cannot be considered to promote voluntary collective bargaining. Compulsory arbitration should be possible only (i) if it is at the request of both parties to the dispute; (ii) in the case of disputes in the public service involving public servants engaged in the administration of the State; or (iii) in essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 5, 14 and 25 of Act No. 2/2004 concerning industrial relations dispute settlement so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may be imposed only where this is in accordance with the above.

2. Federations and confederations. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations had the right to collective bargaining. The Committee notes from the Government's report that the parties entitled to sign a collective agreement are the plant level trade union and the respective company. The Committee recalls that the right to bargain collectively should be granted to federations and confederations and that the choice of bargaining level should be made by the partners themselves since they are in the best position to decide this issue (see General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraph 249). Noting that the Government's report does not provide any information in this regard, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to guarantee the right of federations and confederations to engage in collective bargaining and allow the parties to freely decide the level at which negotiations should take place.

Export processing zones (EPZs). In its previous observation, the Committee had requested the Government, pursuant to allegations of violent intimidation and assault of union organizers, and dismissals of union activists in the EPZs, to provide information thereon as well as on the number of collective agreements in force in the EPZs and the percentage of workers covered.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates that there are no specific data regarding the number of collective agreements in EPZs but that compared to other localities, the number of collective agreements in the EPZs seems to be balanced with that in other industrial estates. The Government indicates, moreover, that the same laws and regulations apply throughout the territory of Indonesia, including the EPZs. The Government conducts training programmes for unions and employers on how to negotiate collective agreements, the benefits of collective bargaining and how to be best represented in this process. EPZs are among the priority targets.

The Committee notes this information. It requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken to collect statistical information on collective bargaining in EPZs and to provide data concerning the number of collective agreements and workers covered. It further requests the Government to provide specific information on the number of complaints of anti-union discrimination and employer interference in EPZs and the relevant investigation/remediation measures.

The Committee is addressing a request on another point directly to the Government.

Iraq

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the draft Labour Code of 2007. The Committee notes with interest that this draft legislation, which was drafted with the technical assistance of the ILO, applies to a significant extent the provisions of the Convention. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which refer to serious violations of freedom of association and collective bargaining in practice, including instances of anti-union violence and the issuance of a directive prohibiting companies in the oil sector from cooperating with members of trade unions. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

Previously, the Committee had taken note of the allegations made by the ITUC in 2006 concerning serious cases of violence and other violations of freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee notes the Government's statement that it has not set any conditions impeding the setting up of trade unions in Iraq, but rather recognizes all trade union formations without distinction and strives to ensure their independence. The Government further states that certain trade union leaders had fallen victim to terrorist operations and that, although a climate of violence remained the general situation in all sectors of activity, it remained committed to eliminating this serious problem. The Committee, aware of the ongoing process of reconstruction and the climate of violence in the country, takes due note of the above information.

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to include in the legislation provisions guaranteeing adequate protection for workers against any acts of anti-union discrimination. In this regard, the Committee notes with interest that several provisions of the draft Code provide for protection against anti-union discrimination. Section 41(1) of the draft Labour Code provides that union membership or participation in union activities shall not constitute valid reasons for termination. Under section 39 of the draft Code, a worker whose employment has been terminated has the right to challenge his or her termination before the Employment Termination Committee or before the labour courts, within a period of 15 days after receiving notification of termination. Section 41(2) of the draft Code provides, moreover, that the Employment Termination Committee and the courts may order reinstatement and back pay in cases of unjust termination; where the worker does not demand reinstatement, or where reinstatement is not feasible, the Employment Termination Committee and the courts may order compensation in an amount at their discretion, provided that such compensation is sufficiently dissuasive so as to punish the unjust termination.

The Committee notes that section 139 of the draft Labour Code also affords protection from acts of discrimination, for limited time periods, to trade union founders and trade union presidents and workers' representatives, respectively. Section 139(1) provides that any dismissal and any measure short of dismissal whereby a trade union founder has been prejudiced shall be deemed to be anti-union discrimination, and shall be prohibited from the date of the lodging of an application for trade union registration until six months after the trade union has been registered. Similarly, section 139(2) states that protection from anti-union discrimination shall be granted to trade union presidents and workers' representatives for a period beginning 30 days before the election of the individuals concerned, if notice of their candidature had been given to the employer, and ending either 30 days after the election – if they had not been elected – or six months after the end of the performance of their duties as elected union officials. The Committee further notes that section 139(6) limits the scope of the protection established under section 139(2) to five workers in enterprises employing less than 50 workers, to seven workers in enterprises employing from 50 to 100 workers, and to two additional protected workers for every additional 100 workers employed in the enterprise. Finally, the Committee notes that under section 139(3) all acts of anti-union discrimination shall be deemed to be null and void, and employers found liable for such an offence shall be subject to a fine of 100–500,000 dinars.

The Committee notes, however, that the protections of section 139 do not extend throughout the full course of employment, including at the time of recruitment, and apply only to trade union founders, presidents and workers' representatives. The Committee additionally notes that sections 41 and 139 do not set out time frames for the completion of anti-union discrimination proceedings, and that, although section 41 states that compensation amounts "sufficiently dissuasive so as to punish dismissals" may be ordered, section 139 does not expressly provide for remedies to fully compensate victims of anti-union discrimination.

As regards adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, the Committee recalls that such protection applies equally to trade union members and former trade union officials as to current trade union leaders, and covers not only dismissals but all measures of anti-union discrimination (transfers, demotions, and any other prejudicial acts). The Committee recalls moreover that the protection provided for in the Convention covers both the time of recruitment and the period of employment, including the time of work termination. Finally, the Committee recalls that the existence of general provisions prohibiting acts of anti-union discrimination is not enough if they are not accompanied by effective and rapid procedures to ensure their application in practice. Hence, the importance of Article 3 of the Convention, which provides that "machinery appropriate to national conditions shall be established, where necessary, for the purpose of ensuring respect for the right to organize ..." as defined in Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Such protection against acts of anti-union discrimination may thus take various forms adapted to national legislation and practice, provided that they prevent or effectively redress anti-union discrimination (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 202–224). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the draft Labour Code so as to ensure for trade union members and representatives adequate protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, in accordance with the principles outlined above.

Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee notes with interest that section 137(1) of the draft Labour Code provides that trade unions shall be entitled to represent their members in relation to any matter involving their collective interests, and to engage in collective bargaining. It additionally notes with interest that under section 141(1) collective bargaining may take place at all levels. The Committee further notes that section 142 establishes a duty to bargain in good faith when a request to open collective negotiations has been submitted by a registered union representing no less than 50 per cent of the workers employed at the establishment or enterprise concerned, or where a request to open collective negotiations has been jointly submitted by several registered trade unions if the latter collectively represent no less than 50 per cent of the workers to whom the collective agreement is to apply. In this connection, the Committee recalls that problems may arise when the law stipulates that a trade union must receive the support of 50 per cent of the members of a bargaining unit to be recognized as a bargaining agent: a majority union which fails to secure this absolute majority is thus denied the possibility of bargaining. The Committee considers that under such a system, if no union – or group of unions, as provided for in section 142 – covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, collective bargaining rights should be granted to all the unions in the unit concerned, at least on behalf of their own members (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 242). The Committee requests the Government to take the appropriate steps to amend section 142 of the draft Labour Code accordingly.

Articles 1, 4 and 6. The Committee had previously noted that Act No. 150 of 1987 concerning public servants does not contain any provisions ensuring that the guarantees provided for by the Convention apply to public servants and employees not engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee notes that section 2 of the draft Labour Code includes “workers listed as officials in state and public sector departments” within the scope of the draft Code’s provisions, but excludes “workers listed as civil servants and civil pensioners” from them. In this respect, the Committee recalls that Article 6 authorizes to exclude public servants engaged in the administration of the State from the scope of the Convention and that, in defining this exception, a distinction must be drawn between, on the one hand, public servants who by their functions are directly employed in the administration of the State (government ministry officials, for example) and who may be excluded from the scope of the Convention and, on the other hand, all other persons employed by the Government, by public enterprises or by autonomous public institutions, who should benefit from the guarantees provided for in the Convention (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 200). In the light of the above, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the specific categories of workers covered by the term “civil servants and civil pensioners” in section 2 of the draft Labour Code, and to ensure that the draft Code includes a provision recognizing the application of the Convention’s guarantees to all public servants not engaged in the administration of the State.

The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take the appropriate measures to bring the draft legislation into full conformity with the Convention and requests it to transmit a copy of the Labour Code upon its adoption.

Jamaica

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received.

It also notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) on 28 August 2007 which refer to issues already raised and the non-deduction of union dues from the affiliates of the National Workers Union (NWU) in the oil sector. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC’s comments as well as on those submitted by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) in 2006 which largely concerned legislative issues still outstanding and obstacles to the exercise of trade union rights in the export processing zones.

The Committee underlines that it previously commented on the extensive power of the Minister to refer an industrial dispute to arbitration (sections 9, 10 and 11(A) of the Labour Relations and Industrial Disputes Act). The Committee recalls that compulsory arbitration should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term or situations of acute national crisis and that, otherwise, recourse to compulsory arbitration should only be possible at the request of both parties to the dispute. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in amending the legislation.

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It is bound to repeat its previous comments on the application of Article 4 of the Convention which concerned:

- the denial of the right to negotiate collectively in the case of workers in a bargaining unit when these workers do not amount to more than 40 per cent of the workers in the unit or when, if the former condition is satisfied, a single union that is engaged in the procedure of obtaining recognition does not obtain 50 per cent of the votes of the workers in a ballot that the minister has caused to be taken (section 5(5) of Act No. 14 of 1975 and section 3(1)(d) of its regulations);
- the need to take measures to amend the legislation so that a ballot is made possible where one or more trade unions are already established as bargaining agents and another trade union claims that it has more affiliated members in the bargaining unit than the other trade unions, and therefore invokes its most representative status in the unit in order to be considered as a bargaining agent.

Recalling once again that, by ratifying the Convention, the State undertook to promote collective bargaining and that this implied granting of collective bargaining rights to the most representative trade union or (jointly) trade unions, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures in order to amend its legislation, lowering the percentage mentioned and allowing a ballot in cases of conflicts of representativeness, so as to bring it into full conformity with the Convention in the very near future. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this regard.

The Committee also notes the comments on the application of the Convention submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) which refer in part to issues already raised. The ITUC refers also to some comments concerning anti-union discrimination and refusal to recognize a union and states that no union exists in the export processing zones.

The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on the ITUC's comments.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report as well as its response to the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006; the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) dated 28 August 2006; the Japan Federation of Prefectural and Municipal Workers' Unions (JICHIROREN) and the National Network of Fire-Fighters (FFN) dated 13 April 2007 with regard to the issues previously raised by the Committee including the public service system reform and the right to organize of fire-fighters. It further notes the communication by the ITUC dated 27 August 2007 with regard to difficulties in trade union organizing due to an increase in precarious forms of employment and subcontracting, including for migrant workers and the communication of JTUC–RENGO dated 19 October 2007. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the latest comments by the ITUC and the JTUC–RENGO.

1. Denial of the right to organize of firefighting personnel. The Committee recalls its long-standing comments concerning the need to recognize the right to organize for firefighting personnel.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report which reiterates its previous position to the effect that the services and functions of the fire defence in Japan correspond to those of the police and therefore fall under the exception of Article 9 of the Convention. In 1997 a system of fire defence personnel committees was created, allowing for the participation of fire defence personnel in decisions over their terms and conditions of employment. On 15 October 2004, eight years since the establishment of the system, certain improvements were agreed between the Minister of Internal Affairs and Communications and the representative of the JICHIROREN on the practices of the fire defence personnel committees, including with regard to the timing of the sessions of the committees (to be held in the first half of the fiscal year, from April to September, in order to allow enough time for budget allocations), the provision of feedback to employees who submitted opinions to the committees, the communication of summaries of the deliberations and opinions of the committees and the creation of a "liaison facilitator" system to provide explanations to the personnel (improvements introduced in the Order on the organization and operation of the fire defence personnel committees under article 14(5), paragraph 4, of the Fire Defence Organization Law).

The Committee notes that, according to the comments communicated by JICHIROREN and FFN, following a survey conducted in eight fire defence departments to which FFN officers belong so as to evaluate the implementation of the above improvements, it was revealed that no real progress had been achieved with regard to the right to organize of firefighters. In particular, committee meetings were scarce (held once a year), employees did not receive proper feedback, the "opinion coordinators" did not function properly and many opinions submitted by the employees had been dismissed as not falling under the committee deliberations, thus demonstrating overall the limited role that these committees could play. The Committee recalls that in previous comments, these organizations had indicated that, although they considered the fire defence personnel committees as an advancement in providing an opportunity to staff to state their own opinions, they also considered that these committees were not equivalent to giving personnel the right to organize and that the law needed to be amended in this respect.

The Committee notes from the Government's report that by March 2007, nearly 5,000 opinions annually and 60,000 in total had been discussed in almost all (99.6 per cent) of fire defence headquarters across the country, and each year about 40 per cent of the opinions were found to be appropriate for adoption and of those, more than half were implemented by the fire chief. These opinions concerned for instance, measures to counter smoking, the introduction of counselling as a means to counter stress, the improvement of the office environment such as nap rooms for those on shift, etc. Almost 80 per cent of the opinions discussed have been submitted through liaison facilitators. In a recent notification the Government invited all local authorities to fully implement the relevant discussions and the liaison facilitator system. The Committee further takes note of the information provision and training measures to ensure the full implementation of the system.

The Committee once again recalls that as early as 1973, it had stated that it “does not consider that the functions of fire defence personnel are of such a nature as to warrant the exclusion of this category of workers under Article 9 of the Convention” and hoped that the Government would take “appropriate steps to ensure that the right to organize is recognized for this category of workers” (ILC, 58th Session, Report III(4A), page 122). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the additional legislative measures taken or contemplated in order to ensure that fire defence personnel are guaranteed the right to organize.

2. Prohibition of the right to strike of public servants. The Committee takes note of the interim conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Cases Nos 2177 and 2183 (329th Report, paragraphs 567–652, and 331st Report, paragraphs 516–558) to the effect that public sector employees, like their private sector counterparts, should enjoy the right to strike, with the possible exceptions of public servants exercising authority in the name of the State and workers employed in essential services in the strict sense of the term. Moreover, public employees who may be deprived of this right should be afforded appropriate compensatory guarantees (329th Report, paragraph 641, and 331st Report, paragraph 554). The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it had referred to the detailed comments of the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association which stressed the importance “... in circumstances where strikes are prohibited or restricted in the civil service or in essential services within the strict meaning of the term, of according sufficient guarantees to the workers concerned in order to safeguard their interests” (ILC, 63rd Session, 1977, Report III(4A), page 153).

The Committee recalls that it has expressed concern in the past at the lack of progress in this regard, given that the Government has been confined ever since the Fact-Finding and Conciliation Commission on Freedom of Association took place (ILC, 64th Session, 1978, Report III(4A), page 143), to noting that the Supreme Court of Japan maintained throughout its judgments that the prohibition of strikes by public servants is constitutional. Noting that the Government's report once again repeats its previously stated position, the Committee once again asks the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the right to strike is guaranteed to public servants who are not exercising authority in the name of the State and to workers who are not working in essential services in the strict sense of the term, and that the others (e.g. hospital workers) benefit from sufficient compensatory guarantees in order to safeguard their interests, namely adequate, impartial and speedy conciliation and arbitration procedures, in which the parties have confidence and can participate at all stages, and in which the awards, once made, are binding and fully and promptly implemented.

3. Reform of the civil service. The Committee notes that in Cases Nos 2177 and 2183 the Committee on Freedom of Association requested that the Government, as well as the complainants National Confederation of Trade Unions (ZENZOREN) and JICHIROREN make efforts with a view to achieving rapidly a consensus on the reform of the public service and on legislative amendments addressing the issues raised above and many others.

The Committee takes note of the comments made by JTUC–RENGO and the ICF TU to the effect that on 24 December 2005, the Government adopted an “Essential Policy for Administrative Reform” which represented a major switch from the previous policy of the General Principles for Civil Service System Reform in that it provided for “frank dialogue and adjustment with the parties concerned” in order to achieve the implementation of a personnel management system based on merit and the fair management of re-employment in the context of reforms of overall employment costs; it also provided for “a broad review of the public service system, including the fundamental labour rights of civil servants and the National Personnel Authority system, the way of setting salaries for civil servants” and treatment based on merit and performance evaluations, taking into account public awareness and progress in reforms of the existing salary system. Pursuant to this policy, government–labour consultations were held on three occasions between January and May 2006 and the two parties agreed that the best way to develop industrial relations and discuss the issue of fundamental labour rights of public service employees was to establish a “Special Examination Committee” consisting of 17 members including three representatives from trade unions, in addition to representatives from private enterprises, academia and the mass media. At the first meeting of the committee held on 27 July 2006, it was agreed that a meeting would be held once a month to discuss: (a) the scope of public work for a simple and efficient government; (b) the proper classification structure and job descriptions for workers engaged in public work; and on the basis of these (c) the proper way of developing industrial relations, including the issue of fundamental labour rights of public employees.

The Committee also takes note of the information provided by the Government on this point, to the effect that until May 2007, the Special Examination Committee had held ten meetings until May 2007 and had approved a note by its chairperson according to which “the issue of labour–employer relations in the public sector, including the fundamental labour rights of public employees, should be re-examined with an eye towards reform". Moreover, the Government submitted two bills to the Diet aimed, inter alia, at introducing an ability- and performance-based personnel management system for public employees at the national and local levels respectively. It also adopted a Cabinet Decision on civil service reform according to which the Government shall continue to examine the fundamental labour rights of public employees taking into consideration the discussions taking place at the Special Examination Committee and further exchanges of views with concerned parties such as employees' organizations.

The Committee takes note of this information and wishes to stress once again that the reform process which will establish the legislative framework of industrial relations in the public sector for many years to come is a particularly appropriate opportunity to hold full, frank and meaningful consultations with all interested parties on all the issues which create difficulties with the application of the Convention and whose legal and practical problems have been raised by workers' organizations over the years. The Committee trusts that the Government will vigorously pursue these consultations in order to find mutually acceptable solutions to these difficulties and to bring the law and practice into full conformity with the provisions of the Convention and asks it to provide information on the progress made in its next report.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report as well as its response to the comments made by: the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006; the Japanese Trade Union Confederation (JTUC–RENGO) dated 28 August 2006; and the Zentoitsu (All United) Workers' Union dated 13 December 2005, with regard to issues previously raised by the Committee including anti-union discrimination and the setting of wages in the public service. It also notes the communication by the ITUC dated 27 August 2007 with regard, inter alia, to difficulties in trade union organization and collective bargaining due to the increase in precarious forms of employment and subcontracting, including for migrant workers as well as the comments by JTUC–RENGO dated 13 October 2007. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations on the latest comments made by the ITUC and JTUC–RENGO.

Article 1 of the Convention. The Committee notes that the comments of the Zentoitsu (All United) Workers' Union concern a long-standing dispute and court proceedings arising out of the privatization of the Japanese National Railways (JNR) which were taken over by the Japan Railway Companies (JR); they concern in particular, the decision of the JR not to rehire workers belonging to certain organizations which opposed the privatization plan. The Committee notes that in its report the Government indicates that it is not in a position to make comments on the final determination of this issue by the courts. The Committee also notes with interest from the latest communication by the ITUC that the 17-year dispute and trade union struggle ended in November 2006 with a final agreement which settled 61 outstanding court cases between the parties. The ITUC adds, however, that the last major issue, the reinstatement of the 1,047 Kohuao worker hold-outs, continues to be worked out. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the relevant information in its next report and, in particular, the results of any appeals from the remaining workers or any other developments.

Article 4. 1. Collective bargaining rights of public service employees not engaged in the administration of the State in the context of the civil service reform. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need for measures to ensure the promotion of collective bargaining for public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State in the framework of ongoing consultations on the reform of the civil service. The Committee recalls that in the framework of that reform, the National Personnel Authority (NPA), a neutral body which makes recommendations to the Diet and the Government on the revision of remuneration and working conditions of public employees (based on surveys of working conditions in the private sector and taking into account the views of public employees' organizations), proposed on 15 August 2005, a drastic reform of the whole remuneration system of public employees so as to reflect local private sector wage levels and each employee's performance.

The Committee notes the comments made by JTUC–RENGO and the ICFTU to the effect that, on 24 December 2005, the Government adopted an "Essential Policy for Administrative Reform" which represented a major switch from the previous policy in that it provided for "frank dialogue and adjustment with the parties concerned" in order to achieve the implementation of a personnel management system based on merit and the fair management of re-employment in the context of reforms of overall employment costs; it also provided for "a broad review of the public service system, including the fundamental labour rights of civil servants and the National Personnel Authority system, the way of setting salaries for civil servants, treatment based on a merit system and performance evaluations, and the career system" taking into account public awareness and progress in reforms of the existing salary system. Based on this policy, a Special Examination Committee was created to examine, inter alia, the proper way of developing industrial relations, including the issue of fundamental labour rights of public employees. Despite this policy, however, according to JTUC–RENGO, during the 2006 revision of the remuneration levels of public employees, the NPA unilaterally modified the index on the basis of which wage levels of public employees are compared to those of the private sector, from one comprising 100 companies to one comprising 50 companies, following instructions from the Government. JTUC–RENGO recalls that the methodology for the evaluation of public employees' remuneration levels is based on an agreement between the Government and trade union leaders dating back to 1964. The recent unilateral change is according to JTUC–RENGO evidence that the NPA system is not functioning effectively.

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the NPA, which functions as a compensatory measure for the denial of the right to bargain collectively and to strike in the public sector, undertook, pursuant to a request by Cabinet, a review of the wage index for the determination of public employees' wage levels – an index which it had established on its own initiative in 1964. The revision took place pursuant to wide discussions in the framework of a conference organized by the NPA with the participation of experts from various fields, as well as interviews of personnel officials in each ministry and employees' organizations. After having heard the opinions of all sides, the NPA decided to replace the index from one based on 100 enterprises to one based on 50. Moreover, the NPA recommended in August 2006 that the reform of the remuneration structure, which had started in the fiscal year 2006, be promoted, based on the results of fact-finding surveys on the remuneration of public employees. The Government held a total of 39 official meetings with employees' organizations in 2006 with regard to issues including remuneration. Three of these meetings were held with the Minister of Internal Affairs and Communications. Based on these findings, amendments were adopted to the Law concerning the remuneration of regular service employees so as to revise the remuneration as recommended by the NPA.

Taking note of this information, the Committee recalls from previous comments that the capacity of public employees who are not engaged in the administration of the State to participate in the determination of wages is substantially limited and once again requests the Government to examine measures in the context of the current dialogue over the civil service reform, aimed at giving a primary role to collective bargaining so that workers and their organizations may be able to participate fully and meaningfully in designing the overall bargaining framework. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will be able to report progress in this respect in its next report.

2. Negotiations in national medical institutions. The Committee's previous comments concerned restrictions over collective bargaining introduced in the context of the transfer of 154 national hospitals and sanatoriums to the National Hospital Organization (NHO), an independent administrative agency, as of 1 April 2004. The Committee takes note of the information provided in the Government's report to the effect that in the 2004–06 period 268 collective bargaining sessions were held in hospitals (221 sessions between 197 hospitals and the respective branch officers of the All Japan National Medical Workers' Union, seven sessions between seven blocks of hospitals and trade union district councils and 40 sessions between the headquarters of the NHO and the All Japan National Medical Workers' Union). Among the items discussed were the promotion of annual leave, reduction of nurses' nightshifts, the bargaining process, etc. Agreements were reached in 396 cases. The Committee takes note of this information.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1968)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It further notes the comments submitted by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), which principally refer to matters previously raised by the Committee as well as to the situation of migrant workers in export processing zones, who, according to the ITUC, are denied trade union rights and are subject to poor working conditions, threats of deportation and acts of violence. The Committee requests the Government to submit its observations thereon.

1. Scope of the Convention. Previously, the Committee had taken note of the allegations made by the ITUC in 2006 concerning the denial of trade union rights to migrant workers, including in the export processing zones, and had also referred to certain classes of agricultural workers excluded from the provisions of the Labour Code. In this regard, the Committee notes the Government's statement that the Ministry of Labour has supported the efforts of the General Federation of Jordanian Trade Unions (GFJTU) to reach out to migrant workers by helping to establish migrant workers' committees in the export processing zones that are associated with GFJTU offices set up in those areas. The Government adds that it has also responded to allegations of poor treatment of migrant workers by, inter alia, increasing the number of labour inspectors and appointing staff to provide them with logistical support, placing complaints boxes in most factories and offices employing migrant workers, and announcing the beginning of hotline services in seven languages to field work-related complaints. As concerns legislative measures, the Government indicates that in consultation with the social partners it has formulated amendments to the Jordanian Labour Code, the purpose of which is to include migrant workers, domestic workers, and all categories of agricultural workers within the scope of the Labour Code's provisions. The Government further states that the draft amendments have been referred to the Council of Ministers, in order to begin the process of adopting the legislative and constitutional measures for their promulgation. The Committee notes this information with interest. It expresses the hope that the amendments to the Labour Code will, in the near future, ensure the guarantees of the Convention to the categories of workers mentioned and requests the Government to transmit a copy of the amendments to the Labour Code once they are adopted.

2. Article 2 of the Convention. Need to provide for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference. The Committee had previously recalled that, to ensure that measures prohibiting acts of interference receive the necessary publicity and are effective in practice, the relevant legislation should explicitly lay down provisions for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference in order to guarantee the application in practice of Article 2 of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). Noting that the Government provides no information respecting this matter, the Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures in order to adopt legislative provisions providing for rapid appeal procedures and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference and to keep it informed in this respect.

Kazakhstan

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. In its previous observations, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether there were any regulations restricting trade union rights of non-citizens. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the Law on Trade Unions applies to foreign citizens, as well as to stateless persons living and working in Kazakhstan and that, by virtue of section 11 of the Law on Social Associations, all public associations, other than political parties, are allowed to open their membership to foreign citizens and stateless persons.

The Committee had further requested the Government to indicate whether there were any regulations restricting trade union rights of railway workers. The Committee notes the Government's indication that under the Law on Trade Unions, railway workers enjoy the same rights with regard to the establishment, operation and dissolution of their organizations as other trade union associations. The Government explains that workers of the railway sector are members of the Trade Union of Railway Workers of the Republic of Kazakhstan.

Article 5. Right of organizations to establish federations and confederations and to affiliate with international organizations. The Committee had previously noted the ban on financial assistance to national trade unions by an international organization (section 106 of the Civil Code and article 5(4) of the Constitution) and requested the Government to amend the legislation so as to lift this prohibition. The Committee notes the Government's indication that other than monetary, the financial assistance also includes such forms of support as property, equipment, motorized transport, communications, printing equipment, etc. The Government explains that the reason behind such a prohibition is dictated by the need to protect the constitutional structure, independence and territorial integrity of the State; and that trade unions, by their very nature, possess a well-organized solidarity and have the capacity to influence the public political view and the policy of the State in various areas of public life. The Government further indicates that in order to protect trade unions from external influence and to ensure their independence and self-sufficiency, the State may adopt a legislation to prohibit other assistance to trade unions from foreign entities. The Committee considers that legislation prohibiting the acceptance by a national trade union of financial assistance from an international organization of workers to which it is affiliated infringes the principles concerning the right to affiliate with international organizations of workers and that all national organizations of workers and employers should have the right to receive financial assistance from international organizations of workers and employers respectively, whether they are affiliated or not to the latter. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take steps to amend section 106 of the Civil Code, as well as article 5 of the Constitution, so as to lift this prohibition and to keep it informed of the measures taken or envisaged in this respect.

The Committee had previously requested the Government to clarify the meaning of article 5 of the Constitution and section 5(4) of the Law on Social Associations, which seemed to forbid the activities of international organizations within Kazakhstan, particularly in the light of section 9 of the Law on Social Associations, which provides that the subordinate structures (affiliates and representatives) of international and foreign non-commercial and non-governmental associations may form and operate in the Republic of Kazakhstan. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, while no foreign trade unions may operate in Kazakhstan, section 6 of the Law on Trade Unions entitles trade unions to cooperate with trade union organizations based abroad, join international trade union associations and organizations and conclude agreements.

Finally, the Committee notes the adoption, in May 2007, of the Labour Code. The Committee recalls that in its previous observations it had raised the following issues, which now seem to be covered by the new Code:

- the right to establish and join organizations of employees of law enforcement bodies and judges;
- the right to strike in civil service;
- the basis for determining the legality of strikes; and
- sanctions against strikes.

The Committee will examine these issues once the translation of the Labour Code becomes available.

The Committee further once again requests the Government to provide its observations on the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006, alleging violations of trade union rights in practice, in particular, high registration cost, which makes registration of trade unions almost impossible and interference by employers in trade unions' internal affairs.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

New Labour Code. The Committee notes the adoption, in May 2007, of the Labour Code which seems to regulate the issues previously raised by the Committee. The Committee will examine the conformity of the new Code with the Convention next year, once its translation becomes available.

Comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee regrets that the Government provides no reply to the previous comments of the ITUC, alleging violations of trade union rights in practice, in particular interference by employers in trade unions' internal affairs and activities, and refusals to bargain collectively. The Committee requests the Government to institute an independent investigation into these allegations and to keep it informed in this respect.

Liberia

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the comments of 10 August 2006 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) on the application of the Convention referring to matters already raised by the Committee and to threats of arrest and prosecution by the police to civil servants who took part in a strike in 2005. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations on these matters.

For many years the Committee has been asking the Government to take the necessary steps to amend or repeal the following provisions, which are inconsistent with Articles 2, 3, 5 and 10 of the Convention:

- Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes;
- section 4601-A of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting agricultural workers from joining industrial workers' organizations;
- section 4102, subsections 10 and 11, of the Labour Practices Law providing for the supervision of trade union elections by the Labour Practices Review Board; and
- section 4506 of the Labour Practices Law prohibiting workers in state enterprises and the public service from establishing trade unions.

The Committee notes a report of the judiciary and labour committees of the Senate on the passage of an act to repeal Decree No. 12 and requests the Government to furnish a copy of the repealing legislation with its next report.

Emphasizing the seriousness of these problems, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all steps within its reach to repeal or amend these provisions of the Labour Practices Law in the near future in order to bring the legislation fully into conformity with the requirements of the Convention, and requests the Government to provide information in its next report on all measures adopted to this end.

The Committee reminds the Government that the technical assistance of the Office is available should it so desire.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

The Committee takes note of the comments of 10 August 2006 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) on the application of the Convention.

The Committee recalls that for many years, it has been commenting on the application of Articles 1, 2 and 4 of the Convention and, in particular, has asked the Government to take measures to ensure that:

- the legislation guarantees workers adequate protection against anti-union discrimination at the time of recruitment and during the employment relationship, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions;
- the legislation guarantees workers' organizations protection against acts of interference by employers and their organizations, including sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions; and
- employees in state-owned enterprises who are not public officials engaged in the administration of the State enjoy the right to collective bargaining.

The Committee points out the seriousness of the problems it has raised and expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all measures within its reach to bring the law and practice fully into conformity with the requirements of the Convention, and asks the Government to provide information in its next report on all measures taken to this end.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Malawi

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It observes, however, that it does not reply to the points raised in its previous comments.

The Committee noted that the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) submitted comments that referred in particular to violent police repression of a protest march by tea sector workers as well as acts of violence against a trade union organizer. The Committee recalls that freedom of association can only be exercised in conditions in which fundamental rights, and in particular those relating to human life and personal safety, are fully respected and guaranteed. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take all the necessary measures to ensure that this kind of violent acts will not take place in future.

The Committee had noted that sections 45(3) and 47(2) of the Labour Relations Act empower the parties concerned to apply to the Industrial Relations Court for a determination as to whether a particular strike involves an essential service. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on any strike declared illegal and the reasons therefor, as well as on any decisions rendered by the Industrial Relations Court under sections 45(3) and 47(2) of the Labour Relations Act.

A request concerning other points is being addressed directly to the Government.

Malta

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1965)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government, pursuant to comments by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 10 August 2006, alleging death threats against leaders of the General Workers Union (GWU), to conduct an inquiry into these allegations and to keep it informed of the result. Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard, and that no further information has been provided by workers' organizations, the Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measure taken to verify these allegations and take appropriate measures.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to send its observations on the comments made by the ICFTU in 2006 with regard to suspensions of strikers, freezing of union assets and suits filed against unions following industrial action.

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify whether sections 74 and 75 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002, continue to impose compulsory arbitration over disputes of interest – just like the repealed Industrial Relations Act, 1976 – or whether the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal (under section 75(1) of the Act) is now limited to disputes of rights only. The Committee had also requested information on the number of strikes and the incidents of recourse to the Minister's power to refer disputes to the Industrial Tribunal at the request of only one party. The Committee notes that the Government's report does not contain any information on these points.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the request previously addressed to it with regard to the resolution of eight strikes held in 2003, to the effect that all of them were resolved through mediation by the authorities and not through recourse to the Industrial Tribunal.

The Committee recalls once again that restrictions on strike action through a compulsory arbitration procedure seriously limit the means available to trade unions to further and defend the interests of their members and are acceptable only in cases of essential services in the strict sense of the term, or public employees exercising authority in the name of the State, and at the request of both parties. The Committee once again asks the Government to clarify whether the Industrial Tribunal's jurisdiction is limited to questions arising from disputes of right, or whether it is also entitled to hear disputes of interest and issue binding decisions thereon and, if so, to take the necessary measures to amend sections 74 and 75 of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may be imposed only in cases of essential services in the strict sense of the term and public employees exercising authority in the name of the State.

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Article 1 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to clarify the procedures for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers given that these categories of workers are excluded from the jurisdiction of the industrial tribunal pursuant to section 75(1) of the Employment and Industrial Relations Act 2002 (EIRA). Noting with regret that the Government's report does not provide information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the procedures applicable for the examination of allegations of anti-union dismissals by public officers, port workers and public transport workers.

Articles 2 and 3. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous comments, the Committee had observed that the EIRA did not expressly protect employers' and workers' organizations from acts of interference by one another, nor did it provide for a rapid and effective appeals procedure or sanctions in the case of breach as is required to ensure compatibility with the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 232). While noting the Government's indication that section 2 of the EIRA includes in the definition of "trade dispute" a dispute between "employers and workers" and "workers and workers", so that, if an act of interference is alleged, any one of the parties can refer the matter to the industrial tribunal, the Committee notes that there is no explicit prohibition of acts of interference in the EIRA. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to introduce in the legislation an explicit prohibition of acts of interference, as well as sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against such acts.

Article 4. Collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2447 with regard to the need to amend section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act so as to ensure that this provision: (i) does not render automatically null and void any provisions in existing collective agreements which grant workers the right to recover public holidays falling on a Saturday or Sunday; and (ii) does not preclude voluntary negotiations in the future over the issue of granting workers the right to recover national or public holidays which fall on a Saturday or Sunday on the basis of a collective agreement (see 342nd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 752). Noting that the Government's report does not contain any information in this regard, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending section 6 of the National Holidays and Other Public Holidays Act.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether collective bargaining with trade unions representing less than 50 per cent of employees is possible, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee takes due note of the Government's report according to which nothing in the law precludes employers from negotiating with unions representing less than 50 per cent of employees.

In its previous observations, the Committee had noted with concern that section 74 of the EIRA entitles the Minister to refer an unresolved trade dispute to the industrial tribunal at the request of one party and that the industrial tribunal's decision in this matter will be binding. The Committee had also noted that, pursuant to section 80 of the EIRA, in its capacity to decide trade disputes, the industrial tribunal is obliged to take into consideration the Government's social and economic policies and plans. The Committee recalls that, except in the case of public servants engaged in the administration of the State or essential services in the strict sense of the term, it is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in the Convention, and thus the autonomy of the bargaining parties, for binding arbitration to be imposed by the authorities at the request of one party (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 257). The Committee addresses a request to the Government on this point under Convention No. 87.

Republic of Moldova

The Committee notes the Government's report as well as the Government's reply to the comments made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Moldova (CRSM).

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee notes that the Government points to article 20 of the Constitution and to article 38 of the Law on Trade Unions according to which a trade union organization claiming violations of its legal rights can submit an application to the juridical instance which will express itself on the causes of the dispute by a motivated decision. The violation of trade union rights is sanctioned under article 41 of the Code on Administrative Contraventions (CAC) which provides for application of fines in the amount up to 250 units, which equals 5,000 MDL (section 26 of the CAC).

The Committee notes that the Government refers to the comments of the CRSM according to which section 41 of the CAC does not describe in sufficiently specific terms the illegal actions that constitute obstructions of trade union activities. The Government points out that the Ministry of the Economy and Trade elaborated a draft law which sought the introduction of a new contravention into the CAC providing for the application of a fine in the amount from 75 to 200 conventional units for obstruction of lawful activities of trade unions and their bodies by high-level civil servants. The Government reports that it was, ultimately, decided to stop promoting the draft law in question, and suggested to Parliament to incorporate its content into the draft of the new Code on Contraventions which is currently being discussed in Parliament.

The Committee hopes that specific legislative provisions providing for effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions (civil, administrative or penal) in cases of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to keep it informed of new developments in this respect and to ensure that these sanctions are applied through effective and expeditious procedures.

Article 4. Compulsory arbitration. The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned section 360(1) of the Labour Code according to which, if the parties to the collective labour dispute have not reached an agreement or disagree with the decision of the reconciliation commission, either party has the right to submit an application to settle the conflict in the judicial tribunals.

The Committee notes that the Government refers to an amendment under consideration which would exclude the obligation to examine collective labour conflicts within the conciliation commission before addressing the judicial instance. The Committee considers, however, that this amendment maintains the possibility of one of the parties submitting the dispute to the judicial instances.

The Committee recalls that arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established in the Convention and thus the autonomy of the bargaining partners. Recourse to compulsory arbitration in cases where the parties do not reach an agreement through collective bargaining should be permissible only in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term (i.e. services, the interruption of which, would endanger the life, safety or health of the whole or part of the population) or for public servants engaged in the administration of the State. The Committee again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the legislation so as to ensure that referral of the dispute to the judicial tribunals is possible only upon request by both parties to the dispute, in the context of essential services in the strict sense of the term and for public servants engaged in the administration of the State.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the Government's report, including its reply to some of the comments previously made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in a communication dated 12 July 2006.

The Committee notes the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in its interim report concerning Case No. 2268 (340th Report, paragraphs 1064–1112) and in particular observes that it requested the Government to institute an independent inquiry into the alleged murder of a trade unionist, Saw Mya Than, and to release Myo Aung Thant from prison. The Committee notes that the Government's observations on these matters refer to its previous communications.

The Committee also notes the comments of the ITUC dated 27 August 2007 on grave matters which arose in the course of 2006, in addition to issues that have already been raised by the Committee over the years, including the current situation of an obscure legislative framework; a single trade union system; military orders and decrees further limiting freedom of association; the prohibition of trade unions; "workers' committees" organized by the authorities; the Federation of Trade Unions of Burma (FTUB) forced to work underground and accused of terrorism; and the repression of seafarers even overseas and the denial of their right to be represented by the Seafarers' Union of Burma (SUB):

- The arrest by the military authorities on 8 and 9 August 2006 of eight members of the family of the FTUB member and activist Thein Win at their house in the Kyun Tharyar section of Pegu city as well as ten alleged associates of Thein Win including the village head and other elders. While his mother and one of his sisters were released after one day, the others were sent to Toungoo prison and intensively interrogated under torture by military intelligence and special branch officers about the activities of Thein Win including an alleged trip he made to Pegu to organize activities around May Day. While being held at Toungoo the family members were ordered by their interrogators to sign "confessions" about Thein Win's activities and most of them were forced to do so under torture. On 3 and 4 September 2006, the authorities released most of the family members and friends. Most were however subsequently visited and threatened by military intelligence officers who demanded that each prisoner pay 1 million kyats into an army fund. Three of Thein Win's siblings (Tin Oo, Kyi Thein and Chaw Su Hlaing) were still being detained at the end of the year charged with violations of section 17(1) and (2) of the Unlawful Associations Act.
- The arrest in March 2006 of five underground democracy and labour activists for a variety of offences connected to efforts to provide information to the FTUB and other organizations considered as illegal by the regime, and to organize peaceful anti-SPDC demonstrations. All five were sentenced to long prison terms and four were serving those terms in Insein prison (U Aung Thein, 76 years old, sentenced to 20 years; Khin Maung Win, sentenced to 17 years; Ma Khin Mar Soe, 17 years; Ma Thein Thein Aye, 11 years; and U Aung Moe, 78 years old, sentenced to 20 years).

- Intimidation by the army of the 934 workers at Hae Wae Garment, located in South Okkapala Township in Rangoon, who went on strike on 2 May 2006 to demand better terms and conditions of work. The 48 workers allowed to meet with the authorities were forced to sign a written statement that indicated that there were no problems at the factory. A detachment of 12–20 police officers were regularly present in the factory after workers returned to work.
- The arrest and sentencing to a four-year prison term with hard labour of Naw Bey Bey, an activist member of the Karen Health Workers' Union (KHWU). She was supposedly held in Toungoo.

The Committee further recalls the grave information previously communicated by the ICFTU to which the Government has not provided any new information:

- The arrest, torture and killing of Saw Thoo Di, a.k.a. Saw Ther Paw, a Karen Agricultural Workers' Union (KAWU) committee member from Kya-Inn township, Karen State, by an armed column of Infantry Battalion 83 outside his village on 28 April.
- The shelling of the Pha village with mortars and rocket propelled grenades by Light Infantry Battalion 308 which had been sent by the State Peace and Development Council (SPDC) military upon learning that, on 30 April, the FTUB and Federation of Trade Unions – Kawthoolei (FTUK) were preparing a May Day workers' rights commemoration.
- The discovery in early June 2005, by the SPDC of an underground network of ten FTUB organizers in the Pegu area who were providing support and education to workers and serving as a networking and information link to FTUB structures abroad. Seven men and three women were arrested. In a press conference held on 28 August, the SPDC leaders accused the organizers of having used satellite phones to convey information from inside Burma to the FTUB, which then provided information to the ILO and the international trade union movement. The arrested FTUB members were taken to the infamous Aug Tha Pay interrogation centre in Mayangone district of Rangoon where they were investigated and tortured by special branch police and the Bureau of Special Operations (military intelligence) personnel during the months of June and July. On 29 July, they were transferred to Insein prison, and their case sent to a special court that conducts its hearings inside the prison. During the secret trial, they were denied access to outside counsel or witnesses, and the proceedings clearly did not meet international judicial standards. They were all found guilty and were sentenced on 10 October. Wai Lin and Win Myint, as key leaders of the network, respectively received sentences of 25 years and 18 years; the other five men and two of the women (Hla Myint Than, Major Win Myint, Ye Myint, Thein Lwin Oo, Aung Myint Thein, Aye Chan, Kin Kyi), each received seven-year jail terms, and bank clerk Ma Aye Thin Khine was sentenced to three years of imprisonment. In its communication of 27 August 2007, the ITUC adds that, at the end of 2006, all these FTUB members were still being detained in Insein prison. There were significant concerns about the health of retired army Major Myint Lwin, aged 77, who had been sentenced to seven years.
- Thet Naing, another underground FTUB leader, was released from Myitkyina prison in November 2004 after serving a seven-year sentence following his rearrest for his role in leading a workers' protest in the Yam Ze Kyang garment factory. He continues to be affected by nerve damage suffered from the torture he was subjected to during his interrogation and the mistreatment he received while in jail. He has now left the country and joined the FTUB abroad.

The Committee takes note of the information provided by the Government with regard to some of the other allegations made by the ICFTU in 2006:

- The police arrest on 17 April 2005 of four workers (Hlae Hlae Khaing, Zin Min Khing, Moe Thi and Mar Mar) following a strike at a garment factory in Hlaingthayar industrial zone, and their imprisonment in Rangoon for allegedly having broken the law through their actions connected with the factory (released on 2 May after mobilization of the other workers in the factory which was suppressed by the army). The Government indicates that the mobilization was due to claims that the annual bonus be paid on a monthly basis and was resolved through negotiations and conciliation.
- The death on 3 November 2005, of FTUB organizer Aung Myint (see above) under mysterious circumstances in his cell at Insein prison. According to the ICFTU, the authorities told the family that he died of dysentery, but refused to turn over the body to his relatives for a funeral, making it impossible to ascertain whether he died from abusive treatment, disease or other cause. Police officials cremated the body themselves. The Government indicates that he was suffering from tuberculosis and had received treatment in the prison hospital as well as the Insein Public Hospital and then, at the patient's request, back to the prison hospital where he died on 6 November 2005. Because his relatives had difficulties to arrange for a funeral, the authorities, in consultation with the relatives, cremated the body.

- The arrest of Myo Aung Thant, a member of the All Burma Petro-Chemical Corporation Union in 1997, and his being charged at the time with high treason for maintaining contacts with the FTUB. According to the ICFTU, now the SPDC, has explained that he was jailed for ten years for high treason under section 122(1) of the Penal Code, plus seven years for violations of the Emergency Provisions Act, plus three years for violating the Unlawful Associations Act. Myo Aung Thant is detained in a remote part of the country at Myitkyina prison in Kachin State, and was, according to his family, in the course of 2005 held in solitary confinement in a small, windowless cell. The Government indicates that the cell is 10 by 10 feet, the main door is 7 by 2.5 feet and the bed is 6 by 4 feet. He received a medical check-up and it was found that he was suffering from the disease of piles. He was sent to the Myitkyina General Hospital for operation. His relatives (mother, son, sister and niece) were able to see him seven times.

The Committee regrets the paucity of the information provided by the Government in reply to the large number of extremely grave allegations most of which have remained without reply. The Committee urges the Government to provide detailed observations on all the above allegations, in its next report.

The Committee once again most strongly deplores the recent and serious alleged acts of arrest, detention, torture and sentencing to many years of imprisonment of trade unionists for the exercise of their trade union activities, including the mere sending of information to the FTUB. The Committee recalls once again that respect for civil liberties is essential for the exercise of freedom of association and that workers and employers should be able to exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate of complete freedom and security, free from violence and threats and that a climate of violence, in which murders and disappearances of trade union leaders go unpunished, constitutes an extremely serious obstacle to the exercise of trade union rights and that such acts require severe measures to be taken by the authorities. The authorities should not seize on legitimate trade union activities as a pretext for arbitrary arrest or detention. Furthermore, as regards more specifically, torture, cruelty and ill-treatment, the Committee points out that trade unionists, like all other individuals, should enjoy the safeguards provided by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and governments should give the necessary instructions to ensure that no detainee suffers such treatment (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 29–30). The Committee therefore urges, once again, the Government to provide information on measures adopted and instructions issued without delay so as to ensure respect for the fundamental civil liberties of trade union members and officers and to take all necessary measures to release all those who have been imprisoned for the exercise of trade union activities immediately and to ensure that no worker is sanctioned for the exercise of such activities, in particular for having contacts with workers' organizations of their own choosing. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will soon be in a position to indicate progress in this respect.

Concerning the legislative framework (Articles 2, 3, 5 and 6 of the Convention), the Committee recalls that it had noted in its previous observation a total lack of progress towards establishing a legislative framework under which free and independent workers' organizations could be established. In particular, the Committee had regretted the long delay in the adoption of the Constitution, and the lack of participation in this process of the social partners and civil society as a whole, which would be a necessary foundation for the establishment of a legislative framework on the particularly serious and urgent issues raised in relation to the application of the Convention for nearly 20 years. Furthermore, the Committee recalls that, for several years, it has indicated that there exist some pieces of legislation containing important restrictions to freedom of association or provisions which, although not directly aimed at freedom of association, can be applied in a manner that seriously impairs the exercise of the right to organize. More specifically: (1) Order No. 6/88 of 30 September 1988 provides that the "organizations shall apply for permission to form to the Ministry of Home and Religious Affairs" (section 3(a)), and states that any person found guilty of being a member of, or aiding and abetting, or using the paraphernalia of, organizations that are not permitted shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years (section 7); (2) Order No. 2/88 prohibits the gathering, walking or marching in procession by a group of five or more people regardless of whether the act is with the intention of creating a disturbance or of committing a crime; and (3) the Unlawful Association Act of 1908 provides that whoever is a member of an unlawful association, or takes part in meetings of any such association, or contributes or receives or solicits any contribution for the purpose of any such association, or in any way assists the operations of any such association, shall be punished with imprisonment for a term which shall not be less than two years and more than three years and shall also be liable to a fine (section 17.1).

The Committee notes the Government's indications that: (i) the National Convention delegates successfully completed the drawing up of the fundamental principles and detailed basic principles for the drawing up of the Constitution; (ii) work has started at the basic level, especially in the Yangon Division, under the supervision of the Supervisory Committee of the Industrial Zone, towards the creation of the new trade union and that 11 basic workers' organizations have been formed at the industrial zones in Yangon Division and more will be formed in the remaining industrial zones of Myanmar; and (iii) workers can bargain with their employers on their working conditions under the existing labour laws, either individually or collectively; such bargaining took place in 80 factories and workplaces in 2006 and 140 factories and workplaces up to September 2007; all these could be settled by the representatives of the Government, employers and workers through conciliation and negotiation.

While noting the Government's indications, the Committee must, however, recall once again the long delay in the adoption of the Constitution and the fact that, in the meantime, no progress has been made on the particularly serious and urgent issues it has been raising for nearly 20 years now. It must also express serious doubts as to whether the organizations and negotiations referred to by the Government actually reflect the free choice and interests of workers in a situation as described above, void of any legislative protection for the exercise of meaningful freedom of association.

The Committee once again urges the Government to furnish without delay a detailed report on the concrete measures taken to enact legislation guaranteeing to all workers and employers the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing, as well as the rights of these organizations to exercise their activities and formulate their programmes and to affiliate with federations, confederations and international organizations of their own choosing without interference from the public authorities. It further urges the Government in the strongest terms to immediately repeal Orders Nos 2/88 and 6/88, as well as the Unlawful Association Act, so that they cannot be applied in a manner that would infringe upon the rights of workers' and employers' organizations. It requests the Government to communicate any steps taken towards the adoption of the Constitution and provide the text of the fundamental principles for the drawing up of the Constitution as well as any further relevant draft laws, orders or instructions made to guarantee freedom of association so that it may examine their conformity with the provisions of the Convention. Finally, the Committee requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the elements of civil society were involved in the adoption of the fundamental principles.

Pakistan

Right of Association (Agriculture) Convention, 1921 (No. 11) (ratification: 1923)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received.

The Committee notes the comments submitted by the Pakistan Workers Federation in a communication dated 2 May 2007 indicating that agricultural workers have been excluded from the application of the provisions of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 2002 and that they have no right to freedom of association.

In its last observations, the Committee noted that while agriculture is not expressly excluded from the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) 1969, it is not expressly covered and the definitions given in the Ordinance can be interpreted as excluding small agricultural workers like self-employed farmers, sharecroppers, tenants and smallholders, from its application.

The Committee notes that the IRO 1969 has been replaced by the IRO 2002. In this regard, the Committee notes that according to section 1(4), the IRO 2002 shall apply to all persons employed in any establishment or group of establishments or industry. According to section 3(1)(a) IRO 2002 the right to establish a trade union is granted to those employed in an establishment or industry; section 2(xi) defines establishment as "any office, firm, factory, society, undertaking, company, shop, premises or enterprise which employs workmen directly or through a contractor for the purposes of carrying on any business or industry and includes all its departments and branches". Industry is defined as "any business, trade, manufacture, calling, service, occupation or employment engaged in an organized economic activity of producing goods or services for sale, excluding those set up exclusively for charitable purposes" (section 2(xvii) IRO 2002). Moreover, according to section 2(x) IRO 2002, the term "employer" means any person or body of persons, whether incorporated or not, who or which employ workmen in an establishment under a contract of employment. The Committee therefore observes that although the IRO 1969 has been replaced by the IRO 2002, small agricultural holdings which do not run an establishment or farmers working on their own or with their family still appear to be excluded from the provisions on freedom of association.

Under these circumstances, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide in its next report detailed information concerning legislative and other measures taken or contemplated to ensure specifically that those engaged in agriculture, that appear to be excluded from the provisions on freedom of association of the IRO 2002, enjoy the same rights of association and combination as industrial workers. It also requests information on the number of trade unions and associations of agricultural workers.

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments concerned the following issues:

- (a) the authority of the Regional or General Labour Directorate to refer labour disputes to compulsory arbitration in order to stop a strike in a public service enterprise, including when the service cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, such as transport (sections 486 and 452 of the Labour Code);

- (b) sections 174 and 178, last paragraph, of Act No. 9 (“establishing and regulating administrative careers”) of 1994, which lay down respectively that there shall not be more than one association in an institution and that associations may have provincial or regional chapters, but not more than one chapter per province;
- (c) section 41 of Act No. 44 of 1995 (amending section 344 of the Labour Code), which requires too large a membership (ten) for the establishment of an employers’ organization and an even larger membership (40) for the establishment of a workers’ organization at the enterprise level;
- (d) article 64 of the Constitution, which requires Panamanian nationality in order to serve on the executive board of a trade union;
- (e) the obligation to provide minimum services with 50 per cent of the personnel in establishments which provide essential public services, which go beyond essential services in the strict sense of the term and include transport, and the penalty of summary dismissal of public servants for failure to comply with the requirement concerning minimum services in the event of a strike (sections 152(14) and 185 of Act No. 9 of 1994);
- (f) legislation interfering with the activities of employers’ and workers’ organizations (sections 452(2), 493(1) and 497 of the Labour Code) (closing of the enterprise in the event of a strike and compulsory arbitration at the request of one of the parties). The Government provided the technical assistance mission with a copy of Executive Decree No. 32 of 1994, providing for minimum services to safeguard the security of the enterprise and its assets, and the maintenance of services. The Committee requests the employers’ confederation, which raised this issue, to provide its comments in this regard;
- (g) the requirement of a high number (50) of public servants to establish an organization of public servants under the Act respecting administrative careers. The Government acknowledged previously that the number is high, but pointed out that section 176 of Act No. 9 allows public servants to organize by class (category) or sector of activity, and the Committee asked the Government to take steps to amend the legislation with a view to reducing the minimum number of public servants required to establish organizations;
- (h) denial of the right to strike of workers engaged at sea and on inland waterways (Act No. 8 of 1998), and in export processing zones (Act No. 25);
- (i) prohibition for federations and confederations to call strikes (prohibition of strikes protesting against problems relating to economic and social policy, while strikes not related to a collective agreement in an enterprise are unlawful). The Committee emphasized that federations and confederations should have the right to strike and that organizations responsible for defending workers’ socio-economic and occupational interests should, in principle, be able to use strike action to support their position in the search for solutions to problems posed by major social and economic policy trends which have a direct impact on their members and on workers in general, in particular as regards employment, social protection and the standard of living (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 165). The Committee requested the Government to take steps to amend the legislation with a view to bringing it into line with these principles;
- (j) disaffiliation of the National Federation of Associations and Organizations of Public Servants (FENASEP) from a trade union confederation by decision of the authorities. The Government indicated previously that public servants are governed by the Act respecting administrative careers and considered that they must join homologous organizations of public servants. The Committee pointed out that, although first-level organizations of public servants may be restricted to this category of workers, such organizations should, however, be free to join federations and confederations of their own choosing, including those which also group together organizations from the private sector (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 193). The Committee requested the Government to take measures to amend the legislation with a view to bringing it into line with the above principle. The Committee requested the Government not to prevent the affiliation of the FENASEP;
- (k) denial to public servants of the right to establish unions. The Government indicated previously that interpretation by the National Council of Organized Workers (CONATO) was inconsistent with reality; the right of association of public servants is recognized in Act No. 9 of 20 June 1994 and, in practice, FENASEP operates in the same way as any other private sector organization and participates in CONATO and the International Labour Conference. The Committee notes that FENASEP indicated to the technical assistance mission that it was negotiating with the Government the draft text partially reforming the Act respecting administrative careers;
- (l) denial of the right to strike of public servants. The Government indicated previously that the Constitution allows special restrictions in cases determined by law. The Committee recalls that the prohibition of the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State [see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 158];
- (m) denial of the right to strike in enterprises which have been in existence for less than two years under the terms of Act No. 8 of 1981. CONATO indicated that section 12 of the Act provides that no enterprise shall be compelled to conclude collective agreements during the first two years of operation and that the general legislation permits strikes only in pursuance of collective bargaining or in other limited cases. The Committee notes that the Government does not refer to this issue in its report and requests it to provide its comments on this matter;

- (n) the need for the support of the majority of the workers in the enterprise, shop or establishment to call a strike (section 476(2) of the Labour Code). The Government indicated previously that it considered the restriction to be justified by the effects produced by strikes under the national legislation (closure of the enterprise, prohibition upon the conclusion of new employment contracts, etc.). The Committee takes due note that the Government and the social partners indicated to the mission that if the above percentage is not obtained, at the third meeting of the union assembly, the requirement is for a simple majority of voting members.

The Committee notes the Government's statements in its report in which it repeats that it has shown its willingness to bring national law and practice into conformity with Conventions Nos 87 and 98, but that in order to do so it is necessary to amend the Labour Code, which in turn requires tripartite consensus. However, such consensus does not exist since, as the ILO technical assistance mission (February 2006) observed, there are significant differences between the social partners. The Government expressed the view that in light of the sensitivity of the subjects (right to organize, strikes, etc.), any reform has to be undertaken with tripartite consensus so that social peace is not endangered.

With reference to the specific points and requests for information, the Committee notes that the Government has provided the ruling of the Supreme Court which implicitly recognizes the right to collective bargaining and to strike of shipowners and organizations of seafarers, and which finds that section 75 of Legislative Decree No. 8 of 1998 infringes articles 64 and 65 of the Constitution. The Committee notes this ruling with satisfaction. It also notes with satisfaction that the FENASEP has been able to affiliate to the Workers' Central Organization (a previous government had cancelled the affiliation of the FENASEP to a trade union federation which included private sector workers, in which case the Committee had requested guarantees of the right to trade union affiliation).

The Committee notes that the Government has provided the text of the draft reform of the Act respecting administrative careers and notes with interest that it guarantees the right of association and the other rights envisaged in the Convention, and that it establishes protection against acts of anti-union discrimination and interference and recognizes the right to collective bargaining. Nevertheless, as the Act provides that "there shall not be more than one association in an institution", the Committee requests the Government to take measures to amend this provision so as to guarantee the application of Article 2 of the Convention, which sets out the right of workers to establish organizations of their own choosing; the exercise of this right could also be facilitated by reducing the minimum number of members or founders, which is set at 40 in the draft text (the Government nevertheless indicates that FENASEP is opposed to this measure).

The Committee notes that the Government has provided the text of Act No. 25 respecting export processing zones and recalls that it noted previously that a World Trade Zones Bill, which referred to the relevant provisions of the Labour Code for all matters relating to relations between workers and employers, would replace the above Act. The Committee understands that at present there is no right to collective bargaining or to strike in export processing zones, and accordingly maintains its previous comments on this subject.

The Committee regrets that the Government has not referred to certain legal provisions identified by the technical assistance mission in 2006 which could be amended as neither the Government nor the social partners were opposed to such amendment. These concern in particular the following: (1) reducing to four the number of employers needed to establish an employers' organization; (2) removing the restriction on the free affiliation of associations of public servants to other trade union organizations, particularly those of a higher level which group together public servants and other workers; and (3) the possibility for associations of public servants to have more than one chapter (section) per province.

The Committee regrets to note that the discrepancies referred to above between the law and practice and the Convention have existed for many years, and that some of the restrictions referred to are serious. The Committee requests the Government to fulfil its commitments to the technical assistance mission of 2006 in terms of holding meetings with the social partners in the form of seminars or workshops with the ILO's support and to actively promote tripartite dialogue on all pending issues. The Committee hopes that in the near future it will be in a position to note improvements in the legislation and requests the Government to keep it informed in this regard and, in accordance with the assurances given to the technical assistance mission, to ensure that any proposals to reform the trade union legislation are not used to regulate or include other issues.

The Committee notes with interest a new law of 2 July 2007, just transmitted by the Government, which grants public servants the right to establish and join trade unions and to engage in collective bargaining. The Committee understands that the new law provides for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee will examine the new legislation fully at its next session.

The Committee takes note of the information contained in the Government's report. It notes in particular the third draft Industrial Relations Bill, which was last revised on 14 August 2006 following widespread consultations with the social partners, has entered its third phase, and incorporates some technical inputs provided by the ILO. The said Bill replaces the draft Industrial Relations Act of 2003 as part of an ongoing effort, commenced in 2003, to review and consolidate the labour legislation. To this end, section 257 of the current Bill repeals the Industrial Organizations Act, the Industrial Relations Act, the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act of 1992, the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Act of 1998, the Public Service Conciliation and Arbitration Act, and the Teaching Service Conciliation and Arbitration Act.

Power of the minister to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest. Previously, the Committee had requested the Government to amend section 32 of the draft Industrial Relations Act of 2003, which confers a broad power on the Minister of Labour to assess collective agreements on grounds of public interest – a principle that also applied to the public sector. The draft legislation had stated that “The minister may, on behalf of the State, appeal as of right against the making of an award or order (including an award or order made by consent) or the certification of an agreement, on the ground that the making of the award or order, or the certification of the agreement, is contrary to public interest”. In this respect, the Committee notes that this provision has been retained in the most recent draft legislation – as section 32(1) of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill. Noting the Government’s indication that section 32 of the draft Bill has been highlighted for further review in January 2007, and that further improvements are needed to ensure the legislation’s compatibility with the Convention, the Committee recalls once again that such legislative provisions will only be compatible with the Convention if they merely stipulate that approval of collective agreements may be refused if the collective agreement has a procedural flaw, or does not conform to the minimum standards laid down by general labour legislation, and requests the Government to take measures to ensure that section 32(1) of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill is in conformity with this principle. The Committee reiterates its hope that the technical assistance currently being provided by the ILO would contribute to the resolution of this matter.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee had previously noted that the previous draft industrial relations legislation appeared to institute a system of compulsory arbitration when conciliation between the parties failed. The Committee notes in this regard that sections 151 and 152 of the previous draft Industrial Relations Act – which appeared to grant the commissioner the authority to commence compulsory arbitration proceedings where the power to initiate conciliation proceedings had not previously been exercised – have been retained as sections 151 and 152 of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill. In this connection, the Committee notes with regret the Government’s indication that it has opted to retain the same approach and system of compulsory arbitration, without significant changes from the previous draft legislation. The Committee also notes, nevertheless, that in its 2007 report to the Committee on the application of Convention No. 87, the Government had indicated that the sections concerning dispute settlement in the third draft Industrial Relations Bill would be subject to further deliberation at the National Tripartite Consultative Council meeting in early 2007, following which amendments would be drafted by an interim national consultant. In these circumstances, the Committee requests the Government to amend sections 151 and 152 of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill, so as to ensure that compulsory arbitration may only be possible for public servants engaged in the administration of the State or in the framework of essential services in the strict sense of the term.

The Committee expresses its hope that its comments will be fully taken into account in the finalization of the third draft Industrial Relations Bill and asks the Government to transmit a copy of the said legislation once it is adopted.

Philippines

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report including the text of the Act to Secure the State and Protect Our People from Terrorism (No. 9371). It also notes the discussion that took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007. Furthermore, the Committee takes note of the interim conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2528 which concerns allegations of killings, grave threats, continuous harassment and intimidation and other forms of violence inflicted on trade unionists. The Committee further notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication dated 27 August 2007 with regard to numerous violations of trade union rights in 2006, including killings, attempted murders, abductions, disappearances, assaults, torture, military intervention in trade union activities, violent police dispersion of International Women’s Day marches, and arrests of trade union leaders in connection with their activities. The Committee requests the Government to send its observations without delay on these very grave and serious allegations as well as on the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC) in 2006 with regard to the murder of four trade union leaders in 2005, anti-union violence in the sugar sector, death threats to discourage union formation in the economic zone in Cavite, and the non-arrest of the authors of the killings of seven strikers in November 2004.

A. Civil liberties. The Committee notes that in its conclusions, the Conference Committee expressed deep concern at the allegations of the murders of trade unionists, and emphasized that respect for basic civil liberties is essential for the exercise of freedom of association. While noting the initial steps taken by the Government to address this serious situation through the establishment of the Melo Commission and the subsequent creation of special regional tribunals, the Conference Committee, concerned at the absence of judgements against the perpetrators and instigators of these crimes, stressed the importance of ensuring that all instances of violence against trade union members are properly investigated and that any evidence of impunity is firmly combated to ensure the full and free exercise of trade union rights and their accompanying civil liberties. The Conference Committee urged the Government to ensure that all necessary measures are taken, including through the creation of independent and impartial investigations, so as to restore a climate of complete freedom and security from violence and threats thus enabling workers and employers to fully exercise their freedom of association rights.

The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its report that it is relentless and unceasing in its efforts to immediately solve the problem of killings generally and the alleged murder and enforced disappearance of trade unionists. The judiciary, through the Supreme Court, had in fact actively participated in these efforts. The Supreme Court had recently hosted a multi-sector National Summit on Killings and its second immediate concrete contribution – after previously designating special courts to try cases of killings – was the ongoing review of the rules of court to further enhance the protection of constitutional rights in response to the alleged murders and enforced disappearances of activists, trade unionists included. The Task Force Usig of the Philippine National Police (PNP) on the other hand, was continuously pursuing the investigation of the alleged cases and the eventual prosecution of the perpetrators. The Government is approaching the problem at all levels – investigation, prosecution, trial and possible conviction – within the context of the recommendation of the Melo Commission. The Government expresses optimism that definite results shall soon come out from all these efforts.

The Committee emphasizes that workers and employers should be able to exercise their freedom of association rights in a climate of complete freedom and security from violence and threats. Furthermore, the Committee stresses the importance of ensuring that all instances of violence against trade union members, whether these be murders, disappearances or threats, are properly investigated so as to avoid the emergence of a climate of impunity preventing the free exercise of trade union rights. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report further measures taken or contemplated with a view to the prompt investigation, prosecution, trial and conviction of those found guilty of murders and other violations against trade unionists.

B. Legislative issues. With regard to the other matters raised by the Committee in its previous comments, the Committee notes that in its conclusion, the Conference Committee noted with interest the information provided by the Government on certain recently adopted amendments to the Labor Code, and urged the Government to take measures to ensure, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, that further amendments are adopted in the very near future taking into account the comments made by the Committee of Experts for many years. The Committee notes that the Government's latest report is confined to stating that the concern on the adoption of legislative measures shall be addressed by Congress whose session had just opened in the latter part of July 2007.

Article 2 of the Convention. Right of workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations of their own choosing. 1. In previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to consider amending section 234(c) of the Labor Code, which requires, for registration of a trade union organization, the names of all its members comprising at least 20 per cent of all employees in a bargaining unit where it seeks to operate. The Committee notes the statement of the Government representative before the Conference Committee, according to which, an Act had been adopted in May 2007 which sought to expand the capacity of legitimate federations and national unions to organize and to help their local chapters acquire representation status for the purposes of collective bargaining. Any legitimate labour federation or national union could now create a local chapter which could in turn file a petition for the certification of an election without the minimum 20 per cent membership and without revealing the names of the officers and members of the local chapter. However, the 20 per cent membership requirement was still relevant in the case of unions seeking independent registration. The Committee understands from this statement that Senate Bill No. 1049, to which the Government had referred in previous reports, has been adopted. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the text of the relevant Act and to indicate in its next report measures taken or contemplated with a view to lowering the minimum membership requirement for registration of independent trade unions.

2. The Committee had previously requested the Government to amend sections 269 and 272(b) of the Labor Code, so as to grant the right to organize to all nationals lawfully residing within the Philippines (and not just those with valid permits if the same rights are guaranteed to Filipino workers in the country of the alien workers, or if the country in question has ratified either ILO Convention No. 87 or ILO Convention No. 98). The Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee does not provide any new information in this regard and recalls once again that Article 2 of the Convention provides for the right of all workers, without distinction whatsoever, to establish and join organizations. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to provide information in its next report on measures taken or contemplated so as to amend the above-noted sections in a manner which enables anyone legally residing in the country to benefit from the trade union rights provided by the Convention.

Articles 3 and 5. The Committee recalls that in previous comments it had requested the Government to:

- amend section 263(g) of the Labor Code so as to limit governmental intervention resulting in compulsory arbitration to the essential services only;
- amend sections 264(a) and 272(a) of the Labor Code, which provide for dismissal of trade union officers and penal liability to a maximum prison sentence of three years for participation in illegal strikes, so as to ensure that workers may effectively exercise their right to strike without the risk of being sanctioned in a disproportionate manner;

- lower the excessively high requirement of ten union members for federations or national unions set out in section 237(a) of the Labor Code, in order to ensure compliance with Article 5 of the Convention;
- amend section 270, which subjects the receipt of foreign assistance to trade unions to the prior permission of the Secretary of Labor, so as to ensure compliance with Article 5 of the Convention.

The Committee notes that in previous reports, the Government had referred to Senate Bill No. 1049 (formerly Senate Bill No. 2576), entitled “An Act Establishing the New Labor Code of the Philippines and for Other Purposes”, pending before both the Committee on Labor, Employment and Human Resources Development and the Committee on Constitutional Amendments, Revision of Code and Laws, and that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee does not provide any new information in this regard. Recalling that it has been commenting on these provisions for a number of years, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending the aforementioned legislative provisions so as to bring them into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government representative to the Conference Committee with regard to the exercise of the right to organize in export processing zones (EPZs), to the effect that trade unions in these zones have increased from 251 in 2000 to 341 as of September 2005 with a membership increase from 23,000 in 2000 to nearly 34,000 in 2005. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information in its next report on unionization levels in the EPZs.

Finally, recalling that the Conference Committee had requested the Government to accept a high-level ILO mission in respect of the serious matters raised relating to the purview of the Convention, the Committee trusts that this mission will take place in the very near future and that it will be able to assist the Government in ensuring full implementation of the Convention in both law and practice.

The Committee is raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee takes note of the information provided in the Government’s report.

In a request addressed directly to the Government, the Committee raises issues of protection against acts of anti-union discrimination in practice and requests the Government to give consideration, in full consultation with the social partners concerned, to the establishment of prompt and impartial procedures, in order to ensure that trade union officials and members have the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts of anti-union discrimination.

Romania

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the Government’s report and its reply to the comments made by the National Confederation of Trade Unions (CARTEL ALFA) of 15 November 2006 concerning the application of the Convention. The Committee also notes the debate which took place within the Conference Committee in June 2007 and particularly the fact that the Government accepted a technical assistance mission with regard to bringing its law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication that on 19 July 2007, Parliament adopted Act No. 261/9 concerning the settlement of labour disputes, amending and supplementing Act No. 168/1999. The Government points out that a new clause (e) has been introduced into section 12, adding the words: “in case of divergence from the compulsory annual negotiations concerning wages, working hours, the programme of work and conditions of work”. Nevertheless, the Committee considers that this amendment is not sufficient to settle all the issues raised in its previous observation (with regard to the settlement of labour disputes – sections 55 to 62 – particularly section 62 concerning submission of a dispute to the arbitration commission when the strike lasts over 20 days) and direct request. In this regard, the Committee hopes that the technical assistance mission accepted by the Government will take place in the near future.

Moreover, the Committee requests the Government to communicate its observations, in the context of the regular reporting cycle, at the next session in November–December 2008, on issues connected with the legislation and the practical application of the Convention which are mentioned in its previous observation (see 2006 observation, 77th Session).

Russian Federation

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee regrets that the Government failed to provide its observations on the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) concerning restrictions imposed on the right to strike and the alleged violation of trade union rights in practice. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

In its previous observation, the Committee had noted that the Labour Code was amended in 2006 and that several of its previous recommendations were not reflected in the amended Code. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to modify the following sections of the Labour Code so as to bring it into conformity with Article 3 of the Convention:

- section 410 of the Labour Code, so as to repeal the obligation to indicate the duration of a strike;
- section 412 of the Labour Code, so as to ensure that any disagreement concerning minimum services in organizations responsible for safety, health and life of people and vital interests of society, where the minimum services must be ensured during a strike, is settled by an independent body having the confidence of all parties to the dispute and not the executive body;
- section 413 of the Labour Code, so as to ensure that, when a strike is prohibited, any disagreement concerning a collective dispute is settled by an independent body and not by the Government.

The Committee further notes from the Government's report that the right to strike is restricted or prohibited in the following services: postal services (section 9 of the Federal Postal Service Act of 17 December 1994), municipal services (section 11(1)(10) of the Federal Municipal Services Act of 8 January 1998) and railways (section 26 of the Federal Rail Transport Act of 10 January 2003), which the Committee does not consider essential, i.e. those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population and in which restrictions and even prohibition may be justified. The Committee is of the opinion that in order to avoid damages which are irreversible or out of all proportion to the occupational interests of the parties to the dispute, as well as damages to third parties, namely the users or consumers who suffer the economic effects of collective disputes, the authorities could establish a system of minimum service in other services which are of public utility rather than impose an outright ban on strikes, which should be limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. In the view of the Committee, such a service should meet at least two requirements. Firstly, and this aspect is paramount, it must genuinely and exclusively be a minimum service, that is one which is limited to the operations which are strictly necessary to meet the basic needs of the population or the minimum requirements of the service, while maintaining the effectiveness of the pressure brought to bear. Secondly, since this system restricts one of the essential means of pressure available to workers to defend their economic and social interests, their organizations should be able, if they so wish, to participate in defining such a service, along with employers and the public authorities. It would be highly desirable for negotiations on the definition and organization of the minimum service not to be held during a labour dispute, so that all parties can examine the matter with the necessary objectivity and detachment. The parties might also envisage the establishment of a joint or independent body responsible for examining rapidly and without formalities the difficulties raised by the definition and application of such a minimum service and empowered to issue enforceable decisions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraphs 160–161). The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend its legislation so as to take into account the abovementioned principle.

The Committee notes that no information was provided by the Government in respect of the right to strike of public servants not exercising authority in the name of the State (previously prohibited by section 11 of the Law on fundamentals of state employment). In this regard, the Committee notes that the Law on civil service of 27 July 2004 repealed the Law on fundamentals of state employment. While the new law does not seem to expressly prohibit the right to strike in civil service, the Committee notes that section 18(6) stipulates that “civil servants must observe restrictions imposed on civil servants by the legislation”. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether there are any legislative restrictions imposed on the right to strike of civil servants other than civil servants exercising authority in the name of the State.

Finally, the Committee notes the Government's indication that the Ministry of Health and Social Development, together with the federal government authorities concerned and the social partners, was currently engaged in work to amend specific legislative acts so as to bring them into conformity with the recommendations of the ILO. The Committee hopes that further legislative reform will take into account its previous comments and requests the Government to keep it informed of any further developments in this respect.

The Committee is addressing a request concerning other matters directly to the Government.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee notes the Government's report and regrets that it does not provide a reply either to the previous comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) concerning several cases of anti-union discrimination, acts of interference by employers in trade union activities and violations of collective bargaining rights, or to the Committee's previous observation.

The Committee recalls that it had requested the Government to:

- specify the concrete sanctions imposed on employers found guilty of anti-union discrimination and to mention the relevant provisions;
- specify the sanctions imposed for acts of interference by workers' or employers' organizations or their agents in each other's affairs, particularly in the establishing, functioning and administration of the organizations, and to indicate the relevant legislative provisions;
- amend section 31 of the Labour Code so as to ensure that it is clear that it is only in the event where there are no trade unions at the workplace that an authorization to bargain collectively can be conferred to other representative bodies;
- take the necessary measures so as to ensure that the legislation provides for a possibility to conclude an agreement at the occupational or professional level;
- provide further information on the practical application of sections 402 and 403 of the Labour Code and 6(7) of the Law on collective labour disputes, which seem to impose compulsory arbitration;
- provide examples of collective agreements applicable to civil servants and civil employees of the military service and the system of execution of penal sentences.

The Committee hopes that the Government's next report will contain precise information on the above issues. Hoping that further legislative reform will take into account the previous requests of the Committee, it asks the Government to keep it informed of any further developments in this respect.

Rwanda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1988)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) of August 2006 with regard to acts of anti-union discrimination, including cases of unjustified dismissal of trade union leaders. In its reply, the Government indicates that under the terms of section 158 of the Labour Code, trade union delegates benefit from the same protection as staff delegates, particularly in respect of dismissal. It also describes the inquiries conducted into the cases of dismissal referred to by the ICFTU and the action taken. The Committee notes the indication that, in view of the delay in the labour administration being informed of the cases and intervening to enforce the law, the Government wishes to take measures, through workers' education activities, to raise the awareness of workers and trade unionists concerning the protection afforded by the law and that employers will be called upon to comply strictly with the protection of trade union delegates. The Committee notes this information and hopes that the planned activities will contribute to improving the application of the Convention.

The Committee notes the draft new Labour Code, dated September 2006, forwarded by the Government. The Committee regrets to note that, even though it is indicated in the preamble that the amendments are made to give effect to the recommendations made to the Government by the International Labour Office, the draft Labour Code does not take into account certain of the comments that it has been making for many years on the provisions applying the Convention.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee recalled that the legislation should make express provision for rapid appeal procedures, coupled with effective and sufficiently dissuasive sanctions against acts of interference and anti-union discrimination. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to prohibit, in the draft text of the new Labour Code or in any other legislative text, any acts of interference by employers' and workers' organizations in each other's affairs or of anti-union discrimination, and to adopt dissuasive sanctions for this purpose, not only in the case of staff delegates.

Article 4. The Committee previously requested clarifications concerning collective disputes and, more specifically, section 183 of the Labour Code, and it noted the Government's indication that a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted by both parties or by either of them individually to the competent legal authority the decisions of which are binding. The Committee also notes the draft ministerial order on the establishment and functioning of the conciliation board, issued under section 183 of the Labour Code. It requests the Government to keep it informed of the adoption of this ministerial order. The Committee recalls that, with the exception of public servants engaged in the administration of the State and essential services in the strict sense of the term, arbitration imposed by the authorities at the request of one party is generally contrary to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements established by the Convention, and therefore the autonomy of the bargaining partners (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 257). The Committee therefore requests the Government to amend section 183 of the Labour Code (section 222 of the new draft Labour Code) so that, except in the circumstances referred to above, a collective labour dispute in the context of collective bargaining may be submitted to the competent legal authority only with the agreement of both parties.

The Committee also notes that, under the terms of section 136 of the new draft Labour Code, at the request of one of the representative organizations of workers or of employers, the collective agreement shall be negotiated in a joint commission convened by the Minister of Labour. In this respect, the Committee recalls that this provision is liable to restrict the principle of free and voluntary bargaining by the parties and it requests the Government to amend section 136 of the new draft Labour Code by establishing that recourse to a joint commission can only generally be had with the agreement of both parties.

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to amend the draft new Labour Code taking into account the principles described above and it trusts that in its next report the Government will indicate real progress in bringing the legislation into conformity with the Convention. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the Government may call upon the technical assistance of the Office.

Article 4. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to adopt measures to encourage and promote the widest possible use of voluntary negotiation procedures and of collective agreements in the country. Noting the information supplied by the Government relating to the adoption of Ministerial Order No. 62/03 of 2 November 2005 on the establishment and operation of the National Labour Council and the list of its members, the Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the activities of the National Labour Council in relation to collective bargaining, as well as the number of collective agreements concluded, and the sectors and number of workers covered.

Sao Tome and Principe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1992)

The Committee notes the Government's report and regrets to note that it does not reply to the issues raised. The Committee notes that the World Confederation of Labour (WCL) and the General Union of Workers of Sao Tome and Principe (UGT-STP) sent comments on the application of the Convention which refer mainly to the outstanding issues.

The Committee recalls that it has been commenting for a number of years on the need for the Government to take steps to amend the provisions of Act No. 4/92 which refer to the following issues:

- the majority required for calling a strike is too high (section 4 of Act No. 4/92);
- with regard to minimum services, it is important, in the event of disagreement in determining such services, that the matter be settled by an independent body and not by the employer (section 10, paragraph 4, of Act No. 4/92);
- the hiring of workers without consultation with trade unions concerned to perform services essential to maintain the economic and financial viability of the enterprise should it be seriously threatened by a strike (section 9 of Act No. 4/92);
- compulsory arbitration for services which are not essential in the strict sense (services whose interruption might endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population) (postal, banking and loan services; section 11 of Act No. 4/92).

The Committee asks the Government to take steps to amend the abovementioned legislative provisions so as to bring the legislation into line with the Convention, and to inform it, in its next report, of any measures adopted in this regard.

The Committee asks the Government, once again, to state whether public employees have the right to organize, and to indicate the applicable provisions in this respect. Finally, the Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether federations and confederations are able to exercise the right to strike.

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. The Committee had asked the Government to indicate what sanctions may be imposed against acts of discrimination which undermine freedom of association and acts of interference by employers and their organizations in workers' organizations and vice versa. The Committee notes the Government's indication that there is no appropriate legislation providing for sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination. The Committee therefore asks the Government, once again, to take the necessary steps to adopt appropriate legislation which imposes sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference committed by employers against trade union organizations, in conformity with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee reminds the Government that it may seek technical assistance from the Office in this respect.

Sierra Leone

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

*Articles 1 and 2 of the Convention. Need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers and workers' organizations against acts of anti-union discrimination and acts of interference. The Committee had previously noted that the revision of the labour laws, prepared with ILO technical assistance, had already been submitted to tripartite meetings, that the comments of the tripartite body had been received and that the document had just been forwarded to the Law Officers' Department. The Committee had asked the Government to keep it informed of any further progress made in the preparation of the final draft document and to provide a copy of the revised legislation as soon as it had been adopted. Noting that according to the information previously sent by the Government, the revision of the labour laws was submitted to the Law Officers' Department in 1995, the Committee requests the Government once again to make every effort to take the necessary action for the adoption of the new legislation in the very near future and to keep it informed in this regard.

*Article 4. The Committee requested the Government in its previous observation to provide information on any collective agreements covering teachers that had been concluded. The Committee notes the Government's indication in a previous report that the Sierra Leone Teachers' Union has been conducting free and voluntary negotiation with employers under the trade group negotiation councils established by law to fix better terms and conditions of employment for the workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information on the collective agreements in force in this sector.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

South Africa

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1996)

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments previously sent by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation).

The Committee recalls that the ICFTU comments referred to acts of violence and arrests during the course of strikes and demonstrations, as well as massive dismissals of strikers in various sectors (truck drivers, toll operators, metalworkers, teachers, rural workers, public sector, etc.) in 2005.

The Committee takes due note of the detailed information provided by the Government according to which, the issue of massive dismissals was related to restructuring operations, which do not constitute an exclusively South African phenomenon and were carried out within a legal framework which provides for consultations with employees as well as conciliation/mediation facilities and the possibility to refer the matter to the Labour Court for adjudication or the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration (CCMA) for arbitration. Furthermore, with regard to the intervention of the police in various incidents the Government indicates that this was prompted by the commission of violent and criminal acts. The Committee takes due note of the detailed information provided by the Government on each incident mentioned by the ICFTU which indicates that police intervention was not prompted by a motive to intimidate workers but rather to uphold the law and protect property and lives. Finally, the Committee notes that the Government emphasizes that the Bill of Rights enshrined in the Constitution of the country provides that although everyone has a right to assemble, demonstrate and picket, these actions must be peaceful and unarmed; everyone has the right to life and to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources.

Swaziland

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1978)

1. The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It also notes the comments of 29 March 2007, by the Swaziland Federation of Trade Unions (SFTU) referring to issues under examination.

2. The Committee wishes to recall that for several years it has been referring to provisions of the law that are inconsistent with those of the Convention, or has requested information on the effect given to some provisions in practice. In its previous comments, it asked the Government:

- to repeal the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations, concerning trade union rights;

- to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes;
- to amend the legislation or enact other laws to ensure that prison staff and domestic workers (section 2 of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA)) have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests;
- to amend section 29(1)(i) of the Industrial Relations Act (IRA) placing statutory restrictions on the nomination of candidates and eligibility for union office, to enable such matters to be dealt with in the statutes of the organizations concerned;
- to amend IRA section 86(4) to ensure that the Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Commission (CMAC) does not supervise strike ballots unless the organizations so request in accordance with their own statutes;
- to recognize the right to strike in sanitary services (at present banned by IRA section 93(9)), and establish only a minimum service with the participation of workers and employers in the definition of such a service;
- to amend the legislation in order to shorten the compulsory dispute settlement procedures laid down in IRA sections 85 and 86 read in conjunction with sections 70 and 82;
- with regard to the civil liability of trade union leaders, to continue to provide information on any practical application of section 40, and in particular the charges that may be brought under IRA section 40(13); and
- to provide information on the effect given in practice to IRA section 97(1) (criminal liability of trade union leaders) and to ensure that penalties applying to strikers under section 88 are proportionate to the seriousness of the offence and that enforcement of section 87 does not impair the right to strike.

3. In this respect, the Committee recalls that in its previous observation it noted that the Government and the social partners signed an agreement undertaking to set up a Special Consultative Tripartite Subcommittee within the framework of the High-level Steering Committee on Social Dialogue. The terms of reference of the Subcommittee are: (1) to review the impact of the Constitution on the rights embodied in Convention No. 87; and (2) to make recommendations to the competent authorities to eliminate the discrepancies between the existing legislative provisions and the Convention. The Committee notes that the High-level Social Dialogue Committee has decided, in respect of the constitutional issues, that the ongoing engagement between the Government and the national Constitutional Assembly, which extended beyond those groups in the Tripartite Subcommittee to involve other interest groups, should not be disturbed. Furthermore, the Committee notes, as regards legislative issues, that the Labour Advisory Board (LAB) of a tripartite nature drafted an Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill proposing amendments to the IRA in relation to sections 2, 29(1)(i), 85 and 86, taking into account comments made by the Committee (see above). The Committee nevertheless observes that some questions were not included but were pending consultation with the ILO (the right to strike in sanitary services).

The Committee expresses the firm hope that all its comments, and where necessary the technical advice of the Office, will be taken into account in amending the Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill and that it will be adopted in the near future. It requests the Government to keep it informed of any development in this respect.

Furthermore, the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps: (1) to abrogate the 1973 Decree/State of Emergency Proclamation and its implementing regulations concerning union rights; (2) to amend the 1963 Public Order Act so that it will not be used to repress lawful and peaceful strikes; and (3) to guarantee that prison staff have the right to organize in defence of their economic and social interests. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to review and amend the legislation and to provide information on any development in this respect.

4. Report from the Independent Judicial Inquiry. Finally, the Committee takes due note of the report of the Independent Judicial Inquiry set up as recommended by the Committee and which visited Swaziland from 2 to 9 December 2006, to investigate and clarify all the facts on the allegations of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) according to which, in August 2003, a three-day protest by Swazi labour federations was violently broken up by police using tear gas and rubber bullets, during which a trade unionist was killed. In particular, the Committee notes that the Independent Judicial Inquiry: (1) was not able to conclude that there was a death of a person during the protest action; however, the inquiry declared itself surprised by the fact that no records on casualties and fatalities were available for the days of the protest and indicated that this situation did not help to remove all doubt; and (2) the security forces used force that was disproportionate to the circumstances and this was substantiated by pictures and witnesses. In these circumstances, while noting that the Government has taken note of the findings of the Independent Judicial Inquiry and continues to discuss them, the Committee would like to recall that the authorities should resort to the use of force only in situations where law and order are seriously threatened, and that the intervention of the forces of law and order should be in due proportion to the danger to law and order that the authorities are attempting to control, and governments should take measures to ensure that the competent authorities receive adequate instructions so as to eliminate the danger entailed by the use of excessive violence when controlling demonstrations which might result in disturbance of the peace. The Committee firmly hopes that the Government will guarantee full respect of the principles set out above in the future.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the Government's report. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) of 10 August 2006, which referred to issues that have already been examined and a number of acts of anti-union discrimination in the textile sector. The Committee once again requests the Government to send its observations in respect of the ICFTU comments.

The Committee recalls that in its previous comments it referred to the following points:

- the need to adopt specific provisions accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations (Article 2 of the Convention); and
- the need to adopt a specific legislative provision so as to ensure that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, this does not prevent the exercise of the collective bargaining rights of the unions in the unit at least on behalf of their own members (Article 4 of the Convention).

The Committee notes from the report of the Government that a process has already commenced within the social dialogue framework for all the comments of the Committee to be addressed positively. A high-level steering committee has already been established and has already decided to fast-track the comments by setting up subcommittees and task teams to deal with them and submit their draft by the end of February 2007. The Committee notes that, in this process, the Government is counting on the technical assistance of the Office.

The Committee has been recently informed that the Labour Advisory Board (LAB), of tripartite nature, is reviewing the legislative issues raised by the Committee for many years and has drafted an Industrial Relations (Amendment) Bill which includes a number of amendments to the Industrial Relations Act. The Bill refers to the need to tackle the issue of adopting a specific legislative provision so as to ensure that, if no union covers more than 50 per cent of the workers, this does not prevent the exercise of the collective bargaining rights of the unions in the unit, at least on behalf of their own members. The Committee, however, notes that the draft does not address the issue of the adoption of specific provisions, accompanied by sufficiently effective and dissuasive sanctions, for the protection of workers' organizations against acts of interference by employers or their organizations, as required by Article 2 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to address also this issue in the draft Bill.

The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to review and amend the legislation, where necessary with the technical assistance of the Office, and expresses the hope that the legislation will be brought into full conformity with the requirements of the Convention in the near future. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments in this regard.

Switzerland

The Committee notes the Government's report for the period ending May 2006, which was received at the end of its previous session (November–December 2006) and of which it decided to postpone the examination. The Committee notes that the Government attaches comments by the Union of Swiss Employers (UPS) and the Swiss Federation of Trade Unions (USS). It also notes the comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), dated 12 July and 10 August 2006, which relate to issues that are already under examination. The Committee further notes the discussion in the Committee on the Application of Standards at the 95th Session of the International Labour Conference (June 2006).

Articles 1 and 3 of the Convention. Protection against anti-union dismissals. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the comments of the USS according to which protection against anti-union dismissals is not adequate and its reference to a number of court decisions on this matter. In its statement to the Conference Committee, the Government however indicated that adequate protection did, in practice, exist, and included recourse to the courts against acts of anti-union interference. In its report, the Government emphasizes that: (a) Swiss law provides adequate protection for trade union delegates and representatives, thereby complying fully with the Convention; (b) the current system under Swiss legislation relating to unjustified termination of employment takes into account the fact that compensation which may attain six months' wages constitutes, particularly in the view of Parliament, a sufficiently dissuasive measure in view of the fact that the great majority of Swiss enterprises are small and medium-sized enterprises; (c) the Parliament did not wish to introduce into Swiss law respecting contracts of employment the principle of the reinstatement of dismissed workers, which is not required by the Convention or the ILO's supervisory bodies; (d) the principles referred to previously were set out democratically and confirmed by recent parliamentary interventions, and the question does not therefore arise in this context of proposing a legislative amendment establishing additional protection against acts of anti-union discrimination, as it would be doomed in advance to failure and would further increase the parliamentary workload; (e) the courts take into account all objective, and even subjective circumstances in granting compensation to workers, the amount of which is determined equitably; (f) the cases referred to by the USS have all been the subject of regular legal action before the courts and the rights of the parties have been respected, even in the cases in which the parties have agreed upon arrangements on the basis of legal texts; and (g) only five of the 11 cases raised by the USS in its complaint of 14 May 2003 may be considered as valid.

The Government adds in its report that the Federal Council provides detailed explanations of the tripartite negotiations held following the adoption in November 2004 of the interim conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2265. The Tripartite Federal Commission for ILO Affairs examined the case. However, in the absence of agreement, it was not considered necessary for measures to be adopted to strengthen protection against unjustified dismissals on anti-trade union grounds or to make it more effective in practice. However, it is recognized that the discussion on strengthening protection against unjustified dismissals may be pursued in a broader political and democratic context at the national level.

The Government indicates that the parliamentary and democratic channels exist to ensure a serene political debate at the national level (parliamentary interventions and popular initiatives) and accordingly to achieve the objective pursued by the USS of effective protection in practice against unjustified dismissals for anti-trade union reasons. Finally, the Government reports recent changes in the case law respecting penalties against dismissals, which it describes as being more flexible and more favourable to the interests of dismissed workers than described by the USS.

In its comments, the USS observes that it put forward proposals relating to protection against anti-trade union dismissals. These proposals were discussed in November 2005, but were not retained by the Government as they were not accepted by the employers. The USS adds, citing cases, that anti-union practices and dismissals still occur and that judicial practice does not correspond to the criteria for protection against acts of anti-union discrimination set out by the Committee in its 1994 General Survey.

The Committee notes that the Committee on Freedom of Association, in its recommendations when it last examined Case No. 2265 in November 2006, requested the Government to take measures to provide the same protection to trade union representatives who suffer anti-union discrimination as for victims of dismissals that violate the principle of equal treatment for men and women, and it encouraged the continuation of tripartite discussions on the whole matter, including a review of the situation in certain cantons with regard to compensation for anti-union dismissals (see 343rd Report of the Committee on Freedom of Association, paragraph 1148). In these conditions, taking into account the Government's statement that the debate on reinforcing protection against unjustified dismissals may be pursued in a broader political and democratic context at the national level and noting that it has not been informed, either by the Government or the trade union organization, of developments during the course of 2007 following the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any development towards greater protection against anti-union dismissals and any development in case law respecting the compensation granted for unjustified dismissal for anti-union reasons, including by cantonal courts.

Article 2. Protection against acts of interference. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the misgivings expressed by the USS concerning the establishment of staff associations partially financed by employers and the replacement of unions by staff committees, all at the instigation of employers so as not to have to negotiate with the unions. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that legal procedures allow the social partners to assert their rights. The Government indicates that the courts can penalize acts of interference and order the holding of collective bargaining, and it refers in this respect to a decision of December 2005 of the Collective Labour Relations Chamber of the Canton of Geneva finding in favour of the participation of an enterprise union in collective bargaining. In its comments, the USS expresses the hope that federal case law will develop in the same direction as in the above decision, as views currently differ between cantons on this matter. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments in case law, including at the cantonal level, on this matter.

Article 4. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee noted previously that, according to the USS, collective bargaining in Switzerland is not sufficiently extensive and for years the Swiss Confederation has shown no interest in furthering the implementation of the Convention. The USS also refers to the lack of initiatives by the public authorities to encourage voluntary collective bargaining machinery within the meaning of the Convention. In its latest comments, the USS recalls that, according to the latest federal statistics, the coverage of collective bargaining is declining. It indicates that it has proposed tangible measures to promote collective bargaining and does not understand the Government's inaction when the majority of enterprises are small and medium-sized and it is materially impossible for trade unions to approach all enterprises that are not affiliated to an employers' organization, just as it would be impossible to take action in court against all those enterprises refusing to engage in collective bargaining.

The Government provided statistical data for 2003 to the Conference Committee and reported that there were 594 collective agreements in force covering 1,414,000 employees, of whom 36.3 per cent were women. The total proportion of employees covered by collective agreements is 36.7 per cent, according to official figures. Finally, these agreements primarily cover the construction sector (where 66.4 per cent of workers are covered by a collective agreement), industry (40.5 per cent), services (35 per cent) and agriculture (7.2 per cent). In its report, the Government adds that a collective labour agreement can be extended by the federal and cantonal authorities at the request of the parties to the agreement and thereby be made applicable to all employers and workers in an economic branch or occupation, on condition that certain legal requirements are fulfilled.

The Committee notes these indications. It requests the Government to indicate the manner in which the law and case law address abusive practices in relation to collective bargaining (substantiated acts of bad faith, unjustified delay in the holding of negotiations, failure to comply with agreements, etc.), and any measures adopted to promote the broadest development and utilization of machinery for the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements.

Syrian Arab Republic

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes the Government's report. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to indicate whether the right to organize of public servants is governed by section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1996, as amended, or by other legislative provisions and, if so, to provide copies of the relevant legislation. The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication that the right to organize of civil servants is governed by section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1996 which applies to every worker, since no exceptions have been introduced to this provision by any other legal text so far.

Article 3 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974). The Committee takes note of the Government's reply indicating that the unity of trade union organization is not contrary to the substance of the Convention and results from the decisions and orders of the working class at different levels of the union assemblies; it would be illogical to pretend to defend workers' freedom and then oppose the final trade union structure freely chosen by the workers themselves for their representation as an expression of their interests. The Committee recalls once again that although it is generally to the advantage of workers and employers to avoid proliferation of competing organizations, trade union unity directly or indirectly imposed by law runs counter to the standards expressly laid down in the Convention (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 91). The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so as to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which establish a regime of trade union monopoly (sections 3, 4, 5 and 7 of Legislative Decree No. 84; sections 4, 6, 8, 13, 14 and 15 of Legislative Decree No. 3, amending Legislative Decree No. 84; section 2 of Legislative Decree No. 250 of 1969; and sections 26–31 of Act No. 21 of 1974).

The Committee's previous comments concerned legislative provisions which authorize the Minister to set the conditions and procedures for the investment of trade union funds in the financial services, and industrial sectors (section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84, as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the signature of the Minister is required merely as an administrative formality under the scope of his responsibility for the implementation of labour laws and related issues. The Committee recalls that several legislative amendments introduced in 2000, which were taken note of in the Committee's previous comments, were aimed at guaranteeing the freedom of trade unions to organize their administration and activities without interference but did not explicitly amend the provision authorizing the Minister to set the conditions for investment of trade union funds. The Committee requests the Government to provide details in its next report on the specific conditions established by the Minister on the basis of section 18(a) of Legislative Decree No. 84 (as amended by section 4(5) of Legislative Decree No. 30 of 1982) for the investment of trade union funds in the financial services, and industrial sectors.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the legislative provisions which determine the composition of the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) Congress and its presiding officers (section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84). The Committee takes note of the Government's reply indicating that trade unions in the Syrian Arab Republic are independent, that their administration and activities are organized in accordance with their internal statutes and that their independence is secured by national legislation. Noting that the Government's report does not address specifically the issue of the provisions which determine the composition of the General Federation of Trade Unions (GFTU) Congress and its presiding officers (section 1(4) of Act No. 29 of 1986, amending Legislative Decree No. 84), the Committee once again requests the Government to provide specific information on the measures taken or contemplated to repeal or amend these provisions.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84 so as to allow a certain percentage of trade union officers to be non-Arab, at least after a reasonable period of residence in the country. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, by virtue of section 25 of Legislative Decree No. 84 of 1968, as amended by section 1(c) of Act No. 25 of 2000, foreign non-Arab workers have the right to join an occupational trade union; consequently, according to the Government, they have the right to present themselves as candidates to trade union elections. The Committee notes, however, that section 44(B)(3) explicitly sets Arab nationality as a condition of eligibility to trade union office and that the provisions mentioned by the Government do not amend or repeal this provision. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the provisions which explicitly amend section 44(B)(3) of Legislative Decree No. 84 so as to allow a certain percentage of trade union officers to be non-Arab.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend legislative provisions which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code). The Government indicates in this respect that the relevant amendment of the Penal Code requires more time than other amendments and is currently being followed up on. The Committee recalls that sanctions for strike action should not be disproportionate to the seriousness of the violations, and that both excessive recourse to the courts in labour relations and the existence of heavy sanctions for strike action may well create more problems than they resolve (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 177–178). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the progress made with regard to the adoption of amendments to the legislative provisions (sections 330, 332, 333 and 334 of Legislative Decree No. 148 of 1949, issuing the Penal Code) which restrict the right to strike by imposing heavy sanctions including imprisonment.

In its previous comments, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to amend legislative provisions which impose forced labour on anyone causing prejudice to the general production plan decreed by the authorities, by acting in a manner contrary to the plan (section 19 of Legislative Decree No. 37 of 1966 concerning the Code on economic penalties). The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the penalty of forced labour was repealed by virtue of Act No. 34 of 2000. The Committee notes however, that Act No. 34 of 2000 concerns amendments to the Agricultural Relations Act of 1958 and does not appear to repeal any penalty of forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the provisions which have been adopted or are being contemplated in order to repeal section 19 of Legislative Decree No. 37 of 1966 concerning the Code on economic penalties which imposes forced labour on anyone causing prejudice to the general production plan.

The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee recalls that in its previous comments, it had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to amend sections 212, 213 and 219 of the Labour Relations Law (2005) so as to:

- lower the 33 per cent representation requirement imposed on trade unions and employers (or their organizations) for collective bargaining purposes at all levels;
- adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for determining the most representative organization, based on objective and pre-established criteria; and
- adopt legislative provisions regulating the procedure for establishing the negotiation board (the members of which are appointed by trade unions) when no trade union organization represents 33 per cent of employees or no employers' organization meets the same requirement.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that it intends to begin a "Twinnig project" in October 2007 to review the existing labour legislation in order to harmonize it with the EU legislation. In the framework of this project, the issue of representativeness will be examined. The duration of the project will be 15 months; therefore, the Government expects that the necessary changes will be introduced into the legislation by the end of next year. The Committee trusts that all its comments will be taken into account in the process of legislative revision and requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect.

Workers' Representatives Convention, 1971 (No. 135) (ratification: 1991)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee refers to its comments in the framework of Convention No. 98.

Togo

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. Export processing zones. The Committee also notes the comments made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) on 10 August 2006 referring to matters already raised in its previous observation, and particularly the exercise of trade union rights in export processing zones. In this regard, recalling that for several years it has been commenting on the need for workers in export processing zones to benefit from trade union rights, the Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of any trade union organization that has requested the legal capacity to defend workers in export processing zones.

Article 3. Right of foreign workers to hold trade union office. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the draft amendment prepared by the Government to bring section 6 of the Labour Code, concerning the right of foreign workers to hold trade union office, into conformity with the Convention. The Committee noted that, according to the Government, the draft text of the new Labour Code, which was in the final stages of adoption, took this concern into account and contained provisions that are compatible with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed in this respect and to provide a copy of the abovementioned text.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Trinidad and Tobago

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee has been referring for a number of years to the need to amend various sections of the Industrial Relations Act, as amended, so as to: (1) enable a simple majority of the workers in a bargaining unit (excluding those workers not taking part in the vote) to call a strike (section 59(4)(a)); (2) ensure that any recourse to the courts by the Ministry of Labour or by one party only to end a strike is limited to cases of strikes in essential services in the strict sense of the term (sections 61 and 65); (3) ensure that prohibition of industrial action in essential services is limited to cases of strike in essential services in the strict sense of the term (section 67); and (4) repeal the prohibition of industrial action, under penalty of 18 months' imprisonment, for the teaching service and employees of the Central Bank (section 69).

The Committee notes that the Government has sought the views of the social partners on its observations through a tripartite committee established in 1996 to give effect to ILO Convention No. 144. It notes that the parties have: (1) agreed that a legal assessment of the implications of amending section 59(4)(a) of the Act was required for a position to be taken; (2) concurred with the Committee's view as regards sections 61 and 65; (3) agreed that the public school bus service should be excluded from the list of essential services (the workers' group did not consider any of the services listed in the second schedule of the Act as essential services in the strict sense of the term); and (4) diverged as regards section 69 (the workers' representative supported the amendment of that section whereas the Government and employers' representatives wanted further information on the practice in other countries, in particular those of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM)). The Committee also notes that the social partners have agreed to refer further consideration of amendment to the Industrial Relations Act to the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters which will be required to examine the request of the Committee to amend the various sections of the Act. However, this Standing Tripartite Committee is to be reconstituted given the expiration of its term on December 2006.

The Committee expresses the hope that concrete measures will be taken in the near future to amend the legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any progress made in this respect.

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

1. Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee's previous comments concerned the need to amend section 24(3) of the Civil Service Act that affords a privileged position to already registered associations, without providing objective and pre-established criteria for determining the most representative association in the civil service. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that there have been no changes to section 24(3) of the Civil Service Act to date and that the Chief Personnel Officer is in the process of revising all legislation governing employment in the civil service and has been preparing a package of amendments which, when completed, will be submitted to the social partners for comments. The Committee requests the Government to ensure that its comments will be taken into consideration in this process. It expresses the hope that the legislation will be modified so as to ensure full respect for the principles of the Convention and requests the Government to provide copies of the amended texts as soon as they have been adopted.

2. Promotion of collective bargaining. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the need to amend section 34 of the Industrial Relations Act in order to ensure that, in cases in which no trade union represents the majority of workers, the minority unions can negotiate jointly a collective agreement applicable in the negotiating unit, or at least conclude a collective agreement on behalf of their own members. The Committee notes that the Government has sought the views of the social partners on its observations through a national tripartite committee. It notes that the parties did not agree as to whether this section of the Act should be amended and that the matter is to be referred to the Standing Tripartite Committee on Labour Matters which will be required to examine the request of the Committee to amend the various sections of the Act. However, this Standing Tripartite Committee is to be reconstituted given the expiration of its term in December 2006. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report any measure adopted in this respect and expresses the hope that the legislation will be modified soon in accordance with the principles of the Convention.

Turkey

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes the discussion in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2007.

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments made by: the Confederation of Public Employees Trade Unions (KESK) in communications dated 2 September 2006 and 31 August 2007 (government communications of 16 February and 24 October 2007); the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in communications dated 12 July and 10 August 2006 (government communication of 2 January 2007); the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK) dated 9 and 24 April 2007 (government communication dated 16 October 2007). The Committee finally notes the comments made by the ITUC in a communication dated 28 August 2007 with regard to continuing government interference in trade union affairs. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

Civil liberties. The Committee notes that the Conference Committee deeply regretted that the Government had still not provided any information in reply to the serious allegations made by workers' organizations with regard to police violence and arrests of trade unionists and government interference in trade union activities, including the banning of union-related booklets, posters, etc. The Committee emphasized that respect for basic civil liberties is an essential prerequisite to the exercise of freedom of association and requested the Government to take all necessary measures to ensure a climate free from violence, pressure or threats of any kind so that workers and employers could fully and freely exercise their rights under the Convention.

The Committee recalls that the allegations in question (made by the ICFTU, KESK and the Turkish Confederation of Public Workers Association (Türkiye Kamu-Sen) concerned the following issues: (i) the violent repression by Istanbul police of two peaceful demonstrations on 8 March 2005 to mark International Women's Day; (ii) the violent suppression by the police of a peaceful demonstration organized by Egitim Sen (affiliate of the KESK) on 26 November 2005 to demand a re-evaluation of overtime and better sanitary inspections, leading to the injury of 17 demonstrators and, as indicated in the communication by the KESK dated 31 August 2007, the conviction of 11 of its trade union executive members to prison sentences of 15 months; according to the KESK, its President Ismail Haki Tombul and the former President of YAPI-YOL SEN, Fehmi Kutan, risk imprisonment as they cannot have their sentences suspended because they were previously convicted; the issue depends on the outcome of their appeal, which is currently pending; (iii) violent police dispersion of a demonstration by the KESK on 30 May 2006, in protest of the social security reform under discussion in Parliament; (iv) the ban of union-related posters, advertisements and calendars in some public institutions.

The Committee notes that according to the Government, the holding of demonstrations in conformity with the law does not fall under the mandate of the Ministry of Labour and does not seem to involve trade union rights in the framework of the Constitution, the Trade Union Act No. 2821 and international standards on freedom of association. The prosecution of officials of the KESK and its affiliated trade unions after the demonstration organized by Egitim Sen on 26–27 November 2005, was due to the non-respect of the formalities for the staging of demonstrations, the closing by the demonstrators of central highways to traffic and attacks by the demonstrators on the police with clubs and stones. With regard to the comments by the KESK, the Government refers to Circular No. 2005/14 which provides that there shall not be any disciplinary inquiry into press statements of province and district representatives of unions and confederations as well as officials of union branches, unions and confederations, in the context of their union activities, provided that these statements are not related to their duties (as public employees). Moreover, in the same Circular, it is envisaged that meetings and demonstrations organized by the province and district representatives of the unions and confederations and the officials of union branches, unions and confederations under the provisions of the Act on Meetings and Demonstrations No. 2911 will be facilitated. Finally, the Government also makes reference to various Circulars of the Prime Minister ordering the administration to observe the relevant provisions of the legislation and not to obstruct union activities (circulars dated 6.6.2002, 12.6.2003 and 2.6.2005).

The Committee recalls that police intervention should be limited to cases where there is a genuine threat to public order and should be in due proportion to such threat. Governments should take measures to ensure that the competent authorities receive adequate instructions so as to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report measures taken with a view to giving the police adequate instructions so as to ensure that police intervention is limited to cases where there is a genuine threat to public order and to avoid the danger of excessive violence in trying to control demonstrations.

Legislation adopted. 1. The Committee notes the text of Act No. 5672 of 26 May 2007 communicated by the Government. The Act amended section 14(14) of Act No. 2821 by lifting the requirement of ten years' employment in order to enjoy eligibility for trade union office (restrictions remain with regard to election to the General Council of trade unions). The Committee notes moreover from the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee, that the lawsuit brought in 2001 against the DISK in respect of the election of its representatives was rejected in the final instance on 22 December 2004.

2. The Committee notes the text of Act No. 5620 of 4 April 2007 communicated by the Government. It notes that section 4(2) of this Act amends section 3(a) of Act No. 4688 so that public employees working under fixed-term contracts are now entitled to join public employees' unions.

The Committee notes that in its conclusions, the Conference Committee, while noting the above steps towards the fuller application of the Convention, regretted that these steps were insufficient in light of the numerous occasions on which that Committee and the Committee of Experts had urged the Government to take rapid steps to bring its law and practice into conformity with the Convention.

3. The Committee notes the text of the Associations Act No. 5253 of 4 November 2004. The Committee notes that according to section 35 of the Act, certain specific sections of this Act apply to trade unions, employers' organizations as well as federations and confederations if there are no specific provisions in special laws concerning these organizations. Thus, the Committee observes that section 19 (which is applicable to workers' and employers' organizations), enables the Minister of Internal Affairs or the civil administration authority to examine the books and other documents of an organization, conduct an investigation and demand information at any time, with 24 hours notice. The Committee considers that the supervision of accounts should be limited to the obligation of submitting periodic financial reports or to cases where serious grounds exist for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention), or if there is a need to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of the members of the employers' or workers' organizations; both the substance and the procedure of such verifications should be subject to review by the competent judicial authority affording every guarantee of impartiality and objectivity (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 125). The Committee observes, moreover, that section 26 of the abovementioned Act (which is applicable to workers' and employers' organizations) establishes a requirement of permission by the civil administration authority in order for an organization to open student dormitories and boarding houses linked to education and teaching activities. The Committee recalls that according to Article 3 of the Convention, workers' and employers' organizations have the right to organize their activities, such as, for instance, training, without interference which would restrict this right or impede its lawful exercise. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend sections 19 and 26 of Act No. 5253 of 2004 so that: (i) verification of trade union accounts beyond the submission of periodic financial reports takes place only where there are serious grounds for believing that the actions of an organization are contrary to its rules or the law (which should be in conformity with the Convention) or in order to investigate a complaint by a certain percentage of members; and (ii) activities of workers' and employers' organizations, such as the opening of training centres, is not subject to permission from the authorities.

Draft bills. The Committee has been commenting for a number of years on draft bills to amend Act No. 4688 on public employees' trade unions (as amended by Act No. 5198), Act No. 2821 on trade unions, and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strike and lockout. In its previous observation, the Committee took note of several improvements to the draft bills amending Acts Nos 2821 and 2822: (1) the removal of the condition of nationality for eligibility to election as trade union officer; (2) the abrogation of the provision under which trade union officers' mandates are suspended in case of candidacy in local or general elections and terminated in case of election (Act No. 2821, section 37, paragraph 3); (3) the abrogation of the provision under which the Governor is entitled to appoint an observer at the general congress of a trade union (Act No. 2821, section 14, paragraph 1); (4) the removal from the list of activities where strikes are prohibited of the following activities: the production of lignite coal for thermal plants; public notaries; sea and land transport or railway, and other rail transport (Act No. 2822, section 29); urban public transportation on land, sea or rail; lignite production to feed power plants; exploration, production, refining and distribution of petroleum; petrochemicals the production of which is based on naphtha or natural gas; (5) the removal of the prohibition of unions' television and radio stations which results from Act No. 3984; (6) the exclusion of unions from the scope of section 43 of Associations Act No. 2908, which provides that associations are allowed to invite any foreigner to Turkey or send one of their members abroad, provided due notification is given in advance to the Governor.

While noting the positive steps taken so far, the Committee is bound to observe that the draft bills in question have still not been finalized and passed into law and that the Government gives no specific indication of the timetable for their adoption, so as to translate the provisions of these draft instruments into tangible progress on the ground. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report a specific timetable for the adoption and enactment of the draft bills amending Acts Nos 4688 on public employees' trade unions, Act No. 2821 on trade unions, and Act No. 2822 on collective labour agreements, strike and lockout. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the bills in question will be finalized and passed into law without further delay and that these bills as well as the future legislation will fully take into account all the comments made by the Committee with a view to bringing national law into conformity with the Convention. The Committee enumerates once again these comments below.

Article 2 of the Convention. 1. The exclusion from the right to organize of a number of public employees (sections 3(a) and 15 of Act No. 4688). The Committee notes that, although the abovementioned Act No. 5620 of 4 April 2007 amended section 3(a) of Act No. 4688 so that public employees working under fixed-term contracts are now entitled to join public employees' unions, no change has been introduced with regard to the prohibition of the right to organize of public employees under probation (section 3(a) of Act No. 4688) and with regard to the exclusion from the right to organize of several categories of public employees including prison guards, civilian personnel in military installations, senior public employees, magistrates, etc. amounting, according to the KESK, to 500,000 public employees (section 15 of Act No. 4688). It further notes that, under section 6 of Act No. 4688, a public official must have been in employment for two years to become a founding member of a union.

The Committee underlines that Article 2 of the Convention provides that workers without distinction whatsoever, including prison guards, civilian personnel in military installations, senior public employees and magistrates, should have the right to form and join organizations of their own choosing and that the only admissible exception under the Convention concerns the armed forces and the police. As regards public employees “in positions of trust”, the Committee recalls once again that it is not compatible with the Convention to exclude totally these public officials from the right to organize. On the other hand, to bar such officials from the right to join trade unions representing other workers is not necessarily incompatible with the Convention provided that two conditions are met: first, that the officials concerned have the right to form their own organizations to defend their own interests; and, second, that the category of the employees concerned is not so broadly defined as to weaken the organizations of other public employees by depriving them of a substantial proportion of their actual or potential membership. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated so that, in the framework of the legislative reform under way, all workers, without distinction whatsoever, are guaranteed the right to establish and join organizations of their own choosing.

2. The criteria under which the Ministry of Labour determines the branch of activity covering a worksite (unions must be constituted on a branch activity basis) and the implications of such determination on the workers’ right to form and join organizations of their own choosing (sections 3 and 4 of Act No. 2821). The Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee did not provide any new information in this regard and, in particular, did not specify the criteria on which a particular worksite may be classified in a given branch of activity, as previously requested by the Committee. In previous reports, the Government had indicated that classification of the work under a branch of activity takes into account international standards and the views of workers’ and employers’ confederations and that the relevant decision of the Ministry of Labour may be appealed against at the local labour court and the court of cassation. According to the Government, the draft bill on trade unions would envisage fewer branches of activity in order to make a more rational classification and pave the way for much stronger trade unions.

In this respect, the Committee takes note of the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2537 (347th Report, paragraphs 1–26) which concerned allegations that as a result of the provisions limiting trade union organization by branch of activity, YAPI-YOL SEN automatically lost members who, pursuant to an administrative reorganization, were transferred from the General Directorate of Village Services to local governments (according to the Government, they were taken out of the branch of activity entitled “Public works, construction and village services” and were transferred to the branch relevant to local governments). According to YAPI YOL SEN, regardless of the fact that these workers continued to perform identical tasks under a new administrative authority, they automatically lost their membership in YAPI-YOL SEN; thus, membership fees are no longer deducted and the check-off system is considered invalid, leading the trade union to financial difficulties. The Committee on Freedom of Association observed with regret that this is the second case concerning Turkey where the Ministry of Labour and Social Security modified the branch of activity classification on the basis of questionable criteria – which do not relate to the nature of activity carried out but to the authority under which work is performed – with very serious consequences for the trade unions concerned (loss of membership and representation rights) [see Case No. 2126, 327th Report, paras 805–847]. The Committee notes the further observations made by the Committee on Freedom of Association according to which, the duties of trade union officers are automatically terminated under section 16 of Act No. 4688 where changes occur in branch classifications.

The Committee deeply regrets the recurrent unilateral interference by the Government in trade union membership and activities, in particular through the narrow determination of categories of workers that may come together in a single trade union, which could, as a consequence, lead to excessive fragmentation of trade unions in the public sector. The Committee recalls once again that, while it considers that the setting up of broad bands of classification relating to branches of activity for the purpose of clarifying the nature and scope of industrial level unions is not in itself incompatible with the Convention, this classification and its modification should be determined according to specific objective and pre-established criteria relating in particular to the nature of the functions carried out by the workers at the worksite concerned so as to avoid any arbitrary determination and thus to guarantee fully the right of workers to form and join organizations of their own choosing. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide in its next report information on steps taken or contemplated so as to:

- (i) amend section 5 of Act No. 4688 as well as the Regulation on the Determination of Branch of Activity of Organizations and Agencies, which determine the branches of activity according to which public employees’ trade unions may be established, so as to ensure that these branches are not restricted to any particular ministry, department or service, including local governments;
- (ii) amend the Regulation of 2 August 2005 (which amends the Regulation on the Determination of Branch of Activity of Organizations and Agencies) so as to maintain Yapi-Yol Sen members within the branch of activity

entitled “Public works, construction and village services” in conformity with the nature of their functions and their willingness to remain affiliated to Yapi-Yol Sen; more generally, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures so that members of a union which may be affected by the modification of the list of branches of activity will have the right to be represented by the union of their choice in accordance with Article 2 of the Convention,

- (iii) amend section 16 of Act No. 4688 so as to ensure that trade union office is not terminated by reason of the transfer of a trade union leader to another branch of activity, or his/her dismissal or simply the fact that a trade union leader leaves the work.

Article 3. 1. The detailed provisions of Acts Nos 4688, 2821 and 2822 in respect of the internal functioning of unions and their activities. The Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee reiterates previously provided information according to which the rationale behind the detailed provisions of Acts Nos 4688, 2821 and 2822 is to ensure the democratic functioning of the unions and to protect the rights of their members while draft Bills Nos 2821 and 2822 will make legislation less detailed.

The Committee notes the comments made by the KESK and ITUC with regard to repeated interference by the authorities into the statutes of the KESK and five of its affiliates (Egitim Sen, Kültür-Sanat Sen, ESM, Haber-Sen and SES); the Government interventions aim to make these trade unions amend their aims as stated in their statutes, with regard to terms such as “collective bargaining”, “collective agreement”, “job security”, “collective dispute” which are being considered as contrary to Act No. 4688; in 2006, Egitim Sen had to amend its statutes by eliminating reference to “the right to receive education in one’s mother tongue”, in order to avoid being dissolved. The Government indicates that this is in conformity with section 6 of Act No. 4688, which provides that in case of divergencies between the law and the statutes of trade unions, the relevant governorship should request the union to correct its statutes.

The Committee recalls the conclusions and recommendations reached by the Committee on Freedom of Association in Case No. 2366 (342nd Report, paragraphs 906–917) concerning the statute of Egitim Sen. In particular, while noting that limits may be placed on the right of trade unions to draw up their constitutions and rules in full freedom where the manner in which they are expressed may imminently jeopardize national security or the democratic order, the Committee on Freedom of Association expressed serious concerns that references in a union’s by-laws to the right to education in a mother tongue had given and could give rise to the call for dissolution of a trade union. The Committee emphasizes that trade unions should have the right to include in their statutes the peaceful objectives that they consider necessary for the defence of the rights and interests of their members. It recalls that legislative provisions which go beyond formal requirements may hinder the establishment and development of organizations and constitute interference contrary to Article 3(2) of the Convention (see General Survey of 1994, op. cit., paragraphs 110 and 111). The legislation may oblige unions to adopt provisions on various issues but should not dictate the contents of these provisions. Details could always be provided in guidelines attached to the Acts that the unions would nonetheless remain free to follow. The Committee requests the Government to cease its interference in the statutes of the KESK and its affiliates and to indicate in its next report the outcome of the court proceedings pending on this issue. It also once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated with a view to amending the detailed provisions of Acts Nos 4688, 2821 and 2822 so as to avoid interference with the internal functioning of unions and their activities.

2. The removal of union executive bodies in case of non-respect of requirements set out in the law which should be left to the free determination of the organizations (section 10 of Act No. 4688). The Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee did not provide any new information in this respect. It once again emphasizes that workers’ organizations may organize their administration and activities without any interference by public authorities on grounds which are incompatible with Article 3. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken or contemplated to amend section 10 of Act No. 4688 to enable workers’ organizations to determine freely whether union officials may remain in their post during their candidacy or election in local or general elections.

3. The right to strike in the public service (section 35 of Act No. 4688). The Committee recalls that section 35 of Act No. 4688 makes no mention of the circumstances in which strike action may be exercised in the public service and that, according to the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee, a constitutional amendment is required for the review of restrictions on the right to strike of public servants; however, the Government is planning to launch a personnel reform in the public sector whereby “public servants” in the narrow sense of the term, i.e. those exercising authority in the name of the State, would be defined first and then carefully distinguished from other public employees; work on this reform programme was continuing as a priority. The Committee underlines that restrictions on the right to strike in the public service should be limited to public servants who are exercising authority in the name of the State and those working in essential services in the strict sense of the term (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraphs 158 and 159). Where the right to strike is prohibited or limited in a manner compatible with the Convention, compensatory guarantees should be afforded to public servants, such as mediation and conciliation procedures or, in the event of deadlock, arbitration with sufficient guarantees of impartiality and rapidity (see General Survey, op. cit., paragraph 164). The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the measures taken, including the possible personnel reform in the public sector, so as to bring section 35 of Act No. 4688 into conformity with the above. Furthermore, the Committee requests once again the Government to transmit a copy of the new draft modifying Act No. 4688.

4. The right to strike under Act No. 2822. The Committee recalls that it has commented on several occasions on certain provisions of Act No. 2822 concerning the right to strike and which are incompatible with the Convention: section 25 prohibiting strikes for political purposes, general strikes and sympathy strikes (furthermore, article 54 of the Constitution, which contains similar prohibitions further prohibits occupation of work premises, go-slow strikes and other forms of obstruction); section 48 placing severe limitations on picketing; sections 29 and 30 prohibiting strikes in many services which cannot be considered to be essential in the strict sense of the term and section 32 under which compulsory arbitration at the request of any party may be imposed in the services where strikes are prohibited; sections 27 (referring to section 23) and 35 providing for an excessively long waiting period before a strike can be called; sections 70–73, 77 and 79 providing for heavy sanctions, including imprisonment, for participating in “unlawful strikes” the prohibition of which, however, is contrary to the principles of freedom of association. In this respect, the Committee notes that the statement of the Government representative to the Conference Committee reiterates previously provided information according to which some of the restrictions on the right to strike, such as those mentioned in section 25, require a constitutional amendment; however, several restrictions will be lifted with the amendment of Act No. 2822; for instance, in addition to the revision of the list of activities where strikes may be prohibited (noted above), the waiting period for the staging of a strike has been shortened in the draft bill amending Act No. 2822, to a maximum of 30 days or 45 days if the parties have recourse to mediation. The Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report the tangible progress made in amending the above provisions so as to bring them in line with the Convention.

Noting that the Conference Committee requested the Government to accept a high-level ILO mission with a view to assisting it in rapidly taking the necessary measures to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, the Committee trusts that this mission would take place in the near future and that it will be able to assist the Government in bringing its law and practice into full conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is raising a number of other points in a direct request addressed directly to the Government.

Uganda

Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention, 1949 (No. 98) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes that the Government’s report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 4 of the Convention. Promotion of collective bargaining. The Committee notes that section 7 of Labour Unions Act No. 7 of 2006 (LUA) sets forth the lawful purposes for which trade union federations may be established. The said purposes include, inter alia: the formulation of policy relating to the proper management of labour unions and the general welfare of employees; the planning and administration of workers’ education programmes; and consulting on all matters relating to labour union affairs. Noting that the lawful purposes delineated under section 7 of the LUA does not include collective bargaining, the Committee recalls that the right to collective bargaining should also be granted to federations and confederations of trade unions (see General Survey of 1994 on freedom of association and collective bargaining, paragraph 249). In this connection, the Committee requests the Government to confirm whether the right of trade union federations to engage in collective bargaining is assured in the LUA or in other legislation.

Compulsory arbitration. The Committee notes that, under section 5(3) of the Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act of 2006, in cases where a labour dispute reported to a labour officer is not referred to the Industrial Court within eight weeks from the time the report is made, any of the parties or both the parties to the dispute may refer the dispute to the Industrial Court. Section 27 of the Act, the Committee further notes, empowers the Minister to refer disputes to the Industrial Court where one or both parties to a dispute refuse to comply with the recommendations of the report issued by a board of inquiry. In this connection, the Committee recalls that recourse to compulsory arbitration is acceptable only for: (1) workers in essential services, in the strict sense of the term; and (2) public employees engaged in the administration of the State. Otherwise, provisions that permit the authorities to impose compulsory arbitration, or allow one party unilaterally to submit a dispute to the authorities for arbitration, run counter to the principle of the voluntary negotiation of collective agreements enshrined in Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to amend the above legislation so as to bring it into conformity with the Convention.

Comments of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation). The Committee notes the comments of the ICFTU dated 10 August 2006. The ICFTU’s comments concern legislative issues previously raised by the Committee and problems regarding the application of the Convention in practice, including the refusal to recognize and negotiate with trade unions in the hotel, textile, construction and transport sectors. In this regard, the Committee takes note of the Government’s indication that there have been positive developments concerning the attitude of employers towards union recognition and negotiations with unions following the adoption of the Labour Unions Act and other new legislation, including Employment Act No. 6 and Labour Disputes (Arbitration and Settlement) Act No. 8. A number of employers, including employers in the textile and hotel industries, are negotiating recognition agreements with unions, and of these employers several are in the final stages of concluding collective bargaining agreements. The Government adds that a number of sensitization workshops have been led by workers’ and employers’ organizations and the Minister of State for Labour, Employment and Industrial Relations is undertaking a tour of some industries, in which about 20 hotels will be visited with a view to, inter alia, create awareness on the labour laws and encourage employers to recognize unions. The Committee appreciates this information. It requests the Government to continue to pursue its endeavours to promote collective bargaining in the abovementioned industries and to keep it informed of the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Bolivarian Republic of Venezuela

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 1982)

The Committee notes the report and the discussion on the application of the Convention held in the Conference Committee in 2007. It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), dated 28 August 2007, and of the International Organisation of Employers (IOE), dated 25 September 2007. Finally, the Committee notes the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association relating to the cases presented by national and international organizations of workers (Case No. 2422) and of employers (Case No. 2254). In its previous observation, the Committee noted the conclusions of the high-level mission which visited the country in January 2006.

Legislative issues

The Committee recalls that it previously raised the following issues:

- the need to adopt the Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act so as to eliminate the restrictions placed on the exercise of the rights granted by the Convention to workers' and employers' organizations. On this issue, the Committee made the following comments:

The Committee previously noted that a Bill to amend the Basic Labour Act took account of requests for amendment that it had made on the following points: (1) it deletes sections 408 and 409 (over-detailed enumeration of the mandatory functions and purposes of workers' and employers' organizations); (2) it reduces from ten to five years the required period of residence before a foreign worker may hold office in an executive body of a trade union organization (it should be noted that the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act establish that trade union statutes may provide for the election of foreign nationals as trade union leaders); (3) it reduces from 100 to 40 the number of workers required to establish a trade union of independent workers; (4) it reduces from ten to four the number of employers required to establish an employers' organization; (5) it provides that the technical cooperation and logistical support of the electoral authority (National Electoral Council) for the organization of elections to executive bodies of trade unions shall be provided only where so requested by the trade union organizations in accordance with the provisions of their statutes, and that elections held without the participation of the National Electoral Council and which comply with the statutes of the trade unions concerned shall have full legal effect once the corresponding reports are submitted to the appropriate labour inspectorate. The Committee noted that the authorities of the Ministry and of the legislative authority support the position set out in this provision of the Bill and that, in practice, trade unions have now held elections without the participation of the National Electoral Council. The Committee also noted in its previous comments that the Bill provided that "in accordance with the constitutional principle of democratic changeover, the executive board of a trade union organization shall discharge its functions during the period established by the statutes of the organization, but in no case may a period in excess of three years be established". The Committee hoped that the Parliament would include in the Bill a provision explicitly allowing the re-election of trade union leaders.

- the need for the National Electoral Council (CNE), which is not a judicial body, to cease interfering in trade union elections and to no longer be empowered to annul them, and the need for the statute for the election of executive bodies of trade union organizations, which accords a preponderant role to the CNE in the various stages of such elections, to be amended or repealed;
- certain provisions of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act, dated 25 April 2006, might restrict the rights of trade union organizations and employers' organizations: (1) the necessity for the trade union organization(s) to represent the majority of the workers to be able to engage in collective bargaining (section 115, sole paragraph, of the Regulations); and (2) the possibility of compulsory arbitration in essential public services (section 152 of the Regulations). The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that where there is no majority trade union, the minority unions can negotiate jointly;
- the Committee also noted the criticisms made by the ICFTU concerning resolution No. 3538 of February 2005 and observes that this issue was examined in March 2006 in Case No. 2411 by the Committee on Freedom of Association, which made the following recommendation (see 340th Report, paragraph 1400): "(b) Regarding the allegations relating to the Ministry of Labour, resolution of 3 February 2005, giving trade union organizations 30 days to provide information on their administration and register of members in a form that includes each worker's full identity, place of residence and signature, the Committee considers that the confidentiality of trade union membership should be ensured and recalls that it would be advisable to establish, between trade unions, a code of conduct governing the conditions in which membership data is to be supplied, with the use of appropriate means of personal data processing, with guarantees of absolute confidentiality." The Committee requests the Government to adopt measures in this respect.
- a draft reform of the Penal Code which establishes sentences of imprisonment of up to 18 years for the interruption of operations in basic or strategic state enterprises (the Government indicates in its report that no reform of the Penal Code is envisaged).

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that: (1) insinuations of violations of Convention No. 87 are undermined by the number of trade union organizations that are established (300 over the past six months) and the number of collective agreements approved (311 over the past six months); (2) the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act continues to be on the legislative agenda, has the consensus support of the social partners and gives effect to the comments of the Committee of Experts, but a constitutional reform is currently being carried out in the country (in which the observations of the national and international trade union movement can be taken into account) which may resolve certain issues raised by the Committee (for example, those relating to the CNE); the inclusion in the above Bill will be considered of the possibility of re-electing the executive boards of trade union organizations, by determining the interpretation of the "changeover" referred to in article 21 of the Constitution; non-intervention in trade union elections is applied in practice and resolution 13 of the Ministry reaffirms the optional nature of the intervention of the CNE; (3) the Government hopes that the CNE will organize and coordinate action to simplify its rules, thereby preventing possible misunderstandings between the social partners; (4) the new Regulations of the Basic Labour Act include improvements in relation to trade union elections intended to prevent delays in elections; isolated cases of alleged violations have been presented as the general pattern and the Government has provided its observations in this respect to the Committee on Freedom of Association (Case No. 2422); and (5) it hopes to continue receiving the technical assistance of the ILO on issues of interest that so require and wishes to undertake a precise analysis of the recommendations of the high-level mission with a view to achieving continuing improvements in the application of Convention No. 87.

Taking into account the gravity of the restrictions which persist in the legislation with regard to freedom of association and the freedom to organize, the Committee once again requests the Government to take measures to accelerate the examination by the Legislative Assembly of the Bill to reform the Basic Labour Act and hopes that the reform of the Constitution will provide an occasion for the CNE to cease interfering in trade union elections (Case No. 2422 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association is a clear example of interference) and that the statute for the election of (trade union) and national executive bodies will be repealed. The Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the scope of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act in relation to compulsory arbitration in basic or strategic services and to amend the resolution of the Ministry of Labour, dated 3 February 2005, as indicated above.

Shortcomings in social dialogue

In successive observations in recent years the Committee has identified important deficiencies in social dialogue. The CSI, the Venezuelan Workers Confederation (CTV), CGT and the Venezuelan Federation of Chambers of Commerce and Manufacturers Associations (FEDECAMARAS) have indicated that the authorities only hold formal consultations without the intention of taking into account the views of the parties consulted and that there is no authentic dialogue. Moreover, there are no structures for such dialogue and the Government does not convene the tripartite commission envisaged in the Basic Labour Act.

The Committee notes the Government's statements that: (1) participation and social dialogue have been broadened, with the base being extended and all actors included (without excluding FEDECAMARAS and the CTV); meetings, consultations and round tables have been organized; the Government refers, for example, to the labour standards meeting for the construction industry, the draft collective agreement in the oil sector, the Framework Agreement on Co-responsibility for Industrial Transformation, the meetings with the authorities of the currency administration system, the rounds of negotiations to manage state procurement, the modalities of dialogue established by the Basic Act on prevention, working conditions and environment (consultation with the most representative organizations and inclusion in the executive board of the National Institute for Prevention and Occupational Health and Safety of the spokespersons of employers' and workers' organizations and cooperatives) and the (bipartite) occupational safety and health committee; (2) the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act provide for the establishment of a National Social Dialogue Table, which opens the possibility for the discussion of issues of great significance, such as the minimum wage; (3) the Government values the contribution of the CTV and certain spokespersons of the CGT in terms of social dialogue; and (4) certain organizations which in the past enjoyed long-standing privileges are now alleging favouritism when they see any type of favouritism or exclusion abolished in a context of respect for political, ideological or religious freedom.

The Committee notes that, at its session in November 2007, when examining Case No. 2554, the Committee on Freedom of Association referred to the need to hold true consultations and emphasized the importance that should be attached to full and frank consultation taking place on any questions or proposed legislation affecting trade union rights, and that it is essential that the introduction of draft legislation affecting collective bargaining or conditions of employment should be preceded by full and detailed consultations with the appropriate independent and most representative organizations of workers and employers. The Committee on Freedom of Association also requested the Government to ensure that any legislation adopted concerning labour, social and economic issues within the framework of the enabling Act be subject to real, in-depth consultations with the independent and most representative employers' and workers' organizations, while attempting as far as possible to find shared solutions [see 348th Report, para. 1325].

The Committee of Experts shares these conclusions and draws the Government's attention to the importance that the National Social Dialogue Table envisaged in the new reform of the Regulations of the Basic Labour Act is based on objective and pre-established criteria of representativeness. The Committee invites the Government to request the technical assistance of the ILO for the establishment of this body and to ensure that the views of the most representative organizations are duly taken into account in the attempt as far as possible to reach mutually acceptable solutions. In this context, it is important, taking into account the allegations of discrimination against FEDECAMARAS, the CTV and their member organizations, including the establishment or promotion of organizations or enterprises close to the regime, that the Government is guided exclusively by criteria of representativeness in its dialogue and relations with workers' and employers' organizations and that it refrains, as indicated by the Conference Committee in 2007, from any form of interference and complies with Article 3 of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to keep it informed of developments in social dialogue, its outcome and the establishment of the Dialogue Table which, it strongly hopes, will be established in the very near future.

Other matters

With regard to the restrictions on the freedom of movement of certain trade union and employers' leaders, the Committee notes that the Government's statements reiterate the information provided previously and that the employers' leader Albis Muñoz (under trial) did not request authorization from the judiciary sufficiently in advance to be able to attend the ILO Conference in 2007. The Committee refers to the conclusions of the Conference Committee and regrets this absence of authorization.

The Committee notes that a number of trade union organizations, including certain federations, have not held their trade union elections despite the expiry of the period for which they had elected their executive bodies. The high-level mission referred to a profound and manifest misunderstanding among the social partners concerning the functions of the CNE. The Committee reiterates the offer of technical assistance made by the high-level mission to trade union federations. The Committee emphasizes the importance of holding such elections since, as indicated in the report of the high-level mission, any delay in the procedures is accompanied by the non-recognition of trade unions for the purposes of collective bargaining.

Moreover, the Committee reiterates that, as proposed by the high-level mission, the Government should conduct investigations into the alleged actions of certain middle-ranking officials in relation to the allegations of favouritism and partiality with regard to certain employers' and workers' organizations.

The Committee hopes that the Government will take measures to ensure full compliance with the Convention in relation to the various matters raised in this observation and it requests the Government to provide information in this regard.

Finally, the Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on the observations made by the IOE and the ITUC on the application of the Convention. Nevertheless, it wishes to recall that one of the issues referred to by the IOE was addressed by the Committee on Freedom of Association at its session in November 2007 and relates to the allegations that a governmental mob forced its way into the head office of FEDECAMARAS, daubing graffiti, damaging property and making threats.

The Committee expresses deep concern, recalls the gravity of the allegations and emphasizes that a movement of trade unions or employers can only develop where fundamental human rights are respected and in a climate free of violence of any kind. The Committee recalls that the Conference Committee requested the Government to take measures to investigate this occurrence so that those responsible could be punished and similar events did not occur in future and it requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee notes the CTV's comments concerning the draft constitutional reform and requests the Government to inform it of its impact on the application of Conventions Nos 87 and 98.

Zimbabwe

Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes the discussion held on the application of the Convention in the Conference Committee in June 2007 and, in particular, that it had decided to mention the case of Zimbabwe in a special paragraph of its report. The Committee further notes the Government's indication that the Government of Zimbabwe is prepared to host the Office with a view to receiving technical assistance to deal with the issues raised by the Committee. The Committee regrets that the Government refuses to accept the high-level technical assistance mission in the terms requested by the Conference Committee in June 2006. The Committee expresses the hope that the high-level technical assistance mission will be undertaken in the very near future.

The Committee also notes Cases Nos 1937, 2027 and 2365 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association concerning serious allegations of violation of trade union rights, including allegations of arrest, detention and assaults of trade union leaders and members, attacks on trade union premises, deportation of and refusal of entry to foreign trade unionists, etc. (see 344th Report).

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) dated 1 September 2006. The Committee notes that the Government disagrees with the ZCTU's allegation that it continued to enact legislation meant to paralyse the right to freedom of association and states that all laws in Zimbabwe are subject to a transparent and democratic law-making process.

As regards the matters raised concerning the Public Order and Security Act (POSA), in the Government's opinion, it serves no purpose to continue debating this issue as it was exhaustively dealt with in the Government's various communications to the ILO. Referring to its previous request to take the necessary measures to ensure that the POSA is not used to infringe upon the right of workers' organizations to express their views on the Government's economic and social policy, the Committee urges the Government to ensure that no other charges are pending against trade unionists under the POSA for the exercise of legitimate trade union activity.

The Government further states that the ZCTU's allegation that the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act of 2006 criminalizing public meetings and gatherings is misleading. According to the Government, the penal sanctions provided for by this Act relate to illegal gatherings and public meetings; the citizens of Zimbabwe are free to exercise their constitutional rights. The Committee notes from Case No. 2365 examined by the Committee on Freedom of Association that a number of trade union leaders and members have been charged under the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act in connection with their participation in the demonstration in September 2006. The Committee agrees with the findings and recommendations of the Committee on Freedom of Association and urges the Government to drop the charges brought for reasons connected to their trade union activities against trade unionists and to abstain from resorting to measures of arrest and detention of trade union leaders or members for reasons connected to their trade union activities.

With regard to the arrest of Mr W. Chibebe in August 2006, the Government indicates that Mr Chibebe has a pending court case on allegations of assaulting a fellow worker (police officer) on duty during the currency reform exercise. The Committee notes from the examination of Case No. 2365 that the Committee on Freedom of Association concluded that a number of procedural irregularities respecting the case against Mr Chibebe took place. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide full and detailed information respecting the arrest of Mr Chibebe and to transmit the text of any court judgment rendered in this regard.

The Committee notes that by its communication dated 28 August 2007, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitted further comments concerning the application of the Convention in law and in practice. The Committee notes that the ITUC comments refer to the legislative issues already raised by the Committee and to serious allegations concerning arrests, assaults and police violence against trade union leaders and members. In this respect, the Committee has, on numerous occasions, stressed the interdependence between civil liberties and trade union rights emphasizing that a truly free and independent trade union movement can only develop in a climate of respect for fundamental human rights. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee requests the Government, in the context of the regular reporting cycle, to send for examination at the Committee's next session, to be held in November–December 2008, its comments on all the issues relating to the legislation and the application of the Convention in practice raised in its previous observation and direct request (see 2006 direct request, 77th Session).

The Committee notes the Government's reply to the comments of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) dated 1 September 2006. With regard to the ZCTU comment that collective agreements are subject to governmental approval and need to be published as a prerequisite for enforcement, the Government refers to its previous report in which it had indicated that it would initiate consideration of the Committee's comments in respect of the relevant sections of the Labour Act in the context of the ongoing labour law reform. The Government further indicates that collective agreements are published to ensure that they become legally enforceable as statutory instruments so as to protect the interests of the parties to the collective agreement.

With regard to the ZCTU allegation that civil servants continue to be denied the right to bargain collectively, the Government reaffirms its previous position that the Public Service Act is being amended to ensure that it complies with the international labour standards and provisions of the Labour Act. However, civil servants are currently enjoying collective bargaining within the auspices of the civil service Joint Negotiating Council. It was through the deliberations of this council that civil servants were recently awarded an increase in transport and housing allowances.

With regard to the alleged interference by the Minister in the collective bargaining process by refusing to approve collective agreements, particularly in the agricultural sector where, the Minister, who is a new farmer and an interested party, considered that the agreed salaries were beyond the reach of the new farmers, the Government indicates that the real reason for refusing to register the collective agreement in question is its flaws both in content and process. The Government explains that the agreement was negotiated for certain categories of workers in the sector, leaving out other workers covered by the National Employment Council. Furthermore, the negotiating process has excluded a significant percentage of the employers in the sector, i.e. black indigenous farmers who now constitute the majority. Accordingly, the Minister referred the agreement to the parties for renegotiation with a view to ensuring total coverage of all workers in the sector and ensuring inclusion of the majority of the employers in the sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide detailed information in this respect in its next report, as well as a copy of the collective agreements in question.

The Committee notes that by its communication dated 28 August 2007, the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) submitted further comments, which refer to the issues of law and practice pertaining to the Convention which the Committee is already examining. The Committee requests the Government to provide its observations thereon.

The Committee requests the Government to provide its comments on all issues relating to the legislation and application of the Convention in practice raised in its previous observation (see 2006 observation, 77th Session), which it will examine in 2008, in the context of the regular reporting cycle.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 11 (Tajikistan, Uganda, Zambia); Convention No. 87 (Angola, Australia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Burkina Faso, Burundi, Cambodia, Cape Verde, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Croatia, Czech Republic, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Djibouti, Egypt, Eritrea, Fiji, France, France: French Southern and Antarctic Territories, Gabon, Gambia, Georgia, Ghana, Grenada, Israel, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Malawi, Mauritius, Papua New Guinea, Philippines, Russian Federation, Saint Lucia, Sierra Leone, Swaziland, The former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Turkey, Uganda); Convention No. 98 (Angola, Armenia, Australia, Belize, Benin, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Chad, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Congo, Cyprus, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Fiji, France, France: French Southern and Antarctic Territories, New Caledonia, Gabon, Hungary, Indonesia, Ireland, Kiribati, Kyrgyzstan, Mongolia, Poland, Rwanda, Saint Lucia, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, Uzbekistan); Convention No. 135 (Armenia, Bosnia and Herzegovina); Convention No. 141 (Albania, Belize, Burkina Faso); Convention No. 151 (Armenia, Belize); Convention No. 154 (Armenia, Belize, Kyrgyzstan, Saint Lucia).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 11 (Estonia, Swaziland); Convention No. 87 (Malta); Convention No. 98 (Algeria, Argentina, Belgium, Israel, Malawi, Malta, United Kingdom: Montserrat); Convention No. 135 (Azerbaijan).

Forced Labour

Algeria

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

Article 2(1) of the Convention. Civic service. Since 1986, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the incompatibility with the Convention of sections 32, 33, 34 and 38 of Act No. 84-10 of 11 February 1984 on civic service, as amended and supplemented by Act No. 86-11 of 19 August 1986, under which it was possible to require persons who had completed a course of higher education or training to perform a period of civic service of from two to four years in order to obtain employment or exercise an occupation. The Committee notes that Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, approved by Act No. 06-15 of 14 November 2006, has lowered the minimum length of civic service from two years to one year. Consequently, the length of civic service may now vary, depending on the training and the geographical area, from one to four years instead of the former two to four years. The Committee points out that this reduction in length of the minimum civic service in no way changes the fact that the service is exacted under the menace of a penalty within the meaning of Article 2(1) of the Convention, and therefore amounts to forced labour under the terms of the Convention.

The Government indicated in a previous report that civic service is a statutory period of work performed for a public administration, body or enterprise in local communities by persons submitted to the civic service. It represents the contribution of these persons to the economic, social and cultural development of the country. According to the Government, persons covered by civic service have the same rights and obligations as the workers governed by the legislation respecting the general conditions of service of workers, including the right to receive remuneration from the employing entity in accordance with the law. Furthermore, the years of civic service performed are taken into account for purposes of seniority, promotion and retirement, as well as in the contract period during which the person concerned is bound to a public body by a training contract. The Government further indicated that persons covered by civic service are assigned exclusively to the specialized branch or discipline in which they were trained.

The Committee took due note of these explanations. However, it also pointed out that under sections 32 and 38 of the Act, refusal to perform civic service and the resignation of the person concerned without acceptable grounds result in their prohibition from exercising an activity on their own account, and that any violation is punishable under section 243 of the Penal Code. Similarly, under sections 33 and 34 of the Act, before they engage workers, all private employers are required to satisfy themselves that applicants are not covered by civic service or can produce documentation proving that they have discharged it, and that any private employer knowingly employing a citizen who has evaded civic service is liable to imprisonment and a fine. Therefore, although the persons liable to civic service benefit from working conditions (remuneration, seniority, promotion, retirement, etc.) similar to those of regular public sector workers, they discharge this service under a menace because, in the event of refusal, they are denied access to any professional self-employed activity or to any employment in the private sector, as a result of which civic service falls within the concept of compulsory labour within the meaning of Article 2(1) of the Convention. Furthermore, since it consists of a contribution by the persons concerned to the economic development of the country, this compulsory service violates Article 1(b) of Convention No. 105, which has also been ratified by Algeria.

The Committee again reiterates that forced labour means any work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily. Referring once again to the explanations provided in paragraphs 55 to 62 of its 1979 General Survey on the abolition of forced labour, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken to repeal or amend the provisions in question in the light of Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will soon be able to report on the measures adopted in this respect.

The Committee further notes that under section 2 of Ordinance No. 06-06 of 15 July 2006, civic service may be performed in private sector health establishments in accordance with arrangements set forth in regulations. The Committee refers the Government to paragraph 56 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour in which it pointed out that according to Paragraph 3(3) of the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), the services of participants should not be used for the advantage of private persons or undertakings. The Committee expresses the hope that the Government will take this into account, and requests it to indicate whether regulations have been adopted to specify arrangements under which civic service may be performed in private sector health establishments and, if so, to provide a copy. Please also indicate whether, in practice, persons subject to the civic service requirement perform such service in private sector health establishments, and provide any other information allowing the extent of this practice to be assessed (number of persons and establishments concerned, length of service, etc.) together with information on the working conditions of the persons concerned.

Article 2(2)(a). National service. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Ordinance No. 74-103 of 15 November 1974 issuing the National Service Code, under which conscripts are required to take part in the running of various sectors of the economy and the administration. It has also referred to the Order of 1 July 1987, under which conscripts, after three months of military training, must serve in priority sectors of national activity, and particularly as teachers. The Committee noted that they are further required to perform civic service for a period of between one and four years, as explained above. The Committee recalled that, under the terms of Article 2(2)(a) of the Convention, compulsory military service is excluded from the scope of the Convention only where conscripts are assigned to work of a purely military character.

The Committee notes the information on this matter sent by the Government in its last report to the effect that the civic form of national service has not been used since 2001. It notes the Government's statement that this de facto suspension will be reflected in law as soon as the reform of the National Service Code is placed on the agenda. The Committee requests the Government to send information on any developments in this matter showing that the national legislation has been aligned with practice and hence with the provisions of the Convention, and to provide copies of the relevant texts.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1969)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Punishment for expressing political views. 1. For a number of years the Committee has referred to two provisions of the Associations Act, No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990, that allow the imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving the obligation to work in circumstances which are covered by the Convention.

- Under section 5 of the Act, an association's legal status is automatically invalidated if its objectives are contrary to the established institutional system, public order or offend against morals or the laws and regulations in force.
- Section 45 provides that anyone who manages, administers or actively participates in an association that has not been approved or which has been suspended or dissolved, or facilitates meetings of the members of such an association, shall be liable to a prison term ranging from three months to two years involving the obligation to work pursuant to sections 2 and 3 of the Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983 issuing arrangements for the use of prison labour by the National Office for Educational Work.

The Committee notes that, pursuant to section 173 of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005 issuing the Code on the prison system and the social integration of prisoners, the provisions implementing Ordinance No. 72-02 of 10 February 1972 remain in force on a transitional basis until the promulgation of the texts implementing Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005. The Committee therefore asks the Government to indicate whether texts have been adopted under the said Act and whether the Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983 has been repealed. It asks the Government to send copies of the abovementioned implementing provisions.

The Committee also notes that some provisions of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005 are likely to have consequences with regard to the application of the present Convention. Indeed, under the terms of section 96 of the Act, in the context of training and also rehabilitation and social integration, the prisoner may be required, by the director of the prison and further to an opinion from the Committee for the Enforcement of Sentences, to perform useful work compatible with his state of health and his physical and mental capacity. Under section 100 of the Act, persons whose convictions are definitive may be employed as part of a team on external worksites to do work for public institutions or establishments. This section also allows prison labour to be hired to private companies which take part in the execution of public interest works. Sections 109 to 111 state that prisoners may be placed in low security penal institutions which take the form of agricultural, industrial or handicraft establishments, centres providing services or performing work in the public interest, which entail convicts working and being lodged on site. Hence, pursuant to these provisions and the abovementioned provisions of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990, compulsory labour may be imposed on persons convicted for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system, which is contrary to the provisions of the Convention.

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its latest report to the effect that the penalty laid down by section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 concerns persons who contravene the legal provisions concerning the formation of associations, and not those who express political views, which may be expressed freely provided they comply with the legislation in force. It also notes the Government's statement that there is no provision in Algerian law which obliges prisoners to work. The Committee notes, however, that section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 states that anyone who manages, administers or actively participates in an association which has not been approved or which has been suspended or dissolved, or facilitates meetings of the members of such an association, shall be liable to a prison term ranging from three months to two years. The Committee notes that section 2 of the Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983 provides that prisoners, in the context of their rehabilitation, training and social promotion, are required to perform useful work compatible with their health and with order, discipline and security. Moreover, prisoners may be required to work pursuant to the abovementioned provisions of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005. The Committee therefore expresses the hope once again that the Government will take the necessary steps in the near future to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention, either by amending section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990 or by explicitly exempting persons convicted under this section from compulsory labour. The Committee also asks the Government to indicate whether any persons have been sentenced to imprisonment under section 45 of Act No. 90-31 of 4 December 1990, including the obligation to work pursuant to the abovementioned provisions of Act No. 05-04 of 6 February 2005 and the Inter-Ministerial Order of 26 June 1983. It asks the Government to send copies of any relevant judicial decisions.

2. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the application in practice to section 87bis of the Penal Code (Ordinance No. 95-11 of 25 February 1995) on “terrorist or subversive acts”, which provides for the imposition of sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory prison labour. It noted the information supplied by the Government that section 87bis of the Penal Code deals with acts which, through the use of violence, target the security of the State, territorial integrity, national unity, stability and the normal working of institutions. The Committee notes that the Government indicates in its latest report that acts having a peaceful objective do not come within the scope of section 87bis.

The Committee observes, however, that the very general terms of section 87bis of the Penal Code – hindering traffic or freedom of movement on thoroughfares and occupying public places with gatherings, damaging means of communication and transport, public and private property, taking possession thereof or unduly occupying it, obstructing the actions of the public authorities or the free exercise of worship or public freedoms and also the functioning of public service establishments, hindering the operation of public institutions – may enable peaceful acts to be punished. The Committee already observed in its previous comments that actions which are non-violent but express opposition to the established political system may therefore come under the scope of section 87bis, and the imposition of prison labour on persons convicted under such provisions is contrary to Article 1(a) of the Convention.

The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to limit the scope of section 87bis of the Penal Code so that persons who peacefully express ideological opposition to the established political, social or economic system cannot be sentenced to a term of imprisonment which includes the obligation to work.

Article 1(d). Punishment for participating in strikes. For a number of years the Committee has referred to section 41 of Act No. 90-02 of 6 February 1990 on the prevention and settlement of collective labour disputes and the exercise of the right to strike, which states that requisition orders may be issued pursuant to the legislation in force for workers on strike who hold posts in public institutions or administrations, or in enterprises, that are essential for the safety of persons, plant and property and for the continuity of public services which are essential to the vital needs of the country, or who carry on activities essential to supplying the public. Section 42 states that, without prejudice to the penalties laid down in the Penal Code, refusal to execute a requisition order constitutes serious professional misconduct.

The Committee noted that sections 37 and 38 of Act No. 90-02 establish a list of essential services in which the right to strike is limited and for which a compulsory minimum service is to be organized. It observed that the list is very broad and includes services such as banking and radiocommunications/broadcasting, which, according to the Committee on Freedom of Association, do not constitute essential services in the strict sense of the term (see paragraph 587 of the 2006 Digest of decisions and principles of the Freedom of Association Committee. See also the Committee of Experts’ General Survey on freedom of association and collective bargaining, 1994, paragraphs 159–160). The list in sections 37 and 38 of the Act also includes court registry services.

The Committee furthermore referred to section 43 of Act No. 90-02 prohibiting strikes in certain sectors of public institutions and administrations, such as the judiciary and customs.

It notes that section 55(1) of Act No. 90-02 provides that anyone who causes or seeks to cause, or maintains or seeks to maintain, a concerted collective stoppage of work in conflict with the provisions of this Act, but without violence or assault against persons or property, shall be liable to a term of imprisonment ranging from eight days to two months and/or a fine of 500 to 2,000 dinars.

The Committee notes the Government’s information in its report that the imposition of any penalty on workers taking part in a strike is prohibited. It also notes the Government’s statement that the organisation of a minimum service provided for by Act No. 90-02 does not constitute forced labour, the objective being to ensure the functioning of public institutions. While noting these indications, the Committee recalls that penalizing participation in strikes through imprisonment including the obligation to work is contrary to the present provisions of the Convention. It therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that no worker can be sentenced to a term of imprisonment including the obligation to work and to continue to provide information on the application in practice of sections 41, 43 and 51(1) of Act No. 90-02, specifying in particular the number of persons convicted and supplying copies of the relevant court decisions.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Argentina

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention

The Committee notes the comments on the application of the Convention made in 2006 by the General Confederation of Labour of the Republic of Argentina (CGT) and the International Trade Union Confederation – ITUC (formerly the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions – ICFTU). The allegations relate to the trafficking of persons for labour and sexual exploitation, the direct participation of public officials in trafficking, the slowness and ineffectiveness of the judicial system and the absence of specific legislation on trafficking which makes it impossible to combat this practice effectively.

The Committee notes the Government's detailed reply to the comments made by the CGT and the ITUC. The Government indicates that it is deeply concerned by the problem raised by the two trade union organizations and has provided information on the policies that it is implementing to address the problem.

Trafficking in persons for labour exploitation

The National Apparel and Allied Workers' Federation (FONIVA) and the Apparel and Allied Workers' Union (SOIVA), as member organizations of the CGT, informed the latter of the existence of forced labour practices in the textile sector. According to these organizations, "as a result of the death of four children and two workers from Bolivia in a clandestine workplace, a great number of textile workshops were discovered in the city of Buenos Aires in which illegal workers were engaged, mostly of Bolivian nationality. It was found that they had been recruited in Bolivia, principally in the cities of La Paz and Potosí. Based on the promise of a work contract, the workers are advanced money for their journey and once in Argentina are installed in precarious accommodation, which may be located at the workplace, and they work to pay off their debt for the journey. The conditions of their work and recruitment could be classified as new forms of violations of the fundamental Conventions on forced labour and be related to the phenomenon of the trafficking of persons in view of the manner of their recruit."

According to the comments provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), Bolivian men, along with their families, have also been trafficked for labour exploitation in garment factories in Argentina. Trafficked people have been identified in many provinces of Argentina including, Buenos Aires, Neuquén, La Rioja, Entre Ríos, Córdoba, Río Negro and Tucumán. In October 2005, 17 Bolivians were released from a textile factory in Buenos Aires, where they were forced to work up to 17 hours a day, the employer took away their documents (including locking them into the factory) in order to keep them working against their will. Food was only provided to employees, meaning adults had to share their food with their children and their children were prevented from going to school or to the doctor because it would "interfere with production". The Office of the Ombudsman of the city of Buenos Aires estimates that thousands of people could be working under conditions of forced labour in and around Buenos Aires. On 30 March 2006, a fire broke out in a textile factory where around 60 Bolivians were found to have been exploited for forced labour. Six people were killed, including four children. A programme of inspections was ordered, which resulted in the closure of 30 of the 54 workshops inspected because of the appalling working conditions. According to the Minister for Human and Social Rights of the city of Buenos Aires, there are around 1,600 clandestine sweatshops in the city and some 200 of those employ slave labour. According to the ITUC, the phenomenon is not recent and it refers in its comments to document E/CN.4/2001/78 of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, according to whom "police discovered a group of 56 Bolivian children and young persons between 9 and 20 years of age being held in captivity .... They were kept under armed guard" and "allowed to eat only once a day". They were working in four clandestine sweatshops around the La Matanza area. They had been brought into Argentina, hidden in trucks.

Government's reply on allegations of trafficking of Bolivian workers for labour exploitation

The Government indicates that in 2006 the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security carried out 1,501 inspections in the context of Act No. 12713, respecting homework, and 1,188 inspections in the context of the National Labour Regulation Plan. The Government of the city of Buenos Aires brought the corresponding charges and, where undeclared workers were found, the cases were forwarded to the National Directorate of Migration of the Ministry of the Interior. The regularization of identity documents is a priority action undertaken jointly by the Ministry of the Interior (Patria Grande programme) and the National Directorate of Migration. For the regularization of their employment, there is close collaboration with the Directorate of the Labour Inspectorate of the Ministry of Labour, Employment and Social Security. The Committee notes that in one case charges have been brought for the offence of reduction to a condition equivalent to slavery. The Committee further notes that, according to the CGT in its comments, problems have been identified in the inspection systems.

The Committee notes this information and observes that the Government's report does not contain data on the number of instances in which charges were brought in cases in which the labour inspectorate found situations in violation of the penal and labour legislation, on the effect given to such charges and any penalties imposed. The Committee requests the Government to provide this information with its next report, and also to provide information on the legal action initiated relating to the offence of reduction to slavery and, if the case has been concluded, a copy of the ruling. The Committee further requests the Government to provide information on any measures adopted to strengthen the inspection system.

Transnational and domestic trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation

On the subject of international trafficking, the ITUC indicates that over the past ten years Argentina has been a destination for the trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation from the Dominican Republic, Paraguay and Brazil. Reference is made to a report published by the International Organization for Migration (IOM) documenting the trafficking of 259 Paraguayan women to Argentina for prostitution, of whom 90 were under 18, as well as the information provided by the Paraguayan Vice-Consul in June 2005 concerning over 100 reports from parents of daughters who had disappeared and were believed to have been trafficked.

Further, according to the ITUC, Argentinian women and girls are also trafficked for sexual exploitation abroad. Many of them are from Misiones, Tucumán, La Rioja, Chaco and Buenos Aires. Spain and Brazil are the principal destinations. Coercion and deception are commonly used, although there are also unusually high numbers of kidnappings by gangs involved in the trafficking in persons. In such cases, overt violence and the physical confinement of the women are used to prevent them escaping. The example is given of the case of a young woman kidnapped in 2002 in San Miguel de Tucumán. The investigation carried out by her mother uncovered evidence of trafficking networks operating in the provinces of La Rioja, Tucumán, Buenos Aires, Córdoba and Santa Cruz and the women rescued included some 17 women from Argentina who were forced into prostitution in Bilbao, Burgos and Vigo in Spain.

Around 70 cases have been filed in Tucumán over the past five years relating to women and girls who have disappeared and are presumed trafficked. Furthermore, in May 2005, the Office for Integrated Assistance to Victims of Crime (OFAVI) noted that assistance was being provided to two young women from Tucumán who had been kidnapped and forced into prostitution in La Rioja.

The Committee notes that the Government's report did not address these specific and very serious allegations in relation to either the trafficking of women and girls from the Dominican Republic, Paraguay and Brazil for exploitation, nor does it address the allegations concerning the trafficking networks of Argentinian women and girls abroad. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether any investigation has been undertaken in respect of the specific allegations and, if so, the nature of investigation and any specific action taken in respect of the perpetrators.

Involvement of public officials in trafficking. Corruption of the police force

The ITUC also alleges corruption in the police force and the direct participation of police officers in criminal activities related to the trafficking in persons. The example is given of the case in Mar del Plata, in the province of Buenos Aires, of 13 deaths and disappearances of women which were attributed to an organization of police officers involved in prostitution, the case of the police station in Cuartel Quinto in Moreno, where the complaint by the three women who had managed to escape was not filed and the owner of the brothel was informed of what was happening, as well as the case of two minors who were rescued from a brothel in the port of Quequén run by a municipal employee and a police officer from the province of Buenos Aires.

In the case of the 17 Bolivarian workers who were victims of trafficking for labour exploitation, referred to above, witnesses stated that the police came to the factory to take a percentage of the profits and that four of the workers were threatened before the judge (identified in the comments) who also set the owner of the factory free on the grounds that there was insufficient proof to show that workers had been in servitude. In the view of the ITUC, the involvement of the police is one of the pivotal factors in explaining the rise in internal and cross-border trafficking in recent years and the lack of effective prosecutions for trafficking.

The Committee notes the gravity of these allegations, on which the Government has not provided any information. The key role of the police in enforcing the law and the Convention is undermined in the event of the corruption of the police forces.

The Committee urges the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to conduct full investigations of all allegations of complicity or the direct involvement of public officials in the trafficking in persons and on the penalties imposed if the allegations are found to be true. The Committee notes that the Office for Integrated Assistance to Victims has proposed the establishment of a specialized unit to investigate the crime of the trafficking in persons and it hopes that the Government will indicate what action it has taken to give effect to this proposal.

Legislative measures. Application of effective penalties

According to the ITUC, although there are provisions in the Argentine Penal Code which are currently applied to prosecute traffickers (sections 126 – promoting or facilitating prostitution, 127bis and 127ter – crimes against sexual integrity, 140 and 142bis – crimes against freedom), these provisions do not cover all aspects of trafficking, which means that, for example, persons who recruit and transport victims cannot be prosecuted. The lack of a specific offence of trafficking also means that traffickers escape with relatively light sentences. Reference is made to the case of a trafficker (identified in the comments of the trade union organization) sentenced to just four and half years in prison, despite the fact that he forced dozens of trafficked women into prostitution in San Miguel. The creation of a specific offence of trafficking at the federal level would also resolve the problem currently faced by judges, who can only act within the jurisdiction of their province, and the conflicts over whether trafficking crimes come under national or provincial jurisdiction, which interfere with the investigation of cases of trafficking.

In its reply, the Government recognizes that Argentinian law is characterized by a piecemeal vision of the phenomenon and that the State clearly understands the need to establish a specific crime of the trafficking in persons. Crimes against sexual integrity and freedom (sections 127bis and 127ter, 125bis, 126 and 140 of the Penal Code, as well as sections 116 to 121 of the National Migration Act on the illegal trafficking of persons), do not allow the prosecution of all the acts which constitute the crime of the trafficking in persons in relation to its various stages and objectives. Nevertheless, the Government indicates that this does not mean that the issue has been neglected by the State as there are currently three Bills that are being discussed by Parliament, one of which has already been approved by the Senate. The province of Córdoba is also developing specific legislation.

The Committee notes the extracts of the report of the Deputy Director of the Office for Integrated Assistance to Victims of the Office of the Attorney-General of the Nation. It observes that the above report advocates the need to establish a specific crime of trafficking as in several of the cases dealt with by the Office, including the case of the 34 Paraguayan nationals brought to the country with promises of work and then compelled to engage in prostitution in San Miguel, the person responsible was prosecuted under the provision on promoting and facilitating prostitution and was only sentenced to four years, while in another case of Dominican nationals in the same situation the charges brought were for the crime of unlawful association. According to the above report, there is a pressing need to establish a specific offence covering this crime which undermines human dignity.

The Committee observes that the legislative shortcomings alleged by the trade union organizations and confirmed by the Government's indications have significant implications for the application of the Convention. The Committee hopes that legislative provisions specifically establishing the crime of trafficking will be adopted rapidly and will allow the imposition of penal sanctions, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. In the meantime, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on current prosecutions under existing penal provisions. In this regard, the Committee recalls that the Government is under the obligation to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced.

Assistance for victims

The protection of victims of trafficking and, more generally, the protection of witnesses, contributes to ensuring compliance with the law and the effective punishment of those responsible, as required by Article 25 of the Convention and Article 5 of the Palermo Protocol. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest that in 2005 a judge of Juvenile Court No. 1 in the city of Necochea applied directly the United Nations Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons in the case of four women who had escaped from the sexual exploitation to which they had been subjected. In her ruling, the judge ordered the Secretary for Human Rights of the Province of Buenos Aires to provide housing for the victims and guarantee their physical, psychological and moral well-being. This important precedent nevertheless underlines failings in the national legislation in relation to the protection of victims. The ITUC indicates in this respect that support can only be ordered by a judge when a judicial process has been initiated, while many trafficked people require support before they even consider taking legal action. It adds that the victims of trafficking do not currently benefit from adequate assistance and that in order to establish an effective national programme, adequate funding is necessary to provide for appropriate assistance of victims.

International cooperation

The Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Ministry of Labour is participating actively in the Human Rights Observatory of the Bolivian Community of the Ministry of Justice and Human Rights. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to coordinate the action taken with all countries that in one way or another are involved in the trafficking in persons within or outside the country.

The Committee observes the convergent comments of the national and international trade union organizations on the trafficking in persons for labour and sexual exploitation. This practice constitutes a serious violation of the Convention and requires action that is energetic, effective and proportional to the gravity and magnitude of the phenomenon. The Committee welcomes the Government's statement that "achieving better regulation is one of the concerns of the Argentine State".

The Committee hopes that the Government, in addition to the action to which it has previously specifically referred in this observation, will also take the following action:

- give priority to the adoption of legislation which appropriately defines, classifies as a crime and penalizes all forms of trafficking;
- reinforce the effectiveness of the inspection services;
- take measures to investigate and eradicate corruption of the police force in relation to trafficking;
- take measures to ensure that those found guilty of trafficking have dissuasive penalties imposed;
- provide information on measures taken to raise public awareness of the trafficking of persons;
- provide adequate support and protection for the victims of trafficking; and
- provide information on the measures taken to coordinate transnational action with both the countries of origin and those of destination.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

Further to its earlier comments, the Committee has noted the comprehensive and detailed information supplied by the Government in its reports received in September 2004 and October 2006, as well as the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee in June 2004.

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(c) of the Convention. Privatization of prisons and prison labour. In its earlier comments concerning the privatization of prisons and prison labour in Australia, the Committee pointed out that the privatization of prison labour transcends the express conditions provided in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention for exempting compulsory prison labour from the scope of the Convention. The Committee recalled that compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. The Committee has always made it clear that the two conditions apply cumulatively, i.e., the fact that the prisoner remains at all times under the supervision and control of a public authority does not in itself dispense the Government from fulfilling the second condition, namely, that the person is not “hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations”. The Committee has previously asked the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure observance of the Convention, such as, for example, to provide that any prisoners working for private enterprises offer themselves voluntarily without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Government in its reports has expressed its view that its law and practice comply with the Convention, given that privately managed prisons in Australia remain under the supervision and control of public authorities, and that the private sector has no rights in relation to conditions for the work of prison inmates, such conditions being established by the public authorities. The Government asserts that Australia does not need to establish that work in its privately managed prisons is carried out voluntarily or without menace of penalty, as conditions of work in privately managed prisons are the same or similar to those in publicly managed prisons.

The Committee previously noted that private prisons existed in Victoria, New South Wales, Queensland, South Australia and Western Australia, while there were no prisons administered by private concerns under the Tasmanian, Northern Territory and Australian Capital Territory jurisdictions. In its 2004 and 2006 reports, the Government again refers in detail to prison labour in private prison facilities in New South Wales, Queensland, Western Australia and Victoria, making special emphasis upon the fact that prisoners accommodated in privately operated facilities are under the supervision and control of a public authority, as required by the exemption in Article 2(2)(c). In addition, the Government reiterates the view that prisoners are not “hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations”, since the contractual relationship between the Department of Corrective Services and engaged service providers does not provide for the hire of prison labour (Queensland). In its earlier report received in 2002, the Government recognized, however, that “prisoners are at the ‘disposal’ of the private contractor only in a very literal sense”.

In this connection, the Committee draws the Government’s attention to the discussion concerning the scope of the terms “hired to or placed at the disposal of” in paragraphs 56–58 and 109–111 of the Committee’s General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour. The Committee observes that these terms cover not only situations where prisoners are “employed” by the private company or placed in a position of servitude in relation to the private company, but also situations where the companies do not have absolute discretion over the type of work they can request the prisoner to do, since they are limited by the rules set by the public authority, and where the performance of work is “merely one of the conditions of imprisonment imposed by the State”. The Committee also refers to paragraph 106 of its General Survey of 2007, where it indicated that the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments. The prohibition applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons; consequently, it applies to all work organized by privately run prisons.

Referring to the explanations in paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of its 2007 General Survey referred to above, the Committee points out that work by prisoners for private companies can be held compatible with the explicit prohibition of the Convention but only where the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the prisoners concerned offer themselves voluntarily, without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, as required by Article 2(1) of the Convention. The Committee indicated that, taking into account their captive circumstances, it is necessary to obtain prisoners’ formal consent to work for private enterprises in state-run prisons or in privatized prisons and that it should be in writing. Further, given that such consent is given in a context of lack of freedom with limited options, there needed to be indicators which authenticate or satisfy the giving of the free and informed consent. The Committee recalls that the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may also be other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether free and informed consent is given. The Committee in its General Survey of 2007 gave examples such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released, the offer of continuing the work of the same type upon their release or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills. The Committee indicated that all of these factors should be taken as a whole in determining whether consent was freely given and they should be considered and assessed by the public authority.

As regards the question of voluntariness, the Committee previously noted that in privately operated prisons in Victoria, New South Wales and South Australia the formal consent of prisoners to work does not appear so far to be asked for. It notes, however, from the Government's reports received in 2004 and 2006 that, in New South Wales, employment of inmates in correctional centres (including Junee Correctional Centre, the only privately managed facility) is voluntary on the part of the inmate and there are no incidents of forced labour. The Government indicates that, in Queensland, prisoners are not forced to participate in approved work activities: though no formal consent of prisoners is required, prisoners apply (and thereby impliedly consent) to perform approved work activities. As regards Western Australia, the Government indicated in 2004 that the intent of Prison Regulations 43, 44 and 45 is to require prisoners to work, but not force them to do so against their will. It has also stated in its latest report that the maintenance of the private prison will not lead to any instances of forced labour as defined in the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons in accordance with the factors outlined by the Committee as set out above.

In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information:

- on the action taken to ensure that the informed written formal consent to perform work is obtained from such prisoners without the menace of any penalty;
- on the action taken to ensure that such formal consent is authenticated by the existence of objective and measurable factors such as the prisoners performing work in conditions approximating a free labour relationship, together with other advantages such as learning of new skills which could be deployed when released; the offer of continuing work of the same type upon release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively and develop team skills, or other similar factors;
- on the objective and measurable factors which are to be taken into account by public authorities in order to ensure that voluntariness of the consent is authenticated;
- on the procedures undertaken by public authorities to regularly assess that such objective and measurable factors are in place in order to ensure that work performed by prisoners is voluntary.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. Further to its earlier comments, the Committee has noted the Government's indication in its latest report that there have been three prosecutions under way, involving seven defendants, under division 270 of the Criminal Code (which deals with slavery and sexual servitude), as amended by the Criminal Code Amendment (Trafficking in Persons Offences) Act, 2005. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the outcome of these proceedings, indicating the penalties imposed. Having also noted the Government's indication in its previous report that six of eight states and territories (New South Wales, Victoria, Western Australia, South Australia, Northern Territory and the Australian Capital Territory) have introduced provisions criminalizing sexual servitude, the Committee requests the Government to supply information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted under these provisions and on any penalties imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1972)

Article 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Restrictions on freedom of workers to terminate employment. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act No. LIII, 1952, under which termination of employment by any person employed by the central Government without the consent of the employer is punishable with imprisonment for up to one year, notwithstanding any express or implied term in the contract of employment providing that the employee may freely, and with notice, terminate his or her employment (sections 3, 5(1)(b) and explanation 2, and section 7(1)). Pursuant to section 3 of the Act, these provisions apply to every employment under the central Government and to any employment or class of employment declared by the Government to be an essential service. The Committee also referred to the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance No. XLI, 1958, which contains similar provisions (sections 3, 4(a) and (b) and 5). The Committee pointed out that, even regarding employment in essential services whose interruption would endanger the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population, provisions depriving workers of the right to terminate their employment by giving notice of reasonable length are incompatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its report that the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act No. LIII, 1952, has not yet been repealed, but its provisions are no longer applied in practice. As regards the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance No. XLI, 1958, the Government indicates that it is still in force and is not listed among the existing legislative texts to be repealed in the course of the labour legislation reform.

While noting the Government's statement that it is in favour of the freedom of workers to terminate their employment by way of notice of reasonable length, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will be taken to formally repeal the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act No. LIII, 1952, and to repeal or amend the Essential Services (Second) Ordinance No. XLI, 1958, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

2. Trafficking in persons. The Committee previously noted the Government's indications concerning various programmes aiming at combating trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation, which include awareness-raising and prevention measures. The Government states, in its latest report, that the existing programmes and activities have improved the situation. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would describe such programmes in more detail and communicate copies of any relevant reports, articles, etc., as well as any other information concerning awareness-raising and prevention measures. Please also continue to provide information on the progress achieved in the implementation of the multisectoral action programme against trafficking and on the progress of the Law Commission set up to review existing laws and enact new ones to safeguard women's rights and to prevent violence against women including trafficking.

Article 25. Law enforcement. The Committee recalls that, under this Article of the Convention, the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and it shall be an obligation of any ratifying State to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced. The Committee refers to its earlier comments and notes also the Government's statements in the report that the police, the other law enforcement agencies and concerned officers, including local government organizations, are involved actively in fighting against trafficking in persons. The Committee urges the Government to pursue its efforts to strengthen the law enforcement mechanism and requests the Government to supply information on the number of trafficking offences reported, the number of prosecutions initiated and the number of convictions obtained, indicating the penalties imposed.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee has noted the Government's brief reply to its earlier comments.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes. In comments made for a number of years, the Committee has referred to section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act, under which a penalty of imprisonment (involving, by virtue of section 66 of the Prison Rules, an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed on any person employed by the Government, municipal authority or any employer in charge of supplying electricity, water, railway, health, sanitary or medical services or communications or any other service that may by proclamation be declared by the Governor to be a public service, if such person wilfully and maliciously breaks a contract of service, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the probable consequences will be to cause injury or danger or grave inconvenience to the community. The Committee has also noted that section 2 of the Settlement of Disputes (Essential Services) Act, Statutory Instrument No. 92 of 1981, declared the National Fire Service, Postal Service, Monetary and Financial Services (banks, treasury, monetary authority), Airports (civil aviation and airport security services) and the Port Authority (pilots and security services) to be essential services; and Statutory Instrument No. 51 of 1988 declared the Social Security Scheme administered by the Social Security Branch an essential service.

The Committee pointed out that the imposition of sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for having participated in strikes is incompatible with the Convention. It noted that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act refers not only to injury or danger but, alternatively, to grave inconvenience to the community, and applies not only to essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population), but also to other services, such as most employment under the Government or a municipal authority and most banking, postal and transport services.

The Committee has noted from the Government's latest report that section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act has not been amended. While having noted the Government's repeated indication in its earlier reports that there had been no recorded penalties of imprisonment imposed under this section, the Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary measures will be taken to bring section 35(2) of the Trade Unions Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress achieved in this regard.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of sentences of imprisonment involving an obligation to work as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced labour as a punishment for expressing certain political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It stressed in particular that when they involve compulsory labour, sentences of imprisonment fall within the scope of the Convention when they may be imposed for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It observed that by virtue of section 67 of Decree No. 73-293 of 15 September 1973 issuing the prison regulations, as amended by Decree No. 78-161 of 23 June 1978, convicted prisoners may be assigned to social rehabilitation work.

In view of the foregoing, the Committee has for many years been drawing the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 60-12 of 30 June 1962 on the freedom of the press under which various acts or activities relating to the exercise of freedom of expression are punishable by a prison sentence. It referred more particularly to the following provisions: section 8 (deposit of a publication with the authorities before its release to the public); section 12 (ban on publications of foreign origin in French or the vernacular printed in or outside the country); section 20 (incitement to commit an act classified as an offence); section 23 (causing offence to the Prime Minister); section 25 (publishing false reports); sections 26 and 27 (slander and insults).

The Committee likewise referred to Act No. 97-010 of 20 August 1997 liberalizing audiovisual communication and establishing special penal provisions relating to offences in the area of the press and audiovisual communications. While noting that the provisions of this Act prevail should they conflict with those of the abovementioned Act on the Freedom of the Press, the Committee pointed out that the two Acts were different in scope, since Act No. 97-010 covers audiovisual communication and the Act on the Freedom of the Press covers printing, books and periodicals. For the above reasons, the Committee also drew the Government's attention to certain provisions of Act No. 97-010: section 79(3), under which "any seditious shouting or chanting against the lawfully established authorities in public places or meetings" is punishable by a sentence of imprisonment of from six months to two years; section 81, under which to cause offence to the President of the Republic is punishable by imprisonment of from one to five years; and section 80, which punishes by imprisonment of from two to five years any provocation of the public security forces aimed at distracting them from their duty of defending security or of obeying the orders given by their chiefs for the enforcement of military laws and regulations.

In its last report, the Government indicates its intention of ensuring that national laws are brought into line with ratified Conventions, and that in November 2005 a department to promote fundamental rights at work was established for the purpose, inter alia, of ensuring that laws and regulations are consistent with Conventions. The Government adds that the provisions of the offending texts will thus be revised. The Committee takes note of the Government's resolve to amend provisions of the national legislation that could be incompatible with the Convention. It hopes that these provisions will be revised to ensure that normal exercise of freedom of expression and peacefully expressed opposition to the established political, social or economic system may not be punished by imprisonment involving an obligation to work. It requests the Government once again to specify whether the courts have had recourse to the abovementioned provisions of Acts Nos 60-12 and 97-010 and, if so, to send copies of court decisions clarifying their scope.

Article 1(c). Imposition of forced labour as a means of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend sections 215, 235 and 238 of the Merchant Shipping Code of 1968. Under these provisions, certain breaches of labour discipline by seafarers are punishable by imprisonment which, pursuant to section 67 of Decree No. 73-293 of 15 September 1973, involves the obligation to work. The Committee notes that in its last report, the Government states that the draft Merchant Shipping Code submitted to the National Assembly for adoption takes account of the Committee's comments.

The Committee trusts that the new Merchant Shipping Code will be adopted very shortly and that it will make no provision for prison sentences involving the obligation to work to be imposed for breaches of labour discipline where they do not endanger the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons. Please send a copy of the new Code as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation on the following matters:

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Punishment for having participated in strikes. In previous comments the Committee referred to section 234 of the Penal Code under which advocacy of lockouts, strikes or stoppages declared illegal by the labour authorities is punishable by imprisonment of one to five years. Sentences of imprisonment involve an obligation to work under sections 48 and 50 of the Penal Code. The Committee requested the Government to supply information on the effect given in practice to these provisions in order to enable it to evaluate their scope, and to provide copies of court decisions made under them, indicating the number of convictions.

With reference to this matter, the Committee noted the conclusions of the Committee on Freedom of Association regarding the complaint made by the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), Case No. 2007 (GB.277/9/1). According to the complaint, arrest warrants had been issued against a number of striking workers on the basis of section 234 of the Penal Code. The WCL alleged that this case set an extremely serious precedent in criminalizing a strike (GB.277/9/1, paragraph 263).

In its conclusions the Committee on Freedom of Association stated that the Committee of Experts in its comments on the application of Convention No. 87 by Bolivia in 1999 and previous years criticized certain restrictions in respect of the right to strike, such as the requirement for a majority of three-quarters of the workers of the enterprise to call a strike (section 114 of the General Labour Act and section 159 of the Regulation), the unlawful nature of general and sympathy strikes which are liable to penal sanctions (Legislative Decree No. 02565 of 1951) and the recourse to compulsory arbitration by decision of the Executive Power (section 113 of the General Labour Act). In these circumstances the Committee on Freedom of Association urged the Government to adopt measures as a matter of urgency with a view to amending legislation concerning strikes in respect of all the points raised by the Committee of Experts and with regard to the need to ensure that strikes may be declared illegal only by an independent body, given that excessive requirements and restrictions in many cases make legal strike action impossible in practice (paragraph 282). In its recommendations, the Committee emphasized that no worker on strike who had acted peacefully should be subject to criminal sanctions, and asked the Government to reform the Penal Code with this principle in mind and to inform it of any rulings handed down in this regard (paragraph 285(c)).

The Committee referred to the explanations contained in paragraph 187 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour which indicate that excessive restrictions imposed on the exercise of the right to strike have an impact on application of the Convention. This is the case with the requirement for a qualified majority to call a strike and the existence of compulsory arbitration systems when such restrictions result in a declaration that the strike is illegal with the consequent penal sanctions and the imposition of compulsory prison labour. The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would take the necessary measures to ensure that penalties involving compulsory labour would not be imposed for participation in strikes.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report to the effect that, with the assistance of the ILO technical advisory mission carried out in April 2004, a draft Act has been drawn up on the basis of a tripartite agreement resulting from negotiations between representatives of the Bolivian Central Workers' Organization (COB), the Bolivian National Confederation of Private Sector Employers (CEPB) and the Ministry of Labour, who agreed on the amendment of various legal provisions, including sections 2, 9 and 10 of Legislative Decree No. 2565 of 6 June 1951, establishing penal sanctions for sympathy strikes, and section 234 of the Penal Code, which classifies as an offence strikes or lockouts declared illegal by the Ministry of Labour, thereby abolishing the penalties which had previously been imposed on strikes.

The Committee hopes that the Government will provide a copy of the amended legislation once it has been adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report. It also notes the comments sent by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning the trafficking of persons, which are examined in a direct request addressed to the Government.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Slave labour

For many years, the Committee's comments have referred to the situation of workers who are subject to inhuman and degrading conditions of work, debt bondage or internal trafficking for the purposes of labour exploitation. Over recent years, the Committee has noted with interest a certain number of measures taken by the Government, which indicate its commitment to combating this phenomenon, referred to in Brazil as "slave labour". Such measures have provided the country with a legal arsenal adapted to national circumstances, through the adoption of provisions clearly describing the elements which constitute the crime of "reducing a person to a condition akin to that of slavery" (section 149 of the Penal Code), a national action plan and campaign for the eradication of slave labour, and institutions which specialize in combating this phenomenon, in particular the National Commission for the Eradication of Slave Labour (CONATRAE) and the Mobile Inspection Group. Thanks to inspection visits carried out by this group, a large number of workers have been liberated from the hands of malicious and exploitative employers. These victims have been compensated and heavy fines have been imposed on the persons who exploited them. Nevertheless, despite all these measures, the phenomenon persists. Neither legislation, nor the monitoring activities of the labour inspectorate, nor the rulings handed down by the courts, appear to be sufficiently dissuasive to put an end to a practice which evidently remains lucrative. The Committee therefore asks the Government to continue doing everything within its power to remain at the front line in the battle against persons who impose forced labour on others, despite the obstacles and resistance which continue to exist in the country.

1. Strengthening and adjustment of the legal framework. (a) Bill to amend article 243 of the Constitution (PEC No. 438/2001). The Committee previously asked the Government to take all the measures in its power to accelerate the adoption of this Bill. By providing for the expropriation without compensation of establishments in which the use of slave labour has been identified, this amendment would make it possible to impose truly dissuasive penalties on the owners of such establishments. The amendment also provides that the expropriated lands will be consigned to the agrarian reform and reserved as a priority for the persons who worked on them. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Bill, which has already been approved by the Senate, has been awaiting its second reading in the Chamber of Deputies since the end of 2004. The Government states that, despite its efforts in favour of the approval of this Bill, the matter is progressing slowly and is meeting strong opposition from members of the Chamber of Deputies who represent the rural sector.

(b) List of persons or entities which use or have used slave labour. Since 2003, the names of individuals or entities convicted of having used slave labour have been entered into the "Register of Employers", a list drawn up and regularly updated by the Ministry of Labour. Every six months, the register is sent to various public administration bodies and to banks administering constitutional and regional financing funds so that no financial assistance, grants or public credits are granted to the names included on the list. Moreover, for two years following the inclusion of a name in the register, the labour inspectorate verifies the conditions of work in the establishments concerned. If there is no repeat offence and if the fines and the debts to the workers have been acquitted, the name may be removed from the list (Decree No. 540 of the Ministry of Labour and Employment of 15 October 2004).

The Committee notes that, during the most recent review of the register in July 2007, 22 names were removed and 51 were added, which brings the total of individuals or entities listed to 192. The Committee notes with concern that, according to the information provided by the Government, this register has been contested in the courts. The National Confederation of Agriculture and Livestock (CNA) filed a complaint with the Supreme Federal Court contesting the legality and constitutionality of the list adopted by order of the Ministry of Labour. Subsequently, and while awaiting the decision of the Supreme Federal Court, a number of individuals and entities included in the register asked the courts to remove their names from the list, as a preservation measure. While certain courts agreed to these requests, the Attorney-General of the Union (AGU) contested their decisions, as it considered that the register was not illegal since it only contained the names of individuals or entities convicted by a final court decision, which was itself based on reports made following inspection visits carried out by public officials. The Government states that, in order to end this controversy, a Bill creating a register of employers who have kept workers in conditions of slavery has been tabled with a view to giving legal force to the register instituted by ministerial directive (PLS No. 25/05).

The Government also states that the register has served as the basis for considering that an establishment has not fulfilled its social function. In one case, the land concerned was declared of social interest for the purposes of agrarian reform and the President of the Republic ordered its expropriation. Furthermore, a declaration of intent on the eradication of slave labour was signed by the Brazilian Banking Federation (FEDRABAN) in December 2005. Under this instrument, FEDRABAN undertakes to implement a programme of action to dissuade its associates from granting credit to enterprises which use slave labour.

(c) Other bills. The Government states that other bills have been tabled which aim, on the one hand, to give a legal basis to the prohibition under which individuals and entities recognized as having used slave labour cannot obtain tax incentives and credit or participate in public tendering and, on the other hand, to establish stricter penalties for the crime of reducing a person to a condition akin to slavery.

The Committee has already stated that the register is a vital tool in combating forced labour. Judging by the reactions it has generated, it seems that the objective sought by the register, i.e. to undermine directly the economic and financial interests of those who exploit slave labour, is being achieved. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will continue to take all the necessary measures to accelerate the adoption of the bills and the draft constitutional amendment referred to above and that of any other draft legislation which contributes to meeting this objective.

2. Prevention and awareness-raising activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the public awareness-raising and prevention measures taken by the Government. It noted the role played in this area by CONATRAE as a permanent entity for the coordination of all the action to be taken in the context of the National Plan of Action. It also noted the action taken within the framework of the cooperation project between the ILO and the Government – “Combating forced labour in Brazil” (2002–07).

The Committee notes that these activities continue and take a number of different forms:

- publicity campaign for the eradication of slave labour, involving the distribution of flyers warning the population of the methods used by middlemen (“gatos”) to recruit workers and containing information on labour rights and how to report cases of slave labour;
- programmes favouring access to credit and land for workers freed from slavery and providing such workers with agriculture-related technical assistance and training so as to promote their emancipation through production and work;
- the “Rights Shop” initiative, the aim of which is to provide identity papers and legal assistance to rescued workers or potential victims. These “Rights Shops”, which operate as fixed or travelling units, disseminate information on workers’ rights, citizenship and the risk of enslavement, particularly in isolated areas where recourse to slave labour is widespread;
- the “Slavery, don’t even think about it” project, the aim of which is to reduce the number of adolescents sent to Amazonian regions by mobilizing schools and teachers to play a role in the prevention of slave labour.

The Committee notes that civil society and the ILO, through its cooperation project, are often involved in these initiatives and in the organization of workshops and seminars. Furthermore, it notes with interest that the business world is also developing initiatives to promote the social responsibility of enterprises. Such initiatives, which aim to ensure that the activity, production chain or the products purchased are in no way related to slave labour, put moral and economic pressure on enterprises or farms which might be tempted to use slave labour and encourage them to adopt good labour practices. The Government refers, in particular, to the following: the National Covenant for the Eradication of Slave Labour launched in 2005, which has over 120 signatories including large supermarket chains and industrial and financial groups that have undertaken not to buy products resulting from slave labour; the Citizen Charcoal Institute, the main aim of which is to eradicate slave labour in the sector's production chain and promote the integration of rescued workers in the labour market; and the Social Cotton Institute, which has the same objective.

The Committee welcomes the efforts of the Government and asks it to continue providing information on the measures taken to pursue activities which aim to raise awareness and mobilize the population with a view to combating slave labour. Please indicate the measures taken to support and promote the private initiatives carried out in this domain, to protect the marginalized groups who are at risk of becoming victims and to reintegrate rescued workers.

3. Strengthening and protection of the labour inspectorate. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the central role played by the Special Mobile Inspection Group (GEFM) in combating slave labour and asked the Government to provide information on the resources made available to it to carry out its functions. The Committee also expressed its concern at the climate of intimidation and violence in which labour inspectors, attorneys and judges have to work. In its report, the Government states that, for each of its operations, the GEFM is made up of labour inspectors, federal police officers and attorneys from the Labour Prosecution Service. According to the statistics provided by the Government, since its creation in 1995, the GEFM has carried out more than 560 operations which have involved the inspection of more than 1,800 estates and led to the liberation of more than 25,000 workers. The number of operations increases each year, which suggests that the work of the GEFM is not subject to any particular restrictions or obstacles. The Government does not deny, however, that difficulties are encountered by the GEFM and the other public and private agents involved in combating slave labour. It states that it has adopted various measures to attenuate these problems, for instance, increasing the daily payments made to civil servants working in the interior of the country. With regard to the processing of complaints filed with the Labour Inspection Secretariat (SIT), the Government states that the SIT examines their relevance and decides whether an inspection must take place. The period of time between the receipt of a complaint and the inspection visit depends on the circumstances of the reported violation: the location of the enterprise, conditions of access, existence of armed militias and number of workers concerned. A computerized control system for complaints is currently being set up, which will streamline the processing of information and indirectly enhance the Government's response capacity. As regards the protection of labour inspectors, the Government recalls that the federal police are present at each operation and can exercise the function of criminal police.

The Committee notes all the above information. It observes that, in September 2007, the secretary of the SIT decided to suspend all GEFM inspection visits. This decision was taken in response to the accusations made against the GEFM by an external temporary committee of the Senate, set up following an inspection carried out by the GEFM subsequent to which a large number of workers were freed. The Senate committee requested the opening of a police inquiry into the methods used by the GEFM at this inspection. The SIT considered that the climate of intimidation and suspicion did not permit the GEFM to carry out its activities in good conditions. The Committee notes that the GEFM resumed its inspection visits following the conclusion of a cooperation agreement between the Ministry of Labour and Employment and the AGU. The services of the AGU now provide legal assistance in respect of the activities carried out by the GEFM and assist labour inspectors in the event of their implication in any proceedings. While recalling that the GEFM is a vital link in the battle against slave labour, the Committee is concerned about the pressure it has to face and asks the Government to continue taking all measures to allow the GEFM to carry out its activities in a serene climate free from threats or political pressure. The Committee would like the Government to continue providing information on the action taken by the GEFM (number of complaints received by the SIT, number of operations carried out, number of workers rescued) and to indicate the measures taken to strengthen the intervention and reaction capacity of the GEFM.

4. Article 25. Imposition of effective penalties. (a) Administrative sanctions. The Committee recalls that the effective imposition of penalties for violations of labour legislation is an essential element in combating slave labour in so far as slave labour is characterized by the combination of a number of violations of labour legislation which must be punished as such. Moreover, taken as a whole, they constitute a criminal offence calling for specific penalties, as examined below. The Committee notes the Government's statement to the effect that the total of the fines imposed for violations of labour legislation is constantly increasing. It also emphasizes the role of the Labour Prosecution Service, which, within the framework of public civil action, demands, in addition to fines, the payment of compensation for moral damages suffered by the worker and for group moral damages. The Government provides statistics on all these procedures and also refers to court decisions in which record amounts of compensation have been granted. The Government considers the large fines imposed and the high amount of compensation sought for group moral damages, in combination with the register, to be highly effective since they undermine the economic advantages of using slave labour. The Committee also believes that slave labour will continue for as long as it remains lucrative. The payment of fines and compensation of dissuasive amounts, combined with the impossibility of accessing public subsidies and financing and selling their merchandise, and expropriation measures, constitute the elements of economic pressure which must be put on persons who exploit work carried out by others. The Committee therefore asks the Government to continue to ensure that these administrative penalties are dissuasive and that they are collected in practice, and to provide information in this regard.

(b) Penal sanctions. The Committee recalls that, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, the Government must ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced. On a number of occasions it has expressed its concern regarding the low number of cases tried and sentences imposed by the criminal courts under section 149 of the Penal Code for reducing a person to a condition akin to slavery.

The Government states that, according to the Federal Attorney-General's Office, between 1996 and 2006, there were 110 criminal prosecutions against entities accused of using slave labour. The Federal Attorney-General's Office passed on 882 reports from the Ministry of Labour and Employment to the regional prosecutor's offices for investigation of slave labour, 144 of them in 2005. According to the Federal Attorney-General's Office, only three prosecutions led to convictions by the courts for exploitation of slave labour, and in one case, the prison sentence was commuted to community service. The Government, the Federal Attorney-General's Office and the social movements believe that the main cause of the impunity prevailing in the country is the uncertainty as to which courts are the competent forum for trying crimes of exploitation of slave labour – the federal court, the ordinary courts or the labour courts. The Government states that the determination of jurisdiction is a matter to be decided by the Federal Supreme Court.

More recently, the Committee has become aware of the Supreme Labour Court Order of 30 November 2006, which determines that the competence for examining and trying the crime of reducing a person to a condition akin to slavery (section 149 of the Penal Code) lies with the federal courts. The Committee hopes that this decision will bring an end to the conflicts concerning jurisdiction which have prevented those responsible for such crimes from being tried. It would be grateful if the Government would provide information on the court decisions made on the basis of section 149 of the Penal Code by the federal courts. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes that in order to eradicate the practice of slave labour it is vital that dissuasive penal sanctions be imposed on those responsible for these crimes.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the texts annexed thereto. It notes the provisions of the Constitution of 18 March 2005, in particular article 26, which sets forth the prohibition on slavery and the trafficking of slaves in any form.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory community development work. Compulsory agricultural work. Compulsory labour resulting from a sentence handed down for the offences of begging and vagrancy. For many years, the Committee has drawn the Government's attention to the need to take measures to bring certain provisions of the national legislation into line with the Convention. The Committee notes from the information provided by the Government in its report that the provisions in question still appear to be in force.

With regard to Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979, which establishes the obligation, under penalty of sanctions (one month of penal labour performed on one half-day a week), to perform community development work, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 organizing municipal administration, provides for voluntary participation in municipal development activities within the framework of national reconstruction. The Committee does not, however, note any provision to this effect in the version of the text annexed to the Government's report. Furthermore, the Committee notes that, according to the Government, the Legislative Decree of 29 May 1979 has been repealed. The Committee notes, however, that Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 does not expressly repeal the abovementioned Legislative Decree. The Committee would therefore be grateful if the Government would indicate, firstly, whether Act No. 1/016 of 20 April 2005 was amended following its promulgation in the sense indicated by the Government and, secondly, the provisions which expressly repeal Legislative Decree No. 1/16 of 29 May 1979.

The Committee recalls that its previous comments referred to the following matters:

- the need to set out in the legislation the voluntary nature of agricultural work resulting from obligations relating to the conservation and utilization of the land and the obligation to create and maintain minimum areas of food crops (Ordinances Nos 710/275 and 710/276 of 25 October 1979);
- the need to repeal formally certain texts on compulsory cultivation, portage and public works (Decree of 14 July 1952, Ordinance No. 1286 of 10 July 1953, and Decree of 10 May 1957);
- the need to amend sections 340 and 341 of the Penal Code, pursuant to which, in the event of begging or vagrancy, a person may be placed at the disposal of the Government for a period of between one and five years, during which time he may be forced to perform work in a prison institution.

Recalling the Government's statement, according to which the national legislation considered contrary to the Convention and dealing with matters covered by the Ministry responsible for agriculture was to be submitted for repeal at one of the subsequent meetings of the Council of Ministers, the Committee once again expresses the hope that the Government will make every effort to take concrete measures to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in the very near future.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2(2)(b) and (e) of the Convention. Work imposed in the context of the national service for participation in development. For many years, the Committee has been emphasizing the need to amend or repeal Act No. 73-4 of 9 July 1973 instituting the national service for participation in development, which allowed the imposition of work in the general interest on citizens aged between 16 and 55 years for 24 months, with penalties of imprisonment for refusal. The Committee notes that this Act was repealed by Act No. 2007/003 of 13 July 2007 establishing the national civic service for participation in development. The Committee notes with satisfaction that participation in work in the general interest is now on a voluntary basis. The Committee refers to its direct request, in which it asks the Government to provide information on the effect given to this Act in practice.

Article 2(2)(c). Hiring of prison labour to private associations. For many years, the Committee has been requesting the Government to take the necessary measures to supplement the legislation respecting the prison system (firstly Decree No. 73-774 of 11 December 1973, and then Decree No. 92-052 of 27 March 1992) by a provision requiring the formal consent of detainees who are hired to private enterprises and individuals. The Committee notes the Government's confirmation that Order No. 213/A/MINAT/DAPEN, of 28 July 1988, is still in force. This Order establishes a number of conditions respecting the use and rates for the hiring of prison labour, including the cost of the daily allowance for a manual worker and a technician, and the surveillance costs. The Government adds that for the time being no text issuing regulations under Decree No. 92-052 respecting the prison system has been adopted and that at a later date it will provide an opinion in writing by the Directorate of Prison Affairs.

The Committee recalls that, in a captive environment, it is necessary to obtain prisoners' formal consent to work in cases where such work is performed for private enterprises. The Committee has also considered that there need to be indicators which authenticate or satisfy the giving of free and informed consent, and that the most reliable indicator of the voluntary nature of labour is that the work is performed under conditions which approximate a free labour relationship. The Committee hopes that the Government will take all the necessary measures to adopt in the very near future the implementing texts of the Decree respecting the prison system and that they will explicitly provide that convicts shall formally give their consent to any work performed for the benefit of private individuals, companies or associations, and will ensure conditions which approximate a free labour relationship, in terms of remuneration and occupational safety and health. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of imprisonment involving an obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the political, social or economic system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Penal Code adopted in 1990 no longer exempts from the obligation to work persons sentenced to imprisonment for political offences. Under section 24 of the Penal Code and section 49 of Decree No. 92-052 establishing the prison regime, penalties of imprisonment involve the obligation to work. The Committee stressed that where an individual is, in any manner whatsoever, compelled to prison labour as punishment for expressing certain political views or views opposed to the established political, social or economic system, this falls within the scope of the Convention. Penalties of imprisonment that involve compulsory labour are covered by the Convention when imposed as punishment for the expression of views or of opposition. To enable the Committee to ascertain that the application of the provisions mentioned below is restricted to activities falling outside the protection provided by the Convention, it requested the Government to provide all available information on their application in practice, including copies of court decisions handed down under these provisions, which define or illustrate their scope. The Committee referred to the following provisions:

- Section 113 of the Penal Code, under which the issuing or propagation of false information liable to injure the public authorities or national unity is punishable by a prison term of from three months to three years.
- Section 154(2) of the Penal Code, under which incitement, whether in speech or in writing intended for the public, to revolt against the Government and the institutions of the Republic, is punishable by imprisonment of from three months to three years.
- Section 157(1)(a) of the Penal Code, under which incitement to obstruction of the execution of any law, regulation or lawfully issued order of the public authority is punishable by imprisonment of from three months to four years.
- Section 33(1) and (3) of Act No. 90-53 on freedom of association which provides for imprisonment of three months to one year for board members or founders of an association which continues operations or which is re-established unlawfully after a judgement or decision has been issued for its dissolution, and for persons who have encouraged the assembly of members of the dissolved association by allowing continued use of the association's premises. Section 4 of the Act declares null and void associations founded in support of a cause or in view of a purpose contrary to the Constitution, and associations whose purpose is to undermine, inter alia, security, territorial integrity, national unity, national integration or the republican nature of the State. According to section 14 of the Act, the dissolution of an association does not bar any legal proceedings from being instituted against the officials of such an association.

The Committee notes that in its report the Government states that the aim of the prison policy is the social rehabilitation of convicts, including those found guilty of the offences referred to in the abovementioned provisions. In this context, all necessary measures are taken to prevent the exploitation of convicts. The Committee reminds the Government that under the Convention, persons who express, without using or inciting to violence, political views or views that are ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic order, may not be subjected to imprisonment involving compulsory labour, whatever the form of such labour. In view of the developments referred to above, the Committee again asks the Government to provide information on judicial decisions handed down under the abovementioned provisions of the Penal Code and the Act on freedom of association (number of sentences and copies of the decisions) that illustrate their scope. It would also be grateful if the Government would indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, the persons protected by the Convention may not be subjected to penalties involving an obligation to work.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to the need to amend sections 226, 229, 242, 259 and 261 of the Merchant Shipping Code (Ordinance No. 62/DF/30 of 1962), under which certain breaches of discipline committed by seafarers may be punished by imprisonment involving the obligation to work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of the revised Merchant Shipping Community Code by the Council of Ministers of the Economic and Monetary Community of Central Africa – CEMAC (Regulation No. 03/01-UEAC-088-CM-06 of 3 August 2001). Under the above Code, breaches of labour discipline by seafarers are not punishable by imprisonment. The Committee notes, that in its last report, referring to the legislation giving effect to the Convention, the Government cites the Cameroonian Merchant Shipping Code of 1962 and the CEMAC Code of 2001 and indicates that the text of the revised CEMAC Code will be sent as soon as it is adopted. The Committee requests the Government to provide more extensive information on the provisions that actually apply to the discipline of seafarers and to state which of the two Codes prevails should their provisions be contradictory.

Canada

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1959)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to certain provisions of the Canada Shipping Act, under which penalties of imprisonment involving compulsory labour could be imposed for breaches of discipline in circumstances where the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons are not endangered. Having noted the Government's clarifications concerning sections 82(3) and 101(1) and (2) of the new Canada Shipping Act, 2001, the Committee notes that the penalties of imprisonment provided for in section 101(2) do not involve an obligation to perform prison labour. Noting also the Government's indication in the report that the new Canada shipping act, 2001, will enter into force in 2007, the Committee asks the Government to keep the ILO informed of the date of entry of the new Act and related regulations into force.

Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

1. Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. The Committee has several times drawn the Government's attention to section 4 of Act No. 11-66 of 22 June 1966 establishing the National People's Army and section 1 of Act No. 16 of 27 August 1981 introducing compulsory national service. The former provides for active participation by the army in tasks of economic construction for effective production and the latter stipulates that national service, which comprises both military and civic service, enables every citizen to take part in the defence and construction of the nation. The Committee drew the Government's attention to Article 2, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention which provides that work or service exacted in virtue of compulsory military service laws is excluded from the scope of the Convention only when it is imposed for work of a purely military character. Work exacted from recruits as part of national service, including work related to national development, is not purely military in nature. The Committee referred in this context to paragraphs 24-33 and 49-62 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour. According to the Government, the practice of imposing on recruits work which is not purely military in nature has fallen into disuse. The Committee notes that, in its last report, the Government expressed its intention of repealing Act No. 16 of 1981 on compulsory national service. The Committee hopes that the necessary steps will be taken to repeal the above Act in order to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention.

2. Youth brigades and workshops. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 17 of Act No. 31-80 of 16 December 1980 on guidance for youth under which the party and mass organizations would gradually create all the conditions for the formation of youth brigades and the organization of youth workshops. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, these practices no longer exist. It observes, however, that the abovementioned Act has not been repealed. The Committee noted that a draft decree on voluntary work for young people was in the process of being approved, and requested specific information on the type of tasks performed, the number of persons concerned, the duration and conditions of their participation. The Committee asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to bring the national legislation into line with the Convention and to provide a copy of the decree on voluntary work for young people as soon as it is adopted, together with relevant information.

3. Article 2, paragraph 2(d). In its previous comments, the Committee asked for the repeal of Act No. 24-60 of 11 May 1960 which allows persons to be requisitioned for work of public interest in cases which do not constitute the emergencies provided for in Article 2, paragraph 2(d), of the Convention. Persons requisitioned who refuse to work are liable to a penalty of imprisonment of from one month to one year. The Committee notes the Government's indication in its report that, although it has never been repealed, Act No. 24-60 has fallen into abeyance since the publication of the Labour Code, the Penal Code and the new Constitution of 2002. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the measures taken to formally repeal this Act in order to avoid any legal ambiguity.

4. Article 2, paragraph 2(e). Imposition of sanitation jobs. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government may request the population to carry out certain sanitation jobs. The Government indicated that this practice consisted of mobilizing the population for work in the community interest and was based on section 35 of the Statutes of the Congolese Labour Party, but that it no longer exists and such tasks (weeding, sanitation work) are now undertaken voluntarily by associations and employees of the State and local communities. The Government indicates its intention of including, in the Labour Code currently being revised, a provision to establish the voluntary nature of sanitation work. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the new provisions of the Labour Code once they are adopted.

5. The Committee asks the Government to provide copies of the Order regulating the operation of prisons and prison labour.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Work exacted for national development purposes. For several years the Committee has been requesting the Government to repeal Act No. 76-011 of 21 May 1976 concerning national development efforts and its Implementing Order No. 00748/BCE/AGRI/76 of 11 June 1976 concerning the performance of civic tasks in the context of the national food production programme. These legal texts, which aim to increase productivity in all sectors of national life, are contrary to the Convention inasmuch as they require, on pain of penal sanctions, every able-bodied adult person who is not already considered to be making his contribution by reason of his employment to carry out agricultural and other development work as decided by the Government. The legal texts also deem certain persons to be making their contribution, namely political representatives, wage earners and apprentices, public servants, tradesmen, members of the liberal professions, the clergy, students and pupils. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government reiterates its previous declarations to the effect that these texts have lapsed and therefore, in effect, have been repealed. The Committee stresses the importance of formally repealing texts which are contrary to the Convention, out of a concern for legal finality. It again expresses the hope that the Government will soon be in a position to communicate information on the measures taken to repeal or amend the abovementioned texts so as to ensure their conformity with the Convention in fact as well as in law.

2. Work exacted as a means of levying taxes. In its previous comments the Committee drew the Government's attention to sections 18 to 21 of Legislative Ordinance No. 71/087 of 14 September 1971 on minimum personal contributions, which provide for imprisonment involving compulsory labour, upon decision of the chief of the local community or the area commissioner, of taxpayers who have defaulted on their minimum personal contributions. The Committee notes that, contrary to the information provided in its previous reports, according to which draft amendments to the provisions in question were under consideration, the Government, in its latest report, indicates that these provisions have lapsed and have therefore been effectively repealed. Recalling that this matter has been the subject of its comments for many years, the Committee again expresses the firm hope that the Government will shortly adopt the necessary measures to ensure the conformity of the legislation with the Convention.

Article 2(2)(c). Work exacted from detainees who have not been convicted. For many years the Committee has been drawing the Government's attention to Ordinance No. 15/APAJ of 20 January 1938 concerning the prison system in indigenous districts, which allows work to be exacted from detainees who have not been convicted. The Government stated that, under section 64.3 of the Ordinance of 1965 governing prison labour, detainees who have not been convicted are not subject to the obligation to work. The Committee notes that in its latest report, the Government again indicates that Ordinance No. 15/APAJ has lapsed and therefore has, in effect, been repealed. It again expresses the hope that the next time the legislation in this field is revised, the Government will adopt the necessary measures to repeal formally Ordinance No. 15/APAJ, so as to avoid any legal ambiguity.

Article 25. Penal sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee stressed the need to include a provision in national legislation establishing penal sanctions for persons who unlawfully exact forced or compulsory labour, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention. It noted that, under section 323 of the Labour Code adopted in 2002, any infringement of section 2.3, which prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour, shall be punished by a maximum of six months' penal servitude plus a fine or by only one of these penalties, without prejudice to criminal legislation laying down more severe penalties. In this regard, the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would indicate the penal provisions which prohibit and sanction recourse to forced labour. Since the Government has not replied to its previous observation on this matter, the Committee would be grateful if it would provide the requested information in its next report. Furthermore, it once again requests the Government to send an updated copy of the Penal Code and of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

In addition, the Committee addresses a request directly to the Government concerning other points.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(a) and (d), of the Convention. National service obligations. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures with a view to repeal or amend the National Service Act, 1977, under which persons between the ages of 18 and 21 years are required to perform service with the national service, including participation in development and self-help projects concerning housing, school, construction, agriculture and road building, failure to do so being punishable with a fine and imprisonment (section 35(2)). The Committee observed that, contrary to the Government's repeated statement that the national service was created to respond to national disasters, the Act contained no reference to natural disasters, but specified the objectives of the national service, which "shall be to mobilize the energies of the people of Dominica to the fullest possible level of efficiency, to shape and direct those energies to promoting the growth and economic development of the State". The Committee also referred to Article 1(b) of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105), likewise ratified by Dominica, which specifically prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour "as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development".

While noting the Government's indication in its latest report that the National Service Act, 1977, has been omitted from the Revised Laws of Dominica, 1990, as well as the Government's repeated indications in its previous reports that section 35(2) of the Act has not been applied in practice, the Committee expresses firm hope that appropriate measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal the above Act so as to bring national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 29 and 105 and that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(d) of the Convention. Imprisonment involving compulsory labour for participation in a strike. In the comments that the Committee has been making for many years, it has urged the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that Article 1(d) of the Convention is applied. The Committee referred previously to Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967, which allows a prison sentence of from two to five years to be imposed on any person fomenting or taking a leading part in a collective work stoppage. The penalty laid down in the Decree for anyone who participates in such a stoppage without fomenting or taking a leading part in it is correctional imprisonment of from three months to one year. For the purposes of this provision, there is a work stoppage "when there is a collective stoppage of work or the imposition of a lockout except in the cases allowed by the law, the paralysing of the means of communication and similar anti-social acts". Prison sentences involve compulsory labour under sections 55 and 66 of the Penal Code.

In its report, the Government once again indicates that it is making every effort to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention and that for this purpose the Government has taken measures for the Congress of the Republic to amend the provisions contained in Decree No. 105 of 7 June 1967. For this purpose, the Committee's observation has been submitted to the relevant commissions of the National Congress.

The Committee notes this information and hopes that Decree No. 105 will be repealed without delay. The Committee points out in this respect that the repeal of this Decree has also been requested in the observation on the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87).

Article 1(c). Sentence of imprisonment imposed as a means of labour discipline. Under the terms of section 165 of the Maritime Police Code, crew members are prohibited from disembarking in a port other than the port of embarkation, except with the agreement of the ship's master. Section 165 further provides that crew members who desert, forfeit their pay and belongings to the vessel and, if recaptured, shall pay the cost of arrest and be punished in accordance with the naval regulations in force.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its reports that it is making every effort to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. As it has been commenting on this matter for many years, the Committee hopes that the Government will be able to indicate in the very near future that section 165 of the Maritime Police Code has been amended or repealed.

Following a detailed examination of the list of draft legislative texts submitted to the specialized commissions of the National Congress, available on its web site (www.congreso.gov.ec), the Committee has not found draft texts relating to Decree No. 105 of 1967, nor section 165 of the Maritime Police Code. The Committee requests the Government to indicate the stage reached by the draft texts in their examination by the special commissions and whether any statement has been made relating to the amendment or repeal of the above provisions, as requested by the Committee.

Article 1(a). Imprisonment involving compulsory labour for offences related to freedom of expression. The Committee also previously requested the Government to provide information on the application of sections 230 and 231 of the Penal Code (disrespect or insult towards public officials). The Government reiterates that no court decisions have been made under these provisions. The Committee notes from the web site of the National Congress that two draft texts have been submitted to the Standing Specialized Commission on Civil and Penal Matters with a view to decriminalizing insults, as well as disrespect towards public officials, which are established as offences in section 230 and 231 of the Penal Code.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the progress of these draft texts which bring the national legislation into greater conformity with the Convention.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Use of conscripts for non-military purposes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to Act No. 76 of 1973, as amended by Act No. 98 of 1975, concerning general (civic) service of young persons on completion of their studies. According to section 1 of the Act, young persons, male and female, who have completed their studies and who are surplus to the requirements of the armed forces, may be directed to work, such as in development of rural and urban societies, agricultural and consumers' cooperative associations and work in production units of factories. The Committee recalled that the Conference, while adopting the Special Youth Schemes Recommendation, 1970 (No. 136), had rejected the practice of making young people participate in development activities as part of, or instead of, their compulsory military service, as being incompatible both with the present Convention and Convention No. 105.

The Committee has noted with interest the Government's indication in its report that there is a proposal, which is currently before the Committee on Law Revision at the Ministry of Social Solidarity, to amend the Act concerning general (civic) service of young persons referred to above, so as to provide for the voluntary nature of the service. The Committee has also noted statistical information concerning the number of persons called up for general (civic) service and the number of persons exempted from such service.

The Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken to amend the Act concerning general (civic) service of young persons by clearly providing that the participation of young people in the civic service programme is voluntary, in order to ensure the observance of the forced labour Conventions. Pending the adoption of such measures, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the application of the above legislation in practice, including information on the number of persons who applied for exemption from such service and those whose applications have been refused.

The Committee is again addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1995)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons and penalties. In its previous observation, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to prevent and combat trafficking in persons, including the court judgements handed down pursuant to sections 367 and 370 of the Penal Code, under the terms of which trafficking in persons for any purpose and the organization or membership of international organizations involved in the trafficking of slaves or the sale of persons are punishable by a prison sentence of between four and eight years, respectively. The Committee noted the Government's indication that, in connection with sections 367 and 370 of the Penal Code, a number of court cases were under way on which no rulings had yet been handed down and that it would bring them to the attention of the Committee when they were issued. The Committee noted with concern that no penalty had been imposed under the provisions of the Penal Code to punish trafficking in persons and recalled the requirements set out in the Convention that the exaction of forced labour shall be punished as a penal offence by penalties that are really adequate and are strictly enforced (Article 25).

The Committee notes the Government's indication in its last report received in August 2006 that awareness-raising campaigns are being carried out for the population at large with the participation, inter alia, of the Office of the Public Prosecutor of the Republic and its crime prevention unit. It adds that a National Committee on Trafficking in Persons has been established in which various institutions participate, such as the General Directorate of Migration and Foreign Nationals, the national police, the Office of the Public Prosecutor, the Ministry of Labour and non-governmental organizations. The purpose of the National Committee is to coordinate action to ensure that effective measures are taken to combat and prevent trafficking in persons. Training programmes have also been carried out for persons working in this area on proving the existence of the crime and the accusation of the perpetrator in a manner that guarantees the presumption of innocence.

The Committee once again observes that the Government's report does not contain any information on the application of sections 367 and 370 of the Penal Code. The Government does not refer to court cases that are under way, nor to any penalty imposed on the persons responsible. The Committee hopes that compliance with procedural guarantees of the presumption of innocence, which clearly have to be safeguarded in every country abiding the rule of law and to which the Government refers in its last report, will not affect or impede compliance with the requirement of the Convention, namely the imposition of penal sanctions following due process on those found guilty of the crime of trafficking in persons.

The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the court cases that are under way and, where appropriate, copies of the rulings handed down under the national legislation that has been adopted (sections 367 and 370 of the Penal Code) with a view to combating this serious crime. The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to provide information on any other measure adopted to combat trafficking in persons.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. 1. In comments made for a considerable number of years, the Committee has referred to provisions of the Criminal Code, the Newspaper Licensing Decree, 1973, the Merchant Shipping Act, 1963, the Protection of Property (Trade Disputes) Ordinance and the Industrial Relations Act, 1965, under which imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed as a punishment for non-observance of restrictions imposed by discretionary decision of the executive on the publication of newspapers and the carrying on of associations, for various breaches of discipline in the merchant marine and for participation in certain forms of strikes. Having requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures in regard to these provisions to ensure that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including compulsory prison labour) might be exacted in circumstances falling within Article 1(a), (c) or (d) of the Convention, the Committee noted the Government's statement that the National Advisory Committee on Labour was discussing the comments of the Committee of Experts and that it was the wish of the Government to bring the legislation concerned into conformity with the Convention. The Government also indicated in its report received in 1996 that the National Advisory Committee on Labour concluded discussions on the Committee of Experts' comments and submitted recommendations to the Minister in March 1994 designed to bring domestic legislation into conformity with ILO standards, and the comments of the Committee of Experts had been submitted to the Attorney-General for a closer study and expert comments.

In its reports received in 1999 and 2001, the Government has indicated that the action of the Attorney-General to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention in accordance with the recommendations of the National Advisory Committee on Labour has been halted in view of the proposed review and codification of the labour laws. It has also indicated that the tripartite National Forum that includes representatives of the Attorney-General's Office, the National Advisory Committee on Labour and the employers' and workers' organizations, would consider the comments made by the Committee of Experts regarding the application of the Convention.

The Government indicates in its latest report that the National Forum has already codified all the country's labour laws into a single labour bill, which is being considered by the Cabinet and will be forwarded to Parliament to be passed into law. The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary action will at last be taken on the various points which are once again recalled in detail in a request addressed directly to the Government.

2. The Committee previously noted the adoption of the Political Parties Law, 1992, the Emergency Powers Act, 1994, and the Public Order Act, 1994, which gave rise to a number of questions under the Convention that are also reiterated in the request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Greece

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1952)

Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention. Recourse to compulsory labour under emergency powers. The Committee has noted a communication dated 11 August 2006, received from the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GGCL), which contained observations concerning the application by Greece of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). The Committee has noted that this communication was transmitted to the Government on 4 September 2006, for such comments that might be considered appropriate.

The GGCL alleged that, over the last 32 years, the Government has often resorted to civil conscription that under threat of severe penalties compels workers to terminate their strike action and return to work. The GGCL indicated, in particular, that the Government has issued, on 22 February 2006, a "Civil Mobilization Order" (requisition of workers' services) of indefinite duration to put an end to a legal strike of seafarers on passenger and cargo vessels, which do not constitute essential services. According to the allegations, the legal ground for the civil conscription of workers on strike is Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 on "civil emergency planning". The GGCL also indicated that the Panhellenic Seamen's Federation (PNO), affiliated to the GGCL, together with the International Transport Workers' Federation (ITF), has submitted a complaint on the above matter to the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association on 12 July 2006 (Case No. 2506).

The Committee recalls in this connection that, in its earlier comments addressed to the Government under the present Convention, it has been drawing the Government's attention to certain provisions of Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 referred to above, under which the full or partial mobilization of civilians may be proclaimed, even in peace time, in any situation arising suddenly and resulting in a disturbance of economic and social life (section 2(5)). In such circumstances, all citizens may then be called upon to take part in work or to perform services under penalty of imprisonment (section 20(2) and (3), and section 35(1)) and labour legislation is suspended. The Committee referred to the provisions of Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention, under which recourse to compulsory labour in an emergency situation should be limited to circumstances that would endanger the existence or well-being of the whole or a part of the population, and pointed out that it should be clear from the legislation that the authority to exact labour may be used only within the above limits.

The Committee recalls that, in its earlier comments, it noted the Government's repeated assurances that Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 would be revised after Parliament had adopted the Bill on civil defence dealing with questions of emergency arising from physical or technological causes. The Committee also noted the Government's statement in its 1996 report that, with the adoption in October 1995 of Act No. 2344/95 on the organization of civil defence, which deals with questions of emergency arising from physical or technological causes and provides for the mobilization of groups of volunteers in emergency situations, there was no more problem of application of Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974.

The Committee has noted that the Government's reports on the application of Conventions Nos 29 and 105 received in October 2006 contain no reference to the observations by the GGCL. However, the Committee notes the report of the Governing Body Committee on Freedom of Association concerning Case No. 2506 referred to above (Report No. 346, Vol. XC, 2007, Series B, No. 2), in which the Committee takes note of the Government's indication that the Ministry of National Defence is elaborating a draft law with a view to partly or wholly abrogating Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974. The Committee on Freedom of Association has also noted with interest that, according to the Government, pursuant to recent legislative amendments (adoption of the Act concerning "Special Regulations of Migration Policy Issues and other issues under the competence of the Ministry of the Interior, Public Administration and Decentralization" which is awaiting publication in the Official Gazette), Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 will only apply in times of war. As for requisition in times of peace, section 41 of the new Act provides that the requisition of personal services is possible only in case of emergency, i.e. "every sudden situation requiring the taking of immediate measures to face the country's defensive needs or a social emergency against any type of imminent natural disaster or emergency that might endanger the public health".

While noting this information, the Committee hopes that the necessary measures will be taken in the near future in order to formally repeal Legislative Decree No. 17 of 1974 or amend it by specifying clearly that recourse to compulsory labour under emergency powers is strictly limited to circumstances endangering the existence or well-being of the whole or a part of the population, so as to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee has noted a communication dated 11 August 2006, received from the Greek General Confederation of Labour (GGCL), which contained observations concerning the application by Greece of the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), and the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105). The Committee is examining these observations in its comments addressed to the Government under Convention No. 29.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. 1. The Committee previously noted that section 239 of the Code of Public Maritime Law, 1973, has been amended by Act No. 2987 of 2002 to the effect that the sanctions of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour) provided for in sections 205, 207(1) and 222 of the Code of Public Maritime Law and in section 4(1) of Act No. 3276 of 26 June 1944, respecting collective agreements, shall be imposed only in the following situations:

- (a) where the safety of the vessel, the persons on board or other persons, the cargo or property are endangered;
- (b) where pollution or other damage to the maritime environment is caused; or
- (c) where order is disturbed or public health is endangered.

The Committee recalled that Article 1(c) expressly prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline. As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, only acts which endanger the ship or the life or health of persons are excluded from the scope of the Convention (see e.g. paragraphs 179–181 of the 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour). The Committee observed that the situations where "order is disturbed" or where "pollution or other damage to the maritime environment is caused" or "the cargo or property are endangered" do not seem to satisfy these criteria. It also pointed out that endangering cargo or other assets may be punishable by sanctions involving compulsory labour only in cases of wilful acts (which would amount to criminal offences), and not where they are caused by negligence.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in the report that the protection of the cargo or property or of the maritime environment and the avoidance of disturbance of order constitute elements of major importance for sea transport, and that special international maritime instruments have been developed on these issues. The Government also considers that the imposition of sanctions cannot be linked to forced labour, since all cases of fraud or negligence are investigated by competent courts, which decide whether to impose a sanction or not.

While having duly noted these views and comments, and being fully aware of the importance for sea transport of the factors referred to above, the Committee wishes to draw the Government's attention to the fact that neither "pollution of the maritime environment", nor "endangering cargo or other assets" do not necessarily jeopardize the safety of the vessel or the life or health of persons, which can be also proved by the fact the new wording of section 239 of the Code of Public Maritime Law makes a distinction between these two situations and a situation where the safety of the vessel, the persons on board or other persons are endangered. As regards the wording "order is disturbed", it seems broad enough to cover various kinds of situations, including those which do not necessarily endanger the ship or the life or health of persons. On the other hand, it seems clear that the offences connected with the disturbance of order, pollution of the maritime environment and endangering cargo or other assets may be made punishable by other kinds of sanctions (e.g. not involving compulsory labour), which lay outside the scope of the Convention.

As regards the Government's statement that the imposition of sanctions by the court cannot be linked to forced labour, the Committee points out once again, referring also to the explanations in paragraphs 144–146 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that labour imposed on persons as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law, in most cases, has no relevance to the application of the Convention; however, it is covered by the Convention in so far as it is exacted in the five cases specified in Article 1 of the Convention.

The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that, in the light of the above considerations, the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point, and that the Government will soon be in a position to provide information on the progress achieved in this regard.

2. In its earlier comments, the Committee also referred to section 213(1) and (2) of the Code of Public Maritime Law, 1973, under which collective insubordination by seafarers to a ship's master, even in the absence of acts of violence or acts endangering the vessel or the life or health of persons, is punishable by deprivation of liberty (which involves compulsory labour). In its latest report, the Government indicates that the above section provides for the imposition of penal sanctions on seafarers only in case of mutiny against the master, and that such mutiny endangers the safety of the vessel, as well as the persons on board, wherever the vessel is, either in the port or in the open sea.

While having duly noted this indication, the Committee again recalls that the prohibition established by the Convention from imposing sanctions involving compulsory labour in the event of the violation of labour discipline covers the punishment of acts of disobedience (including collective disobedience, which may be also connected with strikes) in relation to the master of the vessel, except for cases of acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons (e.g. acts of violence). As the Committee observed in its earlier comments, offences punishable under section 213(1) and (2) do not necessarily jeopardize the safety of the vessel in certain cases (e.g. when the ship is not at sea, but securely moored in a safe berth) and may be made punishable by other kinds of sanctions (e.g. not involving compulsory labour). The Committee therefore reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to amending the above provisions of the Code of Public Maritime Law, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered.

3. As regards section 15 of Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 on the settlement of collective disputes in the merchant marine, which relates to violations of executory decisions concerning pay punishable with sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour, the Committee previously expressed the hope that, in the context of modernization of the legislative framework in the area of seafarers' freedom of association, this provision would be repealed or amended, so that no penalties involving compulsory labour could be imposed as a means of labour discipline. The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 must not be considered to be in force, as a consequence of the adoption of Act No. 3276 of 26 June 1944, which provides in section 1(2) that collective labour agreements determine, inter alia, the manner in which disputes among the crew members, the master and the shipowner are settled through arbitration committees. While having noted this indication, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or envisaged to formally repeal Act No. 299 of 25 October 1936 referred to above, in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice.

Article 1(a). Punishment for expressing political views. For many years, the Committee has been making comments calling for the repeal of Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970, which contains provisions allowing the imposition of restrictions on freedom of assembly and expression, in private as well as in public, and give the police discretionary powers to forbid or disperse meetings, such restrictions being enforceable with sanctions of deprivation of liberty. The Committee has noted that under sections 40 and 41 of the new Penitentiary Code (Act No. 2776 of 1999), which repealed the Penitentiary Code of 1967, persons sentenced to imprisonment have an obligation to work.

The Committee has duly noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that the provisions of the above Legislative Decree are opposed to articles 9 and 11 of the Constitution and consequently do not apply in practice. The Government also indicates in its latest report that the process of the formal repeal of the above Legislative Decree has been initiated. While noting these indications with interest, the Committee expresses the firm hope that Legislative Decree No. 794 of 1970 will be formally repealed in the near future, in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be in a position to provide a copy of the repealing text.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1989)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Obligation to do overtime under threat of a penalty. In its previous observation, the Committee indicated that, for the purposes of the Convention, the expression “forced or compulsory labour” means all work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered her or himself voluntarily. The Committee observed, in relation to the allegations made by the Trade Union Confederation of Guatemala (UNSITRAGUA), that in certain cases refusal by workers in the public sector to work hours in excess of the normal working day can result in the termination of their contract and that in the private sector there are cases of enterprises which set production targets for workers who have to work in excess of the ordinary hours of the working day in order to earn a survival wage. The Committee observed that in both cases the common denominator is the imposition of work or a service and the worker has the possibility to “free her or himself” from such imposition only by leaving the job or accepting dismissal as a sanction for refusing to perform such work. In theory, workers have the choice of not working beyond normal working hours, but their choice is not real in practice in view of their need to earn, at least, the minimal wage and to retain their employment, or for both reasons. The Committee considered that in such cases the work or service is imposed under the menace of a penalty. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure compliance with the Convention in this respect.

The Committee notes the Government’s detailed report in reply to the various issues raised by UNSITRAGUA and the questions raised by the Committee, which are addressed below.

1. Public sector: Justices of the Peace – Judicial bodies; National Civil Police; Municipal Water Company (EMPAGUA) – Municipality of the Capital City of Guatemala. (a) Justices of the Peace. According to UNSITRAGUA, “in most of the towns of the country, there is only one Justice of the Peace who has to be on duty 24 hours a day, every day of the year. The auxiliary staff of Justices of the Peace have to cover shifts by rotation as additional work supplementing their ordinary working day. The shifts worked on public holidays, Saturdays and Sundays are compensated with time off, but the shifts worked after the completion of the ordinary working day are not compensated in time off, nor are they paid. Failure to perform such shifts constitutes an offence liable to be punished by dismissal”. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the case, cited by UNSITRAGUA by way of illustration, of a worker dismissed for refusing to work 24 hours continuously (ruling No. 25-04, which found against the Supreme Court of Justice). The Committee also requested information on the other case cited by UNSITRAGUA (ruling identified as No. 566-2003, which found against the Ministry of Public Health and Social Assistance). In this latter case, the worker was dismissed for failure to turn up on three complete working days in the same month. The Fifth Chamber of the Labour and Social Insurance Court found that the worker had incurred dismissal “by failing to turn up for work on 23 September 2001 when he was due to work 24 hours of the day consecutively, with such failure being equivalent to three full working days”. The Committee notes that, according to the Government’s indications in its report, both cases are awaiting a final ruling. The Committee requests that the Government provide copies of the rulings when they have been issued.

(b) Employees of EMPAGUA. According to UNSITRAGUA, employees of EMPAGUA have to work for 24 consecutive hours, followed by 48 hours rest, with this work arrangement avoiding the payment of hours worked outside the normal working hours. Refusal to work under these conditions may give rise to dismissal and penal prosecution in view of the status of these workers as public employees. The Committee notes the comments provided by the Union of Operators of Plants, Wells and Guardians of the Municipal Water Company and Allied Workers (SITOPGEMA). With regard to the conditions and limits on the working of overtime, the Committee refers to its observations on the application of the Hours of Work (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 1). The Committee also refers to the discussion in the General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, paragraphs 132 and 133. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure that this practice does not amount to “forced or compulsory labour”.

(c) National Civil Police. According to UNSITRAGUA, officers of the National Civil Police are often subjected to the total suspension of rest periods and leave, compelled to work in shifts outside the normal working day, without remuneration and under the menace of penalties, including penal sanctions in the case of failure to comply with such instructions. In cases in which a penalty other than dismissal is imposed, in accordance with the rules of the institution, such a penalty prevents the officer from gaining promotion. In this regard, the Government indicates that, under the terms of Ministerial Accord 301-97 issuing rules governing holidays, leave and rest periods for the national police, the granting of any type of holidays, leave and rest periods is always subordinate to the needs of the service as assessed by those empowered to grant such leave. The Committee also notes the report of the Subdirector General of Public Security, National Police of Guatemala, concerning the suspension of rest periods, leave and the organization of shifts in the national police, which was provided by the Government, indicating that holidays, leave and rest periods have only been suspended at certain periods (for example, the national holidays at the end of the year) or in cases in which public security may be at risk, and that in all cases shift work consists of eight hours' work followed by eight hours' rest. The Government also provided a report with documentation indicating the dates on which rest periods and holidays were suspended in 2004, 2005 and 2006.

The Committee takes due note of this information. Under these circumstances, the Committee hopes that the Government will ensure that in practice, irrespective of the organization of hours of work required for the necessities of the service, abuse will be avoided in measures to suspend holidays and rest periods, which may result in practices that can be assimilated to forced labour.

(d) State employees (category 029). In previous comments, UNSITRAGUA also referred to the situation of state employees belonging to the category 029. The classification of state employees is determined by the budgetary category to which they belong. The category 029 was established to allow the recruitment of skilled professional and technical personnel for specific tasks and periods, without such workers obtaining the status of public employees. Contracts are renewed when sufficient funds are allocated and these workers do not have the right to benefits to which permanent employees are entitled. UNSITRAGUA alleged that workers contracted under this system are not paid for the hours worked in excess of the normal working day, that refusal to work these hours affects the evaluation of their performance and could result in the termination of the contract, with no liability for the State.

The Committee previously noted the Government's reply, according to which "the contracts of persons providing personal services are assigned in financial terms to category 029 of the general budget of the nation and do not constitute employment relationships, but rather civil contracts, for which reason these workers do not have the status of workers, but of providers of services. In its latest report, the Government indicates that in view of these special characteristics there is no dependent relationship under this type of contract and no limitation on working hours, adding that such contracts are of an exceptional and temporary nature. In this respect, the Committee observed that the Convention applies to any type of legal relationship, and even in the absence of a legal relationship, and consequently affords protection against the imposition of forced labour in any labour relationship, including those which do not arise out of a contract of employment. The Committee further notes that the allegations referred to the undue use of such contracts to cover functions that are intrinsically permanent, thereby avoiding employment protection. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to protect this category of workers against the imposition of compulsory labour outside the normal working day.

2. Private sector: Plantations. In its previous observations, the Committee noted UNSITRAGUA's comments relating to cases of enterprises which set production targets for workers who, to earn the minimum wage, have to work in excess of the ordinary hours of the working day, with the additional hours being unpaid. According to UNSITRAGUA, "such cases are occurring with greater frequency in ranches producing bananas as independent producers for the multinational fruit company in the United States known as Chiquita, which is present in the ranches in the municipality of Morales in the department of Izabal and on the southern coast of Guatemala". It also referred by way of illustration to the "El Real and El Atlántico ranches in the district of Bogos, in the municipality of Morales in the department of Izabal, where the employers refuse to negotiate unless it is first accepted that piece work is not subject to (ordinary) working hours, in violation of the provisions that are in force". The Committee further noted the reports on the corporate responsibility of Chiquita Brands International in which it was indicated that in Guatemala "hourly workers and administrators sometimes work over 60 hours (a week)" and that "workers exceeded the maximum number of overtime hours".

The Committee notes the Governments' detailed reply on these issues in its latest report. With regard to the situation in the El Real and El Atlántico ranches in the municipality of Morales, the unions of the workers in both ranches, with the advice of the legal commission of UNSITRAGUA, have for the past three years been negotiating a collective accord on working conditions, including the form of remuneration, based on the provisions of the Labour Code. According to the Government's indications, in most of these banana ranches agreement has been reached on the calculation of remuneration based on wage tables which provide for piece work or daily rates. When workers agree to work overtime following the working day of eight hours, the mixed day of seven hours and night work of six hours, they are paid 50 per cent higher than the normal wage. The Government adds that daily working hours are applicable irrespective of the form of pay agreed by workers and employers. Furthermore, it indicates that in the case of the El Real and El Atlántico ranches the wage paid is around Q. 2,500.00 and that the minimum wage is Q. 1,273.80 (1 US dollar = 7.5 quetzales). The Committee notes with interest that a commission to address disputes on banana ranches has been established. The Committee takes due note of this information and hopes that the Government will continue to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure that work outside normal working hours is not imposed under the menace of dismissal in the plantations sector. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the commission to address disputes in banana ranches.

Article 25. The Committee notes with interest the statistics provided by the Government in its report on the complaints received which are considered to be complaints of forced labour in view of the failure to provide pay and the withholding of basic and additional remuneration. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the outcome of these prosecutions, with an indication of the type of penalty imposed in cases found to constitute forced labour.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1959)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline or participation in strikes. In earlier comments the Committee noted the Government's statement that some provisions of the Penal Code that may affect application of the Convention, particularly Article 1(a), (c) and (d), are still in force but are not applied. The provisions in question are the following: "Any person who seeks to organize or operate, or who participates in, associations which act in collaboration with, or in obedience to, international bodies that promote communist ideology or advocate any other totalitarian system, or associations whose purposes offend against the law, shall be punished by imprisonment of from two to six years" (section 396); "Any public servant or employee who fails or refuses to carry out, or delays carrying out, any duty pertaining to his position or office, shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to three years" (section 419); "Anyone committing an act intended to paralyze or disrupt an enterprise that contributes to the economic development of the country shall be punished with imprisonment of from one to five years" (section 390(2)); and "Public servants, public employees and other employees or members of the staff of a public service enterprise who collectively abandon their jobs, work or service, shall be punished with imprisonment of from six months to two years. The penalty shall be doubled where such stoppage harms the public interest and in the case of leaders, promoters or organizers of a collective stoppage" (section 430). The Committee has noted that under section 47 of the Penal Code, labour is compulsory for prisoners.

The Committee has pointed out time and again in its comments that, in breach of the Convention, these provisions allow the imposition of prison sentences involving compulsory labour as a punishment for the expression of certain political opinions, as a means of labour discipline or for participation in a strike, and has requested the Government to repeal them. With regard to participation in strikes by public servants and employees of public services deemed to be essential, the Committee refers the Government to its comments on the application of Convention No. 87 in which it also asks the Government to repeal the provisions in question. The Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to align the legislation with the practice, which, according to the Government, already exists, and to ensure observance of the Convention.

Guyana

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1966)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to observations concerning the application of the Convention by Guyana received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) in 2003 and forwarded to the Government on 13 January 2004, which contained allegations that there was evidence of trafficking for forced prostitution and reports of child prostitution in cities and remote gold mining areas.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, 2005, as well as the Government's indication in the report that 300 volunteers have been trained to identify cases of trafficking. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on the following matters:

- the activities of the task force to develop and implement a national plan for the prevention of trafficking in persons, to which reference is made in section 30 of the above Act, supplying copies of any relevant reports, studies and inquiries, as well as a copy of the National Plan;
- statistical data on trafficking which is collected and published by the Ministry of Home Affairs in virtue of section 31 of the Act;
- any legal proceedings which have been instituted as a consequence of the application of section 3(1) of the 2005 Act on penalties, supplying copies of the relevant court decisions and indicating the penalties imposed, as well as the information on measures taken to ensure that this provision is strictly enforced against perpetrators, as required by Article 25 of the Convention.

Haiti

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1958)

1. Exploitation of children employed as domestic servants known as "restaveks". For a number of years now, the Committee has been commenting on the working conditions of children employed as domestic servants, who are known in Creole as "restaveks" from the French "rester avec" or "to stay with". A report submitted to the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery of the United Nations High Commission on Human Rights and concordant comments received in 2002 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now the International Trade Union Confederation, ITUC) and the Coordination Syndicale Haïtienne (CSH) described the practice. This practice involves poor families sending or selling their children to city-dwelling, generally more affluent families, to work as domestic servants in exchange for room and board, and education. In reality, many of these children are victims of exploitation; they are forced to work long hours without remuneration; they are discriminated against in relation to other members of the family; they are poorly housed, poorly fed and are sometimes ill-treated; very few of them receive any schooling (according to the ICFTU, only 20 per cent of “restaveks” go to school and less than 1 per cent reach secondary school level). Moreover, it has been emphasized that although placing children in families to work as domestic servants is only authorized under the Labour Code (section 341) from the age of 12 onwards, many children are placed in families before reaching this age.

The Committee emphasized that domestic work carried out by children is not necessarily forced labour. Nevertheless, the Committee was concerned about the exploitative conditions of which the children employed as domestic servants, within a framework of a relationship of total dependency, are victims. Taking into account the conditions in which such work may be carried out, their young age, and the fact that it is impossible for them to leave their work and the family in which they have been placed, such labour may come under the definition of forced labour provided for in the Convention. The Committee asked the Government to respond to these allegations and urged it to take the necessary action without delay, and also to provide information on the measures taken to ensure the effective implementation of the existing repressive provisions in this area.

The Committee notes that the United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations concerning Haiti, published in March 2003 (CRC/C/15/Add.202), is deeply concerned about the situation of child domestic workers. The UN Committee notes with concern that these children, most of them girls, are forced to work long hours under harsh conditions and without any financial gains, and are subjected to ill treatment and abuse, including sexual abuse. The UN Committee recommends most notably the adoption of a comprehensive strategy.

The Committee notes that the Government, in its last two reports, reaffirms its commitment to protect vulnerable children and notably those working as domestic servants. The Government confirms that, children who are placed in families in big cities in the hope of being well fed and of having the opportunity to go to school, often end up in families living in precarious conditions, and are, on the contrary, ill-treated, beaten and abused. The Government undertook to strengthen the Social Welfare and Research Institution (IBESR) which, over the last few years, has been able to monitor a considerable number of children who were victims of rape and ill treatment while in domestic service. The Government also refers, to certain steps that it has taken, such as:

- the validation in October 2006 of a National Protection Plan;
- the implementation in 2007 of a number of training activities for officials of the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour who are involved in the area of child protection;
- the repeal of section IX of the Labour Code on “children in service” by the Act on the Prohibition and Elimination of All Forms of Abuse, Violence, Ill Treatment or Inhuman Treatment against Children, of 5 June 2003; and
- the programme entitled “Education for All”, which targets vulnerable children, particularly those from poor families in rural areas, who, in search of an education, have been sent to work as domestic servants in large cities, so that they can attend schools in those areas.

The Committee notes with interest that the abovementioned Act of 2003 prohibits abuse and violence of any kind against children, as well as child exploitation, including work which, by its very nature or because of the conditions in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of the child. The Committee also notes that by repealing section IX of the Labour Code which relates to children in service, the Act has abolished section 341 which allowed a child, from the age of 12 onwards, to be entrusted to a family for the purposes of carrying out domestic work. The Act has also repealed the Labour Code provisions relating to the host family’s obligation to obtain a permit and comply with the conditions required by the IBESR. Henceforth, pursuant to section 3 of the Act, a child may be entrusted to a host family within the context of a relationship of assistance and solidarity. He or she must be treated as a member of the family and enjoy the same privileges and prerogatives as the other children in the family. Any report of an abused or ill-treated child is addressed to the Ministry of Social Affairs which may refer the matter to the competent judicial authority (section 4 of the Act).

The Government also states that it is not able to provide exhaustive data and that it will do its utmost to make up for this lack of information and documentation in its next report.

The Committee notes all this information. It is aware of the economic difficulties facing the country and notes the Government’s reaffirmed willingness to protect vulnerable children, particularly child domestic workers. The Committee hopes that the Government will, as it promised in its last report, be able to provide information on the concrete measures adopted to combat the exploitation of numerous children placed in families and on the National Protection Plan adopted in 2006. In this regard, the Committee would like the Government to communicate detailed information on the following points:

- measures taken to assess the extent and the characteristics of the phenomenon. The Committee considers that the general term “restavek” covers a number of different situations and believes that the phenomenon of child domestic labour should be more accurately targeted in order to find effective solutions to the problem. The Committee would like the Government to provide information on the number of child domestic workers placed in host families, indicating their age and in particular the percentage of children who have not reached the minimum employment age and yet are employed as domestic workers;

- measures taken to ensure that regular inspection visits are made to the host family. The Committee would like the Government to specify how, in practice, the authorities ensure that host families do not exploit the children entrusted to them (competent authorities, types of checks carried out, etc.);
- measures taken to ensure that penalties are imposed in the event of the exploitation of child domestic workers. The Committee would like the Government to specify the extent to which the violations observed result in an investigation being carried out and the extent to which they are brought before the competent jurisdiction: labour courts or criminal courts depending on the gravity of the violation observed. The Committee notes that the abovementioned Act of 2003 does not provide for penalties against persons responsible for the abuse, ill treatment or inhuman treatment that it prohibits. In this regard, the Committee emphasizes that the penalties imposed for exacting forced labour must be of a dissuasive nature. It recalls that, under Article 25 of the Convention, the penalties imposed shall be really adequate and strictly enforced. The Committee would like the Government to indicate whether proceedings have been brought against persons who exploit child domestic workers and, if so, the penalties imposed. Furthermore, the Committee would like the Government to communicate information on the measures taken or envisaged to protect, help and reintegrate child victims of exploitation.

2. Trafficking in persons, including children. The Committee notes that the Act on the Prohibition and Elimination of All Forms of Abuse, Violence, Ill Treatment or Inhuman Treatment against Children of 2003 cites, among other examples of ill treatment, inhuman treatment or exploitation, the sale and trafficking of children and the offering, recruitment, transfer, harbouring, receipt or use of children for the purposes of sexual exploitation, prostitution or pornography.

The Committee notes that, in its abovementioned concluding observations, the UN Committee on the Rights of the Child is deeply concerned at the high incidence of trafficking in children from Haiti to the Dominican Republic. The UN Committee notes that these children, once separated from their families, are forced to beg or work in the Dominican Republic. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on this phenomenon and on the measures taken to combat it.

The Committee has also noted the report by the Research Mission of the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States (OAS) on the situation regarding people trafficking in Haiti (September 2006). This mission concluded that “the analysis of the quantitative and qualitative data shows a trend towards the systematization trafficking in persons in Haiti. This trend can be explained by the deterioration of the socio-economic and political situation in the country over recent years which precludes an effective response to the basic needs of the population and opens the way for an increase in all forms of human exploitation and unlawful economic activity”. The Committee would like the Government to provide information on the measures taken to combat the trafficking in persons to the Dominican Republic and other neighbouring countries, both at the legislative (adoption of a text incriminating trafficking in persons) and judicial (arrest and punishment of the guilty parties) levels and in terms of raising public awareness, in particular that of persons exposed to this risk.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1954)

1. The Committee has noted the Government’s reports received in 2005 and 2006 together with its two replies to the communications received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation) dated 31 August 2005. The Committee also notes the further communication of the ITUC dated 30 August 2007 which was forwarded to the Government on 17 September 2007, in order to afford it the opportunity to make comments on the matters raised therein.

Bonded labour and the need to identify the magnitude of the practice

2. The Committee has previously referred on many occasions to the urgent need for a comprehensive, large-scale national survey on bonded labour, using appropriate methodologies, in order to ascertain the scope and order of magnitude of the practice and of the efforts needed to identify, free, and rehabilitate workers who are exploited by it and to prosecute those who use it to exploit them. This issue is again a subject of the 2005 communication from the ICFTU referred to in paragraph 1 above.

3. The ICFTU in its 2005 communication on this topic, adverted to a number of matters including indications that:

- according to the 2005 ILO report, “A global alliance against forced labour”, a commission set up in 1995 by the Supreme Court to investigate bonded labour cases in Tamil Nadu conducted a large-scale survey and concluded that, in that state alone, there were more than 1 million bonded labourers spread across 23 districts and 20 occupations;
- while the Government has denied the existence of bonded child labour in the silk industry, a report by the Centre for Education and Communication (CEC), in conjunction with Anti-Slavery International, highlights a 1998 report by the Labour Commissioner indicating that 3,077 cases of child bonded labour were found in silk reeling units in areas of the Bangalore district of Karnataka;

- the number of people identified by the Government since 1976 does not represent the total number of bonded labourers in the country. It again referred to the systematic survey on bonded labour conducted in 1978–79, the Ghandi Peace Foundation (GPF), and the National Labour Institute (NLI), an autonomous body of the Ministry of Labour, which estimated that 2.6 million bonded labourers were employed in agriculture alone.

4. The Committee notes the Government's response in its 2006 report and the annex attached thereto, which indicated that:

- as a result of government-funded local surveys, during the period 2000–01 to 2005–06, 15,111 bonded labourers were identified in 149 districts and all of them were rehabilitated;
- the incidence of bonded labour, as reported from state governments, declined from 2,465 bonded labourers in 2003–04, to 866 in 2004–05, to 397 during the year 2005–06; this decline, according to the Government, is “a result of concerted efforts made by the Government through various anti-poverty programmes, awareness, sensitization, etc.”;
- the Government considers that the figures quoted by the non-governmental agencies regarding incidence of bonded labour relied upon by the ICFTU are invalid, as they were not derived from the use of appropriate statistical tools for collecting primary data;
- the Government reiterates that it does not consider it necessary to conduct a large-scale national survey on bonded labour, since the central Government already provides grants to the states to conduct district-wide surveys, and that a national survey is not possible to carry out because of the need to use qualitative methods for collecting appropriate data.

5. In relation to the need for a comprehensive national survey, the Committee notes the 2004–05 Annual Report of the National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) from its Internet site, indicating that, pursuant to the recommendations of its Expert Group on Bonded Labour, the commission has since 2003 conducted workshops for sensitizing and educating district magistrates, police superintendents, NGOs and other field officials involved in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1976 (BLSA); that such workshops have “proved useful in identifying significant issues relating to identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labour”; and that among the “important points” emerging from this process was the need for a “fresh, comprehensive survey to determine the magnitude of bonded labour”.

6. The Committee also notes from a news update dated 28 June 2007 and posted on the Internet site of the NHRC, that during a national workshop held on 28 June 2007 a former NHRC special rapporteur, who chaired a session on adequacy and effectiveness of administrative mechanisms, called for “effective surveys to identify bonded labour”.

7. *The Committee once again urges the Government to undertake a large-scale national survey on bonded labour as a matter of priority, using valid and appropriate statistical methodologies, and requests that the Government supply information in its next report on the measures taken or envisaged towards this end.

Vigilance committees

8. The Committee in its previous observation requested that the Government continue to provide information on the vigilance committees (VCs) – the bodies constituted by state governments at district and subdivision levels pursuant to section 13 of the BLSA to, inter alia, advise district magistrates to ensure that the provisions of the BLSA are properly implemented, survey for the occurrence of bonded labour offences, monitor the number of such offences, and provide for the rehabilitation of freed bonded labourers – as well as to provide information on measures taken or contemplated to improve the effectiveness of the VCs in carrying out these activities.

9. The Committee has noted that the ICFTU, in its 2005 communication, referred to the 2001–02 Annual Report of the NHRC, which states that the VCs “were not in position in many places” and even where constituted “have become defunct over the years”, and that they “have not made worthwhile contributions anywhere in terms of the identification, release and rehabilitation of bonded labour”.

10. The Government in its 2006 report indicates that state governments have all confirmed the constitution of VCs, that “the meetings are being held regularly”, and that state governments are frequently requested to ensure that such committees are duly constituted or reconstituted. The Government, in reply to the ICFTU comments, stated in its 2005 report that “there might be a few instances when the VCs did not meet regularly (but) these instances cannot lead to a conclusion that (they) were not ... delivering useful results”.

11. In relation to the operation of VCs, the Committee notes the following from the Annual Report 2004–05 of the NHRC, that:

- in Rajasthan, the State Labour Committee on Bonded Labour was not meeting regularly and had held no meetings after 10 September 2001;
- in Maharashtra, the VCs “are not meeting regularly and the detection of bonded labour is practically nil in the State”; and

- in Punjab, there had been no reported detection of bonded labour since the previous review, and despite advice from the commission, the state government “does not seem interested in taking up the Awareness Generation Programme”.

12. The Committee further notes that the general recommendations which have evolved out of the series of sensitization and awareness-raising workshops conducted by the NHRC and referred to above, have included recommendations:

- for a convergence of the work done by government agencies and NGOs;
- for the constitution of district and subdivisional level VCs;
- for the VCs to examine the status of already rehabilitated bonded labourers, to plan for rehabilitation of identified bonded labourers, and to monitor bonded labour-prone areas and industries; and
- for the periodic review of VCs and their functions.

13. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will address itself to the shortcomings of the VCs in fulfilling their mandate under the BLSA, which are clearly evidenced by a preponderance of recent information from governmental and other sources, including that cited above, and that it comment on recommendations concerning the apparent need for other local institutions to assume the functions of the VCs.

Law enforcement

14. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the problem of law enforcement in connection with the eradication of bonded labour and sought information on the number of prosecutions, convictions and acquittals in various states under the BLSA and also questioned the adequacy of the penalties imposed. The Committee previously observed that, in the light of Article 25 of the Convention, the number of prosecutions launched under the Act did not appear to be adequate in relation to the number of identified and freed bonded labourers reported by the Government.

15. The Committee notes that the ICFTU in its 2005 communication referred to a finding by the NHRC reported in its Annual Report 2001–02 that, “the prosecution of offenders under the bonded labour system has, in fact, been neglected in every state reviewed”.

16. The Government in its 2005 report referred to section 21 of the BLSA, under which the power of judicial magistrates to try offences may be conferred upon executive magistrates, and stated that the Act “has enough penal provisions to deal with the issue of bonded labour”, and that the judiciary in India “is proactive in dealing with the issue of bonded labour”.

17. The Committee notes that the Government in its 2006 report states that, although exact information on the number of prosecutions launched for offences relating to bonded labour during the period under review was not available, according to statistics reported by state governments, there had been 5,893 prosecutions initiated; convictions obtained in 1,289 cases; and fines of 107 million rupees so far realized under the BLSA. The Government adds that the low rate of prosecutions could be explained, in part, by the existence in rural and informal sectors of society of an informal system of grievance and dispute resolution centred on village-level bodies, known as “Nyaya Panchayat” or “Lok Adalats”.

18. The Committee also notes the following findings of the NHRC published in its 2004–05 Annual Report:

- in Uttar Pradesh, 55 bonded labourers were identified and freed in 2004–05, but the “prosecution aspect remains totally neglected”;
- in Madhya Pradesh, a total of 22 criminal cases under the BLSA had been registered since 1999–2000 and 20 cases were pending trial, but the power of executive magistrates to try offences conferred under section 21 of the BLSA was being used “reluctantly”; and
- in Jharkand, orders regarding the empowerment of executive magistrates to exercise powers of judicial magistrates under the BLSA had not yet been issued.

19. The Committee further notes from the 2004–05 Annual Report of the NHRC that among the “important points” emerging from the series of sensitization and awareness-raising workshops on bonded labour conducted by the commission since 2003 in association with the Ministry of Labour and Employment and concerned state governments, and referred to above, is the need for “prosecution of offending employers”.

20. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide comprehensive information about the practical workings of the village institutions referred to above, including:

- detailed information about their geographic prevalence and detailed statistics, for every state, concerning the number of bonded labour complaints lodged with these bodies;
- the number of bonded labour cases adjudicated through them; and
- the outcomes of such cases.

The Committee also asks that in its next report the Government supply detailed information about measures it is taking or contemplating to address the serious and ongoing deficiencies in the prosecution of cases of bonded labour and, more generally, in the enforcement of the penalties and sanctions prescribed under Chapter VI of the BLSA, as well as information assessing the practical results of the ongoing sensitization and awareness-raising workshops conducted by the NHRC for law enforcement officials and members of the judiciary.

Release and rehabilitation

21. The Committee notes the indication in the 2005 observations of the ICFTU that significant problems exist in policies and programmes for the release and rehabilitation of bonded labourers, which include, among other things, corruption and bribery in the distribution of rehabilitation packages; discriminatory treatment in the provision of rehabilitation packages against bonded labourers identified by non-governmental organizations; and the failure of rehabilitation resources to provide economic security and sustained livelihoods to freed workers.

22. The Committee notes the reply of the Government in its 2005 report to the ICFTU comments in which it indicated that efforts were being made to upgrade the skills of beneficiaries required in their previous occupations; referred to directions to state governments to dovetail rehabilitation packages with other poverty-alleviation programmes; and asserted that no case of relapse into bondage had been received from beneficiaries already rehabilitated.

23. The Committee also notes from a news update of the NHRC dated 28 June 2007 and referred to above, that in the course of a national workshop held on 28 June 2007, the secretary of the Ministry of Labour and Employment stated that “no data on the freed bonded labour is available and how their rehabilitation has taken place is still a question”, and that the secretary also called upon state officials to initiate projects so as to converge development schemes for the benefit of freed bonded labourers.

24. *The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will supply detailed information about the measures it refers to for upgrading the skills of freed bonded labourers and about its policy of integrating rehabilitation packages with other poverty-alleviation programmes, including information about the implementation and practical outcomes of these policies and programmes.

25. *The Committee also requests that in its next report the Government provide detailed information about measures it is taking or contemplating to address the significant problems and shortcomings, exemplified in the reports discussed above, in the Government’s policies and programmes for the release and rehabilitation of identified bonded labourers.

Child labour

26. The Committee has previously raised a number of questions concerning efforts to eliminate child labour falling under the Convention (i.e. in conditions which are sufficiently hazardous or arduous that the work concerned cannot be considered voluntary). The Committee expressed the hope that the Government would redouble its efforts in this field, particularly with regard to the identification of working children and strengthening the law enforcement machinery, in order to eradicate the exploitation of children, especially in hazardous occupations; and it also requested the Government to supply the results of the latest census on the number of working children in the country.

27. The Committee notes the indications of the Government in its 2006 report, including the following statements:

- based on census data from 2001 there are an estimated 12.63 million child labourers nationally in the age group 5–14, an increase from the estimate of 11.28 million based on the 1991 Census;
- during the 10th Five-Year Plan (2002–07) the National Child Labour Projects (NCLPs) scheme for the rehabilitation of working children withdrawn from hazardous occupations, launched by the Ministry of Labour and Employment on 15 August 1994, was expanded in scope from 100 to 250 districts;
- the central Government has increased the budget allocation for NCLPs from 2,500 million rupees under the previous plan to 6,670 million rupees under the current Five-Year Plan;
- increased monitoring of government schemes for eliminating child labour has taken place at state and district levels.

28. The Committee notes with interest that the Child Labour (Prohibition and Regulation) Act, 1986 (CLPA), was amended in October 2006, in order to extend the prohibition of employment of children to occupations involving employment in domestic service, hotels, motels, restaurants, road-side eateries, tea shops, resorts, and recreational centres.

29. *The Committee requests that in its next report the Government supply information about the application and enforcement of the prohibitions under this amendment to the CLPA.

30. The Committee notes, with regard to enforcement of the CLPA, the statement of the Government in its 2006 report that it was “moving in the direction” of creating suitable enforcement machinery. The Committee, however, also notes the statistical data (as reported by state governments and the Organisation of the Chief Labour Commissioner) posted on the Internet site of the National Child Labour Project of the Ministry of Labour and Employment. This data include the following comparative statistics for the periods 2004–05 and 2002–03:

- in 2004–05, 242,223 inspections were conducted and 16,632 violations were detected, whereas in 2002–03, 26,411 violations were detected;
- in 2004–05, 2,609 prosecutions were launched compared to 9,159 in 2002–03; and
- in 2004–05, there were 1,385 convictions and 447 acquittals, in comparison to 4,013 convictions in 2002–03.

31. The Committee notes that there has been a steep drop in the detection of violations and initiation of prosecutions during 2004–05, when at the same time the estimates indicate a continuing increase in child labour. The Committee also notes that no data were reported on the nature of the sanctions or sentences imposed in cases where convictions were achieved.

32. The Committee asks the Government to provide information in its next report on the nature of sanctions or sentences received in relation to successful convictions, supplying copies of the court decisions (including those of the Supreme Court) concerning the work of children in hazardous occupations. The Committee also asks the Government to comment on the drop in the detection of violations and initiation of prosecutions during 2004–05 and also any explanation for the comparatively high rate of acquittals. Further, the Committee requests the Government to elaborate on what is meant by its assertion that the Government is committed to “moving in the direction” of creating suitable enforcement machinery.

33. The Committee notes two news releases of the Ministry of Labour and Employment dated 20 August 2007 and 22 August 2007, posted on the Internet site of the Government’s Public Information Bureau, indicating that the Ministry was now implementing its scheme of NCLPs in 250 districts in a total of 20 states. Under the scheme, these children were placed into special schools and provided with accelerated bridging education, vocational training, mid-day meals, stipends, and health check-up facilities. At present, 343,000 children were enrolled in the special schools and 457,000 children had already been mainstreamed into the formal education system since the scheme’s inception. An expansion of the scheme along with an enlargement of its scope through additional components during the 11th Five-Year Plan (2007–12) was under consideration. The programme covered children working in notified hazardous occupations in the agricultural sector, among others. In addition, a scheme of grants-in-aid to voluntary agencies for the benefit of children withdrawn from hazardous occupations was being implemented in other districts not covered by the NCLP scheme.

34. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide updated and detailed information about the implementation in all 20 states of the NCLPs scheme for rehabilitating child labour withdrawn from hazardous industries and about the status of plans to enlarge its scope under the next Five-Year Plan.

Prostitution and commercial sexual exploitation

35. In its earlier comments, the Committee welcomed the adoption of a National Plan of Action to combat trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation of women and children, among other positive measures taken by the Government, as well as the Government’s intention to review the existing legal framework including the Immoral Trafficking (Prevention) Act, the India Penal Code, the Criminal Procedure Code and the Evidence Act, with a view to making the punishment more stringent for traffickers but at the same time, more victim-friendly. The Committee also expressed the hope that measures would be taken to compile reliable statistics concerning the extent and magnitude of the problem of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation in India, including the problem of child prostitution.

36. The Committee notes with interest the enactment of the Commissions for Protection of Child Rights Act, 2005 (CPCRA), referred to by the Government in its 2006 report. The Committee notes that the purpose of the Act is to provide for the constitution of a national commission and analogous state-level commissions “for providing speedy trial of offences against children”. The Committee notes some of the salient points of the CPCRA with respect to the functions and powers of the national commission, which include:

- inquiring into violation of child rights and recommend initiation of proceedings in such cases (section 13(1)(c));
- examining all factors that inhibit the enjoyment of rights of children such as trafficking and prostitution and to recommend appropriate remedial measures (section 13(1)(d));
- inquiring into complaints relating to the deprivation and violation of child rights and take up such matters with appropriate authorities (section 13(1)(j));
- forwarding any case to a magistrate, who shall hear the complaint against the accused as if it were forwarded under section 346 of the Code of Criminal Procedure (section 14(2));
- where an inquiry discloses a violation “of a serious nature or contravention of provisions of any law”, recommending the initiation of proceedings for prosecution (section 15(i));
- commissions constituted by state governments at the state level are accorded functions and powers analogous to those of the national commission (section 24).

37. The Committee notes the Government’s reference to proposed legislation, the draft Offences against Children Bill, 2006 (DOCB). The Government states that the DOCB seeks to improve deficiencies in the India Penal Code, which does not separately take cognizance of various offences against children, and that it specifically includes the offence of sexual exploitation of children and trafficking and provides for corresponding sanctions.

38. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will supply information concerning the practical application of the provisions of the Commissions for Protection of Child Rights Act, 2005 referred to above, as they relate to trafficking of children for purposes of commercial sexual exploitation or prostitution. The Committee hopes that the Government will soon enact the draft Offences against Children Bill and asks the Government to supply updated information on the prospects for such action.

39. The Committee also notes from the Internet site of the Parliament of India that the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Amendment Bill, 2006 was introduced in the Lok Sabha in May 2006 and adopted by the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Human Resource Development in November 2006 and thereafter reported back to both Houses of Parliament. The Bill amends the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act 1956 (ITPA), which makes trafficking and sexual exploitation of persons for commercial purposes a punishable offence. Among other things, the Bill provides for more stringent punishment of offenders; deletes provisions relating to the prosecution of prostitutes for solicitation; defines the term “trafficking in persons” and punishes trafficking in persons, including children, for the purpose of prostitution; increases penalties for certain trafficking offences; and provides for the constitution of authorities at the central and state levels to combat trafficking.

40. Further, the Committee notes from a press release dated 20 August 2007, posted on the Internet site of the Government’s Press Information Bureau (PIB), that a pilot project on combating trafficking of women and children for sexual exploitation was being implemented; that a “Comprehensive Scheme for Prevention of Trafficking and Rescue, Rehabilitation and Reintegration of Victims of Trafficking and Commercial Sexual Exploitation” had been included in the Annual Plan, 2007–08; and that the Central Advisory Committee on Combating Child Prostitution, headed by the Secretary of the Ministry of Women and Child Development (WCD), was reviewing the States’ activities in combating trafficking and prostitution every quarter.

41. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will supply updated and detailed information on: the status of the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Amendment Bill, 2006; on the progress in the implementation of pilot projects aimed at combating trafficking of women and children for commercial sexual exploitation; and on the work of the central advisory committees within relevant ministries in terms of measures to combat/prevent trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation and prostitution and to review states’ activities in this area.

Indonesia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

While noting the Government’s report, the Committee regrets that it only provides very brief replies to the many issues raised in its previous observation. The Committee recalls that its comments concerned the trafficking in persons and the exploitation of migrant workers. With regard to the issue of forced labour by children on fishing platforms, the Committee refers to the observation that it is making in relation to the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182).

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Trafficking in persons for exploitation. In its two previous observations, the Committee referred to the observations made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU), which has since become the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), containing worrying information on the trafficking in persons, particularly for the purpose of prostitution. The ITUC indicated that 20 per cent of the 5 million Indonesian migrant workers were reported to be victims of trafficking. The Government recognized the phenomenon and had taken a certain number of measures to combat it. At the 92nd Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2004, the problem was examined by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the discussion on the application of the Convention by Indonesia. The Government provided certain information on that occasion, as well as in its subsequent report. The Committee noted all this information and observed with interest that the Government, which is aware of the importance of the problem of the trafficking in persons, was continuing to adopt awareness-raising, prevention and repressive measures, particularly through the reinforcement of the capacities of the police and labour inspectors, regional cooperation and ILO technical assistance. The Committee nevertheless requested the Government to provide more concrete and detailed information, particularly on the assessment of the scope and nature of the phenomenon of trafficking, the penalties imposed and the results achieved in practice through the action carried out in the context of the National Action Plan for Abolishing Woman and Child Trafficking, adopted in December 2002.

In its report provided in August 2006, the Government refers to certain measures that it has taken to combat trafficking, such as sending inspectors to the points of entry into the country of migrant workers, as well as lawyers and police liaison officers to certain countries of destination of victims of trafficking. According to the Government, results have been achieved in practice. However, the Committee notes that the Government has not provided any information on the assessment by the Government as to the extent and nature of the phenomenon of trafficking. With regard to the penalties imposed, the Government indicates that it has attached to its report examples of court rulings. However, the Committee notes that the Government’s report only contains a list of seven cases, without dates or references to the courts which ruled on the cases.

The Committee notes with interest the adoption of Law No. 21/2007 of 19 April 2007 on the elimination of the crime of human trafficking. It notes that the Law establishes penalties of from three to 15 years of imprisonment and fines of between 120 million and 600 million Rupiahs (articles 2–6), which may be supplemented by one third in certain aggravating circumstances such as causing serious injury or serious mental disorder (article 7(1)), where the crime of trafficking is committed by a state administrator (article 8), by an organized band (article 16) or where the victim is a child under 18 years of age (article 17). In the event of the death of the victim, the penalty is between a minimum of five years’ imprisonment and a maximum of life imprisonment (article 7(2)). The Committee further notes that the Law establishes penalties for the crime of trafficking in human beings when it is committed by a corporation through sentences of imprisonment and fines against its executives, combined with additional penalties such as revoking the business licence, confiscating assets resulting from the crime and prohibiting the executives from establishing a corporation in the same field (article 15). Articles 19–24 provide for sentences of imprisonment and fines for related crimes, such as the falsification of documents with a view to facilitating the trafficking in human beings, inciting a witness to commit perjury and revealing the identity of witnesses or victims. The consent of the victim is not a ground for abandoning proceedings against those responsible for the crime of the trafficking in human beings (article 26).

The Committee further notes other provisions of the Law: articles 43–55 which relate to the protection of witnesses and victims of the trafficking in human beings; articles 56–58 concerning the preventive measures that are to be adopted at the regional and national levels to combat trafficking; and article 59 respecting international cooperation in the field of trafficking. The Committee also notes the provisions of Law No. 13/2006 on the protection of witnesses and victims. It further notes that a technical cooperation programme with the ILO was established in September 2006 for two years to combat forced labour and the trafficking of Indonesian migrant workers.

The Committee notes the efforts made by the Government, particularly with regard to the adoption of legislation to combat the trafficking in human beings. In view of the persistence of the practice of trafficking in Indonesia, and the gravity and extent of the phenomenon, as illustrated by many sources, the Committee considers that the Government needs to redouble its efforts to combat trafficking and to take the appropriate measures to ensure the effective application of the legislation. The Committee emphasizes the need to take action both to reinforce prevention and to impose penalties for this crime, and also emphasizes the importance of adopting measures to assess the extent and nature of the phenomenon of trafficking. It regrets that the Government has not provided fuller information in this respect. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide detailed information in its next report, particularly with regard to:

- the measures adopted or envisaged for the prevention of trafficking, and particularly the programmes and policies formulated under article 57 of Law No. 21/2007, the activities of the various task groups envisaged by article 58(2) and (3), and the measures adopted or envisaged under article 59 in the field of international cooperation to combat trafficking;
- the measures taken in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention to ensure that the penalties envisaged by the national legislation are really adequate and are strictly enforced, including information on the charges brought for trafficking, the prosecutions initiated against those responsible for this crime and the penalties imposed (please provide copies of court rulings issued under Law No. 21/2007);
- the measures for the protection of witnesses and victims of trafficking adopted under Law No. 21/2007 and Law No. 13/2006 respecting the protection of witnesses and victims of trafficking, the operation of the Witness and Victim Protection Institution (LPSK), including a copy of the periodical report that the LPSK has to submit every year as a minimum to the House of Representatives under article 13(2) of Law No. 13/2006.

2. Vulnerable situation of Indonesian migrant workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. In its previous observations, the Committee noted the particularly worrying conditions in which Indonesian migrant workers are exploited in various countries, based on the comments provided by the ICFTU (currently the ITUC) in 2003 and 2004. The main problems concerned the need to go through recruitment agencies and the absence of legislation establishing the rights of Indonesian migrant workers and regulating the process of migration for employment, with these factors facilitating the exploitation of such workers. The Committee also noted the abusive practices of certain recruitment agencies throughout the recruitment process and during the period for which migrant workers are in the country of destination. In this respect, the Committee observes that these agencies charge migrant workers exorbitant enrolment and training fees, thereby obliging them to take on a substantial debt which places them in a situation of vulnerability from the outset to exploitation and forced labour. Recruitment agencies force workers to live in training camps, sometimes for up to 14 months, where they may be deprived of freedom of movement and forced to work free of charge for recruitment agency staff. Then, once they have arrived in their country of destination, migrant workers have to reimburse the debt to the agency which recruited them, by paying back several months' wages, with the result that they work for long periods without pay.

In reply, the Government accepted that the recruitment of Indonesian migrant workers came under its responsibility and it provided information on the legal provisions regulating recruitment agencies. It acknowledged that abuses could occur throughout the recruitment process and indicated that it therefore supervises the activities of recruitment agencies and imposes sanctions on those which do not comply with the regulations. It further indicated that it is aware of the lack of bargaining power of migrant workers and for this reason is seeking to improve their conditions through the conclusion of protocol agreements with host countries. While welcoming the Government's initiatives, the Committee requested it to continue providing information, particularly on:

- the nature of the supervision carried out on the activities of placement agencies on the national territory, particularly with regard to the verification of placement agreements and employment contracts and compliance with their terms, the cost of placement actually borne by the worker, the training provided, the living conditions in training centres and dormitories and waiting periods;

- the means available to the Ministry of Manpower and Transmigration to carry out these controls;
- the nature of the infringements reported, court decisions and the penalties imposed;
- the facilities provided (assistance, redress mechanisms, etc.) to Indonesian migrant workers who are exploited in host countries and the protocol agreements signed with these countries.

In its report provided in August 2006, the Government indicates that it is taking measures in the field of labour inspection to ensure compliance with the legislation. The contracts signed by migrant workers have to be notified to labour inspectors and officers of the Board for the Placement and Protection of Indonesian Workers. Controls are carried out of recruitment agencies and administrative penalties up to the withdrawal of licences are imposed in the event of violations. Moreover, controls are carried out at the places of embarkment of migrant workers. Furthermore, in certain countries, attachés are assigned to embassies with responsibility for social affairs to provide assistance to migrant workers and control recruitment agencies.

The Committee notes the adoption of Law No. 39/2004 on the placement and protection of Indonesian workers abroad and the Regulation of the Minister of Manpower and Transmigration No. PER.19/MEN/V/2006 of 12 May 2006 on the placement and protection of Indonesian workers abroad. The Committee notes that under article 5 of Law No. 39/2004, the Government shall regulate and supervise the placement and protection of migrant workers, while part of its authorities and/or duties may be delegated to regional governments. Under article 7(c), the Government has to establish and develop a system of information on the placement of migrant workers. With regard to the enrolment and training fees that recruitment agencies impose upon migrant workers at the outset, the Committee notes that article 76 of the Law provides that private placement operators for Indonesian workers may only impose costs in relation to the arrangement of personal identity documents, medical examinations, training and certification of competence. By virtue of this article, the components of these costs have to be transparent. However, article 34 of Regulation No. PER.19/MEN/V/2006 adds new components to the costs which may be charged by agencies to migrant workers, including the costs of accommodation and subsistence during the period when the worker is lodged by the agency. Under articles 94 and 95 of Law No. 39/2004, placement and protection agencies for Indonesian workers are responsible for the implementation of policies on the placement and protection of Indonesian workers abroad. The Law also contains provisions relating, inter alia, to rights and obligations, insurance, accommodation, repatriation, the protection of Indonesian migrant workers, among others, by Indonesian embassies, the settlement of disputes which may arise between a worker and a placement agency and the administrative and criminal sanctions which may be imposed on individuals and corporations for violations of the provisions of the Law.

The Committee also notes the study entitled “Using Indonesian law to protect and empower Indonesian migrant workers: Some lessons from the Philippines”, published in June 2006 by the ILO Office in Jakarta in the context of the ILO project on mobilizing action for the protection of domestic workers from forced labour and trafficking in South-East Asia under the Special Action Programme on Forced Labour (SAP-FL). According to the study, although Law No. 39/2004 contains some provisions that are favourable to migrant workers, it nevertheless has serious shortcomings, such as the focus on the placement of migrant workers rather than on their protection. The study concludes that this Law lacks clarity on several issues, such as the attribution of responsibility for the enforcement of migrant workers’ rights. But the weakest aspect of the Law is that its enforcement has been minimal if not non-existent.

Finally, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report concerning the preparation of a draft Memorandum of Understanding with the Government of Malaysia on the recruitment and placement of domestic workers. It notes that the report of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the human rights of migrants, dated 2 March 2007 (A/HRC/4/24/Add.3), refers to a Memorandum of Understanding on domestic migrant workers concluded with Malaysia on 13 May 2006 in Bali (paragraph 36 of the report). According to this report, the Memorandum of Understanding covers procedural matters regarding recruitment, but makes little mention of employees’ rights (paragraph 37). Moreover, it leaves migrants in a vulnerable situation as it does not guarantee standard labour protections, nor does it include measures to prevent and respond to cases of abuse. Appendix A.xii of the Memorandum of Understanding, entitled “Responsibilities of the Employer”, provides that the employer shall be responsible for the safekeeping of the domestic worker’s passport and surrender such passport to the Indonesian mission in the event of abscondment or death of the domestic worker (paragraph 38). The Memorandum of Understanding also contains many restrictions on the fundamental rights of domestic workers. According to the report, the Memorandum of Understanding may end up encouraging irregular migration because of the long, complicated and expensive documentation process (paragraph 40). In conclusion, the Special Rapporteur indicates that the provisions of the Memorandum of Understanding do not meet international labour standards, especially regarding the right of workers to hold their own passports. The authorization for employers to hold workers’ passports makes it difficult for workers to leave abusive conditions or to negotiate better working conditions and full payment of their wages, and also contributes to the creation of networks of traffickers in persons, forced labour and undocumented migration (paragraph 64).

The Committee notes all this information. It recognizes that the Government has adopted measures intended to improve the protection of migrant workers against exploitation and the imposition of forced labour, both before and after their departure abroad, particularly through the adoption of a Law intended to guarantee their rights and control the activities of recruitment agencies. However, this Law does not appear to provide effective protection for migrant workers against the risks of exploitation due to its vague provisions and its numerous shortcomings. The information available to the Committee shows that, despite the measures adopted, many Indonesian workers continue to turn to illegal networks, thereby increasing the risk of exploitation. Furthermore, with regard to domestic workers, who account for a large proportion of Indonesian migrant workers, the Committee notes that the Memorandum of Agreement signed with Malaysia, which is later than the adoption of the Law on the placement and protection of Indonesian workers abroad, contains provisions that contribute to maintaining these workers in a situation of great vulnerability, particularly through the authorization of the employer to keep their passports. The Committee is all the more concerned at the situation as the Ministry of Manpower and Transmigration has announced the objective of sending 1 million Indonesian workers abroad per year until 2009 (see page 7 of the study by the ILO Jakarta Office referred to above). In this context, the Committee requests the Government to provide detailed and tangible information on the measures that it is continuing to take to improve the protection of Indonesian migrant workers against exploitation and the imposition of forced labour, both in Indonesia and following their departure abroad, particularly with regard to:

- measures to overcome the shortcomings of the legislation that is in force;
- controls over the activities of recruitment agencies and on the fees that they charge migrant workers, in view of the fact that the debt taken on by many of these workers is one of the major causes of their exploitation;
- assistance to migrant workers who are victims of exploitation, including clandestine migrant workers;
- the memoranda of understanding signed with the host countries of Indonesian workers; and
- the penal sanctions imposed in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention on individuals and associations guilty of having imposed forced labour and the legal proceedings that are currently under way.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1999)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Use of forced labour as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political, social or economic system. 1. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that sentences of imprisonment (which involve compulsory prison labour under articles 14 and 19 of the Criminal Code and articles 57(1) and 59(2) of the Prisons Regulations) may be imposed under articles 107(a), 107(d) and 107(e) of the Law concerning the amendment to the Criminal Code in relation to crime against the state's security (No. 27/1999), on any person who disseminates or develops the teachings of Communism/Marxism-Leninism orally, in writing or through any media, or establishes an organization based on such teachings, or establishes relations with such an organization, with a view to replacing Pancasila as the State's foundation.

The Committee recalled that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. In this respect, it refers to paragraph 154 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, in which it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence, but that sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system, whether such prohibition is imposed by law or by a discretionary administrative decision.

The Committee notes that once again the Government's report does not contain any information in reply to its comments on this point. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the necessary measures to bring articles 107(a), 107(d) and 107(e) of Law No. 27/1999 into conformity with the Convention and that it will provide information in its next report on the progress achieved in this respect.

2. The Committee noted previously that Act No. 9/1998 on freedom of expression in public imposes certain restrictions on the expression of ideas in public during public gatherings, demonstrations, parades, etc., such restrictions being enforceable with criminal sanctions (articles 15, 16 and 17 of the Law). It requested the Government to indicate these sanctions, supplying copies of the relevant texts, and to provide information on the application of the above Law in practice, including copies of court decisions defining or illustrating its scope, so as to enable the Committee to assess its conformity with the Convention. The Committee notes that once again the Government's report does not contain a reply on this point. The Committee trusts that the Government will provide the information requested in its next report.

3. The Committee noted previously the indication in the Government's report that Presidential Decree No. 11 of 1963 on the eradication of subversive activities, which contained provisions punishing the distortion, undermining or deviation from the ideology of Pancasila State or the broad policy lines of the State, was no longer in force. Noting that the Government's report does not contain a reply to its previous comments on this matter, the Committee once again requests the Government to indicate in its next report whether this Decree has been formally repealed and, if so, to supply a copy of the repealing text.

4. In its previous direct requests, the Committee requested the Government to provide a copy of the latest updated and consolidated text of the Criminal Code. It notes the Government's indication that the new Criminal Code is still in the process of finalization. The Committee further notes the information contained on the Internet site of the Constitutional Court (<http://www.mahkamahkonstitusi.go.id>), concerning certain sections of the Criminal Code. According to this information, the Constitutional Court, in its ruling on Case No. 6/PUU-V/2007, found articles 154 and 155 of the Criminal Code to be contrary to the Constitution of 1945. These articles establish the penalty of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) for up to seven years and four and a half years, respectively, for a person who publicly gives expression to feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Government (article 154) or who disseminates, openly demonstrates or puts up a writing containing such feelings, with the intent to give publicity to the contents or to enhance the publicity thereof (article 155). In its ruling, the Constitutional Court found that the qualification of a punishable offence formulated in articles 154 and 155 of the Criminal Code requires the fulfilment of the element of a prohibited act, without being linked to the consequence of such acts. Consequently, the formulation of the two articles may lead to abuse of power since they can be easily interpreted according to what the ruler wishes. According to the Constitutional Court, a citizen intending to criticize or to express opinions concerning the Government, which constitutes a constitutional right guaranteed by the 1945 Constitution, may easily be qualified by the ruler as expressing feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Government due to the uncertainty of the criteria in the formulation of articles 154 and 155. Such uncertainty makes it difficult to distinguish a criticism or expression of opinions from such feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Government, since a prosecutor does not need to prove whether or not a statement or opinion expressed by a person has actually caused or provoked hatred or hostility among the public. The Committee further notes that, in ruling No. 013-022/PUU-IV/2006, the Constitutional Court found that it was inappropriate for Indonesia as a republic based on the sovereignty of the people and which upholds the human rights as set forth in the 1945 Constitution, to maintain articles 134, 136bis and 137 of the Criminal Code (respecting deliberate insults against the President or the Vice-President), since they negate the principle of equality before the law, diminish freedom of expression and opinion, freedom of information and the principle of legal certainty. Accordingly, in the view of the Constitutional Court, the new draft text of the Criminal Code must also exclude provisions that are identical or similar to those of articles 134, 136bis and 137 of the Criminal Code.

Furthermore, the Committee has noted the cases of several persons convicted recently to heavy sentences of imprisonment, involving compulsory labour, for the peaceful expression of their political opinions, their peaceful support to an independence movement, or for the simple fact of having raised a separatist flag in the eastern provinces of Papua and West Irian Jaya, under the above provisions of the Criminal Code and article 106, under which a maximum sentence of imprisonment of 20 years may be imposed for an attempt to separate part of the territory of the State.

In view of the above and of the incidence that these provisions of the Criminal Code may have on the application of the Convention, the Committee expresses its deep concern and hopes that the Government will take into account the rulings of the Constitutional Court in the context of the adoption of the new Criminal Code. It requests the Government to provide a copy of the Code as soon as it has been adopted. In the meantime, it requests the Government to indicate the manner in which articles 106, 134, 136bis, 137, 154 and 155 of the Penal Code are applied in practice, with copies of any court rulings issued thereunder.

Article 1(d). Recourse to compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. In its 2005 direct request, the Committee noted that under article 139 of the Manpower Act (No. 13 of 2003), read in conjunction with article 185 of the same Act, restrictions on the right to strike in enterprises that serve the public interest are enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment for a term of up to four years (which involves compulsory prison labour). With reference to paragraph 185 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee recalls that, to be compatible with the Convention, penalties involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes may only be applied in respect of essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, only those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population). The Committee observed previously that certain kinds of services listed in the explanatory notes to article 139 of the Manpower Act (such as the railway service) do not meet these criteria. The Committee also refers to the observation that it is making under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), particularly on the need to remove certain restrictions on the right to strike and to amend provisions establishing disproportionate penal sanctions. The Committee notes the Government's statement in its last report that there is no plan to amend these provisions. The Committee trusts that the Government will take the appropriate measures to amend these provisions of the Manpower Act so as to limit their scope to essential services in the strict sense of the term and to ensure that no penalty involving compulsory labour can be imposed on persons participating in strikes. While awaiting this amendment, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to articles 139 and 185, including copies of court decisions defining or illustrating their scope.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government on other matters.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 97th Session.]

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(c), of the Convention. Prison labour performed for private entities. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 155(2) of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules of 1991, under which no inmate may be employed in the service of, or for the private benefit of, any person, except with the authority of the Commissioner or in pursuance of special rules. The Government indicated in its 2001 report that, under section 60(b) of the Corrections Act, as amended by the Corrections (Amendment) Act, 1995, the Minister may establish programmes under which persons serving a sentence in a correctional institution may be directed by the Superintendent to undertake work in any company or organization approved by the Commissioner, subject to such provisions as may be prescribed relating to their employment, discipline and control, and such work may be within the centre or institution or outside its limits. The Committee noted the information concerning the functioning of the Correctional Services Production Company (COSPROD), supplied by the Government in 2001 and 2002, as well as the Government's repeated statement that, under this programme, some inmates had been working under the conditions of a freely accepted employment relationship, with their formal consent and subject to guarantees regarding the payment of normal wages.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in the report that the Department of Correctional Services under the Ministry of National Security and Justice contemplates no change or deviation in its governing rules or general practices, and that there is no consideration being given to reintroducing forced labour. The Government indicates that inmates who work on farms do so willingly and without coercion.

The Committee reiterates its hope that on the occasion of a future amendment of the Correctional Institution (Adult Correction Centre) Rules, section 155(2) will be amended so as to ensure that no prisoners may work for private individuals, companies, etc., except where they do so under the conditions of a freely accepted employment relationship, with their formal consent and subject to guarantees regarding the payment of normal wages and social security, etc., in order to bring this provision into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. The Committee again requests the Government to provide a copy of any special rules adopted under section 155(2) and to continue to provide information on its application in practice, pending the amendment.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the following provisions of the Jamaica Shipping Act, 1998, under which certain disciplinary offences are punishable with imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour under the Prisons Law):

- section 178(1)(b), (c) and (e), which provides for penalties of imprisonment, inter alia, for wilful disobedience or neglect of duty or combining with any of the crews to impede the progress of the voyage; an exemption from this liability applies only to seafarers participating in a lawful strike after the ship has arrived and has been secured in good safety to the satisfaction of the master at a port, and only at a port in Jamaica (section 178(2));
- section 179(a) and (b), which punishes with similar penalties the offences of desertion and absence without leave.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications in its 2004 report that the Maritime Authority had given written instructions to the Attorney General's Department and the Office of the Parliamentary Council to amend the above sections of the Shipping Act, 1998, in order to make its provisions compatible with the Convention. The Government states in its latest report of 2006 that no response has been received from the abovementioned bodies on the Maritime Authority's request.

While having noted the Government's view expressed in the report that, despite the fact that amendment has not yet been made to the above provisions of the Act, Jamaica is still in compliance with the Convention, the Committee points out, referring also to paragraphs 179 to 181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that provisions under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) may be imposed for desertion, absence without leave or disobedience are incompatible with the Convention. Only sanctions relating to acts that are likely to endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons (e.g. as provided for in section 177 of the 1998 Shipping Act) have no bearing on the Convention.

The Committee expresses firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention, e.g. by limiting the scope of the relevant provisions of the Shipping Act, 1998, as indicated above, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1932)

1. In its previous comments, the Committee has discussed at length the limits of its mandate in respect of the two historical breaches by the Government of the Convention relating to the Second World War and the years leading up to it namely, military sexual slavery (the system of so-called "comfort women") and wartime industrial forced labour. It will not repeat them here.

2. The Committee, in its last two observations, has requested the Government to continue to inform it about the course and outcomes of litigation in relation to claims of the victims and also to provide information about any related action. Next year is the reporting year for the Government under this Convention.

3. This year, following its previous observation, the Committee has received further information from numerous workers' organizations, including communications from:

- the All Japan Shipbuilding and Engineering Union received on 28 May, 27 and 28 August 2007, copies of which were forwarded to the Government on 5 June and 5 September 2007;
- the Japan Dockworkers Union (Nagoya Branch), received on 24 July 2007, of which a copy was forwarded on 21 August 2007;
- the All Toyota Labour Union (ATU), received on 10 August 2007, with a copy forwarded on 17 August 2007;
- the Heavy Industry Labour Union (Japan), received on 27 August 2007, with a copy forwarded to the Government on 5 September 2007;
- the Federation of Korean Trade Unions (FKTU) and the Korean Confederation of Trade Unions (KCTU) received on 30 August 2007, with a copy forwarded to the Government on 11 September 2007;
- the Federatie Nederlandse Vakbeweging (FNV) received on 30 August 2007 with a copy forwarded on 13 September 2007. A second communication was received on 28 November 2007; and
- the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), received on 13 September 2007, of which a copy was forwarded to the Government on 21 September 2007.

4. The Committee notes that the communications essentially referred to a number of recent judgements by Japanese courts in cases involving individual claims by victims of wartime industrial forced labour and military sexual slavery, in which the courts have dismissed the claims, finding that the legal basis of the claims has been extinguished by post-war treaties (or barred by statutes of limitation). At the same time, factual findings have been made in favour of the victim plaintiffs and encouraging the party defendants to settle the claims on moral or humanitarian grounds. Some cases may be the subject of future appeal on legal grounds.

5. In addition, the communications of the workers' organizations referred to above include reference to public remarks in October 2006 and March 2007 by then Prime Minister Shinzo Abe and other Cabinet officials. The communications assert that the remarks amount to assertions denying proof of the use of direct, physical coercion by the Japanese military to recruit women and girls into conditions of wartime sexual slavery, which statements appeared to repudiate the August 1993 statement of the then Chief Cabinet Secretary, Mr Yohei Kono, reporting on the findings of a government inquiry, and noted by this Committee in its 2002 observation.

6. The Committee notes the communication submitted by the Government dated 30 November 2007, informing it that, given the volume of communications it has received, it will provide a comprehensive report in 2008, which is its regular reporting year for this Convention. The Government however provided a copy in Japanese of the Supreme Court judgement on the Nishimatsu Corporation case on 27 April 2007. It also stated as regards the issue of "comfort women" that the position of the Government expressed in the statement of the then Chief Cabinet Secretary, Mr Yohei Kono, on the result of the study on the issue of "comfort women" in 1993 remained unchanged and that the then Prime Minister Abe has expressed his support for this statement.

7. *The Committee requests the Government to fully respond to the recent judicial and related developments referred to in the communications from the workers' organizations referred to above as well as to the observation contained in its last report.

Lebanon

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1977)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Vulnerable situation of migrant domestic workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the observations on the application of the Convention by Lebanon received in 2001 from the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), which contained information concerning cases of the illegal abuse of migrant workers, particularly domestic workers, including non-payment of salaries, corporal punishment, sexual abuse and enforced sequestration. The WCL alleged that, from the early 1990s, there had been a particularly large influx of African and Asian women into Lebanon, serving primarily as domestic labour in private households, and that both the employment relations and social status of these women left them extremely vulnerable to exploitation and abuse, most of them falling under the category of "contract slavery"; the existence of abuse and violence, denial of basic freedom of movement and exploitative working conditions contributed to this definition.

The Committee has noted from the Government's indications in its reports that the authorities are endeavouring to stop or prohibit the illegal exaction of forced labour which may be encountered by migrant workers who enter Lebanon in an illegal manner. According to the reports received in 2005 and 2007, the Lebanese Ministry of Labour has adopted measures for the protection of migrant workers including women working as domestic workers, particularly as regards payment of wages and other conditions of work. The Committee has noted the adoption of Order No. 70/1 of 9 July 2003 on the organization of work of agencies which bring in foreign female domestic workers, which provides for the obligations of employers with regard to working and living conditions of domestic workers, payment of their wages, and contains provisions concerning submission of complaints, supervision and labour inspection. It has also noted Order No. 40 of 10 April 2007 concerning the establishment of a National Steering Committee on the situation of female migrant domestic workers in Lebanon, in accordance with the recommendations of a workshop on this subject held in 2005 in Beirut. By virtue of section 2 of Order No. 40, the National Steering Committee shall prepare and carry out projects aiming at promoting and protecting female migrant domestic workers' rights, in coordination with the relevant departments, the International Labour Organization, other competent Arab and international organizations, as well as non-governmental committees and other relevant bodies. The Committee has noted the ratification by Lebanon, in 2005, of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime.

While noting this information with interest, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on the activities of the National Steering Committee and on the measures taken, both in legislation and in practice, to protect migrant domestic workers with a view to complete elimination of the exaction of forced labour from this category of workers. Please describe, in particular, the measures taken or envisaged in pursuance of recommendations of the workshop referred to above, concerning, inter alia, the elaboration of a standardized employment contract for domestic workers to be used by all employment agencies in the country, the establishment of a help desk for domestic workers at the Ministry of Labour for investigation of complaints and mediation between the employer, employment agency and worker, the inclusion of the protective measures for migrant domestic workers into the National Plan of Action on human rights.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Liberia

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation on the following matters:

1. Article 1(a) of the Convention. Imposition of prison sentences involving the obligation to work as punishment for expressing political views. In its earlier comments the Committee observed that prison sentences (involving, under Chapter 34, section 34-14, paragraph 1, of the Liberian Code of Laws, an obligation to work) might be imposed in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention under section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law (punishing certain forms of criticism of the Government) and section 216 of the Election Law (punishing participation in activities that seek to continue or revive certain political parties). The Committee also requested the Government to provide a copy of Decree No. 88A of 1985 relating to criticism of the Government.

The Committee has noted the Government's indication in its report that section 216 of the Election Law and Decree No. 88A of 1985 have been repealed. Since the copies of repealing Acts referred to by the Government as annexed to its report have not been received at the ILO, the Committee hopes that copies will soon be forwarded. The Committee also requests the Government to state whether section 52(1)(b) of the Penal Law is still in force and, if so, to indicate the measures taken with a view to ensuring observance of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted that under a Decree adopted by the People's Redemption Council before its dissolution in July 1984, parties can be forbidden if they are considered to have engaged in activities or expressed objectives which go against the republican form of government or basic Liberian values. The Committee again requests the Government to indicate whether the provisions of this Decree are still in force and, if so, to provide a copy of the text of the Decree.

2. Article 1(c). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that under section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law, local authorities shall apprehend and deliver a seafarer who deserts from a vessel with the intention of not returning to duty and who remains unlawfully in a foreign country. Referring to paragraph 171 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee must point out that measures to ensure the due performance by a worker of his service under compulsion of law (in the form of physical constraint or the menace of a penalty) constitute forced or compulsory labour as a means of labour discipline and are thus incompatible with the Convention. The Committee hopes that section 347(1) and (2) of the Maritime Law will soon be repealed and that the Government will supply information on the measures taken to this end.

The Committee also noted that under section 348 of the Maritime Law various other offences against labour discipline by seafarers such as incitement to neglect duty, assembling with others in a tumultuous manner, may be punished with imprisonment of up to five years (involving an obligation to work). The Committee refers to paragraph 179 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour where it pointed out that sanctions relating to acts tending to endanger the ship or the life or health of persons on board do not fall within the scope of the Convention. However, as regards more generally breaches of labour discipline such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience, all sanctions involving compulsory labour should be abolished under the Convention. In a great number of maritime nations, similar penal provisions have been repealed, restricted in scope to cases involving a danger to the ship or the life or health of persons, or otherwise amended so as to provide for a fine or some other penalty not falling within the scope of the Convention. The Committee therefore again expresses the hope that measures will be taken to bring section 348 of the Maritime Law into conformity with the Convention, and that the Government will provide information on the action taken to this end.

In its earlier comments the Committee referred to Decree No. 12 of 30 June 1980 prohibiting strikes. It notes with interest the Government's statement in its report that a draft law repealing the abovementioned Decree is now before the competent authority for passing into law. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the repealing law as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Libyan Arab Jamahiriya

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline or participation in strikes. Since many years, the Committee has been referring to various provisions of the Publications Act of 1972, under which persons expressing certain political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system may be punished with penalties of imprisonment (involving, under section 24(1) of the Penal Code, an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also referred to sections 237 and 238 of the Penal Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) may be imposed on public servants or employees of public institutions as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline or for participation in strikes, even in services, the interruption of which would not endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population.

In its earlier comments, the Committee noted that Act No. 20 of 1991 on the promotion of freedom proclaims the right of citizens to express their opinion and that point 2 of the Green Book on Human Rights prohibits punishments such as forced labour or long-term imprisonment. It also noted the Government's indications to the effect that the abovementioned provisions of the Publications Act No. 76 of 1972 and of the Penal Code would be amended, and that under section 2 of Act No. 5 of 1991 on the application of the principles of the Green Book on Human Rights, amendments must be drawn up within a period of one year.

While noting the Government's repeated confirmation of its intention to amend the provisions of Publications Act No. 76 of 1972 and the Penal Code referred to above, in accordance with the Convention and the provisions of Act No. 20 of 1991 on the promotion of freedom, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the necessary amendments will be made in the near future so as to ensure that no penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed as a punishment on persons who have expressed certain political or ideological opinions or who have committed breaches of labour disciplines or participated in strikes. It asks the Government to supply the copies of the amended texts as soon as they are adopted.

Supply of legislation. The Committee asks the Government once again to provide copies of the legislative texts governing the establishment, functioning and dissolution of associations and political parties.

Madagascar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention. Prison labour. Hiring of prison labour to private enterprises. The Committee notes that Decree No. 2006-015 of 17 January 2006 on the general organization of prison administration has repealed Decree No. 59-121 of 27 October 1959, which allowed prison labour to be hired out to private enterprises and persons detained pending trial to be required to perform work.

With regard to the latter provision, the Committee notes with satisfaction that with the repeal of Decree No. 59-121 and the provisions introduced by Decree No. 2006-015, persons detained pending trial are no longer subjected to compulsory labour. In its previous observation, the Committee noted that under section 4(4) of the new Labour Code (Act No. 2003-044), it was prohibited to require persons detained pending trial to work. It notes that, according to section 109(2) of Decree No. 2006-015, for such persons to be employed, prior authorization must be obtained from the magistrate in charge and that such authorization is granted only for persons who have been in pre-trial detention for more than two months.

The Committee notes the provisions of Chapter XIX of Decree No. 2006-015, "Work by Prisoners" (sections 104–115). It notes that under these provisions, as under those of Decree No. 59-121 prior to its repeal, prison labour may be hired out to private enterprises. According to section 109(1) of Decree No. 2006-015, prison labour is carried out under general service or hiring arrangements. Under section 112(1), in the case of prison labour under a hiring arrangement, the prisoner may either be placed at the disposal of public or semi-public services or establishments or hired out to private enterprises. The Committee recalls that according to Article 2(2)(c), of the Convention, prison labour is excluded from the Convention's scope only on condition that the work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and the convicted person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations. In its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, the Committee has taken the view that, as long as the necessary safeguards exist to ensure that the persons concerned offer themselves voluntarily and without being subjected to pressure or the menace of any penalty, such employment does not fall within the scope of the Convention (paragraph 59). The Committee also indicated that the most reliable indication of authenticating voluntariness and free consent is where the work is performed under conditions which approximate a free labour relationship (paragraphs 115–120). The Committee notes with interest in this connection that some provisions of Chapter XIX of Decree No. 2006-015 are an improvement in comparison with previous legislation. It notes that under section 105, persons in custody, regardless of their penal status, may ask to be offered work. According to section 106, work provided to prisoners takes into account the requirements for the proper running of establishments in general and penal camps in particular. Section 107(1) provides that daily and weekly working hours, which are set by internal rules of the establishment, must approximate working hours in the corresponding region or type of occupation and must on no account exceed the working hours practised. Section 107(2) provides that observance of weekly rest periods and holidays must be ensured and that the necessary provision must be made in work schedules for rest periods and for meals. According to section 108, independent of prisoner surveillance, staff must ensure observance of the rules on discipline and security in the workplace. Under section 110, work in the service, or for the personal convenience, of individuals, whether magistrates, public servants or private persons, is prohibited. Section 112(3) provides that for prison work carried out under a hiring arrangement, remuneration and working conditions must approximate those provided in the Labour Code. Lastly, under section 114, prisoners employed outside prison establishments under a hiring arrangement or in penal camps remain under the control of the prison staff.

In view of the foregoing, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in practice, persons convicted in a court of law are hired to private enterprises and to indicate what measures are taken to ensure that the consent of the persons concerned is free and informed. Please indicate in particular what consequences would result from refusing to work for a private enterprise, for example, with regard to the possibilities for conditional release in the event of such refusal, and specify the level of remuneration actually received by prisoners as compared to free workers in the same occupational category, the daily, weekly and monthly working hours actually in force, as well as measures taken concerning the occupational safety and health of prisoners.

Article 2(2)(a). National service. In its previous observations the Committee took note of the indications of the Government that it was contemplating the amendment of Ordinance No. 78-002 of 16 February 1978 setting forth general principles of national service, which define national service as the compulsory participation of young Malagasies in national defence and in the economic and social development of the country. The Committee noted that, according to the Government's report, changes were to be made and would be communicated in due course. Having received no fresh information on this matter, the Committee must point out once again that to force young people to participate in development work as part of compulsory military service, or as an alternative thereto, is incompatible with the Convention. It again expresses the hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to bring the legislation into line with the Convention, in particular by ensuring that participation by young persons in national service is voluntary and that work required under military service laws is of a purely military character.

Mauritania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Slavery and slave-like practices. The Committee notes the Government's report and the comments provided by the General Confederation of Workers of Mauritania (CGTM).

For many years, both the Committee of Experts and the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference have been examining attentively the issue of slavery and the vestiges of slavery in Mauritania, and particularly the practices of forced labour which may be imposed in this context. In its last comments, the Committee noted that, at the request of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, the Government accepted the visit of a fact-finding mission in May 2006. The Committee observed with interest that the mission had noted a number of positive measures which illustrated the Government's commitment to combat slavery and its vestiges, which was no longer considered to be a taboo subject. It also noted the Government's indication that the recommendations contained in the mission's report should be taken into account in the national strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery. On the basis of these recommendations and the information provided by the Government, the Committee requested the Government to take additional measures to reinforce its legislation, the effective application of the legislation and the national strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery.

(a) Applicable legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee emphasized the shortcomings in the legislation. It hoped that, as the fact-finding mission had recommended, the Government would take the necessary measures to adopt a text clearly penalizing slave-like practices and defining in precise terms their constituent elements so as to enable the judiciary to apply it easily. The Committee notes the adoption by the National Assembly on 9 August 2007 of the Act criminalizing and penalizing slave-like practices. In his explanation of the reasons for the Act, the Prime Minister indicated that the legislative provisions adopted up to then had not achieved their objective, as the texts adopted had not contained an "explicit classification of the phenomenon and its criminalization and penalization to an extent that takes into account its inhumanity". The Committee notes with satisfaction that this Act defines, criminalizes and penalizes slave-like practices. Section 2 of the Act defines slavery as the exercise of one or all of the attributes of the right of ownership over one or more persons. The Act makes a distinction between the crime of slavery and offences of slavery. A crime of slavery, which is punishable with a sentence of imprisonment of between five and ten years and a fine of between 500,000 and 1 million ouguiyas, consists of reducing another person to slavery, or inciting said person to relinquish her or his freedom or dignity or that of a dependent person or a person under her or his guardianship to be reduced to slavery (section 4). Sections 5–13 define and penalize the various offences of slavery. The Committee notes in particular that these offences include "any person who appropriates the goods, products and earnings resulting from the labour of any person claimed to be a slave or who forcibly takes that person's monies shall be punished by a sentence of imprisonment of from six months to two years and fine of from 50,000 to 200,000 ouguiyas". Offences of slavery also include prejudicing the physical integrity of a person claimed to be a slave and denying a child claimed to be a slave access to education. The Committee further notes with interest that the Walis, Hakems, local chiefs and officers of the criminal investigation police who do not follow up denunciations of slave-like practices that come to their knowledge, shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment and a fine (section 12). Finally, human rights associations are empowered to denounce violations of the Act and to assist victims, with the latter benefiting from free court proceedings (section 15).

(b) Effective application of the legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the national jurisdictions had never previously examined allegations relating to practices of forced labour or slavery and that victims encountered difficulties in being heard and in asserting their rights, both at the level of the public authorities and the judicial authorities. It noted, on the one hand, the instructions issued by the Minister of the Interior to Walis, Hakems and local chiefs to enforce the law, deal with cases which come to their knowledge with the required rigour and bring cases that lie within their competence to justice; and, on the other hand, the instructions given by the Minister of Justice to the prosecution services to make on-the-spot investigations when an allegation relating to the vestiges of slavery is brought to their knowledge and to investigate it.

The Committee considers that the Act criminalizing and penalizing slave-like practices, as it defines precisely the elements which constitute the crime and the offences of slavery, will be easier for the investigatory and judicial authorities to apply. The Committee considers that it is indispensable for this Act to be the subject of broad publicity among these authorities, as well as the population in general. It is essential that both the victims and those responsible for these practices realize that the climate has changed. The Committee notes in this respect that the Government refers in its report to the “mobilization of all official and private media with a view to demystifying this problem and raising the awareness of populations as to the gravity of slave-like practices and the obstacle that it constitutes to national cohesion and the socio-economic development of the country”.

The Committee requests the Government to take steps to publicize the new provisions of the legislation so as to promote an understanding of the criminal nature and consequences of engaging in slavery and its vestiges. Such awareness is required to be disseminated to public authorities as well as the public in general. The Committee asks that the Government inform in its next report of the actions taken.

The Committee recalls that, under Article 25 of the Convention, States which ratify the Convention are under the obligation to ensure that the penalties imposed by the law for the exaction of forced labour are really adequate and are strictly enforced. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, on the one hand, victims receive appropriate protection in order to encourage them to approach the police and judicial authorities to assert their rights and, on the other, that investigations are conducted in a rapid, effective and impartial manner; the provisions of the Act addressing assistance to victims and those allowing the prosecution of authorities which do not follow up on denunciations of slave-like practices that are brought to their knowledge will undoubtedly contribute to the achievement of this objective. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on any court decision handed down under the Act criminalizing slavery and slave-like practices. Whilst the Government has taken an important first step in combating slavery by the adoption of legislation, the challenge is now to implement the legislation by ensuring that those responsible for the continuation of slavery are appropriately convicted and that dissuasive penalties are applied.

(c) National strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery. The Committee noted previously that the Council of Ministers adopted in July 2006 the principle of the formulation, in the context of a participatory approach, of a national strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery, and that an inter-ministerial committee was established for this purpose in October 2006. It requested the Government to provide detailed information on the adoption and implementation of this strategy. In its last report, the Government does not specify whether the strategy has in practice been adopted. The Committee however notes the Government’s indication that it will endeavour to find the means and machinery to address the vestiges of slavery through a national plan determining objectives in accordance with the priorities defined and encompassing the state sectors concerned (education, justice, communication, agriculture, water, youth and sports). The plan will be evaluated regularly until such time as those suffering the vestiges of the phenomenon catch up with the general level of construction, equality and justice. The Government refers to the implementation of a voluntarist national policy involving all Mauritians and rejecting exclusion by giving priority to the most underprivileged and vulnerable citizens, with a view to their integration into active life. The Government refers in this respect to the need to promote and support the emergence of income-generating activities for persons who are vulnerable and have been the victims of the vestiges of slavery, and to facilitate the access of the poorest and most vulnerable to vocational training so as to improve their employability. It also refers to the promotion in poor rural agglomerations of basic infrastructure construction (dams, schools, wells) so as to address their essential problems more effectively.

The Committee notes this information. It would be grateful if the Government would indicate whether a national strategy to combat the vestiges of slavery or a national plan of action have been adopted in practice and, if so, to provide a copy, and asks it to indicate the activities undertaken by the inter-ministerial committee established for this purpose. The Committee also requests the Government to provide more detailed information on the tangible measures that have been adopted and that it intends to take in the context of the strategy or national plan that is adopted. In this respect, it is important for all the actors called upon to play a role in combating slavery and its vestiges, including the police and the forces of order, the judiciary, the labour inspectorate and civil society, including the National Human Rights Commission and the religious authorities, to be stakeholders in this strategy, and for the need to be taken into account to undertake awareness-raising activities at the national, regional and local levels targeting all of the stakeholders referred to above. The Committee would be grateful if the Government would indicate the manner in which programmes to combat poverty specifically target communities in which the phenomenon of slavery and its vestiges is known and persists with a view to preventing these vulnerable persons from once again becoming victims of these practices.

Finally, in the same way as the fact-finding mission, the Committee emphasized previously that it is important to have available reliable information as a basis for assessing the scope of the phenomenon of slavery and its characteristics. It hoped that the Government would be able to conduct a study to offer better guidance for the action that has to be taken by the public authorities and to target the populations and geographical areas concerned. The Committee notes that the UNDP and the European Commission have agreed to mobilize financing to undertake this study and have proposed terms of reference to the Government, in consultation with the Office, which is making its technical assistance available to the Government. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any development in this respect.

Republic of Moldova

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1993)

Article 1(b) of the Convention. Mobilizing of labour for purposes of economic development. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted a communication received in February 2004 from the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Republic of Moldova (CSRM), which contains observations concerning the application of the forced labour Conventions Nos 105 and 29, ratified by the Republic of Moldova. The CSRM referred, in particular, to certain provisions of the Law on mobilization, No. 1192-XV of 4 July 2002, the Law on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest, No. 1352-XV of 11 October 2002, and the government decision to approve regulations on the mobilization at the workplace, No. 751 of 24 June 2003, under which the central and local authorities, as well as military bodies, can exact compulsory labour from the population under certain conditions as a means of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of the development of the national economy. Thus, section 3(b) of the Law on the requisitioning of goods and services in the public interest referred to above stipulates that one of the aims of such requisitioning is to create conditions for the good functioning of the national economy and public institutions.

The Committee recalls that Article 1(b) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour “as a method of mobilizing and using labour for purposes of economic development” and expresses the hope that the Government will provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or envisaged in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Myanmar

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1955)

Historical background

1. In previous comments the Committee has drawn attention to gross breaches of the Convention by the Government of Myanmar and the failure by the Government to implement the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry, appointed by the Governing Body in March 1997.

2. The Commission of Inquiry, appointed in 1997 under article 26 of the Constitution, concluded that the Convention was violated in national law and in practice in a widespread and systematic manner, and made the following recommendations:

- (1) that the relevant legislative texts, in particular the Village Act and the Towns Act, be brought into line with the Convention;
- (2) that in actual practice, no more forced or compulsory labour be imposed by the authorities, in particular the military; and
- (3) that the penalties which may be imposed under section 374 of the Penal Code for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour be strictly enforced.

The Commission of Inquiry emphasized that, besides amending the legislation, concrete action needed to be taken immediately to bring an end to the exaction of forced labour in practice, in particular by the military.

3. The continued failure of the Government to comply with those recommendations and the observations of the Committee of Experts as well as other matters arising from the discussion in the other bodies of the ILO, led to the unprecedented exercise of article 33 of the Constitution by the Governing Body at its 277th Session in March 2000, followed by the adoption of a resolution by the Conference at its June 2000 session. The detailed history of this extremely serious case has been set out at length in previous observations of this Committee in recent years.

4. Each of the ILO bodies, in discussing this case, had focused attention on the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee of Experts has in its previous observations identified four areas in which measures should be taken by the Government to achieve those recommendations. Specifically, the Committee indicated the following measures:

- issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities;
- ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity;
- providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour; and
- ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour.

Developments since the Committee's last observation

5. There has been a number of discussions and conclusions by ILO bodies and also further documentation received which the Committee has considered in the course of making this observation. In particular the Committee notes:

- the discussions and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards during the 96th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2007;
- the documents submitted to the Governing Body at its 298th and 300th Sessions (March and November 2007) as well as the discussions and conclusions of the Governing Body during the sessions;
- the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication received on 31 August 2007 together with the detailed appendices of some 740 pages;
- the reports of the Government of Myanmar received on 17 and 20 August, 10 September and 12 and 23 October as well as 3 December 2007; and
- the Supplementary Understanding (SU) of 26 February 2007 to the earlier Understanding of 19 March 2003 concerning the appointment of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar.

The Supplementary Understanding of 26 February 2007

6. The Committee notes at this point that the SU is a very important development and its significance is discussed in greater detail towards the end of this observation. It is important for the SU to be viewed in the context of the other documentation, discussions and conclusions referred to above.

7. The SU concerns the appointment and role of an ILO Liaison Officer in Myanmar, and was concluded after long negotiations between the ILO and the Government of Myanmar. The SU provides for a new complaints mechanism to be established and put into operation, and has as its prime object "to formally offer the possibility to victims of forced labour to channel their complaints through the services of the Liaison Officer to the competent authorities with a view to seeking remedies available under the relevant legislation". The mechanism was to be implemented on a trial basis over a period of 12 months and could thereafter be extended by mutual agreement (GB.298/5/1, appendix).

8. The role of the Liaison Officer in the context of the SU and the impact of his work in the circumstances in which he was required to perform it in the country, was a major subject of later discussion in ILO bodies.

Discussion and conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards

9. The conclusion of the Conference Committee during the 96th Session in June 2007, was that, whilst the complaints mechanism set up under the SU was continuing to function, it had to be assessed against the ultimate goal of eliminating forced labour.

10. In this connection, the Committee notes that the Committee on the Application of Standards in its conclusions in June 2007 (ILC, 96th Session, Provisional Record No. 22, Part 3) "observed that the mechanism had to be assessed against the ultimate goal of eliminating forced labour, and it remained to be seen what the impact would be"; and that the recent documentation submitted to the Governing Body stated that "it is both physically and financially very difficult for victims of forced labour or their relatives to lodge a complaint if they live outside Yangon" noting that "informal networks have been developed" which "although valuable ... do not necessarily extend to all parts of the country" (GB.300/8, paragraph 9). The Committee also notes from the documentation that "regarding the mechanism set up by the Supplementary Understanding, it is not possible today to say to what extent it is fully functional after the civil unrest and its suppression, and thus to what extent experiences from it can be built upon" (GB.300/8, Add, paragraph 9).

Discussions in the Governing Body

11. The Committee notes that the reports to the Governing Body at its 300th Session in November 2007 regarding the progress of the complaints mechanism indicated that as of 7 November 2007, the Liaison Officer had received 56 complaints (GB.300/8 (Add.), paragraph 3). Of those complaints, 19 were assessed as falling outside the mandate of the Liaison Officer and 24 were formally submitted for investigation and appropriate action to the Deputy Minister of Labour in his capacity as Chairman of the Government Working Group on Forced Labour. Four complaints were closed after being assessed as having an insufficient basis to proceed, and nine complaints were still being processed or could not proceed until further information was received from the complainants (GB. 300/8, paragraph 5 and GB.300/8 (Add.), paragraph 5).

12. In addition, the Governing Body called upon the Government to ensure that the mechanism provided by the SU remained fully functional with no further detention or harassment of complainants, facilitators or others, and that it should be fully applied to the military authorities. It considered that full attention should also be given to preventing the recruitment of child soldiers (paragraph 5). Importantly, the Governing Body also called for the putting into place of an appropriate network towards ensuring that the nationwide application of the SU, including in the combat zones, and to ensure that forced labour victims are able to easily access the complaints mechanism (paragraph 6).

Communication received from the International Trade Union Confederation

13. The Committee notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) in a communication received on 31 August 2007. Appended to this communication were 45 documents, amounting to more than 740 pages, containing extensive and detailed documentation referring to forced labour practices on the part of civil and military authorities. In many cases, the documentation refers to specific dates, detailed locations and circumstances, and specific civil bodies, military units and individual officials. The documentation covers a broad area of the country (including many parts of Chin, Kayah, Kayin, southern Mon, northern Rakhine and Shan States, and of Ayeyarwady, Bago, Mandalay and Tanintharyi Divisions) during the period from the second half of 2006 through the first half of 2007. The incidents referred to involve the alleged requisition of labour for the full range of tasks identified by the Commission of Inquiry:

- portering for the military (or other military/paramilitary groups, for military campaigns or regular patrols);
- construction or repair of military camps/facilities;
- other support for camps (guides, messengers, cooks, cleaners, etc.);
- income-generation by individuals or groups (including work in army-owned agricultural and industrial projects);
- various infrastructure projects; and
- cleaning/beautification of rural or urban areas.

14. The documentation includes copies of 145 written orders apparently from military and other authorities to villages in Kayin State, containing a range of demands entailing in most cases a requirement for (uncompensated) labour. It also includes photographs purporting to show people in Mon State being forced to work on military development projects, as detailed in an accompanying report. It further includes a video in which five men state that they were forced to work for the Myanmar army since April 2007 as porters, sentries, carrying out construction projects, building fences and doing various tasks in army camps, as well as being forced to provide ox carts and tractors to the army. A copy of the ITUC's communication and its annexes was transmitted to the Government for such comments as it may wish to provide.

The Government reports

15. The Committee notes the Government's reports received on 17 and 20 August, 10 September, 12 and 23 October, and 3 December 2007. These reports make reference to information contained in a communication from the ITUC to the Committee dated 31 August 2006 that was forwarded to the Government and to which reference was made in the Committee's previous observation. The Government has not responded in detail to the information contained in the ITUC's communication, except to state its view that "most of the issues raised by the [ITUC] are totally groundless" and to note that such cases "would be covered by the mechanism to deal with the forced labour complaints under the Supplementary Understanding" agreed between the ILO and Myanmar on 26 February 2007.

16. The Committee must point out that agreement on the Supplementary Understanding and the establishment of the complaint mechanism provided for thereunder, in no way relieves the Government of its obligation under the Convention to suppress the use of forced labour. Rather, they are a means to assist the Government in meeting this obligation through the full implementation of the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry.

17. The Committee requests the Government to respond in detail in its next report to the numerous specific allegations contained in the most recent communication from the ITUC as well as that of the previous year.

Assessment of the situation

Issuing specific and concrete instructions to the civilian and military authorities

18. The Committee notes that in its report the Government has again referred to a series of letters, directives, telegrams and rules issued by various civil and military authorities relating to the Orders prohibiting forced labour. However, as noted in its previous observation, since the Government has supplied minimal details of the content of these instructions, and given that all the indications suggest that the imposition of forced labour continues to be widespread, the Committee is yet to be convinced that clear instructions have been effectively conveyed to all civil authorities and military units. The Committee reinforces the need for appropriate publicity to be given to these Orders.

19. The Committee must also emphasize that, even if the Orders provide a statutory basis in practice for ensuring compliance with the Convention, this still falls far short of the formal repeal of the provisions of the relevant legislation requested by the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to amend these provisions as soon as possible, something it has been promising to do for 40 years. The Committee also hopes that the Government will take advantage of the opportunity to bring constitutional clarity to the prohibition of forced labour.

Ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity

20. In relation to ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is given wide publicity, the Committee refers to its comment above. The Committee also notes the agreement on 26 February 2007 of a Supplementary Understanding between the ILO and the Government, which is a welcome development. The mechanism that it establishes to deal with complaints of forced labour provides an opportunity to the authorities to demonstrate that continued recourse to the practice is illegal and will be punished as a penal offence, as required by the Convention. The fact that Order No. 1/99 as supplemented by the Order of 27 October 2000, has been used as a legal basis for criminal convictions of government officials for exacting forced labour, is in line with the Committee's conclusion in its observation published in 2001, that these Orders "could provide a statutory basis for ensuring compliance with the Convention in practice, if given bona fide effect not only by the local authorities empowered to requisition labour under the Village and Towns Acts, but also by civilian and military officers entitled to call on the assistance of local authorities under the Acts".

21. The Committee also notes that some publicity has been given to the signing of the Supplementary Understanding and to the subsequent prosecutions of two officials for imposing forced labour (a press release on 26 February 2007; a press conference by the Director-General of the Department of Labour on 26 March 2007; and an article on the prosecutions in the New Light of Myanmar on 31 March 2007). The Committee also notes from the report submitted to the 300th Session of the Governing Body that the Government "has undertaken widespread training for administrators to raise awareness of the law and to explain the Supplementary Understanding procedure", that "a further round of such training on a joint ILO/Ministry of Labour basis has been discussed" and that "the Government has drafted a booklet entitled Eradication of forced labour – Educational Paper No. 1", consultations on the content and format of which are continuing prior to its dissemination throughout the administration (GB.300/8, paragraph 8).

22. The Committee considers that such publicity is vital in ensuring that the prohibition of forced labour is widely known and applied in practice, and should continue and be expanded. The Committee shares the view of the Governing Body that "an unambiguous public statement that all forms of forced labour are prohibited throughout the country and will be duly punished" from the Government of Myanmar "at the highest level" (GB.300/8, conclusions) would be extremely valuable.

Providing for the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour

23. In this regard, the Committee stresses the importance of its request, made regularly in previous observations and underlined in the recent conclusions of the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards, that specific instructions be issued to all military units making clear the prohibition of forced labour and the fact that this will be strictly enforced. This requires the budgeting of adequate means for the replacement of forced labour, which tends also to be unpaid, are necessary if recourse to the practice is to end.

24. Similarly, the Committee notes that the Government's report of 17 August 2007 states that it provides a budget allotment including labour costs "for all Ministries to implement their respective projects" and that a signed statement from the Ministry of Construction indicating the sum in question is provided in an annex to the report. Again, the Committee fails to understand, if adequate resources really are provided to civil and military authorities, why it is that recourse to unpaid forced labour apparently remains widespread, particularly by the military and by local civil administrations. The Committee repeats its earlier request that the Government, in its next report, provide detailed information about the measures taken to budget for adequate means for the replacement of forced or unpaid labour.

Ensuring the enforcement of the prohibition of forced labour

25. The Committee is bound to express its concern that, as stated in the reports submitted by the Office to the Governing Body referred to above, and in the information provided by the Government, that out of 24 complaints (as of 7 November) forwarded by the Liaison Officer to the authorities for investigation and appropriate action, only one case has so far resulted in the prosecution of those responsible (Case No. 001, which led to the prosecution of two civilian officials). A number of other cases have led to administrative action against civilian officials (for example, dismissals or warnings for the officials concerned). Although seven of the cases forwarded to the authorities by the Liaison Officer involved allegations against military personnel (for forced recruitment of children into the army, and imposition of forced labour against villagers), there are so far no indications that any action, criminal or even administrative, has been taken against any military personnel. The Committee notes the recent information provided by the Government on 3 December 2007 that it has taken concrete measures to prevent recruitment of children into the military by setting up a central committee and working committees, with follow-up workshops.

26. The Committee notes the information from the Liaison Officer that the Government Working Group "appears to be more successful in achieving prompt and constructive outcomes in cases associated with civil administrations. It is more difficult to obtain timely and appropriate responses on complaints involving the military" (GB.300/8, paragraph 6).

The Committee indicates that this is all the more concerning, as it has previously observed that forced labour is a particular problem in areas of the country with a heavy presence of the army.

27. The Committee reemphasizes that the illegal exaction of forced labour must continue to be punished as a penal offence, rather than an administrative issue, as required by Art. 25 of the Convention. While taking account of the measures to be taken by the Government regarding recruitment of children, it is also essential that the legal penalties be strictly enforced in cases involving military personnel, including in cases of forced recruitment of children into the armed forces.

Conclusion

28. The Committee considers that there are obvious constraints and limits on the contribution that the complaint mechanism can make to the eradication of forced labour. This is due to structural limitations on the mechanism and is magnified by the uncertainties of the present situation in the country. The mechanism can certainly provide welcome relief to individual victims by offering an objective and safe channel for complaints to be raised and addressed, and beyond this it can send a powerful signal to potential perpetrators that they are not free to act with impunity. However, the mechanism is not obviously well-suited to dealing with some of the more extreme and widespread violations in remote areas, of the kind referred to in the documentation submitted by the ITUC.

29. More fundamentally, the complaint mechanism, whilst valuable, does not address the root causes of the forced labour problem that were identified by the Commission of Inquiry and by the High-level Team (see GB.282/4). Namely, it does not address the basic governance relationships prevailing in the country, the role of the army and its self-reliance policy, and the absence of freedom of association and, more generally, freedom of assembly, which recent events have served to graphically illustrate. The prevailing situation in Myanmar, ten years after the establishment of the Commission of Inquiry, seems to provide sad support to the perception that addressing these root causes remains indispensable.

30. In the light of this, the Committee believes that the only way that genuine and lasting progress in the elimination of forced labour can be made is for the Myanmar authorities to demonstrate unambiguously their commitment to achieving that goal. This requires, beyond the agreement of the Supplementary Understanding, that the authorities establish the necessary conditions for the successful functioning of the complaint mechanism, and that they take the long overdue steps to repeal the relevant provisions of domestic legislation and adopt the appropriate legislative and regulatory framework to give effect to the recommendations of the Commission of Inquiry. The Committee remains hopeful that, having agreed the Supplementary Understanding, the Government will finally take the required steps to achieve compliance with the Convention in law and in practice and resolve one of the most serious and long-standing cases that this Committee has ever had to address.

Niger

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Slavery and slave-like practices. The persistence of slavery in Niger was one of the matters examined by the Committee in its previous observation and by the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2004 (92nd Session). In its previous comments, the Committee referred to observations from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – and to the study carried out in 2001 under the auspices of the ILO on the identification of obstacles to the implementation of fundamental principles and rights at work and proposed solutions in Niger, validated by the Government and the social partners. The Committee observed that in Niger, there was an archaic form of slavery found in nomadic communities and that slave status was still transmitted by birth to persons from certain ethnic groups. The slave is placed at the disposal of the master without charge or in exchange for payment. The relations between master and slave are based on direct exploitation. Slaves work for their masters without remuneration, largely as shepherds, agricultural workers or domestic employees. The Committee noted that the Government acknowledged that slavery had not been totally eradicated and that numerous actions had been undertaken to combat the forced labour of persons reduced to slavery. In terms of legislation, Act No. 2003-025 of 13 June 2003 amended the Penal Code by introducing a section on slavery. A prison term of ten to 30 years and a fine are imposed for reducing someone to slavery or for incitement to relinquish one's liberty or dignity or that of a dependent person in order to become a slave. Slavery offences are likewise defined and punished. Furthermore, associations established for the purpose of combating slavery or similar practices may sue for damages in the civil courts in redress for breaches of the Criminal Slavery Act (section 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code). As to awareness raising, campaigns have been carried out, targeting traditional chiefs in particular. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken to assess the extent of slavery in Niger, the programmes or measures implemented specifically for former slaves or descendants of slaves, and the number of persons prosecuted, sentenced and punished for exacting forced labour from persons reduced to slavery.

The Committee notes that in its report for 2005, the Government states that there have been no convictions by the courts as there were no complaints filed by victims. In a later communication, and in response to the ICFTU's observations, the Government again stated that it did not deny that slave-like practices still existed in certain parts of the country and that, on the contrary, it had always treated this as a matter of concern and taken appropriate initiatives. The Government referred in particular to circulars from the Prime Minister addressed in 2004 and 2005 to the Minister of the Interior following the adoption of the 2003 Act criminalizing slavery and asking him to meet with administrative heads, and religious and traditional chiefs to draw their attention to the pressing need to comply with the law and put an end to all forms of slave-like practices. The Government stated that in the context of cooperation with the Office, a project was to be launched to prevent the persistence of forced labour and similar practices, in the course of which a study might be conducted with a view to gaining more knowledge about the nature and extent of the phenomenon and identifying target groups, and a national action plan against forced labour might be set up.

The Committee notes with interest that since then, a National Committee to Combat Forced Labour and Discrimination was established (Order No. 0933/MFP/T of 4 August 2006) and officially set up in November 2006. Its terms of reference include preventing the persistence of forced labour and combating discrimination through measures to reduce poverty in target areas; preparing a national action plan in this field on the basis of an in-depth diagnostic study; ensuring monitoring of the national action plan. The Committee notes that the abovementioned committee has already met several times and has support from the Office through the Special Action Programme to combat forced labour (SAP-FL) and in particular the support project for combating forced labour and discrimination in Niger (PACTRAD), which have been associated with the above committee's meetings. At its meeting of October 2007, the said committee finalized a plan against the persistence of forced labour and discrimination which is to be submitted to the Government for adoption. The Committee also notes that at the request of the National Committee, the Office is lending its support for a statistical study on child labour and the consequences of slavery, which will be conducted by the National Statistics Institute.

The Committee takes note of all this information. It hopes that the Government will continue to take all necessary steps to ensure that the National Action Plan is adopted promptly and that the study on the persistence of forced labour is conducted at the earliest possible date. In the Committee's view, it is essential that the Government should have access to reliable quantitative and qualitative data on the various forms of slavery and their consequences, so as to target both the measures to be taken and the beneficiary groups. It hopes that the national action plan will provide for measures to publicize the Act of 2003 incorporating into the Penal Code (sections 270-1 to 270-5) the provisions criminalizing slavery, and for measures to raise the awareness of the population and those involved in combating slavery, particularly religious and traditional chiefs, criminal police officers and magistrates. It would also be appropriate for the action plan to include activities or programmes specifically aimed at former slaves or descendants of slaves to ensure that they have sufficient means of subsistence not to fall back into a situation of dependency and hence exposure to exploitation of their labour.

Lastly, the Committee points out that under Article 25 of the Convention, the Government must ensure that the penal sanctions imposed by law are really adequate and strictly enforced. It asks the Government to indicate whether there have been any court decisions based on sections 270-1 to 270-5 of the Penal Code and, if so, to provide a copy of them. The Committee stresses that it is essential that the perpetrators of slavery offences be prosecuted and, if appropriate, sentenced. It hopes that the Government will take all measures available to it for this purpose and will ensure that the victims are effectively in a position to go to the police and judicial authorities to assert their rights.

Nigeria

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation on the following matters:

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing views opposed to the established system. 1. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Public Order Decree No. 5 of 1979, which contained provisions under which public assemblies, meetings and processions on public roads or places of public resort must be previously authorized and may be subject to certain restrictions enforceable with sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to work). The Committee notes that the Public Order Act, Cap. 382, Laws of the Federation of Nigeria, 1990, supplied by the Government with its report, imposes similar restrictions on the organization of public assemblies, meetings and processions (sections 1 to 4), offences being punishable with imprisonment (sections 3 and 4(5)).

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. It refers in this connection to paragraph 154 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, where it observed that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence; but sanctions involving compulsory labour fall within the scope of the Convention where they enforce a prohibition of the peaceful expression of views or of opposition to the established political, social or economic system. Since opinions and views opposed to the established system are often expressed at various kinds of meetings and assemblies, restrictions affecting the organization of such meetings and assemblies may give rise to similar problems of the application of the Convention, if such restrictions are enforceable with penalties involving compulsory labour.

The Committee therefore hopes that the necessary measures will be taken in order to bring the provisions of the Public Order Act into conformity with the Convention. While noting the Government's indication in the report that there is no record of the violation of the provisions of the Act, the Committee asks that, pending the amendment, the Government will provide information on its application in practice, including information on convictions for violation of its provisions and on penalties imposed.

2. The Committee previously referred to the Nigerian Press Council (Amendment) Act, 2002, which imposes certain restrictions on journalists' activities enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (section 19(1) and (5)(a)), which involves an obligation to work. While noting the Government's indication in the report that no journalist has been convicted under this Act, and referring also to the explanations in point 1 of this observation, the Committee reiterates its hope that measures will be taken to repeal or amend these provisions in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. Pending the amendment, the Government is requested to provide information on the application of these provisions in practice, indicating, in particular, any convictions under the above Act and penalties imposed.

3. The Committee previously noted the Government's indication that the Human Rights Violations Investigation Panel, established in 1999, has concluded its assignment and forwarded the report to the federal Government, which was supposed to release a white paper on it. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would supply copies of the Panel's report and the white paper, as soon as they are released.

Article 1(c) and (d). Punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes. In its earlier comments the Committee referred to the following provisions: section 81(1)(b) and (c) of the Labour Decree, 1974, under which a court may direct fulfilment of a contract of employment and posting of security for the due performance of so much of the contract as remains unperformed, and a person failing to comply with such direction may be committed to prison; section 117(b), (c) and (e) of the Merchant Shipping Act, under which seafarers are liable to imprisonment involving an obligation to work for breaches of labour discipline even in the absence of a danger to the safety of the ship or of persons; section 17(2)(a) of the Trade Disputes Act, Cap. 432, of 1990, under which participation in strikes may be punished with imprisonment involving an obligation to work in certain cases.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indications that all these provisions were under consideration by the National Labour Advisory Council. The Government states in its latest report that the review of the labour laws has been completed and submitted to the federal Government for further action. The Committee trusts that the legislative provisions referred to above will be amended in the near future and that the legislation will be brought into conformity with the Convention. It asks the Government to indicate, in its next report, the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Pakistan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

The Committee has noted the following communications received from the organizations of workers, which contain observations concerning the application of the Convention by Pakistan: communications dated 31 August and 19 September 2006 received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (now – the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC)), communication dated 30 March 2007 received from the All Pakistan Federation of United Trade Unions (APFUTU) and communication dated 2 May 2007 received from the Pakistan Workers Federation (PWF). The Committee notes that the above communications were sent to the Government, in September and October 2006 and in May and June 2007, for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. It hopes that the Government's comments will be supplied in its next report, so as to enable the Committee to examine them at its next session.

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

I. Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention

A. Debt bondage

1. In its earlier comments, the Committee noted the difficulties in the implementation of the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act (BLSA), 1992. The Committee notes the communications from the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU) and the All Pakistan Trade Union Federation (APTUF) dated 26 April 2005 and 14 May 2005, respectively, which contain comments on the observance of the Convention and which were forwarded to the Government in June and July 2005 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. Among other things, the APTUF observed that the BLSA was not being implemented, and the APTUF similarly observed that laws, including those concerning bonded labour, were not being enforced due to the absence of adequate labour inspection machinery. Since no comments from the Government on these communications have been received to date, the Committee hopes the Government will provide them in its next report.

2. The Committee notes the National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers of 2001, which the Government communicated in its latest report. The Committee notes that under the plan of action, a National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour was to be established to coordinate the implementation of the plan, with the specific functions of:

- reviewing the implementation of the BLSA and of the action plan;
- monitoring the work of the district-level vigilance committees set up under section 15 of the BLSA and the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Rules, 1995; and
- addressing concerns of national and international bodies on bonded and forced labour issues.

The Committee notes the statement by the Ministry of Labour in its 2005 draft Labour Protection Policy, that the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action "clearly establishes the intentions and commitment of Government to implement in full" the Convention. The Committee further notes, however, the statement of the Ministry of Labour in its document, "Labour Policy, 2002", dated 23 September 2002, that the targets and activities set out in the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action "need to be actively implemented".

Implementation of National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour. 3. The Committee notes that in its latest report the Government specifies recent initiatives against bonded labour it is taking or contemplating, apparently within the framework of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, including:

- establishment of a Legal Aid Service Unit in the Labour Departments of Punjab and NWFP with a toll free help line to provide legal advice and assistance to needy bonded labourers, with a plan envisaged to hire legal experts to provide legal assistance;
- launching a scheme to construct low-cost housing for freed bonded labour families in the agricultural sector of Sindh, which will provide shelter to these families and contribute to their rehabilitation;
- organizing training workshops for key district government officials and other concerned stakeholders to enhance their capacity and enable them to draw up district-level plans to identify bonded labourers and activate the district vigilance committees; and
- incorporating the issue of bonded labour into the syllabi of judicial, police and civil service academies, in order to help sensitize judicial, law enforcement, and civil service officials to the problem, and holding capacity-building seminars.

4. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, under the BLSA, inspection functions in the area of bonded labour have been assigned to the regular labour inspectorate, as well as to local government heads/officials and police departments. The Committee also notes from the 2001 action plan document, that the fund mandated by the BLSA Rules had been established and an initial deposit of 100 million rupees had been made. The Government, in its report received in January 2005 (on the application of the Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105)), indicates that work has started on making the Bonded Labour Fund functional, and that a project manual was being prepared to provide guidelines to executing agencies for preparing project proposals for financing.

5. While recognizing these Government initiatives to try and combat bonded labour, the Committee hopes that necessary measures are being taken or envisaged to ensure the effective implementation of the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action for the Abolition of Bonded Labour and Rehabilitation of Freed Bonded Labourers. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will provide detailed information on progress made and practical results achieved, including copies of relevant reports on all of the activities, projects, institutions and mandates referred to in the action plan. The Committee further asks that the Government provide information clarifying the present status of the district vigilance committees as well as their role in, and relationship to, the labour inspection process, and that it supply information about actions that both the district magistrates and vigilance committees are taking to ensure the effective implementation of the BLSA and the fulfilment of their other functions as mandated under the BLSA and the 1995 rules, such information to include copies of monitoring/evaluation reports prepared by the National Committee for the Abolition and Rehabilitation of Bonded Labour.

Special programme of action to combat forced/bonded labour. 6. The Committee in its report (on the application of Convention No. 105), received in January 2005, the Government indicates that since mid-2002 it has been carrying out a special Programme of Action to Combat Forced/Bonded Labour with technical assistance from the ILO. The Government indicates that under the programme the ILO was, among other things, to provide training on human rights and bonded labour concerns to the District Nazims, members of the vigilance committees, and judicial and law enforcement officials; to assist the Government in developing partnerships with stakeholders, employers, and workers; to provide advice on the creation of a high-level national body to combat forced labour; and to assist it in launching demonstration projects to test the feasibility of approaches adopted to tackle the problem. The Committee asks that, in its next report, the Government provide more detailed and comprehensive information concerning this programme and its implementation, including copies of the most recent reports evaluating programme activities and outcomes.

Debt bondage: Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem. 7. The Committee notes that under the 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action a national survey to ascertain the extent of bonded labour was to have been undertaken by January 2002, yet it notes the Government's indication in its latest report that no such quantitative survey has yet been carried out to measure the quantum of the problem in the country.

8. The Committee notes a 2004 report of an initiative of the Ministry of Labour and the ILO, entitled "Rapid Assessment Studies of Bonded Labour in Different Sectors in Pakistan", which contains findings and conclusions from a series of rapid assessment studies conducted from October 2002 to January 2003 by teams of social scientists and researchers under the auspices of the Bonded Labour Research Forum (BLRF), the aim of which was to explore the existence and nature of bonded labour in ten sectors – namely, agriculture, construction, carpet weaving, brick making, marine fisheries, mining, glass bangles, tanneries, domestic work, and begging – and to seek preliminary conclusions. The project represented the first phase of a larger research programme and was intended to lay the groundwork for detailed sector studies and a national survey to determine the incidence of bonded labour across the country, as foreseen in the Government's National Plan of Action. The rapid assessment studies focused primarily on debt bondage but also explored other forms of bonded and forced labour without debt.

9. The Committee notes the conclusion in the report that the findings in "the sectors covered ... yield fresh insights into the workings of the peshgi (advance payments) system and its possible relationship with bonded labour and other coercive labour arrangements". The correlation was found to be "relatively weak" in some sectors but present in others. The report also emphasizes the findings that there exist "other forms of labour bonding and coercion ... not clearly associated with the peshgi system".

10. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government, as a follow-up to the preliminary part of the research programme noted above and in accordance with the mandate of its 2001 National Policy and Plan of Action, will undertake a statistical survey on bonded labour throughout the country, using a valid methodology in cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations and with human rights organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Bonded labour in agriculture. 11. In its previous observation, the Committee noted the Government's view that there are built-in deficiencies in its labour laws on dealing with labour engaged in the agricultural sector. The Committee asks once again that the Government supply further information on the issue, as well as information on measures taken or envisaged to remedy the situation, in the context of the eradication of bonded labour in agriculture.

Bonded child labour. 12. In its earlier comments, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on progress on the implementation of the agreement between the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (IPEC) of the ILO and the Pakistan Carpet Manufacturers' and Exporters' Association (PCMEA), and the agreement signed by the Government in 1997 with the European Commission and the ILO to take measures aimed at the eradication of bonded child labour. With regard to this point and the problem of bonded child labour in general, the Committee notes that the Government has ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). In so far as Article 3(a) of Convention No. 182 provides that, the worst forms of child labour include “all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour”, the Committee is of the view that this problem can be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182. The protection of children is enhanced by the fact that Convention No. 182 requires states which ratify it to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to refer to its comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

B. Trafficking in persons

13. The Committee notes with interest the promulgation of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), which entered into force in October 2002. Among other things, the ordinance criminalizes “human trafficking”, which it defines, in part, as trafficking that entails the use of coercion for the purpose of attaining any benefit or for the purpose of exploitative entertainment, slavery or forced labour (sections 2(h) and 3); makes trafficking offences punishable by sanctions involving sentences of imprisonment of up to seven years and, in cases of trafficking of women, of up to ten years, as well as fines (section 3); provides for special sentences for trafficking offences committed by organized criminal groups (section 4) and for repeated offences (section 5); provides for the payment of compensation and expenses to victims (section 6); and makes trafficking in persons cognizable by the courts as a prosecutable offence (sections 8 and 10). The Committee asks that in its next report the Government supply a copy of the most recent rules and regulations that have been promulgated to implement the PCHTO.

Trafficking in persons. Data-gathering measures to ascertain the current nature and scope of the problem. 14. The Committee notes the 2005 report of the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) entitled, “Data and research on human trafficking: A global survey”, which indicates that Pakistan continues to be a major destination country for trafficked women as well as a major transit country of persons trafficked from Bangladesh to Middle Eastern countries, where women are exploited for sexual exploitation. The report indicates that men are seldom viewed as “victims of trafficking” and more often in the context of irregular migration, and that this shortcoming has limited the availability of knowledge and data on trafficking in men in South Asia. The report emphasizes that, while available studies contribute to an understanding of the causes, sources, destinations, and consequences of trafficking, current statistics on trafficking in persons are outdated or anecdotal, and there is an urgent need to carry out comprehensive national baseline surveys with the aim of developing a South Asian database on trafficking in persons. In light of these indications, the Committee hopes that the Government will undertake a national baseline survey on trafficking in persons, in cooperation with employers’ and workers’ organizations as well as other societal organizations and institutions, and that it will supply information on the progress achieved in this connection.

Practical measures aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons. 15. The Committee notes with interest the information concerning the Government’s collaboration with the IOM in an action programme on migration issues which includes, as a significant component, the problem of trafficking in persons. The Committee notes that, at the 12th Summit of the South Asian Association for Regional Cooperation (SAARC) in Islamabad in January 2004, the Government agreed to the Islamabad Declaration, which among other things calls on member States to “move towards an early ratification” of the SAARC Convention on Preventing and Combating Trafficking in Women and Children for Prostitution, adopted in 2002 (paragraph 19). The Committee also notes that in May 2005, representatives of the Government and other participants at the Fifth South Asia Ministerial Conference adopted the “Islamabad Declaration: Review and Future Action”, in which, among other things, they “recognize the gaps and challenges in implementation” in a number of areas, including an inadequate commitment, awareness, measures, and resources to combat violence against women (paragraph 5(g)); and the lack of regional cooperation and partnership initiatives to address problems of regional concerns such as trafficking in women (paragraph 5(q)). The Committee hopes that the Government will continue to develop policies and take measures that are aimed at the effective elimination of trafficking in persons in both law and practice, in conformity with the Convention, and that in its next report it will supply detailed information in this connection.

Trafficking in children. 16. The Committee has noted previous allegations of the ICFTU as well as indications in the IOM reports referred to above, according to which trafficking in children remains a serious problem in Pakistan. With regard to the problem of trafficking in children, for the reasons set out above concerning bonded child labour, the Committee asks the Government to refer to its comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

II. Restrictions on voluntary termination of employment

17. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the information supplied by the Government representative to the Conference Committee in June 1999, according to which an amendment to the Essential Services (Maintenance) Act of 1952, under which government employees who unilaterally terminate their employment without consent from the employer are subject to a term of imprisonment, was to be considered by the tripartite Commission on the Consolidation, Simplification and Rationalization of Labour Laws. The Government indicated in its report of 2000 that the Commission’s final report was expected at the end of September 2000. As the Government’s latest report contains no new information on this subject, the Committee once again requests the Government to supply a copy of the Commission’s report. The Committee expresses its firm hope that the Government will take the necessary steps to bring the federal and provincial essential services Acts into conformity with the Convention and will report on the progress achieved in this regard.

18. The Committee also repeats its request for copies of the full texts of the following Ordinances enacted in 2000: the Removal from Service (Special Powers) Ordinance, No. XVII of 27 May 2000; the Civil Servants (Amendment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1 June 2000; and the Compulsory Service in the Armed Forces (Amendment) Ordinance, No. LXIII of 6 December 2000.

III. Article 25. Adequacy and enforcement of penalties for the exaction of forced or compulsory labour

Enforcement of Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992. 19. The Committee previously noted the allegations of the ICFTU, contained in its communications of 2001, according to which the Bonded Labour System (Abolition) Act, 1992 (BLSA) had not been applied in practice, as few officials were willing to implement it for fear of incurring the wrath of the landlords, thus allowing the latter to use forced labour with impunity. Recalling that Article 25 of the Convention provides that the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable by penalties that are really adequate and strictly enforced, the Committee once again requests information on the number of inspections under the BLSA, as well as information about any legal actions taken against employers of bonded labourers, including copies of any court rulings in such cases.

Enforcement of Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance. 20. With regard to enforcement of the Prevention and Control of Human Trafficking Ordinance, 2002 (PCHTO), the Committee notes a press statement by the Minister of the Interior in June 2005 that, during the period from 2003 to May 2005, 888 trafficking-related complaints under the PCHTO were registered with the Federal Investigation Agency; that as many as 737 suspected traffickers were arrested; that in 336 of these cases investigations subsequently led to court prosecutions; and that these prosecutions resulted in 85 convictions and four acquittals, with the remaining cases still pending in trial. The Committee also notes from the report of the Prime Minister Secretariat, "One year performance of the Government, August 2004-August 2005", dated 29 August 2005, a section on "Curbing human trafficking" in a chapter entitled "Improving law and order", which states:

The Government through the Federal Investigation Agency has adopted stringent measures to curb human trafficking ... For sustained action against human trafficking, Anti-Trafficking Units (ATUs) have been set up at FIA HQ and in zonal directorates. These outfits are dedicated units for the enforcement of laws relating to prevention of human trafficking to and from Pakistan. To solicit support from the Civil Society, leading NGOs have also been co-opted for information and assistance.

The Committee also notes the indication in the 2005 Annual Report of the Law Division of the Ministry of Law, Justice and Human Rights that, while the Government has promulgated an ordinance to criminalize human trafficking, "a lot needs to be done for effective implementation of that ordinance".

21. The Committee asks that in its next report the Government provide updated information on the enforcement of the PCHTO, including statistics concerning the numbers of trafficking-related complaints registered, individuals arrested, court proceedings initiated, convictions obtained, penalties imposed, and victim compensation awarded, including copies of all relevant court rulings. More generally, it hopes that the Government, in accordance with Article 25 of the Convention, will endeavour to both assess whether and ensure that the penalties provided under the PCHTO that punish trafficking are really adequate and will strive to ensure that the PCHTO is strictly enforced, and that it provide information in this connection, including updated information concerning the evolution of the system of anti-trafficking units and assessing its strengths and shortcomings.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no reply to previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

1. The Committee has noted the observations received in September 2001 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) concerning application of the Convention, which were transmitted to the Government in October 2001 for such comments as it might wish to make. The Committee also notes the communication dated 26 April 2005 from the All Pakistan Federation of Trade Unions (APFTU), which contains comments on the observance of the Convention, and which was forwarded to the Government in June 2005 for any comments it might wish to make on the matters raised therein. The Committee regrets that the Government has not referred to these observations in its latest report and hopes it will do so in its next report.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Forced or compulsory labour as punishment for breach of contract or participation in strikes in non-essential services. 2. In earlier comments made under the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), the Committee has noted that the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act (ESA), 1952, and corresponding provincial Acts, prohibit employees from leaving their employment, even by giving notice, without the consent of the employer, as well as from striking, subject to penalties of imprisonment that may involve compulsory labour. The Committee has also noted previous comments, made under the Convention by the APFTU, according to which the Government has applied provisions of the ESA to workers employed in non-essential services, including various public utilities such as the Water and Power Distribution Authority (WAPDA), the Karachi Port Trust, and Sui Gas, as well as railways and telecommunications, and these workers cannot resign from their service and cannot go on strike.

3. The Committee notes the indication of the Worker member of Pakistan, in the Conference Committee at the 90th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2002, that management in the Karachi Electric Supply Corporation, and in the telecommunications and railway industries generally, had been making use of the provisions of the ESA to prevent workers from presenting their legitimate demands and to refuse any type of social dialogue. He referred in particular to workers in Quetta who had gone on strike and been arrested. The Committee also notes, from the APFTU communication dated 26 April 2005, the indication that the provisions of the ESA continue to be applied to ban strikes in non-essential services.

4. The Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that, while that the Act has remained on the books, that most public sector organizations to which the ESA was applied were undergoing privatization, including WAPDA and the telecommunications and oil and gas sectors, and that the Act would therefore no longer be applicable when those organizations had been fully privatized. The Committee notes from its latest report the Government's indication, which it has repeated for a number of years, that the provisions of the ESA are applied restrictively.

5. The Committee points out once again, with reference to the explanations provided in paragraphs 110 and 123 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, that the Convention does not protect persons responsible for breaches of labour discipline or strikes that impair the operation of essential services in the strict sense or in other circumstances where life and health are in danger; however, in such cases there must exist an effective danger, not mere inconvenience. Furthermore, all the workers concerned – whether in any employment under the federal and provincial governments and local authorities or in public utilities, including essential services – must remain free to terminate their employment by reasonable notice; otherwise, a contractual relationship based on the will of the parties is changed into service by compulsion of law, which is incompatible with both the present Convention and the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), likewise ratified by Pakistan. The Committee also recalls that, in its comments to the Government on its application of the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention, 1948 (No. 87), it has observed that the ESA includes services which cannot be considered essential in the strict sense of the term, including, among others, oil production, postal services, railways, airways, and ports, and it has for some time requested that the Government amend the ESA so as to ensure that its scope is limited to essential services in the strict sense of the term. The Committee refers the Government to its comments under Convention No. 87 on this point. It reiterates its firm hope that the ESA, and corresponding provincial Acts, will be repealed or amended in the near future so as to ensure the observance of the Convention, and that the Government will report on the action taken to this effect.

6. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to sections 54 and 55 of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (No. XXIII of 1969), under which, whoever commits any breach of any term of any settlement, award or decision or fails to implement any such term may be punished with imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Industrial Relations Ordinance (IRO) of 2002, which has repealed the 1969 Ordinance (section 80). The Committee notes with interest, from the indications of the Government in its latest report, as well as the text of sections 65, 66, and 67 of the IRO, that the penalties of imprisonment have been eliminated.

Forcible return of seafarers on board ship. 7. The Committee has, from the time of the Government's ratification of the Convention in 1960, referred to sections 100 to 103 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in relation to various breaches of labour discipline by seafarers, and seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Pakistan Merchant Shipping Ordinance (PMSO), 2001 (No. LII of 2001). It observes that the PMSO still contains provisions, particularly sections 204, 206, 207, and 208, which would permit, in respect of various breaches of labour discipline, such as absence without leave, wilful disobedience, or combining with the crew in "neglect" of duty, the imposition of sanctions involving the forcible conveyance of seafarers on board ship, as well as imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour by virtue, inter alia, of section 3(26) of the General Clauses Act, 1897). The Committee regrets that, after decades of comments addressed to the Government on this point, the Government has promulgated new legislation without eliminating the divergences between its national legislation and the Convention. The Committee hopes that the Government will amend or repeal without delay those provisions of the 2001 Ordinance that prescribe penalties for breaches of labour discipline under which seafarers may be imprisoned or forcibly returned on board ship to perform their duties. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in this regard. The Government is also asked to provide a copy of the implementing rules or regulations promulgated under section 603 of the 2001 Ordinance.

Article 1(a) and (e). Forced labour as a means of political coercion. 8. In comments made for many years, the Committee has referred to certain provisions in the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952 (sections 10–13), the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (sections 12, 23, 24, 27, 28, 30, 36, 56 and 59) and the Political Parties Act, 1962 (sections 2 and 7), which give the authorities wide discretionary powers to prohibit the publication of views and to order the dissolution of associations, subject to penalties of imprisonment which may involve compulsory labour.

9. The Committee notes the promulgation of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, which repeals the West Pakistan Press and Publications Ordinance, 1963 (section 45). Under the registration provisions of the 2002 Ordinance, a District Coordination Officer must deny authentication of a declaration, which must be made as a prerequisite for publication of a newspaper, in cases where the declaration has been filed by a person convicted of a criminal offence involving moral turpitude or for wilful default of public dues (section 10(2)(c)). Where the District Coordination Officer fails to take action to authenticate or to pass an order denying authentication of a declaration within a period of 30 days, the declaration is deemed to be authenticated (section 10(4)). Anyone who, among other things, edits, prints, or publishes a newspaper in contravention of the Ordinance – for instance, without having made a declaration or without having a declaration authenticated – is liable to punishment involving a sanction of imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term of up to six months (sections 5 and 28). Referring to paragraph 133 of the General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, the Committee asks the Government in its next report to indicate in relation to the abovementioned provisions of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, the measures taken or envisaged to ensure, in accordance with Article 1(a) of the Convention, that no form of forced or compulsory labour (including labour exacted as a consequence of a sentence of imprisonment) may be imposed as a means of political coercion or as a punishment for expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee also asks the Government to provide information on the application in practice of sections 5, 10(2)(c), 28 and 30 of the Press, Newspapers, News Agencies and Books Registration Ordinance, 2002, including the number of persons arrested and convicted under these provisions, as well as the particulars of any judicial decisions which may serve to define or clarify the effect of the abovementioned provisions. The Government is also requested to supply a copy of the text of any rules promulgated under section 44 of the Ordinance to implement it.

10. As regards the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, the Committee notes the indications by the Government representative in the Conference Committee in June 2002 that the application of these statutes was extremely restrictive. The Committee also notes from the Annual Reports of 2003 and 2005 of the Government's Law and Justice Commission, as well as its Report No. 56, that the Commission, in response to a Supreme Court ruling, had approved and drafted legislative proposals for certain amendments to be made to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and that proposed reforms to other legislation, including the Political Parties Act, 1962, were under consideration. The Committee hopes that the concerns of the Committee will be taken into consideration in the work of the Law and Justice Commission. More generally, the Committee hopes that the Government will soon take the necessary measures to bring the abovementioned provisions of the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Government is requested to supply updated information on their practical application, including the cases registered, the number of convictions, and copies of any relevant court decisions.

11. The Committee notes that, in its latest report, the Government has indicated, with reference to the non-conformity with the Convention of the Pakistan Essential Services (Maintenance) Act, 1952, that "Pakistan is serving in the front line of the war against terrorism and in retaliation the unscrupulous elements off and on try to disrupt the supply chain of oil as well as natural gas to make stand still the whole economy of the country". It notes the similar indication by the representative of the Government in the Conference Committee in June 2002, with reference to the Security of Pakistan Act, 1952, and the Political Parties Act, 1962, that Pakistan "was in the forefront of the fight against terrorism and faced very difficult political circumstances", and that under the present circumstances any change to the existing laws might not be feasible, particularly those related to the security of the country. The Committee observes that these laws, as well as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1923, have been the subject of comments by the Committee ever since the Government ratified the Convention in 1960, and that they have also been the subject of numerous discussions in the Conference Committee. The Committee would also like to point out that, if counter-terrorism legislation responds to the legitimate need to protect the security of the public against the use of violence, it can nevertheless become a means of political coercion and a means of punishing the peaceful exercise of civil rights and liberties, such as the freedom of expression and the right to organize. The Convention protects these rights and liberties against repression by means of sanctions involving compulsory work, and the limits which may be imposed on them by law need to be properly addressed.

12. The Committee hopes that, as a matter of urgency, the Government will at long last take the necessary measures to bring the provisions of the national legislation mentioned above into conformity with the Convention, and that it will report on progress achieved.

The use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of religious discrimination. 13. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 298B(1) and (2) and 298C of the Penal Code, inserted by the Anti-Islamic Activities of Qadiani Group, Lahori Group and Ahmadis (Prohibition and Punishment) Ordinance, No. XX of 1984, under which any person of these groups who uses Islamic epithets, nomenclature and titles is subject to punishment with imprisonment (which may involve compulsory labour) for a term that may extend to three years. The Committee has noted the report submitted to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 1996 by the Special Rapporteur on the Implementation of the Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and of Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief (document E/CN.4/1996/95/Add.1 of 2 January 1996), which indicates that, according to many non-governmental sources, the religious activities of the Ahmadi community are seriously restricted, and that many Ahmadis are reported to be prosecuted under section 298C of the Penal Code (paragraph 41). The Committee has also noted the conclusion of the Special Rapporteur that the State laws related to religious minorities are likely to favour or foster intolerance in society, and that the law applied specifically to the Ahmadi minority is particularly questionable.

14. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statements in its reports that religious discrimination does not exist and is forbidden under the Constitution, which guarantees equal citizenship and fundamental rights to minorities living in the country. The Government states that subject to law, public order and morality, the minorities have the right to profess, propagate their religion and establish, maintain and manage their religious institutions. In the Government's view, the Penal Code imposes equal obligations on all citizens, whatever their religion, to respect the religious sentiments of others, and an act that impinges upon the religious sentiments of other citizens is punishable under the Penal Code. The Government indicates that religious rituals referred to in Ordinance No. XX are prohibited only if exercised in public, whereas if they are performed in private without causing provocation to others, they do not fall under the prohibition.

15. While noting this information, the Committee points out once again, referring also to the explanations provided in paragraphs 133 and 141 of its General Survey of 1979 on the abolition of forced labour, that the Convention does not prohibit punishment by penalties involving compulsory labour of persons who use violence, incite to violence or engage in preparatory acts aimed at violence. But where punishment involving compulsory labour is aimed at the peaceful expression of religious views, or where such punishment (for whatever offence) is meted out more severely, or even exclusively, to certain groups defined in social or religious terms, this falls within the scope of the Convention. The Committee therefore reiterates that it firmly hopes the necessary measures will be taken in relation to sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, so as to ensure the observance of the Convention. Pending action to amend these provisions, the Committee requests that in its next report the Government provide updated and detailed factual information on the practical application of the provisions of sections 298B and 298C of the Penal Code, including a record of cases registered, the number of persons convicted, and copies of court decisions.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation on the following matters:

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions applicable to seafarers for various breaches of labour discipline. In comments it has been making since 1978, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act, 1952, under which a seafarer belonging to a foreign ship who deserts or commits certain other disciplinary offences is liable to imprisonment which involves an obligation to perform labour (section 2(1), (3), (4) and (5)). The Committee also referred to section 1 of the same Act and section 161 of the revised Merchant Shipping Act (chapter 242) (consolidated to No. 67 of 1996), which stipulate that foreign seafarers deserting their ship may be forcibly returned on board ship.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, referring also to the explanations in paragraph 179 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) would only be compatible with the Convention where they are clearly limited to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the life or health of the persons, but not where they relate more generally to breaches of labour discipline, such as desertion, absence without leave or disobedience; similarly, provisions under which seafarers may be forcibly returned on board ship are not compatible with the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's indication in the report that numerous requests concerning the Committee's comments have been communicated to the Department of Transport, which is responsible for administering and applying the above legislation, with a view to amending these provisions. It also notes the Government's renewed commitment to review these provisions in connection with the overall revision of the labour legislation being undertaken with ILO technical assistance, as well as the Government's indication that it is hopeful the amendment of these provisions will take place in 2005–06.

While noting these indications, the Committee expresses firm hope that the above provisions of the Seamen (Foreign) Act and the Merchant Shipping Act will soon be brought into conformity with the Convention and asks the Government to report the progress achieved in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Paraguay

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1967)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Debt bondage of indigenous communities in the Chaco. In comments made since 1997, the Committee has expressed its concern about the existence of cases of debt bondage in the indigenous communities of the Chaco. The Committee observed that debt bondage constituted a serious violation of the Convention.

The Committee notes the comments made in August 2006 by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The ITUC refers to the practice of forced labour in Chaco, the existence of which has been confirmed in the report: Debt bondage and marginalization in the Chaco of Paraguay. The research contained in the report was carried out under the technical cooperation project called Forced Labour, Discrimination and Poverty Reduction among Indigenous Peoples, which is part of the Special Action Programme to combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL) of the ILO.

The report confirms the existence of forced labour practices, specifying “a number of factors” that lead to situations of forced labour encountered by many indigenous workers on the estates of Chaco: the payment of wages to workers that are below the legal minimum; providing them with insufficient quantities of food; charging excessive prices for those provisions available for purchase, there being no access on the estates to other markets or means of subsistence (hunting and fishing); and the payment of partial or total wages in kind. All of these lead to the indebtedness of the worker which obliges him, and in many cases his family as well, to work permanently on the estates.

The ITUC also refers to violations of section 47 of the Labour Code, which provides that a contract will be void when it fixes a salary under the minimum wage or if it involves direct or indirect obligations to buy goods or food from shops, businesses or a place determined by the employer. Articles 231 and 176 of the Labour Code provide that only 30 per cent of wages can be paid in kind, and the value of these goods must be the same as those at the nearest urban settlement. The ITUC asserts that such provisions are not being enforced in practice, thus creating conditions of indebtedness leading the indigenous workers of the Chaco into situations of forced labour.

The report was confirmed during workshops conducted separately with organizations of employers and workers as well as for the Inspection Services. Subsequently the Ministries of Labour and Justice created an Office of Inspection in Mariscal Estigarriba, in the Chaco region in March of 2006. The Committee has learned, however, from information available from the SAP-FL of the ILO that the work was difficult for the two inspectors appointed to this office, who apparently resigned recently because of the limited support they received from Asunción.

The Committee also notes the conclusions of the Tripartite Seminar of September 2007 relating to the need for the Government to establish, by means of decree, a Tripartite Committee on Fundamental Principles at Work and the Prevention of Forced Labour, consisting of six representatives of each group, Employers, Workers and Government. The Committee, once established, would have 60 days to develop an action plan.

In its report of 2006, the Government referred to the report mentioned above and to the three workshops carried out with various social actors, and it also indicated that it planned to create an inter-institutional and cross-sector National Commission responsible for overseeing this issue. The Committee notes that the Government’s report communicated in September 2007 does not contain any information in this regard.

The Committee notes the convergence of the allegations it has been examining since 1997 on the debt bondage to which the indigenous workers of the Chaco region of Paraguay are being subjected. It notes existing provisions of labour law which, if applied, would contribute to the prevention of indebtedness that requires workers to continue working to pay off their debt, and it notes that measures taken to combat the phenomenon seem stalled at present.

The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will communicate information on the various measures taken or envisaged to combat practices by which forced labour is imposed on the indigenous workers of Chaco, in particular information on:

- the operation of the Office of Inspection in Marsical Estigarriba, providing copies of inspection reports that have been prepared by that Office; and
- the creation of the National Tripartite Committee on Fundamental Principles and the Prevention of Forced Labour and its operation, and the communication of a copy of the action plan once it has been adopted.

Article 25. Penalties for the exaction of forced labour. The Committee recalls that by virtue of Article 25 of the Convention, criminal sanctions shall be imposed, and strictly enforced, upon those found guilty of having imposed forced labour. The Committee requests the Government to communicate information about the measures taken or planned to ensure the application of Article 25 of the Convention, including copies of relevant judgements.

Article 2(2)(c). Obligation to work imposed on non-convicted detainees. In its previous comments, the Committee referred to section 39 of Act No. 210 of 1970, which provides that work shall be compulsory for detainees. Section 10 of the above Act defines detainees as not only convicted persons, but also persons subjected to security measures in a prison establishment. The Committee recalled that persons who have been detained but not convicted shall not be obliged to carry out any type of work.

The Committee notes the Draft Code on the Execution of Sentences, communicated by the Government in its report of 2006. Sections 127, 68 and 69 of the Draft Code, read together, provide for the obligation to work of convicted persons, those sentenced to a term of imprisonment pursuant to a final judgement rendered by a competent court. If these provisions are adopted they would be in compliance with Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention under which work or service can only be imposed on an individual by virtue of a conviction in a court of law. The Committee notes, however, that section 34 of the Draft Code states: “Provided they are compatible with the status of persons as detainees, do not contradict the principle of presumption of innocence, and are more favourable and useful for protecting said persons, the provisions relating to the living conditions and standards of conduct of Title III shall apply.” The Committee observes in this respect that Title III, Chapter 7, of the Draft Code contains provisions relating to compulsory work by convicted persons which, by virtue of section 34, could be applied to detainees. It would be necessary, in order to eliminate the possibility of imposing work upon those who are in preventive detention, that this be explicitly prohibited, with the clarification that the detainee could work if he so requested.

The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will be able to indicate that the national legislation has been brought into conformity with the Convention, and that it will communicate a copy of the Code on the Execution of Sentences once it has been adopted.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1960)

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour for expression of political views. In its earlier comments the Committee has noted section 142 of the Revised Penal Code (Inciting to sedition), under which a penalty of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour):

... shall be imposed upon any person who, without taking any direct part in the crime of sedition, should incite others to the accomplishment of any of the acts which constitute sedition, by means of speeches, proclamations, writings, emblems, cartoons, banners, or other representations tending to the same end, or upon any person or persons who shall utter seditious words or speeches, write, publish, or circulate scurrilous libels against the Government ..., or which tend to disturb or obstruct any lawful officer in executing the functions of his office, or which tend to instigate others to cabal and meet together for unlawful purposes, or which suggest or incite rebellious conspiracies or riots, or which lead or tend to stir up the people against the lawful authorities or to disturb the peace of the community, the safety and order of the Government, or who shall knowingly conceal such evil practices.

The Committee has also noted section 154 of the Revised Penal Code (Unlawful use of means of publication and unlawful utterances) under which a penalty of imprisonment may be imposed on any person:

... who by means of printing, lithography, or any other means of publication shall publish or cause to be published as news any false news which may endanger the public order, or cause damage to the interest or credit of the State (subsection 1), or who by the same means, or by words, utterances or speeches, shall encourage disobedience to the law or to the constituted authorities or praise, justify, or extol any act punished by law (subsection 2).

The Committee notes the Government’s statements in its latest report, indicating, among other things, that section 142 “does not penalize a person for holding or expressing political views, per se”, and that: “What is punished is the act of making speeches, writings or proclamations that create a clear and present danger to the public safety, public order and public good.”

The Committee recalls that Article 1(a) of the Convention prohibits the use of forced or compulsory labour as a means of political coercion or education or as a punishment for holding or expressing political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system. The Committee refers to its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, in which it has explained that the range of activities which must be protected under Article 1(a) of the Convention comprises the freedom to express political or ideological views, which may be exercised orally and through the press and other communications media, as well as various other generally recognized rights, such as the right of association and of assembly, through which citizens seek to secure the dissemination and acceptance of their views and the adoption of policies and laws reflecting them, and which also may be affected by measures of political coercion (paragraph 152); that the Committee has been concerned to see that the offences laid down in the laws against defamation, sedition, subversion, etc., are not defined in such wide or general terms that they may lead to the imposition of penalties as a punishment for the expression of political or ideological views (paragraph 153); and that provisions such as those in sections 142 and 154(1) of the Revised Penal Code are worded in terms broad enough to lend themselves to application as a means of punishment for the expression of views, and in so far as they are enforceable with sanctions involving compulsory labour, they fall within the scope of the Convention (paragraph 159).

The Committee reiterates its firm hope that the Government will take steps in the very near future to amend or repeal sections 142 and 154 of the Revised Penal Code so as to bring these provisions into conformity with the Convention, and it requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this direction. The Committee also repeats its request that the Government provide information on the application in practice of sections 142 and 154, including copies of relevant court decisions interpreting these provisions and defining their scope.

Article 1(d). Sanctions of imprisonment involving compulsory labour for participation in strikes. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that, under section 263(g) of the Labor Code, the Secretary of Labor and Employment has discretionary authority to enjoin or force an end to strikes in labour disputes that occur in industries which, in his or her opinion, are “indispensable to the national interest”, by “assuming jurisdiction” over the dispute and certifying it for compulsory arbitration. The President of the Philippines is separately granted the same authority under section 263(g). The declaration of a strike after such an “assumption of jurisdiction” or submission of the dispute to compulsory arbitration is a prohibited activity (section 264(a)), and the violation by any person of any of the provisions of section 264 is punishable by imprisonment (section 272(a) of the Labor Code), which involves an obligation to perform labour (pursuant to section 1727 of the Revised Administrative Code). The Revised Penal Code also lays down sanctions of imprisonment for participants in illegal strikes (section 146).

The Committee recalls that Article 1(d) of the Convention prohibits the use of any form of forced or compulsory labour as a punishment for having participated in strikes. The Committee further recalls its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, in which it explained that the suppression of the right to strike enforced by sanctions involving compulsory labour is compatible with the Convention only in so far as it is limited to situations involving an acute national crisis, and even then the suspension of rights must be strictly limited in time and scope to what is required to meet the emergency situation (paragraph 183); or to essential services in the strict sense of the term – only those services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population (paragraph 185); or to public servants exercising authority in the name of the State (paragraph 184).

The Committee must once again point out that section 263(g) of the Labor Code is drafted in such general terms that it could be applied in situations extending well beyond those which conform to the criteria enumerated above. The Committee notes the statement of the Government in its 2007 report indicating that the requisite criteria under the Convention are in fact considered in the practical application of section 263(g). The Committee, however, notes from a Government news release that, in the year 2004 alone, the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) intervened under section 263(g) on 47 occasions to “assume jurisdiction” of labour disputes at the point of the filing of strike notices, as a method of “resolving” those disputes.

The Committee notes from the Government’s latest report its further statement indicating that it is not the participation in illegal strikes (prohibited under subsection (a) of section 264) which is penalized under section 272(a), but only the illegal incidental activities prohibited under subsections (b)–(e) of section 264. The Committee notes, however, that, by its very terms, section 272(a) makes the violation by any person “of any of the provisions of article 264” punishable with imprisonment. The Committee asks the Government to supply copies of any interpretive court decisions concerning the sanctions imposed in terms of sections 272(a) and 264(a). The Committee firmly repeats its request that the Government take the necessary steps to amend or repeal sections 263(g), 264(a) and 272(a), in order to bring these provisions of the Labor Code into compliance with the Convention and that, in its next report, it supply information on the progress made towards this end. The Committee also refers the Government to its observations made on this point in relation to the application of Article 3 of Convention No. 87.

Saudi Arabia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

Article 25 of the Convention. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. The Committee for many years has expressed its concern about the failure of the Government to comply with Article 25 of the Convention, particularly in light of the special problems faced by migrant workers in Saudi Arabia. The Committee has previously indicated that Article 25 of the Convention requires a member State to have specific provisions punishing the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour with penal sanctions. The Committee expressed its hope that measures would soon be taken to introduce such provisions, and that the penalties imposed by law would be really adequate and strictly enforced, as required by the Convention. The Committee notes that in its 2005 report the Government indicated that the new Labour Code would include a text on the prohibition of forced labour and the penalties for its exaction.

The Committee notes the new Labour Code supplied by the Government with its 2007 report. It notes with regret, however, that the Code contains no prohibition on forced labour and no penalties, and that in section 7 it continues to exclude agricultural workers and domestic workers, an exclusion that has particular significance for migrant workers who are often employed in those sectors. The Committee notes, as it has previously, that the lack of such protection for migrant workers exposes them to exploitation in their working conditions, such as retention of their passports by their employers, which in turn deprives them of their freedom of movement to leave the country or change their employment. The Committee asks that in its next report the Government inform it about the measures it is taking to amend the Labour Code to provide for the prohibition of forced and compulsory labour, for penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour, and for such penalties to be adequate and strictly enforceable, as well as measures that encompass migrant workers, with a view to protecting them from being exposed to situations in which they are vulnerable to exploitation of that nature.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Vulnerable situation of migrant workers with regard to the illegal exaction of forced labour. The Committee previously noted the adoption, through Decision No. 166 of 12 July 2000 of the Council of Ministers, of “Regulations governing the relationship between employers and migrant workers”, and that according to section 3 of those regulations, “migrant workers may keep their passports or the passports of members of their families and may be authorized to move within the Kingdom as long as they have a valid residence permit”. The Committee has also noted that section 6 provides for the creation of a rapid mechanism for the examination of conflicts which may arise and for their settlement by the competent authority. In its previous observation the Committee expressed the hope that the Government would provide full information on the dispute-settlement mechanism under section 6 of Order No. 166, as well as on the sanctions that may be imposed on an employer for non-observance of those regulations. With regard to the dispute-settlement mechanism under section 6, the Government, in its 2005 report, stated only that the departments at labour offices dealing with such issues undertake to resolve disputes expeditiously, and that delays and backlogs were problems common to labour judiciaries, but the Government had this problem under examination. The Committee hopes that the Government will report on the measures it has taken to establish and bring into operation the rapid dispute settlement mechanism, as prescribed under section 6 of Order No. 166.

The Committee notes that in its 2005 report the Government indicated that the sanctions prescribed under section 6 of Order No. 166 for non-observance of the regulations include terminating the labour relationships and prohibiting an employer from contracting for the employment of migrant workers. The Committee hopes that in its next report the Government will include information about the number of cases and the circumstances in which those sanctions have been imposed to date, as well as information about whether there are any other penalties prescribed by law for violations of the regulations under Order No. 166 and, if so, about the imposition of any such penalties. The Committee hopes that the Government will also explain how it is ensured that the application of sanctions prescribed under section 6 does not adversely affect the workers involved by causing them to be placed in precarious situations that may subject them to further exploitation through the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour.

The Committee notes Circular No. 55 of 10 March 2001, which, according to the Government's statement in its 2005 report, provides for an employee's transfer to another employer in cases where long delays in existing dispute-resolution procedures cause economic hardship for the migrant worker involved in the pending dispute. The Committee hopes that the Government will provide information relating to the application in practice of this measure, including the number of cases in which it has been applied.

Sierra Leone

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Compulsory cultivation. Over many years, the Committee has been referring to section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act (Cap. 61), under which compulsory cultivation may be imposed on "natives". On numerous occasions, it requested the Government to repeal or amend this provision. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that the abovementioned section is not in conformity with article 9 of the Constitution and would be held unenforceable.

The Committee takes due note of the Government's repeated indication in its report that section 8(h) is not applicable in practice and that information on any amendment of this section would be communicated to the ILO in the near future.

As the Government has repeatedly indicated since 1964 that this legislation would be amended, the Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring section 8(h) of the Chiefdom Councils Act into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. It requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Singapore

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1965)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Legislation concerning destitute persons. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Destitute Persons Act 1989 (which repeated without change some provisions of the Destitute Persons Act 1965), under which destitute persons may be required, subject to penal sanctions, to reside in a welfare home (sections 3 and 16) and to engage in any suitable work for which the medical officer of the home certifies them to be capable, either with a view to fitting them for employment outside the welfare home or with a view to contributing to their maintenance in the welfare home (section 13).

The Committee has previously pointed out that the imposition of labour under the Destitute Persons Act 1989, comes under the definition of "forced or compulsory labour" in Article 2(1) of the Convention, and that the Convention makes no exception for labour imposed "in the context of rehabilitation" of destitute persons.

The Committee previously noted the Government's repeated indication that section 13 of the Act should be interpreted in the context of rehabilitative services for destitute persons and that, in practice, residents in the welfare home are not compelled to work and are only assigned chores after they have given their written consent, and also received payment for their participation. While noting these indications concerning the current practice under the Destitute Persons Act 1989, which appears to be in conformity with the Convention, the Committee previously drew the Government's attention to the necessity to bring the legislative provisions into conformity with the Convention, so as to ensure compliance both in law and in practice.

The Committee notes the Government's statement in its latest report that it will be reviewing the necessity to amend section 13 of the Act to better articulate the voluntary nature of the activity in its current review of the Act, which is expected to be completed by early 2008. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that section 13 of the Act will soon be amended so as to provide clearly that any work in a welfare home is to be done voluntarily, thus bringing the abovementioned legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice. The Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on the progress made in this regard.

Sri Lanka

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1950)

Article 2(2)(d) of the Convention. Emergency regulations. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to the state of emergency declared on 20 June 1989 under the Public Security Ordinance, 1947, and the powers of the President under section 10 of the Emergency (Miscellaneous Provisions and Powers) Regulations (adopted in 1989 and revised in 1994, 2000 and 2005). The Committee has duly noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that, in view of the ongoing civil war in the country, it is imperative that the provisions of the Emergency Regulations are to be in force in order to prevent any breakdown in the national security and to ensure the maintenance of essential services in the country. However, the Committee reiterates, referring also to paragraphs 62–64 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that recourse to compulsory labour under emergency powers should not only be limited to circumstances which would endanger the existence or well-being of the whole or part of the population, but that it should also be clear from the legislation itself that the power to exact labour is limited in extent and duration to what is strictly required to cope with the said circumstances. The Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point and that the Government will report the progress made in this regard.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Compulsory public service. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to sections 3(1), 4(1)(c) and 4(5) of the Compulsory Public Service Act, No. 70 of 1961, under which compulsory public service of up to five years may be imposed on graduates. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated statement in its reports that no prosecutions under the Act have been reported so far. The Government repeats in its 2006 report that the Act has not been implemented in practice and has in effect fallen into disuse. However, the Government indicates that the matter has been referred to the Ministry of Public Administration and Home Affairs for further consideration and steps have been taken to repeal the Act. The Committee therefore expresses the hope that the Compulsory Public Service Act will soon be repealed and the legislation will be brought into compliance with the Convention and the indicated practice.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Sudan

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1957)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Abolition of forced labour practices. 1. For many years, the Committee has been examining information concerning the practices of abduction and forced labour affecting thousands of women and children in the regions of the country where an armed conflict was under way. The Committee has pointed out on numerous occasions that these situations constitute gross violations of the Convention. These victims are forced to perform work for which they have not offered themselves voluntarily, and the work is performed under extremely harsh conditions, as well as the victims being ill-treated in ways which may include torture and death. In its earlier comments, the Committee considered that the scope and gravity of the problem were such that it was necessary to take urgent action that was commensurate in scope and systematic. The Government was therefore requested to provide detailed information on the measures taken to combat the practice of forced labour through abduction of women and children and to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators.

2. The Committee has noted with interest the adoption in 2005 of the Interim National Constitution, which followed the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement in January 2005. The Committee notes with interest that Part Two of the Interim National Constitution contains the Bill of Rights which promotes the human rights and fundamental freedoms, and that Article 30 of the Interim National Constitution specifically prohibits slavery and forced or compulsory labour.

3. The Committee has taken note of the Government's report received in October 2006 and of the summary reports of activities of the Committee for the Eradication of Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC) supplied in November 2005 and October 2006, as well as of the discussion that took place in the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2005. It has also noted the observations dated 6 September 2005, received from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU, now ITUC – International Trade Union Confederation), concerning the application of the Convention by Sudan, as well as the Government's reply to these observations.

Conference Committee on the Application of Standards. 4. The Committee has noted that, in its conclusions adopted in June 2005, the Conference Committee observed the convergence of allegations and the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the practices of abduction and the exaction of forced labour. The Committee noted that, while there had been positive and tangible steps, including the conclusion of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement, it was of the view that there was no verifiable evidence that forced labour had been abolished. The Committee invited the Government to avail itself of the technical assistance of the ILO and other donors to enable it to eradicate the practices identified by the Committee of Experts and to bring the perpetrators to justice. The Committee considered that only an independent verification of the situation in the country would enable it to determine that forced labour in the country had ended. The Committee decided that, in the framework of the ILO technical assistance, a full investigation of the facts be undertaken and requested the Government to provide the ILO with all the necessary assistance.

United Nations bodies. 5. The Committee notes that, in the UN Security Council resolution 1769 (2007), the Security Council noted with strong concern ongoing attacks on the civilian population and humanitarian workers and continued and widespread sexual violence. The resolution referred to the report of the Secretary-General and the Chairperson of the African Union Commission on the Hybrid operation in Darfur and the report of the Secretary-General of 23 February 2007. The resolution emphasized the need to bring to justice the perpetrators of such crimes and urged the Government of Sudan to do so and reiterated its condemnation of all violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Darfur. The Committee also notes that, in the Decision 2/115, of the UN Human Rights Council concerning Darfur, of 28 November 2006, the Human Rights Council, while welcoming the Darfur Peace Agreement, noted with concern the seriousness of the human rights and humanitarian situation in Darfur and called on all parties to put an immediate end to the ongoing violations of human rights and international humanitarian law, with a special focus on vulnerable groups, including women and children. The Committee further notes a report on the situation of human rights in Darfur prepared by the group of experts mandated by Human Rights Council resolution 4/8 presided by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan (A/HRC/5/6, of 8 June 2007), in which the experts group shared the concern of the Council regarding the seriousness of ongoing violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in Darfur as well as the lack of accountability of perpetrators of such crimes. According to the recommendations contained in the report, all allegations of violations of human rights and international humanitarian law must be duly investigated and perpetrators must be promptly brought to justice (paragraph 43(h)).

Comments from workers' organizations. 6. In the observations of 2005 referred to above, the ICFTU welcomed the fact that the Government had finally recognized the scale of the problem in its statement to the Conference Committee in June 2005 and, in particular, the Government's indications that the CEAWC had successfully resolved, through documentation, retrieval and reunification measures, 11,000 cases of abductions. However, the ICFTU expressed concern about the assistance and reintegration of these individuals into Sudanese society. While welcoming the positive developments, such as the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement and the adoption of the Interim National Constitution, which provided a historic opportunity for the Government to resolve the issue of abduction and forced labour once and for all, the ICFTU expressed the view that it would not automatically lead to an end to abductions, exaction of forced labour and associated human rights violations, as events in Darfur had demonstrated. It also referred in this connection to the information concerning widespread and systematic cases of sexual slavery and forced prostitution, and called on the Government to ensure that such crimes are prosecuted and punished severely. The ICFTU believed that the impunity that those responsible for abductions and the exaction of forced labour have enjoyed – illustrated by the absence of any prosecutions for abductions in the last 16 years – contributed to the continuation of this practice throughout the civil war and more recently in Darfur. Finally, the ICFTU strongly supported a recommendation made by the Conference Committee that “only an independent verification of the situation in the country would enable it to determine that forced labour in the country had ended” and urged the Government to fully support and provide assistance to the ILO investigation on abductions in Sudan.

Government's response. 7. In its 2006 report, the Government confirms its strong and continued commitment to completely eradicate the phenomenon of abductions and to provide continued support to the CEAWC. The Government indicates that, out of 14,000 cases of abductions, the CEAWC has already successfully resolved 11,000 cases and has been able to reunify abducted persons with their families in 3,394 cases. The Government has confirmed its statement to the Conference Committee that abductions have stopped completely, which, according to the Government, has been also confirmed by the Dinka Chiefs Committee (DCC). The Government states that the workers' concern about the assistance and reintegration of the abductees has no factual base. As regards the prosecution of perpetrators, the Government repeats its previous indications that the CEAWC has been requested by all the tribes concerned including the DCC not to resort to legal action, unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful. It also states that, within the context of the comprehensive peace process, there is an argument for not pursuing prosecutions against those responsible for abductions and forced labour since 1983 (and even before) in the spirit of national reconciliation.

8. *While noting the Government's renewed commitment to resolve the problem, as well as the progress achieved by the CEAWC in the liberation of abductees, the Committee strongly urges the Government to pursue its efforts with vigour in order to resolve the remaining cases of abductions and reintegrate the victims, thus putting an end to the long-standing and large-scale practice of the exaction of forced labour through abduction of women and children. The Committee refers again to the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the violations of human rights and international humanitarian law in certain regions of the country. The Committee trusts that the Government will take urgent measures, in accordance with the recommendations of the relevant international bodies and agencies, to put an end to all human rights violations, which would help to create better conditions for the full observance of the forced labour Conventions.

Article 25. Penalties for the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour. 9. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to a criminal code provisions punishing the offence of abduction with penalties of imprisonment, and requested the Government to take measures to ensure that, in accordance with the Convention, penal sanctions are imposed on perpetrators. While noting the Government's view expressed in the report that, within the context of the comprehensive peace process, there is an argument for not pursuing prosecutions against those responsible for abductions and forced labour in the spirit of national reconciliation, the Committee again draws the Government's attention to the provision of Article 25 of the Convention. This Article provides that "the illegal exaction of forced or compulsory labour shall be punishable as a penal offence, and it shall be an obligation on any Member ratifying this Convention to ensure that the penalties imposed by law are really adequate and are strictly enforced". The Committee considers that the non-application of penal sanctions to perpetrators is contrary to this provision of the Convention and will have the effect of ensuring impunity for abductors who exploit forced labour. The Committee therefore trusts that the necessary measures will be taken to ensure that legal proceedings are instituted against perpetrators, particularly against those unwilling to cooperate, and penal sanctions are imposed on persons convicted of having exacted forced labour, as required by the Convention. The Committee requests that the Government provide, in its next report, information on the application in practice of the penal provision punishing the offence of abduction, as well as the provisions punishing kidnapping and the exaction of forced labour (sections 161, 162 and 163 of the Criminal Code), supplying sample copies of the relevant court decisions.

[The Government is asked to supply full particulars to the Conference at its 97th Session and to reply in detail to the present comments in 2008.]

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1970)

Article 1(a) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views and for having participated in strikes. For a number of years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code and the Labour Code, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to work under the Prison Regulations, Chapter IX, section 94, and the 1997 Regulations concerning the organization of work in prisons, Chapter XIII, section 38(6)) may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention.

The Committee has noted the adoption in 2005 of the Interim National Constitution, which contains the Bill of Rights promoting human rights and fundamental freedoms. It has noted that the declaration of emergency was lifted in July 2005 as a result of signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement. The Committee has also noted the Government's indication in its report that a draft labour law has been finalized and prepared for submission to the competent authorities for adoption. The Committee asks the Government to supply a copy of the new law, as soon as it is adopted. It also asks the Government once again to supply copies of the legislation in force concerning freedom of association, assembly, and expression of political opinion.

The Committee takes note of the situation regarding human rights in Sudan as described in Decision 2/115 of the UN Human Rights Council concerning Darfur, of 28 November 2006, in the report on the situation of human rights in Darfur prepared by the group of experts mandated by the Human Rights Council resolution 4/8 presided by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan (A/HRC/5/6, of 8 June 2007) and in the statement issued by the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Sudan, of 6 August 2007. In its Decision 2/115 referred to above, the UN Human Rights Council noted with concern the seriousness of the human rights and humanitarian situation in Darfur and called on all parties to put an immediate end to the ongoing violations of human rights and international humanitarian law. In her statement referred to above, the Special Rapporteur pointed out that, despite the potential for democratic transition and optimism created by the Interim National Constitution and the Bill of Rights, violations of civil and political rights continue, including limitations on freedom of expression. She welcomed the Government's acknowledgement of the seriousness of the situation and strongly encouraged it to take action without delay to improve it, so that people can fully enjoy their human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As the Committee repeatedly pointed out, it observes the importance for the effective respect of the Convention of the legal guarantees regarding freedom of assembly, expression, demonstration and association, and the direct effect which restriction of these rights, both in law and in practice, can have on the application of the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that, according to the Prison Regulations of 1999, there is no compulsory labour in prisons and work is optional for prisoners. It requests the Government once again to supply a copy of the 1999 Prison Regulations with its next report, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain whether national legislation is compatible with the Convention.

The Committee is addressing a more detailed request on the above matters directly to the Government.

Swaziland

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1978)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Legislation concerning compulsory public works or services. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to the Swazi Administration Order, No. 6 of 1998, which provided for the duty of Swazis to obey orders requiring participation in compulsory works, such as, for example, compulsory cultivation, anti-soil erosion works and the making, maintenance and protection of roads, enforceable with severe penalties for non-compliance. With reference to the comments it has been making for a number of years concerning the Swazi Administration Act, No. 79 of 1950, which contained similar provisions and which was repealed by the abovementioned Order No. 6 of 1998, the Committee observed that provisions of this kind were in serious breach of the Convention.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's indication in its report received in January 2007 that the Swazi Administration Order, 1998, was challenged at the High Court of Swaziland (Case No. 2823/2000), which declared the Order null and void, and that the Swaziland Government did not appeal against that judgement. The Committee would appreciate it if the Government would communicate a copy of the High Court judgement with its next report.

Syrian Arab Republic

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1960)

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. 1. Freedom of persons in the service of the State to leave their employment. For many years, the Committee has been referring to Legislative Decree No. 46 of 23 July 1974, amending section 364 of the Penal Code, under which a term of imprisonment from three to five years may be imposed for leaving or interrupting work as a member of the staff of any public administration, establishment or body or any authority of the public or mixed sector before resignation has been formally accepted by the competent authority; or evading obligations to serve the same authorities, whether the obligation derived from a mission, a scholarship or a study leave.

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indications in its reports that, in practice, a worker's right to submit a request for resignation at any time is fully respected, and the competent authority is bound to accept the resignation, provided the continuity of the service is ensured. In its reports received in 2006 and 2007, the Government confirms its previous indications that the amendment of the Penal Code is currently ongoing and that the Committee's comments are being taken into account in order to ensure conformity with the Convention. Recalling, with reference to paragraphs 96–97 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, that persons in the service of the State should have the right to leave the service on their own initiative within a reasonable period, either at specified intervals or with previous notice, the Committee reiterates the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will provide information on the action taken to this end.

2. Legislation on vagrancy. Over a number of years, the Committee has been referring to section 597 of the Penal Code, which provides for the punishment of any person who is reduced to seeking public assistance or charity as a result of idleness, drunkenness or gambling. The Committee recalled that, while the punishment of gambling or the abuse of intoxicating liquor is outside the scope of the Convention, the possibility to impose penalties for mere refusal to work is contrary to the Convention.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that the amendments of the Penal Code will accommodate the Committee's request. The Committee therefore expresses the firm hope that the necessary measures will soon be taken with a view to clearly excluding from the legislation any possibility of compulsion to work, either by repealing section 597 or by limiting its scope to persons engaging in illegal activities, so as to bring legislation and practice into conformity with the Convention.

Article 2(2)(d). Work or services exacted in cases of emergency. In comments it has been making since 1964, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of Decree No. 133 of 1952 with respect to compulsory labour, particularly those of Chapter I (compulsory labour for purposes of health, culture or construction) and sections 27 and 28 (national defence work, social services, road work, etc.), which provide for the call up of inhabitants for periods of up to two months, in circumstances that go beyond the exception authorized by the Convention for "any work or service exacted in cases of emergency, that is to say, in the event of war or of a calamity or threatened calamity ... and in general any circumstance that would endanger the existence or the well-being of the whole or part of the population".

The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indications in its reports that Decree No. 133 of 1952 is currently being reviewed with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention. The Government reiterates that the provisions of Decree No. 133 are only applied in emergencies and to very limited categories. It also refers in this connection to Legislative Decree No. 15 of 11 May 1971 concerning local administration, under which certain kinds of work or services (national defence work, social services, road work) may be exacted in the event of war, emergencies or natural disasters. The Government repeatedly indicates that Legislative Decree No. 15 does not contain provisions similar to those in the above sections 27 and 28 of Decree No. 133.

While noting this information, the Committee trusts that the necessary measures will soon be taken to formally repeal or amend the above provisions of Legislative Decree No. 133 of 1952 so as to limit the possibility of exacting labour to situations of emergency in the strict sense of the term, as defined in the Convention, and that the Government will soon be in a position to report on the measures taken to this end. The Committee again requests the Government to communicate a copy of Legislative Decree No. 15 of 11 May 1971 referred to above.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1958)

Article 1(a), (c) and (d) of the Convention. Penal sanctions involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for breaches of labour discipline and for the participation in strikes. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act, under which prison sentences involving compulsory labour can be imposed as a punishment for expressing views opposed to the established political system, as a punishment for breaches of labour discipline and for participation in strikes.

The Committee previously noted the Government's indication in its report that a draft legislative decree amending the Penal Code had been prepared by the Ministry of Justice in response to the economic and social developments witnessed by the country and to fulfil the request made by the Committee of Experts. The Government indicated that the draft legislative decree was aiming at the elimination of all obligation to perform prison labour and in particular, that the terms "imprisonment with labour", "life imprisonment with hard labour" or "temporary hard labour" would be removed from the Penal Code. In its 2006 and 2007 reports, the Government reaffirmed its commitment to bring legislation into conformity with the ratified ILO Conventions, taking due account of the Committee's comments and, in particular, confirmed its intention to remove the above terms from the Penal Code.

The Committee expresses the hope that, following the adoption of the draft legislative decree, persons convicted for activities coming under the purview of the Convention and, in particular, persons convicted under the provisions referred to of the Economic Penal Code, the Penal Code, the Agricultural Labour Code and the Press Act, would no longer be under an obligation to perform labour, although they might be allowed to engage in work. The Committee also hopes that the draft legislative decree referred to above will soon be adopted and that the Government's next report will contain full information on the progress made in this regard.

United Republic of Tanzania

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Employment and Labour Relations Act, 2004 (No. 6) has repealed the Employment Ordinance (Cap. 366), under which compulsory labour could be imposed for public purposes.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1) of the Convention. Imposition of compulsory labour for purposes of economic development. For many years the Committee has been commenting on serious discrepancies between national law and practice and the provisions of the Convention. The Committee referred in this connection to the following provisions:

- article 25, paragraph 1, of the 1985 Constitution, which provides for a general obligation to work; article 25, paragraph 3(d), of the Constitution, which provides that no work shall be considered as forced labour if it is relief work that is part of compulsory nation-building initiatives, in accordance with the law, or national efforts in harnessing the contribution of everyone in the work of developing the society and national economy and ensuring success in development;
- the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, the Penal Code, the Resettlement of Offenders Act, 1969, the Ward Development Committees Act, 1969, and the Local Finances Act, 1982, under which compulsory labour may be imposed, inter alia, by administrative authority, on the basis of a general obligation to work and for purposes of economic development;
- several by-laws adopted between 1988 and 1992 under section 148 of the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, entitled "self-help and community development", "nation-building", and "enforcement of human resources deployment", which provide for an obligation to work.

The Committee has previously expressed its concern at the institutionalized and systematic compulsion to work established in law at all levels, in the National Constitution, Acts of Parliament and District by-laws, in contradiction with Convention No. 29 and Article 1(b) of Convention No. 105, also ratified by the United Republic of Tanzania, which prohibits the use of compulsory labour for development purposes.

The Committee notes the Government's repeated statement concerning practical difficulties encountered in the application of the Convention, which in most cases were due to application of by-laws and directives issued by local authorities imposing compulsory labour on the population. However, the Government stated in its 2003 and 2004 reports that it has taken very serious note of the Committee's concerns, and that the identified laws – such as the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, 1982, the Penal Code, the Resettlement of Offenders Act, 1969, the Ward Development Committees Act, 1969, and the Local Finances Act, 1982 – had been addressed by the Task Force of the Labour Law Reform, which had recommended to the relevant authorities to make appropriate amendments to these laws.

The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to repeal or amend the numerous provisions which are incompatible with the Convention and to do so expeditiously. The Committee requests the Government to report on the progress made.

The Committee is addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1962)

The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Employment and Labour Relations Act, 2004 (No. 6), has repealed the Industrial Court of Tanzania Act (No. 41 of 1967), which contained provisions prohibiting strikes contrary to the procedure under the Act, enforceable with penalties of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour).

Article 1(a), (b) and (c) of the Convention. Penalties involving compulsory labour as a punishment for expressing political views, for failure to engage in socially useful work and for various breaches of labour discipline. For many years, the Committee has been referring to certain provisions of the Penal Code, the Newspaper Act, the Merchant Shipping Act and the Local Government (District Authorities) Act, under which penalties involving compulsory labour may be imposed in circumstances falling within the scope of the Convention. The Committee also asked the Government to provide information on the amendment or repeal of the provisions of various legal instruments, to which it referred in its comments under Convention No. 29, likewise ratified by Tanzania, and which are contrary to Article 1(b) of this Convention.

The Committee noted the Government's statements in its 2003 and 2004 reports that the Committee's views and comments made on the provisions of the above laws which are incompatible with the Convention had been duly taken into account, and that the identified laws had been addressed by the Task Force of the Labour Law Reform with a view to making appropriate recommendations to the Government. As regards the abovementioned Merchant Shipping Act, the Government indicated in its 2002 report that the International Maritime Organization (IMO) had prepared proposals for the amendment of the Act, which had been submitted to the Government.

The Committee reiterates firm hope that the necessary action will be taken in the near future in order to repeal all provisions incompatible with the Convention, and that the Government will soon be able to report on progress made in this regard.

The Committee is again addressing a more detailed request on the above matters directly to the Government.

Thailand

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1969)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. 1. Trafficking and sexual exploitation of children. In its earlier comments, the Committee requested the Government to take all the necessary measures to eradicate the trafficking of children for the purpose of exploitation and to punish those responsible. The Committee has noted the Government's reply to its previous observation on the subject, as well as other information communicated in its reports received in 2006 and 2007. The Committee recalls that the Government has ratified the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182). In so far as Article 3(a) of Convention No. 182 provides that the worst forms of child labour include "all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour", the Committee is of the view that the problem of trafficking of children for the purpose of exploitation may be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182. The protection of children is enhanced by the fact that Convention No. 182 requires States which ratify it to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly asks the Government to refer to its comments on the application of Convention No. 182.

2. Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation – communication from the international workers' organization. The Committee has noted the Government's reply to its earlier comments, as well as other information communicated by the Government in its 2006 and 2007 reports. It has also noted the comments on the application of the Convention by Thailand, made by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) – now the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) – in its communication dated 31 August 2006. In this communication, the ICFTU expresses its concern about the persistence of the trafficking in persons from and into Thailand and refers to a report published by the UN Office on Drugs and Crime (April 2006), in which Thailand has been listed in the group of countries which have a very high level of trafficking, as a country of destination, origin and transit. According to the report, Cambodian and Lao women and girls are trafficked into Thailand for factory and domestic work and the sex trade; Burmese, Cambodian and Lao men are trafficked into Thailand for forced labour in such sectors as construction, agriculture and in particular the fishing industry. The ICFTU refers in this connection to first-hand information concerning Burmese fishermen and, in particular, six members of the Seafarers' Union of Burma, who had been tricked into abusive working conditions on board Thai fishing vessels in situations similar to forced labour, which included allegations of brutality and injury. The ICFTU expressed concern about the lack of legal protection of men subjected to forced labour, which leaves the problem of male victims unaddressed.

The communication from the ICFTU was forwarded to the Government, on 28 September 2006, for such comments as might be considered appropriate. The Government in its latest report acknowledged that the current legislation was limited in its scope and that human trafficking had become more severe and complicated. It indicated that the Government was in the process of adopting the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act and that it had been approved by the Cabinet and was now under the consideration of the National Assembly. However, the Committee notes that the Government's report contained no reference to the ICFTU communication referred to above. It requests the Government to respond to the allegations made by the ICFTU in its next report.

3. Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation – prevention and protection measures, law enforcement. The Committee has noted the Government's renewed commitment expressed in its reports to eradicate all manner of human trafficking. It has noted with interest the positive steps taken by the Government, some of them in cooperation with ILO/IPEC and other international institutions, to adopt legislation and to put into place a coherent national policy framework for dealing with this problem.

The Committee has noted, in particular, the information on the application of the Prevention and Suppression of Prostitution Act 1996, including the information concerning the activities of welfare protection and vocational development centres set up under the Act, as well as statistical data with regard to the prosecution of offences under the Act. It has noted comprehensive information supplied by the Government on the activities of the Ministry of Labour concerning the promotion of employment opportunities among women and youth, including various training courses and specific projects for women. The Committee has also noted the information on the application of the Measures for the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act 1997, which covers offences both in Thailand and abroad and also provides protection for victims from foreign countries, ensuring that they are placed in shelter and provided with the necessary assistance before they are repatriated. It has noted with interest the information on the activities of various committees and subcommittees related to human trafficking and sexual exploitation of women and children, covering both domestic and cross-border trafficking, with regard to prevention, protection, recovery and reintegration measures. The Committee has further noted the second Memorandum of Understanding on Common Guidelines of Practices for Agencies Engaged in Addressing Trafficking in Women and Children B.E. 2546 (2003), according to which the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security is working in collaboration with other concerned agencies such as the Royal Thai Police, the Office of the National Commission on Women's Affairs, the Immigration Bureau and the International Organization for Migration (IOM), to assist trafficked women by providing them with temporary shelters before repatriating to their hometowns and by conducting recovery programmes which would enable them to reintegrate into society. The Committee has also noted the information concerning the Government's participation in multilateral cooperation in combating trafficking in the Mekong subregion.

The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts with vigour and to take effective action to implement the anti-trafficking policies it adopts. It hopes that the Government will continue to supply detailed information on the application in practice of the above Memorandum of Understanding, as well as the information on the practical application of the Measures for the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act 1997, including the information on any legal proceedings which have been instituted in connection with the offences related to human trafficking. In relation to the new draft Act on the prevention and suppression of human trafficking under consideration by the National Legislative Assembly, the Committee hopes that the Government will communicate a copy, as soon as it is adopted. Please also provide information on the activities of the Centre Against International Trafficking under the Office of the Attorney-General, to which reference is made in the report.

Trinidad and Tobago

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1963)

The Committee has noted the Government's brief reports on the application of the Convention received in 2006 and 2007.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Sanctions involving compulsory labour for breaches of labour discipline and participation in strikes. For a number of years the Committee has been referring to sections 157 and 158 of the Shipping Act, 1987, section 8(1) of the Trade Disputes and Protection of Property Ordinance and section 69(1)(d) and (2) of the Industrial Relations Act, Cap. 88:01, under which penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour under the Prisons Rules) may be imposed for various breaches of labour discipline and participation in strikes in circumstances where the life, personal safety or health of persons are not endangered. The Committee has noted the Government's repeated indications in its earlier reports that efforts were underway to amend the provisions mentioned above and that no sanctions had been imposed under these provisions in practice.

The Government reiterates in its 2006 report that no amendments have been made to the legislation in question and that the relevant ministries under whose authority the acts are administered have not indicated any immediate intention of making amendments to this legislation.

Noting that the legislative amendments required have been under consideration for many years, the Committee trusts that the Government will not fail to take all the necessary measures in order to bring the abovementioned provisions into conformity with the Convention, and that it will soon be in a position to report the progress made in this regard.

Turkey

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1998)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The Committee previously noted a communication received in December 2003 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now the International Trade Union Confederation). In that communication, the ICFTU focused its concern on the trafficking of women and children. It observed that:

- Turkey is both a transit and a destination country for trafficked persons;
- most women and girls whose destination is Turkey come from the Russian Federation, Republic of Moldova, Romania, Georgia, Ukraine, Armenia, Azerbaijan and Uzbekistan;
- Turkey provides transit mainly for women from Central Asia, Africa, the Middle East and former Yugoslavia to other countries in Europe; and
- most victims of trafficking find themselves forced into prostitution and some into debt bondage.

The Committee notes, under the new Penal Code (Act No. 5237 of 2004), that:

- trafficking in persons for the purpose of subjecting them to forced labour or to slave-like conditions is punishable with a sentence of imprisonment of eight to 12 years (section 80);
- the employment of homeless, helpless or dependent persons without payment or for substandard wages or forcibly subjecting them to inhumane working and living conditions is punishable by a term of imprisonment of six months to three years (section 117(2)); and
- trafficking for the purpose of prostitution is punishable by a term of two to four years' imprisonment (section 227(3)).

The Committee asks the Government in its next report to supply information concerning the application and enforcement of sections 80, 117(2), and 227(3) of the Penal Code, including statistical data and other information about investigations and prosecutions, as well as convictions and sentencing outcomes in cases of convictions.

The Committee notes the reference by the Government to other measures it has taken, including among other things:

- training and awareness-raising seminars for law enforcement officers, organized in collaboration with the International Organization for Migration (IOM);
- implementation, within the framework of financial cooperation between Turkey and the European Union and under the coordination of the General Directorate of Security, a “Project for enhancement of the institutional capacity with a view to combating trafficking in human beings”;
- the conclusion on 24 September 2004 of a bilateral “Memorandum of Understanding for cooperation in the struggle against human trafficking and illegal migration” with the Republic of Belarus as a source country; and
- the launching of a national emergency hotline and call service for use by victims of trafficking, as well as initiatives to establish women’s trafficking shelters in Ankara and other cities.

The Committee asks the Government to supply information in its next report on the progress of these measures and information on any more recent measures taken or contemplated to combat trafficking in persons for purposes of sexual exploitation or other forms of forced labour, including updated information on police training and other efforts to improve law enforcement capacity in relation to trafficking; as well as on efforts to strengthen intergovernmental cooperation on trafficking cases, particularly with source countries.

The Committee notes the indication of the Government that application of the regulations implementing the Work Permit for Foreign Workers Act (No. 4817 of 2003), particularly sections 7, 12, and 22 of the Act, has entailed the imposition of new obligations that are aimed at combating trafficking in persons. The Government indicated that copies of these provisions were attached to the report in an “Annex 2”; however, the annex does not appear to have been included, and the Committee asks the Government to supply a copy with its next report.

Abolition of Forced Labour Convention, 1957 (No. 105) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee has noted the Government’s reply to its earlier comments, and it has also noted the observations of the Confederation of Public Servants Trade Unions, the Confederation of Progressive Trade Unions of Turkey (DISK), the Confederation of Turkish Trade Unions (TÜRK-İŞ), and the Turkish Confederation of Employer Associations (TISK), communicated by the Government with its report.

Article 1(a) of the Convention. Political coercion and punishment for holding or expressing views opposed to the established system. The Committee has previously noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory prison labour, under section 198 of the Regulations pertaining to the administration of penitentiaries and to the execution of sentences, adopted by decision of the Council of Ministers of 5 July 1967, No. 6/8517, as amended) may be imposed under various provisions of the Turkish Penal Code, including, among others, section 159 (insulting or vilifying, inter alia, “Turkism”, various state authorities, the state laws or the decisions of the National Grand Assembly) and section 312

(publicly inciting hatred and enmity of the population with reference to distinctions of class, race, religion or region) and under section 8 (written or oral propaganda, assemblies, manifestations and demonstrations against the indivisibility of the State) of the Anti-Terrorism Law, No. 3713 of 12 April 1991, as amended on 13 November 1996, in circumstances falling within Article 1(a) of the Convention.

The Committee noted that, while certain of the provisions might appear to be aimed at acts of violence or incitement to the use of violence, armed resistance or an uprising, their actual scope, as shown through their application in practice, is not limited to such acts, but provides for political coercion and the punishment of the peaceful expression of non-violent views that are critical of government policy and the established political system, with penalties involving compulsory labour.

The Committee notes that section 159 of the Penal Code was amended by Act No. 4771, of 3 August 2002, and that section 159 now corresponds to section 301 of the new Penal Code (Act No. 5237 of 2004). The Committee notes that this provision, under its fourth subsection, protects expression directed at “Turkishness”, the Republic, or organs and institutions of government, if intended only to criticize, while the prior subsections continue to penalize such expression if it “publicly denigrates” those institutions. The Committee asks that the Government supply information about the application of this provision in practice, including information about any prosecutions, convictions and sentences under the various subclauses of section 301 of the Penal Code, so as to assure the Committee that the expression of political views or views ideologically opposed to the established political, social or economic system are not sanctioned with penalties that involve the use of forced or compulsory labour.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted that the amendment introduced in section 312 of the Penal Code by Act No. 4744 of 6 February 2002, which makes the inciting of hatred and enmity of the population punishable with imprisonment if such acts constitute a danger to public order, required further clarification. In its latest report the Government indicates that the new Penal Code replaced section 312 with sections 215–218. The Committee notes that, under section 215, a person who “praises a crime or a criminal” is liable to a sentence of imprisonment of up to two years; that under section 216 a person who “deliberately incites one section of the population to hatred and hostility against another through discrimination based on race, region, or religion, shall be liable to a sentence of imprisonment of one to three years”; and that under section 217 a person who commits the crime of “inciting people to disobey laws” is liable to a term of imprisonment of six months to two years. The Committee asks that the Government supply information about the application in practice of sections 215–217 of the new Penal Code, including information about any prosecutions, convictions and sentences under these provisions and copies of court decisions which construe and define their scope, so as to enable the Committee to ascertain whether they are applied in a manner compatible with the Convention.

In its previous observation, the Committee noted with regard to section 8 of the “Act on the Fight against Terrorism”, No. 3713 of 1991, that, by virtue of Act No. 4744 of 6 February 2002, a penalty of imprisonment in this section was replaced with fines, and it requested the Government to provide clarification of the phrase “unless such acts necessitate a heavier penalty” and to supply copies of the court decisions defining or illustrating the scope of this provision. The Committee notes that, in June 2006, the Grand National Assembly adopted amendments to the Act. The Committee asks that in its next report the Government clarify the provision for penalties in section 8 as earlier requested. It also requests the Government to provide a copy of the 2006 amendments to the Act, including the relevant penalty provisions, and to supply updated information relating to the application in practice of the Act, as amended, including copies of all relevant court decisions and information about prosecutions, convictions and sentencing outcomes.

The Committee has previously referred to provisions of the 1965 Act concerning political parties, which prohibits political parties from asserting the existence in Turkey of any minorities based on nationality, culture, religion or language and from attempting to disturb national security by conserving, developing or propagating languages and cultures other than the Turkish language or culture. It noted that penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) could be imposed under sections 80–82, read in conjunction with section 117, of the Political Parties Act (No. 2820 of 1983) and sections 5 and 76 of the Associations Act (No. 2908 of 1983). In its previous observation the Committee noted the Government’s indication in its 2003 report that changes were to be made in the Political Parties Act, in accordance with the Emergency Action Plan published on 3 January 2003, with a view to ensuring that the whole population would be able to participate in political parties and to make possible the establishment of equity and justice in political representation.

The Committee notes the Government’s indication in its 2005 report that the penalties applicable to prohibited activities under sections 80–82 have been “re-regulated” under the new Penal Code, Act No. 5237 of 2004. It further notes the Government’s indication that the new Associations Act, No. 5253, no longer includes provisions corresponding to sections 5 and 76 of the former Act. The Committee asks the Government in its next report to indicate the specific provisions of the new Penal Code which it states “re-regulate” sections 80–82 of the Political Parties Act. The Committee defers its comments on the new Associations Act pending a translation of the text of that Act.

Article 1(b). Use of conscripts for purposes of economic development. The Committee has previously noted, among other provisions, that section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, as amended by Act No. 3358, as well as section 5 of Council of Ministers resolution No. 87/11945 of 12 July 1987, adopted pursuant to section 10 of Act No. 1111, lay down procedures relating to the surplus reserves, including the procedures concerning the persons liable to perform military service who are assigned duties in public bodies and institutions. In its 2003 report, the Government confirmed its previous indication that Act No. 3358, which amended section 10 of the Military Service Act, No. 1111, was no longer applied after 1991, though no action has yet been taken to repeal its provisions. The Committee in previous comments asked that necessary measures be taken with a view to repealing the above provisions in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government provide information on the progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's reply on this point in both its 2005 reports on the application of Conventions Nos 105 and 29. The Government indicates that a new draft Military Service Bill that would bring Military Service Act No. 1111 into conformity with "current conditions" has been examined by special expert committees of the Turkish Grand National Assembly, and that it further indicates that the Bill has been drawn up in a way that embodies a policy of protecting persons conscripted into military service from being assigned duties in public bodies or undertakings without their consent. The Committee requests the Government to keep the ILO informed about the progress of the above Bill. The Committee reiterates its hope that the necessary measures will at last be taken with a view to repealing the provisions referred to above in order to bring legislation into conformity with the Convention and the indicated practice, and that the Government will soon be able to provide information on the progress made in this regard.

Article 1(c) and (d). Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments the Committee noted that, under section 1467 of the Commercial Code (Act No. 6762 of 29 June 1956), seafarers may be forcibly conveyed on board ship to perform their duties, and that, under section 1469 of the Commercial Code, various breaches of discipline by seafarers are punishable with imprisonment (involving, as previously noted, an obligation to perform labour). The Committee also noted that the Government had submitted to Parliament a Bill to amend section 1467 of the Commercial Code, which contains a provision limiting the powers of the master under section 1467 to circumstances jeopardizing the safety of the ship or endangering the lives of the passengers and the crew, and expressed the hope that section 1469 of the Commercial Code would likewise be amended to limit its scope to acts endangering the safety of the ship or the lives or health of persons.

The Committee notes the Government's indication that a draft Turkish Trade Act, which has the aim of bringing sections 1467 and 1469 of the Commercial Code into conformity with the Convention, is now under elaboration in the specialized committees of the Parliament, and that, once the Bill is adopted, the Government will supply copies of the text of the new legislation. The Committee reiterates its hope that the Government will very soon be in a position to report the progress achieved in this matter.

Article 1(d). Punishment for participation in strikes. The Committee has previously noted that Act No. 2822 of 1983, respecting collective labour agreements, strikes and lockouts, provides in sections 70–73, 75, 77 and 79 for penalties of imprisonment (involving compulsory labour) as a punishment for the participation in unlawful strikes, in circumstances not limited in scope to those described in paragraphs 182–189 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour. The Government indicated in its 2003 report that a tripartite "Science Board", established with the objective of bringing Act No. 2822 into conformity with relevant ILO Conventions, had completed its work and submitted its report for consideration by the social partners. The Committee refers the Government to its comments on this point under the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize Convention, 1948 (No. 87), and expresses the firm hope that amendments to Act No. 2822 addressing the Committee's concerns under both Conventions will be adopted without further delay.

United Kingdom

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1931)

The Committee has noted the information supplied by the Government in reply to its earlier comments. It has also noted a communication dated 24 October 2005 received from the Trades Union Congress (TUC), which contains the TUC's response to the Government's report, as well as a communication dated 29 August 2006, whereby the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (currently the International Trade Union Confederation – ITUC) submitted comments on the application of the Convention by the United Kingdom. The Committee notes that these communications have been forwarded to the Government for any further comments it might wish to make and hopes that such comments will be supplied by the Government with its next report.

Article 1(1) and Article 2(1) and (2)(c) of the Convention. Privatization of prisons and prison labour. Work of prisoners for private companies. In its earlier comments concerning the privatization of prisons and work of prisoners for private entities, the Committee pointed out that Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention expressly prohibits that convicted prisoners are hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations, in the sense that the exception from the scope of the Convention provided for in this Article for compulsory prison labour does not extend to work of prisoners for private employers (including privatized prisons and prison workshops), even under public supervision and control. The Committee has previously asked the Government to take the necessary measures in order to ensure that, with regard to contracted-out prisons and prison industries, any work by prisoners for private companies be performed under the conditions of a freely consented upon labour relationship, without the menace of any penalty and, given their conditions of captive labour, subject to guarantees as to wages and other conditions of employment approximating a free employment relationship.

The Government reiterates its view that its approach to the work of prisoners for private entities is in line with the aims of the Convention. It states that there is no real difference between supervisory arrangements for public and private prisons in the United Kingdom, where prison officers serving in private prisons have to be licensed by public authorities. The Government indicated previously that it could see no justification for requiring different systems of employment for public or private sector work in prisons, where adequate safeguards against abuse are in place. The Committee notes, however, that these views have again been rejected by the TUC in its response to the Government's report contained in the communication referred to above. The TUC has also expressed the view that the supervisory arrangements in private prisons do not amount to the level of public supervision required by the Convention for such work: while prison officers employed by private companies have to be licensed by the public authorities, that does not amount to day-to-day supervision of prisoners' work by the public authorities.

While having noted these views and comments, the Committee recalls that the privatization of prison labour transcends the express conditions provided in Article 2(2)(c) of the Convention for exempting compulsory prison labour from the scope of the Convention. By virtue of this provision, compulsory work or service exacted from any person as a consequence of a conviction in a court of law is compatible with the Convention only if two conditions are met: namely, "that the said work or service is carried out under the supervision and control of a public authority and that the said person is not hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations". Both these conditions are necessary for compliance with the Convention: if either of the two conditions is not observed, the situation is not excluded from the scope of the Convention, and compulsory labour exacted from convicted persons under these circumstances is thus prohibited. In other words, the two conditions apply cumulatively: i.e. the fact that the prisoner remains at all times under the supervision and control of a public authority does not in itself dispense the Government from fulfilling the second condition, namely, that the person is not "hired to or placed at the disposal of private individuals, companies or associations".

As the Committee pointed out in paragraph 106 of its General Survey of 2007 on the eradication of forced labour, the prohibition for prisoners to be placed at the disposal of private parties is absolute and not limited to work outside penitentiary establishments, but applies equally to workshops operated by private undertakings inside prisons; therefore, it applies to all work organized by privately run prisons. Consequently, the privatization of prisons and/or of prison labour is only compatible with the Convention where it does not involve compulsory labour. Thus, in order to comply with the Convention, the work of prisoners for private companies requires the freely given consent of the persons concerned. The Committee has considered that, in the context of a captive labour force having no alternative access to the free labour market, the most reliable indicator of the voluntariness of labour is the work performed under conditions approximating a free labour relationship, which include wage levels (leaving room for deductions and attachments), social security and occupational safety and health. In addition, there may also be other factors that can be regarded as objective and measurable advantages which the prisoner gains from the actual performance of the work and which could be considered in determining whether consent was freely given and informed, such as the learning of new skills which could be deployed by prisoners when released, the offer of continuing work of the same type upon their release, or the opportunity to work cooperatively in a controlled environment enabling them to develop team skills. The Committee has indicated that all of these factors should be taken as a whole in determining whether consent was freely given and informed; they also should be considered and assessed by the public authorities (see paragraphs 59–60 and 114–120 of the Committee's General Survey of 2007 referred to above).

The Committee is of the opinion that, in spite of the express prohibition for prisoners to be hired to or placed at the disposal of private parties under the terms of the Convention, it is fully possible for countries to apply the Convention when designing or implementing a system of privatized prison labour, once the abovementioned requirements are observed. Noting the Government's confirmed willingness to cooperate with the ILO on this matter, the Committee requests that the necessary measures be taken so as to ensure that free and informed consent is required for the work of prisoners in privately operated prisons in accordance with the factors outlined by the Committee as set out above.

In particular, the Committee requests the Government to provide, in its next report, information:

- on the action taken to ensure that the informed written formal consent to perform work is obtained from such prisoners without the menace of any penalty;
- on the action taken to ensure that such formal consent is authenticated by the existence of objective and measurable factors such as the prisoners performing work in conditions approximating a free labour relationship, together with other advantages such as learning of new skills which could be deployed when released; the offer of continuing work of the same type upon release; or the opportunity to work cooperatively and develop team skills, or other similar factors;
- on the objective and measurable factors which are to be taken into account by public authorities in order to ensure that voluntariness of the consent is authenticated;
- on the procedures undertaken by public authorities to regularly assess that such objective and measurable factors are in place in order to ensure that work performed by prisoners is voluntary.

Articles 1(1) and 2(1). Trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation. Referring to its earlier comments, the Committee has noted with interest the comprehensive information provided by the Government on measures taken to combat trafficking in persons for the purpose of sexual and labour exploitation. It has noted, in particular, the adoption of the Asylum and Immigration (Treatment of Claimants, etc.) Act, 2004, which criminalizes trafficking for labour exploitation, the Sexual Offences Act, 2003, which has reinforced provisions covering trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation, as well as the Gangmasters (Licensing) Act, 2004, and the Gangmasters (Licensing Authority) Regulations, 2005, which establish a system of licensing and registration of labour providers operating in the agriculture, shellfish-gathering and associated processing sectors. It has also noted with interest that the Government is participating in a project launched by the ILO Special Action Programme to combat Forced Labour (SAP-FL), which focuses on the forced labour dimensions of trafficking in selected European “source” and “destination” countries. Finally, the Committee has noted the establishment in 2004 of an interdepartmental Ministerial Group on Human Trafficking to ensure maximum effectiveness of the work undertaken by the Government to prevent, disrupt and prosecute trafficking and support victims, as well as a project called “the POPPY Scheme” aiming at the supporting of enforcement action, including prosecution and disruption of trafficking activity. Noting the Government’s indication in the report that the scheme is currently being evaluated, the Committee hopes that the Government will provide information on the results of its evaluation, particularly as regards the efficiency of prosecution, punishment of the offenders and victim protection measures.

In its previous comments, the Committee referred to the observations by the TUC concerning the situation of workers from abroad who fall victim to trafficking and find themselves in conditions which would amount to forced labour, in which the TUC expressed the view that a fundamental weakness in the existing law and regulations remains that workers who denounce these practices, and in particular if they leave that employment, may find themselves at great risk of deportation. In its latest communication referred to above, the TUC again expresses its concern with the fact that there is a great risk that deported trafficked workers may be delivered back into the hands of the criminal gangs that trafficked them in the first place and thus may be trafficked yet again. In the TUC’s view, an essential component of effective victim protection is the right of liberated trafficked workers to stay in the United Kingdom rather than be deported to their country of origin or the last country of residence.

The Committee previously noted the Government’s indication in its 2002 report that there was already provision for victims of trafficking to be granted exceptional leave to remain in the United Kingdom and that, in the Government’s view, these arrangements were best considered on a case-by-case basis, since any blanket grant of residency is open to abuse and may create a perverse incentive for traffickers to exploit more victims, by suggesting that they will be granted residency if they are trafficked. The Committee has noted the Government’s detailed explanations in its 2005 and 2007 reports concerning a grant of humanitarian protection, discretionary leave or leave outside the immigration rules, which, in the Government’s view, allows a fully flexible approach to be applied. While having noted these explanations, the Committee would appreciate it if the Government would provide information on how these arrangements work in practice, as well as information on any further measures taken or envisaged to protect the victims of trafficking. In particular, please provide information on the implementation of the UK Action Plan on Tackling Human Trafficking, as well as information on the activities of the UK Human Trafficking Centre referred to in the Government’s latest report.

Article 1(c) and (d) of the Convention. Disciplinary measures applicable to seafarers. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to section 59(1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1995, which provides that a seafarer who combines with other seafarers employed on the same ship at a time when the ship is at sea to disobey lawful commands, neglect any duty which is required to be discharged, or impede the progress of a voyage or the navigation of the ship, is liable, on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years (which involves compulsory prison labour) or a fine or both. The Committee also noted the Government’s indication that section 59 is applicable to seafarers who withdraw their labour in furtherance of an industrial dispute.

The Committee has noted the Government’s indication in its 2005 report that it has not been possible to carry out the proposed consultations with the shipping industry on whether or not section 59 should be amended, as a result of the need to progress legislative measures of a higher priority. The Government also states that, in deciding the priority to be afforded to the proposed changes to this section, the Government has had regard to its view expressed previously, that the above section does not conflict with the Convention.

The Committee recalls in this connection, referring also to the explanations given in paragraphs 179–181 of its 2007 General Survey on the eradication of forced labour, that sanctions of imprisonment (involving an obligation to perform labour) relating to breaches of labour discipline are incompatible with the Convention, and only sanctions specifically relating to acts tending to endanger the safety of the ship or the life or health of persons would not be covered by the Convention.

The Committee has noted the Government’s intention expressed in the report to carry out consultations to assess the attitude of all sides of industry to the proposal to make changes to section 59, as well as the Government’s repeated indication that, in order to incorporate the proposed changes to this section, it will be necessary to proceed with an Order under the Regulatory Reform Act, 2001, which is an extremely time-consuming process and is subject to Parliamentary scrutiny. The Committee expresses the firm hope that section 59(1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1995, will be amended, either by repealing sanctions involving compulsory labour or by restricting their application to the situations where the ship or the life or health of persons are endangered, so as to bring the merchant shipping legislation into conformity with the Convention.

Noting also the Government's indication in its 2005 report that there have been no prosecutions under section 59 in recent times, the Committee hopes that the Government will supply copies of the relevant court decisions, if and when such prosecutions are instituted.

The Committee is again addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Zambia

Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29) (ratification: 1964)

Articles 1(1), 2(1) and 25 of the Convention. Trafficking in persons for the purpose of sexual and labour exploitation. In its earlier comments, the Committee referred to a communication received in October 2002 from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU) (now the International Trade Union Confederation, ITUC), which contained allegations concerning trafficking of women and children to neighbouring countries for the purpose of forced prostitution and kidnapping of Zambians by Angolan combatants who took them to Angola to perform various forms of forced labour. The Committee has noted the Government's reply to these allegations received in August 2006. The Government states that cases as referred to by the ICFTU have taken place, but they are minimal. However, the Government indicates that Zambia is mainly used as a transit point for trafficked persons to other countries rather than a source.

Referring to its general observation concerning the issue of trafficking in persons made in 2000, the Committee asks the Government to provide, in its next report, information on measures taken or contemplated to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons for the purpose of exploitation, and in particular information on the following aspects of law and practice:

- provisions of national law aimed at the punishment of trafficking in persons, as defined in Article 3 of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime;
- measures taken to ensure that the penal provisions punishing trafficking in persons are strictly enforced, including, in particular, measures designed to encourage the victims to turn to the authorities (such as permission to stay in the country, efficient protection of victims willing to testify);
- measures designed to strengthen the active investigation of organized crime with regard to trafficking in persons, including international cooperation between law enforcement agencies with a view to preventing and combating the trafficking in persons;
- cooperation with employers' and workers' organizations as well as non-governmental organizations engaged in the protection of human rights and the fight against the trafficking in persons.

As regards, more particularly, trafficking in children, the Committee asks the Government to refer to its comments made under the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), likewise ratified by Zambia, which provides in Article 3(a) that the worst forms of child labour include "all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour". The Committee is of the view that this problem may be examined more specifically under Convention No. 182, which requires ratifying States to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency.

The Committee is also addressing a request on certain other points directly to the Government.

Direct requests

In addition, requests regarding certain points are being addressed directly to the following States: Convention No. 29 (Albania, Algeria, Angola, Antigua and Barbuda, Australia, Azerbaijan, Bahamas, Bahrain, Belgium, Belize, Benin, Brazil, Burundi, Cameroon, Cape Verde, Chile, China: Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, Macau Special Administrative Region, Colombia, Côte d'Ivoire, Cuba, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Denmark, Dominica, Egypt, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Ethiopia, France: French Polynesia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Iceland, India, Islamic Republic of Iran, Italy, Kazakhstan, Kiribati, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Lebanon, Lesotho, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Lithuania, Madagascar, Malawi, Malaysia, Mali, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Netherlands, Netherlands: Aruba, Niger, Nigeria, Oman, Papua New Guinea, Poland, Romania, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Solomon Islands, South Africa, Sri Lanka, Switzerland, Syrian Arab Republic, Tajikistan, United Republic of Tanzania, Togo, Trinidad and Tobago, Turkey, Ukraine, United Kingdom, United Kingdom: Anguilla, Montserrat, St. Helena, Uzbekistan, Yemen, Zambia); Convention No. 105 (Albania, Algeria, Angola, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Barbados, Belize, Benin, Bolivia, Burundi, Cambodia, Chile, China: Macau Special Administrative Region, Congo, Cuba, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Dominica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Equatorial Guinea, Fiji, Ghana, Greece, Guatemala, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Israel, Italy, Kazakhstan, Kiribati, Latvia, Lebanon, Lesotho, Malawi, Mali, Mauritania, Republic of Moldova, Netherlands: Aruba, Niger, Pakistan, Philippines, Romania, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, Senegal, Serbia, Seychelles, Sri Lanka, Sudan, United Republic of Tanzania, Togo, Turkey, Ukraine, United Kingdom, Uzbekistan, Yemen).

The Committee noted the information supplied by the following States in answer to a direct request with regard to: Convention No. 29 (New Zealand: Tokelau, San Marino, Singapore, Slovenia, Spain); Convention No. 105 (Lithuania, Saudi Arabia).

Elimination of Child Labour and Protection of Children and Young Persons

Algeria

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1984)

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report. It requests the Government to provide information on the following points.

Article 1 of the Convention. National policy. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee takes due note of the Government's information on the measures which it has taken since 2003 concerning child labour, particularly activities to raise public awareness of the problem. The Committee also notes that, in the context of the draft national strategy on children's affairs, the administration responsible for family matters organized a strategic planning workshop on child protection in February 2007 in collaboration with UNICEF and that, following the workshop, recommendations on child protection have been formulated for the 2007–15 period. Moreover, it notes that the Government has initiated a draft act on child protection. The Committee asks the Government to supply information on the implementation of recommendations taken further to the strategic planning workshop on child protection held in February 2007 and also on the results obtained in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour. It also asks it to send a copy of the act on child protection once it is adopted.

Article 2, paragraph 1. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 1 of Act No. 90-11 of 21 April 1990 concerning conditions of work governs individual and collective employment relations between salaried employees and employers. It noted that the terms of this provision of Act No. 90-11 do not apply to employment relations which are not governed by a contract, such as work done by children on their own account. The Committee also noted the Government's statement that Act No. 90-11 of 21 April 1990 does not apply to self-employed persons, as they are governed by other regulations which determine the minimum age for admission to non-wage work. The Committee therefore requested the Government to send copies of these regulations.

In its report, the Government indicates that section 5 of Order No. 75-59 of 26 September 1975 concerning the Commercial Code provides that any emancipated minor of either sex, aged 18 or above, who wishes to engage in commercial activity may not commence commercial operations or be considered of majority age with regard to commitments he enters into for commercial purposes if he has not received prior authorization from his father or mother or, failing that, through an official statement from the family council approved by a court of law. The Government also indicates that, according to this provision, regulations concerning admission to employment are of a general nature and apply to all forms of employment, whether waged or on one's own account.

The Committee notes that this provision of the Commercial Code concerns emancipated minors of either sex, aged 18 or above, who wish to engage in a commercial activity, whereas the situation to which the Committee refers concerns children under 18 years of age covered by the Convention who are engaged in economic activity outside an employment relationship in the informal sector or on their own account. It therefore again reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment or work, whether or not a contractual employment relationship exists and whether or not the work is paid. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection afforded by the Convention is applied to children who are engaged in economic activity on their own account. It asks the Government to supply information in this respect.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to hazardous work and determination of these types of work. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that revision of the national labour legislation is in progress and that the issue of persons under 18 years of age being prohibited from employment in hazardous work will be taken into account. It also notes the Government's information that a list of types of prohibited work will be established by means of regulation. In this respect, the Committee reminds the Government that Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention provides that, when types of hazardous work are being determined, the employers' and workers' organizations concerned must be consulted. The Committee hopes that the revision of the national legislation will be completed soon and that provisions giving full effect to Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention will be adopted as soon as possible. It asks the Government to supply information on all further developments in this respect.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the statistical information sent by the Government, particularly concerning the number of violations reported concerning non-compliance with the legal age for admission to employment (106) and concerning the absence of authorization from the father or legal guardian in the case of working minors (82). The Committee asks the Government to supply information on the penalties imposed by the competent courts further to the reported violations. It also asks the Government to continue to supply information on the way in which the Convention is applied in practice, by providing, for example, statistical data concerning the employment of children and young people, extracts of reports from the inspection services and details of the number and nature of violations recorded and penalties imposed.

Antigua and Barbuda

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee drew the Government's attention to the fact that the provisions of the national legislation respecting the minimum age for admission to employment or work were not in conformity with the age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. Indeed, although the Government had specified the minimum age of 16 years when ratifying the Convention, section E3 of the Labour Code provides that no child shall be employed or shall work in a public or private agricultural or industrial undertaking or in any branch thereof, or on any ship, while the term "child", by virtue of section E2 of the Labour Code, means a person under the age of 14 years. The Committee had noted on several occasions that amendments to the Labour Code of 1975 were under examination with a view to bringing the minimum age for admission to employment or work into conformity with the minimum age specified when ratifying the Convention and with the compulsory school leaving age which, under section 43(1) of the Education Act of 1973, is 16 years of age. The Committee noted that in its most recent report, the Government indicated that the Labour Code was presently under review and that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend section E2 of the Labour Code, so as to define a child as a person under the age of 16 years, which would bring the minimum age for admission to employment or work in the national legislation into conformity with the minimum age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention. It requests the Government to inform it of progress made in amending the Labour Code.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Minimum age for admission to, and determination of, hazardous work. The Committee reminded the Government that Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention provides that the minimum age for admission to any type of employment or work, which by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young persons, shall not be less than 18 years. It also reminded the Government that, under the terms of Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention, the types of hazardous employment or work shall be determined by national laws or regulations or by the competent authority, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Labour Code was presently under review and that the comments of the Committee would be taken into account. The Committee requests the Government to provide information regarding progress towards the adoption of the amendments to the Labour Code, which would contain a list of activities and occupations to be prohibited to persons below 18 years of age, in accordance with Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention. It also requests the Government to provide information on the consultations held with organizations of employers and workers concerned on this subject. Finally, the Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the amendments to the Labour Code once they have been adopted.

Article 4, paragraph 2. Exclusion of limited categories of employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that section E3 of the Labour Code provides that the prohibition upon the employment or work of children, that is persons under the age of 14 years (section E2), does not apply to any undertaking or ship on which only members of the same family are employed, to members of a recognized youth organization who are engaged collectively in such employment for the purposes of fund-raising for such organization, nor to a child who is working together with adult members of his or her family on the same work and at the same time and place. It once again requests the Government to indicate in future reports any changes in law and practice in respect of these categories excluded.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Bangladesh

Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59) (ratification: 1972)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's information on the continued efforts to eliminate child labour from the garment factories of the members of the Bangladesh Garment Manufacturers and Exporters Association (BGMEA). It had also noted that, according to the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 4 February 1997 (CRC/C/3/Add.38 and CRC/C/3/Add.49), the number of child workers is significant in literally hundreds of occupations, and that in some cases children are subject to severe exploitation and physical and psychological hazards. In the same report, the Government recognized the need for action to remove children urgently from hazardous and unhealthy work and to reduce child labour progressively by expanding primary schooling and providing support to poor families (CRC/C/3/Add.49, paragraph 37). The Committee had requested the Government to indicate all measures taken to ensure the application of the Convention in practice, as well as the results achieved, including the number of children effectively removed from the work done in contravention of the minimum age provisions.

The Committee notes the absence of information on this point in the Government's report. It notes, however, that, according to the Government's report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 14 March 2003 (CRC/C/65/Add.22, paragraph 346), the Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) signed by the BGMEA, the ILO and UNICEF has led to the withdrawal of more than 27,000 children from work. It also notes that, according to the same source (paragraph 348), the national household survey on child labour conducted by the Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics in 1995–96 showed that 90 per cent of child workers aged 5 to 14 years operate in the informal sector.

The Committee notes that, according to the Baseline survey on child workers in welding establishments, conducted by the Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics in December 2003, with regard to the 39,000 children working in welding establishments, 52 per cent had never been to school and 95.6 per cent were not studying at the time the survey was conducted. Similar records exist for children working in the battery recharging/recycling sector (“Baseline survey on child workers in the battery recharging/recycling sector”, Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics, February 2004, page 57) and for children working in automobile establishments (“Baseline survey on child workers in automobile establishments”, Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics, November 2003, page 81).

The Committee observes that, according to the abovementioned statistical data, practice is inconsistent with the legislation and the Convention. It notes that an ILO/IPEC project is currently being implemented targeting hazardous child labour (in particular in bidi (hand-rolled cigarette) factories, construction, leather tanneries, matches) and child labour in the urban informal sector. It also notes that a programme has been launched on 24 April 2006 in cooperation with ILO/IPEC to provide vocational skills training for 300 children withdrawn from hazardous work.

Recalling that the Convention sets forth the minimum age of 15 years for any public or private undertaking, with the exception of family undertakings and work done in technical schools, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation. It once again requests the Government to supply statistical information on the practical application of the Convention, such as extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported, school enrolment or attendance rates, not only with regard to garment manufacturing but also other sectors covered by the Convention.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government’s report. It requests the Government to provide information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that sections 5(1) and 6(1) of the Suppression of Violence against Women and Children Act (hereinafter SVWCA) prohibit the sale and trafficking of women (irrespective of their age) and children for purposes of prostitution or immoral acts. It had noted that, by virtue of section 2(k) of the SVWCA, a “child” means a person under 14 years of age. It had observed, consequently, that the sale and trafficking of boys aged 14 years or above is not prohibited under the SVWCA.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that the SVWCA was amended in 2003. By virtue of this amendment, the age of a “child” as defined in section 2(k) has been increased to 16 years. The Committee observes that the SVWCA, as amended in 2003, does not prohibit the sale and trafficking of boys between 16 and 18 years of age. In this regard, it once again reminds the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of both boys and girls under 18 is prohibited and that, under Article 1 of the Convention, immediate and effective measures to prohibit this worst form of child labour must be taken as a matter of urgency. The Committee accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend the SVWCA in order to ensure that the sale and trafficking of all children under 18 years of age is prohibited.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee had previously noted that the Anti-Trafficking Unit, established within the Ministry of Home Affairs, and the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) deal with child trafficking issues. It notes the Government’s information that the police and other law enforcement agencies, as well as local governmental organizations are involved in the fight against trafficking. It further notes that, according to the information available at the Office, although a lack of resources hinders investigations, Bangladesh has expanded anti-trafficking police units to every district to encourage victims to testify against traffickers and to compile data on trafficking. According to the same information, in response to inadequately trained police and prosecutors, the Government has worked with legal experts to provide specialized training to prosecutors and with the International Organization for Migration (IOM) to develop a trafficking course for the national police academy and for immigration officials. The Committee requests the Government to provide full information, including statistics, on the findings and activities of the police, the Anti-Child Trafficking Unit and the CID regarding cases of trafficking involving children under 18 years.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the International Trade Union Confederation’s (ITUC) indication that women and children are trafficked from Bangladesh to India, Pakistan and countries in the Middle East where they are forced to work as prostitutes, factory workers or camel jockeys. In particular, girls are lured into forced labour through promises of marriage and taken to cities such as Calcutta, Mumbai and Karachi where they are forced into prostitution. Boys are more likely to be taken to work as camel jockeys in the United Arab Emirates or other Gulf States. The Committee had also noted that the Government has adopted a number of programmes in order to raise people’s awareness and to prevent the trafficking of children. It had also noted that the two-year Subregional Programme to Combat the Trafficking in Children for Sexual and Exploitative Employment (TICSA) in Bangladesh, Nepal and Sri Lanka was renewed in 2002 and expanded to Pakistan, Thailand and Indonesia.

The Committee notes the Government’s statement that actually trafficking in children and women has emerged as an issue of major global concern, particularly in Asia. Several international events have called for immediate action to end trafficking. It notes the Government’s information that it has enacted different laws and adopted various developmental projects in collaboration with international agencies in order to prevent trafficking, especially through advocacy programmes, workshops and public awareness campaigns. It also notes that, according to the Government, the TICSА project in Bangladesh achieved considerable success in the field, especially in the advocacy and awareness-raising of people in the border areas. The Committee further notes the Government's information that a National Plan of Action against the sexual abuse and exploitation of children, including trafficking, was adopted for the period 2001–06 (NPA 2006). Moreover, the Ministry of Home Affairs has adopted a project for preventing trafficking in children and women. The Committee finally notes the Government's statement that the rate of trafficking in children and women has reduced considerably because of the measures adopted and the enforcement of the provisions of laws.

The Committee welcomes the measures adopted by the Government. However, it observes that, notwithstanding these measures, the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation still remains an issue of concern in practice. The Committee encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to eliminate the trafficking of children under 18 years for labour and sexual exploitation and to provide information on progress made. It also requests the Government to provide information on the concrete results achieved under the TICSА (Phase II), the NPA 2006, and the project for preventing trafficking in children and women adopted by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted that section 6(1) of the SVWCA provides for sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment and fines for the sale and trafficking of children. It notes the Government's information that there are at least 33 tribunals where special judges are appointed to deal with cases of trafficking. Severe punishments have had a deterrent effect in the matter. It also notes that, according to the information available at the Office, Bangladesh sustained efforts to punish traffickers in 2005, prosecuting 87 cases and convicting 36 traffickers. However, despite successes, public corruption is still widespread and the court system is slow. In addition, traffickers are often charged with lesser crimes such as crossing borders without proper documentation. While welcoming the Government's efforts to punish perpetrators of trafficking, the Committee encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that persons who traffic in children are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. Child domestic workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that, according to the World Confederation of Labour (WCL), child domestics worked in conditions that resemble servitude. It had noted the Government's statement in reply to the comments made by the WCL, that forced labour is prohibited by virtue of article 34 of the Constitution and that child domestics were usually well-treated and were not subject to forced or bonded labour. The Government had also indicated that several programmes, such as the Time-bound programme (TBP) adopted in June 2004 by the Government and ILO/IPEC, were in progress to prevent and eliminate the worst forms of child labour, including domestic work. The Committee had nevertheless noted that, in Dhaka City alone, there were an estimated 300,000 child domestic workers. Moreover, according to the Government, some child domestic workers rarely have access to education and they do not get wages or proper food and clothing.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the recent study conducted by the ILO in 2006 on the conditions of domestic servants in Bangladesh under the TBP reveals that more than 90 per cent of domestic servants expressed satisfaction with their jobs and employers and did not want to leave their jobs. Less than 10 per cent of domestic servants indicated that their employers did not behave well. Finally, a negligible percentage of domestic servants expressed that they were abused or punished for any mistake or loss. The Committee notes the Government's statement that in Bangladesh child domestic workers cannot be considered as being involved in the worst forms of child labour. They are provided with food, shelter, medical facilities, and clothes, in addition to monthly wages. Besides, parents feel secure in keeping their children for domestic work in some houses. According to the Government, even if there are a very negligible number of cases where domestic servants are abused or are victims of corporal punishments, such cases cannot be generalized. The Committee takes due note of this information. It nevertheless considers that child domestic workers often fall prey to exploitation, which can take various forms, and that it is difficult to oversee their employment conditions because the work is illegal. It accordingly urges the Government to continue taking measures to protect child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government concerning other points.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes with regret that for the second consecutive year the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Medical examination for fitness for employment. The Committee noted Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004, issued by the Ministers of Labour and of Health and Sports (SEDES), section 1 of which provides that the Ministry of Health and Sports, through its ministries and municipal authorities, shall allocate the necessary and adequate medical personnel so that, in coordination with the Ministry of Labour, free medical examinations are carried out of the fitness for employment of working boys, girls and young persons in the industrial and agricultural sectors and for own account work, in urban and rural areas, in application of section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999. In this respect, the Committee noted section 137(1)(b) of the Code on Boys, Girls and Young Persons of 1999, under the terms of which young workers shall periodically undergo medical examination. Noting that the medical examinations envisaged under section 1 of Decision No. 001 of 11 May 2004 appear to refer solely to the periodical medical examinations of young persons to be carried out during employment, the Committee reminded the Government that, in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no young persons under 18 years of age shall be admitted to employment unless they have been found to be fit for work by a thorough medical examination. Furthermore, the Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour, with the technical assistance of the Bolivian Standardization and Quality Institute (IBNORCA), has formulated regulations under the General Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act on work by young persons in industry, commerce, mining and agriculture. These regulations are due to come into force shortly. The Committee therefore requests the Government to provide information on the progress achieved in this connection and, on the establishment of thorough medical examination before admission to employment.

With regard to the frequency of the periodical medical examinations (Article 3, paragraphs 2 and 3), the medical examinations required until the age of 21 years in occupations which involve high health risks (Article 4) and the adoption of appropriate measures for the vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations (Article 6), the Committee noted the Government's indication that these subjects have not yet been covered. Nevertheless, the Government indicated that these and other matters envisaged by the Convention would be defined in the regulations on work by young persons issued under the General Occupational Health, Safety and Welfare Act. The Committee therefore hopes that these regulations will be adopted in the near future to give effect to these provisions of the Convention. It requests the Government to supply a copy of these regulations as soon as adopted.

Part V of the report form. Application in practice. The Committee noted that, due to economic constraints, there are certain shortcomings in the application of this Convention, particularly in the capitals of remote departments, such as Cobija and Trinidad, and in rural areas. Nevertheless, the Government was adopting measures, in accordance with the possibilities available to it, so that all young persons who work in the country will progressively be covered by the protection afforded by the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's statement with interest. It requests it to continue providing information on the progress achieved in the application of the Convention in practice in the country. The Committee also requests the Government to provide, if such statistics are available, information concerning the number of children and young persons who are engaged in work and have undergone the periodical medical examinations envisaged in the Convention; extracts from the reports of the inspection services relating to any infringements reported and the penalties imposed; and any other information illustrating the application of the Convention in practice.

Work by young persons in agriculture. Even though the Convention does not cover agricultural work, the Committee noted with interest the draft Presidential Decree regulating the exercise of and compliance with rights and obligations arising out of agricultural employment. Section 28(IV) provides that, before being admitted to employment, young persons shall undergo a free medical examination of fitness for work, which shall be repeated periodically. This provision also requires employers to maintain at the disposal of labour inspectors the corresponding medical certificate of fitness for employment. The Committee considered that this provision reflects the principle set out in Articles 2, 3 and 7 of the Convention with regard to agricultural work. In this respect, the Committee noted that the draft Presidential Decree is currently in the process of being approved by the Economic Policy Analysis Unit (UDAPE), which is a Government technical body responsible for preparing a preliminary report on the relevance of the approval of any legal provision by the Cabinet of Ministers. The Committee asks the Government to include provisions in the above draft relating to the intervals at which medical examinations shall be carried out (Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention).

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1973)

The Committee notes with regret that for the second consecutive year the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 7, paragraph 2, of the Convention. With regard to the methods of identification or other methods of supervision to be adopted for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets, the Committee requests the Government to take into consideration, when taking the legislative or regulatory measures on the basis of the analysis of the results obtained from the VALORA Plan, the indications contained in Recommendation No. 79 on the medical examination of young persons particularly Paragraph 14 on methods of supervision.

Moreover, the Committee invites the Government to refer to its comments under Convention No. 77.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1997)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 6 of the Convention. Apprenticeship. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that under sections 28 and 58 of the General Labour Act, children under 14 years of age may work as apprentices with or without pay. According to section 28 of the Act, an apprenticeship contract is a contract under which the employer undertakes to ensure that apprentices receive practical instruction in a trade or craft which the employer or some other person dispenses using the work of apprentices, whether or not remunerated, for a fixed period which may not exceed two years. The provision includes apprenticeships in commerce and activities involving the use of engine-driven machinery. Section 58 of the Act prohibits work by children under 14 years of age other than in apprenticeships.

The Committee noted that, according to the Government, apprenticeship is covered by special legislation on work done by girls, boys and adolescents, namely the Children's and Adolescents' Code, 1999. In this regard, the Committee observed that sections 137 and 138 of the 1999 Code deal with apprenticeship. Section 137 provides for an apprenticeship system, and section 138 defines apprenticeship as vocational training provided through an educational process and a specific trade, in accordance with a programme, under the management of an official and carried out in a suitable environment. The Committee observed that sections 137 and 138 on apprenticeship specify no minimum age for admission to apprenticeship. It reminded the Government that Article 6 of the Convention allows work by persons of at least 14 years of age in undertakings, where such work is part of an apprenticeship course. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that no one under the age of 14 years is engaged in an apprenticeship. It again requests the Government to provide information on the practical implementation of apprenticeship programmes.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Brazil

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report. In particular, it notes that a number of the provisions of the national legislation regulating child labour have been amended.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the National Council for the Elimination of Child Labour (CONAETI) had drawn up a National Plan for the Prevention and Eradication of Child Labour and it requested the Government to provide a copy of the Plan and the results achieved through its implementation. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the CONAETI is currently examining the reports of the organizations and agencies that are engaged in the implementation of the National Plan for the Prevention and Eradication of Child Labour. Once the analysis has been completed, the results will be transmitted to the Office.

The Committee noted previously that a Time-bound Programme (TBP) had been launched in October 2003 and would contribute to the development of programmes and activities essential for the establishment of the conditions required for the elimination of child labour in Brazil, including its worst forms. The Committee also noted that several action programmes targeting hazardous agricultural activities (particularly household agricultural activities), work in the informal economy and child domestic labour were to be implemented. In this respect, the Committee notes that, according to the ILO/IPEC evaluation reports, activities have been organized to raise the awareness of the population concerning child labour and its worst forms, education projects have been established and legislative measures adopted in relation to the most vulnerable children and young persons.

In relation to statistical data, the Committee noted previously that, while statistics showed that child labour had fallen between 1992 and 2001, the application of the legislation on child labour appeared to be encountering difficulties and child labour remained a problem in practice. The Committee expressed serious concern over the situation of children under 16 years of age who were compelled to work. It requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken since 2002 to harmonize progressively the de facto situation and the law. In this respect, the Committee notes with interest the statistical data provided by the Government in its report, which are based on the household survey carried out by the Brazilian Institute of Geography and Statistics (IBGE) in 2004. It notes that 5.4 million children and young persons between 5 and 17 years of age worked during the reference week. Of this number, over 4.5 per cent were aged between 5 and 9 years and over 34.4 per cent were between 10 and 14 years of age. Furthermore, the statistics show that between 2002 and 2004 the number of children between 5 and 9 years of age engaged in work fell by over 54,700. With regard to young persons between 10 and 15 years of age engaged in work, the number fell by around 311,000 and the number of young persons of the same age seeking work also fell by 380,000. Finally, with regard to young persons aged 15 years, the number also fell by over 83,000. In total, the number of children engaged in work between the ages of 5 and 16 years fell by around 450,000.

In its report, the Government indicates that the minimum age for admission to employment or work has been raised from 14 to 16 years. It adds that, although it is desirable for these children only to attend school instead of working, particularly for reasons of family necessity and delays in their studies, the possibility that children are engaged in work has to be taken into consideration. The majority of children and young persons who work do so in family enterprises, where it is very difficult for inspectors to fulfil their mission. According to the survey referred to above, in the case of children between 5 and 9 years of age, around 70 per cent of them are not paid when they perform work in the family enterprise for the subsistence of the family. However, according to the Government, this has to be seen in the context that around 5 per cent of these children do not attend school. The Government adds that since 2006 children have to be admitted to school from the age of 6 and attend school up to the age of 15 years. With regard to young persons between 10 and 14 years of age, they mainly work in family enterprises or in production activities for their own consumption. The Government also indicates that efforts have to be made in the field of education.

The Committee notes with interest the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour and strongly encourages it to pursue its efforts with a view to progressively improving the situation. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing detailed information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including, for example, statistical data disaggregated by sex and age on the nature, extent and trends in child labour and work by young persons under the minimum age specified by the Government when ratifying the Convention or in hazardous work, together with extracts of the reports of the inspection services. It further requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken for the implementation of the various action programmes established in the context of the TBP, with particular reference to measures to combat child labour, and the results achieved. Finally, it requests the Government to provide the results of the study undertaken in the context of the National Plan for the Prevention and Eradication of Child Labour when it has been completed.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government on other specific points.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the communication from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) of 30 August 2006 concerning certain allegations of non-compliance with the Convention. A copy of this communication was transmitted to the Government on 28 September 2006 so that it could comment. Moreover, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that, in the process of bringing the national legislation into conformity with Conventions Nos 138 and 182, a special subcommittee has been established to examine the shortcomings of the national legislation. The Committee hopes that the Government will submit to the special subcommittee the various issues raised below and in its direct request. It requests the Government to provide information on any new development in this respect.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children for economic and sexual exploitation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 228 of the Penal Code made it an offence to induce, facilitate or promote the prostitution of any person. It also noted that sections 206 and 207 of the Penal Code prohibit the sale and trafficking of children for economic exploitation. However, the Committee emphasized that section 231 of the Penal Code applies to the international trafficking of women for prostitution, without including other elements of trafficking, such as the international trafficking of boys or the internal trafficking of both girls and boys. The Committee also noted that, according to the report entitled "Good practices in action against child labour: Ten years of IPEC in Brazil", published by ILO/IPEC–Brazil in 2003, the sexual exploitation of children and young persons is an increasing phenomenon. It was estimated in that document that around 500,000 children between 9 and 17 years of age are sexually exploited in the country. The Committee expressed serious concern at the number of children in Brazil who are sexually exploited for commercial purposes.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Act No. 11.106 of 28 March 2005 amending Title VI, Chapter V, of the Penal Code relating to the procuring and the trafficking of persons. In particular, it notes that under section 231 of the Penal Code, as amended by Act No. 11.106 of 28 March 2005, the international trafficking of persons is prohibited and that, under new section 231-A of the Penal Code, the internal trafficking of persons is also prohibited. However, the Committee notes that, according to the activity reports of ILO/IPEC in 2006 on the project to combat the trafficking of persons, Brazil is a country of transit, origin and destination of child victims of international sale and trafficking for prostitution. Girls and boys are also victims of internal trafficking, particularly for exploitation in agricultural work, mines and charcoal production. In view of the above, the Committee greatly appreciates the amendments made to the Penal Code and requests the Government to renew its efforts to ensure the protection in practice of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for economic and sexual exploitation. In this respect, it requests the Government to provide information on the application of the provisions covering this worst form of child labour, including statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and the penal sanctions applied.

Article 6, paragraph 1. Programmes of action. 1. National Plan. With reference to its previous comments, in which it noted the National Plan to Combat Sexual Violence against Children and Young Persons, the Committee notes that the Plan is currently under examination with a view to being updated. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved in terms of the elimination of this worst form of child labour following the implementation of the National Plan. The Committee also requests it to provide a copy of the new Plan.

2. Project to combat trafficking in persons in Brazil. The Committee notes that, according to the ILO/IPEC activity reports of 2006 on the Project to combat trafficking in persons in Brazil, a Plan of Action to Combat Trafficking in Persons has been formulated and projects will subsequently be implemented. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the Plan of Action and the projects that are developed, as well as on the results achieved in terms of the elimination of the sale and trafficking of young persons under 18 years of age for economic and sexual exploitation.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assistance for their removal from these worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Commercial sexual exploitation. 1. Time-bound programme (TBP). The Committee previously noted that, since September 2003, the Government has been participating in the ILO/IPEC TBP on the worst forms of child labour, implemented in the states of Maranhão, Paraíba, Rio de Janeiro, Sao Paulo and Rio Grande do Sul. One of the worst forms of child labour covered by the TBP is the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the ILO/IPEC activities reports for 2006 on the TBP, the objectives of the projects to prevent children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and remove them from these forms of child labour have been achieved. It also notes that new projects are being implemented. The Committee further notes that monitoring programmes of the commercial sexual exploitation of children currently cover over 1,100 Brazilian municipalities and target 97,000 children. The Committee also takes due note of the fact that social assistance centres have been established to provide psychological and social support for children and young persons who are victims of sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts and to provide information on: (1) the number of young persons under 18 years of age who have been prevented from being engaged in commercial sexual exploitation; and (2) the number of children who are in practice removed from this worst form of child labour and the rehabilitation and social integration measures taken for these children.

2. Other measures. The Committee notes that, according to the ILO/IPEC activity reports for 2006 on the Project to combat trafficking in persons in Brazil, it has been demonstrated that, following police patrols to sites where it is the easiest to transfer the victims of trafficking, it was necessary to train the police services in relation to this problem. It further notes that awareness-raising measures have been taken for the service providers directly related to the tourism industry. The Committee also notes that awareness-raising activities for MERCOSUR countries and meetings with experts from other countries faced with the problems of the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation and work as domestic servants have been held with a view to exchanging information on these problems and sharing experience. The Committee considers that collaboration and the exchange of information between the various actors at the national and international levels concerned, such as governmental organizations, employers' and workers' organizations, non-governmental organizations and other civil society organizations, are essential to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to continue its efforts of collaboration and to provide information on the results obtained.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Child domestic workers. In its communication, the ITUC indicates that, according to an ILO/IPEC study of 2004, there are over 500,000 child domestic workers in Brazil. A significant number are extremely vulnerable to exploitation and forced labour and work under conditions prohibited by Convention No. 182. According to the ILO/IPEC study of 2004, these children do not attend school, particularly in the case of girls, whose school attendance rate is very low: some 28 per cent had had no formal education, 58 per cent had only received primary education, and only 10 per cent had secondary education. Although in Brazil the minimum age for admission to employment or work is 16 years, over 88 per cent of child domestic workers begin working before that age, usually at around 5 or 6 years of age. Certain children say that they do not receive payment and others that they do not have a day off during the week. In its communication, the ITUC adds that although the national legislation contains provisions applicable to child domestic labour, a clear legal framework would be necessary to end this form of exploitation of children. The ITUC points out that the fact that these children work in private houses, where it is difficult to monitor them, means that it is important to change public attitudes to child domestic work. This implies that the Government should consider taking preventive measures, including economic alternatives, to encourage families to send their children to school.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report to the effect that the characteristics of domestic work prevent the labour inspection services from carrying out inspections directly in houses. Labour inspectors do not have any legal powers to report violations of the laws as the Labour Code does not apply to this category of workers. The Committee notes that, according to the ILO/IPEC activity reports of 2006 on the TBP, an Act establishing the rights of domestic workers was adopted in 2006. Furthermore, that same year, Bill No. 5767 prohibiting the engagement of children under 16 years of age as domestic workers was submitted to the National Congress. The Committee further notes that discussions have been held on the inclusion of this form of child labour on the list of activities considered to be hazardous. Finally, it notes that child domestic work is one of the forms of child labour targeted by the TBP and that measures are being taken in the context of the implementation of the programme to combat this problem. Noting that children engaged in domestic work are often the victims of exploitation, which takes on very different forms, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the TBP to protect these children against the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government on certain other specific points.

Burkina Faso

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's reports.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted concordant information from various sources to the effect that the cases of trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour, particularly in agriculture, concern a substantial number of children in Burkina Faso. It also noted that Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003, defining and repressing the trafficking of children, prohibits and penalizes the trafficking of children, and requested the Government to provide information on the application of this Act in practice.

The Committee notes that, according to the UNICEF report on trafficking in persons, especially women and children, in West and Central Africa, published in 2006, children from Burkina Faso are the victims of trafficking in the following countries: Benin, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Mali, Niger, Nigeria, Togo, and also of trafficking to Europe. It also notes that, according to ILO/IPEC information, internal trafficking accounts for 70 per cent of cases and principally concerns girls who work as servants or as itinerant traders in the streets of the country's major cities. Cross-border trafficking of Burkinabé children is mainly with Côte d'Ivoire, even though new patterns of migration and trafficking have emerged with other countries of the region as destinations. Boys tend more to look for work in agriculture in neighbouring countries, in cotton, coffee or cocoa plantations. The Committee also notes that, according to the UNICEF report on the trafficking of persons, talibé children from Burkina Faso are exploited for begging in cities in the Gambia and also in rice fields in Mali.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's information to the effect that, since the adoption and implementation of Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 defining and repressing the trafficking of children, 31 cases of trafficking have been prosecuted in the 19 higher courts and 18 persons have been sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from one to three years. Moreover, it notes the Government's information on the recent cases of cross-border trafficking concerning children from Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Mali and Nigeria. The Committee observes that, although the Government has adopted a number of measures to combat the sale and trafficking of children for the exploitation of their labour, the problem still exists in practice. It encourages the Government to continue its efforts to ensure the protection in practice of children under 18 years of age against the sale and trafficking of children for the purpose of labour exploitation. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the practical application of Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 defining and repressing the trafficking of children, in particular by supplying statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Vigilance and supervision committees. In its previous comments, the Committee requested the Government to provide information on the activities of the vigilance and supervision committees. In this regard, the Committee notes that, according to the information in the activity report of ILO/IPEC on the LUTRENA programme combating trafficking in children for labour exploitation in West and Central Africa, the work done by the vigilance and supervision committees since 2002 has resulted in the interception of approximately 620 children from Burkina Faso involved in trafficking and in an information campaign for more than 3,600 members of various communities in the country, including 700 girls and 1,900 boys. The Committee encourages the Government to do its utmost to facilitate the work of these committees.

2. Child labour unit. The Committee notes that, according to the information in the ILO/IPEC activity report on the LUTRENA programme, a child labour unit has been set up. It requests the Government to supply information on the working of this unit by supplying reports on its activities.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes with interest that more than 26,730 children have benefited from the LUTRENA programme since it was launched in 2001. Of these, 14,790 children were removed from this worst form of child labour and 11,940 were prevented from being involved in it. It also notes that, between September 2006 and March 2007, some 92 child victims of trafficking were withdrawn from this worst form of child labour and received educational or training services.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assisting the removal of children from these worst forms. 1. Trafficking of children. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government in its report concerning the implementation of the LUTRENA programme in the country. It notes in particular that, in the context of this programme, training activities with regard to combating the trafficking of children have been undertaken with the social partners, labour inspectors and the general public, including children and their families; more than 632 children have benefited from the project and from educational support. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the measures taken in the context of the implementation of the LUTRENA programme to prevent young persons under 18 years of age from being victims of the sale or trafficking of children. In addition, it asks the Government to provide information on: (1) the number and location of reception centres which have been set up in the country to cater for child victims of trafficking; (2) programmes providing specific medico-social monitoring which have been drawn up and implemented for child victims of trafficking.

2. Project for small-scale gold mines in West Africa. The Committee notes that Burkina Faso is participating in the ILO/IPEC project entitled "Prevention and elimination of child labour in artisanal gold mining in West Africa (2005–08)", in which Mali and Niger are also taking part. The specific objective of the project is to remove children from gold mines, while establishing structures to prevent child labour, and to support local activities, particularly those aimed at enhancing the safety and boosting the income of adults working in the mines. The Committee notes that, according to the information in the 2007 ILO/IPEC activity report on the project in small-scale gold mines, more than 240 children had been prevented from being employed in hazardous work in the gold mines and were receiving school education. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken under the ILO/IPEC project in small-scale gold mines to: (a) prevent children from being engaged in hazardous work in the mines; and (b) provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained.

Clause (e). Taking account of the special situation of girls. The Committee notes that, according to ILO/IPEC–LUTRENA information, internal trafficking, which accounts for 70 per cent of cases, mainly concerns girls who work as servants or as hawkers in the streets of the big cities in the country. It observes that girls, particularly those employed in domestic work, are often the victims of exploitation, which takes on very diverse forms, and it is difficult to monitor their conditions of employment because of the unauthorized nature of the work. The Committee urges the Government to renew its efforts to protect girls, particularly against economic and sexual exploitation, and requests it to provide information on the measures taken in this regard in the context of the LUTRENA programme.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. 1. Regional cooperation. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, apart from the bilateral cooperation agreement on the cross-border trafficking of children signed with Mali, Burkina Faso in 2005 signed the multilateral cooperation agreement on combating the trafficking of children in West Africa and in 2006, the Abuja multilateral cooperation agreement. With regard to the agreement between Mali and Burkina Faso, the Committee notes the Government's information to the effect that 22 Malian children have been intercepted and repatriated to Mali. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of the agreements and indicate whether the information exchanges with the other signatory countries have made it possible to: (1) apprehend and arrest persons operating in networks engaged in the trafficking of children; and (2) detect and intercept child victims of trafficking in the border areas.

2. Poverty elimination. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the draft Decent Work Country Programme for Burkina Faso. It notes that the problems connected with child labour form part of the priorities of this country programme, including child labour in rural areas and in mines, and that the Government intends to take measures aimed at eliminating child labour in the context of poverty reduction. Noting that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the poverty cycle, which is essential for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken in the context of implementation of the country programme to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, particularly as regards the actual reduction of poverty among child victims of sale and trafficking, of forced begging and also of hazardous work in mines and quarries.

Part III of the report form. Court decisions. The Committee requested the Government to supply copies of court decisions further to the adoption of the Act of 27 May 2003 on the trafficking of children. In this respect, it notes the Government's indication that information would be sent subsequently to the Office. In view of the information provided by the Government on the number of prosecutions and convictions since the adoption and implementation of Act No. 038-2003/AN of 27 May 2003 defining and repressing the trafficking of children, the Committee hopes that the Government will be able to supply copies of these court decisions in its next report.

In addition, the Committee is raising a number of other points in a direct request to the Government.

Burundi

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the numerous documents attached.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) that child labour constitutes a serious problem in Burundi, particularly in agriculture and informal activities in urban areas. It also noted the statement by the Government that the socio-political crisis experienced by the country had aggravated the situation of children, some of whom were obliged to perform work "illegally" to support their families, very frequently in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee noted that section 3 of the Labour Code, in conjunction with section 14, prohibits work by young persons under 16 years of age in public and private enterprises, including farms, where such work is carried out on behalf of and under the supervision of an employer.

In its report, the Government confirms that the country's regulations do not apply to the informal sector, which consequently escapes any control. Nevertheless, the question of extending the application of the labour legislation to this sector is to be discussed in a tripartite context on the occasion of the revision of the Labour Code and its implementing texts. The Committee reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment and work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship, including own-account work. It expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to extend the scope of application of the Convention to work performed outside an employment relationship, particularly in the informal economy and in agriculture. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee previously noted the ITUC's indications that the war had weakened the education system due to the destruction of many schools and the death or abduction of a large number of teachers. According to the ITUC, the school attendance rate is lower and the illiteracy rate higher for girls. The Committee further noted that, according to a report of the International Bureau of Education (UNESCO) of 2004 relating to data on education, Legislative Decree No. 1/025 of 13 July 1989 reorganizing education in Burundi does not provide for free and compulsory primary education. Entry into primary education is around the age of 7 or 8 years and lasts six years. Children therefore complete primary education around the age of 13 or 14 years and then have to pass a competition to enter secondary education. The Committee further noted that in 1996 the Government had prepared a Global Plan of Action for Education designed to improve the education system, among other measures, by reducing inequalities and disparities in access to education and achieving a gross school attendance rate of 100 per cent by the year 2010.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government in its report with regard to the various measures adopted in the field of education. It notes that, under article 53(2) of the Constitution of 2005, the State is under the obligation to organize public education and promote access to such education. It further notes that basic education is free of charge and that the number of children attending school tripled during the 2006 school year. In 2007, primary schools will be constructed and other mobile and temporary schools will be established. Furthermore, coordination units for girls' education have been established and over 1,000 teachers recruited. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in the field of education and to provide information on the impact of the above measures in terms of increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the drop-out rate, with special attention to the situation of girls. It also requests the Government to indicate the age of completion of compulsory schooling and the provisions of the national legislation which determine this age.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government on other specific points.

The Committee notes the Government's first report. It also notes the comments made by the Confederation of Burundi Trade Unions (COSYBU), dated 30 August 2005, and the Government's reply. Furthermore, with reference to its comments under the Forced Labour Convention, 1930 (No. 29), concerning the recruitment of children for use in armed conflict and the commercial sexual exploitation of children and because the Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182), addresses these forms of child labour, the Committee considers that the comments under Convention No. 29 may be examined under Convention No. 182.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee noted previously that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its concluding observations on the initial report of the Government (CRC/C/15/Add.133, October 2000), expressed concern at the use of children by the State as soldiers or helpers in camps or in obtaining information. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed concern at the low minimum age for recruitment to the armed forces and at the widespread recruitment of children by opposition armed forces and the sexual exploitation of children by members of the armed forces. Moreover, the Committee of Experts noted that in March 2003 the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) made comments on the application of the Convention confirming the use of child soldiers by the armed forces.

The Committee notes that, in its comments, the COSYBU indicates that armed conflicts persist, maintained by the Partie pour la libération du peuple Hutu/Forces nationales pour la libération of Agathon Rwasa (PALIPEHUTU/FNL) and that children continue to be enrolled. It also notes the information provided by the Government in reply to COSYBU's comments according to which, following the signature of the Arusha Peace and Reconciliation Agreement in August 2000 and the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement signed with the Conseil national pour la défense de la démocratie/Forces pour la défense de la démocratie (CNDD/FDD) of Pierre Nkurunziza, the phenomenon of children being used in armed conflict has almost ended and the integration of these children into social and economic life is continuing. The Government adds that the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict is the worst form of child labour observed most commonly in Burundi. However, considering the relative calm that is being experienced over most of the national territory, it has launched the implementation of a vast programme for the demobilization and reintegration of former combatants through three organizations, namely: the National Commission for Demobilization, Reinsertion and Reintegration (CNDRR), the National Structure for Child Soldiers (SEN) and the ILO/IPEC project on the "Prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflicts: An interregional programme". Furthermore, according to the Government, all children have been demobilized except those used by the armed movement FNL (Front national de libération) of Agathon Rwasa, which has not yet laid down its arms.

The Committee notes that, in his Report on Children and Armed Conflicts in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the United Nations Secretary-General indicates that, despite the substantial progress achieved in addressing the grave violations of children's rights, violations are still occurring and the competent authorities have not always conducted criminal investigations nor punished those responsible. During the period from August 2005 to September 2006, the United Nations Operation in Burundi (UNOB) identified over 300 cases of child victims of grave violations, perpetrated mainly by members of the FNL and FND troops, including the murder and mutilation of children, serious sexual violence and the recruitment and use of children in armed groups and forces, with an increase of this latter violation being noted (paragraph 25). The Secretary-General adds that the authorities have not yet adopted national legislation to criminalize the recruitment and use of child soldiers (paragraph 36). Furthermore, according to the information contained in the Report of the Secretary-General of 27 October 2006, a ceasefire agreement was signed between the Government and Agathon Rwasa's FNL, the last active rebel movement, on 7 September 2006 (paragraph 5). Nevertheless, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicates that the implementation of the Comprehensive Ceasefire Agreement has remained stalled since its signature (paragraphs 1 and 2).

The Committee notes that, in the information provided under Convention No. 29, the Government indicates that the minimum age for enrolment in the armed forces of Burundi has been increased from 16 to 18 years. It also notes that, according to the information contained on the Internet site of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict (<http://www.un.org/children/conflict/english/home6.html>), following her visit to the country, the Government of Burundi has made progress in the protection of children affected by conflict. In this respect, the Committee notes that the Penal Code has been amended to bring its provisions into harmony with the international instruments on human rights ratified by Burundi and that the proposed changes include provisions relating to the protection of children and against war crimes. The Penal Code now provides that the recruitment of children under 16 years of age in armed conflicts constitutes a war crime. The Committee reminds the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour. It therefore requests the Government to take measures as a matter of great urgency to amend the national legislation and prohibit the forced recruitment of young persons under 18 years of age for use in armed conflict, either in the national armed forces or in rebel groups, and to provide information in this respect.

The Committee notes that, despite the measures adopted by the Government, the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflicts still occurs and that the situation in Burundi remains fragile. It expresses great concern at the current situation, particularly since the persistence of this worst form of child labour gives rise to other violations of the rights of the child, such as the murder and mutilation of children and sexual violence. In this respect, the Committee refers to the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi and requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to continue negotiations with a view to reaching a definitive peace agreement, putting an end unconditionally to the recruitment of children and undertaking the immediate and complete demobilization of all children. Finally, with reference to the Security Council which, in resolution 1612 of 26 July 2005, recalls "the responsibilities of States to end impunity and to prosecute those responsible for genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other egregious crimes perpetrated against children", the Committee urges the Government to convict and impose sufficiently and dissuasive penalties on persons found guilty of enrolling or using young persons under 18 years of age in armed conflict.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. In its communication, the COSYBU indicates that the extreme poverty of the population encourages parents to allow their children to engage in prostitution. In its report, the Government indicates that cases of the use of children for prostitution have been reported in the popular districts of the municipality of Bujumbura (Bwiza and Buyenzi). However, the juvenile police reacted rapidly and eradicated this phenomenon, with penalties being imposed on persons who recruited children for prostitution. The Committee notes that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the United Nations independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicates that more and more children are victims of sexual violence (paragraph 82). The Committee notes that sections 372 and 373 of the Penal Code penalize the use, procuring or offering of children who are minors for prostitution, even with their consent. The Committee notes that, even though the national legislation prohibits this worst form of child labour, the use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution remains a problem in practice. It requests the Government to renew its efforts to implement these provisions effectively in practice and to ensure the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against prostitution. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in this respect, including reports on the number of convictions. It also requests the Government to indicate whether the national legislation contains provisions criminalizing the client in the event of prostitution.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of children for illicit activities. Street children. In its communication, the COSYBU indicates that the extreme poverty of the population drives parents to allow their children to engage in begging. In his Report on Children and Armed Conflict in Burundi of 27 October 2006 (S/2006/851), the Secretary-General indicates that UNOB and its partner child protection agencies have received information on the recruitment of from three to ten male children per month, including street children in Bujumbura Mairie Province (paragraph 2 5). As the national legislation does not appear to regulate this activity, the Committee expresses grave concern at the increase in street children who are exposed to numerous risks, including being used or recruited for armed conflict or other illicit activities. It reminds the Government that, in accordance with Article 1 of the Convention, it is under the obligation to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to protect street children and to establish the prohibition in the national legislation of their use, procuring or offering for illicit activities. It also requests the Government to establish penalties for this purpose.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these worst forms and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Child soldiers. The Committee notes with interest that the Government is participating in the ILO/IPEC interregional project on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, which also includes the Congo, Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Philippines, Sri Lanka and Colombia. The objective of the programme is to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict, facilitate their removal and ensure their social integration. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the measures that it has taken with organizations to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict or to remove them from this worst form of child labour. It notes that, in the context of the ILO/IPEC interregional project, over 15 programmes of action have been implemented and that around 1,440 children have been demobilized in the areas covered by the project. The Committee further notes that, in his ninth report on the United Nations Operation in Burundi of 18 December 2006 (S/2006/994), the Secretary-General indicates that, since November 2003, the United Nations project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of children associated with armed forces and groups has freed and reintegrated 3,015 children (paragraph 27). It further notes that the National Structure for Child Soldiers is a project for the demobilization, reintegration and prevention of the recruitment of child soldiers which has been in operation since 2003. Up to now, 1,932 children have been demobilized in the context of this programme.

The Committee notes that the Ministry of National Solidarity, Human Rights and Gender has signed a memorandum of understanding with the Executive Secretariat of the NCDRR. In the context of this agreement, measures are adopted at different levels to raise the awareness of the various target groups with regard to the problem of recruitment (members of military forces, combatants, parents, young persons, the civil administration, civil society, NGOs and politicians) and to institutionalize training on the rights and protection of the child in armed conflicts within the training structures of the national army. Furthermore, children who have been demobilized and are exposed to the risk of being recruited once again are monitored. The Committee encourages the Government to continue collaborating with the various bodies involved in the process of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration with a view to removing children from armed forces and groups. It requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the ILO/IPEC interregional programme on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict with a view to preventing children from being enrolled in armed conflict and to remove them from this worst form of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures adopted for the rehabilitation and social integration of children who are in practice removed from armed forces or groups.

2. Sexual exploitation. Considering that a number of children are the victims of sexual exploitation as noted under Article 3(b), the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to remove young persons under 18 years of age from prostitution. It also requests the Government to envisage measures to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of children removed from this worst form of child labour.

Clause (c). Ensuring access to free basic education and vocational training for all children removed from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government to the effect that, during the 2004–05 school year, a total of 485 former child soldiers were reintegrated into primary school, 99 were oriented towards secondary school, 79 in technical training centres and 74 in training from craft workers. It strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to provide access to basic education or vocational training to children removed from armed conflict. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on this subject.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Street children. The Committee notes that in his report of 23 September 2005 (E/CN.4/2006/109), the United Nations independent expert on the human rights situation in Burundi indicates that the situation of children in the country remains extremely worrying. Children are affected not only by the continuing conflict, but also by the deteriorating economic situation (paragraph 55). According to some estimates, there are over 3,000 street children in the country. It also notes that, in the report of 19 September 2006 of the independent expert on the situation of human rights in Burundi (A/61/360), the Secretary-General indicates that the phenomenon of street children is on the rise in Bujumbura and that a programme aimed at curbing the trend has been elaborated and includes aspects relating to prevention, assistance and reintegration (paragraph 79). Recalling that street children are particularly exposed to the worst forms of child labour, the Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to protect them from these worst forms. It also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the programme to bring an end to this phenomenon, particularly with regard to measures for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is also raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Congo

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. In the observations that the Committee has been making for several years under Convention No. 29, it had noted the Government's information mentioning the existence of child trafficking between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing the children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading (fixed and itinerant) and domestic work. According to the Government, the receiving families force the children to work in unimaginable conditions. They have to work all day and are subjected to all kinds of hardships. The Committee noted that section 345 of the Penal Code provides for penalties for individuals found guilty of kidnapping. It noted that section 354 of the Penal Code provides for penalties for those found guilty of having, by means of fraud or violence, kidnapped or ordered the kidnapping of juveniles, or taken, led or moved them from the places where they had been placed by the individuals to whose authority or direction they were subject or had been entrusted. Furthermore, under section 356(1) of the Penal Code, sanctions are to be imposed on anyone who, without fraud or violence, has kidnapped, led away or tried to kidnap or lead away, a juvenile under 18 years of age.

The Committee reminded the Government that under Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of children is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour. It also drew the Government's attention to the fact that pursuant to Article 1 of the Convention, each member State which ratifies the Convention must take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour for a person under 18 years of age. The Committee requests that the Government indicate the extent to which sections 345, 354 and 356 of the Penal Code have been implemented in practice.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee reminded the Government that under Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, it must take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of penal sanctions. The Committee therefore requests that the Government adopt sanctions allowing for the prosecution of those involved in the sale or trafficking of children. In this regard, the Committee draws the Government's attention to the fact that sanctions of a sufficiently effective and dissuasive nature must be imposed. The Committee also requests that the Government provide information on the number and nature of reported infringements, the investigations carried out, legal proceedings, convictions and the sentences imposed.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and provide for their rehabilitation and social integration. Sale and trafficking of children. In the observations that the Committee has been making for several years under Convention No. 29, it had noted the information provided by the Government in which it is acknowledged that the trafficking of children between Benin and the Congo for the purpose of forcing the children to work in Pointe-Noire in trading (fixed and itinerant) and domestic work is contrary to human rights. Consequently, the Government has taken certain measures to curb child trafficking, including the repatriation by the Consulate of Benin of children that have either been picked up by the national police or removed from certain families, and the current requirement at borders (airport) for juveniles (children under 18 years of age) to have administrative authorization to leave Beninese territory. The Committee requests that the Government provide information on the impact of the measures taken as regards the rehabilitation and social integration of children following their withdrawal from labour.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Costa Rica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report. It notes in particular that the International Relations Commission is currently examining the Bill on the employment of young persons and the Bill prohibiting the performance of hazardous and unhealthy types of work by young workers. The Committee hopes that the examination of these Bills will result in their adoption and requests the Government to provide information on the progress made in the procedure relating to the two Bills and to provide copies once they have been adopted.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the statistics contained in the national report on the results of the study on work by children and young persons in Costa Rica, published in June 2003 by the National Statistical and Census Institute (INEC) and the Ministry of Labour and Social Security (MTSS), in collaboration with ILO/IPEC and the Statistical Information and Monitoring Programme on Child Labour (SIMPOC), according to which around 113,500 girls and boys aged between 5 and 17 years worked in Costa Rica. Of this number, around 49,200 children under 15 years of age, which is below the minimum age for admission to employment or work, were engaged in work, or 43.4 per cent. The principal sector of economic activity affected by child labour is agriculture, including the harvesting of coffee, which is one of the major exports in Costa Rica. The other economic sectors affected by child labour are manufacturing, commerce and services, including domestic work. Moreover, over 45 per cent of children who do not attend school do so for reasons related to work. The Committee noted the measures adopted by the Government to combat child labour, but expressed concern that the statistics showed that difficulties appear to be encountered in the application of the legislation on child labour and that child labour is widespread in Costa Rica.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government in its report, including the measures to raise awareness among public officials of the problem of child labour and the intra- and inter-institutional protection protocols intended to improve communication between the various persons working in this field. The Committee notes with interest the adoption of the Second National Plan for the prevention and elimination of child labour and the special protection of young workers (2005–10), which addresses eight subjects in a transversal manner, including rights, gender, poverty, the risk or fact of social exclusion and the social and cultural environment. The Committee further notes that, following the compilation of the various types of information provided by the institutions constituting the National Steering Committee, a report will be prepared on the progress achieved. However, it notes the statistics for 2005 of the National Directorate of Labour Inspection according to which 68 per cent of the 161 cases relating to minors working were concentrated in the central region. Furthermore, most children work in the commercial sector (33 per cent), services (27 per cent), industry (20 per cent) and the agricultural sector (15 per cent).

With reference to the Government's collaboration with ILO/IPEC, the Committee notes that Costa Rica is participating in the Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour and the Subregional Programme for the elimination of child labour. According to the activity reports of the TBP, the programme has directly benefited over 150 families and 1,100 children and indirectly over 113,000 children. With regard to the ILO/IPEC Subregional Programme on the prevention and elimination of child labour in the coffee industry, the Committee takes due note of the statistics provided by the Government. In this respect, it notes that, in the context of the Second National Plan, the Ministry of Agriculture will develop action to eliminate child labour in agriculture. Furthermore, according to the activity reports of the TBP, projects are being implemented to prevent the premature engagement of children in work. The Committee greatly appreciates the measures adopted by the Government for the abolition of child labour, and it considers that these measures are an affirmation of the political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. It therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to provide information on the implementation of the projects and the new National Plan referred to above, and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour, particularly in the agricultural, industrial, commercial and service sectors. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, including statistical information disaggregated by sex on the nature and extent of work by children, extracts of the reports of the inspection services and information on the number and nature of the violations reported and the penalties imposed.

Article 2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted a contradiction between, on the one hand, section 89 of the Labour Code, which established a minimum age for admission to employment of 12 years and, on the other, sections 78 and 92 of the Code of Children and Young Persons, which set this minimum age at 15 years, in accordance with the minimum age specified when the Convention was ratified. In this respect, the Government indicated that, despite the contradiction between the provisions of the Labour Code respecting the minimum age for admission to employment and work and those of the Code of Children and Young Persons, the applicable rule was contained in the latter. The Government added that it would convey to the competent authorities the suggestion made by the Committee of Experts that the provisions of the Labour Code should be harmonized with those of the Code of Children and Young Persons. In view of these statistics on child labour, the Committee considered that, to ensure the protection of children under 15 years of age who are engaged in work, the harmonization of the provisions of the Labour Code with those of the Code of Children and Young Persons is important.

In its report, the Government indicates that no draft legislation has been submitted to amend the Labour Code. However, in the legal system in Costa Rica, the principle that a standard contained in special legislation, in the present case the Code of Children and Young Persons, prevails over one contained in a general law, in this case the Labour Code, is applicable, as well as the principle that the most favourable provision and the most beneficial conditions have to be implemented. While taking due note of the Government's indications, the Committee considers it desirable, taking into account the statistics on work by children under 15 years of age in the country, for the provisions of the Labour Code to be harmonized with those of the Code of Children and Young Persons. It hopes that on the occasion of a revision of the labour legislation, and particularly of the Labour Code, the Government will take the necessary measures in this respect.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). 1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. With reference to its observations under Convention No. 29, the Committee noted that in its initial report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in August 2000 (CRC/C/3/Add.57, paragraphs 68, 205 and 206), the Government indicated that phenomena such as the trafficking and sale of children for their sexual and commercial exploitation are increasingly widespread in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Nevertheless, there is no in-depth study or statistics on the subject. The Government also indicated that the causes are mainly of an economic nature, but also of a social, family, political-legal and cultural nature. The Committee further noted that, in its concluding observations, of July 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.153, paragraphs 68 and 69), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the information on the trading, trafficking, kidnapping and use for pornography of young girls and boys within the territory of the country, or from the Democratic Republic of the Congo to another country, and that it considered it to be of great concern that domestic legislation does not sufficiently protect children from trafficking. The Committee on the Rights of the Child strongly recommended that the Government take urgent measures to end the sale, trafficking and sexual exploitation of children through, among others, the adoption and implementation of appropriate legislation and the use of the criminal justice process to punish those persons responsible for such practices.

The Committee noted that the Government ratified the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography in November 2001. It also noted that section 67 of the Penal Code prohibits the forceful abduction, restraint or detention of any person. Section 68 prohibits the abduction, restraint or detention of any person for the purpose of sale as slaves or the use of persons placed under their authority for that purpose. As indicated by the Government to the Committee on the Rights of the Child, the provisions of the Penal Code to suppress the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation are not appropriate in view of the extent of the phenomenon. The Committee therefore requests the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to prohibit in national legislation the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years of age for the purposes of sexual exploitation and to adopt appropriate penalties for contraventions of the prohibition.

2. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. With reference to its observations under Convention No. 29, the Committee noted that, in her report on the situation of human rights in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in April 2003 (E/CN.4/2003/43, paragraphs 33–36), the United Nations Special Rapporteur indicated that the phenomenon of child soldiers continues to be very disturbing. There is very little demobilization and mass recruitment taking place in the east of the country; according to UNICEF and the NGOs, there are more than 30,000 child soldiers in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In Uvira, in South Kivu, all the armed groups in the region (RCD/Goma, Maï-Maï, Banyamulenge) continue to recruit children. Children aged under 15 make up a large proportion of the Maï-Maï, the Congolese National Army (ANC) and the Congolese Patriotic Union (UPC). The UPC has on several occasions ordered local communities to “supply children” for the war effort. According to the information transmitted to the Special Rapporteur, many child soldiers are abducted from their families by the various armed groups. They include young girls, who are frequently used as sex slaves for the soldiers. Many of the children are sent to the front.

The Committee also noted that, according to the report of the Secretary-General of the United Nations on children and armed conflict of 9 February 2005 (A/59/695-S/2005/72, paragraphs 15–22), since the establishment of the Transitional Government in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, the Forces armées congolaises (FAC, the armed forces of the former Government), the Mouvement de libération du Congo (MLC), the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-Goma (RCD-Goma), the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-Kisangani/Mouvement de libération (RCD-K/ML), the Rassemblement congolais pour la démocratie-National (RCD-N) and the main Maï-Maï groups represented at the inter-Congolese dialogue have been integrated into the new national army, the Forces armées de la République démocratique du Congo (FARDC). According to the Secretary-General, while this is a positive step, the various military units have yet to be fully integrated. In many cases, the units are only nominally FARDC, and some of them continue to use children. Since the designation of FARDC regional military commanders in October 2003, some 5,000 children, a small number of them girls, have been released from armed forces and groups. The Secretary-General however indicates that, despite some advances, thousands of children remain in the armed forces and armed groups in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and recruitment, although not systematic, has continued. Although reiterating its commitment to separate all children from the FARDC, the état-major has not yet provided adequate information about the presence of children in its numerous brigades. While some regional and local commanders have released children, no mass release of children has yet taken place.

The Committee noted that the Democratic Republic of the Congo ratified the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the involvement of children in armed conflict in November 2001. It also noted that Article 184 of the Transitional Constitution provides that no one shall be recruited into the armed forces of the Democratic Republic of the Congo nor take part in a war or hostilities unless he has reached the age of 18 years at the time of recruitment. Furthermore, the Committee noted that the Government has adopted Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 to demobilize and reintegrate vulnerable groups present in the fighting forces (Legislative Decree No. 066). Under the terms of section 1 of Legislative Decree No. 066, an order has been issued to demobilize the vulnerable groups in the Congolese armed forces or other armed groups operating in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and to provide for their socio-economic integration and their integration into their families. Under section 2, the term “vulnerable groups” includes child soldiers, girls or boys aged under 18 years, which constitute a specific group requiring urgent humanitarian intervention.

Despite the action taken by the Government in this field, the Committee expressed particular concern at the current situation of children who are still recruited for armed conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In this respect, the Committee referred to the United Nations Security Council which, in resolution No. 1493, adopted on 28 July 2003, indicates that it “strongly condemns the continued recruitment and use of children in the hostilities in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, especially in North and South Kivu and in Ituri”. With reference to the United Nations Human Rights Commission, which in resolution No. 84, adopted on the 22 April 2004, “urges all the parties (...) to put an end to the recruitment and use of child soldiers, contrary to international law (...)”, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to ensure compliance with the legislation applicable in respect of the forced and compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. It also requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to take measures as a matter of urgency to ensure that young persons under 18 years of age are not forced to take part in armed conflict either in the national armed forces or in rebel groups, and to provide information on any further measures adopted or envisaged for this purpose. The Committee also requests the Government to provide a copy of Legislative Decree No. 066 of 9 June 2000 on the demobilization and reintegration of vulnerable groups present in the fighting forces.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Mines. In its communication, the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo indicated that young persons under 18 years of age are engaged in mineral quarries in the provinces of Katanga and East Kasai. In this respect, the Committee noted that, in her report on the situation of human rights in the Democratic Republic of the Congo in April 2003 (E/CN.4/2003/43, paragraph 59), the United Nations Special Rapporteur noted that military units recruit children and force them to work, especially to extract natural resources. She added that NGOs in South Kivu informed her of children being recruited by armed groups to work in mines. The Committee referred to its observations under Convention No. 29, in which it noted the Concluding Observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child of July 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.153, paragraphs 66 and 67), according to which many children are at work in dangerous work environments, particularly in the Kasai mines and at certain locations in Lubumbashi. The Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended that the Government take measures to enforce legal protection in both the formal and informal work sectors, including in mines and other harmful environments.

The Committee noted that section 3(2)(d) of the Labour Code prohibits child labour in its worst forms, and particularly work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm the health, safety, dignity or morals of children. Under the terms of section 1 of Ministerial Order No. 68/13 of 17 May 1968 determining the conditions of work of women and children (Order No. 68/13), it is prohibited for any employer to engage children in work in excess of their strength or exposing them to high occupational risks. The Committee also noted that under section 32 of Order No. 68/13, the extraction of minerals, shale, materials and debris from mines, open cast mines and quarries, as well as earthworks, are prohibited for young persons under 18 years of age. The Committee noted that section 326 of the Labour Code establishes penalties for violations of the provisions of section 3(2)(d) respecting hazardous work. Furthermore, it noted that the Democratic Republic of the Congo participates in the certification scheme for the internal control of diamonds established by the Kimberley Process. The Committee observed that although the legislation is in conformity with the Convention on this point, child labour in mines is a problem in practice. The Committee requests the Government to provide information in relation to the allegations made by the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo. It also requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the effective application of the legislation for the protection of children against hazardous types of work, and particularly hazardous work in mines.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee recalled that, under Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government has to take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including the provision and application of penal sanctions. The Committee therefore requests the Government to indicate the penal provisions relating to: the sale or trafficking of children for sexual exploitation; the forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict; the engagement of children in hazardous work in mines. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the number and nature of the infringements reported, the investigations undertaken, legal proceedings initiated, convictions and the penalties applied in practice.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation. The Committee noted that, in its concluding observations of July 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.153, paragraph 69), the Committee on the Rights of the Child recommended to the Government that the police force and border officials should receive special training to help in combating the sale, trafficking and sexual exploitation of children, and that programmes be established to provide assistance, including rehabilitation and social integration, to the child victims of sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of young persons under 18 years of age who are victims of sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation.

2. Child soldiers. The Committee noted that the Government, through the Ministries of Human Rights and Defence, has adopted, in collaboration with the National Demobilization and Reintegration Bureau (BUNADER), a national programme of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants (PNDR). It also noted that a National Commission on Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration was established in March 2004. Furthermore, the Committee noted that the Government is participating in the ILO/IPEC interregional project on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, which also covers Burundi, Rwanda, Congo, Philippines, Sri Lanka and Colombia. The objectives of the programme are to prevent the recruitment of children in armed conflict, facilitate their removal and ensure their social integration.

The Committee also noted that, in his report of 9 February 2005 on children and armed conflict (A/59/659-S/2005/72, paragraphs 15–22), the Secretary-General of the United Nations indicated that in early 2004 the Transitional Government adopted a national policy and procedural framework for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of children in FARDC and all other armed groups. The National Commission on Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration has been actively planning the National Programme of Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration with the Military Integration Structure (MONUC), the United Nations country team and NGOs. During the reporting period, MONUC, UNICEF and their child protection partners have been collaborating with the National Commission in the ongoing activities to remove children from the armed forces and armed groups. They have also been pursuing dialogue with the military authorities to advocate and plan the separation of children. In order to do so, direct contacts have been made with field commanders, the Ministry of Defence and the FARDC leadership. Since the designation of FARDC regional military commanders in October 2003, some 5,000 children, a small number of them girls, have been released from armed forces and groups. The planning of reintegration projects has also continued. The Secretary-General adds that in Ituri, some progress has been made through dialogue with various armed groups, as well as through collaborative disarmament, demobilization and reintegration planning by the United Nations country team and NGOs. In May 2004, the Forces armées populaires congolaises (FAPC), the Front nationaliste et intégrationniste (FNI), the Parti pour l'Unité et la sauvegarde du Congo (PUSIC), the Union des patriotes congolais (UPC-Thomas Lubanga faction) and the UPC-Floribert Kisembo faction formally undertook to participate in the disarmament and community reintegration programme, which first became operational in early September 2004. As of mid-December, almost 700 children had passed through this programme. An unspecified number of children had been released from these groups prior to the launching of the programme.

The Committee encourages the Government to continue collaborating with the various bodies involved in the disarmament and community integration process with a view to removing children from armed forces and groups. It requests the Governments to provide information on the impact of the ILO/IPEC interregional programme on the prevention and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict and the results achieved. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of the children who are in practice withdrawn from armed forces and groups.

Article 7, paragraph 3. Competent authority responsible for the implementation of the provisions giving effect to the Convention. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Ministry of Labour and Social Insurance, through the Committee to Combat Child Labour, is responsible for the implementation of the provisions giving effect to the Convention. The Government added that the Committee to Combat Child Labour will formulate a national strategy, monitor its implementation and evaluate the effect given to the measures recommended. However, the Committee noted that in its communication to the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo stated that, although section 4 of the Labour Code provides for the establishment of a Committee to Combat Child Labour, it has never been created. The Committee requests the Government to provide information relating to the allegations of the Confederation of Trade Unions of the Congo. It also requests the Government to provide information on the national strategy formulated by the Committee to Combat Child Labour and to provide a copy when it has been adopted.

Article 8. Enhanced international cooperation and assistance. The Committee noted that the Democratic Republic of the Congo is a member of Interpol, the organization which assists in cooperation between countries in the various regions, in fields such as combating the trafficking of children. It also noted, according to World Bank information, that the Government has been preparing a Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (PRSP) since 2002, with the development phase of the strategy due to begin in 2005. Recalling that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the circle of poverty, which is essential for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on any significant impact of the PRSP on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, and particularly on the sale and trafficking of children for sexual exploitation, the forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict and the performance of hazardous work in mines.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Dominica

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1983)

The Committee notes with regret that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee recalled that, under section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance, the minimum age of admission to employment was 12 years and that, under section 4, subsections (1) and (5), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance, the minimum age is 14 years. The Government, however, specified a minimum age of 15 years when it ratified the Convention. It once again urges the Government to take the necessary measures in order to raise the statutory minimum age to 15 years, in accordance with this provision of the Convention.

The Committee further noted that the statutory provisions on minimum age applied only to persons employed under an employment relationship or under a contract of employment, whereas the Convention also covered work performed outside any employment relationship, including work performed by young persons on their own account. The Committee hopes that the Government will indicate the measures taken or envisaged to give full effect to the Convention on this point.

Article 3. Hazardous work. The Committee recalled that no higher minimum age had been fixed for work which is likely to jeopardize the health, safety or morals of young people, other than night work. It once again urges the Government to take measures so as to set such higher minimum age(s) in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention, and to determine the types of employment or work to which higher minimum age(s) should apply, in accordance with Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention.

Article 7. Light work. The Committee noted that the national legislation allowed exceptions to the above minimum ages as regards the employment of children under the age of 12 years in domestic work or agricultural work of a light nature at home by the parents or guardian of such children (section 3 of the Employment of Children Prohibition Ordinance) and the employment of children under the age of 14 years in an undertaking or on a ship where only members of the same family are employed (section 4, subsection 1 and section 5, of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance). The Committee recalled that under this Article of the Convention, national laws or regulations may permit the employment or work of persons 13 to 15 years of age on light work which is: (a) not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and (b) not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, their participation in vocational orientation or training programmes approved by the competent authority or their capacity to benefit from the instruction received. Another condition is that the activities involved and the conditions of work and employment should be determined by the competent authority. It hopes that the Government will take measures to restrict, in accordance with this provision, the possibility to employ children below the minimum age specified, and to determine the activities and conditions of their employment or work.

As regards the Government's reference to the work of family members as the category excluded under Article 4, the Committee pointed out that the exceptions under this provision must be listed in the first report after ratification, and that the Government declared in its first report, received in February 1988, that no use was made of this provision.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Keeping of registers. The Committee noted that section 8, subsection (1), of the Employment of Women, Young Persons and Children Ordinance provided for the keeping of registers or lists of young persons of less than 16 years of age, whereas the Convention describes the keeping of such registers of persons of less than 18 years of age. It noted the Government's indication that this provision is not applied in practice. The Committee nevertheless pointed out that the Government has an obligation to give effect to the provisions of the Convention in law and practice. It therefore once again asks the Government to take the necessary measures so that registers or other documents are kept by the employer concerning workers younger than 18 years of age.

The Committee noted the Government's indication that the provisions of the Convention are upheld by custom and practice. Pending the necessary amendments to the legislative provisions as requested above, the Committee once again asks the Government to supply detailed information on how the Convention is applied in practice, as required under Part V of the report form, including, for instance, extracts from official reports, statistics, and information on inspection visits made and contraventions reported.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Honduras

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1980)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the attached documentation. It also notes the detailed observations made by the Honduran Council for Private Enterprise (COHEP).

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that it would be necessary to amend section 2(1) of the Labour Code, which excludes from its scope agricultural and stock-raising undertakings that do not permanently employ more than ten workers, so that the minimum age provisions contained in the Labour Code apply to this category of workers. In this respect, it noted the Government's indications that the draft revision of the Labour Code contained provisions which would bring the national labour legislation into conformity with the international Conventions ratified by Honduras, thereby harmonizing the provisions of the Labour Code and the 2001 Child Labour Regulations with those of the 1996 Code for Children and Young Persons. This would give effect to the provisions respecting the minimum age for admission to work to young persons working under a contract of employment or on their own account. The Committee also noted certain statistics contained in the national report on child labour in Honduras of 2002, according to which 54.3 per cent of children between 5 and 9 years of age and 59.8 per cent of those between 10 and 14 years of age work in agriculture, forestry, hunting and fisheries. In addition, 6.2 per cent of children between 5 and 17 years of age in urban areas and 7 per cent in rural areas work on their own account. The Committee hoped that the draft revision of the Labour Code would be adopted in the near future.

The Committee notes the Government's indications that, although the draft revision of the Labour Code has still not been adopted, it is one of the Government's priorities and that it will examine the possibility of including the Committee's recommendations. Observing that it has been raising this matter for a number of years, and in view of the worrying statistics referred to above, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the draft revision of the Labour Code will be adopted in the near future and that it will contain provisions guaranteeing the protection afforded by the Convention to children who work in agricultural and stock-raising undertakings that do not permanently employ more than ten workers.

Article 2, paragraph 4. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under section 120(2) of the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996, a minor under 14 years of age may not, under any circumstances, be permitted to work. The Committee also noted that, under section 32(1) of the Labour Code, young persons under 14 years of age and those having reached this age who are still engaged in compulsory education are not allowed to work. However, it noted that, under section 32(2) of the Labour Code, the authorities responsible for supervising work by persons under 14 years of age may permit them to work if they consider that it is indispensable for ensuring their subsistence or that of their parents or their brothers and sisters, and provided that it does not prevent them from completing their compulsory schooling. The Government indicated that cultural practices in the country make child labour legitimate at an age that is well below the minimum age for admission to employment or work specified when the Convention was ratified, namely 14 years. The Committee also noted the measures adopted by the COHEP and the Chambers of Commerce to prohibit their members from employing boys and girls under 14 years of age and to prevent the access of children to the workplace, even with their parents. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that no minor under 14 years of age is permitted to work in any sector of economic activity.

In its report, the Government indicates that article 128(7) of the Constitution of Honduras provides that young persons under 16 years of age and those who have reached this age but are still subject to compulsory schooling may not be engaged in any work. It adds that section 119 of the Code for Children and Young Persons provides that child labour is subject to the provisions of article 128 of the Constitution. The Committee notes that section 120 of the Code for Children and Young Persons is in conformity with the age specified by the Government, namely 14 years. However, it observes that, in the same way as section 32(2) of the Labour Code, article 128(7) of the Constitution provides that the authorities responsible for labour may permit young persons of 16 years of age and less to work if they consider that it is indispensable for ensuring their subsistence or that of their parents or of their brothers and sisters, and provided that it does not prevent them from completing their compulsory education. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, no one under the age specified shall be admitted to employment or work in any occupation, subject to the derogations envisaged in Articles 4 to 8 of the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that, in the context of the revision of the Labour Code, the Government will take into account the above comments and it requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to ensure that no minor under 14 years of age is permitted to work in any sector of economic activity.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Hazardous work from the age of 16 years. The Committee noted previously that, under section 122(3) of the Code for Children and Young Persons of 1996, young persons between 16 and 18 years of age may be permitted to perform hazardous types of work, as listed in section 122(2) of the Code, if so approved by technical studies undertaken by the National Vocational Training Institute or a specialized technical institute under the responsibility of the Secretariat of State for Public Education. The Committee noted the Government's indication that the Department of Labour and Social Security examines the technical studies with a view to certifying that the workloads associated with the tasks in question can be performed by young persons between 16 and 18 years of age and that occupational safety measures are adopted in order to minimize the dangers to their health and safety. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the number of permits granted by the Department of Labour and Social Security to young persons between 16 and 18 years of age.

In its report, the Government indicates that the use of the term "could" in section 122 of the Code for Children and Young Persons means that a work permit for a young person over 16 years of age may only be granted in cases in which, in the view of the Department of Labour and Social Security, the work would not prejudice the young person. The Government adds that for work to be permitted by a young person, the latter must attend school. While taking due note of the information provided by the Government, the Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that the young persons have received adequate specific instruction or vocational training in the relevant branch of activity. In view of the fact that, according to the statistics contained in the national report on child labour in Honduras of 2002, a large number of children still work in hazardous activities, the Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that, where a young person of 16 years of age is permitted to perform hazardous types of work, the conditions set out in this provision of the Convention are observed. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the number of work permits granted by the Department of Labour and Social Security to young persons between 16 and 18 years of age.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee previously noted the 2003 statistics provided by the Government, according to which 255,972 children between the ages of 5 and 17 years were engaged in an economic activity, with 65.4 per cent of them being in rural areas and 34.6 per cent in urban areas. It also noted the measures adopted by the Government to combat child labour, including the adoption of the National Action Plan on the prevention and gradual and progressive elimination of child labour and the implementation of various programmes of action in collaboration with ILO/IPEC.

In this respect, the Committee notes that a new plan for the prevention and gradual and progressive elimination of child labour is currently being developed and will be closely linked to the worst forms of child labour. It further notes that the country is collaborating with ILO/IPEC, particularly for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. The Committee also notes the information provided by the COHEP concerning its programme of monthly grants for students, particularly with a view to reducing the school drop-out rate. Furthermore, the COHEP has supported the ILO/IPEC project for the elimination of child labour in the firework sector and has given instructions to all enterprises in the formal economy not to employ children under 14 years of age.

However, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations on the third periodic report by the Government in February 2007, the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at: the lack of funds allocated for the implementation of the National Plan of Action for the prevention and gradual and progressive elimination of child labour; the large number of children, especially in rural areas and among the indigenous people, working in exploitative conditions, including children engaged in deep sea fishing in Puerto Lempira; young persons between 14 and 17 years of age working in mines; and the high percentage of children who do not attend school (CRC/C/HND/CO/3, paragraph 72). While noting the efforts made by the Government to combat child labour, the Committee expresses serious concern at the situation of children under 14 years of age compelled to work in the country. It therefore strongly encourages the Government to renew its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to take the necessary measures, including the allocation of additional resources, for the implementation of the new National Plan. In this respect, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of this National Plan and the programmes of action which will be established in this context, as well as on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour and in the field of school attendance.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report and the attached documents.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clauses (a) and (b). Sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation and the use of children for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 234-2005 of 28 September 2005 reforming the Penal Code. It notes in particular that sections 148 and 149 prohibit procuring, namely the recruitment and submission of a person to commercial sexual exploitation, and the international and internal trafficking of persons for commercial exploitation. These two provisions also establish heavier penalties when the victim is under 18 years of age. Furthermore, sections 149-B and 149-D prohibit the use of young persons under 18 years of age in public or private exhibitions or performances of a sexual nature and in the production of pornography. Section 149-E also penalizes the international and national promotion of the country as a tourist destination accessible for sexual activity.

However, the Committee notes, according to the information contained in the evaluation reports of the ILO/IPEC subregional project entitled "Contribution to the prevention and elimination of commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic", in which Honduras is participating along with Belize, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua, that despite the progress achieved, the problem of the commercial sexual exploitation of young persons under 18 years of age still persists in the country. In this respect, the Committee also notes that, in its concluding observations of February 2007 (CRC/C/HND/CO/3), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern that, despite the measures taken, particularly in terms of legislation, the commercial sexual exploitation of children is common in Honduras and is not only due to poverty and the socio-economic situation prevailing in the country. The Committee considers that the new provisions of the Penal Code improve protection against the commercial sexual exploitation of children and trafficking for this purpose and encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on the application of the new provisions in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of infringements reported, investigations carried out, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Article 6. Programme of action. National Plan of Action on the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes that, in the context of the ILO/IPEC subregional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, a National Plan of Action to prevent and eliminate the commercial sexual exploitation of children has been developed. It requests the Government to provide information on the programmes of action developed in the context of the implementation of the National Plan of Action and the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour and assistance for the removal of children from these worst forms. The commercial sexual exploitation of children. 1. ILO/IPEC subregional project. The Committee notes the information contained in the evaluation reports of the ILO/IPEC subregional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic, according to which around 240 children have been prevented from being the victims of commercial sexual exploitation or have been removed from this worst form of child labour in the country. The Committee strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to combat commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the implementation of the ILO/IPEC subregional project and on the results achieved in terms of: (a) preventing children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation or trafficking for this purpose; and (b) providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of the child victims of these worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. Tourist activities. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the information contained in the ILO/IPEC study of 2002 entitled “Commercial sexual exploitation of boys, girls and young persons in Honduras”, commercial sexual exploitation is an activity that is on the increase in the country. This form of exploitation exists throughout the national territory, for example in tourist areas, border areas, ports and on international traffic routes. As the country has a certain level of tourism, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to raise the awareness of actors directly linked to the tourist industry, such as associations of hotel owners, tourist operators, taxi companies and the owners of bars, restaurants and their employees.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. HIV/AIDS orphans. The Committee noted previously that, according to the study entitled “Commercial sexual exploitation of boys, girls and young persons in Honduras”, published by ILO/IPEC in 2002, HIV/AIDS is a health problem affecting children who are victims of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also noted that, according to the Joint United Nations Programme on HIV/AIDS (UNAIDS), Honduras reports 50 per cent of the cases of HIV/AIDS of the whole of Central America. The Committee notes that, according to the paper entitled AIDS epidemic update, published in December 2006 by UNAIDS and the WHO, the increasing incidence of the virus is a cause for concern. In this respect, the Committee notes that, in its concluding observations of February 2007 (CRC/C/HND/CO/3), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at this situation. Noting the seriousness of this situation, the Committee regrets the absence of information in the Government’s report on this issue. The Committee once again observes that HIV/AIDS has serious consequences for orphans, who are at increased risk of being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, and particularly commercial sexual exploitation. It therefore urges the Government to take the specific time-bound measures taken to prevent child HIV/AIDS orphans from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of these children removed from these worst forms.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the ILO/IPEC study “Commercial sexual exploitation of boys, girls and young persons in Honduras”, activities relating to the commercial sexual exploitation of boys, girls and young persons are linked to international trafficking networks and affect girls in particular. Noting the absence of information on this subject in the Government’s report, the Committee once again requests it to provide information on the manner in which it intends to accord special attention to these girls and remove them from commercial sexual exploitation.

Article 8. International and regional cooperation. Commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee takes due note of the measures adopted in the context of the ILO/IPEC subregional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Central America, Panama and the Dominican Republic, including awareness-raising campaigns for the public and the media and the holding of a regional seminar bringing together the governments collaborating in the ILO/IPEC project and Interpol agents. The Committee notes that the strengthening of horizontal collaboration between countries participating in the project is planned in the context of the ILO/IPEC subregional project. The Committee is of the view that cooperation between law enforcement agencies, particularly the judicial authorities and police forces, is indispensable to prevent and eliminate commercial sexual exploitation, and particularly the sale and trafficking of children for that purpose, through the collection and exchange of information and through assistance to detect and prosecute the individuals involved and to repatriate victims. The Committee therefore hopes that, in the context of the implementation of the ILO/IPEC subregional project on the prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children, the Government will take measures to cooperate with the participating countries and accordingly reinforce security measures, particularly on the common borders with El Salvador, Guatemala and Nicaragua, with a view to bringing an end to this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Indonesia

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 6 September 2005. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Self-employment. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that child labour was widespread in Indonesia and that most child labour took place in informal unregulated activities, such as street vending, agricultural and domestic sectors. The Committee had also noted that Act No. 13 of 2003 (Manpower Act) appears to exclude from its application children who are engaged in self-employment or in employment without a clear wage relationship. It had further noted that the Government was in process of formulating a regulation concerning children working in the informal sector, in conformity with section 75 of the Manpower Act. The Committee notes the Government's statement that at the moment it is still coordinating with stakeholders concerning an arrangement for children working outside an employment relationship. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any progress made towards the adoption of a regulation concerning children working outside an employment relationship.

2. Domestic work. The Committee notes the ITUC's allegation in its communication of 6 September 2005 that girls as young as 12 years routinely work 14–18 hours a day, seven days a week, without a day off. Moreover, according to the ITUC, many child domestic workers are promised decent wages, good working conditions and the opportunity to attend school, but these promises have rarely materialized. Very few are able to attend formal school, and most receive wages far below the minimum wage in the formal sector. Some receive no wages at all. The Committee notes the ITUC's information that, although Indonesia ratified the Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138), and national law sets the minimum age for employment at 15 years, girls were found typically entering domestic work between the age of 12 and 15 and some begin work even earlier. The ITUC adds that it would appear that the Government had failed to take meaningful action to protect domestic workers – who number at minimum 688,000 children – from exploitation and abuse. National labour laws exclude domestic workers from the minimum protections afforded to workers in the formal sector, such as the minimum wage, hours of work, rest, holidays, employment contract and social security. Laws enacted to protect children from labour exploitation do not address child domestic labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information submitted in its report under Convention No. 182 that it is in the process of regulating domestic work, including protecting child domestic workers. The Committee expresses its deep concern at the situation of children under the age of 15 who work as domestic workers. It strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation and to ensure that children under 15 do not perform domestic work. It requests the Government to take all the necessary measures to ensure that the above regulation is adopted as soon as possible so that child domestic workers benefit from the protection laid down in the Convention.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 6 September 2005. It requests the Government to provide further information on the following points.

Article 3. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted the ITUC's indication that the trafficking of persons, including for the purpose of prostitution, is widespread and that as many as 20 per cent of the 5 million migrant workers, who left Indonesia to work in other countries, were victims of trafficking. It had noted the Government's information that a draft bill on trafficking was under preparation. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Indonesian House of Representatives has passed the long-awaited Act on human trafficking. The Act of 19 April 2007 criminalizes all kinds of human trafficking, at home and overseas. It stipulates that whoever recruits and transfers people by force, abduction or deceit, in order to exploit them, faces three to 15 years' imprisonment or fines of 120 million to 600 million rupiahs or both. Anyone who brings into the country foreigners for purposes of exploitation or adopts children for a similar purpose, commits a criminal offence. Moreover, the Act requires traffickers to pay compensation for the material and immaterial losses suffered by the victims.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The police and inspectors. The Committee had previously noted that the police were carrying out investigations in prostitution areas in different provinces which sometimes resulted in the arrest of the perpetrators of trafficking and the finding and returning of victims to their places of origin. It had noted that a two-year police training project was launched, in August 2003, with the support of ILO/IPEC. It had also noted that training sessions were conducted in several provinces to provide labour inspectors with the necessary knowledge to combat child trafficking. The Committee notes the Government's information that 64 trafficking cases were filed in 2006 involving 177 children, of which 35 are before the courts while the rest are under investigation. The Committee encourages the Government to continue to strengthen the role of the police and labour inspectors in order to enable them to combat the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation. It requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to this end. It also requests the Government to supply, with its next report, extracts of the inspection reports specifying the extent and nature of violations detected involving the trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation. It finally requests the Government to continue providing information on the convictions and penal sanctions applied.

Article 6, paragraph 1. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. 1. National Action Plan for Abolishing Women and Child Trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that a five-year National Action Plan for Abolishing Women and Child Trafficking (NAP against WCT) was endorsed through Presidential Decree No. 88/2002. It had noted that the Plan's objective consists in reducing by half the number of child victims of trafficking by 2013. The Committee had also noted that one of the targets of the NAP against WCT is to increase the number of crisis service centres for the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims of trafficking and that 200 special centres for combating trafficking were established.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the second phase of the NAP against WCT consists in establishing in a selected region a "model of good practice" in handling cases of trafficking to be replicated in other regions. Jakarta, as the previous role model, has established a centre for crisis service to rehabilitate and reintegrate child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also notes the Government's information that, as a result of the NAP against WCT, up to 1,404 children were prevented from entering prostitution and 174 were removed. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the achievements of the National Action Plan for the Elimination of Trafficking in Women and Children, and its impact with regard to removing child victims of trafficking from labour or sexual exploitation and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. ILO/IPEC TICSА Project on combating child trafficking for sexual and labour exploitation in South and South-East Asia – Phase II (TICSА II). The Committee had previously noted that the subregional ILO/IPEC TICSА Project was adopted in June 2003 to complement the ILO/IPEC Project of Support to the Indonesian National Plan of Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour. It had noted that the TICSА Project's objective is to contribute to the progressive elimination of trafficking in child labour and sexual exploitation in Indonesia by: (i) assisting children and families in high-risk sending areas to reduce children's vulnerability to trafficking; and (ii) improving the capacity of social partners to provide services to rehabilitate and reintegrate child victims of trafficking. The Committee notes the Government's information that 1,404 children were prevented from trafficking and sexual exploitation and 53 removed. It also notes the Government's information that the total number of children who benefited from the programme is 3,359. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the ILO/IPEC TICSА II in combating the sexual and labour exploitation of children under 18 years of age, and results attained.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (d). Identifying and reaching out to children at special risk. 1. Children on fishing platforms. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the document entitled "Support to the Indonesian National Plan of Action and the Development of the Time-Bound Programme for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour" (TBP), more than 7,000 children were estimated to be engaged in deep-sea fishing in North Sumatra. It had also noted the indication of the government representative to the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards (June 2004), that a project was launched in 2000 and extended in 2004 aimed at preventing the employment of children on fishing platforms, raising awareness on the danger of working on a fishing platform, and providing for direct assistance and the removal of children from this type of work. It had finally noted the Government's indication that ILO/IPEC technical assistance has contributed to the withdrawal of 344 children from fishing platforms and that 2,111 children were prevented from working in "jermas" since 2000.

The Committee notes the Government's information that one of the programmes adopted in implementing the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour targets children working in the offshore fishery sector. As a result of this programme, 3,004 children were prevented from working in this sector and 174 were removed. The Committee further notes the Government's information that it has established a special monitoring team consisting of local government and personnel from the main naval base in order to prevent children from working in fishing platforms. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of the TBP and other measures on withdrawing children under 18 years from fishing platforms and results achieved.

2. Child domestic workers. The Committee notes the ITUC's allegations that child domestic workers in Indonesia suffered some form of sexual, physical or psychological abuse. The ITUC adds that the National Plan of Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour identified children who are physically or economically exploited as domestic servants as being involved in a worst form of child labour. However, domestic work – involving at least 688,000 children – was not included in the first phase of the National Plan of Action. According to the ITUC, it seems that the Government has failed to take meaningful action to protect child domestic workers from exploitation and abuse. Moreover, laws enacted to protect children from labour exploitation have not been utilized to address child domestic labour.

The Committee notes the Government's information that various measures have been taken, either by the Government or by society at large, to prevent children from working as domestic workers. Concretely, the Committee of National Action on the Worst Forms of Child Labour has set up a programme aimed at preventing school-aged children from working as domestic workers. Moreover, various programmes carried out by a number of child caring institutions have had a positive impact on preventing children from working as domestic workers. The Committee also notes that the programme “Mobilizing action for the protection of domestic workers from forced labour and trafficking in South-East Asia” was launched in 2004 to address the needs of domestic workers in Indonesia and the Philippines. The programme proposes four areas for concrete action: (a) a law and policy framework on domestic work; (b) advocacy and research; (c) outreach and empowerment of domestic workers at the national and international levels; (d) targeted interventions to respond effectively to reports of forced labour and trafficking affecting domestic workers. The Committee finally notes that, congruent to the TICSA project and the TBP on child trafficking, the ILO TC-RAM supports the ILO/IPEC Programme on Child Domestic Workers. The ILO TC-RAM on child domestic workers aims to increase awareness in general, withdraw child domestic workers (below 15 years), and provide counselling as well as access to non-formal and vocational training service to child domestic workers between 15 and 18 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on any relevant results of these programmes on protecting child domestic workers from the worst forms of child labour and providing for their rehabilitation and social integration.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Kenya

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1979)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report as well as of the detailed discussion which took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards in June 2006. The Committee notes that the Government’s report contains no reply to its previous comments. It is therefore bound to repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. 1. Branches of economic activity covered by the Convention. The Committee had previously noted that, according to section 25(1) of the Employment Act, the prohibition on employing children (i.e. a person under 16 years according to section 2 of the Act) is limited to work performed in industrial undertakings. It had noted that the Employment Act of 1976 (Chapter 226) and the Employment Act (Children) Rules of 1977, were being revised so as to bring the national legislation in line with the requirements of ILO Conventions. The Committee had hoped that the amended legislation would extend the application of the minimum age for admission to employment or work to all sectors of the economy. The Committee notes the Government’s information that the draft Employment Bill has extended the application of the minimum age for admission to employment to all sectors of the economy. It accordingly asks the Government to provide information on the progress made in adopting the amended version of the Employment Bill and to supply a copy of it as soon as it has been adopted.

2. Unpaid work. The Committee had previously noted that section 10(5) of the Children Act, 2001, defines the term “child labour” as any situation where a child provides labour in exchange for payment. Therefore, unpaid workers do not benefit from the protection laid down in the Children Act. The Committee had also noted the Government’s indication that 78 per cent of children (according to the 1998–99 Child Labour Report, published by the Central Bureau of Statistics of the Ministry of Finance and Planning in June 2001) were working for free in family agricultural activities and business enterprises during school holidays and after school. The Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children working for free in family agricultural activities and business enterprises were entitled to the protection afforded by the Convention, notably by amending the definition of child labour contained in section 10(5) of the Children Act. The Committee notes the Government’s indication that it intends to harmonize all legislation dealing with children and child labour to conform to the provisions of Conventions Nos 138 and 182. It hopes that the necessary amendments will soon be adopted.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted that, under section 7(2) of the Children Act, every child shall be entitled to free basic education which shall be compulsory. It had also noted that according to the Child Labour Report 1998–99 and the “Child labour policy”, primary education is compulsory from 6 to 13 years of age. The Committee had further noted the Government’s statement that the draft legislation on compulsory schooling which would address the gap between the age of completion of compulsory schooling (14 years of age) and the minimum age for admission to employment or work (16 years of age), was being prepared. It had requested the Government to provide a copy of the text fixing the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes that the Government is committed to the implementation of free primary education for all children. It also notes that, the draft Employment Bill and the Children Act are in agreement over a definition of a child, described as a person under the age of 18 years. However, it notes the Government’s indication that there is no text that specifically fixes the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether it is envisaged to adopt legislation which would fix the age of completion of compulsory schooling at 16.

Article 3, paragraph 2. Determination of hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that section 10(1) of the Children Act, provides that every child under 18 shall be protected from economic exploitation and any work that is likely to be hazardous, or to interfere with the child’s education, or to be harmful to the child’s health or physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development. The Committee had reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3, paragraph 2, of the Convention, the types of work or employment considered to be hazardous shall be determined in the national legislation after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist. It had hoped that the list of types of hazardous work would be adopted rapidly so as to bring the national legislation in line with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government’s information that it has developed a draft list of hazardous work in consultation with social partners and stakeholders. The list will be reviewed and presented to stakeholders for validation. The Committee asks the Government to provide a copy of the list of types of hazardous work as soon as it has been adopted.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work as from 16 years of age. The Committee had previously noted that section 10(4) of the Children Act provides that the minister shall make regulations in respect of periods of work and establishments where children aged at least 16 years may work. It had requested the Government to indicate whether such regulations had been issued by the competent minister and, if so, to provide a copy. The Committee notes the Government’s information that the competent minister has issued regulations referred to in section 10(4) of the Children Act, which is an act of Parliament. It once again asks the Government to provide a copy of these regulations.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. The Committee had previously noted that section 25(2) of the Employment Act, 1976, exempts any child employed in an industrial undertaking under a deed of apprenticeship from the provisions on the minimum age for admission to employment. It had also noted that, by virtue of section 8(3) of the Industrial Training Act (Chapter 237), a minor (i.e. a person under 15 years of age according to section 2 of the Act) may enter into apprenticeship with the authorization of his or her parents or guardian or, in the absence of such authorization, of a district officer or a labour officer. Therefore, there appeared to be no provisions in the national legislation that set a minimum age for entry into apprenticeship. The Committee had recalled that, by virtue of Article 6 of the Convention, only work done by persons of at least 14 years of age within the context of a programme of training or vocational guidance in enterprises is excluded from the scope of this Convention. It had hoped that the necessary amendments would be adopted so as to bring the legislation in line with the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's indication that the Government has undertaken amendments to the Industrial Training Act (Chapter 237) in order to bring the legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether these amendments have come into force and, if so, to provide a copy of the amended Industrial Training Act.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Admission to light work. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that under section 3(1) of the Employment (Children) Rules, 1977, children may be permitted to work with the written permission of an authorized officer except in bars, hotels, restaurants or clubs where intoxicating liquors are sold or anywhere as a tourist guide. Employment in such places will be accepted if the Labour Commissioner has consented in writing and the child is in possession of a copy of such consent (section 3(1)). The Committee had recalled that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, only children from 13 years of age may be permitted to undertake light work which is not likely to be harmful to their health or development; and not such as to prejudice their attendance at school, or their participation in vocational training programmes. It had urged the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that light work carried out pursuant to section 3(1) of the Employment (Children) Rules, 1977 may only be performed by children of at least 13 years of age. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this issue has been taken into consideration in the process of reviewing the legislation. It hopes that the necessary amendments will soon be adopted.

Article 7, paragraph 3. Determination of light work. The Committee had previously reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority shall determine the activities in which employment or work may be permitted as part of light work. The competent authority shall also prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken. The Committee had hoped that the Government would take the necessary measures to ensure that its legislation determines light work activities. The Committee notes that the Government's report contains no information on this point. It therefore once again requests the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to determine light work activities and to prescribe the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work may be undertaken by young persons of 13 years of age and above, in conformity with the Convention.

Article 8. Artistic performances. In its previous comments, the Committee had observed that section 17 of the Children Act provides that a child shall be entitled to leisure, play and participation in cultural and artistic activities. However, it had noted that national legislation does not provide for permits to be granted when children participate in cultural artistic performances. The Committee had drawn the Government's attention to Article 8 of the Convention, which lays down that after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, the competent authority may, by permits granted in individual cases, allow exceptions to the prohibition of employment or work provided for in Article 2 of this Convention, for such purposes as participation in artistic performances. Permits so granted shall limit the number of hours during which, and the conditions in which, such employment or work is allowed. The Committee had requested the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged in this regard. The Committee notes the Government's indication that this matter will be addressed in the subsidiary legislation, which is being revised. It asks the Government to inform it on the progress made in the revision of national legislation in order to ensure that approval for young persons below 16 years of age to take part in artistic activities is granted in individual cases.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it will endeavour to provide information on the practical application of the Convention including statistical data on employment of children and inspection reports. It hopes that the Government will provide the requested information in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to provide further information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. 1. Scope of application. (a) Seasonal workers. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that a draft Labour Law amending Act No. 38 of 1964 on labour in the private sector was being discussed by the national authorities. The Committee notes the Government's indication, in its report, that it shall send a copy of the draft Labour Law to the Office as soon as it is adopted. Considering, however, that the Government has been referring to the enactment of the draft Labour Law for a number of years, the Committee expresses the firm hope that the Government will take the necessary measures to ensure that it is adopted in the very near future.

(b) Domestic workers. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that the minimum age for domestic work is 20 years, according to section 5(3) of Order No. 640 of 1978 taken by the Minister of Interior, which is attached to the regulations putting into effect the Foreigners' Residence Act. It also notes the Government's indication that it will provide a copy of the rules governing the relationship between domestic workers and their employers which shall be issued by decision of the competent minister once the draft Labour Code is adopted. The Committee observes that, although the Government indicates in its report that a copy of the model contract published by the Ministry of Interior for the employment of domestic workers is annexed, no such document has been provided to the Office. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Order No. 640 of 1978 with its next report. It also asks the Government to provide a copy of the model contract for the employment of domestic workers.

(c) Self-employment. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's indication that it shall provide the Office with information on cases of self-employment and on the situation of street children as soon as it is available. Recalling that Convention No. 138 requires the fixing of a minimum age for all types of work outside an employment relationship such as self-employment, the Committee trusts the Government will supply information on the situation of self-employed children in its next report, and particularly street children, especially with regard to their age as well as the types of work they undertake.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that under the terms of section 18 of Act No. 38 of 1964, the minimum age for admission to employment or work is 14 years, although the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratifying the Convention is 15 years. The Committee had noted the Government's information that section 18 of the draft Labour Law in the private sector has specified 15 years as the minimum age for admission to employment or work so as to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention. The Committee trusts that the draft Labour Law will be adopted as soon as possible and once again requests the Government to inform it of any developments in this regard.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government's information that the age of completion of compulsory schooling has been raised to 15 years. It also notes that the Government adopted the education model from a previous 4+4+4 to a new 5+4+3 model for the 2005–06 school year resulting in the fact that compulsory education is extended from eight to nine years.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Sanctions. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the fines imposed on employers violating the provisions of Act No. 38 of 1964 were low and had invited the Government to take measures to revise and increase those penalties according to Article 9, paragraph 1, of the Convention. The Committee notes the Government's information that the draft Labour Law includes harsher sanctions than the ones applied in the current Labour Code. It notes the Government's indication that it will provide the Office with a copy of the new Labour Law as soon as it is adopted by the Majlis El-Ummah (legislative authority).

Article 9, paragraph 3. Registers of employment. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government indicates that a copy of the model register used by employers has been attached to its report. However, the Committee observes that no such document was effectively attached to the Government's report. Accordingly, it reiterates its request to the Government to provide a copy of the model register used by employers.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that the statistical compilation for employees in the private sector of 2006 that the Government claims to have attached to its report is not, in fact, attached. Therefore, it requests the Government to provide the Office with a copy of this statistical compilation including statistical data on the employment of children and young persons, as well as extracts from the reports of inspection services and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported.

The Committee also once again requests the Government to keep it informed of progress made in enacting the draft Labour Law. In this regard, it hopes that due consideration will be given to all the comments made by the Office on the draft Labour Law.

Malawi

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and practical application of the Convention. The Committee previously noted with interest the detailed information on the measures taken by the Government to combat child labour. It nevertheless was seriously concerned by the situation of the considerable number of children under 14 years of age who were compelled to work (according to the Malawi Child Labour Survey of 2002, more than 1 million children work, of whom approximately half are less than 9 years of age). The Committee encouraged the Government to renew its efforts to progressively improve this situation.

With reference to its previous comments requesting the Government to continue providing detailed information on the development of national policies designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and the results attained, the Committee notes the Government's indication that a National Plan of Action for Orphans and Other Vulnerable Children 2005–09 (NPA for OVC) and a Childhood Development Policy were established. More particularly, it notes that, according to the NPA for OVC, around 500,000 children were orphans due to HIV/AIDS in 2004, and more than 1 million children were orphans in Malawi in 2005. Moreover, the number of orphans by different age groups is the following: 110,000 (0–4 years), 340,000 (5–9 years) and 558,000 (10–18 years). The Committee noted that the Government is aware of the consequences of HIV/AIDS on orphans, such as increased child labour and children dropping out from school. It also noted that the Strategic Objective No. 3 of the NPA for OVC is "to protect the most vulnerable children through improved policy and legislation, leadership, efficient coordination at all levels".

The Committee once again expresses its serious concern at the situation of the considerable number of children under 14 years of age who are compelled to work. It also is seriously concerned by the high number of child orphans in Malawi due to HIV/AIDS and observes that HIV/AIDS has consequences for orphans, for whom there is an increased risk of being engaged in child labour. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the progressive abolition of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the NPA for OVC and the Childhood Development Policy towards abolishing child labour, and on the results attained. Finally, the Committee also requests the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including, for example, statistics on the employment of children and young persons, extracts from the reports of the inspections services and information on the number and nature of the contraventions reported and sanctions imposed.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government on other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Mali

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It takes due note of the information on the measures the Government has taken under the ILO/IPEC–LUTRENA project to prohibit and abolish the sale and trafficking of children, in particular through advocacy and training on child trafficking, inter alia, by means of instructional discussions and films.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the Government informed the Committee on the Rights of the Child that Malian children had been taken to Côte d'Ivoire to work in plantations or as domestic servants and that they were subjected to deplorable working conditions and were often unpaid. Some ethnic groups, such as the Bambara, Dogon and Senufo, were particularly vulnerable. The Committee took note of the Government's efforts to combat child trafficking but observed that, despite all endeavours, the Committee on the Rights of the Child had expressed concern at the trafficking of Malian children to other countries in the region, particularly Côte d'Ivoire, and at their subjection to slavery and forced labour (CCPR/CO/77/MLI, 16 April 2003, paragraph 17). The Committee further noted that although section 244 of the Penal Code and section 63 of the Code on the Protection of Children prohibited child trafficking, in practice it was still a problem.

The Committee notes that according to a report published by UNICEF in 2006 on trafficking in human beings, particularly women and children, in West and Central Africa, Malian children are trafficked in the following countries: Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Guinea, Ghana and Nigeria. The Committee again observes that although the Government has taken several measures to combat the sale and trafficking of children for the purpose of using their labour, the problem still exists in practice. The Committee again expresses deep concern at the situation of Malian children who fall prey to trafficking and encourages the Government to step up efforts to remedy it and to take the necessary measures in the immediate future to eliminate the trafficking of children for the purpose of using their labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to the provisions in the national legislation that deal with trafficking, including statistics on the number and nature of offences reported, the investigations held, the prosecutions, convictions and penalties applied.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. The Committee notes that, according to the UNICEF 2006 report, Talibé children who originate from bordering countries, including Mali, and whom Koranic teachers (marabouts) have brought to the city can be found in the streets of Dakar. These children find themselves in conditions of servitude and are obliged to beg daily. The report also mentions the involvement of marabouts in child trafficking in which young Talibé workers from Burkina Faso are exploited in the rice fields of Mali. They are placed with large-scale farmers who hand over the children's pay to the marabouts. The Committee further notes that in its concluding observations of May 2007 (CRC/C/MLI/CO/2, paragraph 62), the Committee on the Rights of the Child noted the efforts undertaken by Mali to reduce child begging by, among others, providing vocational training programmes for child beggars. It nonetheless expressed concern at the growing number of street children and child beggars, referred to as garibous, who are pupils under the guardianship of marabouts. The Committee on the Rights of the Child likewise expressed concern at their vulnerability, in particular to violence, sexual abuse and exploitation and economic exploitation.

The Committee notes, that according to section 62 of the Code on the Protection of Children, begging as a sole or main activity is dehumanizing and an obstacle to the fulfilment of children's rights. The Committee further notes that according to section 183 of the Penal Code, anyone inciting a child to beg shall be punished by a term of imprisonment of from three months to one year. The Committee is most concerned at the use of children by certain marabouts, for purely economic ends, i.e. as a source of labour. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to enforce the legislation on begging and to punish marabouts who use children for purely economic ends. It also asks the Government to indicate the effective and time-bound measures it has taken to protect these children from forced labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Monitoring committees. The Committee notes the information from the Government that under the LUTRENA project, local monitoring committees (CLVs) to combat child trafficking have been established in the circles of Kangala (Koulikoro region), Bougouni, Kolondiéba and Koutiala (Sikasso region) and others have been reinforced. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the activities of the CLVs, including extracts from reports or documents, together with the results obtained by the CLVs in preventing the trafficking of children under 18 years of age.

2. National task force to combat child trafficking. The Committee notes that according to the activity reports of the ILO/IPEC on the LUTRENA project, a national task force has been set up to combat child trafficking. It requests the Government to provide information on the working of the task force, including reports on their activities.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes with interest the Government's efforts to implement the ILO/IPEC–LUTRENA project. It notes in particular from the ILO/IPEC reports on the project that since the project was launched in 2001, more than 26,730 children have benefited from it. Of these, 14,790 have been withdrawn from this worst form of child labour and 11,940 have been prevented from being employed therein. It also notes that between September 2006 and March 2007, 92 children were rescued from child trafficking and have received education and training.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and assisting their removal. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee takes due note of the information sent by the Government on the implementation of the LUTRENA project in Mali. It notes in particular that, within the framework of the project, more than 3,830 children (1,851 girls and 1,979 boys) have been reintegrated through formal or informal education, vocational training and income-generating activities. Furthermore, three reception and transit centres for victims of child trafficking have been created at Sikasso, Sögou and Mopti. Income-generating activities have been undertaken for the benefit of 30 children and 1,076 parents (422 women and 654 men). Lastly, more than 1,500 social intermediary workers are engaged in identifying children and possible child traffickers, alerting the security services to suspicious persons and informing parents and children about procedures for children travelling abroad. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken under the LUTRENA project to prevent children under 18 years of age from falling prey to sale or trafficking and to remove children from this worst form of child labour. It also asks the Government to provide information on: (1) the number and location of reception centres for trafficked children that have been set up in Mali to take in trafficked children; (2) the programmes providing specific medico-social monitoring which have been drawn up and implemented for child victims of trafficking.

2. Access to free basic education. In previous comments, the Committee noted with interest that the Government had set up a Ten-Year Education Development Programme (PRODEC), the aim of which was to increase the primary school enrolment rate to 95 per cent by the year 2010 and at the same time improve learning, girls' education, health and hygiene standards. The Committee notes the Government's information that a Medium-Term Expenditure Framework (MTEF) has been planned and should allow capacity building for running PRODEC in liaison with the aims of the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (PRSP) and the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). It also notes the Government's information that there have been significant results in girls' enrolment, informal education, specialized education and the allocation of funds to education. Furthermore, 1,880 teachers have been recruited for the two stages of primary education and school textbooks have been bought and distributed.

The Committee notes, however, that according to a national survey on child labour conducted in 2005, 41 per cent of children aged from 5 to 14 years engage in a full-time economic activity, 25 per cent combine work and studies and 17 per cent go only to school. The net enrolment rate for the first stage (7–12 years) for 2004–05 was 56.7 per cent (48.9 per cent for girls and 64.8 per cent for boys), and for the second stage (13–15 years) was 20.6 per cent (15.4 per cent for girls and 26 per cent for boys). The Committee also notes that in its concluding observations of May 2007 (CRC/C/MLI/CO/2, paragraph 60), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at the high child illiteracy rates, the low level of qualification of teachers and the low number of teachers, the high pupil-to-teacher ratio, the insufficient number of adequate installations, the high drop-out and repetition rates, particularly of girls, the lack of information on vocational training and the type of education given in Koranic schools. Despite the Government's efforts, the Committee is deeply concerned at the persistently low rates of school enrolment. Considering that education contributes to preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to step up efforts to improve the working of the education system, in particular by improving school enrolment rates and reducing the drop-out rates, particularly of girls, and by taking measures to integrate Koranic schools into the national education system. It requests the Government to provide information on the results obtained.

Article 8. Cooperation. 1. Regional cooperation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that the Government has signed bilateral cooperation agreements on cross-border trafficking in children with Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire, Guinea and Senegal. It also notes that, as well as the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to Combat Child Trafficking in West Africa, signed in July 2005, Mali signed the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement in 2006. It notes that, according to the Government, the mobile security brigades have carried out patrols in the border regions between Mali and Burkina Faso, Côte d'Ivoire and Senegal. Furthermore, according to the ILO/IPEC activity reports for 2007 on the LUTRENA project, standing committees to oversee the multilateral agreements between Mali and Burkina Faso and Mali and Guinea met in November 2006. They recommended in particular: the organization of advocacy campaigns on both sides of the border in the regions concerned, the adoption of identical travel documents and the development of a joint handbook of procedures for repatriation and rehabilitation measures. The Committee requests the Government to state whether, in the implementation of these agreements, there have been exchanges of information with other signatory countries allowing: (1) persons working in child trafficking networks to be apprehended and arrested; (2) children trafficked in border areas to be detected and intercepted.

2. Poverty reduction. The Committee notes the information from the Government that a Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (PRSP) has been adopted and that it takes account of child labour problems as cross-cutting issues, placing them in an overall framework for improving the situation of children and enhancing the role of the family. Noting that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the poverty cycle, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures it has taken in implementing the PRSP to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, and particularly to secure the effective reduction of poverty among children who are sold and trafficked and subjected to forced begging.

The Committee is addressing a request concerning other points directly to the Government.

Mauritania

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention and Part V of the report form. Compulsory schooling and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indications of the ITUC to the effect that the Ministry of Labour, without exception, authorized work by 13-year-old children in both the agricultural and non-agricultural sectors. The ITUC also indicated that, according to UNICEF statistics for 2000, the total number of child workers aged between 10 and 14 was 68,000, which represents a slight decrease over previous years. The Committee noted that the Government, in its initial report submitted to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in January 2000 (CRC/C/8/Add.42, paragraphs 327 and 328), stated that, in order to tackle the economic exploitation of children, it had adopted important measures including the implementation of a national employment policy and a national plan for the promotion of the child.

The Committee notes that the ITUC indicates in its comments that Mauritania is witnessing a large-scale expansion of child labour, mostly involving precarious conditions. It notes that, according to the Government's 2004 study on child labour in Mauritania, undertaken in collaboration with UNICEF, some 90,000 children under 14 years of age work in the country, slightly over 40 per cent of whom are girls. The study shows that poverty is one of the factors in child labour. The Committee notes the Government's information that sectoral studies will be conducted in the informal sector in Kiffa and in some areas of Nouakchott to identify children who are working and seek, with the employers, to establish possibilities for training, education and integration.

The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF information, the Government has implemented a ten-year development plan for education, the aim of which is to increase the school attendance rate of young persons in the first cycle of secondary education and establish remedial courses for children who have never been to school or who have abandoned their studies. The Committee notes that, according to UNESCO statistics, 72 per cent of children, both girls and boys, attend primary school whereas only 14 per cent of girls and 17 per cent of boys are in secondary education. It notes that the Government has drawn up a national employment strategy and also a plan of action in this field.

The Committee notes that the number of child workers increased from 68,000 to 90,000 between 2000 and 2004. Moreover, despite the Government's efforts, the Committee is deeply concerned at the persistence of low school attendance rates. It observes that poverty is one of the prime causes of child labour and when it combines with a deficient education system, it hampers children's development. In view of the fact that compulsory schooling is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, the Committee urges the Government to renew its efforts to improve the working of the education system, particularly by increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the school drop-out rate, especially among girls. It also asks the Government to step up its efforts to combat child labour by reinforcing the measures enabling child workers to be integrated in the school system, whether formal or informal, or in apprenticeships or vocational training as long as minimum age requirements are met. Moreover, the Committee hopes that the studies mentioned by the Government will be conducted as soon as possible. It requests the Government to supply information on the results of the studies, once they are completed, by providing, for example, statistical data disaggregated by sex and age group on the nature, extent and trends of child labour and the employment of young persons working below the minimum age specified by the Government at the time of ratification, as well as extracts from reports of the inspection services.

The Committee is also raising a number of other matters in a direct request to the Government.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the comments of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. The worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery or practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the adoption of Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 on the repression of the trafficking of persons. It also noted that, in its concluding observations on the Government's initial report in November 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.159, paragraph 49), the Committee on the Rights of the Child indicated that it recognized the Government's efforts to stop cases of trafficking of children to Arab countries. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the measures taken in this regard.

In its comments, the ITUC indicates that in recent years several networks for the trafficking of children to Arab Gulf countries have been developed, in which the child victims do not benefit from any form of protection. Indeed, even though the State is informed of these practices and often knows the persons who are active in the networks, no steps have been taken against them. The Committee notes that, according to a UNICEF report on trafficking in persons, with particular reference to women and children, in West and Central Africa, published in 2006, the information available on trafficking flows in Mauritania is very limited and it is very difficult to know whether Mauritanian children are victims of trafficking in countries in the subregion or whether children are exploited on the territory of Mauritania. However, the UNICEF report indicates that, in the streets of Dakar, there are boy talibés from neighbouring countries, including Mauritania, who have been brought to the city by their Koranic masters (marabouts). These children are in conditions of slavery and are forced to beg on a daily basis. According to the UNICEF report, the internal trafficking of children also exists, including the phenomenon of child talibés from rural areas who beg in the streets of Nouakchott.

The Committee observes that Mauritania appears to be a country of origin for the trafficking of children for labour exploitation. It expresses concern at the situation of these children and requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for labour exploitation. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to Act No. 025/2003 of 17 July 2003 on the repression of the trafficking of persons, including statistics on the number and nature of the offences reported, investigations conducted, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. The Committee noted previously that, in its concluding observations on the Government's initial report in November 2001 (CRC/C/15/Add.159, paragraph 49), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed its concern at the number of children working, particularly in the streets, including the talibés who are exploited by their marabouts. It also noted the statement in a UNICEF study entitled "Child labour in Mauritania" that, according to a July 2003 study by the National Children's Council (CNE), observations in the field suggest that street children tend to be beggars who give daily account of their begging activities to their marabouts. The study also indicated that talibé children are a new phenomenon in Mauritania which is limited in scope. The Committee requested the Government to take the necessary measures to protect street children and talibés from the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee notes that, according to the UNICEF report on the trafficking of persons, with particular reference to women and children, in West and Central Africa, the internal trafficking of children exists particularly child talibés from rural areas who beg in the streets of Nouakchott. The Committee notes that section 42(1) of Ordinance No. 2005-015 on the penal protection of the child provides that the act of causing or directly employing a child in begging is punishable by imprisonment from one to six months or a fine of 100,000 ouguiyas. Section 42(2) provides that any person who, having authority over a child, hands the child over to individuals who incite or engage the child in begging is punishable by imprisonment for eight months or a fine of between 180,000 and 300,000 ouguiyas. The Committee expresses concern at the use of children for purely economic purposes, namely the use of children as a source of labour by certain marabouts. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to give effect to the national legislation on begging and to punish marabouts who make use of children for purely economic purposes. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures adopted to prevent young persons under 18 years of age from becoming victims of forced or compulsory labour, such as begging. Furthermore, it requests the Government to indicate the effective and time-bound measures adopted to protect these children against forced labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF information, children who have been the victims of trafficking, particularly to the United Arab Emirates (UAE) to work as camel jockeys, have recently been repatriated to Mauritania and are receiving education in a special school for former jockeys. It strongly encourages the Government to continue its efforts to provide the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of child victims of trafficking and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee notes that, according to UNICEF information, Mauritania and the UAE, in collaboration with UNICEF, have established a programme to assist child victims of trafficking exploited as camel jockeys. In the context of this programme, the Government of the UAE has offered financial compensation to Mauritanian families and proposed income-generating activities. The Committee takes due note of this information. It requests the Government to provide fuller information on the transboundary programme between Mauritania and the UAE, with an indication of whether: (1) individuals operating in networks for the trafficking of children have been identified and arrested; and (2) child victims of trafficking have been identified and intercepted.

2. Poverty reduction. The Committee noted previously that, in its initial report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in January 2000 (CRC/C/8/Add.42, paragraph 331), the Government indicated that it had established a national plan to combat poverty. It also noted that, in its concluding observations of November 2001 on the Government's report (CRC/C/15/Add.159, paragraphs 7 and 14), the Committee on the Rights of the Child noted with concern that economic and social difficulties facing the State party had a negative impact on the situation of children, particularly in rural and remote areas. The Committee requested the Government to provide information on the impact of the national plan to combat poverty on the elimination of the worst forms of child labour. The Committee notes the Government's indication that it has included a series of actions for children in the strategic framework to combat poverty (CSLP), which is the guiding standard for sectoral macroeconomic policies and other medium- and long-term development policies. Noting that poverty reduction programmes contribute to breaking the cycle of poverty, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the CSLP with a view to eliminating the worst forms of child labour, particularly with regard to the effective reduction of poverty among child victims of sale and trafficking and of forced begging.

The Committee is also raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to provide further information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee had previously noted that the Education Act was amended by Act No. 44 of 8 December 2004 to extend compulsory schooling to 16 years of age. It had noted, however, that the amendment of the Labour Act in 2004 did not concern the minimum age for employment, which remained at 15 years. The Committee had encouraged the Government to take the necessary measures to raise to 16 the minimum age for admission to employment in order to link it with the age of completion of compulsory schooling. The Committee notes with satisfaction that the Labour Act was amended in 2006 in order to raise the minimum age for employment to 16 years (section 3(a) of the Labour (Amendment) Act 2006 – Act No. 26 of 2006).

Article 3, paragraph 3. Authorization to undertake hazardous work as from 16 years. The Committee had previously noted that sections 2 and 28 of the Occupational Safety, Health and Welfare Act No. 34 of 1988 state that no young person (aged 15 – 18 years) shall work at any machine specified in the third schedule, unless he/she has been fully instructed as to the dangers arising in connection with the machine and the protection to be observed, and (a) has received sufficient training in work at the machine; or (b) is under adequate supervision by a person who has a thorough knowledge and experience of the machine. The Committee had urged the Government to take, without delay, the necessary measures to raise to 16 years the minimum age from which young persons may be authorized to work on hazardous machines on condition that their health and safety are fully protected and that they have received adequate training in the relevant branch of activity. The Committee notes the Government's information that provisions regarding the minimum age for admission to hazardous work have been included in section 8 of the Occupational Safety and Health Bill of 2005, which will soon be adopted. The Committee notes with interest that, by virtue of section 2 of this Bill, a "young person" is defined as a person between 16 and 18 years of age. The Committee hopes that the Occupational Safety and Health Bill of 2005 will be adopted soon. It requests the Government to inform it of any progress made towards the adoption of this Bill.

Article 9, paragraph 1 and Part III of the report form. Penalties. 1. Labour inspectorate. For a certain number of years the Committee had observed that, while some cases of violation of child employment were detected by the labour inspectorate, no penalties were imposed on the employers acting in breach of the legislation.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, during the period under review, out of 4,152 inspection visits carried out in connection with the employment of children, two cases of child employment were detected involving two children. The employment of these children was stopped and the employers concerned were warned accordingly. Prosecution is being envisaged in one of the cases. Moreover, in Rodrigues, 94 inspections were carried out, but no case of child employment was detected. The Committee notes the Government's indication that, as of May 2007, the Inspection and Enforcement Division of the Ministry of Labour, Industrial Relations and Employment has been enlarged with new staff.

While noting that only two cases of violations of child employment were detected by the labour inspectorate, the Committee once again observes that persons who employ children in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention are not prosecuted, as a rule, as far as such employment is brought to an end. The Committee considers it necessary to ensure the application of the Convention by applying the penalties provided for in the legislation. It accordingly requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that a person found to be in breach of the provisions giving effect to the Convention is prosecuted and that adequate penalties are imposed. It asks the Government to provide information on the types of violations detected by the labour inspectors, the number of persons prosecuted and the penalties imposed.

2. Ombudsperson for Children. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the activities of the Ombudsperson for Children. The Committee notes the information contained in the report by the Ombudsperson for Children supplied by the Government. According to this report, the Ombudsperson for Children's Office has a small staff including three investigators who do not normally undertake field work. Cases which need to be investigated in the field are usually managed by the Child Development Unit (CDU) of the Ministry of Women's Rights, Child Development, Family Welfare and Consumer Protection. Cases are sometimes referred to the minors brigade of the police. The report indicates that the Ombudsperson for Children's Office has had to deal with very few cases of child labour which were all referred to the CDU.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee had previously observed that the relevant legislation did not prohibit the trafficking of children under 18 years of age for purposes of labour or sexual exploitation. It had requested the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that all aspects of child trafficking, such as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of children for the purpose of labour or sexual exploitation are prohibited, and that appropriate penalties are provided for in the national legislation. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's information that in December 2005 the Child Protection Act was amended in order to include provisions prohibiting all cases of child trafficking. It notes that section 13A(1) states that any person who wilfully and unlawfully recruits, transports, transfers, harbours or receives a child for the purpose of exploitation commits an offence and shall be liable, on conviction, to penal servitude for a term not exceeding 15 years. Section 13A(7) specifies that "exploitation" includes the exploitation of prostitution of children or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee had expressed its concern at the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Mauritius and Rodrigues Island. It had also noted that according to a study carried out in 2001 by UNICEF and the Ministry of Women's Rights, Child Development and Family Welfare and Consumer Protection (MWCFCP), more than 2,600 children and 3,900 adults were involved in prostitution. The Committee had consequently observed that, although the commercial sexual exploitation of children was prohibited by section 14 of the Child Protection Act, and sections 86(2) and 251 of the Criminal Code (Amendment) Act of 1998, it remained an issue of concern in practice.

The Committee notes with interest that various bodies and institutions, especially the police, the Child Development Unit (CDU), the Brigade des Mineurs have taken a number of measures in order to prevent and combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

1. Police. The Committee notes the Government's information that the police is carrying out a number of activities, such as training, raids, surveillance, partnership with other institutions, in order to prevent and combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. In particular, between 2005 and 2007, the police has undertaken various training courses on the trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation of children directed at police officers and specialized units (such as the Criminal Investigation Department, the Police Prosecutors Unit, the Passport and Immigration Office, the Anti Drug Smuggling Unit) in order to provide them with the necessary knowledge, skills and techniques to investigate such cases. Moreover, in 2005 and 2007, the Police Family Protection Unit organized various lectures on child abuse and the commercial sexual exploitation of children directed at children in primary and secondary schools and of various youth centres and communities, as well as adults.

2. Child Development Unit. The Committee notes the Government's information that the Child Development Unit (CDU) of the MWCFCP has specialized staff to protect children under the Child Protection Act. According to the Government's report, the CDU has set up a Community Child Protection Programme to ensure the community involvement in the fight against the commercial sexual exploitation of children. This Programme (previous Child Watch Network) consists of a forum set up at the district level in order to ensure community development regarding child protection and welfare. Moreover, the CDU has taken other measures to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children, which include: (a) setting up a residential drop-in centre to cater for victims of commercial sexual exploitation and to enable their reintegration into society through psychological treatment and support; (b) organizing the "Training of Trainers Programme" on the commercial sexual exploitation of children; (c) supplying a substitute family environment to children abandoned or at risk; (d) organizing workshops on the identification and reporting of child abuse cases, with a view to increasing awareness of child abuse and commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee notes the Government's information that the CDU has been provided with new staff including family welfare and protection officers, family support officers and police officers.

3. Brigade pour la protection des Mineurs. The Committee notes the Government's information that the Brigade pour la protection des Mineurs has been reinforced in order to ensure a close monitoring of all suspicious places. It also notes that, in 2006 and 2007, the Brigade organized a number of lectures in order to sensitize children in primary and secondary school and persons in various community youth centres, to the issue of child abuse, including the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. 1. National plan of action to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee had previously noted that in 2003 the Government launched a two-year National Plan of Action to Combat the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (NPA on CSEC). It had observed that one of the objectives of the NPA was to provide support and rehabilitation to child victims of commercial sexual exploitation and other forms of exploitation.

The Committee notes the Government's information that an evaluation of the NPA on CSEC was carried out in May 2005 to assess the progress made after two years of implementation. The main results include: (a) the signing of a Protocol of Collaboration by stakeholders involved; (b) the development of the "Training of Trainers Programme" for 40 community leaders and social workers; (c) other various training programmes on the commercial sexual exploitation of children; (d) various sensitization campaigns on the commercial sexual exploitation of children; (e) the adoption of a Protocol of Assistance to Victims of Sexual Abuse (valid since April 2006) laying down the correct procedures to be adopted by the police and other officers to ensure prompt assistance to victims of sexual abuse, including the commercial sexual exploitation of children; (f) the rehabilitative measures provided by the drop-in centre for child victims of commercial sexual exploitation (since 2003 the centre dealt with 459 cases); (g) the adoption by the police of new and more customer-friendly techniques for questioning and counselling victims; (h) the organization by the CDU, in collaboration with the National Children's Council and the Ombudsperson for Children's Office of the campaign "16 days, 16 rights" to sensitize the public about children's rights; (i) other various sensitization measures at the level of primary and secondary schools.

2. Subregional network for preventing and combating the commercial sexual exploitation of children. The Committee had previously requested the Government to provide information on the launching of the subregional network for preventing and combating the sexual exploitation of children as well as on the activities of the inter-ministerial committee on child prostitution. The Committee notes the Government's information that the idea of creating a subregional network for preventing and combating the sexual exploitation of children has been successful. The issue was discussed at the Southern African Development Community (SADC) Council held in Mauritius on 24–25 February 2005. During the SADC Council, it was noted that the region is facing a problem with child abuse, and especially with the commercial sexual exploitation of children, and found that there is a need to protect children on a regional basis. In line with the Addendum on the Prevention and Eradication of Violence Against Women and Children, the Council directed the Secretariat to organize a workshop to deliberate on the protection of children from sexual abuse and made appropriate recommendations to the Integrated Council of Ministers.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Mexico

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1956)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Period during which night work is prohibited. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 175 of the Federal Labour Act prohibited night work for young persons under the age of 18 in industry. It also noted that section 60 of the Act defined night work as work performed between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m., i.e. a period of ten hours. The Committee pointed out that the national legislation did not give effect to Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, which defines "night" as a period of 12 consecutive hours. The Government initially indicated that Mexico's labour legislation did not define "night" as a period of at least 12 consecutive hours and was inconsistent with the provisions of the Convention. The Committee took note of the draft legislation to supplement section 175 of the Federal Labour Act (prohibition on night work for persons under 18 years of age) which gave effect to the Convention. However, the Government thereafter stated that there was no discrepancy between the national legislation and this provision of the Convention, and that no such amendment to the Federal Labour Act was envisaged.

The Committee takes note of the information sent by the Government in its report to the effect that the labour inspection services have not detected any night work by minors. The Committee notes with regret that although it has made repeated requests since 1972, the Government has not yet taken the necessary legislative measures to give effect to the Convention. It again points out to the Government that section 60 of the Federal Labour Act, by providing that work performed between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. is night work, establishes a period of ten hours, and is accordingly inconsistent with Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, which requires a period of 12 consecutive hours. The Committee urges the Government to take legislative measures to remedy this state of affairs as soon as possible and requests it to report all progress made in this regard.

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and traffic of children for commercial sexual exploitation. 1. Federal legislation. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the observations of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) reporting the trafficking of young girls within the country and abroad for the purposes of sexual exploitation, including forced prostitution. The Committee noted that, according to a study carried out in six Mexican cities with the support of UNICEF, around 16,000 boys and girls were victims of commercial sexual exploitation. It noted that a study carried out by ILO/IPEC, the Secretariat for Labour and Social Assistance and the National Social Sciences Institute corroborated the figures referred to above and added that around 5,000 children were the victims of this form of exploitation solely in the Federal District of Mexico. The Committee noted that reforms of the legislation were in progress and requested the Government to provide information in this respect.

The Committee notes with satisfaction the Decree of 27 March 2007 which amends, supplements and repeals certain provisions of the Federal Penal Code, the Code of Penal Procedure and the Federal Act to Combat Organized Crime in relation to the sexual exploitation of children. In particular, it notes that sections 205 and 205bis of the Penal Code penalize the trafficking of persons under 18 years of age for sexual and economic exploitation. The Committee also notes that the Government is participating in the ILO/IPEC project entitled "Support for the Prevention and Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (CSEC) and the Protection of CSEC Victims in Mexico" and that progress has been achieved in the context of its implementation. It however observes that, although the Government has taken several measures to combat the sale and trafficking of children for commercial sexual exploitation, the problem still exists in practice. In this respect, it refers to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child on the third periodic report of Mexico of June 2006 (CRC/C/MEX/CO/3, paragraph 64), in which it indicated that it remained concerned about the extent of the sexual exploitation, trafficking and abduction of children in the country. The Committee of Experts, however, notes a communication of the Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, who visited the country from 4 to 14 May 2007, indicating that there is a consensus between the public authorities and civil society organizations that the sexual exploitation of children and the trafficking of minors for this purpose constitute a serious problem which has to be addressed. The Committee appreciates the measures adopted by the Government to prohibit and eliminate this worst form of child labour and it considers these measures as an affirmation of the political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. It strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure the protection of children under 18 years of age against sale and trafficking for sexual exploitation, including prostitution. Furthermore, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on the effect given in practice to the new provisions, including statistics on the number and nature of the infringements reported, the investigations undertaken, prosecutions, convictions and the penal sanctions applied.

2. State legislation. The Committee notes the studies provided by the Government on the penal legislation respecting the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It notes that, according to the information contained in the ILO/IPEC activity reports for 2007 on the project "Support for the Prevention and Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (CSEC) and the Protection of CSEC Victims in Mexico", draft amendments to the Penal Codes in the states of Baja California, Guerrero and Chihuahua have been approved. The Committee hopes that the draft amendments to the Penal Codes will be adopted in the near future and requests the Government to provide information on any progress achieved in this respect.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances. The Committee notes with interest that the Decree of 27 March 2007 contains provisions penalizing the following crimes: acting as an intermediary for the prostitution of persons under 18 years of age (sections 206 and 206bis); pornography involving persons under 18 years of age (sections 202 and 202bis); and sexual tourism involving persons under 18 years of age (sections 203 and 203bis). It requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to these provisions in practice, including statistics on the number and nature of the violations reported, investigations undertaken, prosecutions, convictions and the penal sanctions applied.

Clause (c). Use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities. The Committee noted previously the ITUC's indication that children were engaged in begging. It requested the Government to provide information on the effect given to section 201 of the Federal Penal Code which penalizes the incitement of persons to engage in begging. Noting the absence of information, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information in this respect, particularly with regard to the application of sanctions in practice, and to provide, among other information, reports on the number of convictions.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Sanctions. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government concerning the Internet Police Unit. It notes in particular that, between January 2005 and June 2007, over 2,500 sites containing child pornography were deactivated. It encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in this respect.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes the detailed information provided by the Government in its report on the measures taken to combat the sexual commercial exploitation of children. It notes in particular the training activities for officials of the public authorities (labour inspection, police forces, immigration service), the awareness-raising campaigns for the population and the publication of educational materials.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour and assistance for the removal of children from these worst forms. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the information contained in the ILO/IPEC activity reports for 2007 on the project “Support for the Prevention and Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (CSEC) and the Protection of CSEC Victims in Mexico”, measures have been taken to prevent 245 children from being engaged in this worst form of child labour or to remove them from this activity since 2005. It also notes that around 90 children have been reintegrated into the school system and over 980 children have benefited from the project since the beginning of its activities. Furthermore, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the measures taken for the rehabilitation and social integration of child victims, the assistance provided to their families and the number and location of reception centres in the various states of the country. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the ILO/IPEC project with a view to: (1) preventing children under 18 years of age from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation; and (2) providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Furthermore, it requests the Government to provide information on the specific medical and social follow-up programmes formulated and implemented for the victims of this worst form of child labour.

2. Education. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the indication by the ITUC that 1.7 million children of school age are unable to receive education as poverty makes it imperative for them to work. The ITUC added that, in the case of indigenous children, access to education is difficult as teaching is normally provided only in Spanish and many indigenous families only speak their mother tongue. The Committee noted the efforts made by the Government, particularly in the context of the implementation of the “Opportunities” programme developed by the Ministry of Social Development, which provides children and young persons living in poverty with full and free access to education and to health services.

The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government that over 5,290,000 children benefited from the “Opportunities” programme in 2005 and 2006 and that it hopes to increase the number of grants provided at the secondary and higher levels to cover 1.24 million girls and 1.18 million boys for the school year 2006–07. The Committee however notes that, in its concluding observations of June 2006 (CRC/C/MEX/CO/3, paragraph 56), the Committee on the Rights of the Child expressed concern at continuing low school enrolment rates, especially among migrants and indigenous children, and at the high drop-out rates, especially among rural, indigenous and migrant children. Considering that education contributes to preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to increase the school enrolment rate and to reduce the drop-out rate, particularly for rural, indigenous and migrant children. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

3. Tourism. The Committee notes the information contained in the 2007 activities report of ILO/IPEC on the project “Support for the Prevention and Elimination of the Commercial Sexual Exploitation of Children (CSEC) and the Protection of the CSEC Victims in Mexico” that over 800 professionals in tourism have been covered by awareness raising concerning the commercial sexual exploitation of children, including sexual tourism. As the country benefits from a certain level of tourism, the Committee encourages the Government to continue its awareness-raising activities for actors directly linked to the tourist industry.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Children in agricultural work and marginal urban activities. The Committee previously noted the ITUC’s indication that the majority of children who work are engaged in agriculture or informal urban activities. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government on the results achieved in the context of the implementation of the programme to prevent and eliminate child labour in the marginal urban sector and the Programme to promote the rights of girls and boys, daily child workers in the agricultural sector and the prevention of child labour (PROCEDER) in 2005 and 2006. In particular, it notes that, in the context of the Programme on marginal urban activities, over 132,000 child workers and 162,700 children at risk have benefited from the programme, of whom 10,976 have received an educational grant from the System for the Integral Development of the Family (DIF), and 1,121 have received a DIF training grant. It further notes that, in the context of the PROCEDER programme, over 557,475 children have benefited directly from the programme, 2,873 children have received an education grant and 24 schools and a rehabilitation centre have been constructed. The Committee encourages the Government to continue its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour.

2. Street children. The Committee previously noted the study of the DIF, which showed that 114,497 children under 17 years of age worked and lived in the streets and that, solely in the city of Mexico, which was not covered by the study, there are 140,000 young persons working in the streets. The study added that 90 per cent of the children working in the streets did so on their own account and provided for the subsistence of their families. The Committee notes the information provided by the Government relating to the results obtained in the context of the implementation of the Programme of Prevention and Assistance to girls, boys and young persons living in the streets. It notes that, between 2001 and 2007, around 189,620 children have benefited from this programme. However, it notes that, according to the concluding observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child in June 2006 (CRC/C/MEX/CO/3, paragraph 68), although the number of street children has fallen in recent years, it remains high and the measures adopted to prevent this phenomenon and protect the children involved are inadequate. The Committee therefore requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that young persons under 18 years of age working on their own account, such as street children, are not engaged in hazardous types of work. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of this programme and the results achieved.

Article 8. International cooperation. 1. “Programme OASIS”. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government concerning the cooperation between the United States and Mexico in the context of the “Programme OASIS”, it notes that a “Programme OASIS” conference was held in San Antonio, Texas, in August 2007 and that the authorities of the two countries have agreed to strengthen their cooperation to punish those responsible for the unlawful trafficking of persons, particularly children, and to extend the programme to other frontier points. The Committee requests the Government to indicate (1) the number of persons who are charged and found guilty as a result of the implementation of this programme; and (2) the number of child victims of trafficking intercepted in frontier areas.

2. Border between Mexico and Guatemala. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes the information provided by the Government that the National Institute for Migration (INM) in 2006 made over 1,522 complaints concerning the unlawful trafficking and smuggling of persons. Between January and March 2007, the INM made over 353 complaints, of which 39 were referred to the courts; of these, 26 have been set aside and 462 are under examination. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on convictions and the penalties imposed as a result of the complaints made by the INM against persons working in networks engaged in the unlawful trafficking and smuggling of children.

The Committee is raising other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Morocco

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report.

Article 1 of the Convention. National Policy. The Committee notes the Government’s information that a National Action Plan for Children (2006–15) (PANE) has been adopted, a major component of which is devoted to combating child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken to abolish child labour in implementing the abovementioned Plan.

Article 2, paragraphs 1 and 3. Scope of application and compulsory schooling. The Committee noted previously that, under section 143 of the Labour Code, “minors may not be employed or admitted in enterprises or the premises of employers before the age of 15 years”, and observed that the protection provided by the Labour Code does not apply to persons working on their own account. It nonetheless noted that according to the report “Understanding children’s work in Morocco” prepared by the ILO, UNICEF and the World Bank in March 2003, (pp. 2–22), 85 per cent of working children under 14 years of age were in agriculture, where they worked for their families and not for wages. The commerce sector, which employs many children in urban areas, likewise included a large number of children working for their families without wages (59 per cent) and a high proportion of self-employed workers (around 26 per cent of children). The Committee asked the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged to ensure that the protection established by the Convention is secured for these children.

In its report, the Government indicates that the provisions of the Labour Code apply to all sectors, including agriculture and crafts. It further indicates that, although the Labour Code does not protect children working on their own account, they are protected by the Dahir of 13 November 1963 on compulsory schooling, as amended by Act No. 04.00 of 25 May 2000, under which parents are required to enrol their children in school subject to penalties. The Government states that it has made considerable progress as regards the education system and has implemented national action programmes to combat school drop-out. It also gives countrywide statistics showing the child enrolment rate for 2003–04: 92.2 per cent for the 6 to 11 years age group, 68.8 per cent for the 12 to 14 years age group and 42.9 per cent for the 15 to 17 years age group. While taking due note of this information and of the progress made in terms of school enrolment, particularly among children from 6 to 11 years, the Committee observes that the enrolment rate for children in the 12 to 14 years group shows that a number of them leave school before reaching the minimum age for admission to employment and are found on the labour market. The Committee considers that education is one of the most effective means of combating child labour, and requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the school attendance rate, particularly among children aged from 12 to 14 years, in order to prevent them from working, particularly on their own account. In this regard, it invites the Government to envisage the possibility of assigning to labour inspectors special duties regarding children working in the informal sector.

Article 2, paragraph 1, and Part V of the report form. Minimum age for admission to employment, and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of the information provided by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) to the effect that child labour was common in the informal craft industry, generally in small family workshops producing carpets, pottery, and articles of wood and leather. It also noted that, according to the report “Understanding children’s work in Morocco” (see pp. 19, 20, 22 and 23), some 372,000 children aged from 7 to 14 years – 7 per cent of the reference group – worked; for the 12 to 14 age group, 18 per cent of children were economically active. Of children who worked, 87 per cent were in rural areas, where they were found in the agricultural sector. In urban areas, children were engaged in the textiles, commerce, repairs and domestic service sectors. The average working time of these children was 45 hours a week, with substantial variations depending on the sector.

The Committee takes due note of the detailed information sent by the Government on the measures it has taken to abolish child labour, particularly by implementing a Programme to Combat Child Labour in the Crafts Sector in Marrakesh, similar to the one in Fez, the objective of which is to prevent child labour in this type of work, remove children who engage in it and ensure that they are reintegrated into formal schooling. It also notes the detailed information sent by the Government about the Vocational Training Programme based on apprenticeship in the crafts sector, which has enabled a large number of children to receive training. The Committee further notes from activity reports on the ILO/IPEC Project to Abolish Child Labour in French-speaking Africa for 2006, that a number of activities have been carried out, including measures to build capacity in various government institutions and to raise awareness about the problems of child labour. As to children in domestic work, the Committee notes that a Bill setting a minimum age of 15 years for admission to this type of employment is before Parliament and a special budget has been established for activities in this sector. The Committee notes that, according to the Government, since the start up of the ILO/IPEC project, which covers activities, inter alia, in commerce, services, agriculture and crafts, more than 8,090 children have been removed from work and granted viable alternatives, and more than 15,600 children have been prevented from taking up work.

The Committee much appreciates the efforts and measures undertaken by the Government to abolish child labour, and considers that they reflect a political resolve to develop strategies to overcome these problems. It notes, however, that application of the legislation on child labour appears to be difficult and that, in practice, child labour continues to be a problem in Morocco. The Committee therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to continue to provide information on the implementation of the abovementioned projects and on the results obtained in terms of the gradual elimination of child labour. It also asks the Government to provide information on the manner in which the Convention is applied in practice, providing, inter alia, details of the number of inspection visits conducted each year, the number and nature of the offences reported and the penalties applied.

Article 9, paragraph 1. Sanctions. The Committee noted previously that section 151 of the Labour Code provides that employment of a child under 15 years of age in breach of section 143 of the Code, is punishable by a fine of 25,000 to 30,000 dirhams (US$3,000 to 3,600), and a second offence is subject to a term of imprisonment of six days to three months and/or a fine of 50,000 to 60,000 dirhams (US$6,000 to 7,200). It nonetheless noted that sections 150 and 183 of the Labour Code provide for a fine of 300 to 500 dirhams (US$36 to 60) for breaches of section 147 (banning the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work) or of section 179 (prohibiting the employment of children under 18 years of age in quarries and mines or in work likely to hamper their growth). Considering that the fines set in sections 153 and 183 of the Labour Code are derisory, the Committee requested the Government to take steps to ensure that penalties for employing children in breach of the law are adequate and dissuasive.

In its report, the Government states that the Labour Code has increased the amount of fines for breach of provisions on the protection of child workers. The Committee points out that although the penalties provided for in section 151 of the Labour Code are heavier, it considers that those set in sections 150 and 183 are not adequate or dissuasive enough to ensure application of the Convention’s provisions on hazardous work. The Committee therefore urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that dissuasive and effective enough penalties are set for breaches of the Labour Code’s provisions on hazardous work.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clauses (a) and (d). Forced or compulsory labour and hazardous work. Domestic work of children. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of information from the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) to the effect that the statutory prohibition on forced labour is not applied effectively by the Government. Domestic work by children under conditions of servitude is a common practice in the country: parents sell their children, sometimes as young as 6 years of age, to work as domestic servants, and families adopt young girls to use them as servants. The ITUC also stated that about 50,000 children, largely girls, are working as domestic servants. Of these, some 13,000 girls under the age of 15 are employed as servants in Casablanca; 80 per cent of them come from rural areas and are illiterate; 70 per cent are under the age of 12, and 25 per cent under the age of 10. The ITUC further indicated that special legislative measures are needed to prohibit domestic servitude. The Government stated in reply that a bill on conditions for hiring domestic staff had been drafted by the Department of Employment and that other ministerial departments, non-governmental organizations and the social partners were to be consulted before the text was adopted. The Committee noted that section 10 of the Labour Code prohibits forced labour. It further observed that section 467-2 of the Penal Code prohibits the forced labour of children under 15 years of age.

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government that following a tripartite seminar held at the end of July 2006, a bill on domestic work was adopted and is in the process of validation. It sets the minimum age for admission to this type of employment at 15 years, establishes working conditions and provides for supervisory measures and penalties. The Committee further notes that awareness campaigns have been run to highlight the ills of domestic work for children, particularly “les petites bonnes”. It further notes from activity reports for 2007 on the ILO/IPEC project to “Combat child labour in Morocco by creating an appropriate environment in the country and providing for direct intervention against the worst forms of child labour in rural areas”, a special budget has been established for activities regarding this type of employment.

The Committee duly notes the measures taken by the Government to regulate domestic work, i.e. household tasks carried out by a non-member of the household who is legally old enough to work. The Committee nonetheless draws the Government’s attention to the fact that the work done by a number of children in Morocco amounts rather to domestic work of children, i.e. domestic work carried out by children who have not reached the minimum age for admission to employment or by children who have passed the minimum age but are under the age of 18, who work in conditions that approximate slavery or are hazardous, or who are exploited. The Committee reminds the Government that according to Article 3 of the Convention, such forms of work are among the worst forms of child labour and are therefore to be eliminated as a matter of urgency pursuant to Article 1. It again expresses deep concern at the situation of children who are subjected to forced labour or who work in hazardous conditions in Morocco. The Committee urges the Government to step up efforts and take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to ensure that anyone who uses the domestic labour of children under 18 years of age in the form of forced labour, or who employs children in hazardous work is prosecuted and subjected to effective and dissuasive sanctions. In this respect it requests the Government to provide information on the effect given to the provisions relating to the worst forms of child labour referred to above, including statistics of the number and nature of violations reported, the inquiries held, the legal action taken and the sentences and penalties applied. Lastly, the Committee hopes that the bill on domestic work will be adopted shortly and requests the Government to provide a copy of it as soon as it is adopted.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee takes due note of the information provided by the Government to the effect that, as part of the project being implemented by ILO/IPEC to “Combat child labour in Morocco by creating an appropriate environment in the country and intervening directly against the worst forms of child labour in rural areas”, more than 15,633 children (8,423 boys and 7,210 girls) have been prevented from being engaged in one or other of the worst forms of child labour, and 8,099 children (3,941 boys and 4,158 girls), have been removed from work with the offer of viable alternatives. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the action programmes implemented under the ILO/IPEC project, and their impact in terms of protecting children and removing them from the worst forms of child labour in Morocco.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from being engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing children therefrom and ensuring their rehabilitation and integration into society. Child prostitution and sex tourism. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that in its concluding observations of March 2006 on Morocco’s initial report on the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (CRC/C/OPSC/MAR/CO/1, paragraphs 15 and 16), the Committee on the Rights of the Child noted an amendment to the Penal Code in 2003 introducing the crime of sex tourism”. It expressed concern, however, at the persistence of child prostitution and sex tourism involving young Moroccans as well as immigrants, especially boys. It recommended that the Government intensify its efforts to tackle the problem of child prostitution, including in the context of sex tourism, by developing a specific strategy targeting the tourist industry including specific messages on child rights and on the existing sanctions against child abusers.

The Government indicates in its report that as part of the National Action Plan for Children (PANE) for the decade 2006–16, a preliminary study on the problems of the sexual exploitation of children was conducted in February 2007 with a view to drawing up a national strategy for preventing and combating the sexual exploitation of children. The Government also states that a report prepared after the study recommends certain measures, including awareness raising among young people and the public in general and the adoption of preventive measures. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken on these recommendations and the results obtained in: (a) preventing children from falling victim to prostitution, particularly in the context of sex tourism; and (b) providing the necessary and appropriate assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and ensure their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee also requests the Government to indicate whether it plans to take steps to raise the awareness of service providers directly linked to the tourism industry, including associations of hotel owners, tour operators, taxi companies, and owners of bars, as well as restaurants and their employees.

Clause (d). Children particularly at risk. Domestic work of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that according to the ITUC and the report on the mission to Morocco of the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the issue of commercial sexual exploitation of children (E/CN.4/2001/78/Add.1, paragraph 10), the physical and sexual abuse of young girls working as housemaids, or “petites bonnes”, is among the most serious problems confronting Moroccan children. The Committee takes due note of the National Programme to combat the use of little girls as housemaids (INQAD) implemented as part of the PANE. It notes that various measures are to be taken under this programme to alert the various players about the domestic work of children and to prevent it, in particular by offering alternatives to domestic work, including the reinforcement of compulsory schooling. The Committee observes that children, particularly girls, employed in domestic work often fall prey to exploitation, which can take various forms, and that it is difficult to oversee their employment conditions because the work is illegal. It urges the Government to step up efforts to protect these children, particularly from economic and sexual exploitation, and to provide information on the measures taken to this end under the INQAD programme.

Article 8. Poverty reduction. The Committee notes that in its concluding observations on Morocco's initial report of March 2006 on the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the Sale of Children, Child Prostitution and Child Pornography (CRC/C/OPSC/MAR/CO/1, paragraph 34), the Committee on the Rights of the Child noted that the Government, in cooperation of the UNDP Morocco, civil society and several NGOs, has initiated projects aimed at poverty reduction. The Committee points out that initiatives to reduce poverty contribute to breaking the poverty circle, which is essential to eliminating the worst forms of child labour, and requests the Government to provide information on any notable impact these poverty reduction projects have had in terms of eliminating of the worst forms of child labour.

The Committee is addressing a request on other matters directly to the Government.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It notes with interest the adoption of General Act No. 618 on occupational health and safety and Decree No. 96-2007 issuing the regulations thereto. It observes that both contain provisions that apply to medical examination.

Article 2 of the Convention. Medical examination for admission for employment of children and young persons under 18 years of age. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that it could be inferred from section 46 of the Ministerial Decision of 24 November 2000 that young persons over 16 years of age may carry out tasks involving the use of pesticides or other chemicals. It observed that the medical examinations established by sections 46 and 48 of the Ministerial Decision of 24 November 2000 deal only with workers whose tasks involve the handling of pesticides or other chemicals, and that under section 50 of the Ministerial Decision, the examination does not take place until 90 days after the work begins. The Committee reminded the Government that the medical examinations established in Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention are intended to determine whether children and young persons are deemed fit for the tasks they will have to perform and that the examinations must therefore be conducted before admission to employment and regardless of the type of tasks involved, and asked it to take the necessary steps to give effect to the Convention on this point. The Committee notes with satisfaction that Ministerial Agreement No. VGC-AM-002-10-06 of 27 October 2006 issuing a list of dangerous jobs applicable in Nicaragua prohibits the employment of persons under 18 years of age in tasks that involve exposure to chemical pollutants including pesticides or other chemicals.

The Committee raises other matters in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1976)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It notes with interest the adoption of General Act No. 618 on occupational health and safety and Decree No. 96-2007 issuing the regulations thereto, and that both contain provisions on medical examination. It requests the Government to provide information on the following point.

Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention. Supervision of the application of the system of medical examination for fitness to work to children engaged on their own or their parents' account. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with regret that the national legislation contains no provisions to give effect to Article 7, paragraph 2(a), of the Convention, and asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure compliance with the Convention on this point. It notes that the Government's report contains no information on the matter. It again points out that pursuant to this provision of the Convention, national laws and regulations must determine the measures of identification to be adopted for ensuring the application of the system of medical examination for fitness for employment to children and young persons engaged either on their own account or on account of their parents in itinerant trading or in any other occupation carried on in the streets or places to which the public have access. The Committee once again urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the national legislation provides for the organization of such examinations, in order to give effect to this article of the Convention.

With regard to the other provisions of the Convention, the Government is asked to refer to the Committee's comments under Convention No. 77.

Niger

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the Government's report. The Committee takes due note of the measures taken by the Government to follow up the recommendations of the High-level Fact-Finding Mission that took place in Niger from 10 to 20 January 2006 further to the request made by the Conference Committee in June 2005. It notes the following measures in particular:

- setting up of a National Committee within the Ministry of Labour for combating the vestiges of forced labour and discrimination, drawing up of a National Plan of Action for combating the vestiges of forced labour and discrimination, and implementation of a support programme for combating forced labour and discrimination;
- setting up of a National Committee within the Ministry for the Promotion of Women and Protection of Children for coordination and monitoring of the national action plan against child trafficking;
- approval of a National Employment Policy Framework document, which takes account of the social and occupational integration of persons at risk;
- drawing up of a Support Programme for the Protection of Children in Danger.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery and practices similar to slavery. 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee noted observations by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) alleging the trafficking of girls in Niger for domestic work and sexual exploitation, and trafficking of boys for the purpose of economic exploitation. It also noted that, according to information obtained by the high-level mission, Niger is certainly a transit country since its geographical location makes it a hub for trade between North Africa and sub-Saharan Africa. The Committee also observed that Niger's geographical location – i.e. the fact that it shares land borders with seven States (Algeria, Benin, Burkina Faso, Chad, Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, Mali and Nigeria) – places the country at the heart of the region's migratory flows and exposes it to the risk of trafficking, particularly child trafficking, especially as most of the countries with which it shares a land border are themselves affected by trafficking. The Committee also noted that, according to information gathered by the High-level Mission, Niger is both a country of origin and a country of destination for human trafficking, including the trafficking of children. The mission report also indicated that the trafficking of women and children between the countries of the subregion has increasingly involved Niger, and that the trafficking networks are fed, especially in Niamey, by young persons recruited mainly in Nigeria, Togo, Benin and Ghana, with the promise of a bright professional future, to carry out tasks which are traditionally regarded as demeaning in Niger (domestic work) or which are prohibited on religious grounds (work in bars or restaurants, etc.).

The Committee previously noted that Niger's Association for Human Rights had drafted a bill for the prevention, repression and punishment of trafficking in Niger and asked the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that the bill was adopted as soon as possible. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the drawing up of the draft bill on the trafficking of children is still under consideration by the competent authorities. The Committee is of the opinion that, in order to combat effectively the worst forms of child labour, especially the sale and trafficking of children, the adoption and application of legislation geared to the problem is essential in addition to the implementation of programmes of action. It reminds the Government that Article 1 of the Convention provides that immediate and effective measures must be taken to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee sincerely hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to ensure that the draft bill for the prevention, repression and punishment of trafficking in Niger is drawn up and adopted as soon as possible. It requests the Government to supply information on all progress made in this respect.

2. Forced or compulsory labour. Begging. The Committee previously took note of observations by the ITUC to the effect that children are forced to beg in West Africa, including Niger. For economic or religious reasons, many families entrust their children from the age of 5 or 6 years to a spiritual guide (marabout), with whom they live until they are 15 or 16 years old. During that time, they are entirely under the responsibility of the marabout, who teaches them religion and in return requires them to carry out certain tasks, including begging.

The Committee noted that there are three different forms of begging in Niger: conventional begging, educational begging and begging that uses children for purely economic ends. Conventional begging is the form practised by indigent people. Educational begging is the form practised in Niger in accordance with the Muslim religion as a means of learning humility, for the person practising it, and compassion, for the alms-giver. Lastly, begging that uses children for purely economic ends uses children as a source of labour. The Committee noted that the existence of this third form of begging was acknowledged by those interviewed, including the Government, and that, because this form of begging has its roots in cultural and religious practice, few are shocked to see children exploited in this way. However, in this form of begging children are especially vulnerable since their parents, although concerned for the children's religious education, are unable to provide for their subsistence. The children are therefore left entirely dependent on the marabouts. The Committee expressed serious concern at the use of children for purely economic ends by certain marabouts, particularly since, as it would appear from the information gathered by the mission, this form of begging is very much on the increase.

The Committee notes the Government's information to the effect that a National Monitoring Unit to combat begging has been set up. It also notes with interest that Circular No. 006/MJ/DAJ/S/AJS of 27 March 2006 of the Ministry of Justice of Niger, addressed to the various judicial authorities, requests that sections 179, 181 and 182 of the Penal Code, which punish begging and any person, including the parents of minors under 18 years of age, who engage habitually in begging, who make others beg or who knowingly benefit from begging, be strictly applied by prosecuting without leniency anyone who uses children for begging for purely economic ends. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the practical application of the national legislation on begging, further to Circular No. 006/MJ/DAJ/S/AJS of 27 March 2006 of the Ministry of Justice, particularly by indicating whether marabouts who use children for purely economic ends have been convicted, and by providing statistics on the number and nature of contraventions reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed. It also requests the Government to indicate effective and time-bound measures taken to protect children against forced labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (d). Hazardous work. Children working in mines and quarries. In its previous comments, the Committee took note of information from the ITUC to the effect that child labour in small-scale mining (trona mining in the Boboye region, salt in Tounouga, gypsum in Madaoua and gold in Liptako-Gourma) is widespread, principally in the informal economy where the work is the most hazardous. The Committee noted that section 152 of Decree No. 67-126/MFP/T of 7 September 1967 prohibited the employment of children in underground work in mines.

The Committee noted, from the information gathered by the High-level Mission that hazardous work by children, particularly in mines and quarries, existed in informal locations. The Committee noted the Government's statement that, when parents work at informal sites, they are often accompanied by children who are too young to stay at home alone and that, in some cases, the children carry out small tasks for their parents. The Committee noted, however, that according to various interviews carried out during the mission, the children do more than simply accompany their parents, becoming involved in the chain of production, whether in gypsum mines or salt quarries, sometimes performing small tasks to facilitate their parents' work or, in some cases, tasks that are physically hazardous for more than eight hours a day, every day of the week, running the risk of accident or disease. The Committee pointed out in this connection that there is a difference between the child labour prohibited by ILO Conventions and the small tasks that children may carry out in the family environment which may be regarded as playing a major role in the child's socialization. The Committee expressed concern at the use of child labour in hazardous work, particularly in mines and quarries, in the informal sector. It observed that Niger, like many other developing countries, is affected by child labour because of the poverty of the population and the expansion of the informal economy to the detriment of the formal sector.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's statement that the Minister of the Interior, acting on the instructions of the Prime Minister, has issued a circular letter strictly prohibiting the employment of children in the mines and quarries of the areas concerned, namely Tillabéri, Tahoua and Agadez. The Minister for Mining has received directives for taking account of this ban in the drawing up of mining agreements. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the implementation of the circular letter from the Minister of the Interior, particularly by indicating whether steps have been taken to ensure that the national legislation to protect children against underground work in mines is also applied to informal mining and quarrying, and by providing statistics on the number and nature of violations reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. Labour inspection. In its previous comments, the Committee noted the information in the mission report that site visits revealed that the labour inspectorate, which plays a key role in combating child labour and forced labour, is severely lacking in both the human and material resources needed to perform its duties. The mission recommended a labour inspection audit to ascertain the exact nature and extent of the inspectorate's needs in Niger. While noting that action has been taken to boost labour inspection resources for combating child labour, the Committee notes that the Government does not provide any information on this subject in its report. With reference to its observation under the Labour Inspection Convention, 1947 (No. 81), the Committee hopes that the Government will take the necessary steps to implement the mission's recommendation. It requests the Government to send information on this matter.

2. Youth Protection Unit. The Committee notes the Government's information that a Youth Protection Unit has been set up within the national police force. It requests the Government to supply information on the activities of this unit, especially with regard to the protection of children under 18 years of age against trafficking and forced begging.

Article 6. Programme of action. The Committee notes the Government's information to the effect that a National Plan of Action against the trafficking of children has been drawn up. It requests the Government to send a copy of this plan of action and provide information on the implementation thereof, especially the results achieved in terms of the elimination of trafficking of children in the country.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in June 2005, the Government representative informed the Conference Committee that, notwithstanding government efforts in the legal sphere, the economic situation did not always allow standards to be applied effectively. The Committee observed that the mission report revealed that it is difficult to apply the law on forced labour and the exploitation of children for economic and sexual purposes. Noting the lack of information in the Government's report, it reminds the Government that, according to Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government is required to take all necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including by laying down and imposing penal sanctions or, if appropriate, other sanctions. The Committee urges the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that persons who engage in the sale and trafficking of persons, forced begging by children and the use of children in hazardous work, particularly in mines and quarries, are prosecuted and incur penalties that are sufficiently effective and dissuasive.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. 1. Improving the working of the education system. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that the mission report showed that underlying the problem of child labour is the problem of children's access to education and training that meets the needs of the labour market. Moreover, despite the Government's endeavours in the area of education and its attempts to attain the objective of providing all children, boys and girls, with the means to complete a full primary education cycle by 2015, the situation is still unsatisfactory. The Mission also indicated that parents hesitate to send their children to school when they see that such education affords no guarantee of a job, whereas the Muslim religious schools train children to be good Muslims or even teachers of the Koran, which explains why such schools are on the increase in Niger. The Committee noted in this respect that the education dispensed by Muslim religious teachers leads to no diploma, which limits the children's potential for entering the labour market in the future. The Committee expressed deep concern at the low school enrolment rate and the extent of illiteracy. It noted the Mission's recommendation to the effect that the working of the education system needs to be improved to ensure access for all to high-standard education. The Committee also noted that the Government was considering the possibility of integrating the Muslim religious schools into the national education system, which would make for better supervision both of the teachers and of the education provided.

The Committee notes the information in the Government's report concerning the increase in primary school enrolments, especially among girls. It also notes that the number of classrooms in rural areas has increased. Moreover, the Committee notes that, according to the Government's report on statistics for basic education for 2005–06, the net school attendance rates for children between 7 and 12 years of age is 54.1 per cent for boys and 37.8 per cent for girls, with an average figure of 45.8 per cent. It observes that, according to UNESCO information for 2005, the school attendance rate at primary level is 46 per cent for boys and 33 per cent for girls, and 9 per cent for boys and 6 per cent for girls at secondary level. With regard to the Muslim religious schools, the Committee duly notes the Government's information that, in the context of the Franco–Arab education support project, measures for restructuring the schools have been taken, including taking a census of the schools (of which there were 50,000 in 2000); training the Muslim religious teachers in teacher–pupil relations; and revising the teaching programme by introducing new subjects such as grammar, language, and vocational training activities (sewing, dyeing and woodworking). In view of the fact that education helps to prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour, the Committee strongly encourages the Government to renew its efforts to improve the working of the education system, especially by increasing the school attendance rate and reducing the school drop-out rate, and also by taking steps to integrate the Muslim religious schools into the national education system. It requests the Government to provide information on the results achieved.

2. Informing and educating the public about the problems of child labour and forced labour. The Committee noted that, in its report, the Mission recommended measures to raise awareness and educate the public about the problems of child labour and forced labour, taking account of the gender dimension, because they affect the two sexes differently and because experience has shown that if women (mothers) are made aware, the impact on development is greater. It also noted the Mission's suggestion that specific measures to raise awareness among teachers of the Koran and parents should be undertaken to prevent the use of begging by certain marabouts. The Committee notes the Government's statement that it has conducted information and training campaigns among those involved in fighting the problem of child labour and its worst forms, including political decision-makers, employers, community leaders and traditional chiefs, police officers, magistrates, current or potential child workers and their parents, teachers, students and the general public. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts of sensitization to inform people of the dangers of child labour and its worst forms, by cooperating with the various government agencies, civil society in general and traditional chiefs.

3. Project in small-scale gold mines in West Africa. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that Niger is taking part in the ILO/IPEC project to “Prevent and eliminate child labour in small-scale gold mines in West Africa”, in which the other participants are Burkina Faso and Mali, for three years from 2006. It asked the Government to provide information on the results achieved following the implementation of the project. The Committee notes that, according to the information in the ILO/IPEC activity reports for 2007, approximately 280 children (165 boys and 115 girls) have actually been prevented from being engaged in hazardous work in small-scale gold mines. The Committee requests the Government to supply information on the implementation of the project and also on the results achieved at the end of the project in terms of the actual numbers of children prevented from being engaged in this worst form of child labour.

Clause (b). Necessary direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. With reference to its previous comments on the ILO/IPEC project to “Prevent and eliminate child labour in small-scale gold mines in West Africa”, the Committee notes that, according to the information in the ILO/IPEC activity reports on the project for 2007, more than 400 children, 45 per cent of whom are girls, have benefited directly from the activities of the project. It also notes that several action programmes on education and vocational training, with a view to removing children involved in gold-washing from small-scale mines, have been implemented. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the number of children who will actually be removed from small-scale gold mines further to the implementation of the ILO/IPEC project and the action programmes on education and vocational training. It also requests the Government to supply information on the results achieved through the implementation of these programmes to ensure the rehabilitation and social integration of these children.

Article 8. Cooperation. 1. Regional and international cooperation. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes that, apart from signing the Multilateral Cooperation Agreement to combat child trafficking in West Africa in July 2005, Niger also signed the Abuja Multilateral Cooperation Agreement in 2006. It also duly notes the Government's indication that it signed a bilateral agreement with Nigeria for the setting up of a joint border surveillance unit. The Committee requests the Government to indicate whether, in the context of the implementation of these agreements with the other signatory countries, child victims of trafficking have been detected and intercepted in the border areas, and whether any persons involved in child trafficking networks have been apprehended and arrested.

2. Poverty reduction. With reference to its previous comments, in which it noted the statement that the High-level Mission recommended that, in order to combat poverty, the creation of decent and productive jobs must be at the core of any poverty reduction policy, the Committee duly notes that the Government has drawn up a new economic, financial and social policy framework entitled "Fast-track development and poverty reduction strategy (2008–12)" (SDARP). The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the SDARP, particularly as regards the effective reduction of poverty among children engaged in the worst forms of child labour.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, in its report, the High-level Mission referred to a lack of reliable data for quantifying accurately the extent and characteristics of the problem of child labour. It noted that studies were under way and asked the Government to provide information on their results. The Committee notes the Government's statement that the following studies are being conducted in the country: study on the state of children's education for the 6–18 age group conducted by a consortium of NGOs; study on child labour in gold washing in Niger conducted by the National Institute of Statistics (INS) in collaboration with the ILO/IPEC project on mining in West Africa; basic study on forced labour and child labour in Niger conducted by the National Committee on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; and the national study on child labour in Niger conducted by the INS in collaboration with ILO/IPEC and in partnership with a consortium of NGOs. The Committee requests the Government, once the studies are completed, to supply statistical data and information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour and on the number of children protected by the measures giving effect to the Convention. The information supplied should, as far as possible, be disaggregated by sex.

The Committee is also raising a number of other points in a direct request to the Government.

Minimum Age (Underground Work) Convention, 1965 (No. 123) (ratification: 1974)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalls that for a number of years, it has been requesting the Government to indicate measures taken to give effect to the Convention (Article 4, paragraph 5), under which the employer shall make available to the workers' representatives, at their request, lists of the persons who are employed in work underground and who are less than two years older than the minimum age specified by the Government which is 16 years. The lists should contain the dates of birth of persons aged between 16 and 18 years and the dates at which they were employed or worked underground in the undertaking for the first time.

The Committee noted that under section 62 of the Labour Act, every employer is required to keep a register of all young persons in his employment with particulars of their ages, the date of employment and the conditions and nature of their employment and to produce the register for inspection when required by an authorized labour officer. The Committee further noted that under section 91(1) of the same Act, "young person" means a person under the age of 18 years and "industrial undertaking" includes mines, quarries and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that section 62 of the Labour Act is amended so that such registers may also be made available to workers' representatives, at their request. The Committee asks the Government to inform it of progress made in this regard in its next report.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (d). Hazardous work. In its previous comments, the Committee had expressed concern for the health and safety of children under 18 years of age involved in camel racing and subject to exploitation. It had noted the Government's statement that the Omani Labour Code does not allow for the employment of children under 18 years of age in hazardous work. According to the Government, camel races are a traditional and popular national sport from ancient times practised by adults and children and only Omani children ride as camel jockeys. The latter are not hired workers riding camels in return for a wage and, accordingly, the jockeys are not child labourers. The Committee had further noted that the Regulations on holding and organizing camel races in the Sultanate of Oman, issued by the Oman Equestrian and Camel Federation on 7 August 2005, state that no jockey under 18 years of age will be allowed to take part in camel races in the Sultanate of Oman. It had observed, however, that section 2 of these regulations states that the minimum age of 18 years for taking part in camel races would be reached progressively starting from a minimum age of 14 years, over four years starting from the 2005–06 season. The Committee had noted that the Government adopted a number of wide-ranging measures aimed at protecting the health and safety of camel jockeys under 18 years and providing them with training. While welcoming the measures aimed at protecting the health and safety of camel jockeys, it had considered that camel racing was inherently dangerous to the health and safety of children. It requested the Government to ensure that the measures to protect the health and safety of camel jockeys under 18 years of age were strictly enforced, pending the progressive increase in the minimum age to 18 for camel racing.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the Omani Federation of Camel Racing fully observes the measures set down to protect the health and safety of camel jockeys under 18 years of age. In particular, it undertakes preventive measures to ensure the safety and security of camel jockeys in camel races, by obliging them to wear protective headgear and suitable clothing. It also notes the Government's information that races only occur in Oman when the Omani Federation of Camel Racing – working under direct supervision of the Ministry of Sport Activities – agrees that all conditions are respected: camel jockeys are not young, they enjoy good health and conditions regarding the safety measures are fulfilled. According to the Government, the Omani Federation of Camel Racing continues to undertake unannounced inspection visits to verify that the age of camel jockeys is not less than 15 years. Since the Council of Ministers has approved the decision to increase the age of camel jockeys to 18 years, the Omani Federation of Camel Racing has issued a decision which specifies the gradual increase in the age of camel jockeys to 18 years in 2010, in order to take part in camel races. Meanwhile, in 2007, all camel jockeys participating in camel races are required to register their names with the Omani Federation of Camel Racing and hand over their passports, personal photographs and birth certificates to the Federation.

The Committee observes that, according to the Government's information, the minimum age for taking part in camel races has been progressively raised from 14 to 15 years, in accordance with the Regulations on holding and organizing camel races in the Sultanate of Oman of 7 August 2005. It welcomes the measures taken by the Omani Federation of Camel Racing to increase supervision on the legal requirements that camel jockeys must fulfil to participate in camel races, especially on the legal age to participate in these races. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that the measures aimed at protecting the health and safety of camel jockeys under 18 years of age are strictly enforced, pending the progressive increase in the minimum age to 18 for camel racing. In this regard, it urges the Government to ensure that unannounced inspections are carried out by the labour inspectorate to ensure that children between 15 and 18 years of age do not perform their work under circumstances that are detrimental to their health and safety. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the progress in raising the minimum age for taking part in camel races to 18 years.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. The Committee had previously noted that Decision No. 30-2002 of 8 August 2005 of the Omani Federation of Camel Racing states that any person who violates the Regulations on holding and organizing camel races in the Sultanate of Oman of 2005 shall be convicted by the court. It had requested the Government to indicate the applicable penalties under Decision No. 30-2002 of 8 August 2005. The Committee notes that the Government provides a document showing the list of names of camel jockeys prohibited from participating in camel races by the Omani Federation of Camel Racing due to violations of the regulations on racing. Two of these cases regard violations of the rules on the legal age to participate in camel races. The Committee observes that the Government's report contains no information on the penalties imposed on persons who use under-age children as camel jockeys in camel races in violation of Decision No. 30-2002 of 8 August 2005. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the penalties imposed on any person who employs a child as a camel jockey in violation of Decision No. 30-2002 of 8 August 2005.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59) (ratification: 1955)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to provide information on the following points.

Article 7, paragraph 4(a) and (b), of the Convention. Minimum age for admission to employment in mines and quarries and in dangerous and unhealthy occupations. The Committee had noted, since 1992, that the Mines Act of 1923 and the Factories Act of 1934 established the minimum age of 15 years for access to employment in mines and for dangerous or unhealthy occupations, respectively, in accordance with Article 7, paragraph 4(a) and (b), of the Convention. It had noted that the Employment of Children Act, 1991, in section 2(iii), defined “child” as a person who has not completed his/her 14th year of age, and prohibits the employment or work in the prescribed occupations or processes for children (i.e. under the age of 14 years). It had further noted that section 19 of the Act of 1991 stipulates that the definition of “child” contained in the Factories Act of 1934 and in the Mines Act of 1923, should be deemed to be amended in accordance with the definition in section 2 of the Act of 1991. The Committee had therefore observed that the Employment of Children Act of 1991 did not meet the requirements under Article 7, paragraph 4, of the Convention and the change of the definition of “child” from under 15 years to under 14 years signified a retrogression from the minimum age earlier prescribed under the Factories Act, 1934, and the Mines Act, 1923.

The Committee notes the Government’s information that, under the existing labour laws (Mines Act of 1923, Factories Act of 1934, the Road and Transport Ordinance of 1975) and the Constitution, children under 14 years cannot be employed or work in any public or private industrial undertaking containing processes dangerous to the life, health and morals of children. In particular, according to the Employment of Children Act of 1991, children under 14 years of age cannot be employed in occupations dangerous to their life, health and morals listed in the same Act. The Committee also notes that, according to the information provided by the Government under Convention No. 182, the Employment of Children Act, as amended by Act No. 1280(I) of 2005, includes in the list of types of hazardous work prohibited to children under 14 years of age “work in underground mines and quarries including blasting and assisting in blasting”. The Committee observes that employment or work in mines, quarries, and other works for the extraction of minerals from the earth or in occupations which are scheduled as dangerous or unhealthy by the competent authority is covered by Article 3(d) of Convention No. 182 which was ratified by the Government in 2001. The Committee urges the Government to amend its legislation and in this regard requests the Government to refer to its comments made under Article 3(d) of Convention No. 182.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee had previously noted that the action programmes launched under the International Programme on the Elimination of Child Labour (ILO/IPEC) were contributing towards informal education and simultaneously combating child labour. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the information provided by the Government under Convention No. 182, in the period 2004–07, under the Time-bound Programme (TBP) for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour, various projects have been launched to eliminate child labour in the following industries: tanneries, surgical instruments manufacturing industries, glass bangle industry, deep-sea fishing industry, coal mining industries, rag-picking. Under these projects, in total, 11,800 children were removed from child labour in the abovementioned sectors and rehabilitated through vocational training and health-care services. In particular, 4,750 children who were withdrawn from the glass bangle industry received health-care services and 300 children benefited from vocational training programmes. Moreover, 2,550 children who were removed from the surgical industry received healthcare services and 160 benefited from vocational training programmes. According to the Government, the “National project on the rehabilitation of child labour” has been expanded. The number of national centres for the rehabilitation of child labourers has been increased from 83 in 2004 to 151 in 2007. In these centres, former child workers between 5 and 14 years of age, removed from hazardous work, are provided with free education, vocational training, clothing, footwear and a stipend. At present, 15,045 students are benefiting from primary education in these centres, and 4,497 have been admitted in governmental schools for further education. Moreover, the Child Care Foundation (CCF), an NGO, worked in the provinces of Punjab and Sindh to rehabilitate children working in the carpet industry. As a main result of the activities of the CCF, over 7,000 working children received free education and vocational training. Moreover, 525 children completed primary education and 976 children were mainstreamed into governmental schools. The Committee finally notes the statistical information provided by the Government on the inspections carried out in the period 2005–07 regarding compliance with the Employment of Children Act of 1991. In particular, in 2006, 9,286 inspections were carried out which resulted in 6,300 penalties and 81 convictions. In 2007, 322 inspections were carried out, which resulted in 1,637 cases still pending before courts. The Committee proposes to continue to examine more specifically the application of this Convention in practice under Convention No. 182.

Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the Government’s report.

Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention. Minimum age of employment in industrial undertakings. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 120 of the Labour Code allows persons aged between 12 and 15 to work in undertakings in which those employed are “preferably” members of the employer’s family. Recalling that under this provision of the Convention, national legislation may permit the employment of children under 15 in undertakings in which “only” members of the employer’s family are employed, the Committee asked the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to bring national legislation into conformity with the Convention in this respect.

In its report, the Government states that section 29 of the Labour Code provides that work of a family nature for which “only” members of the family or persons accepted by that family, under the protection of one of its members, are employed is excluded from the application of the Code, provided that the workers are not salaried employees. The Committee notes that, under this provision, the scope of Labour Code does not exclude salaried persons under 15 years who work in the same undertaking as members of their family. Thus, section 120 of the Labour Code, which allows minors over the age of 12 but under the age of 15 to work in undertakings in which those employed are “preferably” members of the employers’ family, is applicable to them. Under these circumstances, the Committee asks the Government to indicate the scope of the term “preferably”, found in section 120 of the Labour Code. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that the possibility offered by Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention to permit the employment of children under the age of 15 years in undertakings in which “only” members of the employer’s family are employed, applies to both salaried and non-salaried persons.

Article 5. Dangerous work. Further to its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction the adoption of Decree No. 4951/05 which regulates Act No. 1657/01 and approves the list of dangerous types of child labour.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the Government’s report.

Article 4, paragraphs 1 and 2, of the Convention. Medical re-examination of fitness for employment until the age of 21 years. In its previous comments, the Committee reminded the Government that, apart from the general examination provided for by Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention, provision has to be made under Article 4 of the Convention, in respect of occupations which involve high health risks, for a medical examination of fitness for employment and for re-examination until at least the age of 21 years. It also reminded the Government that the national legislation must define the jobs or categories of jobs for which this examination of fitness is required. The Committee requested the Government to adopt the necessary measures to bring its national legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point.

While taking due note of the information supplied by the Government concerning the specific register of workers under the age of majority established by resolution No. 701 of 3 October 2006, the Committee observes that although this is a protective measure, it concerns only young persons between 14 and 18 years of age and does not meet the requirements of Article 4 of the Convention. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to provide, in respect of occupations involving high health risks, for an examination of fitness for employment and for re-examination until at least the age of 21 years. It also requests the Government to define the occupations or categories of occupations in respect of which such an examination is required.

Article 6, paragraph 1. Measures for vocational guidance and physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons declared unable to work. Noting the absence of information in the Government’s report, the Committee again requests it to take the necessary measures to provide for the physical and vocational rehabilitation of children and young persons found by medical examination to be unsuited to certain types of work or to have physical handicaps or limitations. It asks the Government to supply information in this regard.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. Referring to its previous comments, the Committee notes the Government’s information that no figures are available. The Committee hopes that, in view of the establishment of the specific register of young workers, the Government will be in a position to supply in its next report statistical data on the number of children and young persons who are working and who have undergone the medical examinations provided for by the Convention, extracts of inspection reports relating to infringements reported and penalties imposed, and also any other information concerning the application of the Convention in practice.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the information contained in the Government’s report. The Committee requests the Government to refer to its comments under Convention No. 77.

Night Work of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 79) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee takes note of the Government’s report.

Article 3 of the Convention. Period during which it is forbidden to work at night. In its previous comments, the Committee noted with satisfaction that under section 2 of Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, night work between 7 p.m. and 7 a.m., i.e. a period of 12 hours, is classified as dangerous and that, pursuant to section 3 of the Decree, it is prohibited for children under 18 years of age. It nonetheless noted that section 58 of the Children’s and Young Persons’ Code prohibits night work for children aged 14 to 18 years for a period of ten hours including the interval between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. In order to avoid any ambiguity in the law, the Committee deemed it advisable to align section 58 with the Children’s and Young Persons' Code with Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005 and the Convention, by introducing an amendment to increase to 12 hours the period during which young persons must not work at night.

While noting the information from the Government that the exceptions allowed by this provision of the Convention have not been used, the Committee again expresses the view that it would be advisable to align section 58 of the Children's and Young Persons' Code with Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, the Convention and practice. It requests the Government to take the necessary steps to amend section 58 of the Children's and Young Persons Code and to establish that the period during which children may not work at night must be 12 hours.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1966)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to refer to the comments made under Convention No. 79.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's first and second reports and the attached documentation. It also notes the observations made by the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 30 August 2006.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee notes that, in his report of 9 December 2004 (E/CN.4/2005/78/Add.1), the Special Rapporteur on the Sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography indicates that, according to evidence gathered in the various cities during his visit to Paraguay, the trafficking of children is a widespread problem in the country. One of the reasons for this phenomenon is that the country's borders are permeable and checks by immigration officials are rare.

The Committee notes that, in its comments, the ITUC refers to a 2005 study on the trafficking of persons in Paraguay undertaken by the NGO Grupo Luna Nueva on behalf of the International Organization for Migration (IOM). According to this study, trafficking of persons, including boys and girls, at both the international and domestic levels, is on the increase in the country. The number of cases of trafficking reported increased from eight in 2002, involving 42 women, of whom 12 were minors, to 118 in 2005, involving 495 women, of whom 145 were under 18 years of age. Furthermore, according to the same study, Paraguay is a country of origin and of destination. Of the 145 girls involved in the cases of trafficking of persons reported in 2005, around 62 per cent were taken to Argentina, approximately 28 per cent were displaced within the country and 10 per cent were removed to other countries, including Brazil. Furthermore, even though in order to leave the country children under 18 years of age require parental authorization, signed by the judicial authority, and their identity documents, this requirement is not applied in practice. The ITUC also emphasizes that the penal legislation does not prohibit the international trafficking of persons for economic exploitation or internal trafficking, and does not penalize accomplices involved in the process of trafficking. In the view of the ITUC, the reasons for which few cases of the trafficking of persons are reported and that there are few prosecutions are the absence of adequate legislation and the lack of awareness of the phenomenon in society, and particularly among the police. By way of illustration, the ITUC indicates that between 2002 and 2004, penal sanctions were only imposed in 21 cases of trafficking.

The Committee notes that section 129 of the Penal Code prohibits the use of force or threats with a view to causing a person to leave or to enter the national territory for the purposes of prostitution. It also notes that section 2(15) of Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, issued under Act No. 1657/2001 approving the list of hazardous types of work, provides that activities involving the displacement of a child to other countries and the periodic movement of a child within national frontiers, are considered to be hazardous types of work. The Committee observes that, although section 129 of the Penal Code prohibits the international trafficking of persons for prostitution, it does not prohibit the international trafficking of persons for economic exploitation or domestic trafficking.

The Committee notes that convergent information demonstrates the existence of the international and domestic trafficking of young persons under 18 years of age for both economic and sexual exploitation. In this respect, it reminds the Government that Article 3(a) of the Convention requires the Government to prohibit the international and domestic sale and trafficking of young persons under 18 years for economic and sexual exploitation. The Committee observes that the national legislation applicable to this worst form of child labour displays shortcomings, which may give rise to problems in its implementation, particularly with regard to the manner in which these offences are addressed. The Committee notes that bills on tourism and sexual exploitation, including the trafficking of persons, has been prepared and is under discussion in the various government bodies. The Committee hopes that in the bills the Government will take into consideration the Committee's comments and will prohibit the sale and trafficking of young persons under 18 years for economic and sexual exploitation. Furthermore, it also encourages the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure in practice the protection of young persons under 18 years against sale and trafficking for both economic and sexual exploitation and requests it to provide information on the application of sanctions in practice and, among other information, to provide reports on the number of convictions.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of children for prostitution. The Committee notes that, in his report of 9 December 2004 (E/CN.4/2005/78/Add.1), the Special Rapporteur on the Sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography indicates that two out of three sex workers are minors. Most of the young persons who are victims of sexual exploitation are aged between 16 and 18 years and began working in the sex trade between the ages of 12 and 13. Children as young as 8 years of age are also involved.

The Committee notes the ITUC'S indication in its communication that, although the number of children engaged in prostitution varies, around half of those engaged in prostitution in Paraguay are minors. According to a study carried out by ILO/IPEC in June 2002 on the commercial sexual exploitation of girls and boys, out of every three persons who work in the sex industry, two are minors. Since 2004, as a result of the awareness-raising campaigns undertaken in the various cities of the country on this subject and the adoption of regulations on the closure of bars and brothels, the problem has become more clandestine. Children engaged in prostitution are now more likely to be found in flats and on the outskirts of towns. According to the ITUC, the majority of children who are victims of prostitution are girls, but the available information indicates that transsexual boys begin to work in prostitution from the age of 13 years and are often the victims of trafficking to Italy. The ITUC adds that the consequences of the sexual exploitation of children are very clear. In addition to physical and psychological ill-treatment, the majority of those engaged in this worst form of child labour drink, smoke and take drugs. Moreover, the ITUC indicates that the police do not have personnel specialized in investigations into the commercial sexual exploitation of children and the law enforcement agencies do not clearly understand that children engaged in prostitution may be victims of crime and that, in practice, they are often treated as prostitutes and criminals.

The Committee notes that sections 139 and 140 of the Penal Code prohibit the procuring and exploitation of persons engaged in prostitution. It notes that, although the national legislation is in conformity with the Convention, the use, procuring or offering of children under 18 years of age for prostitution still occurs in practice. The Committee expresses serious concern at the situation of children who are the victims of sexual exploitation in Paraguay, particularly for commercial purposes. It requests the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation and to take the necessary measures to ensure that effect is given to the legislation in practice and to protect children under 18 years of age from being used, procured or offered for prostitution. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the application of sanctions in practice including, for instance, reports on the number of convictions. Furthermore, it requests the Government to indicate whether the national legislation contains provisions criminalizing the client in the event of prostitution.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. Commercial sexual exploitation. In its comments, the ITUC indicates that very few controls are carried out at borders. It is therefore very easy to transport children from Ciudad del Este or from Pedro Juan Caballero to Foz de Iguazú in Brazil, and from Encarnación and Puerto Falcón to Posadas and Clorinda in Argentina. Moreover, the Argentinian customs officers regularly apprehend minors who have crossed the Paraguayan border without being intercepted and either do not have identity documents or have documents belonging to other persons. By way of example, the ITUC indicates that, according to the IOM study, up to November 2004, Argentinian customs officers on the borders of Puerto and Falcón-Clorinda refused entry to around 9,000 persons, of whom 40 per cent were minors without proper documentation. The ITUC adds that several Paraguayan officials in the Department of Migration and Identification and the Department of Immigration believe that they do not have the authority to intervene in cases of trafficking and suppose that the offence of the trafficking of persons can only be committed in the country of destination of the victims. Accordingly, victims of trafficking are unlikely to lodge complaints as they lack confidence in the judicial system and fear reprisals from the traffickers. The Committee expresses concern at the weakness of the national institutions responsible for enforcing the legislation on the commercial sexual exploitation of children. It requests the Government to take the necessary measures to reinforce these institutions, and particularly the police, the judiciary and customs officers, and to provide information on this subject.

Article 6. Programmes of action. National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of the Sexual Exploitation of Girls, Boys and Young Persons. The Committee takes due note of the National Plan for the Prevention and Elimination of the Sexual Exploitation of Girls, Boys and Young Persons, and the information provided on the progress achieved as a result of its implementation. It requests the Government to continue providing information on the National Plan, on programmes of action for the elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children undertaken in the context of the National Plan and on the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. The Committee notes that Paraguay participated in the ILO/IPEC project on the Prevention and elimination of the commercial sexual exploitation of children on the borders between Argentina, Brazil and Paraguay. It takes due note of the fact that this project contributed to the removal of several children from this worst form of child labour on the borders between these countries and to the provision of psychological assistance to the beneficiaries of the programme.

Clauses (a) and (b). Preventing children from becoming engaged in the worst forms of child labour, removing them from these worst forms of child labour and ensuring their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. Commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee notes that one of the objectives of the ILO/IPEC project on the Prevention and elimination of domestic work by children and the commercial sexual exploitation of children is to prevent the engagement of children in commercial sexual exploitation and to remove children who are already engaged in this activity. The Committee notes that, during the course of 2006, around 150 children were removed from this worst form of child labour and received assistance, particularly psychological help and assistance in their schooling. At the beginning of 2007, around 50 children were detected in situations of commercial sexual exploitation. The Committee also notes that shelters for child victims of commercial sexual exploitation have been established. However, it observes that little information is available on this subject. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the results achieved in the context of the implementation of this project in terms of: (a) preventing children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation; and (b) providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from this worst form of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. It also requests the Government to provide information on the shelters for child victims of commercial sexual exploitation, with an indication, for instance, of the number of children admitted to the shelters whether specific medical and social follow-up programmes have been prepared and implemented for these children and whether the latter receive basic education or have access to vocational training.

2. Tourism. As the country benefits from a certain level of tourism, the Committee requests the Government to indicate whether measures have been taken to raise the awareness of the actors directly related to the tourist industry, such as associations of hotel owners, tourist operators, associations of taxi drivers, as well as owners of bars and restaurants and their employees, on the subject of sexual exploitation.

3. Teaching materials, training and awareness raising. The Committee duly notes the many preventive measures adopted with a view to preventing children from becoming victims of commercial sexual exploitation. In particular, it notes the following measures: (i) the formulation and publication of educational materials on the sexual exploitation of children; (ii) training activities on the commercial sexual exploitation of children organized for police officers in certain departments of the country and for the national police; and (iii) awareness-raising campaigns for the population. The Committee requests the Government to intensify its training and awareness-raising activities for the population and civil society.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. Children working in domestic service – the “criadazgo” system. The Committee notes the ITUC’s indication in its communication that, according to a study carried out between 2000 and 2001, over 38,000 children between the ages of 5 and 17 years worked in domestic service in the houses of others. Moreover, another group of children who are very vulnerable to exploitation, namely those engaged under the “criadazgo” system, live and work in the houses of others in exchange for accommodation, food and basic education. The numbers involved are not known since, as these children are normally considered not to be working, they are not taken into account in statistics. However, the ITUC indicates that a study undertaken in 2002 by the Documentation and Studies Centre shows that nearly 60 per cent of children working in domestic service and those engaged under the “criadazgo” system are aged 13 years and under. According to the ITUC, in so far as these children do not control their conditions of employment, a majority of them work under conditions of forced labour. The Committee notes that section 2(22) of Decree No. 4951 of 22 March 2005, issued under Act No. 1657/2001 and approving the list of hazardous types of work, provides that domestic work by children and work under the “criadazgo” system are considered to be hazardous types of work. The Committee also notes that, according to ILO/IPEC information relating to the implementation of the project on the prevention and elimination of domestic work by children and the commercial sexual exploitation of children, a system for the school enrolment of children has been developed and approved by the National Commission on the Elimination of Child Labour and the Ministry of Labour. Under this system, children at risk of being engaged in domestic service and children who worked as domestics have been enrolled in school.

The Committee takes due note of the measures adopted by the Government to protect children working as domestics against the worst forms of child labour. However, observing that children engaged in domestic work are often the victims of exploitation, which takes on widely varying forms, it requests the Government to redouble its efforts to protect these children from the worst forms of child labour. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the measures adopted in the context of the implementation of the project on the prevention and elimination of domestic work by children and the commercial sexual exploitation of children with a view to: (a) preventing children from being engaged as domestics; and (b) providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance to remove child domestic workers who are victims of the worst forms of child labour and to ensure their rehabilitation and social integration.

Clause (e). Special situation of girls. The Committee notes that, according to the ITUC’s comments, activities relating to commercial sexual exploitation are linked to international trafficking networks and particularly affect girls. It requests the Government to provide information on the manner in which it intends to pay particular attention to such girls and thereby prevent them from being engaged in commercial sexual exploitation and remove them from this worst form of child labour.

Article 8. Enhanced international cooperation. The Committee notes that Paraguay is a member of Interpol, an organization which contributes to the cooperation between countries of different regions, particularly to combat the trafficking of children. The Committee is of the view that international cooperation between law enforcement agencies, particularly the judicial authorities and the agencies responsible for the implementation of the law, is indispensable to prevent and combat commercial sexual exploitation, including the sale and trafficking of children for that purpose, through the collection and exchange of information, and through assistance to detect and prosecute the individuals involved and to repatriate victims. The Committee therefore hopes that the Government will take the necessary measures to cooperate with countries sharing borders with Paraguay, thereby reinforcing security measures with a view to bringing an end to this worst form of child labour. It requests the Government to provide information on this subject.

Parts IV and V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that, according to ILO/IPEC information relating to the project for the prevention and elimination of child domestic labour and the commercial sexual exploitation of children, studies have been carried out on the extent and characteristics of these two forms of child labour. The Committee requests the Government to provide copies of these studies. Furthermore, it requests it to provide statistics and information on the nature, extent and trends of the worst forms of child labour, the number of children covered by the measures giving effect to the Convention, the number and nature of the infringements reported, and the penal sanctions applied. To the extent possible, all information provided should be disaggregated by sex.

The Committee is also raising other points in a request addressed directly to the Government.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1953)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

Article 2 of the Convention. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the regulation issued by Directive No. 23 of 30 May 1977, which prohibited night work for young persons under 16 years between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. was not in conformity with the provisions of the Convention, under the terms of which the prohibition should cover a period of at least 12 consecutive hours, including the interval between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. It had noted the Government's information that a comprehensive child labour bill (Senate Bill No. 1530) was in the process of being enacted providing that no child below 15 years of age shall be allowed to work between 6 p.m. and 6 a.m. the following day.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the comprehensive child labour bill was enacted into law on 19 December 2003 by Republic Act No. 9231. This Act is known as "an Act providing for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour and affording stronger protection for the working child". Subsection (3) of section 12A of Act No. 9231 prescribes that no child under 15 years of age shall be allowed to work between 8 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day. Moreover, no child between 15 and 18 years shall be allowed to work between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day.

The Committee observes that subsection (3) of section 12A of Act No. 9231 is not in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention. In this regard, the Committee reminds the Government that Article 2 of the Convention lays down that night signifies a period of 12 consecutive hours (paragraph 1). For young persons under 16 years of age this period shall include the interval between 10 p.m. and 6 a.m. of the following day (paragraph 2), and for young persons between the ages of 16 and 18 years, the interval of at least seven consecutive hours falling between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. (paragraph 3). The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to amend subsection (3) of section 12A of Act No. 9231 in order to ensure conformity with Article 2 of the Convention.

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) dated 30 August 2006. It finally takes note of the detailed discussion which took place at the Conference Committee on the Application of Standards of the 95th Session of the International Labour Conference in June 2006. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). 1. Sale and trafficking of children. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the sale and trafficking of children under 18 years for labour and sexual exploitation is prohibited by the Philippine legislation under various provisions (sections 7 and 18 of Act No. 7610; section 4 of the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act No. 9208 of 2003; section 59 of the Child and Youth Welfare Act). It had noted the ITUC's allegation that many children are easy targets for trafficking because of the common belief among parents that child domestic labour is the safest work for children. These children then find themselves in a situation of bonded labour where they are forced to endure exploitative work conditions because of the debts they have incurred. The ITUC added that a large number of victims of trafficking were promised work as domestic workers only to be led into prostitution. The Committee had noted that the Visayan Forum Foundation (VFF) initiated the organization of a multi-sectoral network against trafficking in October 2003. It had also noted that the Government took some measures to prevent trafficking of children, such as the adoption of Administrative Order No. 114 aimed at screening the purpose of the travel of a child abroad and ensuring that his/her best interest is protected before the issuance of a certificate to travel.

The Committee notes the Government's information during the Conference Committee discussion that, in the framework of the ILO/IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP) signed in 2002, 1,200 children were rescued from trafficking.

It also notes the ITUC's allegation that the Department of Labor and Employment (DOLE) regulations regarding recruitment and placement of domestic labourers are not yet attuned to the new trafficking law of 2003.

The Committee notes with interest that the Philippines adopted a number of measures aimed at preventing and combating the trafficking of children. Particularly, it notes the Government's information that the DOLE prepared the proposed amendments to the Rules Governing Private Recruitment and Placement Agencies to Local Employment. These amendments will introduce in the abovementioned Rules the provisions against child trafficking contained in Act No. 9231 (Act providing for the elimination of the worst forms of child labour) and in the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2003. Moreover, some local government units have passed local ordinances to address the child trafficking issue in their respective communities such as Ordinance No. 52 (Paombong, Bulacan) and Ordinance No. 566 (Marilao, Bulacan), which implement and enforce the provisions of the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2003. Furthermore, the Committee notes that the Government has also taken specific measures aimed at preventing and combating trafficking for the purpose of exploitation in domestic work such as Ordinance No. SP-1472, series of 2004 (Quezon City) entitled "An ordinance enjoining all barangay officials of Quezon City to conduct massive registration of Kasambahay and/or domestic workers in their respective barangays". In addition, according to the information available at the Office, in 2006, the Philippine Overseas Employment Agency (POEA) issued new employment requirements for overseas Filipino household workers to protect them from trafficking and widespread employer abuse. Such requirements raised the minimum age for domestic work from 18 to 23 years and provided that prospective domestic workers must obtain a certificate of competency attesting to their skills. Employers are required to submit employment contracts for verification. Moreover, in order to protect overseas Filipino domestic workers from illegal recruitment, foreign employers are required to undergo pre-qualification screening by the Philippine Overseas Labor Office and submit a written statement committing themselves to the fair and humane treatment of their domestic workers. The Committee welcomes the comprehensive measures taken by the Government to prevent and combat the trafficking of children under 18 years. It requests the Government to continue to provide information on the measures taken to prevent and combat the trafficking of children under 18 years, in particular for domestic work and commercial sexual exploitation, and the results achieved.

2. Compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee had previously noted that the compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years to serve in the armed forces of the Philippines (civilian units or other armed groups), as well as to take part in fighting or to be used as guides, couriers or spies, is prohibited by law (sections 3(a) and 22(b) of Act No. 7610). The trafficking of children for such purposes is also prohibited (section 4(h) of the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2003). The Committee had nevertheless noted the ITUC's indication that numerous children under 18 continued to take part in armed conflicts. Particularly, based on a report from the DOLE of the Philippines, the ITUC stated that the New People's Army (NPA) included 9,000 to 10,000 regular child soldiers (representing between 3 and 14 per cent of NPA members). Children were also reportedly being recruited into the Citizens Armed Force Geographical Units (a government-aligned paramilitary group) and in the armed opposition groups, in particular the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF). The ITUC had also pointed out that about 60 per cent of child soldiers were compelled to enter into the armed groups. Moreover, the Committee had observed that, according to the United Nations Secretary-General's Report on children and armed conflict (A/59/695-S/2005/72, 9 February 2005, paragraphs 45 and 46), even though the Inter-Agency Committee for Children Involved in Armed Conflict was mandated to initiate projects for the rescue, rehabilitation and reintegration of children involved in armed conflict, as of September 2004, no measures for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of child soldiers had been taken by the NPA or the MILF.

The Committee notes the Government's information that both government forces and non-state entities maintain a policy of not recruiting children for direct hostilities. There has been no evidence of systematic or forcible recruitment of children by the NPA and the MILF. Children volunteer their support mainly because of the influence of family, peers and community members. It also notes the Government's information that, based on reports from combined sources, including the Department of National Defence, there were 186 children involved in armed conflicts for the period 2001–06. Of this number, 174 children have been demobilized and reunited with their families and brought back to school. Moreover, the DOLE implemented the Community Sala'am (Peace) Corps Project, wherein 300 children between 9 and 21 years of age affected by armed conflict were given education, skills training, employment and livelihood assistance for the period 2005–06. While welcoming the measures adopted by the Government to demobilize and rehabilitate children affected by armed conflict, the Committee requests the Government to take prompt and effective action to ensure that the practice of forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age in armed conflict, directly or indirectly, is eliminated both in the national armed forces and in rebel groups. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to rehabilitate and integrate children affected by the armed conflict, and to indicate how many of these children under 18 years have been rehabilitated and reintegrated in their communities through such measures.

Article 3, clause (d), and Article 4, paragraph 1. Hazardous work and child domestic work. The Committee had previously noted that children under 18 years of age shall not perform the types of hazardous work listed in Department Order No. 4 of 1999 (section 3). It had also noted that, by virtue of section 4 of the same Order, persons aged 15–18 years may be allowed to engage in domestic or household service, but shall not perform the types of hazardous work listed in section 3 of the Order. The Committee had noted the ITUC's allegation that hundreds of thousands of children, mainly girls, worked as domestic workers in the Philippines and were subject to slavery-like practices. Particularly, these children were deprived of opportunities for education and isolated from their families. The ITUC further underlined that, based on a study undertaken under the TBP, 83 per cent of child domestic workers lived in their employers' home and only half of them were allowed to take one day off per month. They were on call 24 hours a day, and more than half of them dropped out of school. The Committee had noted the Government's indication that several draft bills aimed at protecting the rights and welfare of domestic workers were under examination by Congress.

The Committee also notes the ITUC's more recent allegations dated 30 August 2006 based on the "Trafficked into forced labor: Selected cases of domestic workers in the Philippines" study, published in 2006 by the VFF with support from ILO/IPEC. Particularly, the ITUC refers to some examples of physical abuses and injuries suffered by children under 18 years, especially girls employed as domestic workers. It also refers to some examples of children working in hazardous conditions. The ITUC points out that, notwithstanding the positive initiatives taken by the Government at the level of local legislation regulating the employment of domestic workers, there are limitations in both law and practice which need to be addressed as a matter of urgency. Particularly, while the Labor Code requires employers to treat their domestic workers fairly and humanely, it lacks specific measures to tackle existing exploitative practices. In this regard, the ITUC underlines that the Domestic Workers' Bill (Batas Kasambahay), first filed in Congress in 1995, which sets out the rights of domestic workers and defines for them decent working standards, has remained pending for over ten years. According to the ITUC, the enactment of this Bill would bring the treatment of domestic workers closer to the standards applied to workers in the formal sector. Moreover, domestic workers would be given the right to humane treatment, basic food and shelter, security of employment, minimum wage and prescribed hours of work. Finally, the Bill would ensure the use of written contracts formalizing the terms and conditions of work.

The Committee notes the Government's information during the Conference Committee discussion that, in the framework of the TBP, 1,500 children were rescued from domestic labour. It also notes the Government's information that bills filed during the 13th Congress aimed at protecting the rights and welfare of domestic workers were not passed into law. With the 14th Congress, it is expected that these bills will be filed for enactment into law. It also observes that, according to the ILO/IPEC Progress Report 2007, on the TBP in the Philippines, 3,224 children were prevented from exploitative child domestic labour (of which 2,423 through the provision of education or training and 801 through other rehabilitative services); and 4,658 children were withdrawn from exploitative child domestic labour (of which 2,091 through the provision of education or training and 2,567 through other rehabilitative services). While observing the successful results achieved under the TBP, the Committee expresses its serious concern at the economic and sexual exploitation which continues to be experienced by child domestic workers. It requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that child domestic workers under 18 years of age do not perform work which, by its nature or the circumstances in which it is carried out, is likely to harm their health, safety or morals in line with national legislation and the Convention. The Committee expresses the firm hope that the Domestic Workers' Bill (Batas Kasambahay), which would specifically address the situation of domestic workers, will be enacted soon. It requests the Government to provide information on any developments made in this regard.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. The Committee notes with interest that the Government has adopted a number of measures to monitor the application of the Convention and enforce it. Particularly, it notes the Government's information that the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) adopted the National Strategic Plan against Trafficking in Persons 2004–10, which covers the key components of prevention, protection, recovery and reintegration of victims of trafficking. It also notes the Government's information that the Trade Union Congress of the Philippines set up an anti-trafficking project aimed at monitoring and reporting on cases of trafficking. The Committee finally notes the Government's information that the Philippine Center on Transnational Crime (PCTC) is in charge of formulating and implementing a concerted programme of action for all law enforcement agencies, intelligence agencies and other relevant bodies for the prevention and control of trafficking in women and children. Through improved coordination, the PCTC is likewise directed to undertake research and maintain a database on trafficking. Moreover, the Department of Justice (DOJ), with support from UNICEF, has trained a pool of 30 state prosecutors to handle cases involving women and children, with a focus on gender-sensitive and child-friendly investigation procedures and the effective handling and gathering of evidence against perpetrators. The Philippine National Police (PNP) has trained 230 police investigators on the investigation of child trafficking, pornography and prostitution. The Committee welcomes these measures and requests the Government to continue providing information on the impact of these measures on eliminating the trafficking of children.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. 1. Trafficking. The Committee notes the ITUC's allegation that while the Philippine Government has passed the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, implementation is still a challenge. Thus, while the new law has increased penalties for child trafficking, there have been only three convictions to date, all of which relate to prostitution.

The Committee notes the Government's information during the Conference Committee discussion of June 2006 that seven criminal cases were being pursued for trafficking. It also notes that, according to information available at the Office, the Philippine Government showed some improvements in arresting, prosecuting and convicting traffickers. In 2006, law enforcement agencies filed 60 new trafficking cases with the DOJ. In addition, Philippine law permits private prosecutors to prosecute cases under the direction and control of a public prosecutor. The Government has used this provision effectively, allowing and supporting an NGO to file 23 cases. According to the same source, the Government is currently (in 2007) engaged in 107 prosecutions of trafficking crimes, with more being investigated. Moreover, the Government has 17 dedicated anti-trafficking prosecutors in the DOJ and 72 additional prosecutors in regional DOJ offices. Finally, the Philippine Coast Guard, under the Department of Transportation and Communication, searched several ferries in order to identify trafficking victims and recruiters.

2. Compulsory recruitment in armed conflict. The Committee had previously noted that, by virtue of sections 4(h) and 10(a) of the Anti-trafficking in Persons Act of 2003, a person who recruits, transports or adopts a child to engage in armed activities in the Philippines or abroad is liable to 20 years' imprisonment and a minimum fine of 2 million pesos. It had also noted that, by virtue of sections 3(a) and 22(b) of Act No. 7610, children under 18 shall not be recruited to become members of the armed forces of the Philippines or its civilian units or other armed groups, nor be allowed to take part in the fighting or used as guides, couriers or spies. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years for use in armed conflict are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. Child victims of trafficking and domestic work. The Committee had previously noted that the VFF provides child victims of trafficking with temporary shelter and psychological services. The VFF for the period 2000–04 assisted a total of 3,000 victims of trafficking for prostitution, domestic work or other types of hazardous work.

The Committee notes the ITUC's allegation that the Government's efforts to provide non-formal education and other alternative learning systems for reintegrating child domestic workers in the education system have been largely unsuccessful due to the lack of centres and teachers.

The Committee notes with interest the Government's information that, for the period July 2005–June 2006, the VFF assisted a total of 4,465 child victims of trafficking and child domestic workers. Educational assistance in the form of schools fees, transportation, school supplies and tutorial services were provided. Some of the children housed in the VFF halfway houses were provided with information technology training and other life skills training. The Committee also notes the Government's information that the Manila International Airport Authority (MIAA) and VFF signed on July 2006 a Memorandum of Agreement to build a halfway house for trafficked women and children at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA). Moreover, MIAA will construct a halfway house/shelter at the NAIA complex aimed at providing temporary shelter to victims of trafficking trapped at the NAIA. The VFF is being tasked to supervise and manage the various programmes and services for the trafficked victims.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning certain other points.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 6) (ratification: 1932)

The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government in its report. It also notes the observations made by the General Confederation of Portuguese Workers (CGTP), the General Union of Workers (UGT) and the Confederation of Trade and Services of Portugal (CCSP).

Articles 2 and 3 of the Convention. Employment of children in industrial undertakings. With reference to its previous comments, in which it pointed out that certain provisions concerning the night work of young persons contained in Legislative Decree No. 409 of 1971 were not in conformity with the Convention, the Committee notes that this Legislative Decree has been repealed by Act No. 99/2003 approving the Labour Code [hereinafter Labour Code], which now regulates the night work of young persons.

The Committee notes that section 65(1) of the Labour Code states that it is prohibited to employ a young person under 16 years of age between 8 p.m. and 7 a.m. It also notes that section 65(2) of the Code states that a young person aged 16 and over cannot work between 10 p.m. and 7 a.m. Moreover, under section 65(3) of the Code, a collective agreement may provide that a young person aged 16 or over may work at night in specific sectors of activity, except during the period between midnight and 5 a.m. Finally, section 65(4) of the Labour Code states that a young person aged 16 or over may work at night, including during the period between midnight and 5 a.m., in cultural, artistic, sporting or advertising activities, where there are objective grounds for doing so and on condition that he/she is granted a compensatory period of rest equal to the number of hours worked.

In its comments, the CGTP states that the national legislation is still not in conformity with the Convention. It authorizes the night work of young persons aged 16 and over in particular sectors of activity without specifying the sectors themselves. The use of this possibility might become a widespread habit in practice. The UGT, for its part, indicates in its comments that it is essential not to obscure the fact that very often the conditions in which night work is undertaken may jeopardize the physical and psychological development of young persons or their school attendance. Hence, night work must be strictly controlled in order to put children's interests before economic interests. In addition, the UGT indicates that, in view of the fact that the Convention was adopted in 1919 and ratified by the Government in 1932, some of its provisions are somewhat obsolete. In addition, the CCSP thinks that the provisions of the Labour Code are in conformity with the Convention.

The Government acknowledges in its report that section 65(2) and (3) of the Labour Code of 2003 are not in conformity with the Convention. However, it indicates again that, although some provisions of the Convention were justified at the time it was adopted, they no longer reflect the current reality of the world of work. Changes in the organization of work now afford greater protection of safety and health, in particular for young workers. The Government also states that the provisions of the Labour Code on the night work of young persons comply with Council Directive 94/33/EC of 22 June 1994 on the protection of young people at work. In addition, the Government recalls the decision taken by the Governing Body to revise Conventions Nos 6, 79 and 90 and hopes that this revision will take place.

While noting the information supplied by the Government, the Committee observes that the requirements of Directive 94/33/EC cannot release the State from its obligations under the Convention since the latter has not yet been revised. The Committee reminds the Government that, under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention, young persons under 18 years of age shall not be employed during the night in any industrial undertaking, other than an undertaking in which only members of the same family are employed and in the cases listed in Article 2, paragraph 2. It also reminds the Government that Article 3, paragraph 1 states that the term “night” signifies a period of at least 11 consecutive hours, including the interval between 10 p.m. and 5 a.m. The Committee reminds the Government that it should take the necessary measures to bring the national legislation into conformity with the Convention on this point.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes the information supplied by the Government to the effect that, between June 2000 and May 2007, 20 serious contraventions of the legislation on the night work of young persons were reported and proceedings have been initiated. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the application of the Convention in practice, particularly by supplying statistics on the number and nature of contraventions reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penalties imposed.

The Committee notes the Government’s report. It requests the Government to supply information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. Scope of application. The Committee had previously noted that, under the terms of section 2, the Labour Code applies only to persons employed on the basis of a labour contract. It had also noted the Government’s indication that the Labour Inspectorate monitors the work of persons employed by an individual labour contract and has no competence with regard to self-employment. The Committee notes the Government’s response that no measures had been taken in this regard. The Committee once again reminds the Government that the Convention applies not only to work performed under an employment contract, but to all types of work or employment, including self-employment. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that children carrying out an economic activity on their own account enjoy the protection afforded by the Convention.

Article 3, paragraphs 1 and 2. Hazardous work. The Committee had previously noted that section 13(4) of the Labour Code, which prohibits arduous or hazardous work for persons under the age of 18, does not prohibit admission to employment or work that is likely to jeopardize the morals of young persons. Noting the Government’s indication that the list of hazardous types of work was in the process of modification, the Committee had expressed its hope that the new list would contain the types of work that are likely to jeopardize the morals of young persons, as required by Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Convention. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government’s indication that it has adopted Order No. 753/2006 which now provides protection to young persons under 18 years from work likely to harm their safety, physical, mental or moral health, or social development. It also notes that, according to section 8(2) of the above Order, young persons shall be prohibited from work which is beyond their physical or psychological capacity; work involving harmful exposure to toxic, carcinogenic and harmful agents; work involving exposure to radiation; work involving risk of accidents; work exposed to extreme cold or heat, noise or vibration; and finally provides a list of work and processes which are likely to entail specific risks for young people.

Article 6. Apprenticeship. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest the Government’s information that a new Law No. 279/2005 concerning apprenticeship at the workplace has been adopted by the Government. It notes that, according to section 5(1) of the Law No. 279/2005, any person of at least 16 years of age could be employed as an apprentice at the workplace in the occupation for which an apprenticeship is organized. Subsection (2) of section 5 further provides that an apprenticeship contract may be concluded by a person over 15 years, upon written approval of his/her parents or legal representatives, for activities that suit his/her physical development, skills and knowledge, unless it is likely to harm his/her health, development and occupational training.

Article 7, paragraph 3. Determination of light work. The Committee had previously noted the Government’s information that the national legislation does not determine light work activities and had requested the Government to take the necessary measures in this regard. The Committee notes the Government’s information that the National Steering Committee for Preventing and Combating Child Labour has drawn up a draft Decision on Hazardous Works by Children based on the information gathered by a working group initiated by the Labour Inspectorate and the National Authority for the Protection of Child’s Rights, representatives of ministries, trade union confederations and employers’ organizations as well as some NGOs in the field. The Government states that any activity or work which is not included in this draft Decision shall be considered as light work which young persons between 15 and 18 years of age are allowed to perform. The Committee requests the Government to supply a copy of the Decision on Hazardous Works by Children, as soon as it is adopted.

Article 9, paragraph 3. Registers of employment. The Committee notes the Government's information that Decision No. 161/2006 establishes the methodology of drawing up and keeping a general register of employees. It also notes that according to section 3, subsections (1) to (4), the register must be drawn up in electronic format and must contain the following data of the employee: full name, personal identification number which includes the age of the employee, hiring date, occupation details, type of contract, etc. The employer shall send this register to the territorial labour inspectorate within 20 days after hiring the worker. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of Government Decision No. 161/2006.

Part V of the report form. Application of the Convention in practice. The Committee notes that the Government has supplied statistics on the employment of children and young persons, and inspections and cases reported. It notes that in 2005, the labour inspectors carried out 33,852 inspections and identified 96 young people aged between 15 and 18 years working without a legal employment contract, and ten children under 15 years were found working. In 2006, the labour inspectors conducted 106,421 inspections, identified 244 young persons between the ages of 15 and 18 working illegally, and imposed penalties on 229 employers for illegally using young people at work. It also notes that during 2007, the territorial labour inspectorates submitted 119 complaints regarding the violation of the Labour Code; for 103 cases the trials were under way; and for three cases administrative fines of 500 to 800 leu (ron) were imposed. The Committee asks the Government to continue providing information on the application of the Convention in practice, including the number and nature of contraventions reported and penalties imposed.

The Committee takes note of the Government's report. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention. 1. Scope of application. The Committee had previously noted that section 63(1) of the Labour Code prohibits children under 16 years of age from concluding a labour contract. It had asked the Government to supply information on the measures taken or envisaged to ensure the application of the Convention to all types of work outside an employment relationship. The Committee notes the Government's statement that there are many cases of illegal employment of minors and violation of their labour rights in the informal economy. These include minors who wash cars, trade and perform auxiliary work. In this regard, the Committee once again reminds the Government that the Convention applies to all sectors of economic activity and covers all forms of employment or work, whether or not there is a contractual employment relationship and whether or not the work is remunerated. The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the protection established by the Convention is ensured for children carrying out an economic activity without a labour contract, such as self-employed children and children working in the informal economy.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. The Committee had previously noted that section 63(1) of the Labour Code states that an employment contract may be concluded only with a person of at least 16 years of age. However, it had noted that according to section 63(2) of the Labour Code, a person of 15 years of age who has completed the basic general education or left the general educational establishment, may work. Noting that the minimum age for admission to employment or work of 16 years had been specified by the Russian Federation at the time of ratification, the Committee had requested the Government to take the necessary steps to ensure that no one under the age of 16 may be admitted to employment or work in any occupation. The Committee notes with satisfaction the Government's information that the Labour Code, as amended by Federal Act No. 90-FZ of 30 June 2006, stipulates that labour contracts may be concluded by persons aged 15 only for light work not likely to jeopardize their health, as long as they have completed basic general education and are continuing to participate in a non-classroom-based programme of general education, or have left an institution of general education in accordance with the Federal Law.

Part V of the report form. Practical application of the Convention. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the comprehensive statistical information provided by the Government, from 2004 to 2006 the employment rate among young persons between 15 and 17 years of age has fallen from 4.1 to 3.3 per cent. In this regard, statistics on the number of children between 15 and 17 years who study and work, disaggregated by educational level and sex, indicate that the number of children working were 293,070 in 2004, 262,160 in 2005, and 219,952 in 2006. They were mainly found working in qualified work in agriculture, forestry and hunting. The Committee requests the Government to continue to supply information on the practical application of the national legislation giving effect to the Convention, including extracts from official reports and information on the number and nature of contraventions reported, especially with regard to children under 16 years of age working in the informal sector.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning certain other points.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation, which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Sale and trafficking of children. The Committee noted that, according to the communication of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC), thousands of persons are trafficked from the Russian Federation to other countries, including Canada, China, Germany, Israel, Italy, Japan, Spain, Thailand and the United States. Internal trafficking within the Russian Federation is also taking place; women are generally forced to work as prostitutes while men are trafficked into agricultural or construction work. There are said to be confirmed cases of children being trafficked for sexual exploitation. The Committee further noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child in its concluding observations (CRC/C/15/Add.274 of 30 September 2005, paragraph 80) while welcoming the recent introduction of norms prohibiting the trafficking of human beings in the Criminal Code, was concerned that not enough was being done to effectively implement these provisions. The Committee on the Rights of the Child also expressed its concern that protection measures for victims of trafficking of human beings were not fully in place and that reported acts of complicity between traffickers and state officials were not being fully investigated and punished.

The Committee observed that section 127.1 of the Criminal Code prohibits the sale and trafficking in human beings, defined as the purchase and sale of persons or their recruitment, transport, transfer, hiding or receipt, if committed for the purposes of exploitation. Subsection (2) of section 127.1 provides for a higher penalty when this offence is committed in relation to a known minor (defined in section 87 as a person aged 14 to 18 years). The Committee also noted that subsection (2) of section 240 of the Criminal Code prohibits transporting another person across the state border of the Russian Federation for the purposes of engaging that person into prostitution or illegal detention abroad. A higher penalty is provided when this offence is committed against a minor.

The Committee noted the Government's information that during the period 2003–05, work has been under way on a draft Law on Combating Trafficking in Human Beings which is based on the Palermo Protocol and provides for appropriate measures to ensure legal protection and social rehabilitation for victims of trafficking. The Committee also noted the Government's information that in 2002, ten cases of criminal proceedings for trafficking in minors were instituted, and 21 in 2003. In 2004, three cases of trafficking in minors were uncovered, of which two involved children aged between 1 and 3 years, and the other involved a child of 16 years.

The Committee consequently noted that, although the trafficking of children for labour or sexual exploitation is prohibited by law, it remains an issue of concern in practice. It recalled that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, the sale and trafficking of children is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and is therefore prohibited for children under 18 years of age. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures as a matter of urgency to ensure that persons who traffic in children for labour or sexual exploitation are in practice prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed. In this regard, it requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied for violations of the legal prohibitions on the sale and trafficking of children. The Committee also asks the Government to inform it on the progress in the elaboration of the draft Law on Combating Trafficking in Human Beings and to provide a copy thereof once it has been adopted.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Prevent the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. The Committee noted the Government's information that efforts are being made to improve collaboration between the media and non-governmental organizations in combating cross-border trafficking in women and children. Thus, it is becoming increasingly common for the major television networks to broadcast programmes on trafficking in women and children, shedding light on this problem and explaining the work done by internal affairs officials to identify and prosecute traffickers in accordance with the new provisions of the Criminal Code. It also noted that in 2004, the organization "Independent voluntary assistance centre for victims of sexual assault" ("Sisters") helped to conduct a series of one-day training sessions on the theme of "Making general use of Russian and international experience in combating trafficking in persons". The Committee further observed that the association of women's crisis centres "Let's stop violence!" has opened a national information line on the problem of preventing trafficking in persons. Its purpose is to provide information on Russian and international organizations that provide assistance to victims of trafficking in the Russian Federation and abroad, Russian embassies and consulates abroad, and personal security plans for persons travelling abroad. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on the impact of the above measures on preventing the sale and trafficking of children.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour and for their rehabilitation and social integration. The Committee noted the Government's detailed information on a system of social institutions which provide for the rehabilitation and social integration of children engaged in the worst forms of child labour. In particular, it notes that, compared to 2003, the number of establishments functioning within the social protection bodies of the constituent units of the Russian Federation and local self-government bodies increased by 144, reaching 3,373 by 1 January 2005 (the corresponding figures were 3,059 in 2002 and 3,229 in 2003). It also noted that social rehabilitation centres for minors, centres to provide social assistance to families and children, social shelters for children and adolescents, centres for children left without parental care, telephone hotlines for emergency psychological assistance and other measures are being actively developed. The development of social rehabilitation centres for minors was stepped up in 2004 (with the addition of 163 new centres compared to the year 2002). The Committee also noted the Government's information that in recent years, the Russian law enforcement authorities have been collaborating closely with organizations which help victims of violence. For example, the National Central Office of Interpol receives information from crisis centres on cases of unlawful detention and sexual exploitation abroad of Russian women, including under-age girls. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on effective and time-bound measures taken to assist child victims of trafficking and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. 1. International cooperation. The Committee noted that the Russian Federation is a member of Interpol, which helps cooperation between countries in the different regions especially in the fight against trafficking of children. The Committee also noted that the Russian Federation has ratified the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime and its supplementary Protocols against Smuggling of Migrants by Land, Sea and Air, as well as the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children. The Committee asks the Government to provide information on any steps taken to assist other member States or on assistance received giving effect to provisions of the Convention through enhanced international cooperation and assistance, in particular, on the issue of combating the trafficking of children.

2. Regional cooperation. The Committee noted the Government's information that since 1998, joint operations have been under way with the countries of the Council of Baltic Sea States with a view to preventing cross-border smuggling of children. Under the auspices of that body's executive committee, so-called "contact officers", including some from the Russian Ministry of Internal Affairs, are dealing with specific cases requiring action to prevent trafficking in children for the purpose of sexual exploitation. Following a decision by the Interpol Operative Committee for the Baltic Sea States, available data on the cross-border smuggling of children for the purpose of prostitution is being analysed and the principal trafficking routes are being mapped. The Committee asks the Government to continue to provide information on regional cooperation with the countries of the Council of Baltic Sea States with a view to preventing cross-border trafficking of children.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1948 (No. 90) (ratification: 1978)

The Committee notes the Government's report.

In its previous comments, the Committee had noted the Government's indication that the Labour Code was amended so as to be in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention, which provides for a period of at least 12 consecutive hours during which children and young persons are prohibited from working. The Committee had requested the Government to send a copy of the legislative text that amended the Labour Code.

The Committee notes with interest that section 163 of the new Labour Code, supplied by the Government, specifies the prohibition of the employment of young persons at night for at least 12 consecutive hours, except in cases decided by ministerial order. However, it notes that the cases in which exceptions to the prohibition of night work can be decided by ministerial order do not seem to be specified by the Labour Code.

The Committee reminds the Government that exemptions from the prohibition of night work may only be allowed for young persons between 16 and 18 years of age under the conditions prescribed by Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention. The Committee requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that the exemptions from the prohibition of night work of young persons decided by ministerial order pursuant to section 163 can only be authorized for young persons between 16 and 18 years of age under the conditions set out in Article 2, paragraph 3, of the Convention.

Night Work of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1919 (No. 6) (ratification: 1960)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 2 of the Convention. In the comments that it has been making for more than 30 years, the Committee noted that sections 3 and 7 of Local Order No. 3724/IT of 22 June 1954 on child labour, which allow exceptions to the prohibition of night work by young persons under 18 years of age, are not in conformity with Article 2 of the Convention. In its report in 2000, the Government acknowledged the non-conformity of these sections and undertook to bring its regulations into accord with international instruments. The Committee noted the information provided by the Government in its report to the effect that, following seminars, draft texts to implement the new Labour Code have been prepared, including a draft Order establishing specific conditions for work by young persons, which was attached to the report.

The Committee noted that under the terms of section 3(2) of the draft Order, young persons cannot be employed in any night work as defined by section L.140 of the Labour Code, namely between 10 o'clock in the evening and 5 o'clock in the morning. Under section 1 of the draft Order, the term child means any person under 18 years of age. The Committee noted that, as it is worded, section 3 of the draft Order gives effect to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention.

However, it noted with regret that section 7 of the draft Order takes up in their entirety the provisions of section 7 of Local Order No. 3724/IT of 22 June 1954, which permits exceptions from the prohibition of night work by young persons which are broader than those authorized by Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention. In its report, the Government stated that it has to submit the draft Order to the National Advisory Council of Labour and Social Security for its opinion before the definitive texts receive the signature of the competent authorities. The Committee trusted that the Government would take the necessary measures to bring section 7 of the draft Order into conformity with Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Convention by providing that the derogation from the prohibition of night work for young persons of 16 years and over concerns only the industrial workplaces in which processes are carried on continuously as enumerated in this provision, namely: manufacture of iron and steel; processes in which reverberatory or regenerative furnaces are used, and galvanizing of sheet metal or wire (except the pickling process); glass work; manufacture of paper; manufacture of raw sugar; and gold mining reduction work.

The Committee once again requests the Government to keep it informed of any developments relating to the entry into force of the draft Order establishing specific conditions of work by young persons.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1999)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It also notes the observations made by the National Confederation of Employers of Senegal (CNES) and the National Confederation of Workers of Senegal (CNTS) concerning certain allegations of failure to apply the Convention, and the Government's comments in reply to the issues raised by the CNES and the CNTS.

Article 1 of the Convention and Part V of the report form. National policy and application of the Convention in practice. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, according to the report on the ILO/IPEC National Programme for the Elimination of the Exploitation of Children at Work in Senegal (1998–2001), children who are usually engaged in production mainly work as family helpers (78 per cent), employed persons (9 per cent), apprentices (6 per cent) and own-account workers (5 per cent). The ILO/IPEC report also indicated that many girls are engaged as domestic workers, of whom a certain number were aged between 6 and 14 years. The Committee requested the Government to continue providing information on the manner in which the Convention was applied in practice.

The Committee notes with interest that the Government is participating in the ILO/IPEC project entitled "Contribution to the abolition of child labour in French-speaking Africa", in which Benin, Burkina Faso, Madagascar, Mali, Morocco, Niger and Togo are also participating. The general objective of this project is to contribute to the abolition of child labour by strengthening the capacities of national partners, raising awareness and social mobilization and direct action to prevent and combat child labour. The Committee also notes with interest that the Government is participating in the ILO/IPEC Time-bound Programme (TBP) on the worst forms of child labour. It observes that, in the context of the two above projects, the Government has adopted a strategy for the implementation of national initiatives to combat child labour through education, vocational training and apprenticeship. The Committee further notes that in 2004 several regional committees to combat child labour were established in the various regions of the country. Moreover, according to the activity reports for the ILO/IPEC project "Contribution to the abolition of child labour in French-speaking Africa" of 2006, a national survey of child labour was carried out in Senegal and the data collected are currently being analysed. The Committee greatly appreciates the measures taken by the Government to abolish child labour, and it considers these measures as an affirmation of a political will to develop strategies to combat this problem. It therefore strongly encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to combat child labour and requests it to provide information on the implementation of the projects referred to above, and on the results achieved in terms of the progressive abolition of child labour and access to education. The Committee also requests the Government to provide information on the national survey of child labour when the data has been analysed.

Article 2, paragraph 1. 1. Scope of application. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that, under the terms of sections L.2 and L.145 of the Labour Code and section 2 of the Order of 6 June 2003 respecting child labour, work carried out by children on their own account is not covered by the protection provided for in the Labour Code and the Orders respecting child labour. It requested the Government to provide information on the manner in which the protection envisaged by the Convention was guaranteed for children exercising an economic activity on their own account. In its report, the Government indicates that children who work on their own account are governed by the provisions of the Code of Civil and Commercial Obligations, as well as those of the OHADA Uniform Act relating to General Commercial Law. Under the terms of the latter, a self-employed worker is assimilated to a trader and no child may be a self-employed worker due to her/his status as a minor who does not have the capacity to enter freely into contracts. According to the Government, although the Senegalese legislation excludes any form of self-employment for children, in practice poverty has facilitated the development of such activities among children (shoe-cleaners, hawkers), who carry them on totally illegally. In this respect, every effort is made to remove children from these activities and give them a healthy occupation. According to the Government, the choice of this strategy, rather than the implementation of measures to protect children who work outside an employment relationship, is more effective in combating child labour. Noting the indications provided by the Government, the Committee requests it to provide information on the measures adopted to remove from work children who are not bound by an employment relationship, such as those working on their own account.

2. Minimum age for admission to employment or work. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section L.145 of the Labour Code provides for the possibility of derogating from the minimum age for admission to employment by order of the minister responsible for labour, taking into account local circumstances and the tasks to be performed. The Committee reminded the Government that it had specified a minimum age of 15 years when ratifying the Convention and that the derogation from the minimum age for admission to employment under section L.145 of the Labour Code was not in conformity with this provision of the Convention. It requested the Government to provide information on the measures adopted or envisaged to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

The Committee notes that the CNTS indicates in its comments that a bill should be prepared rapidly to correct the provisions of section L.145 of the Labour Code in relation to the provision that is made for derogation from the minimum age for admission to employment. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government in its report that it is aware that the derogation from the minimum age for admission to employment set out in section L.145 of the Labour Code is contrary to the provisions of Convention No. 138. It was this which led it to revise the legislation with a view to making the necessary corrections. Accordingly, a legislative study was carried out in the context of the ILO/IPEC TBP, which identified the shortcomings in the Senegalese legislation in relation to the Convention. The conclusions of this study were submitted to the competent authorities so that they could take the relevant measures. However, before any decision is taken in this respect, the Government has established a programme to raise the awareness of parliamentarians and public authorities. The Committee also notes the Government's indication that no order has been adopted granting a derogation from the minimum age for admission to employment or work and determining the nature of the light work which may be undertaken in the family context. The Committee hopes that the work undertaken by the competent authorities will result in an amendment to section L.145 of the Labour Code in the near future with a view to bringing it into conformity with the Convention by only providing for derogations from the minimum age for admission to employment or work in the cases envisaged by the Convention. It requests the Government to provide information on any new developments in this respect.

Article 2, paragraph 3. Age of completion of compulsory schooling. With reference to its previous comments, the Committee notes with interest that Act No. 2004-37 of 15 December 2004 amending and supplementing the Framework Act for National Education No. 91-92 of 16 February 1991 added a section 3bis to this latter Act providing that schooling shall be compulsory and free in public educational establishments for all children of both sexes aged between the ages of 6 and 16 years.

Article 3, paragraph 3. Admission to hazardous work as from the age of 16 years. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 1 of Order No. 3748/MFPTEOP/DTSS of 6 June 2003 respecting child labour provides for a minimum age of 18 years for admission to types of hazardous work. It however noted that, under the terms of Order No. 3750/MFPTEOP/DTSS of 6 June 2003 establishing the types of hazardous work prohibited for children and young persons [hereinafter, Order No. 3750 of 6 June 2003], certain types of hazardous work could be performed by persons aged under 16 years. For example, under the terms of section 7 of Order No. 3750 of 6 June 2003, work in underground tunnels in mines, open cast mines and quarries was permitted for boys under the age of 16 years. The Committee also noted that it was permitted to employ young persons of 16 years of age on the following types of work: work using circular saws, provided that authorization in writing has been obtained from the labour inspector (section 14), operating vertical wheels, winches and pulleys (section 15), operating steam valves (section 18), work performed on mobile platforms (section 20) and performing hazardous feats in public performances in theatres, cinemas, cafes, circuses or cabarets (section 21). The Committee noted that, on the one hand, the upshot of certain of these provisions is that the minimum age for admission to hazardous types of work is under 16 years of age and, on the other, that the conditions envisaged in Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention did not appear to be complied with.

The Committee notes that the CNTS indicates in its comments that, with regard to the admission of young persons under 16 years of age to hazardous types of work, it wishes to be consulted and that it is urgent to implement a specific and appropriate training policy in the branches of activity covered by the Convention. The Committee notes the information communicated by the Government according to which it is aware of the non-conformity of certain provisions of the Order determining the types of hazardous work prohibited for children and young persons with Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention. Accordingly, in the context of the current reform of the law and regulations, all these aspects and contradictions will be corrected so as to ensure coherence between the provisions of the Convention and those of the national legislation. The Committee also notes the information provided by the Government that, with regard to the health and safety of children, 13 legal texts are currently being adopted under the Labour Code and take into account the situation of children who are authorized to work. However, according to the Government, there are no specific provisions respecting children since, once they are authorized to work in types of work deemed to be hazardous, they benefit from the same protection as that afforded to adults. Furthermore, the adequate specific instruction in the relevant branch of activity envisaged by the Convention does not currently exist. The Committee reminds the Government that, under the terms of Article 3, paragraph 3, of the Convention, the competent authority may, after consultation with the organizations of employers and workers concerned, where such exist, authorize employment or work as from the age of 16 years on condition that the health, safety and morals of the young persons concerned are fully protected and that they have received adequate specific training in the relevant branch of activity. It hopes that the current legislative reform will take into account the comments made above and requests the Government to consult the organizations of employers and workers. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on any new development in this respect.

Minimum Age (Industry) Convention (Revised), 1937 (No. 59) (ratification: 1961)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

In its previous comments, the Committee had taken note of the draft Employment Act prepared with the ILO's technical assistance. The Committee noted the information provided by the Government that section 34(4) of the draft Employment Act provides that "no child under the age of 18 years may work or be employed to perform any work that is likely to jeopardize his/her health, safety, or physical, mental, spiritual, moral or social development, or to interfere with his/her education. No employer shall continue to employ such a child after being notified in writing by a labour officer that the employment or work is injurious to health or dangerous". The Committee observed that this section 34(4) of the draft Employment Act gives effect to Article 5 of the Convention. It expresses the hope again that the new Act will be adopted in the very near future in order to ensure complete conformity of the national legislation with the Convention on this point. The Committee requests the Government to communicate the text of the new Employment Act as soon as it is adopted.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Industry) Convention, 1946 (No. 77) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee takes note of the Government's report.

Article 2 of the Convention. Thorough medical examination for fitness for employment. In the comments that it has been making for several years, the Committee has pointed out that the national legislation contains no provision establishing that minors under 18 years of age must undergo a thorough medical examination for fitness for employment before being employed. The Government indicated that Article 2 of the Convention is applied, inter alia, by the provisions of section 37(3) of Royal Decree No. 39 of 17 January 1997 on occupational health services and section 22 of Act No. 31/1995 on the prevention of occupational risks. The Committee observed that it could not be inferred from the abovementioned provisions that a thorough medical examination was a requirement for a worker to be employed, and asked the Government to take steps to bring its legislation into conformity with the Convention.

In its report, the Government states that, section 6(1) of Legislative Decree No. 1/1995 of 24 March 1995, approving the revised text of the Act on the statute of workers, provides that it is forbidden to admit minors under 16 years to employment. It also indicates that section 6(2) prohibits workers under 18 years of age from performing night work and any activity deemed insalubrious or hazardous for their health. The Government indicates in this connection that the Decree of 26 July 1957, which regulates prohibited work, provides that girls and boys under 18 years of age may not be employed in the types of hazardous work listed in the Decree. It also refers to section 27(1)(1) of Act No. 31/1995 on the prevention of occupational risks under which, before assigning minors under 18 years of age to a job, the employer must conduct an appraisal of the posts to which workers are to be assigned, and the appraisal must cover in particular special risks for their safety, health and development that may arise from a lack of experience, knowledge or maturity. The Government likewise refers to section 27(1)(2) of Act No. 31/1995 which provides that, on the basis of an assessment of the risks that the job involves for the young person assigned to it, the employer must take steps to protect the latter's safety and health, taking into account the specific risks that arise from lack of experience and from immaturity in terms of awareness of the risks or the fact that the young person is still developing. According to the Government, since under Spanish law it is forbidden for young persons under 16 years of age to work (section 6 of Legislative Decree No. 1/1995 of 24 March 1995), since the list of types of hazardous work prohibited for minors under 18 years of age has been drawn up (Decree of 26 July 1957) and since all workers are entitled to have their health protected (section 22 of Act No. 31/1995), no one under 18 years of age may carry out hazardous work. It follows that a specific medical examination for fitness for employment for minors under 18 years of age cannot be established for work which they are prohibited by law from carrying out.

While taking due note of the Government's information, the Committee observes that Spain's national legislation allows minors over 16 years of age to be employed under certain conditions (section 3 of the Decree of 26 July 1957 and section 2 of the Ordinance of 28 January 1958). Noting the statistics of breaches of the safety and health protection for minors of 16–18 years in the industries reported by the inspectorate for labour and social security for the years 2001–05, the Committee observes that the possibility does exist for minors to work in enterprises covered by the Convention (Article 1). It accordingly asks the Government to indicate how the appraisal of posts and their inherent risks established in section 27(1)(1) and (2) of Act No. 31/1995 makes it possible to ensure that minors of 16–18 years shall be recognized as fit for work before entering employment, taking into account the fact that such fitness for work shall in any event be recognized by a thorough medical examination. Noting that the abovementioned statistics do not specify the types of breaches committed in the various industries, the Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the practical effect given to the Convention including, for example, data on the number and nature of the offences reported and the penalties applied.

Medical Examination of Young Persons (Non-Industrial Occupations) Convention, 1946 (No. 78) (ratification: 1971)

The Committee asks the Government to refer to the comments made in its observation on the application of Convention No. 77.

Sri Lanka

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted with satisfaction that, by virtue of section 358A of the Penal Code, as amended by the Penal Code (Amendment) Act No. 16 of 2006, the recruitment of children under 18 years for use in armed conflict is punishable as an offence. However, it had noted with concern that, according to the information from the United Nations Office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict of 27 June 2006 (OSRG/PR060623), the LTTE militant group continued to recruit and use child soldiers. Moreover, the Karuna faction, a breakaway group of the LTTE, continued to abduct and recruit children under 18 years.

The Committee notes the Government's information that, by virtue of section 20A of the Employment of Women, Young Persons, and Children (EWYPC) Act, as amended by the EWYPC (Amendment) Act of 2006, the Minister of Labour is empowered to issue regulations on the types of hazardous work prohibited to children. These will include, amongst others, "any work connected with armed conflict". The employment of children in types of hazardous work shall be guilty of an offence and be liable to a fine or to imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both, and to pay compensation to the victim of the offence. The Committee also notes that, with regard to the measures taken to stop the recruitment of children under 18 years in armed conflict, the Government refers to the UNICEF mandate to monitor child rights violations of the ceasefire agreements and to compile and verify data on child recruitment.

The Committee further notes the Report of the Secretary-General on Children and Armed Conflict in Sri Lanka of 20 December 2006 (S/2006/1006; the "Secretary-General's Report"), as well as the Conclusions of the UN Security Council Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict of 13 June 2007 (S/AC.51/2007/9), based on that report. It notes that, according to that report, despite previous commitments by the LTTE, that group continues to use and recruit children. In addition, a particularly disconcerting development in 2005 and 2006 is the increase in abductions and recruitment by the Karuna faction. In particular, UNICEF has received reports of 541 children being recruited by the LTTE, of which 68 per cent are boys and 32 per cent are girls, both of an average age of 16 years. The LTTE notified UNICEF that 362 children had been released from its ranks. According to UNICEF data, as of 31 October 2006, out of the 5,794 total cases of child recruitment since April 2001, 1,598 recruited children are believed to remain with the LTTE. However, it is probable that the UNICEF figures reflect approximately one third of the total cases of recruitment. Moreover, UNICEF has received reports of 164 children being recruited by the Karuna faction, of which 142 are believed to remain in the ranks of this faction (Secretary-General's Report, paragraphs 11–27, pages 4–10). Besides the recruitment of child soldiers, there were also allegations of other grave violations against children by all parties to the conflict. According to the Secretary-General's Report, the Sri Lanka Monitoring Mission (SLMM) indicated that a significant number of the 1,135 civilians killed during the conflict were children. The acceleration of violence since May 2006 has resulted in an increase of child casualties. Several of the children killed have been utilized by the LTTE as child soldiers. Also, the SLMM received 237 complaints on child abductions, mostly against the LTTE and the Karuna faction (Secretary-General's Report, paragraphs 30–37, pages 10–12). Moreover, weaknesses of state institutions, such as the police and the judicial system, impede the effective and timely verification and investigation of cases, the identification and punishment of the perpetrators of grave violations (Secretary-General's Report, paragraph 62, pages 17–18).

The Committee observes that, although the forced or compulsory recruitment of children in armed conflict is prohibited by law, it remains a serious issue of concern in practice. It shares the concern of the UN Security Council Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict about the continuous pattern of abduction, recruitment and use of children by the LTTE and the Karuna faction. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that the practice of forced or compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years of age in armed conflict is eliminated. It also requests the Government to pursue its efforts to ensure that children under 18 years are released from the ranks of the LTTE and the Karuna faction, in particular, in any future peace negotiations. It finally urges the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that persons who forcibly recruit children under 18 years for use in armed conflict are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice.

Clause (b). Use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution. The Committee had previously noted the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) indication that child prostitution is prevalent in Sri Lanka and that, according to PEACE (an NGO), at least 5,000 children in the age bracket of 8–15 years were exploited as sex workers, particularly in certain coastal resort areas. It had further noted that sections 360A, 360B and 288A of the Penal Code, as amended, prohibit a wide range of activities associated with prostitution, including the prohibition of the use, procuring or offering of minors under 18 years for prostitution. The Committee notes the Government's information that prosecutions on the commercial sexual exploitation of children are carried out by the Department of Police and the National Child Protection Authority (NCPA) of Sri Lanka. The police have recorded 341 cases of child trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation from January to June 2006. Out of these, 13 cases regarded child procuring and 108 cases concerned cruelties inflicted on children. In the case of child trafficking, it was revealed that 70 per cent of these cases concerned boys. The Committee also observes that the Government has taken measures to combat the commercial sexual exploitation of children, especially paedophilia, through the NCPA and Cyber Watch activities. More than 40 local and foreign paedophiles have been prosecuted. The Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts in enforcing the legislation on commercial sexual exploitation by ensuring that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice on persons who use, procure and offer children under 18 years of age for commercial sexual exploitation. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the investigations conducted with regard to cases of commercial sexual exploitation of children and penalties applied to offenders.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. Trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that Sri Lanka is one of the three countries included in the ILO/IPEC TICSAs Programme, launched in June 2000. It had noted that TICSAs was moving into Phase II (TICSAs II) with the main objective of preventing 2,000 girls and boys from being trafficked into exploitative forms of employment. The Committee notes that TICSAs II ended in March 2006. It notes with interest that, according to the report entitled “Final Evaluation – Combating Child Trafficking for Labour Exploitation – TICSAs II Project in Sri Lanka” of February 2006 (TICSAs II Final Evaluation Report), supplied by the Government, TICSAs II achieved the following objectives:

- (a) a legal framework on trafficking has been reviewed to include trafficking for exploitative labour;
- (b) the capacity of government, employers’ organizations, trade unions, NGOs and other relevant stakeholders has been strengthened, enabling them to plan, implement and monitor programmes against trafficking;
- (c) the capacities of vocational training institutions have been strengthened;
- (d) children and families in high-risk areas have been assisted in order to reduce their vulnerability to trafficking;
- (e) a number of child victims of trafficking have been rehabilitated;
- (f) the capacity of the relevant institutions to provide services to rehabilitate and reintegrate child victims of trafficking has been improved.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Effective and time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Child trafficking. The Committee had previously noted that various projects aimed at preventing trafficking were implemented under TICSAs II. It notes with interest that, according to the Government’s report and the TICSAs II Final Evaluation Report, the following projects have been implemented under TICSAs II:

- (a) “Cyber Watch” activities aimed at strengthening the anti-trafficking and anti-paedophilia strategy of the NCPA;
- (b) training of 40 surveillance staff by Scotland Yard experts on child trafficking;
- (c) awareness-raising campaigns promoted by the Ceylon Workers’ Congress aimed at preventing 2,000 vulnerable children from trafficking and strengthening the capacity of 100 social mobilizers in plantations to eliminate child trafficking; and
- (d) various activities aimed at preventing the involvement of children in the worst forms of child labour through formal and non-formal education and vocational training.

These activities included various training programmes organized by the Don Bosco Children and Youth Centres at Nochciyagama and Murunkan. In the Nochciyagama centre, education and vocational training were provided to more than 3,000 children under 18 years and in the Murunkan Training Centre, 235 children attended remedial classes. Moreover, vocational training activities were organized by the Ceylon Workers’ Congress whereby vocational training was provided to 200 children. Finally, various other training programmes in the formal sector (including masonry, carpentry, electrical wiring, sewing), and in the rural skills sector (home gardening, animal husbandry, food processing) were organized. A total of 1,679 girls and 821 boys benefited from these programmes between 2003 and 2007. There are currently 3,500 children enrolled in ongoing training.

Clause (b). Direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour. Child victims of trafficking. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the TICSAs II Final Evaluation Report, creating supportive rehabilitation and reintegration services for trafficked and abused children has been the most challenging component of TICSAs II. The following measures have been taken under TICSAs II to rehabilitate child victims of trafficking: (a) psychological assistance, counselling, and other rehabilitative measures were provided by the NCPA in two rehabilitation centres in coordination with a local NGO to child victims of trafficking (148 children have been rehabilitated); (b) establishment by the Ceylon Workers’ Congress of 35 community centres, and 62 children’s clubs to provide various rehabilitative services to vulnerable children; and (c) discussion between the Ministry of Women’s Empowerment and Social Welfare and the ILO on the development of child-friendly guidelines for the rescue, rehabilitation and reintegration of child victims of trafficking. The Committee encourages the Government to pursue its efforts in order to rehabilitate child victims of trafficking and reintegrate them in their communities. It also requests the Government to continue to provide information on the number of child victims of trafficking who have been rehabilitated under the abovementioned and other programmes.

Clause (d). Identify and reach out to children at special risk. 1. Children who have been affected by armed conflict. The Committee had previously noted that various programmes were adopted between 2004 and 2005 with the assistance of ILO/IPEC in order to address the problems of children involved in armed conflict, especially by providing them with vocational training. It notes with interest the Government’s information that among the 3,500 children enrolled in ongoing vocational training, 453 are former child soldiers. The Committee notes that, according to the information available at the Office, UNICEF, in collaboration with the UNHCR, WHO, WFP, ICRC, international and national NGOs and government partners, is continuing to take measures to address the situation of children affected by armed conflict and prevent them from being involved in the worst forms of child labour, especially by providing them with education (Catch-

Up Education), health services, and various support services. The Committee requests the Government to pursue its efforts, in collaboration with UNICEF and other international and national partners, to rehabilitate and reintegrate former child combatants. It also requests the Government to provide data on the number of former child combatants who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated in their communities.

2. Children affected by the tsunami. The Committee notes the Government's information that the NCPA launched a project entitled "Strengthening the capacity of the National Child Protection Authority to mobilize tsunami-affected communities in Sri Lanka and to prevent the trafficking of tsunami-affected orphans into exploitative employment". Under this project, started in 2006, the NCPA adopted measures to raise awareness on the worst forms of child labour among 600 families of tsunami-affected children. It also provided psychosocial care and support to approximately 1,000 children in the six drop-in centres constructed in tsunami-affected areas. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the implementation of the NCPA project to prevent tsunami-affected children and orphans from trafficking into exploitative employment, and the results achieved.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2003)

The Committee notes that the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). Slavery and practices similar to slavery. Abduction and the exaction of forced labour. In its previous comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee had noted the International Trade Union Confederation's (ITUC) allegation that the report on the situation in Darfur issued by Amnesty International in July 2004 indicates cases of abduction of women and children by the Janjaweed militia, including some cases of sexual slavery. Abductions had continued in 2003 and 2004. The ITUC also indicated that, according to the Dinka Chiefs Committee (DCC) and the Committee for the Eradication of Abduction of Women and Children (CEAWC), there were some 14,000 people who had been abducted. The Committee had also noted the Government's information that, during the period from March to May 2004, the CEAWC was able to retrieve, with the Government's funding, more than 1,000 abductees who rejoined their families, including those in the areas controlled by the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA).

The Committee noted the Government's information during the Conference Committee discussion of June 2005 according to which the CEAWC has dealt with 11,000 of the 14,000 cases of abduction and about 7,500 persons have been retrieved in 2004–05 compared with 3,500 from 1999 to 2004.

The Committee also noted the information contained in the ITUC's communication of 7 September 2005 that the signing of a comprehensive Peace Agreement in January 2005, the inauguration of a new Government on 9 July 2005 and the adoption of the interim Constitution provide an historic opportunity for the new Government of Sudan to resolve the problem of abductions, but it will not automatically lead to an end of abductions and the exaction of forced labour. With regard to the Government's statement during the Conference Committee of 2005 that "the case was closed and there were no more abductions", the ITUC alleges that it has been informed about abductions leading to forced labour and repeated rape amounting to sexual slavery and forced prostitution. The Committee also took note of the Government's reply of November 2005, according to which 108 abducted children have been retrieved by the CEAWC.

The Committee noted that article 30(1) of the Constitution of the Transitional Sudan Republic of 2005 prohibits slavery, the slave trade in all its forms and forced labour (unless sanctioned by the tribunal). It noted the Government's information that section 32 of the Act on the Child of 2004 specifically prohibits "the employment of children in forced labour, sexual or pornographic exploitation, illegal trade, or armed conflict". The Committee also noted that various provisions of the Penal Code prohibit forced labour (section 311), including abductions for that purpose (section 312).

The Committee noted the convergence of allegations and the broad consensus among the United Nations bodies, the representative organizations of workers and non-governmental organizations concerning the continuing existence and scope of the practices of abduction and the exaction of forced labour from children. The Committee observed that, while there have been positive and tangible steps to combat the forced labour of children, which include the conclusion of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement of 2005 and the results achieved by the CEAWC, there is no verifiable evidence that the forced labour of children has been abolished. Therefore, although the national legislation appears to prohibit abductions and the exaction of forced labour, this remains an issue of concern in practice. In this regard, the Committee reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 3(a) of the Convention, forced labour is considered as one of the worst forms of child labour and that, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention, member States are required to take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency. The Committee expressed its deep concern over the situation of children under 18 years who continue to be abducted and subject to forced labour. It once again urges the Government to redouble its efforts to improve the situation and to take the necessary measures to eradicate abductions and the exaction of forced labour from children under 18 years. It also requests the Government to provide information on the effective and time-bound measures taken to remove children from situations of abduction and forced labour and to provide for their rehabilitation and social integration.

2. Forced recruitment of children for use in armed conflict. The Committee noted that, according to the Government's Periodic Report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child of 6 December 2001 (CRC/C/65/Add.17, paragraph 39), the National Service Law of 1992 stipulates that any Sudanese person having attained 18 years of age and who is not older than 33 years of age may be subject to conscription. Section 10(4) of the People's Armed Forces Act of 1986 states that all those who are capable of bearing arms are regarded as a reserve force and may be called upon to serve in the armed forces whenever the need arises. Subsection (5) of section 10 further states that, without prejudice to the provisions of subsection (4), the President of the Republic may require any person who is capable of bearing arms to undergo military training and thus be prepared as a member of a reserve force in accordance with the conditions specified by any law or decree in force. Furthermore, the government-run Popular Defence Forces established as a paramilitary force by the Popular Defence Forces Act of 1989, are allowed to recruit 16-year-olds.

The Committee noted that, according to the information available at the Office, the government armed forces, including the paramilitary Popular Defence Forces (PDF), the government-backed militias, the SPLA and other armed groups, including tribal groups not allied to government or armed opposition groups, have forcibly recruited child soldiers in the north and the south of Sudan. Recruitment took place predominantly in Western and Southern Upper Nile, Eastern Equatoria and the Nuba Mountains. An estimated 17,000 children remained in the government, SPLA and militia forces in 2004. In some cases, they were made to attack their own or neighbouring communities. The Committee also noted that in April 2003, the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights expressed concern at the continued recruitment and use of children in Sudan, in violation of international law. The Committee also noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its Concluding Observations of 9 October 2002 (CRC/C/15/Add.190, 2002, paragraphs 59 and 60) expressed deep concern that children are used as soldiers by the Government and opposition forces, and recommended the State party to end all recruitment and use of children as soldiers, in accordance with applicable international standards, complete demobilization and rehabilitate those children who are currently working as soldiers, and to comply with the Commission on Human Rights resolution 2001.

The Committee noted the Government's information that section 9(24) of the Sixth Protocol of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement requires "the demobilization of all child soldiers in the span of six months as from the date on which the Comprehensive Peace Agreement is signed". Section 9(1)(10) of the Protocol considers the conscription of children a violation of the provisions of the Agreement. If such a violation occurs, the joint military committee shall decide on the appropriate disciplinary measures to be taken which include: "declaring or announcing the parties which are involved in the conflict, exposing or denouncing the culprit, or deciding on imposing a harsh penalty if the culprit is involved in serious violations, recommending that the individual culprit or parties involved be referred to a tribunal be it civil, criminal or military, as the case may be". The Committee also noted the Government's information that a Committee was set up after the Peace Agreement which is specialized in disarmament, demobilization and reintegration. It formulated a draft policy framework for the demobilization and reintegration of children linked to the armed forces groups.

The Committee noted the adoption of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement in January 2005. However, it considers that the prohibition of forcibly recruiting children should not be confined to the scope of the said Agreement. Hence, the Committee observed that, according to the legislation in force, children under 18 years may be recruited as "reserve forces" as well as members of the Popular Defence Force (from 16 years of age). The Committee therefore once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures, as a matter of urgency, to prohibit in the national legislation the compulsory recruitment of children under 18 years including as "reserves", in any military force, governmental or not, and to adopt appropriate penalties for contraventions of the prohibition. It also requests the Government to provide information on the time-bound measures taken to demobilize all child soldiers, including information on the number of children under 18 years who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated in their communities.

Article 7. Penalties. Forced labour. In its previous comments under Convention No. 29, the Committee had noted that the CEAWC was of the opinion that legal action was the best measure to eradicate abductions, while the tribes, including the DCC, had requested the CEAWC not to resort to legal action unless the amicable efforts of the tribes had failed.

The Committee noted the ITUC's allegation that the impunity that those responsible for abductions and the exaction of forced labour have enjoyed – illustrated by the absence of any prosecutions for abductions in the last 16 years – has been responsible for the continuation of this practice throughout the civil war and more recently in Darfur. The Committee noted the Government's reply of November 2005 according to which, the main reasons for which all the tribes concerned, including the DCC, have requested the CEAWC not to resort to legal action unless the amicable efforts of the tribes are not successful, are that: legal action is very long and expensive; it may threaten the life of young abductees; and it will not build the peace among the tribes concerned.

The Committee noted that the Penal Code of 2003 contains various provisions which provide for sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties of imprisonment and fines for anyone who commits the offence of forced labour. It also noted the Government's information that section 67(d) of the Child Act of 2004, states that any person who violates section 32 prohibiting forced labour, shall be punished by imprisonment for a maximum period of 15 years and by a fine decided upon by the tribunal.

The Committee noted that the Committee on the Rights of the Child, in its Concluding Observations of 9 October 2002 (CRC/C/15/Add.190, paragraph 62) recommended the State party to prosecute those persons engaged in the abduction, sale and purchase or illegal forced recruitment of children. The Committee considered that the lack of enforcement of the penal provisions prohibiting the forced labour of children under 18 years, while sometimes ensuring that victims are effectively retrieved, has the effect of ensuring impunity for perpetrators instead of punishing them. The Committee reminded the Government that, by virtue of Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention, the Government shall take the necessary measures to ensure the effective implementation and enforcement of the provisions giving effect to the Convention, including through the provision and application of penal sanctions. The Committee once again requests the Government to take the necessary measures to ensure that those engaged in the abduction and exaction of forced labour from children under 18 years are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed on them. It also requests the Government to provide information on the number of infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

The Committee is also addressing a direct request to the Government concerning other points.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2000)

The Committee notes the information provided by the Government in its report. In particular, it notes that the Government ratified the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography on 19 September 2006, and that it has taken measures to raise awareness and for the general prevention of violence and sexual abuse against children. It requests the Government to provide information on the following point.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (b). Use or procuring of a child for prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee noted that section 187 of the Penal Code penalizes any person who commits a sexual act with a child under 16 years of age. In this respect, it noted that in its report and Message of 20 September 1999, the Federal Council indicates that section 187 establishes the age of sexual consent at 16 years and that young persons between 16 and 18 years of age may engage in prostitution provided that they do so of their own free will. According to the Federal Council, in so far as persons of between 16 and 18 years of age are not used or procured for prostitution, such conduct does not fall within the scope of Convention No. 182. The Committee further noted that section 195 of the Penal Code punishes any person who induces a young person (that is a person who has not yet reached the age of 18 years) to engage in prostitution. In this respect, it noted that, in its report and Message of 20 September 1999, the Federal Council specifies that to induce to engage in prostitution means to initiate and cause a person to engage in prostitution. According to the Federal Council, the terms use and procuring for prostitution within the meaning of Convention No. 182 are covered by the terms induce into prostitution used in national law. They all have the connotation of constraint.

In view of the above, the Committee considers that section 195 of the Penal Code covers the prohibition of the procuring of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution, in accordance with the Convention. However, it notes that Swiss penal law is not fully in conformity with the Convention in relation to the use of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution because section 187 of the Penal Code only punishes those who have committed acts of a sexual nature with children under 16 years of age. The Committee emphasizes that it is necessary to make a distinction between the age of sexual consent and freedom to engage in prostitution. Indeed, the freedom of sexual activity accorded to a young person by the law does not include the freedom to engage in prostitution without being in violation of one of the objectives of the Convention, namely the prohibition of the worst forms of child labour. The Committee further observes that there are two issues that need to be considered in response to the arguments advanced by the Government. The first is whether a young person's participation in a worst form of child labour (in this case the participation in prostitution) with that person's consent constitutes conduct that falls outside the scope of the Convention. The second is the meaning of use of a child for prostitution.

With regard to the consent of a young person between the ages of 16 and 18 years, the Committee refers to the preparatory work for Convention No. 182 (ILC, 86th Session, 1998, Report VI(2), pages 52–53). In reply to comments made by certain countries concerning the problems that might arise if prostitution is legal below the age of 18 years or the age of sexual consent is less than 18 years, the Office indicated that this “provision (Article 3(b) of the Convention) would still prohibit the use, engagement or offering of a person under 18 for prostitution. A child's consent to a sexual act would not preclude it from the prohibition”. The Committee also refers to the Message of the Federal Council of 11 March 2005 in which the Federal Council itself records that “it should be noted that, in the view of the working group, the agreement of the child is not sufficient to exempt prostitution from any penalty” (see page 2656 of the Message). The Committee therefore considers that, when adopting Convention No. 182, the ILO also intended that the consent of a young person would not affect the prohibition in Article 3(b).

Moreover, with regard to the meaning of the expression use of a child for prostitution, as it is not defined by Article 3(b) of Convention No. 182, reference may be made to the relevant international instruments (ILC, 86th Session, 1998, Report VI(2), page 52). In this respect, the Committee refers to the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography, 2000. Under the terms of Article 2(b) of the Protocol, child prostitution means the use of a child in sexual activities for remuneration or any other form of consideration. Accordingly, the Committee considers that, in the context of Convention No. 182, the use of a child for prostitution applies to a person, in this case a client, who engages in a sexual act with a child under 18 years of age for remuneration or any other form of consideration.

In the light of the above, although the national legislation (section 187 of the Penal Code) recognizes that a child of over 16 years of age may lawfully consent to a sexual act, the Committee considers that the age of consent does not affect the obligations to prohibit this worst form of child labour. It also considers that the act of engaging in a sexual activity with a child under 18 years for reward constitutes “use” of a child for prostitution whether or not the child consents. Accordingly, section 195 of the Penal Code does not fully give effect to the prohibition contemplated in Article 3(b) of the Convention. Consequently, since under Article 3(b) of the Convention the use of a child under 18 years of age for prostitution is considered to be one of the worst forms of child labour and, under the terms of Article 1 this worst form of child labour shall be prohibited as a matter of urgency, the Committee urges the Government to take the necessary measures to also prohibit and criminalize the use of a child aged between 16 and 18 years for prostitution, thereby specifying that the sexual freedom granted to children as from 16 years of age by the penal legislation does not include the freedom to prostitute themselves.

The Committee is also addressing a request directly to the Government concerning other points.

Minimum Age Convention, 1973 (No. 138) (ratification: 1993)

The Committee notes with regret that, for the sixth consecutive year, the Government's report has not been received. It must therefore repeat its previous observation which read as follows:

The Committee recalled that the minimum age of 16 years for admission to employment or work was specified under Article 2, paragraph 1, of the Convention as regards Tajikistan. It noted, however, that section 174 of the new Labour Code (Act of 15 May 1997) only prohibits the employment of persons under the age of 15 in contrast to the previous Code which fixed the minimum age of 16 years. The Committee recalled that the lowering of the existing minimum age is contrary to the principle of the Convention, which is to raise the minimum age as provided by Articles 1 and 2(2). It also recalled that Article 7 of the Convention allows, as an exception, the employment or work of persons 13 to 15 years of age on only light work which is not likely to be harmful to their health or development and not such as to prejudice their attendance at school. Other than such light work, work done by children under 16 years of age, must be prohibited. Therefore, the Committee again asks the Government to indicate the measures taken or envisaged, pursuant to its declaration under Article 2 of the Convention, to ensure that access to employment of children of 15 years of age may be allowed, exceptionally, only for work meeting the criteria set out in Article 7 of the Convention.

The Committee hopes that the Government will make every effort to take the necessary action in the very near future.

Thailand

Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, 1999 (No. 182) (ratification: 2001)

The Committee notes the Government's report. It requests the Government to supply further information on the following points.

Article 3 of the Convention. Worst forms of child labour. Clause (a). All forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery. Sale and trafficking of children. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes with satisfaction that the draft Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act has been adopted by the National Legislative Assembly in November 2007. This Act defines "human trafficking" as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of threat or the use of force or other forms of coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, of the abuse of power, or of a position of vulnerability, or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation. The consent of a child or woman victim of trafficking to the intended exploitation should be irrelevant where any of the abovementioned means have been used. Key elements of the Act include, amongst others, protective and rehabilitative measures (physical, psychological, legal, and educational services) provided to the victims of trafficking. The Committee requests the Government to provide a copy of the Prevention and Suppression of the Human Trafficking Act with its next report.

Article 5. Monitoring mechanisms. 1. The police and public officials. The Committee notes the Government's information on various measures aimed at training and raising public officials' awareness on preventing and eliminating child trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. In particular, the Department of Labour Protection and Welfare has carried out various seminars on collaboration between concerned agencies aimed at raising the awareness of public officials in preventing, eliminating and punishing unfair labour practices concerning children and women. The seminars were attended by 50 officers, including the Immigration Bureau and Juvenile Aid Subdivision under the Office of the Royal Thai Police. Moreover, the various measures promoted by the Subcommittee to Coordinate Combating Trafficking in Children and Women (SCTCW) to implement the National Policy and Plan of Action on Preventing, Suppressing and Combating Domestic Transnational Trafficking of Children and Women (NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003–07) include the following: (a) promoting cooperation with the Royal Thai Police to establish a specific unit responsible for combating trafficking of children and women (Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women Division); (b) organizing workshops for officers responsible for protecting children, women and disadvantaged persons. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken by the newly established Division on the Suppression of Offences against Children, Youth and Women, to combat child trafficking.

2. Protection and Occupational Development Committee (PODC). The Committee had previously noted that the Prostitution Act of 1996 established a Protection and Occupational Development Committee (PODC), composed of representatives of various ministries as well as representatives of the police and central and juvenile court police (section 14). The PODC was responsible for coordinating plans of action, projects, working systems and determining action plans to be implemented jointly by government agencies and the private sector involved in preventing and suppressing prostitution (section 15 of the Prostitution Act). Noting that the Government provides no information on the concrete measures taken by the PODC as well as their impact on preventing and eliminating child prostitution, the Committee requests the Government to provide information on this point in its next report.

Article 6. Programmes of action to eliminate the worst forms of child labour. 1. The ILO/IPEC TICW project and the National Plan on Prevention and Resolution of Domestic and Cross-border Trafficking in Children and Women (NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003–07). The Committee had previously noted that the ILO/IPEC project to combat trafficking in children and women in the Mekong subregion (TICW project) was launched in 2000 and covered Thailand, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Viet Nam, Cambodia and Yunnan (province of China). In Thailand, the first phase of the project (2000–03) focused on rural communities in the provinces of Phayao, Chiang Mai, Chiang Rai and Nong Khai. The second phase of the project (2003–08) would expand project interventions to cover the complete perspective of Thailand as a source, transit and destination country of trafficking victims with the objectives of: (i) enhancing the capacity of governmental agencies, civil society organizations and community-based groups to combat and monitor human trafficking; (ii) providing direct assistance to vulnerable groups (including people living in poor rural areas, tribal and migrant peoples); and (iii) increasing the role of the organizations of employers and workers in combating the trafficking of children and women. In the framework of the second phase of the TICW project, the National Committee on Combating Trafficking in Children and Women launched, in 2003, its first National Policy and Plan of Action on Preventing, Suppressing and Combating Domestic Transnational Trafficking of Children and Women (NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003–07), focusing on prevention, with short-term and long-term interventions, as well as on research, monitoring and evaluation systems. The Committee notes the Government's information that the following activities have been carried out at the national level in implementing the NPA: (a) signing of memorandum of understandings (MOUs) for nine northern provinces on common guidelines of practices for agencies in addressing trafficking in children and women; (b) MOU on the common guidelines and practice for government agencies concerned with cases of trafficking of children and women; (c) MOU on the procedural cooperation between governmental and non-governmental agencies concerned with cases of trafficking of children and women; (d) MOU on the operational guidelines of NGO agencies concerned with cases of trafficking of children and women. The Committee further notes the information contained in the TICW, phase II (TICW-II), progress report of 2007 that the Operational Centre for the Prevention and the Protection of Trafficking in Women and Children and the concerned governmental and non-governmental agencies signed the domestic MOU on trafficking among 19 north-eastern provinces (3 July 2006). The MOUs will be expanded to cover all 17 northern provinces in the first half of 2007. The Committee requests the Government to continue to provide information on the concrete measures taken at the national level in implementing the second phase of the TICW and the NPA on Trafficking in Children and Women 2003–07, and their impact on eliminating child trafficking.

2. Child prostitution. In its previous comments, the Committee had noted that the Office of the National Commission on Women's Affairs estimated that there were between approximately 22,500 and 40,000 prostitutes under 18 years of age (representing approximately 15–20 per cent of the overall number of prostitutes). These estimates did not include foreign child prostitutes. It had also noted that, according to UNICEF, estimates of the number of children engaged in prostitution varied from 60,000 to 200,000, with 5 per cent of them being boys (Official summary of the state of the world's children 2005). The Committee had noted that the National Plan of Action on the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (2004–09), aims at preventing and eliminating the worst forms of child labour, including child prostitution and had asked the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken under the National Plan of Action. The Committee is very concerned about the absence of information from the Government on this point. It observes that although the commercial sexual exploitation of persons under 18 is prohibited by law, it remains an issue of concern in practice. It once again requests the Government to provide information on the concrete measures taken under the National Plan of Action to eliminate the use, procuring or offering of a child under 18 for prostitution, and the results achieved.

Article 7, paragraph 1. Penalties. 1. Statistical information on child victims of trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, prosecutions, convictions and penalties. The Committee had previously noted that the enforcement of the existing penalties was very ineffective. It notes the Government's information that, according to the statistical figures of the Office of the Court of Justice, in the period 2003–04 there were 823 prosecutions concerning the offences of procuring and trafficking children for the purposes of prostitution and sexual abuse under the Penal Code. The Committee also notes that the Government mentions the difficulty of collecting precise statistics on the worst forms of child labour, especially on national and international trafficking through illegal channels. This is especially due to the unwillingness of victims of trafficking to identify themselves or their perpetrators, as well as the unwillingness of some citizens to become involved. Therefore, Thailand's next attempt is to improve and produce a more comprehensive system of data collection and analysis, disaggregated by sex, age, region and other socio-economic categories. The Committee considers that the issues of improving data collection on the number of children involved in trafficking and the effective enforcement of the penalties for child trafficking are linked. It welcomes the willingness of the Government to improve the system of data collection and analysis on trafficked children. In view of the high number of children under 18 years who are victims of trafficking and prostitution, the Committee requests the Government to redouble its efforts to ensure that persons who traffic in children or exploit children in prostitution are prosecuted and that sufficiently effective and dissuasive penalties are imposed in practice. The Committee also encourages the Government to pursue its efforts to improve the system of data collection and analysis on children involved in the worst forms of child labour, especially in trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation. In this regard, it requests the Government to provide, in its next report, statistical information on the number of children involved in trafficking and commercial sexual exploitation, and on infringements reported, investigations, prosecutions, convictions and penal sanctions applied.

2. Measures aimed at securing compensation for victims of trafficking. The Committee notes that the Government has taken a number of measures aimed at securing justice and compensation for victims of trafficking, including children, and protecting victims of trafficking during the trial period. In particular, it notes that the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act, has been adopted in order to improve the judicial system to ensure justice for victims of trafficking and prosecute the offenders. More specifically, this Act covers the following aspects: (a) the possibility of prosecuting every offender of human trafficking, no matter where the offence has been committed; (b) the protection of victims of trafficking and witnesses during the trial; (c) the possibility for victims of trafficking to claim compensation from the offenders; and (d) the provision of funds amounting to 500 million baht set up by the Government under the draft Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act, for the rehabilitation, occupational training and development of victims of trafficking. In this regard, the Government adds that the Accused Act, BE 2544 (2001) states that children who are deceived into trafficking, prostitution, or forced labour, shall receive compensation. The Committee further notes the Government's information that the Central Juvenile and Family Court, in order to give effect to the provisions of the Convention, has taken several measures aimed at training court officers to deal with children involved in trials. The Committee requests the Government to indicate in its next report the number of former child victims of trafficking who have received compensation either from the offenders or through funds set up by the Government under the Accused Act BE 2544 (2001) or the Prevention and Suppression of Human Trafficking Act, pursuant to its adoption.

Article 7, paragraph 2. Time-bound measures. Clause (a). Preventing the engagement of children in the worst forms of child labour. Trafficking of children. The Committee had previously noted that the Government, with the assistance of ILO/IPEC and collaboration of the social partners and NGOs decided, on 17 January 2005, to establish, under the TICW, joint forces in Chiang Mai, Chaing Rai and Phayao. The objectives of the joint forces were to collect data concerning the supply of and demand for trafficked individuals, to establish victim-support hotlines, raise awareness about the dangers of human trafficking, strengthen networks, develop provincial and district mechanisms for the prevention of trafficking, and promote community and school "watchdogs". The action programme would last 16 to 24 months and was expected to benefit 12,000 children and women from Chiang Mai, Chaing Rai and Phayao, who were at heightened risk of being trafficked. The Committee notes that, according to the TICW-II progress report of 2007, a provincial-level database has been developed, which contains data from various sources on persons and communities at risk of trafficking, victims of trafficking (especially for sexual exploitation), workplaces considered vulnerable to trafficking, and lessons learned. Moreover, the following activities have been carried out to raise awareness on child trafficking issues: (a) a seminar aimed at increasing the media's knowledge on trafficking and migration issues; (b) a campaign to stop violence against women and children; (c) the establishment of watchdog systems in the vulnerable communities of Phayao, Chiang Rai, and Chiang Mai; (d) the distribution of a safe migration guide for foreign migrant workers in the subregion. The Committee notes with interest that, according to the same report, 1,786 boys, 2,765 girls, and 921 young women have been prevented from trafficking through the provision of educational services or training opportunities. Furthermore, 396 boys, 286 girls, and 1,511 young women have been prevented from trafficking through the provision of other non-education-related services.

Clause (b). Providing the necessary and appropriate direct assistance for the removal of children from the worst forms of child labour, and for their rehabilitation and social integration. 1. TICSA project. The Committee notes that, according to the TICSA, Phase II, progress report of 2006, TICSA-II and the Centre for the Protection of Children's Rights jointly initiated the documentation of the "Multi Disciplinary Approach to Rehabilitation of the Victims of Trafficking". This systematic approach to rehabilitation with the support of a group of experts (physicians, psychologists, lawyers, police), has proven to be successful in various shelters. Moreover, as the "Case Information Management System" (a computer software that improves the capacity of collecting data of trafficked victims – CIMS), developed and implemented at two Government shelters, was successful, the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security (MSDHS) has planned to set up a computerized database at its shelters in other provinces.

2. Measures adopted by the Ministry of Social Development and Human Security (MSDHS). The Committee notes with interest the Government's information that the MSDHS has adopted the following measures to protect and assist children and women who are trafficked both into and out of Thailand:

- (a) establishment of the Operation Centre on Human Trafficking at the provincial, national and international levels, aimed at coordinating the concerned organizations to protect and assist the victims of trafficking;
- (b) provision of welfare protection to child and women victims of trafficking;
- (c) establishment of 99 welfare homes (the most important is the Kredtrakarn Protection and Occupational Development Centre) in 75 provinces to provide temporary assistance to Thai and non-Thai child and women victims of trafficking;
- (d) establishment of reception homes for women, and welfare protection and occupational development centres for women, in order to provide trafficked women with rehabilitative services;
- (e) provision of counselling on human trafficking concerns, especially through the telephone helpline "1300";
- (f) development of return and reintegration programmes with Cambodia, Lao People's Democratic Republic, Myanmar, and Yunnan Province in China.

The Committee notes the Government's information that the number of foreign victims assisted and housed in the MSDHS's shelters from 1999 to 2004 was 1,633. Moreover, according to the record of the MSDHS from 2000 to 2005, 3,062 foreign trafficking victims have been protected in Thai shelters and repatriated to their home countries. These include: 959 Cambodians, 567 Burmese, 501 Laotians, 20 Chinese, 12 Vietnamese, nine persons of other nationalities and four of unidentified nationality. The Committee requests the Government to specify how many of these victims of trafficking are children under 18 years. It also requests the Government to continue providing information on the number of child victims of trafficking, including Thai children, who have been rehabilitated and reintegrated in their communities.

Clause (d). Children at special risk. 1. Children from ethnic minorities. The Committee had previously noted that, according to the ILO/IPEC's report of December 2004 on TICW, ethnic communities in the north of Thailand are particularly vulnerable to trafficking and labour exploitation. Noting the absence of information on this point in the Government's report, the Committee once again requests the Government to provide information on the measures taken or envisaged to protect children under 18 years of age of ethnic minorities from trafficking for labour or sexual exploitation, particularly from prostitution.

2. Migrant workers. The Committee notes the information contained in the TICW, phase II, progress report of 2007 (page 16), that the document "The Mekong challenge – underpaid, overworked and overlooked: The situation of young migrant workers in Thailand", based on a research project targeting migrant workers in agriculture, fishing, fish-processing, small-scale manufacturing, and domestic work underlines several human rights violations, such as the forced labour and hazardous work of young migrant workers. However, ILO/IPEC is starting a new project entitled "Support for national action to combat child labour and its worst forms in Thailand". The project, which started in 2006 and will end in 2010, primarily targets migrant children found in the worst forms of child labour and will promote improved education and training policies. The Committee requests the Government to provide information on the impact of the ILO/IPEC project "Support for national action to combat child labour and its worst forms in Thailand" on protecting child migrant workers from the worst forms of child labour.

Article 8. International cooperation and assistance. 1. Regional cooperation. Following its previous comments, the Committee notes that, according to the Government's report, the following measures have been taken to combat child trafficking at the regional level: (a) the UN inter-agency project on trafficking in women and children in the Mekong subregion (UNIAP) has conducted meetings under the Coordinated Mekong Ministerial Initiative against Trafficking (COMMIT) to strengthen cooperation and coordination among countries to deal more effectively with human trafficking; (b) a draft MOU on cooperation against trafficking in persons in the greater Mekong subregion has been proposed; (c) the MSDHS has maintained coordination with five countries in the Mekong subregion through governmental, non-governmental, international organizations, embassies in Thailand and embassies in those countries, for providing assistance to foreign children and female victims of trafficking. In particular, physical and psychological rehabilitation is being provided for the foreign trafficking victims while maintaining coordination with the relevant agencies in the countries of origin in order to trace the families of the victims and assess how well prepared they are for the reintegration of the woman or child victim in the society. The Committee requests the Government to continue providing information on the concrete measures taken to eliminate the cross-border trafficking of children for labour and sexual exploitation, and the results achieved.
